The number of additions to the membership exceed those of any former pastorate.

Congregational.

The St. Paul Congregational Union is planning aggressive city missionary work and the establishment of missions in outlying districts. Rev. Alexander McGregor of Park church is at the head of a sub-committee having the matter in charge. One of the first principles of the new missionary work will be to keep out of the districts in which other Protestant denominations have established missions.

Rev. George E. Bates of Smith's Falls, Ontario, Canada, has been called to the pastorate of the church at Maplewood, Mo., vacant by the appointment of Rev. T. T. Holway as a missionary of the American Board in Turkey. Mr. Bates has been engaged in mission work at Smith's Falls.

SIGNS OF PARALYSIS. Can Be Discovered in Time.

"Numbness of the hands and arms, with premonitions of paralysis, kept by me while I was using coffee. I finally discovered it was caused by coffee. When I quit the coffee and began drinking Postum Food Coffee the numbness ceased entirely and I have been very well ever since. At that time I was unable to sleep, but now I sleep perfectly.

Husband was also troubled from lack of sleep while he was drinking coffee, but now he uses Postum Food Coffee with me, and we both sleep perfectly. Our little boy had peculiar nervous spells and I stopped the use of coffee with him and have been giving him all the Postum Food Coffee he cared for. He is perfectly well now.

My sister was troubled with nervous headaches while she used coffee. She found how greatly improved we were from discontinuing it and using Postum Food Coffee, so she made the change, and is now rid of her nervous headaches. We are naturally strong advocates of Postum." Mrs. J. Walford, Castalia, Erie Co., Ohio.

in the interests of the Forward Movement of the American Board of Foreign Missions. Sixteen states and Canada also were represented. More than half the delegates were men and nearly one-half were college graduates or students. A score of pastors and thirty-five persons engaged in educational work, with a generous supply of business men, one or two missionaries and not a few women made up the conference. Prof. E. I. Bosworth of Oberlin, Rev. Harlan Beach, Drs. Daniels and Creegan, Rev. Doremus Scudder, and J. Campbell White of Calcutta were among the speakers. The home missionary work was represented by Secretary Washington Choate and President F. G. Woodworth.

He is assisted by a good singer who is a practical personal worker. Both these men are trained in pastoral work and in the most successful methods of reaching all classes and conditions of men.

The Home Missionary Society has voted the sum of $28,000 for work in Illinois exclusive of the city auxiliaries. Another general missionary is to be put in this field, to be designated Field Secretary, and Rev. John H. Wilson, D. D., now of Mattoon, Ill., has been chosen for that position.

Rev. James Hayes, "the Coal Mine Missionary," reports that the new building at Kelleyville, Ill., is about completed. It is a matter of interest to add that this makes eight church buildings erected under his supervision and largely as the result of his arduous labors.

The congregation now occupies a commodious new structure erected two years ago.

C. D. Boyd, a conductor on the Burlington railroad, is a member of the Central Church of Christ, Denver. He found it necessary either to give up his position or run a through train on Sunday. He decided to try to hold Sunday services on the train. He began by inviting all the passengers on his train to assemble in one of the parlor cars for a sacred song service. The manager of the road gave his endorsement. Ministers or church workers are asked to conduct services. Reports say seventy-one passengers held services last Sunday while the train was flying through Nebraska.

Episcopal.

The institutions at Gambier, Ohio, have been getting some good things lately: $12,500 to endow the library, a $2,500 scholarship, the $100,000 endowment raised and the gift of $50,000 from Mr. Samuel Mather of Cleveland; $50,000 from Senator Hanna for a new dormitory and the Dr. Benson Fund of $25,000, to maintain the chair of Latin.

There have been during the past year 257 confirmations in the jurisdiction of Duluth, 59 in the Indian missions, and 198 in the parishes and missions of the white race. Two new churches have been built, and are free from debt and ready for consecration. Two other churches are in process of erection. A new Indian mission church has been built on Leech Lake; another mission has been begun at Lake Winnebago, and a new mission is planned among the Indians on the north shore of Red Lake. In the white field five new missions have been organized; two parishes have become self-supporting, which hitherto have needed assistance from the mission fund.

The new building for St. Luke's hospital, Duluth, will be completed this autumn at a total cost of $75,000. Of this amount, $40,000 has been raised in Duluth and rather more than $10,000 has been given by generous friends of Duluth in response to an appeal from the bishop. The hospital will provide accommodation for about 100 patients; it will be fireproof, and will provide the most modern accessories that medical skill demands to accomplish the best results.

Services were held in St. Paul's church, Indianapolis, on July 14, in commemoration of the thirty-fifth anniversary of the parish.

The aim has been to supply a "Bible which on the one hand retains the version around which the loving regard of the people so largely centers, and which at the same time contains all such alterations in the rendering of the text as are necessary for its intelligent use. There is a class of passages in scripture which, owing to changes in taste and feeling, need some paraphrase to give the meaning of the passage without suggesting to the modern reader associations of a distasteful or distracting character."

Rev. George S. Mead, rector of Trinity school, San Francisco, died suddenly June 19 in Guatemala, S. C.

Rev. Benjamin H. Latrobe, a retired clergyman of the diocese of Washington, died July 7 in his sixty-first year. He was rector in Baltimore, Owensboro, Ky., Philadelphia and Wilmington, Del., successively, his last charge being Trinity, Baltimore.

Presbyterian.

The corner-stone of a new edifice for Calvary church, San Francisco, was laid July 4. Dr. Minton in his address, said: "It is a truth that goes in the east without much contradiction that few cities offer more stubborn obstacles to church work than San Francisco. There are unique conditions that only the deepest piety and most consistent perseverance can survive. Old Calvary church has been for many years an important factor in maintaining moral standings, uplifting individuals and preserving here the best possible social conditions."

The First church, Minneapolis, Minn., will celebrate in the fall the recent extinction of the debt which has existed twelve years and has cost the

The United Presbyterian congregation of College Corner, Ohio, has just completed a new church at a cost of over $10,000. Rev. J. C. Warnock, the pastor, preaches in Ohio, but lives in Indiana, as the parsonage, though separated from the church by only the width of the street, happens to be in that state.

The Rev. Dr. Richard Morse Hodge, once pastor of Westminster Presbyterian church, Milwaukee, and until recently instructor in the English Bible at the Bible Institute, Nashville, is going to New York in September, where he will undertake a new work for laymen that is to be inaugurated by Union Theological Seminary. The scheme is primarily for the instruction of Sunday school teachers. The instructors are to be President Hail of the seminary, Professor Hodge, and the Rev. William D. Street, at present an assistant in a local Reformed church. Extension lectures are to be undertaken, to be given in churches in Brooklyn and perhaps in some nearby New Jersey city.

The changing of troops in the Philippines from one part to another, and always through Manila, causes an enormous demand upon Young Men's Christian Association quarters in that city. Larger accommodations are to be provided as soon as possible. At Iloilo a new building has just been secured, and work on Subig bay and at Dagupan has been put upon a better basis.

Land has been set aside within the legation enclosure in Peking, China, for a Young Men's Christian Association building, and workers are to be sent there at once.

Foreign Missionary Items.

Rev. Arthur J. Brown, D. D., writes: "This entire trip through the villages of Korea has been a revelation to us. We have journeyed by so circuitous a path in order to see as many of the outstations as possible that we have covered 350 miles. Everywhere, the Christians have been hospitable and affectionate, while in several places the evidences of the Holy Spirit's transforming power have been wonderful. In Eul Yul, for example, a town of 4,000 inhabitants, there were no Christians three years ago. Then one of its prominent men went to Seoul to buy an office. He met Dr. Underwood, was converted, put his money into Bibles and tracts instead of an office, returned and distributed them among his fellow townsmen. The Spirit of God had evidently prepared them for they responded at once. Now there are eighty baptized Christians in Eul Yul and a considerable number of catechumens. The people have built unaided a neat little church, pay all their congregational expenses and have donated half the cost of the native house set apart for the use of the visiting missionary.

A learned Moslem convert to Christianity, Sheikh Michaiel, is conducting preaching services every Wednesday night in Boulak, near Cairo, and Moslems attend in large numbers. He has published three volumes in vindication of Christianity as superior to Islam in many fundamental particulars.

Latest reports from Japan state that the new converts number several thousand. The revival of churches and pastors is thorough. Public men, Christian and non-Christian, are being moved by the upheaval to more reverence for the gospel and for the work of the Church. The missionaries are curbing the extravagant native expectation, and planning for such supplementary action by churches and pastors as shall make the period of revival one that will bring about permanent good rather than temporary exaltation.

Gave Good Advice.

A young doctor who had recently commenced practice in a new neighborhood, one day had brought to him an uncommonly unwashed infant in the arms of a mother equally unwashed.

Looking down upon the child for a moment, he solemnly said: "It seems to be suffering from hydropathic hydrophobia."

"Oh, doctor! is it as bad as that?" cried the mother. "That's a big sickness for such a mite. Whatever shall I do for the child?"

"Wash its face, madam," replied the doctor. "The disease will go off with the dirt."

"Wash its face—wash its face, indeed!" exclaimed its mother, losing her temper. "What next, I'd like to know?"

"Wash your own, madam; wash your own!" was the prompt rejoinder.

Bishop Whipple says that when he went into the West to preach he was exceedingly anxious to reach artisans and railway operatives, of whom there were hundreds in Chicago. He called upon Wm. McAlpine, the chief engineer of the Galena railway, and asked his advice as to the best way of approaching the employes of the road.

"How much do you know about a steam engine?" asked McAlpine.

"Nothing."

"Then," said McAlpine, "read 'Lardner's Railway Economy' until you are able to ask an engineer a question about a locomotive and he not think you a fool."

The clergyman had the practical sense to see the justice of that advice. So he "read up," and in due season went to the roundhouse of the Galena railway, where he found a number of engineers standing by a locomotive which the firemen were cleaning. He saw that it was a Taunton engine with inside connections, and asked, at a venture:

"Which do you like best, inside or outside connections?"

This brought out information about steam heaters and variable exhausts, and in half an hour he had learned more than his book had ever taught him. When he said good-by, he added:

"Boys, where do you go to church? I have a free church in Metropolitan hall, where I shall be glad to see you, and if at any time you need me, shall be glad to go to you."

The following Sunday every man was in church.

BOOKS

Luther and the German Reformation, by Professor T. M. Lindsay, D. D. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

This is one of the volumes in the series devoted to "the world's epoch-makers." Professor Lindsay had already long ago proved his mastery of this period in Christian history by his capital handbook on the Reformation. In this brief volume of less than three hundred pages, he gives a clear and most attractive account of Martin Luther. The modern spirit is shown in Dr. Lindsay's very careful attention to the sociological aspects of the Reformation movement. That Luther powerfully influenced and yet only half understood these extra-religious forces, has long been well-known; but the facts are brought out with great distinctness by the author. Another admirable feature in this book is the emphasis put upon the fact that Luther discovered no new doctrine. "If we look into the matter," he says, "the Reformation did not bring to light many truths which was absolutely unknown in the mediaeval church. The spiritual life of the mediaeval Christian was fed on the same divine thoughts which are the basis of the Reformation theology. * * * This Reformation which Luther led was the outcome of the old family piety which had flowered during all the previous centuries." (p. 14.) The whole passage is worthy of careful pondering, for that Christian consciousness from the time of the apostles to our own has been more stable, more self-consistent, than a mere survey of our technical theologies would indicate, and it rests on or rises from a theology which, if it were discovered and adequately set forth, would be the final statement of truth.

"The True Story of a Revival," by a pastor's wife—Fleming H. Revell Co.—is one of those books which disarms criticism. It is a simple narrative telling "how one town arranged for special evangelistic meetings, with a record of the outcome." The personality of the evangelists in question is made too important and obtrusive—their modus operandi is unconsciously made to reveal the skillful manipulations of men who had learned to adjust means to ends so as to secure definite results; yet one is made to hope that the wheat exceeded the tares. At the heart of the movement described there was doubtless a goodly measure of spiritual reality. It will not do, however, to hold up this very highly individualized form of evangelistic work as a model. "There are diversities of operations, but the one Spirit." We have the impression that this "true story of a revival" has gained greatly in the telling of it. The "Pastor's Wife" yields a facile pen; her soul is on fire; she magnifies her subject and glids with glory—commonplace events and commonplace men. To those who are prepared to benefit by them her glowing pages will be suggestive of possibilities in church life. There are no doubt communities in which a similar work might be successful, but there are others in which it would be abortive.

Junior Bible Lessons by W. J. Mutch—Christian Nurture, New Haven, Conn.—is a book of special interest because it is along the line of reconstruction work in Sunday school helps. It consists of twenty-six brief chapters and deals with the Patriarchs. When it came to our table we opened it with avidity; for in no department of religious literature is there such a need and demand for something new as in our Sunday school lesson helps. We wish we could honestly say that it met our expectations. Although written from our modern point of view in a clear and simple style, with an evident intent to make prominent the ethical teachings in the lives of the patriarchs, its material is not very thoroughly digested. The general character of the work is scrappy. Yet it is so much better than much that is published that many will no doubt find it of great value. And it has, moreover, the great merit of being something of a pioneer book in the reconstruction period in Sunday school literature upon which we are entering.

"The Messages of Jesus, According to the Synoptists; the Discourses of Jesus in the Gospels of Matthew, Mark and Luke; Arranged as far as Feasible in the Order of Time, and Freely Rendered in Paraphrase," by Thomas Cumming Hall, D. D., New York. Charles Scribner's Sons, 1901. Pp. 236. Price, $1.25.

Dr. Hall was formerly the pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church of Chicago, and is now Professor of Christian Ethics in Union Theological Seminary. This volume belongs to the series of messages of the Bible, edited by Professors Sanders and Kent of Yale University. Its scope is indicated by its title. In a suggestive introduction, the synoptic question is reviewed and its different factors characterized. The remainder of the book is devoted to the consideration of the materials presented by the synoptic gospels, with a somewhat careful treatment of the form of the narratives and of the teachings of Jesus contained in them. The volume will be found a helpful addition to the apparatus for the study of the gospels.

CHAS. J. BURTON, Editor, Canton, Me.

The literary Era for July gives a wide survey of the field of literature. One of its surprises is the statement that "Elizabeth Stoddard is the one woman in America who has revealed the profoundest depth of genius." She is called the Charlotte Bronte of America. Her three books of fiction "The Morgesons," "Two Men," and "Temple House" which were originally written about forty years ago, and which are said to be strangely modern in spirit, are about to be issued in a uniform library edition.

Under the title of "The Making of an America," Jacob A. Riis is giving in "The Outlook" a sketch of his eventful life. No romance could be more thrilling. The plucky way in which he hewed for himself a path to a life of honorable usefulness presents to young men an example worthy of emulation.

NEW WABASH EQUIPMENT.

The Wabash Railroad has just received and placed in service on its lines running out of Chicago the following new equipment: Eight combination baggage and passenger coaches, thirty palace day coaches, ten reclining chair cars, three cafe cars and two dining cars. The majority of these new cars are seventy feet in length, and fitted with the latest style wide vestibules. They have six-wheel trucks with steel wheels. The cars are finished in the finest selected Jago mahogany. The lighting is by Pintsch gas with the exception of the cafe, dining and some of the chair cars, which are unusually well lighted by electricity, the fixtures being especially designed for these cars. The dining cars will seat twenty-nine persons and have ample kitchen space. The cafe cars will seat eighteen persons in the cafe, and have a library and smoking room in the observation end of the car which will seat fourteen persons. These cars also contain a private cafe with seating capacity for eight persons. These new cars represent the highest stage of the development of modern car building. Nothing has been omitted and no expense spared that would add to their luxurious elegance, or to the comfort and convenience of the patrons of the Wabash road.

No line is now better equipped than the Wabash for handling business to the Pan-American Exposition. Write for a copy of Pan-American folder containing a large colored map of the Exposition grounds and zinc etching of the principal buildings.

The Acorns and the Oak.

H. Rea Woodman.

Under an old oak tree—a grand old oak, that for a hundred years had stood firm, straight as a marble statue—the little acorns were discussing their prospects in life. The discussion had been brought about by an old man, an old man with a pale, patient face, who walked with a cane, putting an acorn into his pocket and saying, "Come, little oak tree, you be mine!" The acorns had said nothing, they were naturally very polite, until the old man was quite out of hearing. Then one little acorn who sat on a bit of projecting root and looked quite lordly, laughed and said:

"What a funny old man! Did you see him?"

"Yes," replied Somebody, "called an acorn an oak! Must be crazy!"

"Maybe it was a joke," piped up a solemn little acorn who never knew a joke, but who was always looking for one, "it might be, don't you think so?" anxiously.

The Acorn of the Lordly Air laughed disdainfully.

"No, we'll tell you in time to laugh, when there is a joke! The old man is childish, I presume," and he turned to talk to a dancing-eyed daisy who grew near him.

"But why," commenced an earnest acorn, whom they called "the Judge," because he was so grave and always so much in earnest, "why did the old man take the acorn? If we are so worthless why did he want one of us? He did not look like a foolish old man, and I don't believe he was. We must be good for something. Oh, I wish I knew, I wish I knew!" and "the Judge" almost groaned.

"Of course, we are good for something—it is something just to be!" cried out an acorn near the Judge.

"What do you mean?" queried the frivolous acorn, with an uncomfortable shiver, "It doesn't sound very nice, anyway."

"I mean," the little acorn had heard the remark somewhere, and hadn't the remotest idea what it meant, "I mean we ought to wait and see what we're good for."

"I do not mind waiting, only I'd like to know," said the Judge. Then he added, sadly, "We really know nothing but what we are now. I want to know what I am going to be."

"Umph! Listen to the Judge!" sneered the Lordly Acorn, "takes it for granted he's going to be something."

The Judge's sensitive little face flushed. But before he could answer the Old Oak, who had been listening, said quietly, "The Judge is right, he is going to be something. His wanting to be means that he shall be. Years ago, little acorns, so many years ago that the children who knew me have been dead a long, long time, I was a little acorn, lying on the ground as you are, wondering and hoping as you do. Nobody told me, as I now tell you, that little acorns grow to be great oaks; nobody told me that I, an humble little acorn, had something to do in the real world. I was very anxious and worried about it, and asked a great

And then one day, when a man buried me in the earth, so cold and damp, all alone, my heart almost broke, for then I was sure there was nothing more for me, that I would just die there, never amount to anything or be anybody. But as I lay there, so sad and alone, in the dreadful ground, I began to grow, and I grew right up into the sunlight, and then I wanted to lift myself into the blue of heaven, I felt so glad and thankful. You see all my hope came back and helped me grow. So day after day, year after year, I many questions, but nobody told me. grew and grew, glad and happy, trying to reach Heaven, trying to be bigger and stronger and better. I was very proud when the storms of winter raged about me, for I did not falter nor shiver. And when the birds sang in my branches and the children rested in my shade, I was contented, because I was of some use in the world. I am an old oak now, but my heart is still young. People say I am dying—I do not know, perhaps I am. But I want to say to you all, be patient and hopeful, for little acorns are of use in the world. That is what the old man meant—that you are the beginnings of mighty trees which bless and protect men."

Some of the acorns were not listening. All the time the Old Oak was talking, the Lordly Acorn was flirting outrageously with the daisy. But the Oak saw that the restless little heart army of business men such as has he rustled his leaves softly and smiled. For, being a wise old Oak, he knew that it is worth while to comfort one little heart, to quiet one little soul.

A Piece of His Mind.

Abraham Lincoln said a great many wise things, but perhaps he never gave better advice than at one time to Secretary Stanton. Mr. Stanton, it seems, was greatly vexed because an army officer had refused to understand an order, or, at all events, had not obeyed. "I believe I'll sit down," said Stanton, "and give that man a piece of my mind." "Do so," said Mr. Lincoln, "write it now while you have it on your mind. Make it sharp; cut him all up." Stanton did not need another invitation. It was a bone-crusher that he read to the president. "That's right," said Abe, "that's a good one." "Whom can I get to send it by?" mused the secretary. "Send it?" replied Lincoln, "send it! Wry, don't send it at all. Tear it up. You have freed your mind on the subject and that is all that is necessary. Tear it up. You never want to send such letters; I never do!"—Christian Work.

What a Small Vice Costs.

"How can you afford all these books?" asked a young man, calling upon a friend; "I can't seem to find spare change for even the leading magazines."

"Oh, that library is only my 'one cigar a day,'" was the reply.

"What do you mean," inquired the visitor.

"Mean? Just this: when you advised me to indulge in an occasional cigar several years ago, I had been reading about a young fellow who bought books with money that others would have burned in cigars, and I thought I would try to do the same. You may remember that I said I should allow myself one cigar a day?"

"Yes, I recall the conversation but don't quite see the connection."

"Well, I never smoked, but I put by the price of a five-cent cigar every day, and as the money accumulated, I bought books—the very books you see."

"You don't mean to say that your books cost no more than that! Why, there are dollars' worth of them."

"Yes, I know there are. I had six years more of my apprenticeship to serve when you advised me 'to be a man.' I put by the money, which at five cents a day amounted to $18.25 a year, or $109.50 in six years. I keep those books by themselves as a result of my apprenticeship cigar money; and if you'd done as I did you would by this time have saved many many more dollars than I have, and would have been better off in health and self-respect besides."—Success.

Power of a Woman's Word.

He was only an Italian fruit-vender. There was nothing about him at all likely to inspire the beholder with feeling, one way or another. He was not ragged enough to call for especial sympathy, nor unkempt enough to provoke disgust. Yet to the policeman on his beat he was the object of considerable aversion. This was shown by the unrelenting vigor with which the fruit-seller was pursued from corner to corner by the zealous guardian of the law.

The other day, in a too hurried response to the everlasting order to "move on," the peddler's cart was upset, and his peaches and pears were scattered over the ground and across the street-car track. The enraged policeman could barely restrain the impulse to use his club.

"The dirty loafer!" he exclaimed "He did it on purpose—just trying to excite sympathy!"

"He has succeeded, then," said a soft voice at the officer's elbow, and a neat little woman stooped and began to gather up the scattered fruit.

The officer's face reddened. He hesitated a moment, and then he, too, joined in the work of restoration.—Mail and Express.

Christian Melodies

BY PROF. WM. J. KIRKPATRICK

Professor Wm. J. Kirkpatrick, the author of CHRISTIAN MELODIES, is one of the leading and best known gospel song writers in the world today. His songs have been sung the world over in almost every town. Some of his songs have been translated and sung in all languages. He has the advantage of many years of experience as a musician and song writer, and has put the best productions of his life time, as well as the best songs of the principal song writers of the country, into CHRISTIAN MELODIES. This certainly insures for this book the greatest variety and the best quality of songs.

A Book of the Rarest Musical Gems

This is the universal pronouncement of all musicians who have used or examined this new and popular song book. All responses from those using the book are enthusiastic praises. "Best book of the kind I have ever seen." "The more we use it the better we like it." "Gets better all the time;" etc. These are samples of expressions received. No other book on the market approaches it as an all-purpose church song book. It is mechanically perfect, neat, artistic and durable. It contains 192 pages and 227 songs.

FAC-SIMILE OF COVER, REDUCED.

PROF. WM. J. KIRKPATRICK.

THE CHOICEST SONGS OF THE CENTURY

Every song writer has a few favorite songs—or those which he regards as his best—and which make for the author his reputation. Every musician has also his own peculiar style. A book written principally by one man does not excel, as it has no variety of style and but a few very good songs. In CHRISTIAN MELODIES, eighty leading song writers have contributed their favorite or best songs. This insures not only a collection of the most excellent songs, but also the greatest variety of style. This is why people never grow tired of the songs in CHRISTIAN MELODIES. Besides its large number of the latest songs it contains a great many of the old songs that have become popular favorites and never die.

No expense was spared in the production of this book. The best songs were secured regardless of their cost. Many very good songs were rejected because not good enough. No other book shows such care and judgment in excluding the inferior and including only the best. No cheap devices or make shifts, such as rivets were used in binding. It is a hand sewed book, which is the best and most expensive style of binding. If you want the most popular, best wearing and most satisfactory all-around song book get Christian Melodies, pronounced by all who have used it, "A Book of Gems." It is the best and cheapest.

They are printed separate from the text and make one grand panorama of pictorial embellishments that are as instructive and pleasing as they are ornamental and accurate.

EDITORIAL

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES:

The Christian Century is published in the interests of essential Christianity. It is the organ of no party; the advocate of no ism. While welcoming the ascertained results of modern Christian scholarship, it stands for the great evangelical verities which are the foundation stones of the Christian system. It seeks to be tolerant in spirit, practical in aim, and warmly sympathetic towards all the present day problems of religious thought and life. It also aims at being at once a clearing house and medium of communication between the different denominations, so that they may by free and fraternal expression of opinion become better acquainted with one another and may be led to join forces in more aggressive work for the advancement of the Redeemer's Kingdom.

THE CALL OF THE MASTER.

WHEN Jesus spoke to his audience in Galilee the significant words, "Come unto me," he did not mean to call men to several of the things which have been supposed to inhere in that broadly extended invitation, nor did he address himself merely to the small group of people who made up his immediate audience. Speaking to the larger circle of men and women represented by those who were his hearers, he issued a call which is at once the most imperative and stupendous demand ever uttered by any teacher. All possible constructions have been placed upon these words, but it is apparent that many of the things which have been associated with them were not in the mind of our Lord. He did not demand a fixed method of worship as the Jew would have done, nor a formulation of truth, as would the Greek, nor the construction of an organization, in which the Roman would have been interested. Far deeper and wider were his purposes.

Jesus did not call men to an order of worship which was different from that to which they had been accustomed. Liturgy, ritual, the splendid and stately services of the temple and altar were already familiar to the world, and Jesus apparently did nothing to add to this catalogue, nor indeed does he seem to have concerned himself with such a programme. He was himself a Jew, obedient to the law in all of its great requirements, and ignoring nothing of its ancestral sanction save those useless formulations which had grown out of the speculative efforts of scribes and pharisees:

and which laid upon the people burdens too great to be borne. From these, Jesus dissented in emphatic terms; and questioned the right of any group of teachers to burden the consciences of men with obedience to such external and mechanical observances. For himself and his followers, Jesus accepted no stereotyped plan of worship as essential. To the questioning woman at the well of Samaria, he gave the outline of his idea of worship by saying that the historic distinction between Gerizim and Jerusalem as the places where men ought to worship God was immaterial; that place and time and circumstances were all non-essential, but that the vital element in worship was the true purpose, the aspiration of the soul to companionship with God, and "the upright heart and pure." In these words, Jesus asserted the perfect equality of all places as sanctuaries; the splendid cathedral with its historic glooms and graves, the small and plain conventicle in which only the simplest service is held, the groves which "were God's first temples" and where the soul rises to God on the wings of reverent adoration, inspired by the beauty and power of nature, or the chamber in which the devout and prayerful soul shuts itself in, wish to enter the Holy of Holies and gaze upon the ineffable splendor of the presence of God. The thought that a formal service of this or that kind is necessary was essentially Jewish, and wherever the ideal persists, it is the survival of Judaism. The spirit of the gospel permits the use of all forms of worship which accredit themselves to Christian experience and which are helpful and uplifting. If they meet the needs of the worshipper, they are means of grace. In so far as they are substitutes for the worshipping heart and the consecrated life, they are but "sounding brass and clanging cymbal." Jesus calls not to a particular kind of worship, but to worship itself as the communion of the soul with God, and the preparation for the life of service.

If the Jewish spirit essentially expressed itself in certain forms of worship, not less did the Greek mind exercise itself upon formulations of truth. The representative Jew as he accepted Christianity, was in danger of making it a new ritual. To the Greek it became a new philosophy. To take the splendid essence of Christianity and to throw it into the speculative forms of a system of thought, was, to the Greek, the highest use to be made of the new principle. But Jesus did not invite men to a new philosophy. Indeed, he gave his teachings to the world in no such ordered and numbered forms as could be fitted into a system like those which had been set forth by other teachers before his day, and have been the delight of the schools in all the years. Jesus did not ask men to accept a body of truth, nor even any single proposition. It is often said:

that this or that fact of our Lord's life, or some particular statement of his, is to be taken as the embodiment of Christianity. Such can never be the case, so long as we keep the true proportion of things in mind. The difference between Jesus and other teachers lay deeper than the small distinctions which were to be drawn between their teachings and his. Indeed, it is often affirmed that Jesus spoke nothing that was new or original. If one cared to take up the challenge, the proofs are ample that this thesis could not be maintained; yet for the sake of showing the unique supremacy of our Lord as a teacher, one might be willing to accept the consequences of this statement. Granted that Jesus taught nothing new, that his words were mere repetitions of those which had been uttered by Confucius, Plato, Aristotle, Hillel and Shammai; yet the wonder lies in the fact that these very words uttered by Jesus aroused men as no other words to which the world has ever listened. Other teachers had come and gone and had left great or less influence upon the thought of their age, but Jesus, by the spirit that was in his teaching, made men "hunger and thirst after righteousness," and sent them away with a strange yearning after holiness and a mysterious reverence for him, not as a great orator, but as one who "spake as never man spake." The call of Jesus was, therefore, not to the acceptance of a proposition, not even the proposition of his own Messiahship or divinity, much less any formal truth of his utterance. An ordered statement, embracing all the teachings which Jesus gave to the world, would not be the object whose acceptance Jesus commanded. There is no vitalizing power in the acceptance of a proposition, however true, in the embracing of a creed however rich, or the submission to a testimony however time-honored and revered. It was to a more vital object that Jesus called men.

Nor did he invite them into an institution. The Roman found his interest in framing governments, laws, institutions, as the Jew in forms of worship and the Greek in dialectic. The world was full of organizations with various objects and characteristics, but it was not to the number of these that Jesus wished to add. He took no thought during his earthly ministry to formulate a scheme of organization for any set of people who might accept his invitation and regard themselves as his followers. He appeared to give no attention to the enterprise of fashioning for himself a church, in so far as related to an external organization with methods of procedure and rules for its regulation. Indeed, Jesus, so far as we have record of his teaching, never but once mentioned the church, but continually spoke rather of the Kingdom of God, as the rule of the Father in human hearts, the new social order in which the divine ideals were to be realized. The constant emphasis of our Lord was placed upon this idea, and his habitual theme was the Kingdom. It was the apostles in later times who, gathering up the results of Jesus' teaching, concerned themselves with the organization of the church. It may be affirmed with certainty, therefore, that Jesus knew that his teachings would cause men who were like-minded with himself to associate themselves in a visible organization, and that the welfare and growth of this organization would be the chief concerns of his apostolic followers in the period following his departure; yet this organization, the church, apparently lay only in the outer circle of his thought when he gave to men his invitation to fellowship with himself. The church may be regarded rather as the natural consequence of his work than its object. It was a means rather than a direct end of his thought. The church was to become the power by whose means the Kingdom should be extended. The Kingdom is the totality of redeemed souls and redemptive forces in the universe; the church is the visible means by which the enterprises of the Kingdom are carried forward; it is the group of men and women in whom the Kingdom has already found partial realization. Jesus called men to enter the Kingdom, and he knew that this would lead them to associate themselves in the church; but there was something more vital than this organization of a church which lay implicit in his words of invitation.

Passing by any new scheme of religious worship into which the Jew would have been concerned to turn Christianity, leaving aside the philosophic and speculative forms into which the Greek mind strove to cast the new faith, and remembering that it was not to be merely an organization such as the Roman was so well able to construct, one asked himself, To what, then, did Jesus call men? The answer is found in his own words, "Come unto Me." He called men to himself, not to a form of worship he proposed to unfold, not to a scheme of thought which centered in himself, nor to an organization of which he was to be the head. He knew full well that worship would take forms adapted to the Christian spirit, that the truths of which he was the center would properly group themselves into Christian theology, and that the association of believers in him would issue in the Church which should spread throughout the world; yet these were the remoter issues of his great call. He invited men rather to himself, to his point of view, to the acceptance of his methods of looking at life, to his attitude toward God, to his faith in men, to his great horror of sin and all estrangement from God, and his love for all who bore the divine image. He invited men to come into the atmosphere of his life, to come and find how simple and yet how glorious a thing life is, to come and learn the fine art of living. He did not ask men to accept the Jewish scheme of legalism, nor the temple worship nor the formalities which lay in that field of outward religion. He called men to the love of God and men, which legalism never realized. His own patient devotion to human life is shown in his relation to Zacchaeus the Publican, the Syro-Phoenician mother, the Roman centurion, and sinners of every name and degree. He wished to bring to men life, and that life in greater abundance. He did not ask men to accept the Greek ideas, or the distinctions of the schoolmen, nor the lore of the academy, yet he gave them in himself a truer view of life than all the porches had furnished; a view so satisfying and a life so complete that they asked wistfully for nothing more. And, again, he led men away from the love of mere power and mere organization, such as the Roman revered and prized, into a power and accomplishment new to the world. He laid his hand on the best possessions of Jew and Greek and Roman and said, "These are mine, and something far better is mine, which I will give to you; and that is Life; come unto me, you who are restless and unsatisfied, even in the success that you have attained, and I will give you the satisfaction which you seek elsewhere in vain; not in indolence, but in service, not in negation, but in larger acceptance of truth. That truth is myself. Come unto me, and find rest; come and eat that which is good, and your famished soul shall live."

This is still the call of Christ; not to a form of worship, not to a theology, nor to an institution, but to himself. In his presence worship will become satisfying, truth will be full and rewarding, and the Church the life-giving force it was intended to be. But these derive their value only from him, who is the giver of all life, the fulness of him that filleth all in all.

"BECAUSE OF THE ANGELS."

HE words quoted above suggests a guiding principle in the matter of Christian deportment. They present a reason or motive for observing the strictest propriety in the smallest details of social life.

"Because of the angels" the Corinthian women were not to violate the prevailing customs among Eastern women, or override the prevailing ideas of womanly modesty, disregarding the distinctions of sex—the abolition of which would lead to social confusion. They seem to have claimed the right to do all that men did, the right to appear unveiled in public, and to pray with heads uncovered—in imitation of the pagan priestesses; the right, in a word, to set aside all the established laws of social decorum.

But "because of the angels" they were bound to pay regard to the proprieties of life, so as to prevent scandal, and keep dishonor from coming upon the name of their Master, Christ.

There have been almost as many meanings put upon the words "because of the angels" as there are commentators. These we need not recount. The practical truth which lies at the core of the words is, however, self-evident. One feasible explanation is this: Because of the unseen angelic witnesses, who are present in religious assemblies as spectators of their deeds, the Corinthian women were to be careful to do nothing irregular or indecent. They were not to incite bad angels to wantonness, nor grieve good angels by their unseemly behavior.

Another view which may be advanced, and which we, upon the whole, regard as the most reasonable, is this: The word "angels" is here to be taken in the modified sense of messengers or spectators. Into Christian gatherings came messengers from the world to take notes, to criticise, to spy out the liberty which Christians had in Christ, and to report what they saw and heard to those who had sent them. So, because of the messengers or angels who would be glad to blaze abroad any evil report, it behooved the Christian women of Corinth to observe the rules of social life, so as not to expose themselves to the scorn, contempt and ridicule of the world.

These words taken thus teach the practical lesson of watchfulness. Christians are to remember that the eyes of the world are upon them; nor are they to complain that those eyes are too keen, too critical, too relentless. To be under the scrutiny of others is a salutary thing. Public sentiment is a mirror in which every man can see a reflection of himself.

We need the restraint of knowing that others are looking on. We often fancy that we are unseen when our smallest act is being accurately weighed and measured. It is a wholesome thing to have a regard for the opinion of others. How many Scripture exhortations are based upon the value of social judgments. "Give no occasion of stumbling, either to Jews or Greeks, or to the church of God; even as I also please all men in all things, not asking my own profit, but the profit of the many that they may be saved." "Give no occasion of stumbling in anything." "Convince the gainsayers." "So is the will of God that with well-doing ye may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men."

A special application of this principle may be made to vacation experiences. When Christian people go off on their summer holiday they are apt to relax vigilance, and let down high principle. Because of the angels they ought to be careful. The little church in the woods which has been struggling along all the year hears that some Christian families prominent in religious work in a distant city are coming to spend the summer in the vicinity. They are cheered at the prospect of the re-enforcement of strength. But what is their dismay and mortification to find that these Christian workers scarcely ever come near them. They spend the Lord's day in idleness and frivolity, swinging in hammocks and reading light literature as the humble worshipers go past them to church. What will the unchurched onlookers think of this, and what effect will it have upon them? Because of the angels Christians are to be watchful. They are to show that their religion is portable; that it can stand the heat of summer, and the enervating influences of vacation experiences.

"The Church needs to-day not only more men, but more man."

Retribution seldom descends swiftly as an avalanche, but generally moves forward slowly as a ponderous, irresistible glacier.

We have no right to lie down in the pastures of tender grass unless we have wearied ourselves bending our backs to the sickle in the harvest fields of life.

We are sometimes so impressed by a fellow man's estimate of his importance that we tremble at the mere suggestion of what might have been if the Lord had forgotten to make him.

THE QUIET HOUR.

WE all know that the Christian life needs to be tended and watched over with great care. Our own human will and intelligence are essential factors in the experiences of God's grace and the keeping of God's peace. His best gifts come to us and remain with us not as a mere matter of course, mechanically; they need to be seen and chosen, pondered and held fast by us. All the best theologians of all schools agree that in order to make progress in Christian character and in the knowledge of God, the co-operation of the will of man with the will of God must be freely and constantly rendered. Hence the great need and untold value of the daily "quiet hour." It may be less or more than an hour that we are able to spend in the search for hid treasure; but there ought to be, there must be, some time every day which we use in Bible reading and in prayer.

What most of us need is some guidance in the use of the time and some direct stimulus to devotion. For this all kinds of manuals of devotion, books of meditation, are to be had. And there are also the great classics of the Christian life. It would be interesting to know how many of the earnest people in our churches—pastors, Sunday-school teachers, elders, deacons, and others, possess and have read these great and immortal books. They can now-a-days be had for almost nothing; they are great enough to be plain to the common sense of the ordinary man, and out of them the water of life is flowing generation after generation. We refer to such books as Augustine's "Confessions," Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress" and "Grace Abounding," "The Imitation of Christ," by Thomas a Kempis, and William Law's "Serious Call." There are many more. But these are certainly among the deepest and richest. To live with these great hearts awhile is to be brought daily nearer God.

It is the purpose of The Christian Century to do what it can in the furtherance of the devotional life. It recognizes that there is much more needed in a true religious paper than earnest discussion and widely-harvested church news, and literary criticism and pleasant sketches and stories. All these we hope to provide for our readers with increasing excellence and variety as time goes on. But we desire much to provide help also for those whose feet are moving or would move swiftly towards the still waters and the green pastures of the devotional, the prayerful and deep-souled life. We plan to do this, first of all, by means of the columns entitled, "The Quiet Hour." Our readers have already discovered that Mr. Smellie, who writes those columns, is a man religiously gifted for that delicate task. His brief comment on a brief portion of Scripture selected for daily reading has three remarkable qualities: It goes to the main point in each passage with a scholar's skill, it speaks in language at once simple and full of literary grace, and it does teach the heart and conscience of the reader who through it is feeling after some message, some movement, of the Spirit of God. These brief paragraphs may be read not only in the secret places of individual prayer, but at the family altar. They have been so used with comfort and delight. To read the passage named at the heading of each paragraph and then Mr. Smellie's comment, and then to offer a brief prayer ending with the Lord's prayer, this would surely make a beautiful daily service in many a home where now there is none.

It is the intention of The Christian Century to do more than this for the "interior life" of its readers. We propose to have articles written by well-known men on the entire history of this subject. We hope to describe the books, some of which we named above, giving an account of their authors and the place which these books hold in the life of the Church of Christ. We will watch for every opportunity to address our readers on subjects and in a manner that shall lead them to walk with firmer step and heart afire in the sacred and blessed "world of prayer." In this way we confidently desire and hope that The Christian Century will occupy a unique place in the personal affection of its readers. For we know that none are loved by us like those who minister to that which is the central hunger of the soul of man, the yearning for the fellowship of God.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

A Literary Iconoclast.

FRENCHMAN, Henri Vigneaud, first secretary of the United States embassy, declares that "Columbus was a fraud of the first magnitude." M. Vigneaud, who has the reputation of being the greatest living authority upon the early period of American history, has written a book to show that the letter and map which Loscanelli, the great Florentine astronomer, is said to have forwarded to King Alphonso of Portugal, and to Columbus, was not sent to them at all. It seems that Columbus committed this literary forgery to make people believe that he was in communication with the savants of his time. But most of us would never have heard of the great Florentine Loscanelli, but for his connection with Columbus. And at any rate Columbus got there. He discovered America and that is glory enough for any man. Over the blemishes in the life of Columbus let charity draw the veil. To call attention to the wart on the face is a poor business.

Funeral Sermons.

Funerals and weddings are tests of ministerial tact. Many a poor preacher has made for himself a strong place in a community by his ability to give dignity and grace to these occasions. Sometimes a preacher by some act of indiscretion ruins his influence. A flagrant violation of good taste is reported in the case of an Indiana preacher who, a few days ago, at the bier of an ex-congressman, passed severe judgment upon his life. He meant to be honest, but he was merely foolish. He had no right to take advantage of the occasion to harrow the feelings of the dead man's friends and relatives by telling all the truth. There are times when silence is the truest eloquence. The old saying, "Speak good only of the dead" may sometimes be carried too far, but it affords a safe rule to go by. Besides the function of a preacher at an open grave is to speak words of consolation to the living.

Epworth League Convention.

A Methodist gathering is nothing if it is not enthusiastic. For the first few days of the great Epworth League Convention in San Francisco, things moved on rather quietly. The delegates were occupying too much of their time sight-seeing. Dr. Berry, general secretary of the League, reminded them what they had come for and admonished them to "get to work and pump salvation into the people." The tide was instantly turned. The young people forsook the allurements of the Coast and gave themselves up to an aggressive religious campaign. Open-air meetings were held in half a dozen widely-separated districts. Evangelistic services were also held in the music stand in Golden Gate Park, and in the court of the Palace Hotel. These extemporized services were in addition to the regular meetings of the convention, which were held in the Alhambra Theater, the Metropolitan Temple, and Central and Howard Street Churches. That the city was moved; that the Epworth Leaguers made their presence felt cannot be doubted. From sunrise till evening the meetings were crowded; and religious fervor seems to have been at white heat. The programme had in it many excellent features, and some of the papers read were of high merit, but the prevailing note of the convention seems to have been the evangelistic one. The delegates gave themselves up to the work of saving souls. With the aim and spirit of such work we have the profoundest sympathy, but its methods are too suggestive of machine-made religion—something gotten up to order—something that is more suggestive of hypnotism than of the Holy Spirit. It is easy to work up young, susceptible souls into a tempest of passion; but a reaction is sure to come. That hotbed form of piety is apt to wilt. Instruction in divine truth and guidance in the practical matters of Christian life ought to occupy all the time in gatherings of young Christians.

Prayer for Rain.

Prayer for rain was offered in the churches of Kansas. On the following day the rain came. It fell in torrents. People stood in the streets to get the benefit of the cooling shower. They rejoiced with shouting. Finally they marched in procession into the churches and extemporized a thanksgiving service. They felt, and rightly so, that God had sent the rain. The faith of many in the power of prayer was confirmed. But suppose the rain had not come. Suppose that the heavens had remained as brass and that the shrivelled grain had been burned up; would that have been evidence that God had failed to answer prayer? This is a hard question; but of one thing we are sure; it is never safe to ground our faith in prayer upon specific answers to requests for temporal benefits. This world is conducted for spiritual ends; and these may be better served by withholding than by giving. Prayer for temporal blessings is never to be absolute. Subtending every petition there is the implied condition, "If it be thy will." We must allow God some margin. To pray is not to dictate. God does hear prayer alike when he gives the special temporal benefit asked for and when he denies it; for he does what is best, and that is at bottom what the praying soul wants him to do. Are we, then, to thank God for the rain? Certainly. But we are not to imperil our faith in prayer by hanging it upon something being done which we in our shortsightedness may have considered the right thing for God to do. What we regard as an answer to prayer may be simply a coincidence. The rain might have come anyway. "There is no use praying for rain so long as the wind is in that quarter?" said an irreverent sceptic to a humble believer. But cannot God change the wind? There is the case of Elijah, which has been given to fortify our faith. But in Elijah's case the change in the weather was made to conserve spiritual ends; and we may be sure that it will be the same in every instance in which God interferes with the established order of things.

CHICAGO NOTES.

In spite of the official inspection of milk and food supplies by the health department, adulteration goes on. By a mere accident the discovery was made of the impurity of the milk used at the County Hospital. To preserve it formaldehyde had been used. The same deleterious substance is being used by some merchants to keep fruit and vegetables from decaying. A more rigorous and scientific inspection of our food supplies is evidently required.

Professor Triggs of the University of Chicago keeps floundering in the mire, sinking deeper into it all the time. He seeks to defend his statement regarding the worthlessness of hymns by saying that in the privacy of the class room he had spoken playfully and paradoxically. That might be allowed to pass; but when he goes on to say that "a teacher is not required at all times to tell the truth," he shows a lack of moral sense which is simply deplorable.

The resignation of Rabbi Hirsch and Julia C. Lathrop from the State Board of Charities because of the appointment of Mack Tanner as secretary of the board upon purely political grounds, is cause for general regret. To find Governor Yates eating up all his fine promises regarding the appointment of men of high character and unquestioned qualifications to public offices is disappointing and discouraging.

Our old-time friend, Charles T. Yerkes, speaks well of London as compared with Chicago in the matter of street railway franchises. He says with us nine times out of ten the granting of a franchise is a blackmailing scheme, and the parties have to be bought off. The indictment is too true. There is no more important thing to which the reforming energies of the church can be directed than the purification of our civic and political life.

The establishment last week of the shrine of St. Anne at St. Joseph's French Roman Catholic Church, California Avenue, drew crowds of devout pilgrims from all over the city and from surrounding districts. The special attraction is a piece of bone from the wrist of St. Anne. This sacred relic rests in an altar specially built for its reception. Before this shrine throngs of sick people prostrate themselves crying to St. Anne for help. It is a pitiful sight. And to think of such gross superstition flourishing in our midst in the beginning of the twentieth century!

The Roman Catholic Church believes in the power of the spectacular. In the Cathedral of the Holy Name is about to be witnessed one of the most gorgeous ceremonies which has ever taken place in this country. The occasion is that of the consecration of Father Muldoon to the bishopric of Chicago. Two "thrones" have been erected within the chancel rail to be occupied by Cardinal Martinelli and Archbishop Feehan. The vestments to be worn by Father Muldoon when the purple is conferred, will cost about $10,000. They have been made specially for this occasion, and are of the finest silk from a stock held in Peking for the use of the pope. Elaborate embroidery is worked upon the miter and chasuble. To the simplicity which is in Christ Jesus all this pomp and display is utterly foreign.

THE HOME BEAUTIFUL.

W. H. Bagby.

I am building a beautiful temple—
A house for the Spirit of Love—
I am building it after the pattern
Brought down by the Lord from above.

I am building a beautiful temple—
A house that forever will stand—
For I'm building it on "the Foundation,"
And not on the loose, shifting sand.

I am building a beautiful temple—
A house that the Father will own—
For the truth is its solid foundation
And Christ is the chief cornerstone.

I am building a beautiful temple,
Whose glory can never be told,
For it shineth with brightness supernal—
Its stones are more precious than gold.

I am building a beautiful temple—
A house that will ever be new,
For the beautiful temple I'm building
Is character lasting and true.

ANGER OF JESUS.

Edward Scribner Ames, Ph. D.

ANGER belongs to our instinctive life. It is a sign and means of defense. The dog growls over his bone, the hen fluffs her feathers and flies at the enemy of her brood. A man is nettled at insult to his home or his honor. He becomes angry at that which threatens what he loves. It may be his political principles, or religious creed, or scientific view which is attacked, but in each case the feeling is essentially the same. The impulse to defend a set of ideals is peculiarly human, and the higher the ideals the more justifiable is the enthusiasm with which they are pursued and defended. It is the nature of his principles and his ardent devotion to them which makes the anger of Jesus so interesting and suggestive. Nothing could emphasize his humanity more strongly and nothing could reveal more uniquely his deepest motives. St. Paul gives the precept, "Be angry and sin not," but Jesus gives the example of virtuous anger.

That precept is well illustrated in the life of Christ, not only by those rare moments in which he showed burning indignation, but also by those more numerous occasions when to us he seems to have had cause for anger and yet remained perfectly benign and compassionate. His prolonged temptation is a striking illustration. His circumstances might well have made him irritable. Hungry, alone, filled with power which he dared not use, he nevertheless maintained his calm judgment and resistance. The opposition of the Scribes and Pharisees began early in his ministry and increased in tantalizing cunning and craftiness throughout, yet there are few instances where he did not meet them with dispassionate argument or imperturbed silence. They ascribed his power to Beelzebub, but he only said: "How can Satan cast out Satan? If a kingdom be divided against itself, that kingdom cannot stand." The people laughed him to scorn when he said, "the damsel is not dead but sleepeth," yet he went on in his kindly way to perform the miracle. In his home town they taunted him with his lowly birth, but he only marveled at their unbelief and continued with his teaching. At his trial the witnesses testified falsely. Pilate confessed the lack of evidence, the soldiers struck, spit upon and mocked him, but he answered nothing. To most men such treatment would justify the extremest anger, but Christ had risen above resentment. There are other occasions when we are not sure just what his mood was. It might naturally have been anger, as when he cursed the barren fig-tree—so suggestive of the barren nation of Israel with its professions of religion, mere leaves without the fruit. Or again when a sign was asked as a guarantee of his mission, he answered, "a wicked and adulterous generation seeketh for a sign." That sounds like the accent of a lofty indignation as does also the ringing denunciation of the Scribes and Pharisees, "hypocrites!" in the twenty-third chapter of Matthew.

But there are three clear and specific instances of the anger of Jesus. The most dramatic is the earliest, and stands at the beginning of his ministry. Jesus had gone to Jerusalem with the throng of pilgrims for the passover. In his soul burned the zeal of a pure and lofty devotion. The spiritual meaning of the great national feast was clear to his religious and patriotic nature. Along the way his imagination had been quickened by the sight of pilgrims, at first little groups of neighbors and then strangers and foreigners in vast numbers as they converged upon the ancient city—the city of David, the city of the great Temple. In that Temple was embodied the tokens of the national life and history, the evidences of the living God ever mindful of his people. It would not be strange if Jesus idealized it all in his religious enthusiasm so that he would be little prepared for the scene which he actually beheld. To one who thought of it as the house of God, and had brooded over the sight of smoking altars and the odor of incense and the sound of priestly chants and prayers, what a shock it must have been to see in the very court of the temple the market for sacrificial animals and doves, to hear the money changers round their tables weighing the coins, arguing, disputing, bargaining, and to realize that the temple authorities in avarice and greed were in the name and authority of religion, taking advantage of the devout worshiper who came to purchase sacrifices or to have his coin exchanged for the shekel to pay the temple tribute. The utter corruption and blasphemy of it all is best expressed in that righteous wrath in which Jesus with his scourge of small cords, "drove them all out of the temple, and the sheep and the oxen; and poured out the changers' money and overthrew the tables," and said to them "It is written, My house shall be called the house of prayer; but ye have made it a den of thieves." The sensitive soul of Jesus was outraged at the use of the sacred place and things for selfish and corrupt ends. The temple officials had perverted a great trust for the sake of money. It was a terrible example of the corruption to which men descend in their lust for wealth. Many times Jesus attacked that spirit, as when he said, "How hard will it be for rich men to enter the Kingdom of God," and when he told the rich young ruler to give away all that he had in order to become a disciple.

The second recorded instance of the anger of Jesus concerned the observance of the Sabbath. One Sabbath day, upon entering the synagogue, he found a man there with a withered hand. The Pharisees watched Jesus, seeking to catch him in a violation of the law. He asked them, "Is it lawful to do good on the Sabbath day, or to do evil? To save life or to kill?" They were silent and it provoked him. Mark says Jesus "looked round about on them with anger, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts." These Pharisees illustrate how possible it is to be very religious in a way and yet be very bad morally. They were so conscientious in observing the letter of the law of Moses that they had missed its spirit. They had magnified the Sabbath until its observance was worse than its desecration. They had made it of more importance than human life, to which it was intended to minister. To them the healing of a diseased man was of no consequence as compared with the maintenance of an institution and ordinance of the Church. Their hearts had become hard and blind to the real purposes of religion. Is it not a very suggestive thing that Jesus was moved to anger by that exaltation of an element of the creed above the welfare of men? Alas, how often the Church, Christian as well as Jewish, has justified the righteous indignation of her Lord by emphasizing the externals of religion until the heart has become hardened and blinded to the real needs of the world.

The other example of the sinless anger of Jesus is found in that touching scene where the little children were brought to him. The disciples rebuked those who brought them. But when Jesus saw it, he was much displeased—the Greek word is very strong and is nowhere else applied to Christ—and said unto them, "Suffer the little children to come unto me and forbid them not." Then he expressed his deep feeling in his characteristic way, by a word and by a deed. The word contained a fresh revelation concerning the Kingdom of God. No one may enter that Kingdom, except as a little child. And the deed—it was one of the tenderest in all his ministry. "He took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them." That was the most human expression of anger of which we know anything in the life of our Lord. It was directed toward his best friends, the disciples; and it passed away in a moment, as he looked into the innocent faces of the children and caressed them. The disciples would have observed the conventional proprieties, for to bring the children to Jesus was utterly contrary to all Jewish notions and incompatible with the supposed dignity of a Rabbi. The Master, however, resented the courtesy based upon the artificial distinction of learning or traditional authority, because he recognized in the humility, receptiveness and meekness of the child the more genuine qualifications for the Kingdom.

These incidents are exceedingly suggestive concerning the mind of Christ. His anger was never that of an irritable, diseased or narrow soul. It arose only where the noblest principles of love and sympathy were outraged or perverted. Other things made him sad, lonely and discouraged but not angry. His indignation was called for only by the conscious and malicious violation of the law of love or by the blindness of heart which prevented the realization of it. The desecrators of the temple had lost their love to God in their worship of money; the Pharisees overlooked the love of neighbor in zeal for the ordinances and forms of religion, while the disciples themselves failed to discern the essential qualities of the kingdom of God even when presented in their purest form, in the hearts of little children. No personal insult, no cunning craft of his enemies, no doubts or misconceptions of his disciples ever moved him to such intense vexation.

CATHOLICISM IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Herman P. Williams.

IT IS not necessary to justify supremacy over such kingdoms and domains (the Philippines) especially among vassals of kings so just and Catholic (the Spanish) and such obedient sons of the supreme apostolic authority, with which warrant these regions were occupied." In this language the Spanish historian, Concepcion, stated to his countrymen their theory of colonial possession. The reasoning is simple: The Pope, Christ's vice-gerent; the King of Spain, the Pope's loyal agent; the Spanish soldiers and friars, divinely commissioned to subject the heathen for an inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for a possession. Similar notions of piety had possessed Philip II, when he launched his Armada against heretical England. He it was who gave his name to the Philippines; and with the christening, the islands were devoted to a fanatical, belligerent religiosity.

But before this, in the year of our Lord 1521, the archipelago received its first incursion from Christendom. It was Easter week. Hernando Magellan and his sea-worn adventurers had rounded South America, crossed the Pacific, and were skirting the shores of Mindanao. They found harbor in the mouth of the Butnan, and there landed to attend the sacrifice of the mass. Sailing northwestward from there, Magellan made port at Cebu. This was, even then, a city; and was ruled over by a king. The native royalty were overawed by the stately, mysterious worship of their white visitors; and seeming disposed to receive the new religion, were accorded baptism. But instruction by pantomime, of only a few days, could not make their conversion very profound; and two weeks after, King Hamabar showed that he was still in the gall of bitterness, by massacring twenty-six of his guests. Magellan had been killed before this by a hostile tribe; and the expedition withdrew, completing the voyage around the world, under the captaincy of Elcano.

A half century later Cebu was permanently occupied. Legaspi was the soldier; Urdeneta, the priest. That was in 1565, the year St. Augustine was founded in Florida. What a contrast between America and the Philippines through succeeding years! Six years after, Manila was occupied and constituted a Spanish city—built up with barracks and churches among the nipa huts. Then five years more and Manila was made a bishop's see; and history was well begun.

Those were years of spiritual awakening and missionary activity through all Christendom; and the Latin Church especially was fired with a zeal for foreign missions. It was not long until Manila was infested with mendicant friars; and, indeed, all orders were fast crowding to this field, rich for spiritual exploitation. The question was up, whether heathen missions should be conducted by apostolic suasion or by military power.

The Augustinians were vehement for coercion. They were first on the field, foremost in the colony, and although antagonized by some of the other orders, won their point. Sanchez was sent to Europe and persuaded Philip to grant the clergy 20 per cent of the tribute money, to consent to armed expeditions for converting the natives, and to make other provisions favorable to the Church's interests—among them, that forty additional Austin monks be sent at once to the islands.

From the first, Manila was the scene of ecclesiastical jealousy and intrigue. There were bitter rivalries among the friars and violent contests with the civil power. Such strife so dwarfed and enfeebled the colony that in 1621 the king was advised to abandon it. Urgent representations of the Church, however, relative to the interests of heathen missions decided him to continue his control.

But the contentions waxed and waned. Now the prelates triumphed, and now, again the royal governor. In the seventeenth century Corcuera humbled and finally deposed the archbishop for insisting on the right of sanctuary to civil fugitives. Later, Salcedo led Archbishop Poblete a sorry, troubled life; and at his death forbade the De Profundis, and ordered a feast because so vexatious a prelate had been called to his reward. But the Inquisition got hold of Salcedo; and he died a prisoner, disgraced and heart-broken. Then in the next century, one of the governors imprisoned the archbishop. Thereupon the friars fomented a holy riot. Austins, Dominicans, Recollets, Franciscans, with the populace, mobbed the governor, beat him, stabbed him, and threw him into the common jail. The archbishop being released, graciously took the reins of government, and for nine years thereafter executed the royal authority. Succeeding ecclesiasts were not so fortunate, though they were hardly less ambitious. The Cavite conspiracy of 1872 is attributed to the friars. Not that they took up arms against the government; but fomented a false revolution for the sake of further intrinching themselves in power. Spain's colonial system throughout has been paralyzed by the incubus of ecclesiastical intrigue.

Common cause was not always made by the clerical orders against the civil government; they combated one another quite as heartily. An attempt to evangelize Japan from Manila brought the Jesuits and Franciscans into violent clash. Through Xavier Japan had been allotted to the former order by papal decree; and a number of the Jesuits had settled with the Portuguese at Nagasaki. But Frey Bautista, with his Franciscan brothers, also essayed the conversion of the Japanese. At first they were received with honor by the Emperor, and permitted to build a church at Osaka. Then the jealousy of the Jesuits and Portuguese poisoned the mind of the Japanese sovereign. The Franciscans were forbidden to enter the country; and for a century and a quarter they suffered martyrdom with their native converts by crucifixion and burning.

The tables were turned against the Jesuits in Manila, however. In 1768 they were expelled from the islands and permitted to return only in 1852, for the sole purpose of educational work and missions among the Mohammedans. The Austins seemed particularly bitter against them, and have referred to their teaching as "a different religion." The Dominicans at one time raised a tempest in the cathedral because they must pass through territory of the Recollets in order to reach their own province of Pangasinan. The unity of the Catholic Church is hardly the unity of the Spirit, and truly at times has not been unity at all.

The first native friar was admitted to the Austin order two hundred years ago. Such recognition was not widely accorded the Filipinos, and has been virtually refused during the last half century. Since 1872 no native priests have been allowed to hold vicarages, and have occupied only the most subordinate offices.

That friars should hold benefices was contrary to the decree of the Council of Trent, but was allowed under claim that the regular clergy were not sufficient in numbers for the work. Such a state of affairs was carefully perpetuated, and most of the parishes were administered by friars. The orders have been able to control political policies, to amass enormous estates, and to build magnificent churches and convents. The budget of 1888 granted the church eighteen cents of every poll tax, and kindred provisions have augmented the clerical treasuries. These funds were discreetly invested outside the colony.

There are schools in Manila, Jaro and Cebu, where instruction was given especially in Latin and divinites. But in the provinces it has been the policy of the friars to keep the natives in ignorance and submission. The laws provided that religion should be taught in the Spanish language. But the native languages were more frequently employed; and Spanish was taught only superficially, if at all. Other more helpful instruction was avoided. Even in the most intelligent districts after three centuries of opportunity, the Catholic Church has done little enough to lead her children out of the slavery of ignorance into the freedom of the truth of God.

THE NORMAL CHURCH, III.

The whole body fitly joined together and compacted.—Eph. 4:16.

A. B. Jones.

Unity of the Spirit.

ENDEAVOR to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace," is the scriptural injunction. This topic is worthy of a conspicuous place in this discussion, more so than it will be possible to give it. There is nothing more pleasing to contemplate than that of the "unity of the spirit;" nor more delightful in its realizations to the heart. Just what the Word of God intends to comprehend in this expression, its fulness of meaning, we do not undertake to state in the present rapid survey of the mere outlines of the subject. One thing, however, we hold as certain on this point, that whatever the phrase, "the unity of the spirit" may mean, it involves, as its most essential and important factor, the idea of the spirit of unity. Without the spirit of unity there can be no "unity of the spirit." A desire for union and fellowship, whether in domestic, social, civil or religious life, must precede any true realization of the blessings. The greatest obstacle now in the way of Christian unity is the fact that men do not desire it. Sectarians prefer a divided Christendom to a united one. Whenever and wherever the spirit of unity burns in the heart of man, the imaginary mountain barriers to Christian unity diminish into mole hills. Within every body, whether material or moral, there resides normally a spirit of unity, restrained and perverted in some instances it may be, and without this the body could not exist.

The massive stone squared and dressed by the hand of the mason and lying in readiness for its place in the building is held tenaciously together, particle by particle, by the presence of an invisible and imponderable force called, scientifically, cohesion. Without this spirit of unity disintegration and dissolution would set at naught our confidence in the solidity and consequent utility of the stone. The starry hosts of heaven, scattered, diversified, and multitudinous as they are, moving with inconceivable velocity in every direction, are all pervaded and filled with the same spirit of unity, the great law of gravitation, without which chaos and confusion would reign supreme everywhere; but, by the presence of which is given to us that wonderful harmony, styled in poetic conception, the "music of the spheres." The gregarious tendency in every form of animal life, and the social nature of man, are the unseen power which groups together the lower animals, and creates associations among men, holding them together by a kind of unity of the spirit in the bonds of peace.

High above all this there is another force, another spirit, the Spirit of God, which is the spirit of unity dwelling in the hearts of Christians. "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God"—a building, one building, "fitly joined together and compacted," and that "the Spirit of God dwelleth in you." "As living stones ye are built up a spiritual house." Wherever the Holy Spirit dwells in the hearts of men, and is permitted to have its due influence, there will be found the "spirit of unity," and the consequent "unity of the spirit;" and Christian men, wherever they may be, "like kindred drops mingle into one body." Only the presence of some foreign element produces irritation and alienation.

But we are met here by the objection that our religious liberty is put in jeopardy by this doctrine of Christian unity; and that it should be guarded with a watchful eye in view of its abuses in the past history of the Church. Some men seem never to know they have any liberty except when they are doing wrong. They must somehow break away from the established order of things to create in their own minds an assurance of personal freedom. To move along in the quiet sphere of a harmonious, righteous and godly life, alarms them with the idea of slavery. This brings us to another division of our theme.

Unity in Liberty.

While unity in diversity is a grand principle asserting itself everywhere about us, unity in liberty is a grander one—grander because it operates upon a higher plane. The former may be the result of some external pressure compelling its recognition, while the latter is necessarily the outcome of man's free but sanctified volitional nature. The possibility of this scriptural idea of Christian unity being perverted and abused is not to be denied; but the possibility does not imply necessity, and a remote possibility of contingent evil can never justify us in withholding our hands from the imperative right, or violating the Word of God. And that the extreme views of both personal and congregational independence as well as that abnormal denominational independence and dissociation, are incompatible with the doctrine of the New Testament Scriptures is most firmly believed and declared here. The religion of Jesus Christ is pre-eminently a free religion and a religious freedom. So unique is it in this respect that it is styled in the Scriptures, "The perfect law of liberty." But liberty is not licentiousness, nor does unity exclude the idea of liberty; it is rather the result of the wise and normal exercise of liberty. Each single bird, or bee, or fish is free to have the company of its fellows, and lead a life of solitude, but it uses its liberty in another direction. Man is socially free and can exclude himself from society and become a hermit of the mountain cave, but he chooses rather to enjoy the blessings of social life. Christian liberty finds its freest exercise, and its highest enjoyment in associated spiritual life and activity; and in the very nature of the case there can be no real unity among intelligent, moral beings, except it be a free and voluntary one.

That very impulse of man's regenerated nature which inclines him to seek the fellowship of God's children, carries along with it evermore the essential idea of liberty.

Unity in Glory.

This is probably the grandest of all the laws that reign in the normal, corporate life of the Church—grandest because it so operates as to blend all individual achievements and all individual honors accruing from them into one corporate result, thus completely eliminating every vestige of selfishness from a common gratified humanity. While every individual bee bears a part in the toils of the hive, yet the fellowship of toil and of reward is so complete that it is impossible as well as undesirable to determine what part of the sweet product was created by this one or that. "The honey and the honeycomb" is the glory of the corporate family.

Those beautiful coral reefs of the tropical seas are a striking illustration of the same principle of united effort and of united reward. Myriads of polyps contribute their individual parts, and while the product of each by itself is quite insignificant, yet when joined together we have the wonder and the glory of that unity which obtains in this form of corporate life.

As Christian men and women we meet together in our annual conventions, and place under contribution whatever we have in the way of talent and money and influence, of faith and hope and love. The moral results in the way of Sunday-schools and churches organized or revived, of colleges and benevolent institutions established and endowed, of agencies supported and missions fostered at home and abroad—in short, of souls converted and saved, shall so blend in "the general assembly and Church of the first born," that no one of us shall desire or be able to know the metes and bounds of his own work, or even of one's own self. What a sublime conception when this thought is applied to the normal Church of Christ, in its great corporate life, where all denominational names, and pride, and competitions are lost in the mighty tide of the "unity of the body," the "unity of the faith," and the "unity of the spirit!"

As each separate stone contributes to and shares in the corporate glory of the building, so we, simply as Christians, are living stones built up a spiritual house—"a glorious Church not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing." In his intercessory prayer our Lord Jesus says: "The glory which thou gavest me I have given them, that they may be one even as we are one; I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one." Corporate unity, corporate glory! Unity in variety, unity in liberty, and unity in glory!

THE PRESENT STATUS OF CHURCH FEDERATION.

Rev. Chas. H. Small.

HERE was a time when Church Union was much talked about and strongly urged. Various platforms of union were adopted by ecclesiastical gatherings which received more or less endorsement by others, but that is as far as they went. Now federation, which is more desirable and more practicable, is commanding attention. Church union, as Dr. Cuyler once said, is "an iridescent dream," but federation is being realized. Church union calls for a surrender of that which denominations hold to be important and they are not ready for that; federation requires no surrender but co-operation, and this the churches are ready for, and are willing to consider. This willingness is evidenced by what has been done.

Active and efficient local federations have been formed in various parts of the country, and under various names. To describe all these would require too much space, and is not necessary. Cities like New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Cleveland, Chicago, Hartford, have their federations of Christian workers. Other cities like Detroit, Toledo, Rochester, are organizing. Small cities have their federations that have done more or less work. States are organizing. Maine, Vermont and New York have well organized federations "to prevent waste of resources and effort in the smaller towns, and to stimulate missionary work in the destitute places." Ohio has a committee representing fourteen denominations presenting the work, and a convention for permanent organization is called for Dec. 3d. Rhode Island, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Illinois, and Nebraska are falling into line and preparing for active work.

At a convention in Philadelphia, Feb. 5-6, 1901, a National Federation of Churches and Christian Workers was formed, with J. Cleveland Cady as president, and Rev. E. B. Sanford, D. D. (83 Bible House, N. Y.) as secretary. The tact, energy and perseverance of Dr. Sanford has had much to do with the progress of the movement, both national, state and local. He has traveled far and wide.

We learn with gratification that in our new possessions, Porto Rico, Cuba and the Philippines, the missionary work is being federated in a very practical way. The various co-operative endeavors in church alliances and federations that have existed for some time are being brought into the common and growing movement. All this is only the outward manifestation of the spread of federation. It indicates the need of co-operation, the growing desire for it and the possibility of its accomplishment.

Federation is manifesting to the community that there is a unity among Christians that is real and not a sentiment; it is securing co-operative action where it is much needed, both in cities and in sparsely-settled communities; it is encouraging and helping to promote the evangelization of every community wisely and without friction. The watchword of federation is, "Every church a geographical limit and every geographical limit a church." The carrying out of this purpose means not only that churches will not unwisely and unnecessarily encroach upon each other, but that neglected places will be looked after. This latter is fully as important as the former and should not be overlooked as one of the greatest benefits of federation. The movement is spreading and the desire for federation is growing because its good works are being made manifest and its practical efficiency is apparent; because it is being understood that no denomination will be interfered with, and that, as the spirit is evangelistic, greater gain will result for all. By federation the denominations will not suffer, loyalty is just as important as ever, but the cause of evangelical Christianity will be the stronger and will command and deserve greater respect from the community.

The national organization proposes to publish a quarterly in the interests of federation, the first issue of "The Federation Chronicle" has been widely circulated.

A TWELVE HOURS' DAY.

By John E. McFadyen.

WHAT shall we say to our Lord when He asks us, as He asked of old, "Are there not twelve hours in the day?" Shall those searching words not strike us dumb, as we think of the follies that fill most hours of every day? Are there twelve hours in any day, are there six, is there even one, of brave work or patient fidelity, of loyal service or strenuous endeavor, of resolute purpose or honest battle? Powers seen and unseen conspire to rob us of the hours as they slip by, and vigilantly must we buy them back from the callousness and sloth that would destroy us.

Every day, seem it long or seem it short, comes laden with its own twelve hours. How often has it to go away again, weighted with trifles and sighs, instead of with achievement that will endure, when "the fire shall prove each man's work of what sort it is." Every living soul, however harassed by work or abandoned to indolence, has his twelve hours in the day, none more, none less; though in insight into their meaning and grasp of their possibilities, man differs from man as heaven from hell. Time hangs on the hands of some. So they say. Oh, mystery of mysteries! that, in a world where there is so much to do and know and fight and conquer, any man should think he had time enough and to spare, others thrill on the threshold of a new day, as they that look for the salvation of God. They see in every hour a gift and a call; a gift to be used for growth in all that is worthy, a call to prepare for the rest that remaineth. No man can have more time than he needs; the longest life is not too long for the solemn tasks that are laid on every one. Nor is any man's day too short; has not God put twelve hours into it? and only for those twelve hours, though indeed for them all, will He call him to judgment.

"And if indeed there be twelve whole hours in the day," says the sluggard, "may not one little hour be spared for folly?" Nay, verily, for every hour has its own claims, and will bless us or curse us, according as we let it. The hour gone is like the word spoken; you cannot call it back again. Twelve winged hours came yesterday from God and sped across our day and hasted back to the God who sent them. Would we have blushed could we have listened to the tale they told Him? Did they tell of kindnesses undone, of passions unsubdued, of prayers unsaid, of holiness unsought? Or did they tell of temper sweetened and sins slain and graces won? Every day should build us up, set us higher, in faith or knowledge or power.

The tragedy of many a life is that time is not felt to be a trust; it is not seen to be the stage on which issues of eternal moment are wrought out. What are we doing with the hours today? They are bearing us inexorably on nearer to the night, when no man can work; are they bringing us nearer to God or to the outer darkness, where there is weeping? Do the days leave us better or only older? Are we drifting or marching? Are we driven about by every wind of indolence or frivolity, or are our faces set steadfastly toward some good thing? Heaven aids the man who listens to the voices of eternity calling across the dull routine of daily toil. The sun humbly stands still for all who will nobly dare in the great battle for righteousness or man or God. The day will be long and the sun will shine on brave and weary warriors and light them into eventide. In this light of God may we all walk and work and pray, not now and then, but the long day through. For are there not twelve hours in the day? and the night is coming.

GOD'S FAITH TESTS.

H. T. Morrison.

God does not always give a reason for his commands. Had he done so the desired end would not have been reached. If he had stopped to explain the reason for all his requirements, there could not have been such a thing as faith. Faith has to do with things "not seen" by the natural eye, or fully comprehended by the human mind. It grows and develops by going, as Abraham did, "not knowing whither he went."

God pursues much the same course with us as a certain man did in hiring a servant. The first one who sought the place was set to removing a pile of rocks from one place to another in the man's yard. When this was done he was ordered to remove them back again, and to keep on in this way until he was ordered to stop. The man, however, in a short time, became disgusted and left the job. A second man came and was set to removing, back and forward, the same pile of rocks. Patiently he continued at the monotonous task until the day was ended, when the man, calling him to his office paid him for his day's work, and then informed him that he was the kind of man he had been looking for. He was given a permanent job, because he obeyed orders without asking the why and the wherefore. This incident faintly illustrates God's methods with his servants who wish to enter the heavenly kingdom.

God has given what may be fitly termed moral and positive commands. In those that belong to the moral class we can always see an underlying reason for the command. But with respect to those that are positive we may not be able at the time to see a moral reason for their being given, simply because they are intended as faith tests. They are intended to prove us and develop in us a higher order of faith, that we may be bound more closely to our Divine Father, and thus become more loyal to Him.

The command to Abraham to offer up his son was, from a purely human standpoint, most unreasonable; and had the command been given to some other man than the patriarch Abraham he would, in all probability have refused to obey. But Abraham's previous schooling in the ways of God enabled him to stand the test, and by it reach the highest altitude of faith possible for sinful mortals.

The command to Adam and Eve, when placed in the garden, was of the same nature. Although perfectly innocent, they, as yet, were mere children and had to be schooled in the ways of God. Through the simple command not to touch the fruit on a certain tree they were to receive their first lesson in loyalty to God. So with respect to the command to wash seven times in Jordan, given to Naaman. When he obeyed this positive, and to him reasonless command, he not only went away healed, but went away a wiser and better man.

King Saul lost his crown by failing to fulfill one of these test commands. When sent utterly to destroy the Amalekites he failed to carry out the command to the letter and was rejected by God.

Christian baptism and the Lord's supper may, as commands, be classed among tests of faith. By them, when properly observed, we are not only giving to the world a strong expression of our loyalty to Christ, but are performing acts that go far in helping us to cultivate that spirit of loyalty that all created beings must have in order to enjoy the favor of the Creator.

PLEASANTRIES.

Mr. Hilton: "Have you opened that bottle of champagne, Bridget?" Bridget: "Faith, I started to open it, an' it began to open itself. Sure, the mon that filled that bottle must 'av put in two quarts instead of wan." —Philadelphia Record.

A teacher in civil government had told his pupils that once in ten years the State of Massachusetts takes a census. Little James, who is an attentive scholar, upon being called up to recite, said: "Once in every ten years Massachusetts comes to its senses."—New York Tribune.

Blomfield, bishop of London, presided at a meeting of a debating society where the students were all deadly in earnest. One strong, indignant young gentleman inquired oratorically: "What, sir, would the apostle Paul have said, could he have seen the life of luxury led by our present race of prelates and church dignitaries, riding about in their carriages and living in their palaces? What, sir, I repeat, would he have said?" "I think," said the bishop, interrupting the speaker, in a meek and mild voice, "that he would have said, 'Things in the church must be looking up!'"—St. James Gazette.

A stretch of road, running past Sam Rawson's house, was in notoriously poor condition, although Sam declared that he had paid liberally to have it put in good order; and there was general interest when Sam rose to make his statement before the selectmen at the town meeting. "I'd just like to say one thing," he drawled. "I don't want to make any fuss, but I'd just like to ask the honorable board of highwaymen"—That was as far as he could get. A roar of laughter swept over the town meeting, and showed its effects in the red faces of the "highwaymen."

OUR PULPIT.

THE SPIRIT OF LIFE.

W. Douglas Mackenzie, D. D.

Text: Romans 8: 2. "The Law of the Spirit of Life in Christ Jesus made me free from the law of sin and of death."

THE Epistle in which these words occur is remarkable for the frequency and the variety with which that word "spirit" is used. It is a very rich word. It allies itself now with the name of God and again with the name of Christ. It is "the Spirit of God" that dwelleth in you; it is the "Spirit of Christ" a man may have; and yet, again, it is just simply the Spirit, the living, everlasting Spirit; or once more it is the Spirit of Life, the Spirit that belongs to the new experience which Christ has brought into the world. Now, it is one of the most delightful facts connected with the Christian religion that its most difficult doctrines have their roots in historical facts. As there is no doctrine that some people feel to be so abstract, so difficult, so unrelated to life, as the doctrine of the Holy Spirit, let us for a moment look back and see where they got their ideas of the Spirit.

1. Pentecost.

They were waiting, after the resurrection of Jesus, meditating upon His life, meditating upon the dread, the shame and disaster of His crucifixion, and then upon the wonderful, inexplicable glory of His resurrection,—waiting, as He had commanded them to do at Jerusalem, powerless, unable to do anything but to wait. They rejoiced, indeed, but vaguely. They hardly knew what they were rejoicing about. They went on praising God and being happy, and yet all was still indefinite. They kept to themselves, having no message to the world. They seemed to be merely feeling after a consciousness, a life, that had not fully taken possession of them. Yet there was no power, no life, no real preaching, no forthgoing of energy from that community. It was hardly yet a real, living, self-conscious community at all. All at once as they were gathered in one place there came that sound as of a rushing, mighty wind. Once more, as at the birth of Christ, once more as in the miracles of Jesus, once more as in the resurrection of Jesus from the dead, once more God has taken hold of nature and made nature the medium of His wonderful self-revelation. The sound passes on and fills the city streets with awe. As the people rushed toward the center of the sound they came upon a gathering of people that seemed mad. They seemed to be taken hold of by some alien power. They were all speaking and miscellaneously shouting. No man could make any order out of the strange, terrific scene before them. Some of them began to laugh, saying that they were drunk,—so inexplicable were the events that took place there in that strange excited gathering. Gradually a stillness comes over them. One man rises and shouts for silence. A quiet spreads through the Christian community and the great gathering beyond, and one voice begins to speak out. It is the voice of Simon Peter. There has flashed upon him by the inspiration of the Living God,—there has flashed upon him now out of the memories of his Old Testament readings allied with the reality and wonder of this new event,—flashed upon him its truth. He tells the people that this is the fulfillment of an ancient prophecy which they have all often read and all often longed to see fulfilled within the experience of Israel. This is the outpouring upon human beings of the very Spirit of God Himself.

You see then, that it was an historical event, an event that seems to have attracted the attention of others, to have drawn to it the excited and concentrated interest of those who were not otherwise specially interested in the Christian community; and it was an event so strange, so momentous, so definite, so overwhelming, that it remained in the memory of the Church, and has taken its place in the faith of the Church forever, as the incoming of the Spirit of Life upon humankind.

2. The Spirit of Life.

The new Presence that had come into the hearts of those people, manifested itself in so many ways that after we have used the name of God, or of Christ Himself, I know of no other term that more fitly describes this Spirit than that wonderful and glorious word "Life," the Spirit of Life. Life is the richest fact that nature knows. Think of the life that comes surging up at springtime through the earth, the irresistible tides of life breaking through! Think of how you struggle with your gardens and the weeds that you wish to get rid of; and you struggle in vain, for there is life in that soil somehow, and, do as you will, it breaks out day after day. It is various, full, beautiful, attractive. It is musical and colorful because it is life itself. All nature has conspired at springtide to express itself in living forms. And in that young community, amongst those Christians, there now began to work a force so rich, so various, so irresistible, so full of energy that only the word "life" could adequately express it. It is the Spirit of Life.

Think of what that community, hitherto so helpless, began to accomplish. Those men no sooner began to preach than the life that was in them took hold of their auditors. Even when the authorities began to persecute and scatter them, they were like the wind which drives and like the birds and bees which carry the seed away to different parts of the world. Persecution became the servant for scattering the life that was in this community wherever they went,—east and north and south and even across the seas. Wherever these people went they carried life with them. They became the seed of the Kingdom, so that when they settled in any community there began to work in it this strange new force, called the Spirit of Life. They went to Antioch, the great metropolitan city, the emporium of the east, and this life began to manifest itself and a strong church grew up. They farther went to Corinth, and to Philippi; in simple, rude, soldierly Philippi, or in corrupt Corinth, or in Imperial Rome, herself,—wherever these people went the irresistible life within them took hold upon the community around, manifested itself with energy and with glorious beauty. It was life that was in them. It spread everywhere. It rejoiced everywhere. It broke into the flowers of the Christian graces. It grew into the fruits of Christian deeds. Everywhere a new beauty took hold of the imagination of men when they looked upon the community of the Christians. Historians, who are students of the first and second century of the Christian era, all bear witness, as does, for instance, Mr. Lecky, and even Gibbon himself, to the marvelous energy of the Christian Church and to the attractive beauty of the character which it manifested. These people showed to the world a new kind of manhood, a new ideal of purity, a new sense of honor, a new pity for the weak, a new forgiveness of their enemies. The world around saw that there was something new in these men and it was beautiful as God himself. It was the Spirit of Life, it was the Divine Life, the Life of God, that had taken hold of them.

3. The Law of the Spirit.

Now, this Spirit of Life is described to us in this passage in a way which I think deserves a few moments' consideration a little more closely. Especially in this verse we are told that "the law of the Spirit of Life in Christ Jesus made me free from the law of sin and of death." What does that mean? I wonder if we can make it a little plainer to ourselves this morning.

First, that word "law"—how variously we use it. We think of it sometimes as a formal enactment that is addressed to a set of intelligent beings and enforced by certain sanctions with pains and penalties attached. We think of a law that is thus the definite announcement of what may or may not be done under definite circumstances, by definite individuals. And the Apostle Paul frequently uses the word in that sense. The law for him is often the announcement of the will of God, the enactment which God has made concerning human conduct definitely in the law of Moses. Sometimes, however, for Paul is a great master of literary freedom, he uses the word in a slightly different sense, as when we speak about the law or principle of a certain movement in history. We speak about the law governing the growth of some institution, or the growth of some animal, of some plant, or some new development in the world of nature. We mean that there is a principle, a force, at work which can be defined and which controls all the history of the individuals brought within its influence. That is another use of the word "law" very closely allied with the former and yet different. Now, when the Apostle Paul speaks here of the law of the Spirit of Life in Christ Jesus, he means that this Spirit of Life is itself now a principle which is controlling the experiences of men and directing them towards certain issues.

What, then, are the issues towards which this Spirit of Life in Christ Jesus is directing men? What kind of experience does it give to men?

4. No Condemnation.

First of all, there is that wonderful experience described in the first verse of the chapter: "There is, therefore, now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus". The Spirit that has come upon men has swept condemnation away. Condemnation! It is one of the most awful words in human language. Sometimes we can see that it is worse than death just to be condemned. Death ends misery. Condemnation is utmost misery. To be righteously condemned, to be condemned by the supreme authority, and to be condemned as a being unworthy of his moral approval, to have it said, to have it known to myself, known to yourself, oh, human soul! that the living God looks through me, through you, down into the unsearched depths of conscience and imagination and desire and impulse, to have it said that he sees it to be all wrong, and to have it said that thus we are under his condemnation! The first lesson many a man has to learn is just that he is condemned.

We sometimes weaken the matter for ourselves. We say, "I am condemned by my own ideals." That is perfectly true if your ideals are true and high enough. "I am condemned by my own conscience." That is true and dreadful enough if your conscience is alive and quick and intelligent enough. "I am condemned by the standards of society around me." That also is dreadful enough if true, and if they are pure enough. If even they condemn me I am condemned indeed! But is that the highest and worst that can be said? What about the Supreme Intelligence who rules over all history, whose insight and wisdom penetrate every fact, who goes deeper than any conscience, who has higher ideals about yourself than you ever dared to cherish, and who knows more about what you ought to be than society? What can it be if He looks in upon you and condemns you!

The Apostle Paul says condemnation is past. "There is, therefore, now no condemnation." Can you imagine any message that ought to thrill human nature more wonderfully than that? Is there any word, any gospel, that could be spoken that would mean more to you than to say that the Supreme God has passed His condemnation away? Is there any fact, any experience, that is conceivable, higher than that? Is there any ambition to be cherished that will overpass that ambition? Any loftier word than this when it is said that there is now in the mind and heart of the living God no possible condemnation of yourself? "There is, therefore, now no condemnation." Why? Because the Apostle Paul says, "The law of the Spirit of Life has made me free from the law of sin and death." I have hitherto been working and living under the control of one kind of force and energy. It has worked towards sin. It has worked towards death. But now there has taken hold of me another principle. It is the Spirit of Life. It is working towards life. And what is the first fact which must follow from the incoming of that Spirit into a man. It means that he is released from that former law, released from the condemnation it brought upon him, released from the wrath that belonged to that condition, released from all that should have been his shame and terror when he was under its tyranny. Now he is living under the power,—the free, glorious, inspiring power,—of the Spirit of Life. That is the first thing, then. Paul calls it the Spirit of Life because where that Spirit comes into a man, one word he may read across all the years that are to come and all the years that are past; he may read it across his whole nature up and down—"No condemnation!"

5. The New Mind.

But then, in the second place, the Apostle Paul means that the coming of the Spirit of Life upon a man confers a new mind, which he calls the "mind of the Spirit". Now, if we would understand that, we must go back to speak of the seventh chapter, that wonderful bit of psychology and ethics in one, and religion through and through both, that most keen and subtle analysis of the inward experience of a man struggling with the law of righteousness and the law of sin, of two principles that are working and warring in his nature. In that chapter we find that the Apostle Paul says, I know that I have something in me which approves the law of God. I know it is right. I know it is true. I feel its authority. I feel that is what I ought to do. With my mind, with my conscience, with that better life in me, I take pleasure in it when I think about it. Yet I find a force in me that draws me in the opposite direction, and this force or law within me carries me away in gusts of passion, away into the doing of what is foul and what my own conscience condemns. What I would not that I do. I continually feel myself dragged, like a slave in chains, to the doing of a task that is loathsome in the extreme and yet I go and do it again and again. The law of sin is powerful within me. And it must be the law of death, for as I look into that experience very deeply, as I try to understand what its only issue can be and must be, I know that if that goes on longer, and indefinitely, it will finally drag me down into the abyss;—that I must be killed by the working of that force. It is the law of sin and of death in me.

But now, the Apostle Paul tells us, to the Christian man something new has come. He says it is "the mind of the Spirit." The Spirit of Life comes and makes him free from the law of sin and of death. God gives him power over it. "I feel that that is not my master; that this demon that holds me in chains and drags me to my doom has met his conqueror. I know that now there is something new stirring in my heart. My imagination is being cleansed. My heart seems to feel a power of resistance and it grows, and I feel that the chains are being snapped and I can almost hear the clanging of them on the ground as they fall and I stand a free man in Christ Jesus." The result is that the man upon whom the Spirit of Life has come powerfully, knows that he henceforth minds the things of the Spirit. It means that he looks at everything from the eternal point of view. It means that henceforth the flesh,—the sensual, the worldly, the external,—is not the criterion for judging the value of things. He knows that now he must not,—in order to decide what he ought to do,—measure his plans by just what is visible, what is pleasurable, what is momentary. He has got to the eternal point of view. That is the mind of the Spirit. A man, as it were, becomes seated on the throne of God. He gives law to himself, plans for himself. He now looks forward upon his own career and it is from the point of view of God Himself. He gives his life to this sort of thing. He says, "I must read about this. I must fill my imagination with this. I must plan for this, labor in this way about it. This must become the supreme task of my life, the law that is to rule my business, the principle that is to glorify my home. This is the wonderful, glorious Spirit that is to animate all my friendships. I am henceforth to look at everything from the point of view of the eternal." That is the mind of the Spirit. The Spirit of Life confers the mind of the Spirit upon a man.

Then, in the third place, the Apostle Paul goes on in later verses of this chapter to show that the power of the Spirit of Life in a man takes hold of the whole man forever! of the whole man forever! The Spirit of God is not just concerned with your new thoughts, your new imaginations. The Spirit of God is the Spirit that fills all nature. The little birds sing by the Spirit of God. It is in those green and rustling trees there. And the flowers are blooming and fragrant by the indwelling power of the Spirit of God Himself. The wonder of the stars at night is the majesty of the Spirit of God Himself. When, therefore, God takes possession of you He takes possession of your whole self, body, soul and spirit. He takes possession of you not for today, tomorrow; He takes possession of you forever. He is now the Divine working force in your personal life and everything that is to happen to you henceforth is under the control of this wonderful Spirit of Life itself. Hence, there is no such thing as death. He shall "quicken also your mortal bodies". There shall be a strange transformation wrought by His energy upon your entire being. He takes charge of you unto the end, as it seems, which is the beginning of something more glorious still, for, as the Apostle tells us in that wonderful eleventh verse: If the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwelleth in you, He that raised up Christ Jesus from the dead shall make your bodies that are liable to death—shall make them alive through His Spirit that dwelleth in you. "We are children of God and if children, then heirs, heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ, if so be that we suffer with Him that we may be also glorified with Him."

Lastly, let it be observed that this is the Spirit of Life in Christ Jesus. The ancient religions all had a vague feeling that something of what I have been saying is true. They all searched for that Divine Spirit whom they felt somehow to be pervading them with His presence. They knew, as sometimes men have known when they come upon certain regions, that there were untapped sources of life or wealth below the arid soil. As these have looked around to see where they could make the openings from which the water should flow or where they could begin to dig up wealth from the bowels of the earth,—so those ancient, wonderful, pathetic religions, have felt that somehow, somewhere, near to human nature, just above their heavens, or just within their souls, there were wells of light and life, and that if they could just open them they would find that which would fill them with Divinity itself. At last it was disclosed, and the one well which God opened for all men is Christ Jesus. All men who are in Christ Jesus have this light and life welling up through Him into their souls. What all those pathetic mystics of the east sought for and sought in vain, Christians find, and possess with the joy of a living consciousness, the Spirit of Life, the Spirit of God Himself in Christ Jesus.

Go, and ask for the Spirit of God, my brother,—the Spirit of Life, my brother; but ask it not as if God sent that Spirit to you simply out of empty heavens or vague spaces. Know this, that the Spirit of God, of Life, is given to men in Christ Jesus. It is the prominent experience of the Church that the more a man loves Christ, the more a man understands Christ, the more a man reverences Christ, the more a man obeys Christ, the more a man puts his whole confidence in Christ Jesus, the more a man makes Christ Jesus his world in which he lives and moves and has his being, the more mightily he knows that the Spirit of Life has taken possession of him. There is no gospel in the world like this. There is no religion that can for a moment be compared unto this. There is no power measurable with the power of the Spirit. There is no certainty more clear than this that if you love Jesus Christ, the Spirit of Life is in you and the law of the Spirit of Life has made you free from the law of sin and of death.

There is no self-delusion more fatal than that which makes the conscience dreamy with the anodyne of lofty sentiments, while the life is grovelling and sensual. J. R. Lowell.

BIBLE SCHOOL.*GOD'S PROMISE TO ABRAHAM.

Lesson for Aug. 11, 1901. Gen. 15: 1-18.

*Golden Text: I Am Thy Shield and Thy Exceeding Great Reward. Gen. 15:1.A CHICAGO TEACHER'S NOTES ON THE LESSON.

Elias A. Long.

Setting of the Lesson.

Time: Probably five or six years after the events of the last lesson. The place was Hebron, twenty miles south of Jerusalem.

The Covenant of Faith.

The center of the present chapter, as almost of the entire Old Testament, is the covenant referred to in verse 18. The covenant of Noah had been based on nothing higher than material blessings on earth; this one with Abram, marks an advance to spiritual blessing and to eternal interests as conditioned on faith. The immediate design was to stimulate Abram's faith in view of the trials and disappointments which he had experienced. It was necessary for Abram to learn the great lesson that trials are inevitable, that God's child, although guided by wisdom and ways as much higher than his own, as the heavens are higher than the earth (Isa. 55: 9), is certain to meet with many delays and vexations. The fulfillment of the heavenly Father's promises cannot be marked by haste. He is dealing with the eternal standpoint; he is training character for eternal issues: 2 Pet. 3: 8.

It is a mistake to assume, as sometimes is done, that the Old Testament covenant is identical with Mosaism, or that the principle of righteousness had its basis primarily in obedience to the law of Mt. Sinai. Both our present lesson (verse 6) and Paul's argument in Rom. 4; Gal. 3: 6-14, show that the true righteousness before the Lord, in both dispensations, is righteousness by faith and not righteousness through works of obedience to law. Obedience is a fruit of faith.

Faith's Disappointments.

The first words of our chapter show Abram's need of special encouragement following upon his experiences set down in Chap. 14. His love and concern for Lot, his adopted son, did not cease when the latter chose Sodom as his home. Can he not yet win him back to a place by his altar? One result of Lot's folly in getting into bad company is brought out in Chap. 14: 11, 16. He, with other Sodomites, had been captured by a band of soldiers from beyond the Euphrates and carried into captivity. Immediately upon hearing of his beloved nephew's plight, as if hoping he might now regain his alienated heart, he arms his trained servants and, starting in pursuit, gains a great victory over the Elamite leader and rescues Lot and other Sodomites with their goods. Verse 16. But if he had hoped to bring Lot back into a righteous community he was doomed to sad disappointment. Lot ungratefully returns to Sodom and its associations. Although Abram had been successful in his heroic attack on the troops of Chedalaomer, the thought would naturally arise: May not this powerful Elamite gather overwhelming forces and, returning, sweep him from the land? This we gather from Verse 1 of to-day's lesson had a disquieting effect on Abram's heart. Added to such forebodings would be the feelings of disappointment pathetically expressed in verses 2 and 8 of our lesson. Upwards of ten years had passed since the promise, so dear to his heart, of a child had been made. Yet here he is a lonesome old man, surrounded in his camp by many shouting children, but they his servants; he remains childless. "Why does God make me wait so long? Will his promises fail?" Such it would appear were the sore perplexities that bore upon Abram's mind at the time our lesson on God's new covenant opens.

V. 1. Shield of Jehovah. "After these things word of the Lord came." God first draws nigh by his spoken word, leading up to the covenant. No fewer than eight times in this chapter is the voice of God to Abram indicated. He has revealed himself to all mankind in his spoken word. At last the Word became flesh. For God to speak to one whom he created in his own image is most natural. * * * "Fear not, Abram, I am thy shield." In the hour of fear God comes with this definite assurance so oft repeated in his world. If Jehovah is his shield why fear what man can do. God wants us to be strong behind the shield he furnishes, as against the fiery darts of temptation, doubts, fears, passions, evil suggestions, enemies seen and unseen. Eph. 6: 10-16. * * * "Thy exceeding great reward." Not only the rewarder but the reward. Abram had just refused the earthly rewards of the King of Sodom. (Chap. 14: 23.) The true defense of the soul against fear and the true recompense for sacrifice is God himself. God is greater and better than his gifts. To have God is to have all things. 1 Cor. 3: 21-23.

V. 2, 3. Trials of Faith. "I go childless." Abram's faith had been tried by long delays. Perhaps nine years had passed since God's promise that a child should be borne to him. (Chap. 12: 7.) He could not understand why he was kept waiting. Have you waited many years for a promise to be fulfilled and not wondered over the delay? Has your confidence in God's perfect love and care been lessened, when you was receiving not present reward and peace but instead possibly anxiety or bodily pain? If so, then Abram's lesson is for you. * * * "Stewart, this Eliezer." Abram revolved in his mind whether after all it was meant that Eliezer, his steward, and he as Damascene, was to be his heir.

V. 4. Wait on the Lord. "This shall not be thine heir." Not Eliezer, but a natural son shall be his heir. This was to be fulfilled years later in Isaac. But did Abram gain anything through these long-delayed expectations? Yes, step by step he was led (1) from idolatry in Ur, to be (2) a colonist with thoughts set on a land and home in Canaan and then (3) to be the "Friend of God," and at last (4) he is drawn close to the Father, to understand that not land, nor property, nor houses, nor father, nor brother, nor children (Matt. 19: 29), but God himself was to be his exceeding, his "hundred fold" great reward. "Wait on the Lord; be of good courage and he shall strengthen thine heart; wait, I say, on the Lord." Psa. 27: 14; Isa. 40: 31.

V. 5. Sign of the Stars. "Look now toward heaven." Look up. There is no discouragement in that direction. The heavens declare the glory of God. Ps. 19: 1. If he who made the countless stars and controls them in their sweep has promised, be assured, Abram, he will fulfill. * * * "Stars... able to number them." To Abram the stars became a sign of posterity. To us they are blessed signs of another promise. "They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars forever." Dan. 12: 3; 1 Cor. 15: 41. * * * "So shall thy seed be." As the stars were numberless so Abram's posterity should be. The present number of Jews is computed to be above seven millions; multiply this by all the generations since Abram, for vastness of numbers; then there is left out the vastly greater Arabian line as well as Christians, Abram's spiritual children.

V. 6. Faith's Deeper Renewal. "He believed in the Lord." God's word was enough. He will go on trusting and waiting for the blessing to come in God's way and God's time. The English "believe" is not strong enough; the original means that Abram was supported, built up. He accepted what God said as solid, divine substance (Heb. 11: 1) and of which it only required time to prove the truth. He will walk by faith, not by appearances. * * * "Counted to him for righteousness." Righteousness stands for rightness. It means that Abram's heart was right. On Abram's part there was neither act nor work, but a mere acceptance of God in his heart through believing. "With the heart man believeth unto righteousness." Rom 10: 10. His faith brought him—as a right heart now brings us—to the ground where God can remit our sins and where we are justified before God, not of our own merit or works, but, because we accept God's promised grace. Here we have the doctrine of justification by faith the very center of revealed truth. But justifying faith is fruit-bearing faith.

V. 7. Deliverer from Idolatry. "Brought thee out of Ur." I that make these promises have shown my care for you all through life. I will not fail you now. It is almost the identical language addressed to Israel many years later (Ex. 20: 2) and showing God's perpetual guidance of his people. * * * "To give thee this land." How about previous ownership? Some would argue that the first possessors are the owners. God the Supreme Possessor does not say that.

V. 8. Inquiring Faith. "Lord God." God is here presented in capitals because the word in the Hebrew represents Jehovah. Compare with Gen. 2: 4. * * * "Whereby shall I know." His second question. It shows not doubt but acceptance of the promise. God grants to us some visible support of our faith in (1) his past dealings, in (2) his present providences (Gen. 8: 22) and (3) in his ordinances. * * * "Inherit it." He means simply to take possession of.

V. 9. Condescending Response. "He said unto him." Now, in answer to Abram's questions, the great promises are ratified most impressively. In this God shows great condescension by accommodating himself to human weakness. He solemnly goes through the form of an oriental covenant, as if he and Abram stood on terms of equality. The covenant was, like our oaths, one of the many devices men have fallen upon to make sure of one another's words. Abram shall know, by the Most High God's binding himself, in a pledge, to perform that promise. This is only one of many ways in which God has condescended to pledge himself by alliance with men that he may bless them. * * * "Take thee an heifer." As usual in such ratification of a covenant * * * "three years' old," full grown and perfect. * * * "She goat, ram, etc." See Lev. 1: 1, 10, 14.

V. 10. Fruits of Faith. "He took unto him all these." Abram's faith was marked by the works of immediate obedience. Faith without works is dead. Jas. 2: 14-18. * * * "Divided them in midst." The animals were slain and cut in two and each half laid over against the other, a narrow passage being left between them. The idea seems to have been that the contracting parties passing between the pieces, indicates that the compact bound them under the penalty of the same fate as the slaughtered animals. See Jer. 34: 18-20. * * * "The birds divided he not." Being small a whole one was probably laid against a corresponding one.

V. 11. Ravenous Birds. "Fowls came down." Birds of prey, R. V. These abound in the east and would be attracted by the scent of the slain creatures. * * * "Abram drove them away." Thus we should drive away birds that devour the seed of the word from our hearts and the hearts of others (Mat. 13: 4, 19); all devouring worldly and unclean thoughts and cares, temptations, pleasures, or whatever would destroy our close relation with God.

V. 12, 13. Egyptian Bondage. * * * "A deep sleep." A disclosure affecting the future of Abram's posterity was now to be revealed. * * * "A horror of great darkness." Abram was brought under a heavy cloud to hear of the dark experience that was to come to his seed after his death. * * * "Thy seed shall be a stranger." A sojourner, a transient resident. * * * "Shall serve them... afflict them." Be as slaves under hard and cruel bondage. * * * "400 years." Perhaps speaking in round numbers. So Stephen quotes the words Acts 7: 6, while Paul, Gal. 3: 17, speaks with the greater definiteness of Ex. 12: 40, 41. These dates and periods have led to unprofitable dispute over Bible chronology.

V. 14. Brighter Prospects. "That nation... will I judge." Remarkably fulfilled in the plagues and destruction of Egyptians. * * * "Shall... come out with great substance." They were not to go forth as fugitives, but as conquerors, their servitude of many years should be recompensed. In the passages reciting the history, Ex. 3: 21, 22; 12: 35, 36, the "borrow" and "lend" should be "ask" and "let them have," as in the R. V.

□ V. 15. Hope of Immortality. "Go to thy fathers." To go to a place or person implies a continuance of existence, seeming an intimation here of the doctrine of the soul's perpetual existence. * * * "In peace." Abram died in peace and happiness. "The path of the righteous is as a shining light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day." Prov. 4: 18.

V. 16. Growth in Sin. "The fourth generation." Rather the fourth age; four times the length of a man's life. Generations then were longer than now. * * * "Come hither again." Taking possession of Canaan. * * * "Iniquity... not yet full," pointing to the growth of sin among the Amorites, a general name for Canaanitish tribes. They still had some four hundred years of grace. To show that there could be present a remnant of holy seed in those idolatrous tribes we have but to take the case of Abram in Chaldaea (Chap. 12: 7) and of Melchizedek in Canaan (Chap. 14: 18). Some people's measure of sin fills faster than others.

V. 17. Covenant Ratified. "When it was dark... smoking furnace." This may have signified the affliction of the children of Israel in Egypt. * * * "Behold flaming torch." R. V. The luminous symbol of the divine presence. Its first appearance since man left Eden. It afterwards was seen by Moses in the burning bush and later. The flaming fire in the midst of darkness must have greatly impressed Abram. Acts 26: 13, 14. * * * "Passed between those pieces." Thus before the eyes of his human friend and ally, it pleased Jehovah, in his condescension, to bind himself after the manner of man, forever to the promises of his grace. This solemn and impressive ceremony between God and weak, sinful man cannot but have given Abram, as it ought to give us, new thoughts of God and of man. It is, however, but an intimation of the kindness that man, through God's condescension in Christ, would experience.

V. 18. Conditions. "Made a covenant." A covenant merely means an agreement between two. As for Abram's preparation and part, all that had preceded in his faith, obedience, self-renunciation had been but preliminary steps to this meeting with God. * * * "Unto thy seed"... given this land." The deed was executed, the coming into possession was to be deferred. * * * "River of Egypt." This may mean the Nile. Israel's domain never reached exactly to that river, although virtually such was the case. Such extension of the domain was only realized in the prosperous reign of Solomon. 1 Kings 4: 21. Had Israel's faith been equal to God's promise, it might have been gained sooner and held longer. God truly has stood by that covenant, and this should teach us that He surely will stand by every one of his promises.

-[FIVE-MINUTES SERMON ON THE GOLDEN TEXT.

By Peter Ainslie.

OD is something to us—something to every person. He is most to those who know him best, but even to those who know him least he is something. The infidel sees God in some remote cause and to him God is only that, whatever that may be. To the believer God is a shield and a great reward. He becomes a person, and a person of intense affection, as we approach him. Afar off, our knowledge is second hand. We have to quote some other's experience. We name Paul or Peter; we say some of the fathers said this and felt something else; we cite the case of a neighbor and that is as far as our knowledge goes. God is afar off to us and our experience is a second hand thing; but if we want him for our shield and our great reward, we must move up towards him. We must not be contented at beholding afar off. We must get so hid in him that in whatever direction Satan approaches us, he will find that God is there as our shield. The Lord knows them that are his and his angels encampeth around about them that fear him. We sometimes think we are doing a great deal towards our salvation, but see what God is doing. He is making a hiding place for us, for he knows our weakness. He is defending us more bravely than ever a mother defended her child. The bleeding Savior tells the marvelous story of our God's defense. The defense is still kept up. We need all the re-enforcement we can get. The battle is a hot one. Hear this: "No man shall pluck you out of my hand." The safety is more than the heart realizes. If it were not a daily defense, we could not hold out. He fed his people in the wilderness journey, but he fed them day by day. It is so now. He gives us grace for a day's supply and in his sacred heart we are shielded. By the side of the defense is a reward. This is the strangest thing in all the world. I have seen men pay others for saving them, but here is a case where the Savior pays the saved. You will find nothing like this in all the world. God saves the sinner and God gives eternal life to this object of his love. Beneath it all and above it all is one master passion and that is love—just love for the lost world. God will surely get the victory and a great host shall rise up and shout to him eternal glory.

Our Father, we are satisfied in all that thou hast done and give thee thanks in the name of Jesus, our Lord. Amen.

LOOKING CHRISTWARD.

Heb. 12:2. References, Isa. 45:22-25; Acts 4:11, 12; Rom. 14:8-11.

IT MAY seem on first thought to be a matter of small importance to get a man to fix his gaze upon a certain object. But it is upon these apparently minor details that the destiny of men and nations has oftentimes depended. By looking at some unsightly scene for a moment the faint-hearted may swoon and become unconscious; by looking at some peculiarly bright object we become hypnotized; we behold some beautiful picture or scene of grandeur—the whole life may be uplifted and transformed. The writer of the Hebrew letter has pictured the Christian life under the strong and virile figure of a race. The runner at the Olympian games, having put aside every hindrance would fix his eye steadily upon the goal. He must look neither to the right nor the left, not allowing anything to distract his attention. How much more necessary is this in the Christian race! The great cloud of witnesses are not the mere spectators who paid their fee, but they are those who have run the race and obtained the prize, and they are now encouraging us by their presence. But there is one great champion.

Why Look Unto Him?

He is our Captain and standard bearer on the path of faith. He is courageous, never asking us to go where he himself has not first gone. How fortunate we are that we have one to whom we can look, who knows our every temptation and can sympathize with us, but he can do more—inspire us to redoubled effort. He has been pre-eminently successful, although his success has been the world's greatest paradox. He was the stone which the builders rejected, but he has now become the head of the corner. In all the ages past he is incomparable. There is a charm, a power, a vitality in his name that there is in no other. He is the great ethical and religious teacher. He is the realized ideal of humanity. He is the Savior of lost and sinful men. He stands at the goal to beckon us on, assuring us that if we are faithful unto the end we shall receive a crown of life.

What Does it Mean?

Where are we to look that we may see the Christ? Some would belittle the historic Jesus; others suffer as great a loss by forgetting that there is a living and ever present Christ. Let us look to him whose life issued from the throne of God as a stream of purity, sweetening the bitter waters of Phariseism, Sadduceism and paganism.

Towards Palestine the whole world was looking with wistful gaze. The wise men from far-distant lands were moving Christward, and at Bethlehem they saw the object of their quest. See him in the humility of his earthly life! How calm and yet how majestic he is! Let us never lose sight of him who spake as never man spake. We see him as he ministers in loving helpfulness unto those who are in need; as he weeps at the grave of Lazarus; as he approaches Jerusalem; as he wrestles in the Garden of Gethsemane; as he is crucified on Calvary and is raised again to live forevermore. New forces have been set at work in the world which have changed the current of history and made all life more sweet and joyous. If we would see Christ today let us not turn with some far-away look into the skies above, but among the poor and lowly; and there we will see the images that we have made of him; and there we will be able to minister unto him; "for in as much as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me." Let us cultivate the sense of his presence that we may see him in all the greater disclosure of God's power and goodness in the world.

ENEMIES AND ARMS.

Topic, Aug. 11, Eph. 6:10-18—Spiritual Strength

FINALLY, my brethren, be strong in the Lord and in the power of his might." Spiritual strength does not come by chance. It is no miracle of divine grace. We can be strong in the Lord only in the strength of his might. We must will to be strong. It is not enough to want to be. We are to be filled with the Spirit. There is something imperative and imperial in this language. It strikes the soul like the hand of a master the keys of the great organ. It sweeps the spirit like a strong wind from the mountains of the morning. There is hope, possibility, inspiration! We may be strong! Let us get this. I fear too many of us are weak because we do not realize that strength may be ours. We tremble in our weakness, blunder in our blindness, and stumble in our ignorance, when we might be wise, when we might have spiritual sight, when we might truly and triumphantly reign as kings and priests unto God. It is almost mean to apologize for our spiritual weakness, as for our downright meanness. But how shall we become strong? "Put on

The Whole Armor of God.

Many are weak because they are unarmored and unarmed. It is astonishing to find how many there are, who, confessing their weakness, refuse to put on any part of the armor of God. Some actually plead their weakness as sufficient excuse for refusal and failure to put on the divine armor. There are any number of so-called Christians, and endeavorers in name, who simply sit in silence, or shirk every duty and spoil all true delight in service, by inexcusable laziness and indifference. These seem not to have any conception of what it means to be good soldiers of Jesus Christ. They are simply camp followers, or "contraband" Christians. They will not fight and they will not work. What to do with those who will not do anything for themselves is the problem of church management. For there is this about the armor of the Christian—no one can put it on us but ourselves. The best teacher or preacher or leader in the world can not put the armor of God on you. You must "take up," "take unto you," "put on" this armor. You must gird your loins with truth; no one else can do it for you. It is a personal matter between your soul and your Savior. It is your liberty, your life. You must put on the breastplate of righteousness. Every soul must stand in its own integrity. Having no righteousness of our own, we must put on the righteousness of God which is by faith—and whatever is by faith is an individual matter. We must shoe our own feet with the preparation of the gospel of peace—a difficult thing to do. We must take up the shield of faith—which some of us let slip down too easily, or let go entirely, because it is heavy at times. We must take the helmet of salvation and the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God. Read all these in the Revised Version and get this thought, that we are to do these things for ourselves and not wait for some one to do it for us. It's an inspiring lesson. But this we can do: We can pray in the Spirit, at all seasons, watching thereunto in all perseverance and supplication for all saints.

EXPOSITORY HINTS.

A FIRE-PROOF CHARACTER.

ASINFUL character is combustible. It is fuel for the fires of judgment. Its end is to be burned. "Wickedness burneth as a fire." Men are consumed by the fires of passion; they are destroyed by their burning lusts. On the other hand righteous character is fireproof. Upon it the fires of judgment have no power. This is the thought of the text which is quoted above. The double question, "Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? Who among us shall dwell with everlasting burning?" has for its answer, "He that walketh righteously and speaketh uprightly, he that despiseth gain of fraud, that shaketh his hands from holding of bribes, that stoppeth his ears from hearing of blood, that shutteth his eyes from looking upon evil; he shall dwell on high; his place of defense shall be the munition of rocks." The man who walketh in righteousness shall stand unhurt in the midst of the most fiery trials; he shall walk through the devouring fire of persecution uninjured; he shall dwell in everlasting burnings of national judgment untouched by harm.

Ordeal by fire, to which reference here seems to be made, was a very ancient custom. It has been practiced by nations widely separated. When the guilt or innocence of a person had to be decided, an appeal was made to the judgment of God. The accused had to pass through a fire, or carry a piece of red-hot iron for some distance in his hand, or walk blindfolded over red-hot plowshares. If he escaped unhurt he was pronounced innocent, if he could not endure the ordeal he was pronounced guilty.

After a time, ordeal by fire came to be adopted by the Church. There is the well-known case of Savonarola the Florentine monk, who, when excommunicated by the pope, challenged an ordeal. Standing on the balcony of the cathedral in Florence he asked God to destroy him by fire if he had preached or prophesied lies. A Franciscan monk accepted the challenge. Two pyres were lighted in the market-place; but while the Franciscans and the Dominicans were discussing whether the combatants should carry the host or the cross through the flames, a rain storm extinguished the fires.

Ordeal by fire, although a perversion of truth, suggests a moral lesson. It symbolizes faith in the protecting power of God over the righteous. This is the thought which lies at the heart of the story of three Hebrew youths who were preserved in the midst of a burning fiery furnace. They had in them those moral elements which no fire could destroy. "By faith they quenched the violence of fire."

After a building has been destroyed by fire the safe, containing money and valuable papers, is taken out unharmed. So many a man comes forth from the fire of trial unscathed. He may hold firmly by principles in the devouring fire of business rivalry, he may dwell in safety in the everlasting burnings of public misrepresentation and abuse.

The test of fire is applied to character in this life. The purgatorial fires by which character is tried and in which it is purified, lie this side of the grave. "Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to prove you as though some strange thing happened unto you." "Now for a season ye are in heaviness through manifold temptation, that the proof of your faith being more precious than gold that perisheth, though it be proved by fire, might be found unto praise and glory and honor at the revelation of Jesus Christ." "And who shall stand when he appeareth? for he is like a refiner's fire, and he shall sit as a refiner of silver, and he shall purify the sons of Levi and purge them as gold and silver, and they shall offer unto the Lord offerings in righteousness."

Some one has said that "the business of religion is not to insure a man against fire in the other world, but to create an insurable interest in him." That insurable interest which makes him worth saving is the creation within him of a spirit and principle of righteousness. To make a man fireproof you must make him righteous. Nothing but righteousness is indestructible. Paint and pretence will melt away in the fire of divine judgment. When "the fire shall try every man's work what sort it is," the wood, hay, stubble shall be burned up, and the gold, silver and precious stones shall sparkle in the flames. O, my soul, what wilt thou do when tongues of flame lap around thee, and search thee to the core? If within thee sin be found thou hast everything to fear; if righteousness, nothing. Let the fire scorch if only it will preserve and purify. When the fiery ordeal must needs be met listen thou my soul to the voice which says, "When thou walkest through the fire thou shalt not be burned, neither shall the flame kindle upon thee; for I am the Lord thy God, the Holy One of Israel, thy Savior."

Looking at the surface of things we see mighty forces of good and evil at work. They are too powerful for our control. Whither are they leading on? To destruction or to redemption? To believe in Christ is to believe in a Christianized society as the final goal.

THE BEGINNING OF SIN AND REDEMPTION.

"Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound."—Romans 5, 20.

Monday—Genesis 2: 8-17:

It seems more like a story of mythology than a recital of truth and fact—this record of the garden eastward in Eden. I have wandered far from its blessedness and innocence.

Yet I like to believe in that golden past which lies behind me. It may be a long distance behind. It may be separated from me by many more years than I am able to reckon. But once it was a reality. In the infancy of the world there was a Paradise where nothing but what was fair and gracious grew.

And why am I glad to remember this? Because what has been may be again. I delight in the thought of that old Eden, remote as it is, impossible as it sometimes looks. It tells me of the lofty levels on which humanity has walked, and may walk. It assures me that there is no iron necessity which makes me a sinner simply because I am a man. It opens the door of a golden future as well as of a golden past.

Tuesday—Genesis 3: 1-15.

Sin comes to me like the serpent.

There is the vitality of it. For months the serpent will lie apparently dead. But, once it is roused, it can, as a naturalist says, "outclimb the monkey, outswim the fish, outleap the zebra, outwrestle the athlete." So it is with sin. When I think it dead, lo, it leaps into life, and strangles me.

There is the omnipresence of it. I cannot keep temptation out of my life. It appears where I least expect it. It conquers me when I think myself secure.

There is the fascination of it. The serpent is the most subtle beast of the field. It mesmerizes its victims. It fastens them with its eye. It steals on them with its noiseless approach. It perplexes them with its circling folds. And thus does sin bewilder me. I am confused by it. I am led an easy captive.

And there is the awful power of it. The serpent can crush the tiger. Its coils gather rapidly round its prey. Its stroke flashes poison through the blood. Against sin I am helpless. Yes, till he comes who bruises the serpent's head.

Wednesday—Genesis 3: 17-24.

Here is the measureless sorrow of sin.

Adam and I have banished ourselves from our Father's presence. I do not say that we are fatherless. Such is God's unconquerable compassion that, though I am a prodigal, He continues to count me His child, He longs for my return, He loves me still. There is no grace like His.

But I am shut out by my sin from that friendship with Him which I might have had, and there is a dread possibility of my losing altogether His favor and the light of His face. There are moments when the question stirs in me of which the poet writes:—

"Thou art so full of misery, Were it not better not to be?"

It is a mournful ruin. I am sorry for the beggar, who is born a beggar, dependent on the charity of others. Let me be sorer for myself. I was born a King's son, and from such a height I have sunk to such a depth. That is a thousand times sadder and worse.

Thursday—Psalm 14.

I am godless, until Christ redeems me. "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God."

What a rebellion mine is! The door of my heart has to be unlocked by myself, that He may enter in and abide with me; and I will not unlock it. The government over my life has to be surrendered by me to Him; and I will not surrender it—I boast that I am my own master. The Throne of His grace should be the best-loved spot on earth to me, to which I am resorting continually; and I have no gladness in seeking it out. In simple fact I have no God who deserves the name. I am atheistic in practice, if not in creed.

Ah, and what a sadness mine is! I am in the wilderness without a guide. I am on the sea without a harbor or a pilot. I am in sickness of spirit without medicine or physician. I am hungry without bread, and weary without rest. I am an orphan in an empty house, "cold in that atmosphere of death."

If Jesus has given me a God who supplies all my need, can I thank Him too passionately?

Friday—Romans 5: 12-21.

Where my sin abounds the grace of God much more abounds. "O that some one would stretch down a hand!" Seneca cried in his despair. Some one has stretched down a hand, and that Someone is the Lord, supernatural, almighty, divine.

Just because my case is desperate, and my need extreme, He interposes. If my sin had not wrought such a destruction, if it had left any part of me unsmitten and untainted, if there was a vestige of possibility that I could recover myself, the agony and the shame of Calvary would surely have been dispensed with, and the special intervention of the Holy Ghost.

But, when I know myself lost and dead, the Lord comes down to redeem me. Across the cloud, so murky, so big with storm, I see the arch of the rainbow. Over the yawning chasm, which my skill and endeavor cannot span, I see the bridge, whose Builder and Maker He is. Since I am helpless, He hastens to my help. He becomes my Healer, my Righteousness, my Everlasting Light.

Saturday—1 John 1: 1-22.

My God meets my far-reaching ruin with a redemption which reaches every whit as far.

A great load of past guilt lies on me with a crushing weight, guilt for which I deserve His wrath and curse. But "the blood of Jesus Christ, His Son, cleanseth me from all sin." There is a virtue in that precious blood to pacify the loudest demands of the law and the sharpest accusation of conscience. There is a power in this Saviour to snatch from Satan his most abject captives and lead them into glorious liberty. I will rejoice that, through Him, I am pardoned, justified, accepted, set free.

My present life is helplessly weak. But "we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the Righteous." He who died lives, and lives to intercede for me. He gains every good gift for me. He sends me His Holy Spirit. Thus, through His prayers and blessings, I rise above the depraved nature which is my inheritance; I shake myself clear from the fetters of circumstance; I overcome the tyranny of habit. In the habitation of dragons shall be grass.

I have destroyed myself, but in Him is my help.

Sunday—John 3: 9-17.

Not the individual soul merely does God compassionate, but the whole family of sin-poisoned and death-doomed men. He "so loved the world"—let me emphasize it, the wide world!—that He gave His only begotten Son.

It is the race that has fallen. Yes, and it is the race for which salvation is furnished in the Lord Jesus Christ. The succor is as far spread as the sickness; the medicine is as universal as the malady. "As in Adam," St. Paul says, "all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive." "By one man's disobedience," he says again, "many were made sinners, and by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous."

What a hope it opens before me! There are souls to whom the offer is made, and they reject it; but that is contrary to His design and desire—it is His will that all should be saved. I thank Him that He means grace to reign wherever sin has been the usurper and the hard taskmaster.

DIVIDED DESIRES.

We wish to come back with as fond a desire

As ever we wish to depart;
"I want to go somewhere," "I want to get back,"
Are the shuttlecock cries of the heart.

When the high tide of summer breaks over the year,
We float on its flowery crest
Till it leaves us adrift on the pine-covered hills
Or the beautiful valleys of rest.

But the sad winds of autumn, like wandering cries,
Seem the voices of spirits that roam,
And they echo our thoughts through the deepening skies,
Our longing and hunger for home.

And blessed are they who return to their homes—
As blessed as they who depart;
"I want to go somewhere," "I want to get back,"
Are the shuttlecock cries of the heart.

BOOKS

The Chief Things, by the Rev. A. W. Snyder: Thos. Whittaker, p. 195, $1. The dedication of this book is "to that important, but much forgotten creature, the Average Man." The author is of the opinion that "the Average Man" reads the newspapers and very little else save works of fiction. He fights shy of a theological book, handling it gingerly and putting it quickly aside if he finds it dull or deep. He wants to have his theological pabulum cut into small pieces, and rather prefers to have it masticated for him. To meet the demands of this multitudinous individual—the average man, is the aim of our author. In twenty-six brief chapters he discusses in a plain and simple fashion the leading doctrines of the Christian faith. His views are moderate and sensible, and if the party for whom they are specially intended can only be induced to read them he cannot fail to receive benefit from them. Yet we cannot help thinking that the average man might have been more readily enticed to taste the good things here prepared for him had they been served up with more literary grace. The style of the book, like the thought, is plain and substantial. A daintier dish would have helped things out greatly.

Bible Facts. By Calla Scott Willard. Fleming H. Revell Co., Chicago, 1901. Pp. 100. Price 25 cents.

Mrs. Willard is a teacher of thirty years' experience in a prominent church in Chicago, and is admirably equipped to prepare such a little handbook as is here named. Its purpose is to bring out the leading facts of the Scriptures and to prepare teachers and students of the Sunday school, Young Peoples' societies, and home circles for more thorough work in the study of the Bible. It presents the material usually found in handbooks and normal school works on the Bible, including its divisions and books, the geography, history, institutions, versions and character of the Bible, and suggestions for the organization of classes. It is accompanied with four maps.

Tyne Folk; Masks, Faces, and Shadows. By Joseph Parker. F. H. Revell Co., Chicago. Pp. 200; 75 cents.

Everyone knows that Joseph Parker is a noted London preacher, but few have learned, perhaps, of his social sketches, of which this book furnishes a collection. They are interesting studies of country and town people, after the style of those found in the books of Barrie and Ian Maclaren. This volume of 200 pages contains a dozen sketches of this sort, and those who know something of Dr. Parker's work in other directions will be interested in reading these studies.

Christian Science Examined respecting its theism, its doctrine of reality, and the atonement, by Rev. J. R. Kaye, Ph. D. of Hudson, South Dakota, is the title of a pamphlet of 32 pages which contains a careful, scholarly and convincing argument against one of the most seductive errors of the present day. As Dr. Kaye turns upon this new cult the white light of reason and common sense he reveals at once the hollowness of its philosophical pretensions, and the harmfulness of its practical tendencies.

IN THE LITERARY WORLD.

The American Standard edition of the Revised Bible is to be published in August by Nelson & Sons, New York.

One hundred and twenty-six British and American novels and seven plays have taken their titles from Shakespeare's words.

The Eternal City, by Hall Caine, will be published by the Appletons early in the autumn. To prepare himself for this work Mr. Caine has made a lengthy sojourn in Rome, making himself master of all the details that are woven into the fabric of his story.

"The Life and Letters of Thomas Huxley," by his son Leonard Huxley, has just been published by the Appletons. It presents the eminent scientist in an attractive light, as a man of sweet and sunny disposition, who did not allow his exacting studies to dry up his human sympathies.

Joseph Cook and John Fiske died within ten days of each other. Fiske relegated Cook's books to the alcove of eccentric literature. On the morning of Mr. Fiske's funeral the Boston Journal said he was an eccentric historian. Would it not be a striking irony of fate if some day in the near future Fiske's books should get into the same alcove?

It is always interesting to know one novelist's estimate of others. General Lew Wallace, so well-known as the author of "Ben Hur" considers that the six greatest English novels are "Ivanhoe," "The Last of the Barons," "The Tale of Two Cities," "Jane Eyre," "Hypatia," and "Tarry Thou Till I Come." The last-named has been out of sight and mind for a time, but in a new edition is again attracting attention.

The "Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science" for July deals with "America's Race Problems." It is seldom that a magazine has packed into it such an amount of valuable information. Those who wish to know of the peoples of our new possessions will find here first-hand information which it would be difficult to find elsewhere within the same compass. It is a special number and should be kept for reference.

Some years ago a series of novels, evidently from the pen of a skilled church historian, appeared under the nom de plume of "George Taylor." The writer was Professor Adolf Haurath, of the University of Heidelberg. The series has been continued, and a new addition recently made to it, in his "Potamiaena." The theme is the conflict between Christianity and educated heathenism in the third century after Christ. The historical background and action are drawn with scholarly correctness.

Among all the books Sir Walter Besant read in his boyhood he put The Pilgrim's Progress first. He said of it once: "It still seems to me the book which has influenced the mind of Englishmen more than any other outside the covers of the Bible. While it survives and is read by our boys and girls, two or three great truths will remain deeply burned into the English soul. The first is the personal responsibility of each man; the next is that Christianity does not want, and cannot have, a priest. I confess that the discovery, by later reading, that the so-called Christian priest is a personage borrowed from surrounding superstition, and that the great ecclesiastical structure is entirely built by human hands, filled me with only a deeper gratitude to John Bunyan."

General Church News

THE BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION.

The third great religious gathering of young people that has met this month in this country assembled in the Coliseum, Chicago, July 25-28. The occasion was the eleventh annual convention of the Baptist Young People's Union. Rev. Dr. J. W. Conley, chairman of the Board of Managers, reports that it has been a wonderful year for the societies and that there has been a steady gain in membership in every department of the Union.

The Second Baptist church of this city was the place where the Union had its beginning July 7, 1891, and a reunion meeting was therefore held there on the evening of the 24th. The next morning prayer services were held in Immanuel Baptist church, the Second Presbyterian church and the Open church, Wabash avenue and Fourteenth street. Later, a praise service in the Coliseum opened the convention led by the chorus of 800 voices directed by Edward T. Clissold, with orchestral accompaniment. Col. Francis W. Parker gave the address of welcome from the citizens of Chicago; Louis A. Crittenton, in behalf of the young people and Rev. John L. Jackson for the churches. President John H. Chapman made the opening address and emphasized particularly the Bible educational work which is being done in the Union, 15,000 having this year filled out examination papers in the Bible course.

"Kingship" was the theme on which all the leading addresses were based and to which the thought of all was constantly directed. Rev. J. A. Bennett of Philadelphia made an address on the sub-topic, "Christ's Conception of His Kingdom."

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan's address on Friday was the great point of attraction. He asserted that "the new atheism of indifference is fearfully alive. We find it even in our churches. Hundreds of thousands of outwardly respectable people are atheists in practical life. They may come to church and repeat the creed, but in their business and in their pleasures they get along without God. It is you, young men and women, who must fight against this. You must become a new race of Puritans. Everything that is best in this country came from the Puritans, and the evil of the future must be fought by Puritanism. You do not need to wear the somber garb, but in spirit and life you must be Puritans. Argument will not overcome the new atheism. The only thing that will conquer it is the spiritual power in life—in your lives. Along with the atheism goes animalism and materialism, which you must fight and defeat."

At the morning session the following officers were elected for the Union for the coming year: President, John H. Chapman; Recording Secretary, Rev. H. W. Reed; Treasurer, Henry R. Clissold, all of Chicago. Prof. C. L. Williams and Rev. W. W. Weeks spoke of the "Kingship of Christ," the former in the intellectual realm, the latter in the spiritual. In the afternoon, besides Mr. Morgan's address, there was an open parliament on the work of the Union.

The evening addresses discussed "Recreation, Business and the State," the speakers being Rev. W. J. Williamson of Kansas City, Isaac W. Carpenter of Omaha, and Rev. G. L. Morrill of Minneapolis. Dr. Morrill said: "The triumph of municipal misrule has not been because bad men have been bold, but because good men have been cowards. The primaries should be attended as regularly as the prayer meeting. Christ sits over against the ballot box as he did over against the treasury of old to see what is cast therein."

The leading topics on Saturday were "In the King's Garden" at the Juniors' meeting, and in the evening "Enlarging the Kingdom." Addresses were made by Rev. A. P. McDiarmid of Manitoba; Rev. R. J. Willingham of Richmond, Va., and Rev. Fred P. Haggard of Assam.

"Thy Kingdom Come" was the main topic of the Sunday morning services. In the afternoon the annual convention sermon was delivered by Rev. E. E. Chivers of Boston, and the convention closed in the evening with a consecration service led by Rev. William H. Geistweit, Rev. Dr. James B. Cranfill delivering an address.

The attendance was not equal to that of former conventions, probably owing to the heat. It was about 8,000, but the lack in numbers was made up in enthusiasm.

INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION OF THE EPWORTH LEAGUE.

Keynotes of the fifth international convention, held July 18-21 in San Francisco, were civic righteousness, temperance and missions. The music was furnished by the Park Sisters, cornetists of New York, a chorus of 2,000 voices and the Stanford Memorial organ loaned by Mrs. Stanford Memorial church, attached to Leland Stanford, Jr., University. The attendance at this convention was the largest in the history of the organization.

The Epworth League was born May 14, 1889, in the Central Methodist Episcopal Church of Cleveland, Ohio, Dr. B. F. Dimmick, the pastor, inviting to a meeting there the representatives of various Methodist organizations among the young people. The idea of union was proposed and was accepted with enthusiasm. The membership now is 2,225,000. The avowed

The Cause of Many Sudden Deaths.

There is a disease prevailing in this country most dangerous because so deceptive. Many sudden deaths are caused by it—heart disease, pneumonia, heart failure or apoplexy are often the result of kidney disease. If kidney trouble is allowed to advance the kidney-poisoned blood will attack the vital organs or the kidneys themselves break down and waste away cell by cell.

Bladder troubles most always result from a derangement of the kidneys and a cure is obtained quickest by a proper treatment of the kidneys. If you are feeling badly you can make no mistake by taking Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney, liver and bladder remedy.

It corrects inability to hold urine and scalding pain in passing it, and overcomes that unpleasant necessity of being compelled to go often during the day, and to get up many times during the night. The mild and the extraordinary effect of Swamp-Root is soon realized. It stands the highest for its wonderful cures of the most distressing cases.

Swamp-Root is pleasant to take and sold by all druggists in fifty-cent and one-dollar sized bottles. You may have a sample bottle of this wonderful new discovery and a book that tells all about it, both sent free by mail. Address Dr. Kilmer & Co. Binghamton, N. Y. When writing mention reading this generous offer in this paper.

objects of the League are: "To promote intelligent and vital piety in the young members and friends of the church; to aid them in the attainment of purity of heart and in constant growth in grace and to train them in works of mercy and help." A wide and practical plan of work centers about this declaration of spiritual intention. It is a religious organization, first and foremost, and neglects no chance to win followers for Christ, but helpful, educative and charitable work is by no means neglected.

The convention opened with communion services in three of the churches. In the afternoon the Mechanics' Pavilion, which will hold 15,000 persons, was crowded to hear the addresses of welcome. The principal theme of the three meetings held in the evening was "The Young People's Movement in the Twentieth Century." One of the speakers on this subject, Rev. G. W. Kerby, of Montreal, said: "The twentieth century will be the period of achievement. We are setting up our banners today. The first bears the inscription, 'My Life for Christ'; the third, 'My City for Christ'; the fourth, 'My Country for Christ, and the fifth, 'The World for Christ'."

Each succeeding day of the convention began with sunrise prayer-meetings, largely attended. Noon prayer-meetings for business men were held in the rooms of the Chamber of Commerce and the court of the Palace Hotel. "The Church and the Liquor Traffic," "The Church and the Workingman," and "The Church and the Young Man" were the subjects of addresses by Rev. Messrs. Wm. H. Anderson, of Springfield, Ills.; E. J. Helms, of Boston, and T. E. E. Shore, of Toronto. Rev. James B. Buckley of New York spoke on "The Church and the Newspaper" and Rev. J. B. Scott of New Orleans on "Our Imperilled Sabbath." "A man's most dangerous foes," said the last-named speaker, "are those of his own household. The members of the church are often the leaders in that pleasure-seeking spirit which sacrifices principle and tramples sacred things under foot." On the topic, "The Church and the Workingman," Mr. Helms made the suggestions that we seek to "shorten hours of labor so we may not only have a day of rest but a rested man for the day." "Workingmen readily respond when the Church sincerely seeks them and their welfare." Rev. G. R. Turk of Toronto urged that: "The church must prove to the workingman that she is his friend. She must help him in his fight for a weekly rest day. The church must lock shields with the workingman to put down the liquor traffic. The places of worship must be within easy reach of the workingman. The church must banish the dress circle from the sanctuary and abolish the pew rent system, which is a monstrous barrier between the rich and the self-respecting poor."

The same topics were discussed by other speakers at a simultaneous meeting in the Alhambra theater.

"Forward Movements in the Church" was the afternoon topic; Bible study, systematic benevolence, missions, and personal work for Christ were its subdivisions. A missionary mass meeting was held at night in the Pavilion.

Conferences on practical lines of work in the various departments of the League occupied Saturday. On Sunday, the closing day, Bishop Joyce, president of the League, preached eloquently to an audience of 10,000, on "Faith in Christ." Several other services were held at different hours and places. The committee on resolutions emphasized in their report, a great campaign for missions and benevolence in the coming year, increased study of the Bible and missionary literature, Christian stewardship, personal evangelism and unalterable opposition to the liquor traffic.

RELIGIOUS CONGRESSES AT BUFFALO.

Following the idea of the Chicago Parliament of Religions, held in connection with the World's Fair in 1893, a Congress of Religion was held at Buffalo from June 26-July 1. The average attendance was scarcely more than 100, yet the names and topics on the program were attractive. Among the speakers were Professors Jenks of Cornell University, Walter G. Everett of Brown, William N. Clarke of Colgate, and D. G. Duvall of Wesleyan College, Mrs. Florence Kelly, secretary of the Consumer's League, and others of equal merit. The topics were practical and of current interest, concerning religion in the home and school, in the business world, in the church and in the state. In the last-named, more interest was manifested than in any other. It was discussed by Hon. Bird S. Coler and Hon. John A. Taylor of New York, and Prof. Frank Parsons of the Boston Law School. It is admitted even by those not in sympathy with these congresses that in this one there was much that was helpful and inspiring and little to offend the most orthodox.

The Bible Study Congress has been in session the past week. Methods of Bible study have been the subject of consideration and it is to be regretted that so strong and well-proportioned a program should not have received larger attention, yet the attendance was more encouraging than that at most of the numerous conferences held at Buffalo this year. No less than sixteen different Christian bodies were represented on the program. The progressive scholarship of the day was there in the persons of Professors Frank K. Sanders, Shailer Matthews, and Herbert L. Willett; noted workers along Sunday school lines, as Rev. E. Blakeslee, Dr. James M. Gray, Wilbert W. White, of the Bible Teachers' College at Montclair, N. J., Charles G. Meigs, and Rev. E. Morris Ferguson. Prominent educators also took part, among them, Walter L. Hervey, examiner for the New York Board of Education and formerly head of the Teachers' College, New York City, Principal Boone of the Cincinnati public schools, and President Stewart of Auburn Seminary. The objects considered were varied and many of them carefully and effectively presented, and the congress is an excellent testimony to the high value placed upon the Bible and the breadth of interest now being shown in the methods employed in its study.

In the afternoon there will be an address on "The New York Indians," by Rev. H. F. Trippe and another on "A Century of Honor," by Rev. Charles L. Thompson, D. D., Secretary of the Board of Home Missions, and a closing address by Rev. E. P. Cowan, D. D., Secretary of the Freedman's Board.

tures by Professor Dods made a deep impression; and the attendance upon the other public lectures has been large. The preachers under the new system have been Dr. Dods, President Little of Garrett Biblical Institute, and Dr. Gunsaulus. President Andrews will be the university preacher during a portion of the second term, when he is to give a series of twenty public lectures.

He is a brother of William M. Sloane, a well-known author, whose history of Napoleon was the leading article in the Century for a number of months recently.

Contracts are being let for the erection of a new church, more centrally located than the old one, for the Episcopal parish of the Annunciation, Auburn Park, of which the Rev. John Cole has charge, with the Incarnation, Fernwood, and Holy Cross, on Fifty-fifth street, where a lot costing $1,000 is secured and paid for.

growing home department of over 100 members and two mission schools.

The Crawfordsville, Ind., church is rejoicing in freedom from a debt of $3,000 cleared in eighteen months under the leadership of the pastor, Rev. A. W. Runyan.

Akron, Ohio, reports that attendance at prayer-meeting has doubled in the last six months. One-half of the debt has been paid in two years—$4,000. About $1,000 has been expended in renovating the church building.

The Ohio Baptist Assembly held at Mount Vernon so planned its program that good things were not crowded, but sufficient time for rest and recuperation was given, a plan resulting in good attendance at Bible study lectures, etc. Drs. Hulley and Torrey did some of their best work in their lectures on "The Life and Epistles of Paul," and "The Character of Christ." Professor F. W. Shepardson, Ph. D., of the University of Chicago; Rev. Dr. J. W. Carter of West Virginia, and Rev. R. S. Mac Arthur, D. D., LL. D., of New York, were among the speakers.

At the sixty-third annual State convention of Mississippi, held at McComb City July 18, the report of the board showed, in spite of financial distress during the past year, a remarkable increase in the amount of money given by Baptists to missions, both foreign and home, also improvements in the Baptist colleges of Mississippi. Governor Longino was one of the active delegates at the convention. Over $8,000 was subscribed for Mississippi college towards the $45,000 to be raised for an endowment fund.

The Louisiana State convention, which met at Baton Rouge July 19, devoted considerable time to the discussion of missions, both home and foreign. Dr. Penick referred to the fact that there are 550 churches in the State, yet one of these contributed about one-fourth of last year's gifts for foreign missions. The extension of home mission work was emphasized, especially within the State.

Washington Street Congregational church, Toledo, has extended a call to the Rev. Ernest B. Allen of Lansing, Mich., to become its pastor.

Kansas City churches are showing marked signs of progress: Beacon Hill, having been worshipping for five years in a rented hall, is looking forward to the completion of its church building September 1. Dr. J. H. Crum has been its leader from the beginning. Prospect Avenue, six months old, with more than 100 members, feels the need of an adequate church building. Thirty-five persons have united with Olivet church since the spring. It is steadily gaining under Rev. G. Edwin Crossland. Westminster, originally Presbyterian, came into Congregational fellowship last January. It has received 233 members within six years. Rev. William P. George is pastor.

At Platteville, Wis., seventeen were received into the church at the July communion, fifteen on confession of faith, nearly all adults. A brief series of lessons on the basis of Scudder's "Our Children for Christ," has been given by the pastor, Rev. W. H. Short.

The Tabernacle church, St. Joseph, Mo., has been making steady progress in all departments of its work. It has raised $3,000 to remove the debt. Thirty-five have united with church since Rev. W. W. Bolt came to it last October. The Senior Endeavor society supports a Bible woman.

A church of ten members was organized at Gainesville, N. D., July 11, the first church of any name established in Oliver County.

Rev. Richard Bushell is pastor of McMurray and Black Diamond churches, Washington, 101 miles apart; supplies Edison church, at present without a pastor, with Thursday service, and preaches at five other out-stations, week-day services; making a circuit of his field, about 250 miles, every two weeks. At only one place, out of eight regular appointments is there any other service. There are six Sunday schools connected with his appointments. This pastor has enjoyed one month vacation, July, 1898, during the past fourteen years.

He was secretary of the Congregational State Association from its origin in 1858 till the present, a service perhaps unequaled in the annals of the Congregational body. He was president of the Home Missionary Society of Indiana, secretary, for the state, of the Church Building Society, a corporate member of the American Board, trustee of Chicago Theological Seminary, and Wabash College, president of the Indianapolis Art Association, president of the Board of Children's Guardians, and of the New England Society of Indianapolis since its origin.

The Disciples.

Church work is suffering in Nebraska in consequence of the drouth, for with the failure of crops there comes financial inability to build churches needed at several points to make the work permanent and strong.

The Nebraska state convention will be held at Bethany August 19-24. The usual railroad reduction on fares has been granted—full fare to Lincoln and one-third fare return. Ministers cannot claim this unless they pay full fare.

An evangelistic congress will be held at Maxinkuckee Park, Culver, Ind., August 7-8. Addresses will be made by Rev. Messrs. Chas. Reign Scoville, W. E. Harlow, and Allen Wilson. There will be a Round Table Talk on "Some Evangelistic Problems." The assembly banquet will be on Wednesday evening.

In connection with the Bracken County (Ky.) Christian convention held in Brooksville July 11-14 an auxiliary of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions was organized and Christian Endeavor societies, Senior and Junior, also. P. S. Cook was elected county superintendent of Sunday schools.

Rev. John E. Pounds, national superintendent of Christian Endeavor work for the Disciples, urges on every society the observance of Forefathers' Day. Benjamin L. Smith, Y. M. C. A. building, Cincinnati, Ohio, will supply literature for meetings on application.

The alumni of Kentucky University are making a special effort to increase the number of students for next year. The attendance last year was 1,100. Great things are hoped for under the new president, Burriss A. Jenkins.

Rev. J. H. Stottler, who has been pastor at Mount Carmel, Ill., for five years, has accepted a call to Centralia, Ill.

At East Side Church of Christ, Des Moines, Rev. E. W. Brickert, pastor, there have been 298 additions in nine months.

The Church Extension Board organizes 300 new churches each year.

The American Christian Missionary society, the home mission body of the Disciples of Christ, is doing its most active work in Porto Rico, where it was the first Protestant body to establish a mission after the war. The Christian Woman's Mission board has just established an orphanage at Bayonne, which is said to be the first institution of its kind under Protestant control on the island.

The Rev. Mr. Irwin, one of the first missionaries sent to Porto Rico by the Disciples, has been appointed United States District Judge by Governor Allen. Judge Irwin was educated for the law, and his long residence on the island has peculiarly fitted him for the position.

The Disciples' Club, New York City, has changed its name to the Disciples' Union of Greater New York and vicinity. Two new features for next season's work are to be the creation of two funds: one to be an evangelistic fund and the other for the purchase of lots and erection of buildings for church purposes. The conditions in New York are such that the Church Extension Board could not possibly supply sufficient assistance to meet the need.

Sunday, July 14, completed the fifth year of Rev. A. F. Sanderson as pastor of the Christian church at Keokuk, Iowa. In that time the congregation has raised $18,500, has received 484 additions to its membership, built one of the handsomest churches in the city, increased the Sunday school from an attendance of thirty to 206, and the membership of the Christian Endeavor society from four to 120.

Rev. Dr. L. H. Stine has resigned the pastorate of the church at Quincy, Ill., to take effect in September. He went to Quincy from Paris, Mo., nearly three years ago and his ministrations there have been highly successful. He announces that he will retire from the active ministry and in the future will devote his time to literary and business pursuits.

Episcopal.

A $10,000 church is to be built for the Episcopalians of Ishpeming, Mich.

There are about fifty workers in the Episcopal hospital mission, St. Louis, which seeks to reach the insane asylum, poor house, city hospital and female hospital. Services are held each Sunday by Rev. F. W. Cornell. A refuge for convalescent men and women is maintained, flowers are provided for the sick, clothes are given to those who are discharged from the city institutions without anything to wear, letters are written for the unfortunates and often employment and homes found for them.

The Washington cathedral open-air services have been imitated by Grace church, Georgetown, on its spacious lawn and churchyard. Here services are held at seven every Sunday evening, and are received with such favor that the idea seems likely to spread. It is interesting to note the co-operation of an instrumental quartette from the famous Marine band.

St. Paul's church, Indianapolis, held the thirty-fifth anniversary of its founding, July 7, with splendid impressiveness. It has had a memorable history. The earlier Bishops of Indiana—Upfold, Talbot and Knickerbacker—were borne to the tomb from its walls, and here Bishop White, now of Michigan City, was consecrated. For fourteen years it was the cathedral church of the diocese, and its chancel every suggests that honorable designation. The parish plant with its commodious parish house represents an outlay of $100,000. The present rector of the parish, the Rev. Lewis Brown, took charge February, 1900. Statistics are eloquent: Offerings, $399,761.83; baptisms, 958; confirmations, 891; marriages, 199, and burials, 485.

Methodist.

Rev. David Edwards Blaine, who died the other day in Seattle, was the founder of Methodism on Puget Sound and one of the earliest pioneers of Seattle.

The Rev. J. P. Morley, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church at Cambridge, Iowa, has been awarded a special scholarship worth $200 by Harvard University.

The official board of the First Methodist church of Spokane, Wash., has asked that Rev. Dr. Cool be continued as their pastor for next year.

At Charlotte, Mich., the Methodist congregation is to build a $25,000 church.

The new church at Hudson, Mich., was dedicated July 21. The dedicatory sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. B. I. Ives, of Auburn, N. Y. The church, including the organ, has cost $22,000, an indebtedness of $8,000 remaining on the structure was raised by subscription at the morning service, leaving the society entirely free from debt. The church is the most imposing structure of its kind in southern Michigan.

Bishop Hamilton dedicated July 18 the new Oriental Home at 721 Washington street, San Francisco, recently erected by the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal church. With the completion of this building, the headquarters of the rescue work has been transferred from the Chinese Mission House just across the alley. The original building is required for mission work among men. The present site and home represents an expenditure of $16,000. Among the speakers at the dedication were Consul-General Yo How, who thanked the women for their interest in the unfortunate girls among his people and said that the time would come when the question involved would have to be a part of the practice of both religion and politics. He explained that there were laws in China that covered traffic in family girls and that where the laws were enforced a man paid with his life for the crime. Other speakers who told something of the significance of the work and extended congratulations were: Rev. Eli McClish of the University of the Pacific; Dr. J. A. Gardner, Rev. G. B. Smyth, Mrs. E. C. Gibson, widow of Rev. Otis Gibson, who established the Chinese Mission in this city; and Mrs. Masters, whose husband, the late Dr. Masters, took up the work after the death of Dr. Gibson. Miss Lake, the Methodist deaconess who has been untiring in rescue work, was presented, and some of the children of the home sang.

Presbyterian.

Four Presbyterian educational institutions in Kentucky have been consolidated and henceforth will be under one management, viz., Central University, Center College, Danville Seminary, and Louisville Presbyterian Seminary.

The Presbyterian Evangelist Committee of Philadelphia have erected seven tents in as many sections of the city, and well-known evangelists are holding meetings in them. The attendance was so large last year that the number of tents has been increased by two.

Compelled by ill health, Rev. E. C. Jacka has resigned the pastorate of Grace church, St. Louis. He had striven arduously during the winter to collect funds for the building of a new church, and a short time ago entered on the new enterprise of holding tent services every night during the summer. The tent was erected near the church, and Mr. Jacka officiated for several evenings, but he soon found that his strength was insufficient. Grace church has prospered in every way under his ministry. The Sunday services, and the responsibility of carrying forward the plans for building the new church, have been handed over to Rev. Dr. J. B. Brandt, pastor emeritus of Tyler Place church, whose health has now so far recovered as to permit of his performing light pastoral work.

Rev. Charles E. Schaible has been with the church at Creston, Iowa, for four years. When he came there were 182 members; 142 have been received since. At a cost of $9,000 the church building has been completed and a pipe organ, the only one in the city, placed within it. To the boards of the church $775 has been given, and a mission, started seven miles away in the country, has developed into the Zoar church with a good congregation and a building costing $2,000 paid for without debt.

The Presbytery of Denver in accepting the resignation of Rev. Francis E. Smiley, pastor for eight years of the Twenty-third Avenue church, passed resolutions highly appreciative of the work done by him. Seven hundred new members were added to the church during his pastorate, 300 being on confession of faith. The church debt has been reduced and the various departments have been well organized under his leadership. He has served the work at large as moderator of the Presbytery and chairman of its Home Mission Committee; as president of the Colorado State Sunday School Association, and of the Inter-denominational Ministerial Alliance, and as director of the evangelistic effort of the United Young People's societies.

Los Angeles, Cal., has fourteen Presbyterian churches.

Rev. Henry W. Crabbe has been in charge of the Second United Presbyterian church, Los Angeles, for six years, during which time it has been cleared of debt and has secured a church building with ground sufficient for enlargement when needed. July 10 Mr. Crabbe was formally installed as pastor of the Second church.

Baden Mission, St. Louis, conducted for several years by the North church, has just been organized into a church.

Church debts are being paid off in St. Louis. West church has raised $25,000 for the Twentieth Century Fund, half of which pays off a debt on its own property. Walnut Park has raised by real sacrifice $900 to cancel a debt of five years' standing. The pastor of this German-American church, Rev. F. H. Auf Der Heide, M. L., has served since its organization without a salary, depending on his medical practice for support.

Mizpah church, Portland, Oregon, is developing well under the guidance of Rev. Jerome R. McGlade. Twenty-six persons have united with the church since January 20, and a building fund is well in hand.

At the Schenley Park pavilion, Pittsburgh, Pa., Rev. Edward S. Young, pastor of the Second church, preaches every Sunday evening, and the congregations average, according to the local press, about ten thousand. The Schenley Park services are believed to be the most largely attended Sunday services in the world. The excellent order and marked attentiveness are pronounced features.

A STUPID CHILD

may not be so naturally. Many a child that is naturally bright seems stupid and dull in school, because its blood and system are out of order. The key to the situation lies in a course of treatment with Dr. Peter's Blood Vitalizer. Its mild, yet active properties, are especially adapted for the little ones, and persons of weakened constitutions. Not a drugstore medicine. Special agents sell it, or the proprietor, Dr. Peter Fahrney, 112-114 South Hoyne avenue, Chicago, Illinois.

Four-Leaved Clover.

I know a place where the sun is like gold,

And cherry blooms burst like snow,
And down underneath is the loveliest nook,

Where the four-leaved clovers grow.

One leaf is for hope, and one is for faith,

And one is for love, you know;
And God put another in for luck;

If you search, you will find where they grow.

But you must have hope, and you must have faith;

You must love and be strong—and so,

If you work, if you wait, you will find the place

Where the four-leaved clovers grow.—Selected.

"The possible stands by us ever fresh, Fairer than aught which any life hath owned."

So sings Jean Ingelow. And it is true. Hidden even in the most humdrum actual there is a radiant possible. Anyway, there is the possible of noble character through doing one's very best amid a depressing actual. Never let yourself despair.

One of the first flowers to bloom in the spring is the hepatica or liverwort. The chill of the winter was in the air, and the snows were hardly gone, when I saw some beginning their growing amid the dried leaves my stick had poked away. The sturdy hope of the plant moved and helped me.

Never give up; keep alive and alert even amid the dreariest scenes and times. Chance will open somehow if you are getting ready for it by the faithful daily duty, and are looking out for it.—Rev. Wayland Hoyt, D. D.

Face Them.

Prof. Henry Drummond gives the following illustration of a boy's temptations: "You have heard of the old castle that was taken by a single gun. The attacking party had only one gun, and it seemed hopeless to try to take the castle; but one soldier said, 'I can show you how you can take the castle,' and he pointed the cannon to one spot and fired, and went on all day, never moving the cannon. About nightfall there were a few grains of sand knocked off the wall. He did the same thing the next day, and the next. By and by the stones began to come away, and by steadily working his gun for one week he made a hole in that castle big enough for the army to walk through. Now with a single gun firing away at everybody's life, the devil is trying to get in at one opening. Temptation is the practice of the soul, and if you never have any temptation you will never have any practice. A boy who attends fifty drills a year is a much better soldier than one that drills twice. Do not quarrel with your temptations; set yourself resolutely to face them."

An Expensive Badge.

A young man in a London omnibus noticed the blue ribbon total abstinence badge on a fellow-passenger's coat, and asked him in a bantering tone "how much he got" for wearing it.

"That I cannot exactly say," replied the other, "but it costs me about £20,000 a year."

The wearer of the badge was Frederick Charrington, son of a rich brewer, and the intended successor of his father's business. He had been convinced of the evil of the ale and beer trade, and refused to continue in it, though it would have brought him an income of £20,000 a year.

He preferred a life of Christian philanthropy to a career of money-making; and his activity soon made him known through the kingdom as a most successful temperance evangelist. His work, organized in the tent meeting on Mile End Road, has grown steadily for twenty years, and now fills "the largest mission hall in the world."—The Children Record.

A Newsboy's Gratitude.

A newsboy, months after he had eaten a Christmas supper, insisted on paying the kind journalist who provided it. On Christmas night I stepped into a cheap restaurant in Park Row for a cup of hot coffee. As I took my seat at one of the small tables a ragged little boy planted himself on the stool opposite. There was a wolfish glare in the boy's eyes as he fumbled a nickel and said: "A plate of beans."

I sipped my coffee and watched the boy ravenously devour the beans. Whispering to the waiter, I told him to bring a plate of corned beef, some bread and butter, and a bowl of coffee for the boy.

The little fellow stared for a moment and began his meal. In a few minutes the beef, bread, and coffee had disappeared; yet the boy's appetite was not satisfied.

"What kind of pie do you like?" I asked.

"Most any kind; they's all good," replied the boy.

"Bring him some mince pie and

The boy gazed at the two pieces of pumpkin pie," said I to the waiter. He lay in wonderment and then looked up shyly and pushed his nickel toward me.

"What's that for?" I asked.

"To pay for the spread; it's all I've got," he said.

Taking a quarter from my pocket, I laid it on the boy's coin and pushed them both across the table.

"Is them for me?" said the boy, with his mouth full of pie. "Am I to have all that?"

"Yes; this is Christmas night, you know."

"Yes, I remember; but I had no money for my lodging, so I didn't get any of the dinner down at the Newsboys' Lodging House. Thank you, mister; you is good ter me."

Months passed. One day a boy stopped me near Brooklyn Bridge. "Say, mister," said he, "I owe you a quarter. Here it is."

Recognizing my Christmas guest, I gently refused the money, telling him that he had better keep it.

"No, you take it," he persisted.

NEW WABASH EQUIPMENT.

The Wabash Railroad has just received and placed in service on its lines running out of Chicago the following new equipment: Eight combination baggage and passenger coaches, thirty palace day coaches, ten reclining chair cars, three cafe cars and two dining cars. The majority of these new cars are seventy feet in length, and fitted with the latest style wide vestibules. They have six-wheel trucks with steel wheels. The cars are finished in the finest selected Jago mahogany. The lighting is by Pintsch gas with the exception of the cafe, dining and some of the chair cars, which are unusually well lighted by electricity, the fixtures being especially designed for these cars. The dining cars will seat twenty-nine persons and have ample kitchen space. The cafe cars will seat eighteen persons in the cafe, and have a library and smoking room in the observation end of the car which will seat fourteen persons. These cars also contain a private cafe with seating capacity for eight persons. These new cars represent the highest stage of the development of modern car building. Nothing has been omitted and no expense spared that would add to their luxurious elegance, or to the comfort and convenience of the patrons of the Wabash road.

No line is now better equipped than the Wabash for handling business to the Pan-American Exposition. Write for a copy of Pan-American folder containing a large colored map of the Exposition grounds and zinc etching of the principal buildings.

Speaking Hands.

The hand is a true expression of personality. The way we do things is shown by the hand; is it roughly or gently done, is it done with care and precision or is there no finished execution? This means that a mind controls the hand. The training of the hand and mind must go together.

We sometimes say of a person, his fingers are all thumbs, and that implies a certain mental lack. There has been no proper co-ordination between the inward thought and the outward expression of it. Our gestures, our way of taking up any given bit of work, the postures of our body, absolutely unconscious as they are, proceed from the thing that is our real self—the underlying self from which the act of volition springs. How important, then, to cultivate the mind as far as we can, as far back as we can behind the external effects so that what we do may proceed from a right and pure source. This is the only fount of good manners, of gentleness and propriety of conduct and action.

The highest ideal of all is expressed in Albert Durer's "Praying Hands." Do you remember that beautiful drawing of his? The hands are old and knotted hands that have seen work and have served their day and generation, put together in the attitude of prayer. One can feel the devotion, the trust and the aspiration in the very posture of these wonderful hands. It is the hand that can work and the hand that can pray which is our highest ideal for each one of us to pursue. It is the same hand that works and that prays, not a different one, unless it can do both it has not fulfilled its highest opportunity; and it is given to you to train such hands that they in their turn may go into the world with the spirit that dignifies labor and that brings worship into everyday life.—Caroline Hazard, President of Wellesley College.

Hot-Weather Philosophy.

A caller at a pleasant cottage home one sultry afternoon in August found the daughter of the house in the parlor, from which the sunshine had been carefully excluded, a glass of ice-water at her left hand, and a palm-leaf fan clasped in her right.

"How could you venture out on such a day?" was her unconventional greeting. "Since breakfast I've done nothing but think how hot it is, and it has grown worse every minute."

The visitor, an energetic little woman with many cares and many interests in life, laughed by way of answer.

"Of course it has," she said. "Now, I've had such a host of pleasant things to think of, that really I haven't had any energy to spare for being uncomfortable."

This bit of hot-weather philosophy can be stretched to cover numberless experiences in life. How many discomforts we exaggerate by resolutely fixing our thoughts upon them, when they might be borne easily if the mind was only occupied with other things! How long the way seems to the traveler who counts the milestones, while another who occupies himself with reading or conversation, or with doing some helpful kindness for which even a brief journey affords opportunity, finds the time passing with surprising rapidity, and even wonders that he reaches his destination so soon! A schoolgirl once told us that the longest term she had ever known was that in which each morning she counted off on her calendar the days which must elapse before she could go home. By the next term she had grown wise enough to devote herself to her work, without any special thought of how the time was passing, and as a result the vacation was upon her almost before she could realize the fact.

The beautiful advice some one has given, "Make yourselves nests of pleasant thoughts," seems to apply in this connection with special force. There will always be plenty that is disagreeable and annoying to which we can give our attention, if we choose, but by so doing we multiply our discomforts and our anxieties, without any compensat-

Put-Off Town.

Did you ever go to Put-Off Town,
Where the houses are old and tumbledown,
And everything tarries and everything
drags,
With dirty streets and people in rags?
On the street of Slow lives Old Man
Wait,
And his two little boys, named Linger and Late,
With unclean hands and tousled hair,
And a naughty little sister named Don't Care.

Grandmother Growl lives in this town,
With her two little daughters, called Fret and Frown;
And Old Man Lazy lives all alone
Around the corner on Street Postpone.

Did you ever go to Put-Off Town
To play with the little girls, Fret and Frown,
Or go to the home of Old Man Wait,
And whistle for his boys to come to the gate?

To play all day in Tarry Street,
Leaving your errands for other feet;
To stop, or shrink, or linger, or frown,
Is the nearest way to this old town.
—Christian Observer.

Start at the Bottom.

Two boys left home with just money enough to take them through college, after which they must depend entirely upon their own efforts. They attacked the collegiate problem successfully, passed the graduation, received their diplomas from the faculty, also commendatory letters to a large ship-building firm with which they desired employment. Ushered into the waiting room of the head of the firm, the first was given an audience. He presented his letters.

"What can you do?" asked the man of millions.

"I would like some sort of a clerkship."

"Well, sir, I'll take your name and address, and should we have anything of the kind open will correspond with you."

As he passed out he remarked to his waiting companion. "You can go in and leave your address."

"What can you do?" was asked.

"I can do anything that a green hand can do, sir," was the reply.

The magnate touched a bell which called a superintendent.

"Have you anything to put a man to work at?"

"We want a man to sort scrap iron," replied the superintendent.

And the college graduate went to sorting scrap iron.

One week passed, and the president, meeting the superintendent, asked:

"How is the young man getting on?"

"Oh, said the boss, "he did his work so well, and never looked at the clock, that I put him over the gang."

In one year this man had reached the head of a department and an advisory position with the management at a salary represented by four figures, while his whilom companion was maintaining his dignity as "clerk" in a livery stable, washing harness and carriages.—Selected.

I saw a sweet young mother stand
Where snow had drifted o'er the land.
A babe was lying on her breast,
Its fragile form
Against herself she pressed
To keep it warm.

In later years I passed once more
And saw her at the cottage door;
A boy was lying on her knee,
Her look was grim,
And, suffering Joshua! how she Was warming him!

Christian Melodies

BY PROF. WM. J. KIRKPATRICK

Professor Wm. J. Kirkpatrick, the author of CHRISTIAN MELODIES, is one of the leading and best known gospel song writers in the world today. His songs have been sung the world over in almost every town. Some of his songs have been translated and sung in all languages. He has the advantage of many years of experience as a musician and song writer, and has put the best productions of his life time, as well as the best songs of the principal song writers of the country, into CHRISTIAN MELODIES. This certainly insures for this book the greatest variety and the best quality of songs.

A Book of the Rarest Musical Gems

This is the universal pronouncement of all musicians who have used or examined this new and popular song book. All responses from those using the book are enthusiastic praises. "Best book of the kind I have ever seen." "The more we use it the better we like it." "Gets better all the time;" etc. These are samples of expressions received. No other book on the market approaches it as an all-purpose church song book. It is mechanically perfect, neat, artistic and durable. It contains 192 pages and 227 songs.

FAC-SIMILE OF COVER, REDUCED.

PROF. WM. J. KIRKPATRICK.

THE CHOICEST SONGS OF THE CENTURY

Every song writer has a few favorite songs—or those which he regards as his best—and which make for the author his reputation. Every musician has also his own peculiar style. A book written principally by one man does not excel, as it has no variety of style and but a few very good songs. In CHRISTIAN MELODIES, eighty leading song writers have contributed their favorite or best songs. This insures not only a collection of the most excellent songs, but also the greatest variety of style. This is why people never grow tired of the songs in CHRISTIAN MELODIES. Besides its large number of the latest songs it contains a great many of the old songs that have become popular favorites and never die.

No expense was spared in the production of this book. The best songs were secured regardless of their cost. Many very good songs were rejected because not good enough. No other book shows such care and judgment in excluding the inferior and including only the best. No cheap devices or make shifts, such as rivets were used in binding. It is a hand sewed book, which is the best and most expensive style of binding. If you want the most popular, best wearing and most satisfactory all-around song book get Christian Melodies, pronounced by all who have used it, "A Book of Gems." It is the best and cheapest.

on the same page, but in such a manner as not to increase the bulk of the book. The King James version is the basis, and this version is read straight along from the text, while the Revised Version is read from the text in combination with foot notes. These notes give all the words and passages of the Revised Version where it differs from the King James Version. This combination feature is exceedingly valuable, as it gives all the advantages of two separate books with the convenience of one and also saves time as the two readings are always right before the eye. It contains all the to the study of the Bible prepared by the most Eminent Biblical Scholars. It is embellished with a complete series of fifteen New Maps—the newest and best engraved maps of Bible Lands, embodying the results of the most recent investigations and discoveries. It is printed from large, beautiful, clear, new type and all proper names are divided into syllables and every vowel is marked and the syllables inflected, showing the sounds and accents as they are given in every standard dictionary, thus enabling the reader to properly pronounce every word. This feature is a great improvement and a strong recommendation for this Bible over others. This is the only Self-Pronouncing Combination Teachers' Bible and is unquestionably the best edition of the world's best book.

Our Fine Art Combination Bible.

This Bible is the same as the one described above, having the Self-Pronouncing and Combination features and all other helps and in addition is profusely illustrated and embellished with numerous phototype engravings from the paintings of the world's greatest masters, all drawn and engraved by the best artists, to illustrate the teachings of our Lord. They are printed separate from the text and make one grand panorama of pictorial embellishments that are as instructive and pleasing as they are ornamental and accurate.

The growing demand for a wisely and faithfully illustrated student's Bible has been fully satisfied by the introduction of our fine art edition of the Teachers' Bible. It combines every valuable feature of the usual teachers' Bible, with a wealth of descriptive and pictorial illustrations so superb as to distinctly separate this Bible from all others and place it in a class by itself. In artistic beauty it stands without a rival.

Each illustration is a speaking sermon, a gem of art, the handiwork of a master. The wonderful pictures not only beautify this sumptuous volume, but actually interpret and make more clear the grand old truths of the Sacred Word. This beautiful edition of the Bible is indispensable to all students and teachers.

EDITORIAL

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES:

The Christian Century is published in the interests of essential Christianity. It is the organ of no party; the advocate of no ism. While welcoming the ascertained results of modern Christian scholarship, it stands for the great evangelical verities which are the foundation stones of the Christian system. It seeks to be tolerant in spirit, practical in aim, and warmly sympathetic towards all the present day problems of religious thought and life. It also aims at being at once a clearing house and medium of communication between the different denominations, so that they may by free and fraternal expression of opinion become better acquainted with one another and may be led to join forces in more aggressive work for the advancement of the Redeemer's Kingdom.

THE AUTHORITY OF JESUS.

THE first impression made by the words of Jesus must have been one of surprise and incredulity that such authority as he claimed could be exercised by one who came with none of the credentials supplied by position or education. But as the audience listened, that surprise must have passed into admiration, that incredulity into conviction and yearning to know more of one who spoke with such convincing possession of an authority that rested not upon external guarantees, but in himself alone and in the ministry which he was undertaking.

The authority of Jesus is one of the most important factors of his ministry, and one over which there has been no end of debate. Wherein lay the imperative which men recognized in all of his utterances? What authority did he have, and who gave it to him? Jesus refused to discuss this question, and when pressed for an answer, turned upon his questioners with a demand so disconcerting that they abandoned the inquiry. In the near circle of the disciples, he spoke with more freedom upon this theme, but left it still unexplained, though fully realized in the experiences of his followers. They knew he was possessed of a power which sought them and compelled their obedience, with a strange and blessed compulsion, an urgent solicitation which they felt in better moods, powerless to resist. Yet it was not the outreaching of a mere arbitrary and assumed prerogative, but the recognition on their part of an imperial life and a supreme and righteous demand.

The authority of Jesus has been proclaimed in a variety of distorted and repellant forms. He has been represented as a king, whose word is law by the very fact of his kingship; to disobey whom is the highest crime, certain to be visited with condign punishment. This was a conception which entered into the Church in days when it writhed under persecution and felt its impotence to combat the vast aggregation of force represented by the Roman empire and the hostile powers of the world. In such a moment the Church cried out for a king who should vindicate his sovereignty by acts of supreme redemptive power in the physical realm. The cry of the martyrs in all ages has been for the disclosure of kingly might in the kingdom of God, and the adjustment of human affairs to divine standards. The apocalyptic literature of both Testaments is full of this idea, and it is not strange that in periods of persecution the Church has eagerly grasped at the thought of the kingship of Jesus in its most arbitrary and autocratic form, delighting to believe that, as the psalmists had said, the messianic king should rule with a rod of iron and dash his enemies in pieces like a potter's vessel. From this has proceeded that type of preaching which magnifies the kingship of Jesus, and demands unquestioning obedience to him because of his supreme rule in heaven and on earth. From this grew all of the grotesque and terrifying proclamations with which the fiercer Puritan utterances were filled, in which Jesus was represented as a king taking summary vengeance upon his enemies, and the New Testament figures of speech which lent color to these views were pressed to their utmost limit.

Still another type of authority is claimed for our Lord by those who magnify the priestly idea, and emphasize the forms of teaching found in the Epistle to the Hebrews. According to this view, Christianity is a system of priestly intercession in which Jesus takes the part of a great mediator between God and man, and his authority is that of a pontifex maximus, dispensing ex cathedra sentences and appealing to human life through the splendid features of his majestic office. To still others, Jesus has the authority of a prophet, the successor of the men of hairy mantles and words of fire, but greater than them all, rebuking with sternness the sins and follies of humanity and announcing the swift doom that shall follow all unrighteousness.

Another view of authority makes it resident in the Bible as an infallible book, inspired immediately of God, and, therefore, containing no error, but embracing all needed truth, and vindicating its right to an absolute dominance over human life. In this book the authority of Jesus is contained. It holds his credentials, it guarantees his utterances. His authority is bound up with it, and in a certain measure, it takes his place as an interpreter and guide.

Once more, there is another view which makes authority resident in the Church, in its officials, its organization, its ceremonial and its utterances. The Church is understood to be the living embodiment of the Spirit of Christ, and as such, it has the right to revise former judgments, to change the ordinances and activities of the Church, and even to supersede the Bible with what is regarded as fresher and more authoritative truth.

All these views of the authority of Christ and these varying definitions of the media of that authority must be viewed in the light of his own teachings and person, and when this effort is made it is seen that none of them stand the test of experience. The authority of Jesus does not lie in kingship, arbitrary, autocratic and irresponsible. His own statement concerning his kingship lies wholly within the realm of his sovereign administration of truth. "To this end was I born, and for this purpose came I into the world, that I might bear witness to the truth." Herein lay his answer to Pilate's question, "Art thou then a king?" Jesus is a king absolute and final, but a king whose kingdom is not of this world and whose authority is not of the arbitrary sort which has been the bane of all human governments. He rules through the truth; that is, through the appeal which his own life and words make to the human spirit. The only authority which he ever claims is that of one who brings to light the absolute verities of the universe and reveals the pathway of man's perfect adjustment to God. All declarations of Jesus' kingship which do not rest fundamentally upon this conception are disfiguring, grotesque and misleading, repellent to human consciences rather than appealing. It may be possible to bring men into the Church by terror-striking portrayals of the power of our Lord and the awfulness of the punishments he will inflict; but those supposed to be converted by such appeals must be kept in a perpetual state of alarm if their conversion is permanent.

Nor is Jesus' authority that of the priest in the sacerdotal sense. The world's great High Priest he is indeed, carrying the sins of men up along the world's great altar stairs to God, and by the offering of himself once for all making a way of approach to the Holiest. But his authority as a priest lies in the perfection of those ministries of grace which he has brought to humanity, and not in ecclesiastical office whose functions he performs. Nor is he indeed a prophet of the Old Testament type, who by warnings and denunciations brought men to the sense of their duty. Far higher is his authority than this.

Again it may be said that the authority of Christ is paramount to that of either Bible or Church. The Bible is the product of the Spirit of Jesus working in the hearts of men. The Church is the embodiment of the forces of the kingdom resident in human life.

As such, Bible and Church are subordinate to the great author and creator of both. The Bible has supreme authority in the realm of spiritual teaching because it is our only authentic means of access to the historic Christ. But its authority is that of a means and not of an end. It is itself an inspired servant to be used for the high purposes of spiritual life. It is not a master for there can be but one Master in the kingdom of God. So of the Church, it is a means by which Christ is accomplishing his work in the world, and all its ministries, when permeated by his Spirit, are helpful to this end. But it is not an authority save as it reflects his thought, and its very imperfections are themselves the proof that it needs constant correction under the guidance of his teaching.

The authority of Jesus consists in none of these things. And yet it is an authority perfectly recognized by those who heard him then and those who follow him today. It is the authority of the perfect life, revealing the character of God in terms of human experience. It is the authority of teachings so admirable and convincing that men bow before them as the answer to their deepest needs. The authority of Jesus is not arbitrary, and yet it is the most imperial the world has ever known. Like the authority of the physician in whom confidence is felt and whose commands are implicitly obeyed because it is believed that he knows best; like the authority of the sea-captain in the time of storm, whose commands are implicitly followed because one has confidence that in this course alone is there safety, such is the authority of Jesus, and such the reason why no soul escapes or resents this wide-reaching imperative. Jesus spoke little of his authority, simply because he displayed it, and needed not to claim it. Like a master in the laboratory, who uses with a sense of supremacy the apparatus which is only mysterious and terrifying to the novice; like a painter who has produced a masterpiece, and to whom men come with passionate eagerness to acquire something of his power, Jesus needed not to prate of authority, simply because men felt it wherever he went. It was the authority of a supreme personality, the authority of divine teachings, the authority of a complete ideal. In proportion as the Church loses the sense of its power it talks of its authority. In proportion as the true purpose of the Bible is missed do men make of it a text book and a law. In proportion as the divine character of Jesus' life is obscured, with its touching and convincing appeal to the human spirit, do men liken him to a king, a priest or a prophet of the past. King, priest and prophet he is, but much more than this; the Son of God, the incarnation of the highest in human life, the one supreme and final appeal of God to humanity. Men may argue against his authority as they might argue against light, but when the sun rises the arguments fade; and when Jesus appears, doubt, scepticism and reluctance fade away, and a great passion of enthusiasm and loyalty awaits him, because his is the authority of the life which finds men and leads them into the perfect life.

THE VISITOR.

ATTENTION has recently been called in an unusual degree to the question of hymnology by a discussion which is going the rounds of the papers regarding a statement supposed to have been made by a professor at the University of Chicago. The discussion of this question cannot fail to do good. Of course everybody took it for granted at the start that the professor had said exactly what he was reported to have said. This is a liberty which every one possesses. It may be taken for granted by the uninitiated that any report which professes to give a statement made by a professor in his class room is to be received with a grain of salt. Teachers are not infallible. They sometimes make mistakes. Yet it is highly improbable that universities possess a corner on fools, or that the inane and senseless utterances which are credited to instructors in the daily press have any foundation in fact.

But in this instance it is interesting to give the report the full benefit of the doubt. The Visitor has not yet learned that the statement alleged to have been made by the professor in question was ever made at all, but he believes that it might reasonably have been made long ago, and he is prepared to say that only such a broadside statement as this could possibly accomplish any desired result. If the professor had said in a commonplace and ordinary fashion, that many of the hymns used by the Church were mere platitudes and inanities, containing only the shallowest sentiment expressed in the poorest verses, everybody would have said "quite true," and each would have gone his way and straightway forgotten what manner of statement it was. But he evidently felt the need of expressing an ordinary truth in an uncommon way so as to compel attention. Our Savior understood this method when he used the most abrupt and startling words in which to express his teachings. Therefore, the statement that all hymns are rubbish gets itself instantly considered, and the result cannot fail to be good. It is a good thing for the most satisfied and conservative lover of the hymnbook just as it stands to be jostled a bit by a rude thrust of this kind. He is likely to be somewhat more careful hereafter in the selection of hymns, or to be more sensitive to their religious teachings and their literary form. By this means, as time goes on, the trashy, foolish, sentimental and platitudinous kind of poetry such as has been lugged into the hymn books under cover of spiritual value will be banished to the limbo where it belongs.

One of the satisfactions of the Visitor at the recent convention of Christian Endeavor at Cincinnati was the notable improvement in the singing as compared with former conventions. Some people complained that there was not as much of it on the street cars and on the streets as there had been in former years. This was true, but there were good reasons for it. One of these was that the movement is growing more mature and less exuberant in its manifestation of enthusiasm. The other is that it is acquainting itself with a stronger and more permanent type of music, which lends itself less easily to the choppy and dashing sort of employment suggested by the average street car or public thoroughfare. There is great question as to whether these are the proper places for the use of hymns. But leaving that question open, it is certainly true that the hymns in the sessions of the convention were an immense improvement upon those of former years. This, the Visitor believes, was due in large measure to the new collection of hymns recently issued by a special committee of the United Society, in the preparation of which the lighter and less valuable music was left out. One may hate to part with such selections as "Hold the Fort," "Only an Armor-bearer" and "Let a Little Sunshine In," but it must be seriously affirmed that the interests of sensible and artistic Christian worship dictate their rigorous excision. The Visitor well remembers the facetious remark of a trustee of the United Society on the way to the San Francisco convention, who said, that if there was one particular abomination in his list, it was that song about "a little sunshine." It made no difference where he was or what he was doing, what the time of day, or the state of the weather, he was sure to be greeted with the strains of that hymn, "Let a Little Sunshine In." At night when he was trying to rest, he was tortured by those jaunty lines, and in the morning after a troubled sleep, he awakened in the darkness, to find a group of Endeavorers standing outside the window of his sleeping car, singing "Let a Little Sunshine In." It is not strange that a certain sentimentalism and weakness has come to be identified with the young people's work in the minds of those who, from a more sober and considerate point of view, get their impressions of such organizations from the music they dispense in public. But at Cincinnati this was changed. The new book used had been carefully prepared, with the clear purpose of preserving the great hymns of the Church, whether old or new, and of using no others. There was little in it to which exception could be taken. One might regret the absence of some old favorites, because no collection can be great enough to include all good things, but there was certainly an absence of the frivolous, the trivial, the gushy and the doggerel sort, and not one of them went to the extravagance of some of the old theological notes struck in such hymns as "Oh, for a Thousand Tongues," or "This World's a Wilderness of Woe." On the other hand, the stateliness, the depth and power, the sobriety and the artistic beauty of the hymns used were apparent. Such songs as "The Church's One Foundation," "The Son of God Goes Forth to War," "Hark, Hark, My Soul," "Purer Yet and Purer," "Still Will We Trust," "Savior, I Follow On," Phillips Brooks' "Oh, Little Town of Bethlehem," Newman's "Lead, Kindly Light," Kipling's "Recessional" and Tennyson's "Crossing the Bar" were freely used and splendidly appreciated. A book like that will make an epoch in the life of a group of young people, and will distinctly elevate their tastes both for religious sentiment and good poetry.

The Visitor believes that a very large per cent of the hymns in any of the hymn books now in use would be found far above the line of doggerel. Especially is he inclined to this opinion, when he looks over the list of authors and finds that our most commonplace collections include such names as Addison, Milton, Southey, Wordsworth, Tennyson, Mrs. Browning, Lowell, Goethe, to say nothing of the great poets of the Middle Ages who have left the imperishable glories of their hymns on the pages of our modern anthologies. But the Church needs to clear her garments of the charge of harboring foolish, inane and inartistic hymn work, and this she can only do by giving precedence to those collections which aim at dignity and power, qualities which are just as fully appreciated by young people and children as by maturer minds. The ideal hymn book has not yet been issued, but we are on the way to such a desideratum in several high-class works of recent years.

THE LITERATURE OF THE ATONEMENT.

ANY centuries passed before the Church awoke to think earnestly and systematically about the awful and most glorious work of Christ upon the cross. But since the great Anselm tried to sound the depths of this mystery much has been done, and the consciousness of the Church has travelled far. All the great theologians have wrestled with the problem, some clumsily and without getting to close grips, and others with splendid courage and spiritual skill. There have been pauses, of course. The mind of the Church, like the mind of the individual, must grow by resting and rest by changing the direction of its intellectual interests. But in spite of pauses the progress has been very remarkable. We stand today in a position—we dare not say for experiencing the power, but for understanding the spirit and method of the Atonement—where no earlier generation has stood, since the apostles of Christ. Nearly thirty years ago, in the early seventies, Bushnell on this side and Dale in England produced their famous books on the Atonement. They have powerfully moulded the history of the subject. But while they created ardent discussion they were not met by any writings as profound and strong as these were. Then came a pause. Discussion seemed for a time to set more strongly in other directions. But for some time signs have not been wanting that "the Atonement" is coming up again for fresh treatment. May God give his Church new life and sweeping victories, if it is being led back to the Cross. Most of these signs come to us from across the water, from Germany and from England. Scotland and America are not yet openly and directly at work upon the matter. Professor Denney of Glasgow has indeed said some trenchant things, but he has not given proof of having thought the matter through yet. And Mr. Walker in his very original study of the Person of Christ (The Spirit and the Incarnation) has only shown that there is a problem to which his study brings him.

But the most important writers in English are from England herself, and from three different branches of the Church of Christ. Dr. Fairbairn has not yet written at length on the subject, but in his book on The Place of Christ in Modern Theology, he discusses it briefly and has dealt with the materials for it in various scattered articles and chapters. Dr. Simon, in his two books, The Redemption of Man and Reconciliation Through Incarnation, has made a remarkably complete contribution. In the former work he deals with the Biblical material in an exceedingly fresh and instructive manner; and in the latter reaches the Cross through a prolonged and earnest grappling with metaphysical problems which undoubtedly lie behind. One learns from Dr. Simon's method at least this, that our interpretation of an event so remarkable, a power so fundamental, as the death of the Son of God, must depend very largely upon the philosophical presuppositions which we bring to bear upon it. These two are Congregationalists. Then we have Mr. Scott Lidgett of the Wesleyan church, whose book was written amid the cares and distractions of the large social settlement at Bermondsey, London, of which he is the warden. It is entitled The Spiritual Principle of the Atonement, as a satisfaction made to God for the sins of the world. And, lastly, we may name Canon R. C. Moberly's book, which he has called Atonement and Personality. This, Professor Sanday of Oxford recently reviewed at length; and he ventured to speak of it as comparable for significance and power with Butler's Analogy. The very titles of the last two books must be noted. They indicate at once the judgment which their authors have passed upon previous theories of the Atonement and the direction in which they are looking for new light. Let it be said positively that there seems to us to be two conditions observed by the authors of these very important works, without which no real advance can be made at this time in the study of the Atonement. They both assume that the New Testament teaches that the ground of our forgiveness lies in the sacrificial death of Christ. Since the rise of the science of Biblical theology, it should be impossible for any believer in the authority of Scripture to adopt any other starting point. Thirty years ago, as Mr. Lidgett points out, Dale demonstrated clearly that the apostles found the forgiveness of their sins, not only announced, but made possible by that Cross. The task of the theologian, and every educated Christian must be something of a theologian, is to discover why and how Christ was able to die for all so that all died. That brings us to our next point. Both Mr. Lidgett and Canon Moberly see that the forensic or legal view does not cover all the facts. To say that Christ endured the penalty of sin and therefore we escape it, because the legal requirements are satisfied, to say this is either to misrepresent the whole event or it is to fail by not saying enough. Accordingly each of our authors has set himself to seek for some underlying principle, which shall at once explain the relation of Christ's death to our forgiveness and show why the apostolic explanations and illustrations rise naturally out of it. Mr. Lidgett announces therefore that he is in search of "the spiritual principle" of the Atonement, and Dr. Moberly, in his title, boldly announces that this must be found through a scrutiny of the modern doctrine of personality.

This is all most hopeful, is it not? Hopeful that is, for the deepening of our faith and the enkindling of our zeal. For the Church is ever at its humblest and its mightiest when it is gazing into the supreme mystery of love. That gaze into the sorrow of the Son of God, sorrow laid on him by our sins, sorrow endured by him for our deliverance, always will make the Church both wiser and purer, and send its soldiers to their work with a passion which only his passion can create.

REV. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN.

T the Wheaton Christian Conference, held July 22d-28th, the center of attraction was Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, who has just resigned an important pulpit in London, England, to take up evangelistic work in the United States. Mr. Morgan utterly discards the statement that has gained currency that he has come to succeed Mr. Moody. He has come to do a work which Mr. Moody outlined for him several years ago. Mr. Moody left no successor. The work of Mr. Morgan is perfectly distinct.

Mr. Morgan is a striking personality. He is tall, slim, willowy. His intense physical energy is focalized in his mobile, smooth-shaven face. He has Welsh blood, and he shows it, but his face has a Jewish cast, his profile strongly resembles that of Disraeli. He is not a broad man physically or intellectually. His faculties, like his face, are sharpened to a point. His words cut like a rapier; they are always searching, sometimes severe. Yet he is not lacking in tender and generous sentiments.

Exaggeration is not the smallest element in Mr. Morgan's power. He paints his pictures large and in strong colors. Take, for instance, his statement that there is no place where the devil is more firmly installed than in church choirs. This is hardly true. There are many places where the devil has a much firmer footing. Or take the statement, "Do not take care of yourself; let God take care of you. When some one comes and says, 'Take care of your health,' answer 'Get thee behind me, Satan.'" We have always supposed that it was the duty of every man to husband his energies, and expend them frugally so as to get the most out of his life.

But these things are only as the fine dust on the balance; they amount to very little in comparison with the great truths which form the staple of Mr. Morgan's preaching. In the five addresses which he gave at the Wheaton Conference he dwelt on the foundation truths of the Christian life. He began with the new birth, going on from that to consider the soul's health and growth in service. He gave special emphasis to the thought that Christianity is a life, and that apart from life there can be no growth in holiness, no acceptable service. Christ did not come merely or mainly to give us a new ideal, or a new ethical code; he came to give life, to give new capacity or power by which sinful men would be enabled to follow in his steps.

Mr. Morgan's insight into the deeper meaning of Scripture is very marked. He throws sudden flashes of light into dark places. But his interpretations, while always interesting, are often fanciful. The least satisfactory part of his expository work was when he came to deal with the subject of the Second Advent. Here he floundered fearfully. He expressed his personal hope of the Lord's visible return, yet he said that he did not spend his time gazing up into heaven. He admitted that Paul expected Christ to return in his day; but denied that Paul changed his mind on the subject. What Paul regarded as imminent in his day he looked upon as still in the future. Yet we dared not fix the day of the Master's coming, for that would be to put him away from us. What a muddle! The best thing said in this connection was that Christ himself fills the whole horizon of our vision. He is here, and he is here because he has come. Paul was not mistaken about his speedy advent.

But about the convention. It was a success. Through all its services flowed a warm gulf stream of evangelical thought. The hunger of the people for the gospel was evident. Christians were quickened; and many a discouraged worker went back to his hard field reinforced in faith and courage. The hospitality of the friends of Wheaton College was warm and gracious, and a strong desire was expressed that the Conference be made a permanent institution.

Has not the time come when the West may have a Northfield founded upon the broadest evangelical lines? The world is waiting for the new evangelism of which Professor Drummond wrote—an evangelism which in the substance of its message is as old as the Cross of Calvary, but which in the form of its message is fitted to the thought and conditions of the present hour.

CHICAGO NOTES.

Dr. Gunsaulus is reported to have said that "the only pulpit that men respect permanently pours forth the music of redemption." This is emphatically true. From the bruised and burdened heart of man comes the cry, "Tell me the old, old story of Jesus and his love."

There is an old legend of a boy in the East who, when about to start out on a journey to the West, concluded his prayer by saying, "Now, good-bye, God, I am going to Chicago." Chicago is bad enough—in spots, at least, but God is in the midst of it, and heaven is just as near to it as to any other place.

It would astonish many people to know the inroads which church parochial schools are making upon our public schools. In the discussion upon this point at the meeting of the National Educational Association at Detroit it was pointed out that, at a large increase of expense to themselves, many parents are withdrawing their children from the "godless" public schools and sending them to the "religious" schools. To check this tendency the instinctive desire of parents for the inclusion of moral instruction in the school curriculum will have to be met.

In the Century for August, President Harper of the University of Chicago has an article on "Alleged Luxury Among College Students," in which he declares that he has seldom seen extravagance in its worst phases among college-bred people, their educated tastes forbidding such a thing. He admits that there is an increasing expenditure of money by college students, but thinks that this is less in proportion than the general increase in the rate of expenditure among the wealthy. He maintains that the college is democratic in spirit, is a social leveler, and puts a check upon luxurious living.

According to Mrs. Marie Owens, the child labor law on the statute books of the State of Illinois is not a dead letter. During the twelve years in which she has been acting under the Board of Education as detective sergeant, there has been a marked improvement regarding the enforcement of the law which forbids the employment of children under fourteen years of age in factories. The sights which were to be witnessed ten years ago in the slums of the city when frail children, some of them not more than seven years of age, worked for the pittance of seventy-five cents to a dollar a week, are no longer to be seen. The cry of the children has not been altogether unheeded.

The annual report of the Chicago Public Library shows that 1,164,320 books were distributed from the branch stations, and 608,421 from the main building. The number of volumes in the library has risen to 272,276, making a net increase of 13,778 for the year. English prose fiction is credited with forty-five per cent of the circulation, juvenile literature with twenty-eight per cent, history and biography with six per cent, geography and travels with five per cent. This ratio of difference between fiction and solid reading is, we presume, about the same as that which obtains elsewhere. It shows an undue proportion of condiments to substantial food.

MUTE WITNESSES.

The soft lamp gilds my desk to-night;
My books stand all-arow.
I turn them o'er, and to my sight
They seem to sorrow so!

The ancient rhymes of love and death,
That were such comforters,
Seem to know some living breath
That all about them stirs.

Story and fable, quaint and good,
They speak so bitterly!
Not as the hand that penned them would
That they should speak to me.

A little comment scribbled fine,
A finger-print, a bit
Of folded paper at some line,
Tells how we talked of it.

Alike the poet and the sage,
Gold-edge and russet-brown—
A penciled word upon a page,
A corner folded down!

The glamor of the verse is flown;
The cut leaves seem to bleed.
In the dim light I read alone
The books she loved to read.

FICTION AND PHILAN- THROPY.

Mrs. A. M. Harrison.

THE passing of the Reform Bill in England in 1832, instead of being an end of reform, was but the beginning of a new era of reform. The people were like the lion which has tasted man's blood; they had had a taste of righting political wrongs, and it but whetted their appetite for righting the innumerable social wrongs they saw on every side. There were indeed in those early days of the century things permitted by law which seem incredible to us now. A leading writer says, "There were other slaves in those days than the negroes—slaves at home, condemned to a servitude as rigorous as that of the negro, and who, as far as personal treatment went, suffered more severely than the negroes on the better class of plantations. These were the workers in the great mines and factories. No law at this time regulated the hours of labor; a commission was appointed, and soon brought an immense amount of evidence to show the terrible effects, moral and physical, of over-working women and children."

A law was passed in 1833 forbidding them to work more than twelve hours a day and forbidding night work to children. Those were the days when Clarkson and Wilberforce were rousing the nation to white heat over the condition of the slave in the West Indies, and yet at that very time women were harnessed like horses to coal cars, and dragging them deep down in the mines of Merry England, and little children suffered abuses that were crimes against civilization. It was such a state of things as this that made a woman's generous heart burn within her, and made her brave pen write the Cry of the Children:

Do you hear the children weeping, O my brothers?
Ere the sorrow comes with years,
They are leaning their young heads against their mothers,
And that cannot stop their tears;
They look up with their pale and sunken faces,
And their look is dread to see,
For you think you see their angels in their places
With eyes meant for Deity.
But the child's sob curseth deeper in the silence
Than the strong man in his wrath.

And another poet as generous championed the cause of the poor women who were the slaves of the needle, in his Song of the Shirt.

But poetry was not the medium in which to attack abuses; the sceptre was passing from verse as the popular literature—in the Georgian era verse was in the ascendancy, in the Victorian the supremacy passed to prose. The novel was to be to this generation what the drama had been to the age of Elizabeth, and the periodical essay to the clubs and breakfast tables of Queen Anne. The function of the English novel previous to this had been purely to amuse; but with the awakening of the nation to the outrages against humanity that were protected by law in their midst, and with the awakening sense of their power to correct such vicious legislation, came the novel with a purpose.

Now I know that many consider the novel with a purpose as inartistic and inadmissible, and I hardly marvel at the conclusion when we consider the absurd lengths to which it is sometimes carried. For my part, I believe fiction, which is the most powerful literary weapon of our day, to be a legitimate means of exposing the needs and wrongs of humanity. Everything depends on the subject and the treatment. One of the masterpieces of the world's literature is Cervantes' great work; yet it was a romance with an avowed purpose—to expose the absurdities of knight errantry, and it laughed it out of existence. Yet no one will presume to say that Don Quixote is inartistic.

I think I may say that Charles Dickens was the pioneer in the English purpose novel. He began to write in the early thirties, and partook of the spirit of the framers of the Reform Bill. He came from the common people, and had felt himself the hardships of poverty, of prison and of child labor. The wrongs and needs of the common people appealed with special force to his sympathetic heart, and he has clothed them with immortality. Even in joyous Pickwick Papers, there is a blow at imprisonment for debt. His next book, Nicholas Nickleby, may be called the first of the long list of novels dealing with social questions which has been so marked a feature in modern literature. It was aimed at the cruelties inflicted on boys—boys generally whose parents were ashamed to own them—in the cheap boarding schools in Yorkshire. Before writing it, he went down to Yorkshire like a government commission and secured facts on which the sorrowful state of the pupils of Dotheboys' Hall were based. The publication of the book raised a storm of indignation throughout the island; a parliamentary investigation followed; the main facts as set forth by Dickens were clearly established, and such remedial measures were taken as to insure for the future the suppression of such institutions as Dotheboys' Hall, and the punishment of such small monsters as Squeers. Since then he has set his lance in rest against many a social evil; he may be sometimes wrong, but can hardly be accused of want of honesty of purpose. He is one-sided, in that he is always for the poor and oppressed—but it is a generous partisanship. In Oliver Twist he exposed the evils of the poorhouse system, and the training of boys to crime. Investigation verified many of the pictures of low criminal life, and much good resulted from the true state of the case being known.

It is in one of his later novels, however, that he makes his most determined and elaborate attack on existing evils—I mean in Hard Times. Though it is not so popular as his other works with the general reader, yet no less a critic than Ruskin calls it the greatest he has written, and says it should be studied with close and earnest care by all students of social questions, and that Dickens' view was the right one, plainly and sharply told. It is a picture of the manufacturing town of smoke and mud, of the cruel factory system which rates laborers as figures in a sum, or power in a machine—without loves and likes, without memories and inclinations, without souls to weary and souls to hope. He also deals here in a masterly way with the broad question of the true function of education, and proves the folly of the utilitarianism which would degrade it to a mere economic question, and elevate a so-called practical education above the spiritual evolution of the race.

Dickens was the first great English student of Froebel, the first Englishman of note to advocate the kindergarten. He gives more attention to child training than any other novelist, or any other educator, except Froebel. He made school masters prominent characters in six of his books, and deals with nineteen different schools. He shows us the abuses of education in the brutality of Squeers and Creakle, in the cramming system at Dr. Blimbers', in the teaching of naught but hard facts by Mr. McChoakumchild—but these are offset by the dear old schoolmaster in Old Curiosity Shop, and by Dr. Strong in David Copperfield. Childhood has never had a more loving champion than Charles Dickens. Mr. James S. Hughes, inspector of schools of Toronto, Canada, has just published a book on Dickens as an Educator, in which he says that he took the most advanced position on every phase of modern educational thought, except manual training, and when he is thoroughly understood will be recognized as the Froebel of England.

Charles Reade worked so much with Dickens that it is not astonishing he should have written novels for the purpose of exposing wrongs, even if his own bent of mind had not led him that way; in point of fact, though, he naturally leaned very much toward reform and philanthropy. He was a great student of current social problems; he devoured newspapers, and many of his books were based on facts he gleaned from them; he compiled great scrap books from newspaper clippings and made great use of them in his writings. In Never Too Late to Mend he began a series of novels, each written to illustrate some social or public wrong. This one drew attention to the dreadful "silent system," as well as to other brutalities of English prison life, and was instrumental in effecting their amelioration; it also plead for the possibility of reform in a criminal. Hard Cash called attention to the abuses of lunatic asylums, and so forcibly did he put the facts he had gathered that it awakened official investigation, and lead to a change of English lunacy laws. Put Yourself in His Place is an exposure of the system of terrorism practiced by labor unions on non-union men in manufacturing towns. He deals with the fallen women in the New Magdalen, gives a helping hand to advocates of woman's rights in the Woman Hater, and treats of vivisection and various other things in various other books. His writings have been the means of much good, though sometimes they carry the spirit of reform to excess.

Chartism was an aftermath of the Reform Bill, and was a radical movement for uplifting the laboring classes. One of its most earnest advocates was Charles Kingsley. He worked with Maurice among the poor, and their ideas and labors crystalized into what we know as Christian Socialism. He threw himself heart and soul into the Chartist movement, and used the pulpit, as well as the platform and the press, to proclaim its principles. He spoke from the pulpit of a brother clergyman on the text: "The Lord hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor," and preached freedom, equality and brotherhood to rich and poor alike; at the close of the sermon, the incumbent rose and denounced Kingsley's doctrines as false and mischievous. For a Church of England minister to do a thing like that, and endure a public rebuke like that, showed the heat of his convictions. Out of these convictions, of the wants of the poor and the injustices heaped on them, grew his famous novel, Alton Locke, Tailor and Poet. It was written while the Chartist movement was at its height, and just before its collapse, and was a plea that no man should be condemned from his birth to physical disease and mental despair. The hero, Alton Locke, tells his own story, and paints the dreadful, unsanitary conditions under which tailors plied their trade—conditions as deadly to the mind as to the body. It is said that co-operative associations among workmen were largely the result of Kingsley's labors and writings.

I think I may say that the novel with a purpose reached its zenith during the fifties; Kingsley and Reade wrote their fervent fiction then, and Dickens wrote Hard Times in that decade; and it was at this time that there came out the novel that stands with many for the loftiest achievement of philanthropic fiction—I mean Uncle Tom's Cabin. Its admirers claim for it, with truth, the widest circulation of any novel ever written; and claim also that it did more to awaken the world to the condition of slaves in the South, and to put into activity forces that culminated in the Civil War and the emancipation of the negro than all other books ever written, and all the eloquence of Beecher, or Garrison, or Phillips. I do not impugn the motives that impelled Mrs. Stowe to write the book, and I do not question that there may be a parallel for most of the sad things she tells—yet granting all that, I do claim that it is essentially false as presenting a picture of the slave in the South—false, because it presents what is rare and exceptional as normal and typical. If any one would take the trouble to collect every instance he could find of cruelty and neglect of children and mass them together, he could make out a respectable argument against the authority of parents over children; or if he would write up the Chicago man who made sausage of his wife, and the daily other instances of marital infelicity that we find in the daily press, he could denounce the marriage state as unjust to woman. The fact, that while all the men, even the boys, of the South were in the army, the negroes were left as protectors and breadwinners for the women and children, that not a single instance of misuse of their power is on record, but innumerable instances are known of their fidelity and devotion to their helpless charges—those facts, I claim, are a complete vindication of my statement that the picture of slavery in Uncle Tom's Cabin is unfair and unfortunate. I yield to no one in joy and gratitude that the burden and shadow of inherited slavery is lifted from our land, but I sorrow unspeakably that the emancipation of the negro had to come in the ruin and bloodshed of civil war. And so, warmly as I approve of the philanthropic novel, and firmly as I believe in the good accomplished by its means, yet I wish from my heart that this novel with a purpose had never been written.

While we have had innumerable novels dealing with social questions in the past forty years, yet few of them can be classed under the head of philanthropic fiction in the same definite way that we can those of Dickens and Reade and Kingsley. Even that greatest novel of the century, Les Misérables, can hardly be called a novel with a practical purpose. It is more a psychological study of the rise and growth of a soul—of the transformation of a convict and an outcast into a hero and a savior of his kind. George Eliot gives us a picture of radicalism in Felix Holt, Mrs. Ward presents studies in social Christianity in Robert Ellsmere and David Grieve, of paternalism and socialism in Marcella and Sir George Tressady, but they are more problem novels than novels with a philanthropic purpose; you find the cool philosophic head in them, but you miss the warm beat of the humanitarian heart. And what is true of these two great women is true also of the multitude of lesser literary lights who have written on that line.

Sir Walter Besant, who has just passed away, has left us a distinct addition to philanthropic fiction in his All Sorts and Conditions of Men; it is not remarkable from a literary point of view, but it presents a much needed reform wisely and strongly. The heroine, Angela Messenger, a very rich woman, is anxious to do good with her money; she decides that in order to help the poor she must live among them and see for herself what they need. So she goes among poor sewing girls, works with them and helps them in various ways. Finally, the conviction forces itself on her that one of the most imperative needs of these poor toilers is amusement. She finds in the East End of the great joyless city where they live, schools, chapels, hospitals, almshouses—but no gardens, no art galleries, no libraries, no amusements of any kind. In this dreary place she dreamed of planting a Palace of Delight, where she would awaken in dull and lethargic minds a new sense—that of pleasure. There the people would cultivate a noble discontent, they would learn to be critical, they would cease to look on life as merely a down-sitting and an uprising; they would learn to cultivate the sense of pleasure, which is in itself civilizing. Such was her dream, and by means of her great wealth and her clever artisan lover, the Palace of Delight was built. It was a place where tired workers could come and find music, dancing, singing, acting, painting, reading, games, companionship, light, warmth, cheer, comfort.

Surely a wise and healthful plea for a need of toiling humanity that we do not often have presented to us. Food, raiment, regular work do not supply all the craving of their complex natures. The longing for change, for amusement, is just as imperative with them as with our wealthy leisure class, and the lack of it, I doubt not, often drives them into the excitement of vicious dissipation. Angela's Palace of Delight was not only built in the novel—it has been built in reality. In East London a People's Palace has been erected, after the plan outlined in this book, and it is said to be a means of blessing to the neighborhood where it stands.

I have only presented a few of the abuses exposed by fiction, and a few of the reforms it has accomplished. In this day, when the brotherhood of man is felt to be a corollary of the Fatherhood of God, there are numberless agencies for philanthropic work; but I believe there are few which can accomplish more good than the novel with a purpose—if the writer of it have a wise head, and a warm heart, and a ready pen.

LETTERS TO THE BOOKLOVER.
THE DEVELOPMENT OF MR. JOHN FISKE.

My Dear Friend:

We all heard with much regret of the death of John Fiske. Always an interesting personality, he had in recent years won for himself the gratitude and the confidence of a large circle of readers. He had come, like Lord Beaconsfield, to stand "on the side of the angels." Like Saul among the prophets, he created amazement among many of his old philosophic supporters. But he gained new friends and admirers.

Of John Fiske's value as an historian I cannot speak with any authority. His Short History of America seems to me a model of its kind, alike in its clear and yet ample style and in the proportions which are observed in the plan of the work. I am more familiar with the other side of his productive life. I well remember the joy with which his Cosmic Philosophy was discovered at a time when a life's task seemed to loom up in the duty of mastering the synthetic philosophy of Mr. Herbert Spencer. No great and original thinker could have had a more sympathetic disciple or a more lucid and persuasive exponent than Mr. Spencer found in John Fiske. At the close of the second volume of his fascinating description of the evolutionary philosophy Fiske seemed to take an attitude towards religion which was more favorable to faith than that of his master. But I say "seemed" because Fiske himself, as he afterwards confessed, was not clear on the main features of the religious problem. In his Cosmic Philosophy he really did no more than leave the door open. He did not enter the unseen and describe it to us as firmly and confidently as he did in after years.

It was ten years after the publication of this large work which made him famous on both sides of the Atlantic, that Fiske sent out in 1884 his little book on The Destiny of Man. In the following year he followed that with another entitled The Idea of God as Affected by Modern Knowledge. These were brought to what is, alas! the last stage of development, in that most interesting volume, Through Nature to God. In these books Mr. Fiske, while maintaining in a half-hearted way, that he had not altered his opinions since the writing of his Cosmic Philosophy, yet acknowledges that he had gained much light upon the central problems with which he was concerned. The first of these great truths seems to have been that which the learned people call the "teleological." He came to see that evolution makes man the crown and therefore the rational "end" of all the long historic process which produced him. Man is "the terminal fact in that stupendous process of evolution whereby things have come to be what they are. In the deepest sense it is as true as it ever was held to be, that the world was made for Man, and that the bringing forth in him of those qualities which we call highest and holiest is the final cause of creation." He says this had been vaguely in his mind when he wrote Cosmic Philosophy, but he adds: "After long hovering in the background of consciousness, it suddenly flashed upon me two years ago," and "it came with such vividness as to seem like a revelation."

Another truth on which Fiske rests his faith is described in the close of Through Nature to God. Briefly and in my own words it is this, that man's powers of perception and knowledge have been proved to be connected with external or objective realities because they have been built up into his whole orderly experience. History, or experience, rests on the reality of the things which man believes to be there. Now put that conversely, and it comes to this: In man's history we find the constant belief that he is in contact with spiritual realities; this belief has also resulted in the growth of the noblest and highest parts of man's nature, of his moral and religious history; therefore those spiritual realities in which he has believed are real. Concerning this John Fiske says: "So far as I am aware, the foregoing argument is here advanced for the first time." As to that claim of originality I must make a slight demur. The argument has been familiar to my own mind for many years and I am quite sure I did not invent it. It is with fear and trembling before the superior people who despised Joseph Cook, that I dare to write down my own conviction that Joseph Cook promulgated that very argument over and over again in Boston itself. Far be it from me to draw the conclusion that John Fiske got it from Joseph Cook. Of that I know nothing. But if he read the Monday lectures, I would incline to think that Joseph Cook sowed the seed which John Fiske watered.

John Fiske's theism never became fully ripe. It is a great question whether it rested on a sound philosophic basis; my own feeling being this, that his theism did not grow from the same root as his Cosmic Philosophy but was grafted on to it.

And John Fiske left us in ignorance, alas! as to his real attitude, in those last years, towards Christianity. He republished in 1876 in The Unseen World several articles, including two on the Person and Life of Christ, which show that at that time he had not discovered Christ. He adopted outright the conclusions of the Tubingen school in Germany, many of which he must have discarded in his last years. He said then (1876) that he hoped to write a full volume on "Jesus of Nazareth." And he referred to this lifelong desire in one of his last works. But we have no means of knowing what his development in this matter had been. It is amusing and yet sad to read those earlier essays and note one after another of the positions which he claims to have been put beyond all doubt by "scientific criticism" in Germany, and to recall that they have been exactly reversed by radical critics even in Germany. For example, that John most certainly wrote the Apocalypse in A. D. 68 but an unknown man produced the fourth gospel in A. D. 165-180; that Mark's gospel is most certainly the latest of the other three and Matthew the earliest; that Luke's gospel has less of the Ebionitic spirit than Matthew's; that the Acts of the Apostles gives us "a garbled account" of the rise of the Church—are all positions which almost no one with a reputation to make or to save would attempt to defend today.

If there is one fact which stands out clearer than any other from John Fiske's religious speculations it is this, that philosophy may give you good grounds for being a theist, if you already believe in God, but that theism is not Christianity. The warm confidence in a Mind which directs all, is not the same thing, is not in the same world, with the consciousness that has found God immediately in Jesus Christ.

Yours faithfully,

A Bookman.

PROTESTANTISM IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Herman P. Williams.

PROTESTANTISM is not a defined system of belief. It is rather a negation of traditional church tenets, and a refusal to be bound from propagating that negation. At the second Diet of Spires, 1529, the papal party had a majority over Luther's adherents. They were therefore able to pass a decree forbidding the extension of the reformed religion in those states that had not accepted it, and granting full liberty to loyal Catholics in those states that were dominated by the new teaching. The elector of Saxony, with several other princes and fourteen cities, whether for political or evangelical reasons, or both, joined in protest against such an edict, which fortified Romanism and bound and gagged the Reformation. By this act they gave name to subsequent reformers.

The same mental and spiritual tendencies that developed sixteenth century Protestantism in Europe have been manifested in miniature among the brown people of the Philippines. For three centuries the Catholic Church has given them a great deal that is good, and has also imposed upon them a great deal that is bad. They have received, more or less imperfectly, the good; and have learned to rebel against the bad, with varying sincerity. They have been living, in point of time, three hundred years behind the world. The form of Christianity they first received was mediaeval and they have been kept in an essentially mediaeval atmosphere. But the last half century has seen the Orient opened to trade; and has brought also to these islanders gleams of modern thought and stirrings of liberty. Their reformation has come—not like Germany's, national, ponderous, obstinate—but like the islanders themselves, untutored, vehement, incoherent. The rebellion of 1896 was a distinct revolt against the Church. Though it was itself apparently ineffectual, yet from another source the immediate interests of the people have been safeguarded, and now the question is, Will the religious element in their protest develop in them a new, healthful, growing spiritual life; or will the freer civic conditions glaze over the former issue and make them content with the old system of priest-craft.

Bojol is an island in the Visayan group. Here the Jesuits held sway in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. As is sometimes the case with religious orders, their priests were not always humane or just;

and Bojol gives us an early example of Philippine Protestantism. In 1622 some of the natives in the mountains erected an oratory to a heathen deity. They declared they were tired of the rule of the priests, and proceeded to sack churches and demolish shrines. This revolt, it is true, was promptly quelled by troops; but a century and a quarter afterwards a more serious one was provoked in the same island. A priest named Morales tried to coerce the natives into attending mass; and among other punitive measures refused one time to permit a burial service, and left the corpse to decompose in the sun. The brother of the deceased headed a party, killed the priest, and, acting upon the principle, "a tooth for a tooth," left him unburied. For thirty-five years the natives maintained their independence of Spanish power. Finally, the Jesuits were expelled, and the Recollets came to Bojol. A peace was patched up on condition of full pardon to the rebels.

But these instances were hardly indicative of any national trend. The real awakening has taken place throughout the throbbing years of the last half century. Thus 1872 exhibited a serious though insufficient protest against clerical government. Intelligent natives recognized the evil of a policy that filled all their parishes with Spanish priests to the exclusion of native clergy; especially, too, when these priests were all friars, confederated in political schemes by secret vows. A number of malcontents planned an uprising in Cavite and Manila; but their plans miscarried, and their leaders were executed on the Luneta.

From this trouble arose the immediate causes of the last rebellion. On pretext of preserving the peace, the mere word of the parish priest was employed to imprison, deport and dispossess, under the gentle auspices of the guardia civil, all who invited the covetous or malevolent attention of the friars. It was false doctrine that gave issue to Luther's protest; it was tyrannous power that crowded the Filipinos to revolt. In the one case the pope liberated souls from purgatory at his own caprice; in the other case the friars imprisoned their parishioners at will. The Germans resorted chiefly to logic; the Filipinos to arms; the nature of their respective grievances recommended these different remedies.

It was a pitiful inauguration of their cause, when the natives tried to capture the powder house at San Juan del Monte, Aug. 30, 1896. They were but peasants, innocent of the arts of war. Their leader was an honest rope-maker, who conducted the battle from the upper story of a house, by vociferously waving his hands. He and scores of his followers were mowed down by Spanish mausers. And it was rather a cheerless ending for their adventure when thirty-two of their leaders were duped and bribed into abandoning the cause a year and a quarter later. But their protest against religious abuses was not dead; and happily by God's providence, it has been given wise and beneficial advantage.

When the Filipinos had tried to capture Santa Cruz from Spanish soldiers, they raised a battle cry significant of their desires. It was: "Long live Spain! Down with the friars!" When, later, they published their platform of demands from the Spanish government, their first article was this: "Expulsion of the friars and restitution to the townships of the lands which the friars have appropriated, dividing the incumbencies held by them, as well as the episcopal sees, equally between peninsular and insular secular priests." The prime motive of their armed protest was, like Luther's, not schism, but reform.

They have made the just and essentially Protestant discrimination between the truth of religion and its perversions. An intelligent Mestizo near Iloilo spoke vehemently against the immoralities of the friars, but not against religion, though such ministers, of course, made him indifferent to their ministrations. A prominent citizen of Negros Island, himself a faithful Catholic, while on a church mission to Manila, made free to condemn the friars, and even Archbishop Chapelle himself, as unworthy leaders, and he represented the animus of many. Chaplain Pierce found prompt response when he sought to assemble a little group of natives in Malate for Protestant worship, and the missionaries discovered men who, independently and secretly, had worked out for themselves essentially Protestant beliefs. Now word comes that hundreds in and about Manila are allying themselves with the mission classes, especially of the Methodist Church. And a widespread secession from the Roman fold was reported as threatened by Buencamino. This last movement may be modified by the announcement of Archbishop Chapelle that the friars will be withdrawn from the archipelago. But however that event, the Philippines have come to their "Reformation," and the adherents of evangelical truth can do no better thing than press the issue.

A MODERN VERSION OF THE PRODIGAL SON.

By Hamish Mann.

DAVID GORDON was the foremost scholar in the village school of Argyle, a Scotch settlement in northern Illinois. William Murdock, the hunchback teacher, who had for a generation taught the young idea how to shoot, predicted for him a distinguished career. His oft-repeated prophecy was, "He will never need to take off his coat and work for a living, as his father had to do before him; but will be able to live like a gentleman"—exemption from manual labor being the little dominie's mark of a gentleman.

Through the influence of an uncle, who had become wealthy by engaging in wild-cat banking schemes, touching which uncomplimentary rumors were afloat, David got a situation in Chicago as a bank clerk. A cleaner or more guileless boy never went from a country home to push his fortune in that modern Babylon. He carried into it an untarnished soul. He feared no evil because he did not know of any evil to fear. He had a frank and open look which inspired everybody with confidence. With his bank associates he became a general favorite. His promotion was rapid, and no one grudged it to him, for it was fairly won.

At the time of his leaving home his mother had said to him: "My laddie, all that I ask of you is that you come back to me wi' the een wi' which ye leave me." His flying visits to his rural home were marked events. For all of his old friends and neighbors he had a hearty word of greeting. "He's not a bit stuck up" was the general verdict. When he rushed up to his mother to receive her kiss of welcome she would take his face into her two hands and say: "Let me look at your een, Davie"; then gazing into their blue depths, a smile would break over her face as she said: "Ye will dae, Davie."

But a time came when David dreaded his mother's kiss and searching look. He tried, however, to brave it out, and lightly said: "Ye need not be afraid about me, mither; I am all right." She knew better. Her mother love gave her intuitive power approaching omniscience. The tears which fell upon his cheek burned to his very soul. Sorrowfully she turned away, saying: "I hae lost my pure and noble boy." And so she had, although he would not own it. He had fallen into evil ways. His was the warm, impulsive, changeful Celtic nature that either soars or sinks. This time it sank; and that not gradually, but by a headlong plunge. Deterioration took place quickly, as it often does in the purest natures—on the same principle that the sting of an insect which will scarcely make an impression upon hard, gnarly fruit, will poison and spoil fruit of the finest quality.

Outwardly his conduct was as circumspect as ever. The recoil of sated desire had not yet come; the delirium of the new life into which he had been introduced had not exhausted itself; the gildings had not yet been rubbed off his stolen pleasures, revealing the pewter beneath; the apples of Sodom which he had eaten had not yet turned to ashes in his mouth; their taste was still sweet. Inwardly a silent revolution was going on. He had begun to throw off parental restraint, and to act for himself; he refused to be tied any longer to his mother's apron strings—which, by the way, is the safest place to which any boy can be tied; he began to think that his father and mother were too strict and old-fashioned, and that they did not know anything of the world; their ideas of what was proper for a modern young man being altogether out of date; and as every person must sooner or later try to adjust his beliefs to his life, he began to be skeptical on the subject of religion. He had not, however, got the length of saying things out loud, for he had not yet succeeded in hoodwinking his judgment or silencing his conscience or stifling his better nature. His mother, who read his heart like an open book, surprised him by turning round and answering his unspoken thoughts: "O Davie, my laddie, ye think that the ways in which ye have been brought up are too strict; ye think that ye hae at last found your liberty, but gin ye keep on in the way upon which you have entered, you will find that there is a way that seemeth good unto a man but the end thereof is death. Rejoice, O young man, and walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes; but know thou that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment." David winced under his mother's searching words and remained silent. The judgment day came sooner than either of them expected.

His week's holiday was about over. It had not been a satisfactory time either to himself or to his family. He had been restless and unhappy. Some secret trouble seemed to be gnawing at his heart. He did not care to visit his old companions and neighbors as had been his wont, but wandered over the farm, the faithful old collie trotting at his heels. He was to return to the city on the morrow. He wanted to go away, but dreaded to go. The day had been sultry; there was a preternatural stillness in the air, presaging a storm; the muttering of distant thunder was heard; the clouds were rolling up. David, under the excuse of a headache, had left the harvest field, where he had been rendering temporary assistance in binding grain. He walked slowly to the barn, where, ascending the loft, he flung himself upon the mow of new-made hay. A groan that was half a prayer escaped him. Rover looked into his face and whined.

"Poor old fellow," he said, "I know you would help me if you could; but this is something beyond you." Like the disciples of Christ who, in an hour of great strain, fell asleep for sorrow, David, after tugging at the problem of his life until his feelings became numb, fell asleep from sheer exhaustion. Neither the storm, nor the voice of approaching wheels, had availed to waken him. He slept on until he was suddenly aroused by the sound of the dinner horn, which was evidently blown at an early hour to summon his father from the field. A presentiment of coming calamity overpowered him, and he lay still until he heard his father's voice calling him to the house.

Two men had meanwhile driven up in a buggy and had taken shelter in the barn from the approaching storm. They inquired for Robert Gordon, saying that they wanted to see him upon urgent business. It was in answer to their inquiry that he was summoned from the harvest field.

As he stood in the doorway, hat in hand, his strong Scotch face fringed with a circlet of gray hair, he was an imposing figure. His bearing, if a trifle awkward, was dignified. He was a taciturn man, to whom words were precious things, not to be wasted upon small affairs. Turning his eyes toward the strangers, he said with a native courtesy: "I am Robert Gordon; what do you want with me?"

There was a pause, as if they hesitated to answer; then one of the gentlemen said: "Mr. Gordon, I may as well tell you at once that I am a representative of the bank at which your son is employed, and I am afraid that I have bad news for you. A check has been passed to which the signature has been forged, and it looks as if your son were the guilty party. I hope for your sake, and for his own, that he may be able to clear himself. Is he at home?"

"I think he is."

"Then will you please call him in?"

When David saw the bank officer, whom he at once recognized, he felt that his day of judgment had indeed come. He grew deathly pale; his knees trembled; he inwardly prayed that the earth might open and swallow him up; but no such thing happened. When his father, who was eagerly scanning his face, saw his guilty look the very springs of life broke within him. He gasped for breath, and only by gathering up his strength by a supreme act of will was he able to keep himself from falling off his chair.

"Oh, my God, to think that it should come to this! My God, has such an evil befallen us?"

Then turning to David, he said: "If you have done this thing, I beseech you, my son, not to add sin to sin by denying your guilt. Be honest with your soul and make complete confession."

"I am guilty," he stammeringly replied.

Then followed the story of his fall. It was a common tale of bad companions, of gambling, of so-called debts of honor, of money taken to pay the tax which Satan levies upon his dupes, of efforts at concealment, of vain attempts to refund the money which had been taken—and all leading up to the common end of exposure and ruin.

"Mr. Gordon," said the bank official, "we are heartily sorry for you; and as this is evidently a first offense, the bank directors have agreed beforehand that if confession was made, and thereby all further trouble avoided, and if you would make good the loss sustained by the bank, the matter would be hushed up. But, of course, your son will lose his place, as we could never trust him again."

OUR PULPIT.
THE HOLY GRAIL.

By Rev. Richard Fotheringham.

Text—"Seek and ye shall find" (Matt. vii. 7).

THE legend of the Holy Grail, interwoven with much of English literature, has received a new and spiritual interpretation in the writings of Lord Tennyson.

I may tell you that I have chosen this subject of set purpose to-night. I often get very weary of the topics of the day. The noise of the world is always in our ears; and there is a danger of our losing the sweeter voices that would always speak to us if we had ears to hear; and I want to carry you, if I can, for a moment into the regions of beautiful thoughts and beautiful words.

First of all, let me relate the legend of the Holy Grail. It has several forms, but the most beautiful is that adopted by Tennyson. The Holy Grail was the cup out of which our Lord drank, and gave his disciples to drink at the last supper. This cup passed into the possession of Joseph of Arimathea, and to him it was the most precious treasure which he possessed. He journeyed much and journeyed far, preaching the gospel of his Lord, and everywhere he went he carried with him the sacred cup. At last he came in his wanderings to England, and here he found a lodgment for his treasure in the Abbey of Glastonbury, and, as the story goes, whoever could touch or even see it was healed at once of all his ills.

But then the times
Grew to such evil that the holy cup
Was caught away to heaven and disappeared.

And now for Tennyson's story of how Sir Percivale one of the best and bravest knights of the court of King Arthur, sought to find again the grail that had been thus lost in heavenly light.

He heard of it first from his sister, a holy nun, who, having heard of it, prayed that she might see it, and, after much fasting and prayer, did see it in sacred vision. So great was her joy that she told her brother, and bade him also seek to see it, and bid his brother-knights seek to see, for nothing else in all the world could compare with that vision. Do you not see what that means? To drink of this cup, to "know him and the fellowship of his sufferings" is the highest and most perfect thing that man can attain to. It is difficult; it is hard beyond description. But it is great. It satisfies.

Well, Sir Percivale tells his sister's story to all his fellow-knights, and, being a good man, fasts and prays in hope that the vision may come to him, and other knights follow his example.

They meet each evening in the wondrous Hall at Camelot, where Arthur loves to feast with his followers. There is always by the board an empty chair made long ago by Merlin the wizard, who has said concerning it, that whosoever sits in it will be lost. One night Arthur is absent from the board, delayed by an errand of mercy, and Sir Galahad, the virgin knight, the youngest and the purest of them all, approached this chair and, saying, "If I lose myself I save myself," seats himself in it. Instantly a thunder storm breaks over the hall.

And in the blast there smote along the hall
A beam of light seven times more clear than day,
And down the long beam stole the Holy Grail.

No one saw it save Sir Galahad, but they heard the thunder and saw the light, as St. Paul's companions heard and saw on the way to Damascus, yet did not participate in his vision. Then many of the other knights swore a solemn vow that they would journey until they too saw the Holy Grail. To-night I can only tell you about the experiences of Sir Percivale.

King Arthur arrived before the feast was ended and asked Sir Percivale the meaning of the excitement in their midst, and was told the story of the vision and the vows. The king's brow clouded. Most of them he feared only "followed wandering fires," yet since their vow was sacred they must go.

Next morning there was a tournament in which Sir Galahad and Sir Percivale carried all before them, and then our hero departed on his quest of the Holy Grail.

What follows is a wonderful allegory, and as I tell you the story I will try also to make its meaning plain. The first thing of which our knight became conscious was a burning thirst. "I was thirsty even unto death," he says. Do you understand that thirst? Have you ever felt it? Is it possible that you feel it now? "Blessed are they that do hunger and thirst after righteousness," said our Savior. Oh! but some of us do. We would give all that we possess to be Sir Galahad, who never lost the vision of the Holy Grail by day or night, who could have said like the apostle, "God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me and I unto the world."

But we shall find out that all other cisterns save one are broken cisterns which can hold no water. And this lesson our poem teaches.

I. Sir Percivale, aching with this thirst, came suddenly upon a sight which filled him for the moment with delight.

Deep lawns and then a brook . . . .
And o'er the brook were apple trees,
And apples by the brook.

and to himself he said:

I will rest here,
I am not worthy of the quest.

I know very well that this is as far as many of you have yet come. There have indeed been strange stirrings within you—a deep desire for the very highest, a very wistful yearning to be Christ's; and you have come to the lawn and the brook, and the apple trees. This world is full of pleasures, and for some strange reason the devil is allowed to make them baits to lure souls away from God. Now, there is no harm in pleasure—in any innocent pleasure. I would not, if I could, turn life into a convent for any one of you. I know life too well, and I hope I know God too well for that. The cloistered life was a false life—an unnatural life—and those who sought it found it did not save them from their sins.

But pleasure, though it has its own sweet place in life, cannot satisfy the soul or take the place of the highest. And so Sir Percivale, when he had drunk of the brook and eaten the goodly apples, tells us, "All these things at once fell into dust, and I was left alone." That is true, is it not?

II. But there is one thing which, to the young mind, seems to promise satisfaction. To have a home of one's own with love and trust; to gild its walls and make its safeguards sure appears the very crown of life. To that I say, Yes, in a way. There is nothing in this world more heavenlike than a home where love dwells. The marriage service—I know you will call me heretical—is to me more sacred than the communion service, and I rejoice always over "The hearts united; the two in love made one." But even human life, however true and tender, can never take the place of the love of Christ. Sir Percivale in his wanderings met his first love. She was more beautiful than ever. She was a princess in her own right. She had a kingdom to offer him, which she was ready to lay at his feet, and which her subjects were eager that he should accept. But he dare not because of something he had seen. He had beheld in his wanderings a beautiful house with a fair woman outside spinning at her wheel who rose to welcome him, but when he alighted she faded from his sight. Then the house became in his vision "no better than a broken shed," and in it a dead babe, and this, too, faded and he was left alone.

Now, I want to speak of life as I find it, and I am convinced that what the poet says here is true. If you are in quest, as the good knight was, of what is highest in life, no earthly love which is only of earth can satisfy you. God means you to love. God means you to have a home, but the only foundation on which a perfect earthly home can be built is Jesus Christ. "Can ye drink of the cup that I drink of?" he asked his disciples. "We can," they answered, and they were right. But the only home in which there is true happiness and lasting peace is the home where "the cup of Christ" stands always on the board.

III. A strange thing now happened to Sir Percivale. A yellow gleam suddenly flashed across the moon. "I thought," he says, "the sun was rising, yet the sun had risen." The ploughman left his plough, and the milkmaid left her pail as the light shone upon them, yet they fell down crushed before it. The light was the glitter of gold. To Sir Percivale it came as it comes to all of us—as a picture of his own line of life. "A knight in golden armor and with a crown of gold upon his head, and his horse in golden armor, jeweled everywhere." But when he touched him, he tells us, "he fell into dust, and I was left alone." That incident in the story has a very real message for an age which seeks gold more than it seeks God. There are few among you who do not want to make money. Make it by all means. Make as much of it as you can if you are making it honestly. But I have this to tell you. When you have made it—made it even beyond your utmost dream—you will be the poorest of the poor if there is nothing behind it. The man who is rich in gold is not necessarily the man who is rich in happiness. The only truly happy man is the man who is rich toward God.

IV. Presently our hero found himself climbing a great hill, on the top of which was built a wondrous city, and as he climbed a great crowd gathered by the city gate, crying, "Welcome, Sir Percivale, the mightiest and the purest among men." Glad was Sir Percivale as he heard that shout, and pressed up higher that he might meet the crowd; but when he reached the summit, lo! the crowd had gone. Nothing was there but ruins, and one aged man, who in response to his inquiry, "Where is that goodly company that so cried out upon me?" answered in amaze, "Whence and what art thou?" and disappeared.

What does it mean? Why, this—the applause of men is nothing and less than nothing. Popularity fades in a day. To be liked or disliked by those around you counts not at all. The fashion of this world and its applause pass away, but you and I are pilgrims to eternity; and like Sir Percivale, we ought to be in quest of the Holy Grail—in search of the Highest, seeking to find the secret of Christ's life on earth, of which that holy cup was but the symbol.

V. And now let me tell you of how Sir Percivale's quest ended in success. He left the mountain top—he went down into the valley—the valley which Bunyan calls that of humiliation, and there he found a holy hermit's dwelling, who told him where he was wrong.

"Thou hast not true humility," said this good man. And then he saw a wonderful thing—a thing that makes me marvel, every time I read it, at Tennyson's insight into human nature. "Thou thoughtest," said he, "only of thy prowess and thy sins." There you have it in a sentence. We are all a mixture of pride and humility. We think of our good points and our bad ones and balance one against the other, when all the while Christ waits to be, what he alone can be, our Savior; but he can only be that when we make an utter surrender of our life and of our will and let him be all in all.

"My grace is sufficient for thee," he says, but he adds what it is hard to realize, "my strength is made perfect in weakness."

VI. The way in which the vision comes at last to Sir Percivale is in itself a gospel. Sir Galahad, the pure and the holy, to whom the vision of the Highest is clear by night and day, comes by chance to this same hermit's cell, and to his comrade says, "Come with me for thou shalt see the vision where I go." And so Sir Percivale goes with him. He watches him as he passes over the black blank swamp and beyond it enters on the great white sea which means eternity, and above his head there gleams the vision of the Holy Grail. To me that vision means more than I can tell you. I have never seen Christ so clearly as I have seen His presence brooding like a holy Dove over the lives of those I loved, and for Christ's sake almost adored. To have seen him in the lives of good men and pure and holy women is to know beyond a doubt how real and near he is. But to have seen him as he is, is best of all. And sometimes as I have lingered over this exquisite poem, I have thought that Sir Galahad, the spotless knight, was the poet's thought and image of Another. Oh, I have watched him cross the dark, black swamp of this world's wickedness—I have seen him pass into the shining sea of God's Eternity. I have sworn that I would follow him. Will you come too?

London, Eng.

Bishop Wilberforce used to tell a story of a clerk at a village church of the old style who deliberately took half-a-crown out of the offertory plate as he brought it up to the communion table, and slipped it into his pocket. "I distinctly saw him take it," said the Bishop, "and intended to charge him with it at the end of the service; but, carried away by the sublimity of the service, I forgot all about it. Next day I remembered, and spoke about it. 'Oh, sir,' said the old clerk, 'never you fash yourself about that! That half-crown has done good service for many years. I keep it to put down first; then the gentry, when they see a poor man like me put 2s. 6d. in the plate, cannot for shame give a less sum themselves!'"

BIBLE SCHOOL.*ABRAHAM'S INTERCESSION.

Lesson Aug. 18, 1901. Gen. 18: 16-33.

*Golden Text: The Effectual, Fervent Prayer of a Righteous Man Availeth Much—Jas. 5: 16.A CHICAGO TEACHER'S NOTES ON THE LESSON.

Elias A. Long.

Setting of the Lesson.

Place: Abraham on the plain of Mamre at Hebron. Lot in Sodom. The location of the destroyed cities is in dispute, with a majority inclining to the view that their situation was north of the Dead Sea. What agencies God used to destroy the cities is unknown. We know that in later history towns have been swept away by fire, wind, water, earthquake.

Time: About fifteen years after the last lesson, usually ascribed to B. C. 1897. Abraham was 99 years old.

Main Teaching of the Lesson.

This lesson gives us a new glimpse into the heart of God. He who "in divers manners spake in times past" (Heb. 1: 1) now manifests himself to Abraham in a way more familiar than any yet narrated. In the last lesson Jehovah's visible presence was shown by the mysterious smoke and flaming torch. Ch. 15: 17. Now he condescends to appear in the likeness of man, as to a friend. 2 Chron. 20: 7. Indeed, so familiar becomes the conversation between God and the patriarch, that our thought is carried back to Eden and the communion there. This theophany was suggestive of that perfect revelation when God was manifest in the flesh. Matt. 1: 23. This lesson also shows the patience of God as he receives the petitions of his creatures; the value which God places on righteous living (V. 17-19); his wrath against sin (V. 20, 21); the doom of the wicked (Ch. 19: 15); the efficiency of prayer (V. 26) and man's need of an intercessor (V. 23).

Jehovah appeared at this time, as the previous verses show, to convey a new assurance, that within a year Sarah was to have a son, who was to be named Isaac. The simple narrative relates also the admirable grace of Abraham in entertaining three strangers, who proved to be angels. Ch. 19: 1; Heb. 13: 1. That these visitors were of superior rank is indicated, (1) by their approach to the chief Sheik's tent, which in a camp like Abraham's was always distinguishable; (2) in that Abraham "bowed towards the ground;" (3) in the offer of the best of the flock; (4) in his act of respect in standing while the guests were eating. Vs. 2-8. That one of the angels was none other than our Lord, the Eternal Son, who existed before Abraham (John 8: 58), and whose day Abraham rejoiced to see (John 8: 56), many have believed. He is the same exalted personage who under the name of "angel" or "angel of Jehovah," or "Angel of the Covenant" frequently appeared to the patriarchs in human form.

V. 16. Entertaining Strangers. "The men rose up." The angels whom Abraham had graciously entertained. Ch. 19: 1. They arose after the hospitality bestowed by their host. * * * "Abraham." Not now Abram, for his name had been changed, as a new and distinct pledge that he should become the "father of a multitude" the meaning of his new name. Ch. 17: 4, 5. * * * "Went with them." He honors his guests by accompanying them as guide. There were no public roads at that time. Two proceeded on to Sodom, where they passed the night at Lot's house (19: 1-3); the third one, after listening to the entreaties of Abraham, later joins the others in Sodom. This is the Angel of Power as shown in Ch. 19: 17, 18, 24.

V. 17, 18. Secret of the Lord. "The Lord said." The chief angel discloses to Abraham the awful doom that awaited the cities of the plain. * * * "Shall I hide from Abraham." The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him. Ps. 25: 14. What was hidden from worldly-minded Lot was disclosed to God-fearing Abraham. The cares, riches and pleasures of the world may blind the soul to dangers very clear to God's friends who have spiritual sight. Beginning at V. 20, Abraham speaks to God, and God to Abraham, as friend speaks to friend. God proves to be indeed a God of all comfort now sustaining him as with a shield (Chap. 15: 1); now giving the pledge of a new covenant; now a new name of hope; now his condescending presence. * * * "A great and mighty nation." The change of name specially guaranteed this.

V. 19. Ideal Patriarch. "For I know him." God knew Abraham, as he knows us altogether. Ps. 139. It was because God knew Abraham's great fitness, that he chose him for his high purposes. He will choose us for duties in proportion to our fitness and willingness. * * * "The way of the Lord." Here we have an exquisite picture of a righteous man whose fervent prayer availeth much. Jas. 5: 16. * * * "He will command his children . . . household." Exercise parental authority as well as offer parental prayers and precepts. Patriarch means: the father-ruler. His household included the many shepherds and other servants of his camp.

V. 20, 22. Beloved Lot's Danger. "Cry of Sodom and Gomorrah." Because their sin was grievous. In Sodom there were not ten righteous persons. These cities were given over to forms of vice and crime the basest, meanest and most violent. The worst slums of modern cities could not be so utterly fallen as was the entire city of Sodom. That God resolved to destroy this city is apparent from V. 23. * * * "I will go down and see." Speaking after the manner of a righteous earthly judge who bases justice on evidence. * * * "If not I will know." The destruction of these cities was to stand as a monument of the doom of wickedness, to all future ages, hence it must be apparent that the decree was just and not rash nor excessive. * * * "Turn their faces towards Sodom." Two of the three strangers proceed, after the manner of men, to witness the evidence of sin before punishment should fall. * * * "Abraham stood yet before the Lord." Before the person of the third angel to intercede for Sodom. So one stands before God to intercede for us. 1 John 2: 1; Heb. 7: 25.

V. 23. Friend of Sinners. "Abraham drew near and said." Abraham, the friend of God, has a tender, sympathetic heart that reminds us of Christ's; for like Christ, he was the friend of publicans and sinners. With all his loathing for the city's wickedness, he yet could pray and we assume, weep "O, Sodom, Sodom," as the master prayed and wept over Jerusalem. Luke 13: 24. He was his brother's keeper. Gen. 4: 9. Fifteen years before he had, by strong and heroic stroke, redeemed the city from the slavery of Chedorlaomer and now he pleads that it may be saved from severer doom. We, too, will pray more earnestly for those for whom we have labored. Abraham here pleads for "the righteous," "the place" and "all the city." V. 23, 24, 28. Vain and unrighteous people little know of the care and concern which the devout entertain for them. * * * "Wilt thou destroy the righteous with the wicked." Lot was relatively righteous. With all his imperfections he was incomparably better than his neighbors. The fact that he grieved at the sinfulness around him (2 Pet. 2: 7, 8) shows some good in him. From Ch. 19: 9 it appears that he was a judge who interfered with the people's sins. Like his uncle he was a hospitable man (19: 2, 3); he, too, had entertained angels unawares. For Lot's narrow, selfish prayer, see Ch. 19: 18-20. God sometimes throws to worldly men the gifts they crave. They have their reward in this life. Matt. 6: 2, 5, 16.

V. 24. "Sin Very Grievous" "Not spare the place." The moral condition of the cities was hopeless. V. 20. They had been steadily growing worse until the "cry" of their sin (V. 21; Ch. 19: 13) ascended to heaven. They were like a gangrened limb which required to be amputated. The cities treated the death warning of the angels, and of Lot, as a false alarm and perished. Ch. 19: 13, 14. Later the Canaanites also were exterminated for their wickedness. Lev. 18: 24, 25.

V. 25. Righteous Judgment. "To slay the righteous with the wicked." Often in this world the righteous suffer with and for the wicked. This shows that we must look to another world, for a complete carrying out of the justice of God. Rom. 8: 28. * * * "That be far from thee." This fervent prayer availed much. By its means Lot and his family had timely warning and escaped the city's doom. * * * "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" To Abraham God is not the idol of a tribe, one of gods many, but the one true God of all the earth. It was this faith in the one true God that gave Abraham his great distinction and influence in the ancient world. Abraham believed that God would judge righteously, but how, was not clear—a matter ever puzzling to his children. But it is a great satisfaction to know, in this world with its mysteries of sin, that whatever else happens, God will judge the world in righteousness. Ps. 96: 13.

V. 26. Salt of the Earth. "If I find . . . I will spare." Here Abraham receives a definite answer to his petition. It shows the power and value of prayer. God does spare the wicked lest the righteous be injured. Matt. 13: 29, 30. * * * "I will spare . . . for their sake." From this we learn that the wicked are constantly receiving benefits from the righteous. God continues to preserve the earth, for the sake of the leaven of goodness, which is working for leavening the whole lump. Matt. 13: 33. God delighteth in mercy. Micah 7: 18; Lam. 3: 22.

V. 27. Holy Boldness. "I have taken upon me to speak." Humility is the key note of Abraham's prayer as it must be of all true prayer: Having faith in the grace and condescension of God he makes bold to speak as a friend to a friend. Jas. 2: 23. But each one of us can come boldly to the throne of grace. (Heb. 4: 16). * * * "Am but dust and ashes." He recognized the truth of his origin and thus to make him the more deeply humble.

V. 28, 29. Enlarging Vision. "Peradventure fifty . . . forty." The Lord's gracious response to his friend makes Abraham bold to further importune for Sodom. In him were all nations to be blest, why should he not pray for Sodom. In various attempts to reach Lot's heart he had failed. That we should cultivate earnest and untiring prayer is later taught by the parable of the importunate widow. Luke 18: 1-8. Notice that Abraham prays for others, Lot only for himself. Chapt. 19: 18-20.

V. 30, 31. Constrained by Love. "Let not the Lord be angry." Love "constraineth" Abraham to repeat his petition. 2 Cor. 5: 14. In praying that the Lord be not angry, how far he yet was from understanding the mercy and grace of the Lord. Nothing can better please God than when we show our interest in his great work of redemption by working and pleading for sinners. It was to that end God himself worked (Jno. 5: 17) and suffered, by sending his Son into the world to die for sinners. Abraham's pleadings were but the echo of divine love. * * * "Thirty . . . twenty . . . ten be found." Abraham had first reduced by fives and then by tens. As a disciple and learner of God by his importunity, he gains, as do we, a clearer and larger vision of the mercy, patience and judgment of God.

V. 32. God's Patience. "Let not the Lord be angry." He repeats the language of verse 30. Abraham was upright in his pleadings and, far from causing anger, the prayer of the upright is God's delight. Prov. 15: 8. In truth it was Abraham who ceased asking before God ceased granting. Eph. 3: 20. Sometimes we incline to pray, as if we thought ourselves really better and more liberal than God; and that he must be won over to our high ideals. That is very wrong. * * * "But this once." Abraham's intercession was limited, but, God be thanked, with Christ's intercession for us there is no limit. He ever liveth to make intercession for us. Heb. 7: 25. * * * "I will not destroy it for ten's sake." A whole city would have been spared for the sake of ten righteous men. As this number was lacking the city was destroyed. There was only one "righteous" and he, from the circumstances of his being there, might without injustice and but for Abraham's prayer would have perished in the general overthrow.

As to the answer to Abraham's fervent prayer this followed to the extent that Lot, the best man in Sodom, his wife and two daughters escaped. For their sakes God even spared one of the five cities, Zoar. Ch. 19: 21, 22. Let us be reminded that every true prayer is answered, if not by a "yes" it is none the less answered if the response be a "no." That Sodom was not spared, was due to the incorrigible condition of its people. The will of man can thwart the loving purpose of heaven, and make void the prayer of the righteous.

FIVE-MINUTE SERMON ON THE GOLDEN TEXT.

By Peter Ainslie

PRAYER is the mightiest power in all the world today. So far as achievements are concerned, there is nothing that can be mentioned by the side of it. I know that men talk about electricity and its achievements and I do not deny that they are wonderful, but when and where was there any power in men's hands to divide instantly a sea seven miles wide, to throw a transparent dam across a rapidly flowing river so that a great host passed over on dry land, to make wild lions pillows for God's prophet, to bring water out of a rock, to play with the stars so that they fought against the enemy and to make the sun and the moon stand still? These achievements are so old that we forget them, but we can lift up our eyes to-day and see what prayer is doing. See George Muller praying up an orphanage and Hudson Taylor praying up an army for the conversion of China. From a worldly point of view, they represent an ordinary type of men, but they believed God and the Almighty heard them. The Bristol orphanage cares for twelve hundred children and the China Inland mission has more than eight hundred missionaries and only God is back of these enterprises. "If the Lord be for us, who can be against us?" Both Testaments are full of examples of effectual, fervent prayers and all along through the ages, God has let shine great examples to remind us of the power that belongs to the Christian. You can go down too into the obscure places and you will find men and women who will tell you when and where God heard them. These cases may never get into print, but God makes the record of them. Prayer is the mightiest power against sickness, poverty and defeat. Out of all these fields vast armies of men and women can stand up and say that at such a time, if God had not heard our prayers, we would have suffered a complete overthrow, "but the Lord delivereth us out of them all." Has he not said: "The eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous and his ears are open unto their cry?" By the side of all promises, write, "The word of the Lord cannot be broken." Many possibilities lie within our grasp. God has given to us the power and he has named the cost, which is piety. From unworldly lips prayer is limitless. God wants his children to exercise the power. Pray to God. Talk with him frequently. He hears it all. Trust to his power rather than to your piety, to his grace than to your power, and he will bring it to pass.

Our Father, thou hast heard us often. Hear us always for Jesus' sake. Amen.

I can imagine a man who says, "It is of no use for me to make an effort; I am too weak, and the chain too strong." Give a good tug, my brother. Put out your best. Rise, weak and all as you are, only rise, and God almighty will rise with you and in you and for you. Although Alps were piled on Apennines, God the Lord will lay them in dust. Thy feet shall stand in heaven, if thou wilt but begin. That is how we are saved. God is the bottom of it and the top of it, but He works along these natural, human lines of self-termination.—John M'Neil.

THE WISE DECISION.

HERE upon canvas or with the pen have we a truer portrayal of human experience than that which is given us by the prophets? They knew life and have reflected it with a sincerity that becomes at times painful. They were idealists; they were realists; but above all they were true to the truth as it was given them to see it. As long as encouragement and hope were the best tonic for the people they did not hesitate to give it; but when necessity laid upon them to administer that which was bitter and distasteful they did it with the calm assurance of having acted the part of a faithful physician. Like a wilful and half-spoiled child the people insisted on following their own way. The result was they must learn the most important lessons of life from the tragedy of the captivity.

We think how foolish they were! But after all, they reflect universal experience. How many there are who do not learn the deep things of life until they have passed under the rod of affliction. The prodigal son came to himself and faced about when he had spent all and become disgusted with his manner of life. The wise decision did not precede, but followed, his renegade career. So it is with us largely today; the rainbow of hope appears through the tears of disappointment.

Our First Inquiry.

Where is God and who are the people who are with him? for that is where we wish to be found. To those whose faith is fixed in the living God, triumph and victory are sure to come.

We are the spiritual inheritors of all the past—as a nation and as Christians. The world is looking to the Anglo-Saxon people for the solution of the great questions of individual and social duty. Are we living up to our opportunities? Are we fulfilling the expectation of far-distant lands as they send up their cry for life and love? Can we convince these people that God is with us and that he has a fatherly care for all men, if we, his children and agents, are so controlled by the commercial spirit of the age that we traffic in souls, delivering them to the adversary? Is it not well that we pause and ask ourselves the question—how long will he be the protector and sponsor of this nation if we do not more earnestly take heed unto our ways? Let us study the life of this great people of the past that we may not err as they have erred; finally to reap a fate like unto theirs. Though all the world should be against us, if God is with us victory will crown our efforts.

It would seem that many men are unwise or else they doubt that God is interested in our behalf.

Ofttimes our own lives lack the potency and sweetness of the divine presence. Too long we have been engaged in endless strife over genealogies and questions which do not satisfy the hungering of the starving soul. The accompaniments of true religion have been emphasized to the neglect of the essence. We have tithed mint, anise and cummin and neglected the weightier matters—the fundamental verities. It is not a question in science, a pure intellectual proposition that we are asking men to decide; but it is one which must appeal to the ethical and religious sense of man, giving to his life a new curve. With urgency we should proclaim the living, loving Christ as the sinner's best friend.

Let us build upon the rock; let us have our lamps trimmed and burning, that we may be the promoters of the most genuinely spiritual type of religion that the world has seen.

GOD'S REQUIREMENTS.

Topic Aug. 18; Ref. Deut. 10:12-14.

There is in this an affectionate appeal to reason. The great requirements of the law of Moses are based on the fundamental principles of morality. Let it be declared everywhere and always that religion is a reasonable matter. I never could see any sense in decrying the moral man, or trying to exalt the spiritual at the expense of the moral. There is no separating the moral and spiritual. God's requirements are reasonable.

The Prophet's Summary.

"He hath shown thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?"—Micah 6:8. This splendid summary of the divine requirements must appeal to the reason of all right-thinking men. And you will notice the appeal is to man—to all men. I cannot understand the attitude of opposition or passive indifference in which many men put themselves. It certainly must grow out of a misapprehension of the great divine and human requirements of religion. That there is a persistent ignorance, wilful or otherwise, on the part of great masses of men, of all classes and conditions, is apparent to any one who observes men. It may be partly owing to the failure on the part of many professed Christians to exemplify these three great principles of all true religion—justice, mercy, humility. There has been in the past an unwise emphasis of the theological requirements, which has resulted in confusing the popular mind, and led to the conclusion that religion is a sort of supernatural something which practical people cannot understand and cannot afford. I believe profoundly in the supernatural in the religion of revelation, but the moral and spiritual, the practical and supernatural, go together and help us to understand the deep things of God. Jesus said: "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself." The religion of Christ is practical and can be proven by trial. The Master waits the world's supreme test. He has given the challenge, and it abides the centuries. Christ summed up the law and the prophets in the two great commandments: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul—and thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." So we find the great divine requirements are the same for all time and for all men.

"For Thy Good."

This is the final proof. "For thy good" Moses gave the law; the prophets warned; holy men of God spake, as they were moved by the Holy Spirit; the Master spake as never man spake, lived as never man lived, and died as never man died. O believe it, obey it and live!

GOD CALLS ABRAM.

"And I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing."—Genesis 12: 2.

Monday—Genesis 12. 1-9.

Abram yielded an unquestioning obedience to God's call.

He went out, not knowing whither he went. A homeless wanderer, he pitched his tent to-day by the side of the well, and he could not have told you where his invisible Guide would bid him stretch its cords to-morrow. He submitted himself absolutely to the will of the heavenly Lord.

I must be like him, if I am to be a servant of God. Conversion is his call; and what is conversion? It is unspeakable grace on the divine side; but it is simple and unquestioning obedience on the human side. There is an untried God who must be followed without the shadow of a doubt. There is a country, "afar beyond the stars," which must be sought through good report and through bad.

Conversion is the richest blessedness; it is the completest sacrifice also.

Tuesday—Nehemiah 9. 5-10.

Mr. Ruskin writes in one of his little books, "The Crown of Wild Olive," "All good men know their captain; where he leads, they must follow; what he bids they must do. Without this trust and faith, without this captainship and soldiership, no great deed, no great salvation, is possible to man." I hope that I understand from experience the truth of these wise words.

Abraham did. When God "brought him forth out of Ur of the Chaldees," he "found his heart faithful." How the command reached him I cannot tell. But Abram embraced it, and carried it out, although it meant even more of mystery and hardship and loss than he could have dreamed.

Still there are glorious compensations. God "made a covenant" with Abraham, and "performed his words."

Wednesday—Acts 7. 1-7.

Abraham not only obeyed God's call; he waited long for the fulfilment of God's promise. The land flowing with milk and honey. God "gave him none inheritance in it, no, not so much as to set his foot on." Abraham lived and died an alien in his own possessions.

I am asked not only to obey the call of God, but to hold fellowship with him, and to stifle all distrust of him, although his dealings with me are very mysterious and very painful. I have the assurance of the inheritance, but the assurance tarries long for its realization. Meanwhile I must be content to be a stranger and a pilgrim. Meanwhile I must be prepared for apparent disappointment and failure, for separation from those who surround me, for intercourse with a God who is unseen and who is likely to prove my patience and my tenacity to the uttermost. But,

"To the hour of death, after this life's whim,
When the heart beats low, and the eyes grow dim,
And pain has exhausted every limb—

The lover of the Lord shall trust in him.

God bade Noah build an ark to the saving of his house from a deluge which was coming on the earth. And Noah obeyed, though present circumstances seemed to pronounce him a foolish and credulous man.

But the ark itself was a help to his trust.

Enoch walked with God in communion, and never doubted. So far as I know, Enoch's confidence was subjected to no supreme trial.

Abel offered to God an excellent sacrifice. He approached him with the ruddy lifeblood of one of the lambs of his flock. He sought peace with the righteous Lord. He yearned for the remission of his sins.

But Abraham transcended them all. He "believed God," though he was without the external helps which Noah had; though his sorest distresses, unlike Enoch's, came to him from the procedure of God himself; though he had to bring a costlier offering than Abel's to the altar. My Lord, create in me Abraham's triumphant faith.

Friday—Hebrews 11. 6-10.

Abraham looked for the city which hath the foundations, whose Builder and Maker is God. Indeed, he was a citizen of it, all the while he tabernacled in Canaan; for he had laid firm hold on the things which last, and the life which is life indeed.

When I do the will of God, I have the abiding home. And this is his will, that I believe on him whom he has sent. This, too, that I should be a saint, a holy man. And this, that I should glorify him on the earth, and should finish the work he has given me to do. If these desires of his are fulfilled in me, then mine is already the life eternal, and before I reach heaven, I dwell in the city which hath foundations.

Saturday—Mark 1. 14-20.

Who are the souls whom Jesus uses most? Who are they whom he can make "fishers of men"? They are those who have left all and followed him.

He gains from them implicit faith. Other voices used to influence them, to charm, and instruct, and sway them. But now his voice carries the supreme and satisfying message. They listen to him with absolute trust. His words are sweet to their taste. And have not these the true evangel to proclaim to others?

And he gains from them a glad obedience. Duty is not frigid and austere in their belief; it is the doing of his will who fills their whole horizon, and whom they esteem before all beside; it "doth wear the Godhead's most benignant grace." And have not these the sweetest and noblest life to expound?

May mine be this faith, this love, this obedience. For thus only shall I be a true fisher of men.

Sunday—Mark 10. 28-31.

"He shall receive a hundredfold now in this time." How true it is!

Trial endured for God enlarges my knowledge of divine truth. In the dark days I take a special interest in his Word. I grasp with a firmer hand his promises. I apprehend more richly his mind and his purpose. If "on the one side there is a darkening world," then, "on the other side there is a brightening Bible." And I should welcome the gloom which leads to such an issue.

And trial endured for God purifies my character. By it I am delivered from the undue love of what is seen and temporal.

And trial endured for God brings him very near. Sometimes he finds it hard to get a quiet season of communion with me. I have so much work to do; I have so many engagements to keep; I live in such a constant whirl. But he withdraws me from these into the wilderness, and he has leisure to speak to my heart, and I learn his power to soothe and sustain.

A hundredfold—yes, indeed!

BOOKS

The Theology of Albrecht Ritschl, by Professor Albert Temple Swing of Oberlin, together with "Instruction in Ritschl, translated by Alice Mead Swing, A. B.

It is a misfortune that the Ritschlian theology became generally known in Britain and America at first mainly through hostile criticism. Professor Swing in this volume seeks to supply the Christian Religion" by Albrecht a corrective to that one-sidedness. If these pages sometimes have the appearance of special pleading, the reader cannot but be pleased with the enthusiasm, the first-hand knowledge of Ritschl, and the clear exposition of his views which they contain. The translation of Ritschl's famous "Unterricht," one of the most crabbedly written of all his works, will be very welcome, even to scholars. Perhaps especially to them, for it seems unlikely that even a translation will make it palatable to many others. We welcome this book very heartily and would urge those who wish to know the other side in the Ritschl controversy to peruse its pages.

"The Story of Nineteenth Century Science," by Henry Smith Williams, Harper & Brothers, publishers, is a portly volume of 475 pages. It is printed on heavy calendered paper and has about a hundred illustrations, most of which are portraits of eminent scientists. Its price is $2.50. The table of contents includes all of the more important branches of science, and the manner of treatment while thoroughly accurate is not above the level of the ordinary reader. After a description of the condition of science at the beginning of the century, there follows a review of the century's progress in astronomy, paleontology, geology, meteorology, physics, chemistry, biology, anatomy, physiology, scientific medicine, and experimental psychology. Some final suggestions are also made touching some of the unsolved scientific problems. This book presents in an interesting and popular way the evolution of modern science. It gives also the most recent findings of modern research. To the general reader it will prove a source of valuable information, while to the preacher it will supply a rich store of illustrative material. The interest of the book is enhanced by brief sketches of the men whose scientific achievements are recorded.

"The Progress of the Century" is a companion volume to the "Story of Nineteenth Century Science." It is published by the same firm, and sells at the same price. But instead of being a continuous story—the work of one writer—it is a collection of separate treatises, the work of a number of eminent specialists. The table of contents is as follows: Evolution, by Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace; Chemistry, by Prof. William Ramsay; Archaeology, by Prof. William M. Flinders-Petrie; Astronomy, by Sir Joseph Norman Lockyer; Philosophy, by Prof. Edward Caird; Medicine, by Dr. William Osler; Surgery, by Dr. W. W. Keen; Electricity, by Prof. Elihu Thomson; Physics, by President Thomas C. Mendenhall; War, by Sir Charles W. Dilke; Naval Ships, by Captain Alfred T. Mahan; Literature, by Andrew Lang; Engineering, by Thomas C. Clarke; Religion, by Cardinal James Gibbons, Prof. A. V. G. Allen, Prof. Richard J. H. Gottheil and Prof. Goldwin Smith. These papers, which are as far as possible stripped of technical phraseology, give the results of scientific investigation without overburdening the reader with the processes. They contain a mass of valuable first-hand knowledge not easily obtainable elsewhere.

In the opening chapter on Evolution Dr. Wallace takes the position that "Evolution, as a general principle, implies that all things in the universe, as we see them, have arisen from other things, which preceded them, by a process of modification, under action of those all-pervading but mysterious agencies known to us as 'natural forces,' or more generally 'the laws of nature.'" This naturalistic position may be defensible when we limit our view to things as we see them; but we must not forget that when we have discovered the physical basis of life we are still a long way from the basis of physical life. Life proceeds from life, and behind all things is the living God.

In the chapter on Religion there is a four-cornered discussion by representatives of Roman Catholicism, Protestantism, Judaism and Free Thought. Such discussions are profitable, for "truth is a torch, and the more 'tis shook it shines." The whole book is provocative of thought and will prove a valuable possession.

This is a notable book. It has three outstanding features. First, the human interest in it is strong and pervasive; second, it incidentally throws a flood of light upon a great race problem; and third, it is written in a natural, simple style, which has all the charm of the highest art. But interesting as this book is, as showing the upward struggles of a heroic human soul against fearful odds, it has a still higher value as showing the possibilities of the negro race. In what has been attained by the individual, we have a promise and prophecy of what may yet be attained by the whole. The work of social regeneration among a people little more than a generation removed from servitude, and but few generations removed from barbarism, must necessarily be slow. A nation may be born in a day, but its development is the patient work of centuries. But whatever may be our impression of the progress of the negro race since their emancipation, we are forced to admit that a people that can produce such a splendid specimen of humanity as Booker T. Washington are not without hope.

The crowning achievement of Mr. Washington's life—and the one with which this book is largely taken up—is the founding of the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute. This work has given Mr. Washington the foremost place as educator among the colored people of the world. Following along the lines of Hampton Institute, where he was educated, he has built up a large training school which is being accepted as the model in the education of the negro youth. Mr. Washington sees that before the negro can rise he must become an industrial factor. He admits that too many educated negroes have become lawyers, doctors and clergymen. The first thing upon which he insists is that the negro must have a trade; and the second is that he must have a good moral character. His plan for solving the negro problem is eminently sensible, and has the highest endorsement of the Southern people. To get this bright view of the negro character and this hopeful view of the negro problem, read this absorbingly interesting book.

"Latin America," by Hubert W. Brown, M. A., illustrated. Fleming H. Revell Co., Chicago, 1901, pp. 308. Price, $1.25. The five lectures of which this book is composed were first given before the students of Princeton Theological Seminary, and their purpose as stated by the author is to awaken an interest in Mexico and Central and South America as missionary fields. Mr. Brown was for sixteen years a missionary in Mexico. The subjects treated cover the history of the South American countries, dealing in alliterative fashion with the Pagans, the Papists, the Patriots, the Protestants, and the Present Problem. The aboriginal situation is described in the first chapter with the illustration of pagan beliefs and customs, and especially the resemblances of the early South American religious practices to many of those prevalent in Romanism. Under the second head, the splendid work of the early Catholic missionaries is described with the consequent wealth and power of the church, and the corruption and failure which followed. The political situation in these South American countries, which has led to such repeated revolutions, is the theme of the third chapter, which sets forth the causes of the awakening, the fight for independence, and the struggle for religious liberty. These earlier chapters lay the foundation for the discussion of the real problem of Protestantism and its present missionary methods and duties. The writer believes that far greater interest ought to be taken in South and Central America as mission fields than is at present evident, either on the part of the missionary societies or of the Church at large. In the entire book, the author appears as an advocate. At the same time, he is eminently fair to Romanism, whose many virtues are not to be overlooked in the condemnation of its faults. No one can fail to be struck on reading this book with the fact which every student of the original races of the country has observed, namely, that Romanism invariably takes the practices of paganism and employs them, using only a different nomenclature, so that the feasts of the pagan gods become the feasts of the saints and the virgin, while the old sun dance is rechristened under the name of St. John. Almost every element of the old pagan faith can be found in Romanism with a change of label and a slight adaptation to Catholic ideas. The work closes with a number of excellent suggestions for missionary work and with a bibliography.

"With the Tibetans in Tent and Temple," by Susie Carson Rijnhart, M. D.; Fleming H. Revell company. Not since Livingstone recorded his travels in Africa has a more interesting book of its kind appeared than that of Mrs. Rijnhart, with the above title. It is a narration of fact surpassing fancy. The art of book-making consists in having something to say and saying it simply. Dr. Rijnhart had a most extraordinary experience to relate and tells it with a simplicity that is the very artlessness of art. If she has any fault at all it is that of telling an extraordinary story too modestly. Many a thrilling incident is compressed into a short paragraph. As her expedition to the lone, wild inner-land of that least known of all countries was undertaken with a transcendent purpose, the reader soon discovers that purpose revealed in the narrative. It is made abundantly evident that Dr. Rijnhart never sought adventure for adventure's sake.

Tibet lies on a high plateau in Central Asia. It is a nominal dependency of China, paying tribute to the "Son of Heaven," making a show of yielding to her authority on the border, but acting independently under the sway of the Grand Lama in the interior. This high potentate is a sort of Buddhist pontiff and the sacred city of Lhasa, where he lives surrounded by great Lamaseries of monks, is not allowed to be desecrated by the foot of unbelieving foreigners. The people of the inner-land are nomads and trade with China is carried on by means of great caravans. Every trader is a robber when away from home.

After a few years of residence on the border, Mr. and Mrs. Rijnhart undertook a pioneering missionary trip into the interior and succeeded in piercing almost to the sacred capital. It was a picturesque country through which they traveled, with great mountains, rolling plains, blue inland seas and wild, roving peoples. Hospitality is a sacred virtue among them, and all would have gone well but for the prevalence of brigandage, which is a sort of by-occupation. In quick succession came the loss of all their goods; the death of their child; the desertion of their guides; and then the climax of tragedy, the murder of Mr. Rijnhart. After that followed two months of sleeplessness and hardships and dangers, rendered doubly perilous by the position of a woman in a country which forbids her not only consideration, but even courtesy.

Interwoven throughout this interesting volume are pen pictures of landscapes, dwellings, strange peoples, and customs, these serving as a most effective background for the moving drama. The description of battles during the Mohammedan rebellion; of a residence within the walls of a great Lamaserie; of the religious beliefs and ceremonies of the far-famed Buddhist Lamas, and of numberless remarkable things in connection with a land so little known, are of themselves sufficient to make the volume well worth perusing. Every reader will lay it down impressed with the heroic element in Christian missions. He will also have his hope fortified in the future of missions, even in such hard fields as Tibet. He will marvel at the consecration of one who could give herself to a people who had despoiled her of the chief treasures of her life. Dr. Rijnhart's desire to return to Tibet in spite of all the tribulations endured is of the spirit of Christ. It was this spirit of ready sacrifice that rendered the early Christians gloriously triumphant.

Dr. Whyte is probably the best of all Bible character students, and is the author of several volumes of studies similar to those which the present book contains. Earlier volumes have given studies in characters from Adam to Achan, from Gideon to Absalom, and from Achitophel to Nehemiah. The present one deals with such characters as Joseph and Mary, Simeon, Zacharias and Elizabeth, John the Baptist, Nicodemus, Peter, John, Matthew, Lazarus, Mary Magdalen, and several of the people met in the ministries of Jesus' life, such as the widow with the two mites, the woman with the issue of blood, the penitent thief, Annanias and Sapphira, and the Ethiopian eunuch. Dr. Whyte has an admirable faculty of getting at the heart of a character and interpreting it to us. The studies are both historical and devotional and furnish admirable material for private perusal or family devotion.

No surer way could be found to make glad the heart of a boy than to put into his hands the dainty book entitled "Everyday Birds," by Bradford Torrey. It is a square 12 mo. volume of 106 pages, and is published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., which is guarantee for the excellency of its workmanship. It sells at a dollar. The twelve colored plates with which it is illustrated are copies of Audubon's famous pictures. The text of the book consists of elementary studies of bird nature by one who has the eye and the heart of a naturalist. It is just the kind of book to slip into one's traveling bag when starting out on a vacation. It ought to be read when lying prone on the grass in some shady grove, listening to the songs of the birds.

"The Jewish Encyclopedia" is the title of a large and important work which is being issued by the publishing house of Funk & Wagnalls Co. It will consist of ten volumes and when completed will be a monument of modern scholarship. Some 400 American and European scholars are engaged in its preparation. The estimated cost will not fall short of $750,000. In its scope the book includes the history, religion, literature and customs of the Jewish people from the earliest times to the present day. The first volume has just been issued.

"From the Dream of My Youth," by E. P. Tenny, Lothrop Publishing Co. We make two quotations, which are sample bits of practical wisdom, strung upon a slender thread of narrative.

"It is as wicked to worry as to blunder. It is as foolish to look behind despairing as to fail in foresight."

"The world much begrudges the space to record its woes; but he who has joys to tell finds room enough. Our world is so made up that sorrow is not artistic unless the cloud be turned to the sun to show the silver lining."

"The Tempting of Father Anthony" is the title of a new novel by George Horton which A. C. McClurg & Co. announce for publication Oct. 1. It is an idyllic love story, the scenes of which are laid in Argolis, where Mr. Horton spent his summers during his residence in Greece. The illustrations are being made by Otto J. Schneider of Chicago.

With the present widely diversified endeavors of the settlement Miss Jane Addams finds her life largely full. She has written and lectured widely, however. Just now she is writing a book upon "Democracy and Social Ethics," and her publisher already has made the announcement of it. She is a contributor to the magazines and has delivered courses of lectures at the University of Chicago, at the University of West Virginia, and at the University of Iowa. In university extension work she has appeared on the platform in numerous cities.

"A Religion That Will Wear" is the title of a book which is attracting considerable notice in England. It is a "layman's confession of faith, addressed to agnostics by a Scottish Presbyterian," whose identity is as yet unknown. An American edition of the book will be issued by Thomas Whitaker.

LITERARY NOTES.

Adjustable Authors.—The most cheerful author, Samuel Smiles; the noisiest, Howells; the tallest, Longfellow; the most flowery, Hawthorne; the holiest, Pope; the happiest, Gay; the most amusing, Thomas Tickell; the most fiery, Burns; the most talkative, Chatterton; the most distressed, Aken-side.—Chicago Times-Herald.

Marie Corelli is said to be the literary lion of Stratford-on-Avon. She lives in a large and extremely pretty house. She is very popular in the famous little Warwickshire town, and there is little doubt, one of her admirers says, that a great many of its people are far better acquainted with "The Mighty Atom" than with "Hamlet."

Responding to the toast of "The Ladies" recently at the Authors' club dinner in London, Mrs. Humphrey Ward asserted that there was something to be said for the "novel with a purpose" and confessed to belonging to that denomination of writers that did not always bear a good name. She said that the artist is no worse, but better, for stepping outside the limitations of art sometimes for the sake of social service.

In the new Encyclopedia Biblica Professor George Adam Smith expresses a "hope that nobody will go to Beersheba looking for the seven wells which gave name to the place. But recently Professor George L. Robinson of McCormick Theological seminary has found the seven wells and prints in the Biblical World a description of six of them with photogravures of them.

In a letter to a friend in 1893 Huxley wrote regarding certain honors which he had been assisting to bestow on the memory of a departed Englishman whom he did not particularly care for "Whatever the man might be he did a lot of first-rate work, and now that he can do no more mischief he has a right to his wages for it. If I only live another ten years I expect to be made a saint myself. 'Many a better man has been made a saint of,' as old David Hume said to his housekeeper when they chalked up 'St. David's street' on his wall."

Mr. Winston Churchill announces that he has about completed another historical novel, and that Abraham Lincoln, U. S. Grant and William Tecumseh Sherman are to figure in it. Mr. Churchill would doubtless have chucked Jeff Davis, Robert E. Lee and Stonewall Jackson in it if he could have had a little more time. It is reported, however, that he received the following telegram from his publishers a few days ago:

"Chop it where you are. Mob outside howling for the new book. We can't hold out much longer. First edition, 960,000 copies."

The author of "The Helmet of Navarre" is a young lady who is only a little more than 20 years old. The story has an average of two bloody fights to the page. It is alleged that Miss Runkle fainted the other day when her mother's cook cut her thumb with the potato knife.

Some publisher is missing a golden opportunity in neglecting to bring out "The Love Letters of Brigham Young."

Mary E. Wilkins has written a love song containing this stanza:

"The honeysuckle is red on the rock;
The willow floats over the brook like a feather;
In every shadow some love lies hid,
And you and I in the world together."

The latest report from New Jersey says, however, that the doctor is still impatiently waiting.

A New York publisher of novels gives some points of interest. He thinks that 40,000 to 50,000 is a good sale for a novel. A book is worth having if it sells a clear 2,500 copies, and the ordinary book is not a loss to the publisher, save in time and trouble, if it sells a thousand copies. It is now rare in America to buy the copyright of a book. An average number for a first edition is 1,500, and when a book reaches a sale of 5,000 it is well worth advertising.

Mr. Benjamin Kidd, who has maintained a long silence since the publication of his successful book, is engaged upon another, which he hopes to have ready for publication in the autumn of next year.

A. Henry Savage Landor, the author of "In a Forbidden Land," has written a book on the recent disturbances in China. He was in Tientsin when it was taken, entered Peking with the relieving forces and was the first European to enter the forbidden city as a guest by the side of the Russian general.

Tolstoi is finishing a new novel to be called "Who Is Right?" It will be highly sensational and a sort of complementary work to "Resurrection."

"Impostors Among Animals" are so numerous and so clever that Professor William M. Wheeler's illustrated article on their tricks and devices will probably be a revelation to most readers of the July Century. Some insects, it seems, could give points to Sherlock Holmes.

Mr. Morley's life of Gladstone is so far advanced that the American publishers have been able to decide on the form in which they are to issue it. The American edition will be in two volumes, while the English one may be in three, though the point is not settled.

The lapse of copyrights is causing a boom in George Eliot's works. Three new editions of "Adam Bede" have appeared in barely more than as many weeks, and there are more to follow.

A new book by Andrew Lang will be published. It is entitled "Magic and Early Religion," and contains a series of criticisms of recent speculations about early religion. Other essays deal with the latest anthropological research in the fields of religion and magic.

Messrs. Frederick Warne & Co., New York, will issue during the coming season:

A new and powerful romance by Silas K. Hocking, "The Fate of Endiloe," a Cornish story written in this author's best style.

"Kitty's Victoria Cross," a new story by Robert Cromie, author of "A Plunge Into Space," "For England's Sake," "The Crack of Doom," etc. The incidents of this bright and vigorous story take place principally in a little country town in the North of Ireland.

A new edition of "Bootles' Baby; a Story of the Scarlet Lancers," and "Houp-la!" by John Strange Winter. Profusely illustrated. In one volume. 8vo., paper covers.

"The 'Bridge' Manual," by the foremost English authority and expert, John Doe. An illustrated practical course of instruction and complete guide to the conventions of the game. With illustrated hands of actual play printed in red and black.

"The Queen: Her Life and Reign." By the late L. Valentine. Brought up to date and profusely illustrated.

General Church News

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CHRISTIAN UNION CONVENTION.

At Winona Lake, Ind., July 24-29, gathered in thirteenth annual convention the Young People's Christian Union of the United and Associate Reformed Presbyterian churches. The attendance was about 2,000. There was much satisfaction in the fact that Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman had so far recovered from his recent serious illness as to be able to give the address of welcome. He also spoke on "Prayer" on Thursday evening, attracting the largest audience of the convention, and on Friday evening on the value and joy of a spirit-filled life. These efforts were apparently too much for his strength, as after the latter service Dr. Chapman suffered from another attack of heart trouble.

The Bible Studies of Dr. Wilbert W. White of Montclair, N. J., were particularly helpful. The "Quiet Hours" were conducted by Mr. S. D. Gordon of Cleveland with such themes as "Keeping Tryst," "The Greatest Outlet of Power," and "The Passion for Winning Souls." A series of morning addresses on Bible examples were given by Dr. Joseph Ayle of Xenia Theological Seminary.

The official reports showed that the Union had 1,100 societies, with a membership of 40,000 United Presbyterians and 20,000 from the Reformed Presbyterians, principally in the southern states. Nearly five thousand members of the societies have pledged themselves to give to religious work and benevolence one-tithe of their incomes. Treasurer E. K. Marquis reported a total of $38,600 pledged toward the tenth anniversary fund of $50,000. Of this amount $32,700 has been paid.

The following national officers were elected: President, Millard McMurdock of Marissa, Ill.; recording secretary, Mary J. Stewart of Philadelphia; press secretary, John A. Craford of Chicago; treasurer, E. K. Marquis of Indianapolis; junior chairman, J. A. Crosby of Aurora, Ill. W. C. Nicoll retired as president, and will soon leave for Rawal Pindi, India, as one of the faculty of the Gordon Memorial college, the donors of which are Miss Ina Law Robertson and Miss Eleanor C. Law of Chicago.

"Missionary Night," the principal address was by Dr. Alexander Gilchrist, at the close of which a special offering of $800 for mission work was made. Thursday afternoon was devoted to the subject of temperance, Rev. Chas. F. Wishart of Allegheny, Pa., and Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts making powerful addresses. The latter's was entitled "National Hopes and Perils at the Crossing of the Centuries." A college jubilee convocation with several speakers, and various conferences on Sunday school work, parish problems, tithe giving, etc., were helpful features of the convention. The climax was reached on Sunday night in the address of J. Campbell White, just returned from five years' work in India as international field secretary of the Y. M. C. A. The devotional and spiritual tone of the convention was particularly noted. After next year the meeting will be held biennially.

THE BROTHERHOOD OF ST. ANDREW.

It was unfortunate that the first experiment of a midsummer convention for the Brotherhood of St. Andrew was tried in such an unusually heated season as the present has proved to be. It was hardly a fair test as to its success. Hitherto the convention has met in September or October. Another unfortunate circumstance was the coincidence in time of the celebration of the two-hundredth anniversary or the founding of the city of Detroit. Yet this very fact demonstrated the fidelity of the Brotherhood men. To attend closely to business on hot days and nights when unusually attractive floral and electrical parades were passing in the streets, at least indicated the earnestness of their purpose.

To some the showing at this convention appeared discouraging because its membership roll is not as large as formerly. But in quality it is stronger than before for dead material has been cut off and the spiritual growth is noticeable. Fifteen years have developed strength of purpose which recognizing certain weaknesses set itself in this convention to devising and working out remedies.

A new statement of the Brotherhood object was accepted and will be submitted for discussion and for final action next year. It reads as follows:

"The sole object of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew is the spread of Christ's Kingdom among men, especially young men, and to this end every man desiring to become a member thereof must pledge himself to obey the Rules of the Brotherhood so long as he shall be a member. These rules are two. The Rule of Prayer is to pray daily for the spread of Christ's Kingdom among men, especially young men, and for God's blessing upon the labors of the Brotherhood. The Rule of Service is to make at least one earnest effort each week to lead some man nearer to Christ through his Church."

Bishop Codman of Maine gave the charge and it fitted the need of the hour. His topic was "The Call of Jesus." Here are one or two of his points: "If the cause of Jesus is to be our cause we must learn to look at the world as Jesus sees it.... In a real sense you as well as the clergy are mediators between God and your fellowmen. If you do not keep up your prayers for your particular man, be prepared to fail. You will lose your man, you will be false to him, and you will grieve the heart of the Master."

"The Brotherhood Need" was strongly dealt with in an address by Mr. Edmund Billings of Boston and Mr. N. Ferrar Davidson, president of the Brotherhood in Canada. Some pointed questions were put by the first-named: "Do you know anything about the questions or the conditions which are keeping hundreds of thousands of men and women out of the Church? Do you consider these questions as outside your consideration as Christians and Brotherhood men? Let no man persuade you that in any department of life, there is no room for Christ and his example. Business is business only as it is God's business. Politics is politics for you only when the example of Christ is applied to its regeneration." Mr. Davidson drew lessons of humility, persistency and personal touch from the life of St. Andrew, who kept himself informed about local circumstances and when the occasion arose was the man for the hour; he had a workable suggestion.

Bishop Hall gave the address in preparation for the celebration of the Holy Communion which was at 6:30 o'clock Friday morning. There was something thrilling in the sight of such a number of men—sufficient to fill every pew in St. John's church, participating at this sacred service.

The business session was a long and thorough one. Difficulties were faced and discussed. Failure of a large number of the Chapters to report to headquarters so that it is not known whether they are alive or dead resulted in the decision to cut off 442 of them with their estimated 4,000 members.

"The Young Man's Way" was a live subject in the hands of Mr. James H. Houghteling and Rev. Dr. W. C. Richardson. In a talk on "Responsibility for the Boy," Rev. Endicott Peabody of Groton, Mass., indicated considerable practical knowledge of his subject. He said the curse of today among boys is loafing. The annual sermon was delivered by Rev. Dr. J. H. McIlwaine of Pittsburgh, in which perhaps the most telling sentence was this: "You cannot lift another on to the rock unless your own feet are already planted there." Brotherhood work in Japan and the West Indies occupied one afternoon and special work such as "Visiting," "Bible Classes" and "Prison Work" took the time on Saturday evening. In between those we have mentioned were several other good addresses of which we cannot make specific record. H. D. W. English remains president of the Brotherhood in the United States and N. Ferrar Davidson in Canada.

CHICAGO AND VICINITY.

Rev. William A. Bartlett of the Kirk Street church, Lowell, Mass., has been called to the pastorate of the First Congregational church, as successor of the lamented Dr. Goodwin. Mr. Bartlett was born across the street from the first church edifice and has known its history well.

The fifth annual session of the Illinois School for Primary and Intermediate Sunday School Workers has been held at the Second Presbyterian church during the past week. Practical subjects were discussed and model lessons given.

Mrs. Cyrus H. McCormick has promised $30,000 to establish a fellowship fund in McCormick Theological Seminary, which will be used in sending members of the senior class to Europe to continue their studies. Mr. Stanley McCormick gives $15,000 for library purposes.

Rev. Dr. Adam Miller, one of the oldest Methodist ministers in the United States and president of the "Old Guard," a band of physicians in which eligibility to membership depended upon thirty years of active practice, entered into rest July 29.

Work has been begun on the new church for the Presbyterians of Oak Park. The seating capacity will be 600 with provision for another 600 when needed. In the basement will be a dining room, kitchen, toilet and cloak room. In the rear of the main auditorium will be Sunday school, lecture and class rooms. The pastor's study will be on the same floor. The total cost will be about $50,000. Rev. Chas. Hoyt, D. D., is pastor.

Plans have been completed for the new Baptist church at Chicago Heights. The pastor, Rev. George Armour Fair, considers that they provide for a church specially adapted to the need of the town. The auditorium will seat 600. Lecture room, pastor's study, secretary's office, reading rooms and library, baptistry, etc., will be on the first floor. In the basement will be Sunday school rooms, arranged to accommodate four classes in the evening night schools, which will be opened in connection with the church work this fall for the benefit of the young men and women employed in the factories during the day. The basement will also comprise kitchen and dining-room and gymnasium supplied with latest appliances, locker-rooms, and baths.

The first of a series of night gospel meetings, which will continue for thirty days, took place July 28 in a big tent at Western avenue and Lubeck street, under the auspices of the four leading churches of the vicinity. In spite of the rain, fully 800 persons assembled under the canvas.

The new Bethany Presbyterian church, Humboldt boulevard near Cortland street, Rev. Charles A. Wilson, pastor, was opened to the public for the first time Sunday, July 28, services being held in the basement. The work on the auditorium will be completed in a few weeks.

The tent meetings of the Avondale Presbyterian church have drawn large congregations and the pastor, Rev. C. B. Beckes, expects good results. On August 11, the Ridgeway Avenue church will begin a series of tent meetings.

Immanuel Baptist church, Rev. Dr. Johnston Myers, is now sustaining six missions and has about 2,500 Sunday-school scholars enrolled; sometimes more than 1,700 are present on a single Sunday. The pastor has baptized about 150 since Jan. 1st. The church building is kept open every day in the year.

Rev. John T. Christian has received 125 into the membership of the La Salle Avenue Baptist church during the year. It is understood that the People's church of London, England, has invited Mr. Christian to preach there for two months at some future date, not yet determined.

Rev. Camden M. Cobern of Denver, Colo., is to succeed Rev. Robert McIntyre at St. James' Methodist Episcopal church. It is a somewhat singular fact that this is the second time Mr. Cobern has succeeded Mr. McIntyre in the pastorate.

Covenant Baptist church has had a good year. Besides paying all expenses and having a balance on hand, $1,300 has been paid off on the mortgage, and a similar amount has been contributed for benevolent purposes. The interior of the building has been renovated, the walls frescoed, and a new carpet laid.

Chicago was represented at the St. Andrew's Brotherhood convention in Detroit by eight of the clergy and by about forty lay delegates, foremost among them James L. Houghaling, father of the organization; E. P. Bayley, ex-president of the Chicago Church club; B. F. Tuttle, the present president; and Major Taylor E. Brown, its secretary.

Rev. W. S. Braddan, for five years pastor of the Second Baptist church at Detroit, has accepted a call to the Berean Baptist church, 4811 State street.

Grace English Lutheran congregation has rented a hall at 330 West Sixty-third street, half a block west of Wentworth avenue, where services will be conducted hereafter Sunday morning and evening. The church is in charge of Rev. Guido Schuessler.

The Ravenswood Y. M. C. A. is to have a new $50,000 home. Mr. R. J. Bennett has offered $15,000 toward it, and a lot has been bought at Wilson and North Hermitage avenues. The new structure will be of brick, with stone trimmings. On the ground floor there will be one or two stores, the rentals of which will go toward the general expenses. Gymnasium, baths, a swimming pool and an assembly hall with a seating capacity of 800 will be included. On the third story will be a dormitory for members of the association. Sixty men will be accommodated, and the income will probably more than pay the running expenses.

The corner-stone of a church for the Mission of St. John, an off-shoot of St. James' parish, was laid by Bishop Anderson July 21. For the lot, at the corner of Vine and Reese streets, $4,500 has been paid, and the building will cost nearly $8,000. The situation, just off Clybourn avenue, offers great opportunities as a mission field. The congregation owes much to the deep interest taken in the work by prominent laymen of St. James's, notably Messrs. Arthur Ryerson and W. Mills. The priest-in-charge is the Rev. H. C. Granger.

Baptist.

The 118th session of the Dover Baptist association met July 24 at Richmond, Va. The report of the committee on the state of the churches concluded thus: "We find that in sixty-eight churches there have been during the last twelve months forty pastoral changes. Ten churches that were pastorless a year ago now have pastors. So far as we can find, only five are at present without pastors. We do not see how it is possible, with such frequent changes of pastors, to materially strengthen the churches."

Rev. Ray Palmer has resigned his pastorate of the Second church, Portland, Ore., having been there five years. Under his pastorate a large church debt has been paid, the audi-

GRAPE-NUTS AND CREAM.*An Ideal Hot Weather Breakfast.

The selection of food for hot weather is an important question. We should avoid an excess of fats, cut down the butter ration and indulge more freely in fruits and food easy of digestion. One meat meal per day is sufficient during hot weather.

An ideal breakfast is Grape-Nuts, treated with a little cream (which, by the way, supplies the necessary fat in a very digestible form) a cup of Postum Cereal Food Coffee, hot, or if cold, it should have a little lemon juice squeezed in; then some fruit, either cooked or raw; also perhaps two slices of entire wheat bread with a very thin spread of butter. A breakfast of this sort is so perfectly adapted to the wants of the system that one goes through the heat of the day in comfort as compared with the sweaty, disagreeable condition of one improperly fed. Once put in practice, the plan will never be abandoned during the hot days, for the difference in one's personal comfort is too great to be easily forgotten.

torium of the new house beautifully furnished, and a pipe organ bought and paid for. This church numbers 354 members, united, spiritual-minded, and aggressive. Mr. Palmer goes to Chillicothe, Mo.

The First church, Quincy, Ills., reports 100 additions since October 1.

About fifty per cent of the students become school teachers and ten per cent enter the ministry. Twenty-six per cent of the men graduates of Drury college have entered the ministry.

of the evening service until September 1st.

Before leaving for his vacation the pastor of the First church, Dubuque, Iowa, Rev. Frank G. Smith, sent out a mid-summer greeting to his people in which he outlined the work of the coming year. He proposes to decline all outside calls the coming year, giving his whole time and strength to the church. Among his plans for work are efforts to reach men, organization of the forces by wards, special meetings and systematic Bible study.

Since the going of Rev. F. W. Dean to Red Cloud, Neb., over three years ago, forty-five have been added to the church, $357 given to benevolence, $3,475 raised for home expenses. The pastor has made 1,033 pastoral visits, has preached 476 sermons, had thirty-one funerals, eleven weddings and nineteen baptisms, and has driven over 1,800 miles in carrying on the parish work.

Rev. S. S. Mathews recently entertained the sixty-three persons who have united with the church at Danielson, Conn., during the two years and a quarter of his pastorate. Of the sixty-three thirty-one had come on confession. The ages ranged from twelve to eighty-five. Twenty-six were males, thirty-seven females. It was resolved by the assembled company that they would seek to live as if they were alone responsible for the progress of the kingdom of God in the town. They took for their motto, "Be filled with the Spirit."

SURE TO ASK.

The Kind of Coffee When Postum Is Well Made.

"Three great coffee drinkers were my old school friend and her two daughters.

They are always complaining and taking medicine. I determined to give them Postum Food Coffee instead of coffee when they visited me, so without saying anything to them about it, I made a big pot of Postum the first morning, using four heaping teaspoons to the pint of water and let it boil twenty minutes, stirring down occasionally.

Before the meal was half over, each one passed up the cup to be refilled, remarking how fine the coffee was. The mother asked for a third cup and inquired as to the brand of coffee I used. I didn't answer her question just then, for I had heard her say a while before that she didn't like Postum Food Coffee unless it was more than half old-fashioned coffee.

After breakfast I told her that the coffee she liked so well at breakfast was pure Postum Food Coffee, and the reason she liked it was because it was properly made, that is, it was boiled long enough to bring out the flavor. I have been brought up from a nervous, wretched invalid, to a fine condition of physical health by leaving off coffee and using Postum Food Coffee.

I am doing all I can to help the world out of coffee slavery, to Postum freedom, and have earned the gratitude of many, many friends." Myra J. Tuller, 1023 Troost Ave., Kansas City, Mo.

There are 156 auxiliaries of the C. W. B. M. in Indiana. The state and general fund has received $10,196.55. Mrs. Lizzie W. Ross of Edwards, Miss., talked entertainingly on "The Southern Christian Institute." The Rev. Burris A. Jenkins gave an informal talk in the evening.

Episcopal.

Rev. A. W. Mann, himself a deaf mute, has for twenty-six years labored among the "silent people" of the towns and cities of the northwest and interior. He has preached 4,000 sermons, baptized 1,000 persons, visited nearly 100 deaf mute schools and united in marriage ninety couples who could neither hear nor speak. His "silent congregations" are small as he states that there are only about one deaf mute to 1,600 hearing people. They run from two in small towns to seventy-five in large cities.

On the Leech Lake reservation, Mrs. Mercer, wife of the acting agent, Captain W. A. Mercer, Seventh U. S. cavalry, has erected, with the help of some friends, a beautiful house of worship, capable of accommodating about 300 persons. The cost has been about $2,500.

a good attendance in its sixteen days' session. A new feature is the ministerial conference each forenoon in charge of Rev. J. A. Worden.

During the pastorate of Rev. Chas. F. Richardson at the First Presbyterian church, Great Falls, Mont., which has lasted somewhat over two years, ninety-three members have been added to the church, increasing the membership from 176 to 256. He has baptized 63 persons, and the Sunday school has increased from 140 to 253. The two missions have doubled in attendance. A debt of several thousand dollars was also lifted the first year and the church is now clear of debt. Besides this there has been over $9,000 subscribed toward the erection of a new church edifice, the first contract for which has been let. To the credit of Mr. Richardson it may be said that of this amount $7,493 was due to his efforts.

The consolidation of the Presbyterian Theological seminaries at Louisville and Danville into one institution at Louisville and the consolidation of Centre College, Danville, and Central University, Richmond, into one university at Danville, has been completed. Rev. W. C. Roberts, the present president of Centre College, has been chosen president of the new university. A strong faculty has been selected.

General.

Christian unity and co-operation are being manifested this summer in Manhattan and Brooklyn. In Harlem, one Congregational, one Baptist and two Presbyterian churches have united in Sunday services for ten weeks. Each of the four pastors preaches two Sundays while outsiders supply for the other two. The services are held in the two Presbyterian churches, five in each. In Brooklyn six neighboring congregations have joined forces for six Sundays—the Reformed Presbyterian, Congregational, Baptist and Methodist. Services are held in St. John's Methodist church and the preachers are Dr. Nehemiah Boynton of Detroit, Dr. Clifford of Buffalo and Dr. Pattison of Rochester seminary.

Trinity and Christ Congregational churches, together with the Presbyterian and Baptist organizations, all of Tremont, New York city, have made an arrangement covering a period of four years, which insures that the pastor of one of the churches will remain in Tremont during August of each year to meet the demands of the community for pastoral services.

At Independence, Iowa, eight churches are holding union evening services in Gas Park. They are very well attended.

The missionaries in India are realizing that the 25,000 famine children now in their care must be taught such industries as will render them self-supporting. Already in the one hundred homes established for these children the sound of the saw, the anvil, and shuttle are to be heard. Mr. D. C. Churchill, a graduate of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, has just sailed for Bombay. He is to found a system of model trade schools at Ahmednagne. Dr. Hume, one of the Congregational missionaries, has raised $25,000 for this purpose and the government will pay half the salaries of the teachers employed. An expert agriculturist, Mr. J. B. Nice, accompanies Mr. Churchill. The movement is entirely undenominational.

The annual report of Anatolia College at Marsonvan, Turkey, gives the number of students as 252, of whom 178 are Armenians and 74 Greeks. Nearly a hundred of these students are, to a greater or less extent, meeting their expenses by labor in the self-help department. The report says: "No institution enters upon the new century with a more open door before it than Anatolia College. It has not far from half of Asia Minor for its proper field, while pupils come also from Greece and other regions as distant. As concerns the number of candidates for admittance, nothing remains to be desired; the number of applicants has for several years been beyond the capacity of the buildings. The people of the land are more and more eager for education.

Two hundred ministers and mission workers from all parts of the country gathered at Indianapolis, Ind., July 22, for the national revival and camp meeting of the Pentecost bands of the United States. The services began at daylight and lasted till midnight, notwithstanding the heat.

Secular concerts and their concomitants were displaced in all the great parks of the Pittsburg region, Sunday, June 30. The Rev. S. Edward Young, pastor of the Second Presbyterian church, enlisted seven pastors of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Episcopalian, Baptist, Dutch Reformed, and United Presbyterian denominations, to preach at the various meetings, and it was estimated that forty thousand people, mostly non-church-goers, heard the Gospel. The plan is to be carried out more minutely in September.

The fifteenth annual convention of the Christian Missionary Alliance opened July 19 at Beulah Park, near Cleveland, Ohio. Devotional and workers' meetings, Bible teaching, children's and women's meetings, missionary addresses and meetings for inquiry and decision and preaching and evangelistic service on the program. Many noted speakers are taking part: Rev. A. B. Simpson, the president of the alliance; Rev. Henry Wilson, D. D., of New York; Rev. F. H. Swift of Philadelphia, Rev. Messrs. W. E. Shepard and W. F. Meminger of Chicago and others, with several returned missionaries.

A Trip to Toy-Land.

And how do you get to Toy-land?
To all little people the joy-land?
Just follow your nose
And go on tip-toes,
It's only a minute to Toy-land.

And ho! but it's gay in Toy-land,
This bright, merry, girl-and-boy land,
And woolly dogs white,
That never will bite,
You'll meet on the highways in Toy-land.

Society's fine in Toy-land,
The dollies all think it a joy-land;
And folks in the ark
Stay out after dark
And tin soldiers regulate Toy-land.

There's fun all the year in Toy-land,
To sorrow 'twas ever a coy-land;
And steamers are run,
And steam-cars, for fun,
They're wound up with keys down in Toy-land.

Bold jumping-jacks thrive in Toy-land;
Fine castles adorn this joy-land;
And bright are the dreams
And sunny the beams
That gladden the faces in Toy-land.

How long do you live in Toy-land?
This bright, merry, girl-and-boy-land?
A few days, at best,
We stay as a guest,
Then good-by, forever, to Toy-land!
—Eugene Field.

CHINESE MOTHER GOOSE

There are probably more nursery rhymes in China than in Europe and America together. Prof. Isaac T. Headland of Pekin University has gathered six hundred in two out of China's eighteen provinces. Many of these he reproduces in a "Chinese Mother Goose."

Mother Goose, he says, is an omnipresent old lady. She is an Asiatic as well as a European or American. I have rhymes from her in India. I have rhymes from her in Japan. She is in China. Chinese nursery rhymes have never been printed in the Chinese language, but they are carried in the minds and hearts of the children. Could any version of "Ladybug" be more delicious than this from the Chinese:

Ladybug, Ladybug,
Fly away, do;
Fly to the mountain,
And feed upon dew;
Feed upon dew,
And sleep on a rug;
And then run away,
Like a good little bug.

'There is no language in the world,' says Prof. Headland, "which contains children's songs expressive of more keen and tender affection than the Chinese nursery rhymes. They present a new phase of Chinese home life, which will lead the children of the west to have some measure of understanding of and sympathy with the children of the east."

As examples, take these rhymes:

Sweeter Than Sugar.

My little baby, little boy blue,
Is as sweet as sugar and cinnamon, too.

Isn't this precious darling of ours Sweeter than dates and cinnamon flowers?

Grandpa Feeds the Baby.

Grandpa holds the baby,
He's sitting on his knee,
Eating mutton dumplings,
With vinegar and tea.

Then grandpa says to baby,
"When you've had enough,
You'll be a saucy baby,
And treat your grandpa rough!"

THE WANDERING STAR.

A Love Story for Children.

H. Rea Woodman.

Once upon a time, in the waters of a mighty river, there lived a beautiful golden sunfish. All day long, he darted in and out of the sunshine, in and out of the shadow, the gayest little fish in all that mighty river. All night long, under the watching stars and the silent willows, he glided through the slumberous liquid silence. He was a contented, happy little fish, who considered the sparkling water the most beautiful of homes and the fishes the truest of friends. But one day—one day when the June silence lay over the broad-breasted river—a young girl, out boating with her lover, dropped a red rose on the water,—a beautiful rose, like a hundred velvet lips caught in one crimson kiss. The little fish, who was shyly watching the lovers, saw the rose and forgot everything else in his curiosity.

"I wonder what it is," he said to himself. "What a beautiful color! And so soft, like the shadow of willows! How gently it floats on the water! It does not swim, as I do; it has no eyes, nor no beautiful tail! I guess it is only just color—only just lovely color!"

Then he asked all the fishes about it, but they did not know. One said, "It is music," and another, "It is love," and another, "It is a little child." And one little fish, for whose opinion nobody cared, but who was always talking, said, "It is heaven, because it is beautiful and we have never seen it before!" Then said an old catfish,—a big, solemn mud-cattie, who knew everything but never told anything, and who lived in the mud and was wretched—"You little sillies, that is a rose, a red rose. They grow on lovely green bushes and smell very sweet, but they have dreadful thorns and they wither very quickly, and then, of course, they are nothing."

All day long the little fish thought of the beautiful rose and wondered; all night long he wondered and thought. And he wished that he might be a red rose and live in the world and see things.

"How dismal water is, to be sure," he said aloud, "and how pokey it is to be always swimming! I wish I were a rose—or a star! I am tired of being a fish and seeing but water!"

Then, as he was looking up into the star-set sky, very disconsolate and unhappy, a star dropped down on the water.

"Did I hear you say," asked the star in a sweet little voice, "that you wish you were a star?"

"I wish I was," said the sun-fish, with a sigh. "Yes, you did."

"Do you really mean it?" asked the star, slowly.

"Yes, I really mean it. I am tired of this stupid life,—of this great big, lonesome river!"

The star was silent a moment. Then he said, rather sadly, "If you feel that way about it, you won't do any good here. So come with me."

And suddenly the little fish felt himself in the air, as if he were going up, up, up, right into the cool, dark sky.

"Where are we going?" he asked.

"Up above the clouds, up among the stars," answered his guide. "How do you feel?"

"Oh, it is delightful! I feel very light and happy. And it's splendid flying so fast!"

"Yes, if you want to call it flying. We call it shining. Now, this is heaven, I hope you will like it. If you don't come to me and I'll change you again."

The little fish, whom we had better now call the Gold Star, could not tell whether his friend went away or disappeared. He only knew that he was surrounded by millions of stars, and so couldn't tell which was his friend. It didn't matter. How delightful it all was! The broad, deep darkness, the whizzing comets, the great, majestic planets! And, oh, what wonderful music! The Gold Star had never heard music, so he called it "the red color" because it was very beautiful, like the red rose. The red color came swelling and rolling from everywhere; he could not tell where it came from nor where it went; it never commenced, never ended—just seemed all through heaven! The Gold Star looked and listened and wondered and was very happy. After awhile a great light flooded the sky and, as it came, all the shining stars disappeared. He looked around—not a star in heaven! And though he waited and waited, the stars did not return to their places. The red color was all around him and the golden sunlight, dancing and gleaming. He tried to talk to the sunlight, but it would not answer. Then the Gold Star was very lonely and felt himself badly treated. He wondered what the fishes were doing and if there were any red roses in heaven; why his star friend had left him and if the sunlight never grew tired of shining?

Presently, a great storm arose. The red color grew loud and threatening, and the sunlight went very far away. The beautiful clouds grew black and heavy and clashed together. Then it grew very dark and the Gold Star could see nothing and could hear only the clouds clashing together. So he trembled alone in the darkness, and wished that he were a fish again, in the still, quiet water. That night, by the time the stars came back to their places the Gold Star was very frightened and tired of heaven. He determined to find his star friend and be turned into a sun-fish again. He determined to ask every star until he found his friend—his friend who had deserted him in heaven! It would, perhaps, take a very long time, and the Gold Star sighed as he thought of the red rose. So he started right away, and, flying to the nearest star, he said, "Did you make me into a star?"

"Who were you?" asked the star, pleasantly.

"I was a sun-fish," replied the Gold Star, dolefully.

"No," said the star. "I make only lilies into stars."

Then he asked another, who said, "No, I turn beautiful thoughts into stars." And the third said, "It is my duty to turn generous deeds into stars. I have nothing to do with fishes."

"Do you know where the star who turns fishes into stars can be found?" inquired the Gold Star, politely.

"No, I don't. It's very queer; I didn't know anybody did. But I suppose he's somewhere around."

Now, it was thousands of years ago that the poor little lonely Gold Star began his search. He is searching still, every night, always searching. He is never weary, for he remembers the red rose and takes courage. He goes so fast in his impatience and longing, that the children who do not know his story call him "shooting stars." But he is really the Wandering Star,—the only star who is tired of heaven. He may search for thousands of years yet, for he has to go to every star, until he finds the right one, and are there not many millions of stars?

The Chaperones.

Polly and Molly came out to play one morning, and brought with them their dolls, their garden tools and their twin kittens. These last were exactly alike, only Molly's wore a red necktie, and Polly's a blue one.

Polly and Molly were very much alike, too; and so were their dolls. They usually played together very happily. But today Molly wanted to play party, "with me for a shamprone," she said.

"What is that?" asked Polly, much surprised.

"Well, the minister's wife came to see mamma yesterday, and she said she was shamprone for some girls at a picnic. They kind of look after 'em, I think. Anyway, it must be nice, or the minister's wife wouldn't be it. I'll shamprone Arabella and Rose, and you can dig in the garden."

"I want to be shamprone for Rosa, my own child, myself," said Polly, decidedly.

"You can't, child," said Molly firmly, and with a superior air. "You don't know how."

Polly fired up at this.

"You always want to be the best of everything! And you are as selfish as the lions in Daniel's den," she cried, stamping her feet.

"You are the greatest child to get things twisted," said Molly laughing, while Polly got very red in the face. "Daniel didn't have a den, poor child."

There is no telling what would have happened next if Polly's kitten hadn't growled and spit at Molly's, and then the two rushed across the lawn to a hole in the fence. Polly's kitten jumped through this, and Molly's looked through anxiously from the other side, when—slap! came a soft gray paw through the hole, and struck Molly's kitten, who instantly slapped back.

"Well, will you look at Fly!" said Molly.

"And Spy, too," said Polly.

Then they ran and caught them, and sat down on the grass to give them a good lecture.

"Twins fighting! Whoever heard of such a thing?" said Molly. "It's perfectly scandalous!"

"I'm as 'shamed as I positively can be," said Polly, rubbing Spy's pink nose against Fly's.

"Kittens are very silly sometimes, I think, don't you, sister?" said Molly, dimpling at Polly.

"Kind of; exactly like girls sometimes," answered Polly, dimpling, too.

Then they looked straight ahead and blushed a little.

"I'll tell you what, let's play we're both shamprones. There's dolls enough and kittens, too, for that matter," said Molly, presently.

"Well, let's," said Polly, cheerfully.

And then they leaned over and kissed each other.

There was a tall woman weeding a flower bed near by who had been looking sorry, but now she smiled and looked glad.—L. E. Chittenden, in the Churchman.

The following version of a famous parable was told to a Punjab congregation by a native evangelist:

"There was a man going along a road, he was attacked by robbers, looted, ill-used, and thrown to the side of the road half-dead. A Mulla came by, but paid no attention to him, similarly a Pundit, but a Christian followed, he helped him; being a Christian he had liquor with him (! ! !) and restored him to consciousness."

It would be interesting to trace the psychological process by which the native evangelist arrived at this version. It would be interesting also to know if he made any converts.

This Bible is the same as the one described above, having the Self-Pronouncing and Combination features and all other helps and in addition is profusely illustrated and embellished with numerous phototype engravings from the paintings of the world's greatest masters, all drawn and engraved by the best artists, to illustrate the teachings of our Lord. They are printed separate from the text and make one grand panorama of pictorial embellishments that are as instructive and pleasing as they are ornamental and accurate.

The growing demand for a wisely and faithfully illustrated student's Bible has been fully satisfied by the introduction of our fine art edition of the Teachers' Bible. It combines every valuable feature of the usual teachers' Bible, with a wealth of descriptive and pictorial illustrations so superb as to distinctly separate this Bible from all others and place it in a class by itself. In artistic beauty it stands without a rival.

Each illustration is a speaking sermon, a gem of art, the handiwork of a master. The wonderful pictures not only beautify this sumptuous volume, but actually interpret and make more clear the grand old truths of the Sacred Word. This beautiful edition of the Bible is indispensable to all students and teachers.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES:

The Christian Century is published in the interests of essential Christianity. It is the organ of no party; the advocate of no ism. While welcoming the ascertained results of modern Christian scholarship, it stands for the great evangelical verities which are the foundation stones of the Christian system. It seeks to be tolerant in spirit, practical in aim, and warmly sympathetic towards all the present day problems of religious thought and life! It also aims at being at once a clearing house and medium of communication between the different denominations, so that they may by free and fraternal expression of opinion become better acquainted with one another and may be led to join forces in more aggressive work for the advancement of the Redeemer's Kingdom.

THE EVOLUTION OF AN EVANGELIST.

HIS striking phrase occurs in the preface to the new life of Henry Drummond. This biography has been written by Mr. Cuthbert Lennox, a young writer of great promise, whose name has become familiar in London and Edinburgh. His book is much smaller than the "official" life of Drummond by Dr. George Adam Smith; but it is safe to say that no one who admired that unique personality can afford to miss reading this interpretation of his career.

Mr. Lennox very happily lays most emphasis upon the fact that Drummond was supremely an evangelist. If the average man were asked for the ground of Drummond's fame, he would no doubt think at once of his teaching regarding science and religion and especially his interpretation of the doctrine of evolution. Possibly he might think also of those booklets by which Drummond became famous throughout all the land. But Mr. Lennox has put his finger upon the real meaning of Drummond's life as Drummond himself would have wished it to be understood; and this book is most valuable for the clear light in which it sets this predominant passion of Drummond's heart. While Drummond was still in his theological course, Mr. Moody and Mr. Sankey arrived in Edinburgh. Drummond was swept into the current of enthusiasm, was immediately discovered by Moody and persuaded to step out of his course for a year, and give himself to evangelistic work. From that time onwards the bringing of individuals to Jesus Christ was Drummond's chief joy in life.

It is no doubt a remarkable fact that Drummond could work with Moody, quite as remarkable as the fact that Moody could work with Drummond. For from the beginning Drummond aimed at a certain class of persons and believed that to reach them he must employ certain and in some senses peculiar methods. He was aware that amongst educated people and especially young people everywhere there was a shrinking from certain forms of doctrinal teaching and a fear of certain conventional methods of religious speech which savor of cant. He was also aware, as from first to last he unweariedly insisted, that the main obstacle to conversion is sin. His aim therefore was so to describe the claims of religion, the experiences peculiar to the Christian consciousness, the motives and purposes which lead to the great decision that he might win the attention of this large class of intelligent people. His addresses were unconventional in form while conventional, being simply Christian, in the result at which they were aimed. He once said to a gathering of workers, "In talking to a man you want to win, talk to him in his own language," and no man more sedulously set himself to find out the words that conveyed life to the consciences around him. Again, his biographer, and very rightly, emphasizes the fact that Drummond did not trust simply to the power of public address. His addresses, we are told, "only served as sweepnets to bring 'likely fish' within his reach. The personal encounter with the individual, the unraveling of the skein of a man's life, the attack in detail upon the obstacles between allegiance to Christ and a bad record and a sin-entangled or a doubt-distracted present—it was in these that he found his opportunity and did most enduring work for his Master." It is in the gentlest manner that Mr. Lennox refers later to a class of university men with whom Drummond's method failed to produce the fruit he expected. These were the men who had been brought up with prejudices against orthodox Christianity. They, it is feared, "imagined that they were adopting a new and less exacting form of Christianity when they accepted Drummond's advice, and rose to their feet in witness of their willingness and intention 'to go in for Christ.'" In such cases permanent results could hardly be looked for.

The three chief notes of Drummond's evangelistic teaching were: First, the terrific power of sin as a working force in the hearts of men. Drummond has sometimes been accused of passing lightly over the fact of sin. No accusation seems wider of the mark. He knew, as few evangelists have known, the inner story of shame in many hundreds of lives; and he was able to say with a confidence and an insistence which could hardly be surpassed that in all cases of resistance to Christ the real cause is not only sin but some one sin, which is loved and preferred to him.

Drummond's cure for sin was the power of the living Christ. Without attempting to discuss theologically the person of Christ and without emphasizing, even as we should think in an adequate degree, the atonement of Christ, Drummond yet spoke of Christ as of one now living close to human kind, omnipotent in every human life which yielded itself to him. It is a perpetual inspiration to read his own words or a description of his manner and enthusiasm, when he spoke of this absolutely sure cure for sin. He sought moreover so to speak of Christ as to stir in the hearts of young men a feeling of loyalty to him. Christ, as it were, put them on their honor, commanded them to be heroic, expected them to be what he would make them, soldiers worthy of himself.

And lastly, Drummond demanded decision for Christ from all men. Whether he spoke to a gathering of noblemen in a London ducal palace, or addressed intelligent working men in a Glasgow mission hall, or faced his own beloved 'medicals' at Edinburgh University, his addresses always bore down upon the will of the individual. Men were made to feel that they must act, act for their life, and act in relation to Jesus Christ.

There is a widespread desire for what many call a new evangelism. No one knows exactly what is meant by these words. There is room in our wide and varied world and there will be a constant demand for all kinds of evangelism. When God raises up the leaders of the next great movement and a wave of revival sweeps over America, no doubt the chief messenger will, like all his predecessors, have a distinctive note of his own; and after all he will probably leave untouched large classes of people who await their own messenger whom God will send them. But it is safe to say that no movement will ever be known as evangelism, nor will anyone ever succeed in leading men and women into life eternal, unless there be made supreme and definite and overwhelming these three features of the evangelism of Drummond, the deathly power of universal sin, the greater power of the living Christ, and the urgent need of individual and instant surrender to him.

THE BURIED POUND.

IN all of the parables Jesus had one single point to impress by this apt illustration of misused possessions. The men who possessed more were an essential part of the picture, to furnish a contrast for the man who possessed little, but it is upon him that the attention is focused. His sin was in supposing that the thing committed to him was too small to be worth while. He evaded responsibility by digging into the earth and burying his pound. His judgment came swift in the day of his returning lord.

It is the single-pound people who give most trouble in the kingdom of God. They underestimate their own importance and the value of their services. Such a person may be a member of a family where an almost infinite variety of service could be rendered such as would prove helpful to the entire group, but the inclination to evade responsibility under the plea of small abilities grows tempting, and the family life goes unenriched of those numberless forms of service which it might otherwise have enjoyed. A church member regards himself as a man of one talent. He recognizes that there is a vast amount of work to be done in the Church, but he is always thinking of those whom he regards as more prominent and more competent. Instead of looking for the specialty which he can do better than any one else, he loses his life in evasions and excuses and brings nothing to maturity. The Church today is cursed by the indifference of the one-talent people. All the brilliant successes of more richly endowed or faithful souls are rendered only partially effective by reason of this inert and supine negligence in those who fancy that their limitation of power constitutes an excuse for indolence.

The great enterprises in which the Church and society seek to engage for the betterment of the world are attended with the same loss of power under the same plea. A man faces the obligation to use his efforts in behalf of a much-needed reform, temperance, social purity, good literature, the adequate housing of the poor, public parks, proper city government, the wise administration of public trusts, or whatever else lies at hand. He sees the need of effective service, and there are certain moments when the impulse rises within him to exert himself in the needed cause. But he comforts himself with the thought that he has but one talent, and that limits his power. He has only one vote, and he does not believe the cause can win with that alone. He therefore consents to complicity with wrong under the impression that it would be impossible for him to bring in the reform which he, in a general way, favors. He does not want to lose his vote, and he therefore consents to lose his principle in order that he may save his vote for an unrighteous majority who are trampling on his principle every day. He has not learned the lesson that no man ever loses his vote who votes in accordance with his convictions, and that he who votes otherwise is sure to lose, not only his vote, but his manhood. The one-talent men who are hiding behind what they conceive to be the larger abilities of others, or the larger powers of majorities, could win any of the greatly-needed reforms in a single year if they would take their pound out of the napkin in which it is buried.

Nor must the one-pound man forget that the parable unconsciously flatters him by intimating that he can return his talent undiminished. This is impossible in the moral universe. An unused power shrivels. An unemployed faculty shrivels. The unemployed pound disappears. No fate can be worse, no rebuke too severe. Moreover, one needs to remember that the world's best work is done by one-talent people. There are few geniuses; there is a smaller number of real leaders, but the great majority of men are only ordinary folks at best, and yet they are the very ones that are accomplishing the world's noblest work. While we should pray that those men of genius by whom the world is enriched may "mount up with wings as eagles," and those who are true leaders of society may, by the grace of God, "run and not be weary," we should also not forget to pray for ourselves, the one-talent people, that by the power of the indwelling Christ and the ever-living Spirit, we may be enabled to "walk and not faint."

THE ELECTRIC CITY.

BY THE VISITOR.

ONE'S first impression at the Buffalo Exposition is of a charming architectural group tastefully displayed in a park which is itself a sort of miniature paradise, whose natural beauties would suffice without the adventitious help of art. To this natural loveliness the architect has added the glories of a noble series of structures which produce their own desired effect upon the beholder and tell the story of the design upon which the Exposition is constructed. It ought to be said at the very first that one does any great display of this kind grievous injury by persistently comparing it with other expositions in the past. The beholder needs to divest himself of every memory of other sights of the cosmopolitan order and let the picture before him tell its own story. It is natural, to be sure, that one should wish to compare what he sees with what he has seen, but it is only to do injustice to the one or the other, for each exposition possesses or is supposed to possess a unique and specific purpose, in accordance with which its construction has proceeded, and its impression is to be sought. There are no doubt features in which the Philadelphia Centennial, the Paris Expositions of 1888 and 1900, and the World's Columbian Exposition at Chicago in 1893, excelled this one at Buffalo, but the Pan-American has also its own points of superiority to all these, and the visitor must surrender himself to its unique and peculiar charm as though it were the first of its order.

Upon second thought the impression of the Buffalo Exposition is that of a Greater America displaying itself in this small space to the eyes of an interested world. We naturally give to the word "American" a certain provincial meaning, and can hardly understand the resentment which follows this limitation when its use is reviewed by our neighbors to the north and the south. The Canadian believes himself unjustly deprived of his rights when the Yankee speaks of himself as an "American," as though that were a differentiating title. Similar wrong is done the Mexican and the Central and South American, who are as much entitled to it as we are. It is only when we are face to face with these neighbors of ours, both in person and in the arts and industries of which they are the masters, at some such moment as that in which they are gathered with us in common fellowship at a meeting place like the Pan-American, that we recognize the expansion of American ideas to embrace all this far-stretching, double-shouldered continent. When the first bizarre sensation has left us as we enter the fine buildings at Exposition Park, we catch the hint of a composite civilization whose dominant elements are the noble Latin type of building, enriched by the wonderful color schemes which made the earliest type of American architecture, as seen in Mexico and Peru, the marvel of the first European visitors. It is, indeed, a Greater America that expresses itself in this Exposition, and its appropriate text finds inscription on the Propylæa in the hope "that the century now begun may unite in the bonds of peace, knowledge, good-will, friendship and noble emulation, all the dwellers on the continents and islands of the New World." It is this sentiment likewise which has decorated these noble structures with inscriptions to the memory of explorers, navigators, hunters, trappers, guides, missionaries, warriors, teachers, students, inventors, artisans, artists, builders, scientists and all others who have discovered, settled, civilized, protected, beautified and enriched this great land beneath the rays of the westering sun.

The Exposition has the value of a compact and unified whole. One need not wander far and wide as at other times to see so rich and suggestive an assembly of buildings and products. In this respect the Exposition at Buffalo is like a small but exquisite piece of workmanship. Paris and Chicago were both stretched over far greater territory, and the ensemble was difficult to obtain; but at Buffalo all is unified, and set in a fine and satisfying frame. Perhaps, from an artistic point of view, the least engaging feature is the color scheme of the buildings. Historically it is justified; and one inclines to the belief after reflection that even esthetically the same may be said; nevertheless the impression lingers from the first glance that there is something barbaric, not to say barbarous, in that strange and apparently inextricable confusion of reds, blues, browns and greens on buildings that one feels sure would be masterpieces of beauty if only allowed a covering of simple white. Still, even here one confesses that he is under the glamor of the White City at Chicago, that marvelous creation, the like of which has never been seen elsewhere and perhaps will never be seen again. There was something so mysteriously beautiful and entralling about that white vision of the Court of Honor that one felt it to be a kind of architectural prophet, suddenly appearing, like Elijah of old, to speak its message to a degenerate age, and then, like Elijah, taking its departure in a chariot of fire. But one cannot demand that buildings which are intended to be American in their type should conform to the color plan of the classic Greek structures which formed the flanks and facing of the Peristyle. Certain it is that with acquaintance the colors at Buffalo grow less distracting. It is unfortunate that they cannot last in their primal beauty. I remember to have seen these buildings in the winter months, when they were just emerging from the hands of their decorators, and the colors were fresh and vivid. It is perhaps something of that memory which helps me to appreciate the buildings now, though I cannot but regret they should have lost something of their freshness by the fading of the pigments.

Of course one finds here what he has found at every similar place. The exhibits of the Government, including the various departments, the mint, the postoffice, the army, the navy, ethnology, forestry and fisheries. Perhaps among these none attracts more attention than the fisheries exhibit, where three seals and an enormous sturgeon occupy the central tank, surrounded on all sides by aquaria with a great variety of fish life displayed. In the Court of State and Foreign Buildings there are the structures erected by most of the American governments, and in these are interesting displays. The Machinery Exhibits, the Horticultural Hall, the Graphic Arts and Mines Buildings, the Manufactures and Liberal Arts are all elaborate and rewarding. Music has not been forgotten, and a handsome structure has been erected for the holding of concerts and is one of the most artistic buildings on the grounds, containing one of the largest and finest church organs in the world. Here bands of music from both sides of the Atlantic give concerts daily, and numerous organ recitals serve as a rest and inspiration for the throngs who are constant visitors. A novel feature has been added at Buffalo in the erection of a Stadium for sports. This is beautiful in design, with a quarter-mile track and a ground area ample for the requirements of all the popular sports of the day. It has a seating capacity of 12,000, and in it college sports, such as baseball, football and lawn tennis are flanked by the less collegiate recreations like the Marathon race, cross-country runs, lacrosse, cycling, basket ball, shooting, Caledonian games, military manoeuvres, turning, cricket and bowling. This will make an excellent introduction to the Olympian games which are to be celebrated in Chicago two years hence.

Of course no exposition is supposed to be complete in these days without a Midway, and certainly the Buffalo managers have amply justified any expectations on this score; indeed, probably the Midway attracts the majority of the visitors. Perhaps the less said about these shows as a whole the better. Some of them are worth the seeing, and some are worthless, and more than this, vicious, not so much in their actual exhibits as in that which they promise. This matter of the Midway is getting to be a bit overdone. Every exposition, from a world's fair to a street fair, labors under the impression that it must have something corresponding to a Midway show. At Buffalo, apparently, the idea has been carried out to the limit, and what fails to get in under the direct control of the managers has nestled as close as possible to the grounds, under the protection and by the license of the city of Buffalo, and if reports are to be credited, outdoes all decency in its vileness. It is strange that the Christian sentiment of so fair and progressive a city as Buffalo does not demand the suppression of such plague spots as can only do discredit to the municipal name and cause a feeling of outraged decency in every visitor who finds the trail of the serpent so close to this beautiful scene.

But one is glad to turn from this phase of things to the crowning glory of the Exposition in its electrical display. It was to be expected that recent years would bring new wonders in electrical art, and the world is not disappointed as it gathers to behold this new marvel of the age. If the grounds are beautiful by day, they are a dream of paradise at night. Thousands of brilliant electric lights outline the entire series of buildings and form themselves into a frame, within which rises in almost spectral beauty the tall electrical tower, blazing on every side with its myriad lights, and pouring forth its apparently illuminated waters like a smaller Niagara. Indeed, that tower is a veritable pillar of fire by night, leading the hosts of progress in this new and wonderful century. And more mysterious and impressive still becomes the sight when one remembers that yonder, twenty miles away, plunging in the darkness of the night, there is that mighty cataract, the real Niagara, which, with tireless energy, is putting forth the mighty strength which finds expression in these far-flashing splendors. That power which was useless before and only served to amaze by its weird and awful grandeur is now harnessed and set to work, lighting the night, the sure prophecy that all the forces of nature are yet to be trained to do the will of man.

NOTES AND COMMENT,

It seems to have been the protests of the churches which influenced the legislators in Virginia to put the word "Christian" back into the Bill of Rights of that state. There was fear lest the constitution might fail of ratification if the wishes of so large a constituency were ignored.

Summer schools are well-nigh as thick as leaves in Vallombrosa this season. Even Porto Rico is up-to-date in this respect. A normal school to last ten weeks was opened July 15, and before that date 500 pupils enrolled their names. The acme of their ambition is said to be the holding of positions under the American administration.

Hull House is to be duplicated in Paris. One of the foreign delegates to the recent convention of the Young Men's Christian Association, Senator Siegfried, with this purpose in view, made a special study of the Chicago settlement during his stay in this country. Prominent statesmen and educators are supporting this movement, desiring for Parisian artisans the advantages such an establishment offers.

Those who seek to further the trade in liquors are realizing the force of the temperance spirit and the impetus it carries. The Wine and Spirit News says that "as illustrating how fanatics work along temperance lines it is but necessary to refer to the published reports of the work done by the Kansas State Temperance Union. During 1900 its expenditures for temperance work reached nearly $60,000, as against about $600 in 1896. Last year it printed and circulated 1,200,000 pages of literature, as against some 3,000 pages five years ago. It sent out over 14,000 written communications, instead of the 1,500 of five years ago."

More and more in high quarters is the value of temperance being recognized. Now the Treasury Department finds it necessary to forbid the admission of distilled spirits on board vessels of the revenue cutter service, except for medicinal purposes, and even this exception is carefully guarded, the order just issued requiring that all such shall be placed in charge of the medical officer, or if there be none, in charge of an officer selected by the commanding officer, who shall be responsible for its use and safe keeping. And in the Philippines, General Kobbe has rigorously prohibited the sale after August 1 of all beverages containing alcohol. He states that "the object of this order is to shield all native people in the department—almost exclusively Morros and Mohammedan or Pagan—from contact with habits from which they are yet free and from the class of persons that saloons attract; and to provide against disorders and, perhaps, hostilities, in the future." If such action had been taken by other military commanders, much of the reproach now lying on Christian nations for the curse which, with their civilization, they have carried to heathen races, would be removed.

Over the triple doorway of the Cathedral at Milan there are three inscriptions spanning the splendid arches. Over one is carved a beautiful wreath of roses, and underneath is the legend "All that which pleases is but for a moment." Over the other is sculptured a cross, and these are the words: "All that which troubles us is but for a moment." Underneath the great central entrance in the main aisle is the inscription: "That only is important which is eternal."

CHICAGO WORK AND WISDOM.

Chicago is soon to have another "new religion"!

The latest new religion is called "The Church of Man," and its doctrine is "Manology," to distinguish it forever from theology or "Godology."

The creed of "Manology" may be summed up in the one word, "justice," which contains all the principles of the golden rule. The constitution has been drawn up and officers appointed. "Any person who believes in a personal or supernatural God is barred from holding office in the board of the church."

This is, even for Chicago, deliciously naive and frank. But the list of officers is also a delightful surprise. It is to consist of the "minister," two "cardinals," one "bishop," and one "elder," who is a lady—which sounds rude. And yet the perfect humor of the whole thing is crowned by the announcement that the foundation of the new religion is postponed till September 15 at 7 p. m. ! It is not announced who is to be crucified.

The public is aware in a vague and general way that Mormons are very active throughout the country. No Gentile probably knows what their real aim is. The political power which they are beginning to exercise in states around Utah is very great indeed.

There are no less than twenty-two Mormon missionaries at work in Chicago at present. They profess not to advocate polygamy, nor to induce converts to go to Utah. They wish their church to be strongly established in Chicago itself.

Dr. Cyrus Northrop, president of the State University of Minnesota, recently addressed the Chicago Baptist Social Union and said some strong things about "the state of thought in the Church itself in reference to its own thought."

Dr. Northrop named four changes which, he said, have a common root in the "doubt as to whether God has ever had any communication with man." These changes were: First, a decay of belief in the supernatural. Second, the disintegration of the Bible. Third, new views respecting inspiration. Fourth, loss of the sense of accountability.

The theological seminaries in and near Chicago are almost all facing changes and taking steps forward. The McCormick family have been again very good to the Presbyterian school; and Professor Zenos ought to bring home some valuable additions to the library. Professor Charles H. Bradley has resigned his New Testament chair at Garrett. His refined presence will be much missed. The University School of Divinity is anxious about the health of its brilliant Professor Burton. The Congregationalists are about to welcome their new president, Dr. J. H. George, of Montreal.

The Social Settlements in Chicago always find summer time hard as well as hot and perplexing. The number of their resident workers is necessarily lessened, and yet the needs of the neighborhood remain constant.

Small bands have continued at work at the two leading settlements, the Chicago Commons and Hull House. In each case much interest and energy have been absorbed by the harassing task of building. Professor Graham Taylor hopes soon to see his fine structure completed, in which there will be room for all the Settlement's workers and their ever increasing departments of effort, as well as for the operations of the Tabernacle church.

Miss Jane Addams and her many helpers are adding considerably to the already extensive "plant" of Hull House. Under the gymnasium workshops are being built. The space for the Labor Museum, which has attracted so much interest and done good already, is being erected. An apartment house is also being built which will consist of fifteen houses. It ought to serve as an ideal for the property owners in that ward.

It appears that there has been great demand for relief work in the river wards this summer. The intense and prolonged heat produced much sickness among the very old and the very young. The beautiful grounds and buildings of Rockford College, our best western woman's college, have again been placed at the disposal of Miss Jane Addams and one hundred city young women have been living there, receiving instruction and enjoying rest in the beautiful city on the Rock river. It is good to know that while they pay board they belong to a class for whom this opportunity is a great boon.

Camp Good Will at Evanston is one of the happiest spots to be found anywhere during this vacation season. Its twenty-six tents accommodate about a hundred campers, who are taken out from the crowded city in relays once a week. One of the Evanston churches takes charge of the camp each day, furnishing the principal part of the food, and, what is still more important, giving to the tired mothers and the restless children the touch of personal interest.

The pleasure of the summer vacation will be enhanced if something has been done to secure an outing for the women and children who are sweltering in the overcrowded tenement districts. The Bureau of Charities, the Daily News Fresh-Air Fund, the Social Settlements, and various other agencies are engaged in this good work, and they are limited in their operations only by the amount of money which benevolently-disposed people put into their hands.

The sermon of Rev. W. B. Leach of Wicker Park M. E. Church on an "Adamless Eden" has given rise to a good deal of diversified comment. Dr. Leach is of the opinion that he will find heaven a very lonesome place because of the scarcity of man. He can sympathize with Sydney Smith, who, on looking upon a congregation composed largely of women, announced as his text the words, "O, that men would praise the Lord for his goodness." This will do well enough for a bit of pleasantry, but although men are not quite as much addicted to attendance upon religious services as women, they are not on that account necessarily less interested in religion. There are many things which account for their diminished attendance upon the services of the church, not the least being the absence of the manly note in much of the preaching of the day.

CONTRIBUTED

Some day, some day, or you, or I alone,
Must look upon the scenes we two have known,
Must tread the self-same paths we two have trod,
And cry in vain to one who is with God,
To lean down from the Silent Realms and say,
"I love you," in the old, familiar way.

Some day—and each day, beauteous though it be,
Brings closer that dread hour for you or me.
Fleet-footed Joy, who hurries time along,
Is yet a secret foe who does us wrong,
Speeding so gaily, though he well doth know
Of yonder pathway where but one may go.

CHRISTOLOGICAL TENDENCIES OF THE TIME.

W. J. LHAMON.

No. 1.—The Inductive Method.

IN Plato's opinion man was made for philosophy; in Bacon's opinion philosophy was made for man." This is one of the pregnant sentences of Macaulay. It is indicative of the great gulf between the deductive method of Plato and Aristotle among the ancients and the inductive method of Bacon and Faraday and Herschel and Humboldt among the moderns.

The deductive method assumes its premises and draws its conclusions in logical form, the conclusions being valid if the premises are well taken, and if also they contain no more and no less than is assumed. The conclusions may become premises for further conclusions, and these likewise for still further ones, indefinitely.

The inductive method, on the other hand, seeks facts, and collates them, and draws its conclusions from their significance. It is the method of all sciences, and of history and of criticism. It does not presume to say what ought to be on preconceived premises and logical conclusions, but reverently seeks to know what actually is. Facts are legal tender with it.

The deductive method is speculative; the inductive is practical. The deductive has borne fruit in philosophies that have perished one by one, or that have been modified out of recognition by further applications of the same method, so that Socrates felt constrained to say, "Men philosophize only that they may prove the futility of philosophy." The inductive method has borne fruit in a myriad of practical ways; it is the mother of scientific progress, and historical criticism, and industrial development. It is made for man; it seeks the good of men. Its outcome is to place man over all the works of God.

"The ancient philosophy," Macaulay affirms, "was a treadmill, not a path. It was made up by revolving questions, of controversies which were always beginning again. * * * Every trace of intellectual cultivation was there except a harvest. There had been plenty of ploughing, harrowing, reaping and threshing; but the garners contained only smut and stubble."

For centuries Christianity suffered by reason of the ascendancy of the deductive method. The old Greek philosophies brought their fruitless questions to it and forced them upon it, while the spirit of their speculations ran riot all through and through the sweet and holy mysteries that had once been the objects, not of idle theorizing, but of a reverent and working faith. Bacon himself speaks of "the ill-starred day" in which "an alliance was stricken between the old philosophy and the new faith."

"In the fifth century Christianity had conquered Paganism, and Paganism had infected Christianity." This is true to the extent that theology, as it is called, is in reality the application of pagan philosophy to Christian mysteries, while dogmatism, the concomitant of theology, is the application of pagan ideals of government to Christian polity. This has been admirably stated in a recent work by Dr. George C. Lorimer, especially in its application to the system of Augustine. "To him," Dr. Lorimer says, "Jehovah was essentially an infinite Cæsar, to question whose proceedings would be rebellion and blasphemy. The whole earth lay at the feet of the dread sovereign, sinful and helpless, devoid of all rights, and justly doomed to everlasting punishment. If he therefore should choose any, be they many or few, to be rescued from this awful condemnation, it would solely be of his compassion; and if he passed by others, or 'if the rest be hardened,' he would be within the bounds of his absolute authority and would commit no wrong against any one."

Let, therefore, a thorough disciple of Aristotle in philosophy and of Cæsar in government (Augustine was both) take hold of Christianity; let him assume that it is an unbaked clay in his hands, and that it is his province to fashion it into a vessel after his own ideals, and Augustinianism, with all its repulsiveness, more recently called Calvinism, is the result. And over the centuries from Augustine to Calvin, and Hodge, and the last Pan-Presbyterian Assembly, this system has brooded like a nightmare.

We have brought Augustinianism forward simply as an example in theology of the workings of the old Greek philosophical spirit and the old Roman governmental spirit. For the full result of their work we must turn to the Roman Catholic Church. There is perfection of speculation and perfection of dogmatism. In this perfection Christ is reduced practically to a nonentity. He is worshiped less than Mary and the saints, and is obeyed less than the Pope.

With the advent of the inductive method came our reverence for facts as against theories, for history as against speculation, for investigation as against tradition, and for Christology as against theology. With the advent of the inductive method we have made a complete "about-face" and we have hit upon a whole new world. We have dethroned tradition and we have enthroned investigation. What we call historical criticism is but the inductive method applied to history, and what we call literary criticism is but the inductive method applied to literature, and what we call biblical criticism is but the inductive method applied to the Bible.

Today the inductive method is paramount in every department of study and investigation. Its significance as regards the religious tendencies of our day is simply this: it deals with the realm of facts. It seeks what has been and is, and it aims to make the whole world of ascertainable fact and truth subservient to the interest of man. It is adapted to a humane and brotherly and practical age, and such an age can be but slightly influenced by any other system. It hungers for reality; it thirsts for the actual. Its demand is for that "which has been seen, and heard, and handled of the Word of Life."

Now Christ is a fact in our human history, the supreme man among men, and holier and mightier than man. In teaching he is matchless; in works he is miraculous; in character he is faultless. His sinlessness is a fact; his death is a fact; his resurrection is a fact; his commission is a fact; his Church is a fact. The Gospels and Epistles are facts, and they bring to us such a character as is unapproachable in any other literature and inimitable in any age or nation. His very presence commands attention. His supremacy in character is a challenge to the serious scientist and the honest historian, while the saintly seeker after utmost holiness in human form halts before him and proclaims that his quest is done.

The inductive method is compelling a return to Christ. Let it be granted that Jesus is such a fact as stated above; then history, laboring to know and to use for human good what has actually been in the world, cannot and will not ignore her mightiest man and holiest treasure. Social science, slowly working out better political and industrial conditions for men, cannot and will not turn away from her highest symbol of brotherliness and her chiefest champion of human rights. And above all, religion, striving to enrich the souls of men with the joy of forgiveness and a sense of an eternal fatherhood, cannot and will not release her hold upon the One who poured out his blood in benediction and pardon, and who in his resurrection has shown us that "Life is ever Lord of death

And Love can never lose his own."

If the triumph of the inductive method is assured, the triumph of Jesus is assured. If history succeeds, Jesus must succeed. If science fails not, Christ will not fail. If faith and forgiveness and prayer and a personal God are among the facts of religious science, and if they are necessities to the soul, then Jesus must forever stand as the object of faith, the forgiving One, the answerer of prayer, and the revealer of our Creator in the character of our God and Father.

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS IN INDIA.

W. M. FORREST.

IT WAS the last day in the old year. A traveler was enjoying, for the first time, a journey upon an Indian railway. There had been no room for his family in Calcutta when he arrived there in the midst of the crowded season, so they had sought the friendly shelter of the Christian Women's Board of Missions' bungalow at Deoghur. And now he was improving the last days of the Christmas holidays by journeying over the two hundred miles that lay between the capital and Deoghur, in order to spend his first New Year's Day in that strange land with his own family and friends.

A railway journey in India has its peculiarities. The cars are divided into compartments, like those in England, and are entered by a door at the side. The traveler usually has to search the station diligently before he can find any one to tell him what train is the one he wants. Then he calls the troop of coolies who are carrying the various articles of baggage made necessary by the exigencies of oriental travel, and bestows himself and his goods in the car. If he is going over a strange road, and there is no one in his compartment able to give him needed information, he proceeds upon his way in an uneasy frame of mind. No one comes to announce the names of the stations, and if the name is called out upon the station platform it is drowned in the din of the noisy crowds of natives. Hence the traveler anxiously endeavors to read the names of stations displayed upon the sign-boards, if he thinks he is nearing his destination. And failing in that effort, he leaps out of the car and runs wildly about the station to find some one with English enough and sense enough to tell him where he is. It breaks the monotony of the trip, at least.

The traveler now under consideration had started early in the morning, and understood that he was to change cars about noon at a place where he could get lunch before proceeding on his way. His only companions were two children of the soil who had no command of his mother tongue; he had no railroad guide from which to learn what station should follow another. Hence, it was after much anxious watching that he finally saw the place where the first stage of the journey ended. Aided by the indispensable coolies, he removed himself and his belongings from the car. Then he began a protracted search for some one who could tell him when his train would leave. White faces were not numerous; competent informants were few; authorities seemed to differ. It was only after repeated and persistent inquiries that the pilgrim finally found that the train he had left was the one which must carry him to his destination. With what grace he could command he motioned his coolies to return his luggage to the car.

Then he looked at his watch and rapidly calculated how much time was left for needed refreshments. The dining-room was far away across the tracks. Out of regard for life and limb, it was permitted to cross only by the long and lofty bridge. The hungry man found that he might possibly get to the dining-room and back before the train would leave, but would certainly not have even a moment to tarry there. With a sigh that came from the depths of an empty stomach he resigned himself to his fate, and looked longingly about for some chance peddler of refreshments. Alas! only one man was descried, and his stock consisted of diminutive bananas and decayed oranges. The oranges conjured up visions of cholera; so the traveler bought a bunch of bananas and sadly retired to his compartment as the train moved off. Those sixteen bananas soon disappeared. Yes, sixteen; but hold, gentle reader, before you cry out against the voracity or veracity of the Indian missionary. That fruit cost four cents, and no piece of it exceeded the size of a man's finger!

It was late in the afternoon when the train rolled into Baidyanath Junction, where it was necessary to change cars for Deoghur. To the vigilant watcher "a sign was given" this time; he caught sight of the name of the station boldly displayed. To get to the ticket office, buy a ticket for the remainder of the journey, and inquire when the train would be in, was the work of a few minutes. The polite Indian-English of the agent gave the information, very welcome indeed, that the train would arrive in twenty minutes. But when fully half an hour had gone there was still no train. Then the station master came out of his office and invited the impatient traveler in to a seat. Anxious inquiry about the train brought the response that its coming was uncertain, that it might not arrive that night, that it sometimes failed to appear for two or three days. The traveler was startled and demanded why the agent had been permitted to give false information. The station-master replied that the train had been due at the time indicated, but being a single train on a narrow gauge local line, its ways were past finding out. Impatient questions accomplished nothing beyond the suggestion that it would be best to wait awhile, at least until after the passing of the next regular train, and then it could be seen what would be best to do. So the fat, brown body of the station-master conveyed away his unperturbed soul.

Rain had begun to fall; dusk was coming on apace. After a long time the ticket agent appeared and was soundly upbraided by the waiting tourist. He bore it meekly, but said he would return the price of the ticket, and seemed to think that should allay all disquiet of spirit. How far was it to Deoghur? Was there any road, and any kind of a conveyance? These questions elicited the information that it was four miles to Deoghur; that there was a road; that there had been an ox-cart about, but it was gone. But was there no way of getting over those four miles that night? The agent bethought him of a palkey that could sometimes be procured, and agreed to send out a search party for it. Now a "palkey" is a palankeen, and a palankeen is a cross between a coffin and a hearse, and is carried by four men by means of a long pole protruding from each end of it. It seemed to the traveler better suited to the conveyance of the dead than the living, yet he hoped it would be forthcoming.

Another weary wait, during which the rain and the oncoming darkness carried not. Then the agent appeared with the news that the palkey men had just returned from a trip, too weary to go out again. Grumbling and reproaches only led the agent to conclude the traveler an unreasonable creature. He showed signs of taking himself off as he suggested that the best thing to do was to rest quietly in the waiting room for the night. Then the traveler adopted a mollified tone and besought aid in finding a coolie who could serve as a guide and carry the luggage. And the agent agreed to try to find one.

By that time it was quite dark, but fortunately the rain had nearly ceased. The traveler's umbrella was in Calcutta; why should it not be, when he understood that it never rained in India except during the "rainy season" of the summer? At last a coolie came upon the scene. He was willing to go, but must have double pay. Yes, to travel four miles through the dark and rain, guiding a stranger and carrying some sixty pounds of luggage for him, and then to trudge back home, the man had the hardihood to demand eight annas, or sixteen cents! As money was no object to the stranger, and getting on to Deoghur in time to begin the new year with his wife and son was an object, he took the man at his own price.

Down the dark and muddy road they went, the coolie leading the way with the luggage on his head. He surely had rested all that day, for he trotted along at a most unoriental rate of speed. The man found it difficult to keep near him on the rough, dark road, but he knew not how to tell him to go more slowly. One of the first words a man learns in India is that for "hurry," but whoever heard of needing to tell a child of the East to go slow? The unexpected always happens. So in silence strode they on.

Once the coolie stopped, and indicated by a grunt and a motion that he wanted assistance in removing the luggage from his head. Then he took his upper garment, and wrapping it about his head, resumed his load and his journey. That left him quite naked, except for a loin cloth. The traveler reflected that there was small likelihood that such a man should be dangerous on account of concealed weapons. But he did not find an overcoat too heavy, despite the rapid walk, and wondered how the man endured the damp, cool wind. Again the guide stopped and uttered some unintelligible words, but his companion shook his head and waved him on. The next time he paused, the traveler understood, for he cried, "Pawnee, pawnee! (Water, water!)" and there was a river right across their path. It was discomfoting. But the coolie was a man of resources. Motioning his comrade to stay where he was, he himself plunged into the river. Splash, splash, he went, and after a little he was heard clambering up the opposite bank. Then he reappeared and motioned the traveler to mount his back. It was not a "pig-back" but a "bare-back" ride that night. The darkness was kindly; there was no kodak fiend at hand. But what a picture they would have made—that very long traveler bestriding the bare shoulders of that very short coolie and clutching his head to maintain an equilibrium! Had the coolie been a little shorter, or the river a trifle deeper, the man would not have passed over dry shod. But the lithe little fellow, as slender-waisted as a girl, did his duty, and the river was soon left behind.

Then they entered the outskirts of Deoghur, but only to face a new difficulty. The town was asleep; the coolie could not be made to understand where to go. Two chance comers were appealed to in vain. Then a light was seen streaming through an open door. With reviving hope the traveler approached it and addressed his remarks to a military-looking little chap sitting behind a table. At the first word the little black fellow jumped up, nearly overturning the table, and ran across the room to seize a musket. Having secured it, he stood presenting arms in so perturbed and apologetic a manner that the traveler decided not to run away. But inquiry elicited nothing.

The weary man turned away feeling quite faint. Those sixteen bananas had been making a brave stand at some lonely outpost of his stomach for many a long hour. At last they signified that they must capitulate unless reinforced at once. But just when it seemed that nothing was left but to pass the remainder of the night under some tree, a new man came upon the scene. The traveler and the coolie both talked at once for some time without making any impression. The coolie did not know where the traveler wanted to go, and the latter could not make the man understand. All his scant vocabulary was called into requisition to no purpose. At last the word for church was used in desperation, though he knew there was no church. But it struck a spark of intelligence; voluble directions were given the coolie and off the pair started again.

It was but a little after that the traveler might have been seen in the cheerful light of the mission bungalow. The faithful coolie was sent on his way enriched by double the price he had asked. A hasty "watch night" repast was soon prepared. As the traveler sat down, surrounded by cordial friends and his wife and little boy, and hurried on reinforcements to the heroic sixteen, do you think any one could have persuaded him that foreign missions are a failure?

Calcutta, India.

A motion to have the choir change the litany to "Have mercy upon us miserable singers!" could be carried in almost any congregation. The account of a mother who gave her baby paper and pens because he had swallowed a bottle of ink—she wanted him to feel write inside—suggests the origin of some of the holiday novels.

A MODERN VERSION OF THE PRODIGAL SON.

HAMISH MANN.

YOU mean well by us," said Robert Gordon, "but we darna cover up wrong. Davie has made his bed and he must lie in it; God himself does not allow sin to go unpunished, and why should we?"

"Then, officer, you will have to do your duty," said the spokesman to his companion, who had up to this time remained silent.

He took from his pocket a pair of handcuffs and began to fasten them upon the boy's wrists.

"Ye needna dae that, he will go wi' ye without resistance," said the father.

"Then I will take the bracelets off," said the officer of the law.

The storm, which had lasted during the interview, had now spent itself like a sudden burst of passion; the sun was shining; there was a rainbow in the sky, and the birds were singing as if there were no breaking hearts in the world.

The men put the boy into the buggy between them and were about to drive off, when Mrs. Gordon, who had listened at the door of the parlor and had fallen on the hall floor in a swoon, recovered herself, and, rushing out, reached up to her boy and drew him down toward her, saying: "Oh, my puir Davie, your judgment day has come; God hae mercy upon us a'."

The boy did not speak; but never did the mother forget the look of shame and sorrow upon his face, and never did the boy forget the look of suffering love upon the face of his mother.

The two old people tottered into their desolate house. In a few minutes years had been taken out of their lives. Never had such a bitter cup been pressed to their lips.

"The cup which my Father giveth me to drink shall I not drink of it!" exclaimed Robert Gordon.

"We have had many troubles, guidwife, but nane like this one. We buried our five bairns; but dead sorrows are naething tae a leeving ane. God help us in our day of trouble!"

Instinctively they drew together and knelt down in prayer, the wife's arm resting upon her husband's shoulder.

"Oor Faither, which art in heaven," began Robert in broken accents. "We understand ye better noo. We hae often wrung your heart wi' anguish as our bairn has wrung oors today. Yet thou hast loved us, and been merciful to us, and hast not given us up. Help us to love our bairn while we hate his sin, and by showing him thy patience win him back to a guid life."

Bad news travels fast, and it was not long before the news of David Gordon's crime and arrest spread through the little community. Everybody was shocked. One or two ill-conditioned people were not surprised. They had been expecting something of the kind; they had seen signs of extravagance and pride; and they more than suspected that the elder's son was no better than the children of other folk. But most of the people felt as if a personal calamity had overtaken them. They knew better, however, than to obtrude themselves upon the stricken pair. They were left alone, curbed in with their grief and with their God. When they met them they took their hand and gave it a hearty squeeze, looking away from them the while. No one ever spoke to them directly of their trouble, being afraid lest they might touch the wound with an unskilful hand.

David was sentenced to a year in the penitentiary—the lightest punishment that could be given for his offense. He told in a simple, straightforward way how he had been tempted, not so much from a love of evil as from a desire to know what it was like. He had been lured on to break through the hedge of restraint by a curiosity to see what was on the other side of it. Fellow clerks, whose names he would not divulge, had helped to lead him astray. If he had sinned he had also been sinned against. The judge in sentencing him was deeply affected.

It was the common verdict in the community that Robert Gordon did right in giving his son up to justice. For, would he not have been condoning the offense if he had allowed it to go unpunished? No one seemed to think that punishment could come in any other way than through the course of law. They were really, had they only known it, more concerned about the honor of the law than about the salvation of the boy.

Afterwards, when Robert Gordon and his wife went to see their boy in the state's prison, they were perplexed in mind. "Better leave him to himself," they said, "and make him feel the enormity of his misdeed." They did not think that his wounded heart might need healing and soothing.

A greater astonishment awaited them when the time drew near for David's release. Robert Gordon called together a meeting of the church session and delivered to them the longest speech of his life.

"My brethren," he said, "I hae something on my hairt about which I want to speak to you. Ye wadna accept my resignation a year ago, when I thought that I ought to step down from my place as elder of this church because of the blot that came over our family name. I appreciate your confidence in me, and now I want to make a larger draft upon your sympathy and help. My laddie, as ye ken, will be let oot o' prison next week. I believe that the iron has entered into his soul, that he has come to himself, and that he is truly penitent. I do not mean to defend him or to make light of his sin. But oh, he was sair misguided. His very simplicity regarding toil was his ruin. He seems determined to begin a new life, and I want him to begin it right here among his auld friends, who have kenned him since he was a baby. Noo, what I want to know is this: Will ye welcome him back among ye, in the New Testament way?"

The minister who was presiding asked, "What do you mean, Robert, by the New Testament way?"

"I mean," replied he, "the way laid down in the fifteenth chapter o' Luke."

"Would not that be a somewhat dangerous experiment?" inquired the minister.

"Surely God does not think so, seeing it is the way he follows wi' us."

"I have no sympathy with all this soft-hearted foolishness," spoke up Malcolm McPhail, who had driven more than one of his children from home by the severity of his discipline. "Robert Gordon, you will do your laddie harm if you do not make him feel the fire of your indignation, or if you keep him from reaping the full harvest of his iniquity."

"I would like to know," said Walter Keith, the apostle John of the kirk session, "I would like to know if we are a body of Christians."

"I hope so," said Malcolm McPhail.

"Then let us act in a Christian way toward this pair laddie who comes back to us frae the far country."

"And kill for him the fatted calf?"

"Why not? There is good authority for that."

There was a division among them, and when reports of the meeting of session circulated in the community the same division of sentiment was extended over a wider area.

On the day of David's release his father met him at the gate of the prison. He hurried him to a hotel, where he dressed him in a new suit of clothes which he had provided beforehand. Then he took him to the depot and boarded a car.

When David recovered himself he asked, "Where are you taking me, father?"

"I am taking ye hame, my bairn. Where else should one who has fallen go wi' his bruised heart but to his ain mither?"

"Oh, I cannot go home; I have brought disgrace upon all—disgrace that can never be wiped out. I can never look my old friends in the face again. Let me go away where nobody knows me, that I may hide my shame and begin life over again, and when I have proved myself worthy of respect I will come back to you. I promise you that. God helping me, you will never more have cause to be ashamed of me."

"Na, na, my laddie, ye must fight your battle oot where ye lost it. It will be hard for you and for us; but your mither and I would never have an easy day if ye were to leave us. Besides, we want the joy o' helping ye in your struggles."

His father's wish had always been law to him; so he simply said: "I will do just as you say."

When they arrived at the village of Argyle, David was greatly agitated. "Father, let us go home by the back way, round by the south road," he whispered.

"Na, na, my boy, nae round-aboot roads for us; the straight way is best."

To the credit of the people of the Scotch hamlet he said that they did not stand at their doors or windows staring at the returning prodigal. With a fine sense of propriety they kept discreetly out of sight.

When the house was reached David was startled to find that every window was lighted, and to see evident signs of life.

"If there is company in the house, I cannot go in and face them; let me stay out in the barn until they go away."

"You must come; your mither is waiting for you."

The meeting between the mother and her newly recovered child was almost too sacred for relation. She took his face into her hands and, looking steadily into his eyes, said: "Ye hae washed away your sin in the waters of repentance; your een is getting clear and true again." Then, breaking out into the language of Scripture, she exclaimed, "This, my son, was dead and is alive again; was lost and is found."

When David was led into the parlor he found a number of his old friends and companions waiting to receive him. Their greeting was kindly; but their joy was of a sober and chastened sort. The old pastor was there. It was rumored that after the meeting of the church session Walter Keith had a long interview with him, and had convinced him that the Christian way of dealing with a penitent prodigal, although somewhat uncommon, was well worth trying. There were those who objected to his being present and giving countenance to such unheard-of proceedings; but when his course was once made clear he was not the man to turn aside. The modern descendants of the Scribes and Pharisees were, of course, conspicuous for their absence.

Without saying a word, Mrs. Gordon brought the family Bible and laid it on the table before the minister. He read, with great tenderness of tone, the fifteenth chapter of Luke's Gospel; and merely added: "We are here tonight because we want to make an application of this parable to a particular case. We want to show that it is not impossible to follow Christ's teaching; we want to try for once the novel experiment of making the divine method of dealing with sinful men the rule of our action."

It is many years since this incident took place. Almost all the actors in it have gone hence. David still lives. None of the evil prophecies regarding the harm which he was sure to receive from the reception given to him when he returned from the far country have come to pass. Nobly has he redeemed the past. What a comfort and stay he was to his parents in their declining years! And what a friend and helper he has been to tempted and fallen men! "When you bury me," he is wont to say to his friends—"when you bury me, put upon my headstone the words, 'Here lies a prodigal who was loved back to a better life.'"

THE THINGS OF THE FATHER.

Rev. E. Fenn Lyman.

IN the words "Know ye not that I must be about the things of my Father" (Luke 2:49), the emphasis falls upon the word must. But of what compulsion did Jesus speak when he said "I must"? Was it the dogged facing of a severe and heavy task, or was it something else? Man feels the irksome mandate of the moral law, and he says "I must," and in given determination he sets about his joyless task. He seeks to force himself toward his goal as the Spitzbergen glacier moves toward the sea, a slowly creeping, crushing, grinding valley of ice, whose progress is so slow and labored that the advance of a year must needs be measured by inches. Surely not such was the compulsion that Jesus felt when he said "I must." His was the warm compulsion of divine love, the joyous compulsion that the snow fields of the upper Missouri feel when the warm sun of April smiles down upon them, and the icy shackles fall off, and the trickling streams leap with joyous song down the mountain sides and the foothills, and in murmuring chorus sweep through the great plains, filling the vast river bank-full with an irresistible power. That is the invincible must of the divine life, and it was the surging of that strong constraint of love that Jesus felt when at this moment of his soul's awakening he consciously bared his heart like a broad continent to catch the full shining of his Father's sun-like nature, till each separate hill-top and valley of his being was streaming forth in unshackled responsiveness to that love. Here lay a thirsty barren world. His Father's business was to make it a garden. His nature was crying out in that word must to join with all his powers in that glorious work. How noble the enthusiasm of the divine boy Jesus as he stands at this moment of broadening vision!

But when we look upon this picture of Jesus' divine love expressing itself, we sigh that ours is the human and not the divine love; ours the mortal and not the God-like "must." But we who are "made a new creation in Christ Jesus" are partakers of his divine nature.

"O soul of mine! I tell thee true,
If Christ indeed be thine,
No more makes he himself thy kin
Than he made thee divine."

And this deep new-born nature yearns to throw itself open to its Father, God, and to his sweet liberating influences. When the must of divine love—the compulsion of God's own nature thaws us out, it is worth more in a minute than all the prying and pushing and crowding of a million tons of the glacial drift of human effort exerted for a generation of time. Our human wills must still be set with all their powers to do God's will, but this compulsion of the divine nature to which we are made heirs by God's grace should catch us up in its own strong current and bear us joyously on to our Father's business. What a difference there is in acting through the "must" which moves the glacier, or through the "must" that speeds the merry, singing brook!

BLUNDERS MADE BY FAMOUS AUTHORS.

Milton in Error.

Till the dappled dawn doth rise,
And at my window bid good-morrow
Through the twisted eglantine.

Thus ends the forty-first line of Milton's "L'Allegro." The eglantine does not "twist," and Milton was mistaken in giving this name to the honeysuckle. The eglantine is the prickly sweet-briar of our gardens.

Where Shelley Was Drowned.

Drowned by the upsetting of his boat in the Gulf of Spezia. So reads the epitaph on Shelley's monument erected at Christ Church, Hants, by his son, Sir Percy, and Lady Shelley; and dictionaries and encyclopaedias also perpetuate the error. The boat really foundered in the roads of Viaregio. The seaport of Viaregio is only fourteen miles northwest of Pisa, while the Gulf of Spezia, following the coast line, is distant not far short of fifty miles.

Byron's Blunder.

The last line of Byron's "Marino Faliero" reads:
The gory head rolls down the giant steps.
The steps alluded to are in the courtyard of the Ducal Palace, Venice, and are known as the Giant's Staircase, because of the colossal statues of Mars and Neptune on its summit; and by the "gory head" is meant that of Marino Faliero, one of the doges of Venice. Unfortunately this sovereign was decapitated before this stairway had been built; but it is a fact that he was beheaded in the palace.

Scott Makes a Mistake.

What purports to be the true scene of the murder of Amy is one of the chief points of interest at Kenilworth Castle: the ruins of Mervyn's Tower. Here Amy was lured to death by Varney, at the instigation of the earl. But in connecting the unfortunate Amy with that splendid ruin, Sir Walter Scott has given it an importance which is mere fiction. It is even very doubtful whether Amy ever saw the place; at any rate, Kenilworth was not given to Leicester until three years after her death (1560).

Victor Hugo's Mathematical Blunder.

Victor Hugo lays the scene of one of his novels in England, but makes the drollest blunders in regard to English life and customs. Like almost all Frenchmen, he mis-spells English proper names. For instance, he transforms the Firth of Forth into the First of Fourth!

The Story of Baron Munchausen.

The German soldier, Baron Münchhausen, was not the author of the book of travels named after him. The absurdly exaggerated fictions in this book were written by an expatriated countryman of his, named R. E. Raspe, who published them in England in 1785. Raspe made the Baron the putative author, having become acquainted with the false stories which this officer related, and for which he became notorious, after returning from his adventurous campaigns in the Russian service.

Some of Shakespeare's Slips.

"Then our ship has touched the deserts of Bohemia," says Shakespeare, in "The Winter's Tale." The ship bearing the infant Perdita is thus pictured as being driven on the coasts of Bohemia, but Bohemia has no seaboard at all.

The couplet:

Peace, count the clock—

The clock has stricken three, is found in the dialogue between Brutus and Cassius, in Shakespeare's "Julius Caesar." Yet clocks were not known to the Romans, though sun-dials were; and striking clocks were not invented till some hundreds of years after Caesar's death.

The Real Story of Robinson Crusoe.

Readers have formed an idea that because an unwilling dweller on his island through shipwreck, therefore Selkirk, the Scottish sailor, on whose marvelous adventures Defoe founded his fascinating story, must have landed there through like circumstances. The exact contrary is true. Selkirk had been roving about the Southern seas as sailing-master of one of the ships that set out on a privateering expedition under the famous navigator, Dampier, and being dissatisfied with his ship, desired to be put ashore. A few others joined him and they remained on the island of Juan Fernandez for several months until their vessel returned for them. But Selkirk's life-long aversion to discipline again manifested itself, and the next time his ship touched at Juan Fernandez he was put ashore by his own request, in 1704. All things that could be spared to make him comfortable were freely given—food, tools, clothes, weapons and ammunition. After the expiration of four years and four months, he was taken off by another privateer, the "Duke and Duchess." His sea-chest, cup, gun, etc. (which Crusoe saved from the wreck), created some sensation when they were exhibited in London on his return, in October, 1711. They are now in the Society of Antiquaries' Museum, Edinburgh. Robinson Crusoe, on the other hand, must have landed on some island east of Panama, and there is good reason to believe that it was the Island of Tobago. But Defoe blunders in locating Juan Fernandez Island on the eastern side of South America.

THE BREAD OF LIFE.

WM. DOUGLAS MACKENZIE, D.D.

TEXT.—John 6:11. Jesus, therefore, took the loaves and having given thanks he distributed to them that were sat down; likewise, also, the fishes, as much as they would.

The story of the feeding of these thousands of men by Jesus is the only miracle that is told in all the four Gospels; and the writer of this fourth Gospel evidently recounts it because there grew out of it that teaching which he describes to us in the last part of this chapter. Before his readers could understand how Jesus came to speak of himself as the bread of life, and what he meant by it, they must hear the story of the event on which that teaching was founded and which made that teaching relevant for the people to whom it was given.

He describes first the compassion of Jesus as he looked out upon the multitude that had hurried after him to see him do more miracles. Jesus at once understood the situation. These men were away from where they could obtain provisions; and if they were longer there, detained by him, they would indeed be in want and distress. So he turned to his disciples and spoke especially to Philip, saying: "Whence are we to buy bread that these may eat?" "This he said to prove him," to test him, and not only to test him, but to test the other disciples also.

1.—The Test.

It was a kind thing to test those men. Only when they were tested could they take in the lesson which he was about to teach them. Only by first showing them how helpless they were, only by bringing them face to face with the impending calamity for those people, could Jesus then proceed to work that which should be full of real instruction for them; not a mere dark, meaningless sign, but an event full of meaning, out of which they would receive fresh light upon the great problem of religion which they were constantly working upon at this time in their hearts and minds. Jesus said it to prove Philip, we are told; and the answer would indicate that there was some need for Philip to be proved, for Philip turned and said: "Two hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient for them that every one may take a little." He makes a rapid calculation, and seeing the great multitude of people, knows it will take all that and more to buy bread. He does not think of where they are to get it, which is what Jesus asked, but thinks of the cost, which was not what Jesus was concerned with. But he is a practical man, possibly what we would call a business man, who looks at the practical or business side of this transaction. He does not, first of all, consider whence this is to come, but how much it will cost; which seems to a great many people always the first and middle and the last question to ask about a thing. He is, then, a man of this practical business temperament, and that kind of business man who evidently has very little faith. Now, nowhere is faith more needed than in business life, on the part of those who would go far or build up large business concerns. A large number of men have great ability and yet occupy positions of mediocrity or inferiority in the business world, because they do not have faith enough. The man who goes forward and far is the man who has a living faith—faith in himself, faith that comes out of a careful study of the situation. This faith is not that gambling spirit that takes any risk, ignorantly, without calculation. That is a different attitude altogether. That is sin and immorality; it is sheer wickedness for any man to go and run plain, meaningless risks. Faith always has a reasonable element in it. Faith knows why a risk must be run and faith wants to reduce the risk. Faith looks in upon a man's own self and says, "I can meet the difficulty. I can disentangle the complexity of relations that have grown up around me. I know this man; that man I can count upon; I believe it can be done." The gambling spirit thinks: "I will risk it; I will risk the chance that it will come out all right." The man who makes business in the latter way ought to be put out of business altogether for the sake of the honest, faithful men, the men of faith and intelligence, who want to reduce the risks and who want to have as clear a certainty and as straight a path before them as possible in business life. The business man who has a living and a healthy faith is the man who knows himself, and knows the situation and the circumstances, and then goes forward with an earnest and humble confidence that, taking all the circumstances into consideration, and his own power and manhood, he can work the thing rightly.

2.—The Omitted Fact.

Now this man Philip did not take all the circumstances into the situation. He had not counted in everything that was to be counted in. He counted the multitude, then he counted up the number of loaves, then he counted up how much they would cost, then he thought of the man who was the treasurer of their little company, and of the few pence he had in the bottom of the bag, and said, "I suppose this will take perhaps (in modern terms) seventy-five or eighty dollars. We have not got that." He counted in the twelve men and the pence and the bag and the multitude and the loaves and remembered the distance to the nearest village. He forgot Christ! He forgot to take that circumstance into calculation, and accordingly his judgment could not be for that moment a safe and sound and businesslike judgment. He had not counted in all the facts; nay, he had missed out the greatest of them all. Jesus wanted to show that to them; that they had not learned how to count him in. This was the main matter to prove, to test, to find out—to see whether in their own hearts and minds, now, they had learned to count in himself into the very circumstances of their lives; if they had learned, when they were mapping out their plans, to take him into consideration and to see what difference he would make upon the whole vista of action that opened up before them. And Jesus, having tested them, teaches them in a very simple and a very glorious way, reveals himself as the active creator at work before their eyes.

3.—The Power of Thanks.

We are told that Jesus took the loaves and gave thanks. And gave thanks! I wonder if that is what worked the miracle. Gave thanks! He did not merely plead and ask and beg from God, but gave thanks. At the Last Supper, before he broke the bread he gave thanks. When he stood before the tomb of Lazarus, knowing what he was going to do and before he spoke the words that woke the dead to life, while the hush fell on that crowd also, he lifted up his voice to his Father and said, "I thank thee." He gave thanks! Before Christ did anything great he seems always to have, in his spirit, given thanks. When the battle was still before him he gave thanks for the victory. When the task was still to be done he gave thanks that it was done. Before the dead woke to life he gave thanks that the life was there to wake the dead and call him forth. He gave thanks! You and I do not know much of the power of giving thanks. It is always that, that indicates a mighty and invincible faith, when we can give thanks.

Now, there are many people who in our own day are being put to the test by Christ; and in these two ways, I think: As to whether they are taking him into account, and as to whether they are giving thanks. For instance, I think in your own daily life, in your business, God is putting you to the test every day. Do you take God into account? He is putting you to the test each time that you make a new venture, each time you feel a fresh emotion. Are you taking God into account?

Even churches have to learn this lesson. I have heard of churches,—I have seen them in several countries and could name them to you,—that once were strong, and then they grew weak, and then when they were weak they got down into despair. They said: "We cannot do anything. There are only a few of us and the people around us do not want the Gospel. Religion is at a discount and there is no hope. We can not do anything. It would take a tremendous lot of money,—'two hundred pennyworth of bread!'—to be put into this affair to carry it on." They have said, "We will need to get a great preacher from some great center, a man who is known all over the country, or who would speedily become known, a man who would be a mighty organizer. A large figure, 'two hundred pennyworth of bread!'—we have not got it." I know churches like that. They counted their members, summed up their subscriptions and looked with sinking hearts at the great, indifferent, dying mass of the world and said, "We can not do it."

What was the fault in those churches? What was wrong? These were the facts: they did not have that miserable two hundred pennyworth of bread and they had that vast, indifferent and yet soul-unfed, hungering multitude. What had they omitted? Did they take Christ fully, heartily, frankly, into consideration? Did they believe that the very power of the Son of God was in their midst? Did they believe that the spirit of Jesus, the crucified and eternal One, their Saviour, their Lord, who can raise men from the dead, was in their midst? Did they have hearts hot with the love of him? The world needs its Christ, and "Christ to the world we bring." In what mood were they? With what measure of faith were they at work? I have known one or two of these churches that today are full. They began to fill when they discovered that Christ, the giver of bread, the multiplier of a few loaves, was in their midst. When they discovered that the multitude around were hungering for the very bread he gives, then Christ made them the distributors of it, and the twelve men that doubted could feed thousands that were hungering. Today songs of rejoicing fill those buildings because they are giving thanks out of full hearts that the living bread is being broken to multitudes of hungering men and women. But you see they needed to take Christ into account.

4.—The Miracle.

How can I believe that this miracle ever took place? Not merely because the man who writes the description was an eye-witness of the scene, though that is a tremendous fact; not merely because we have two or three descriptions of the fact by eye-witnesses, with minute differences, which show that they are all remembering actually the same thing. The strongest reason of all is this: That the miracle is ascribed to Christ, the Son of God; not to a man but to Christ, the Son of God. He goes on in the last part of the chapter to describe himself, and his relation to this miracle, by calling himself the "bread of life," calling himself the "living bread." And he says that he came down from heaven. Now, if I am not going to believe that, then I differ from Christ and his own witness about himself; and that is about the hardest thing in the world to do. For myself I cannot do it; I believe his witness about himself. When he who lived so, and taught so, amongst men, who gave men the noblest truths and the holiest impulses, who gave to the human race the loftiest power it has ever found of a spiritual and moral kind, when he says, "I came down from heaven, I was sent from God," then I feel that it would be the height of rashness, the height of insanity in me to say, "I differ from you, O Christ, regarding your own origin." The Church has ever said, "We cannot doubt it and live."

5.—The Living Bread.

He came down from heaven, he says, and therefore speaks of himself as the "bread" and the "bread of life," the "living bread." He contrasts himself with that manna of old, that manna of Moses which was connected in their thoughts with the story of the wilderness, when Moses was their leader and prophet. Moses did not give it to them; it was His Father that gave it to them. That was not living bread; it just barely gave men life from day to day. But this is the bread of life. It comes from heaven in order to enter into and become the property of men and in so becoming their inward property and endowment, this bread is to them the bread of the everlasting life. He speaks of himself as the bread of life in order, I think, to show that he is to become the foundation of every man's personality, the foundation of every man's soul life. He uses, to illustrate his relation to man, this bread which we have come to call the "staff of life"; the simplest, commonest form of food, the basis, after all, of all social life, without which everything else is but ornament and extraneous, but which is itself the essential thing in every form of human society everywhere. When the ordinary bread that we eat is received by us it becomes the basis of our physical life. It enters into and becomes ourselves. We assimilate it into our very blood. It passes through our veins and nourishes every part of our physical self. It becomes the very basis of our personal life. Christ says that he, himself, is necessary to every man as to his eternal life, as to his soul's life, just in that way. He is to become the basis of our personal life. Can anything be more complete than that which is the basis of your life?

6.—How to Eat this Bread.

But how is this bread of life to be received by us? How does a man come into possession of it? Christ, towards the end of the discussion, says that men receive this bread of life when they believe on him; that is, when they take him into account; when they give to his claims the assent of their intellect, the homage of their will; when they give to his claims, to himself, the love of their hearts; when they give to him the complete submission of their whole self, their whole nature. In this act of believing on him, a man is taking him into account in everything. Then Christ says, he has been received, he has been taken into the very substance of that person's life. He is then as intimately united with that person as the bread that I eat is united henceforth with my physical self. It seems to me that there is no more compact, solid, vivid way of putting it this morning than by just saying that it is to take him into account.

But, then, what does believing on Jesus Christ mean? It means understanding the fact that he had come down from heaven and that he was able and willing to give that bread, and taking that into account. That is faith; that is believing on him. Jesus Christ means to say that the man who in this way takes him into account, believes on him in this way, does receiveth him into the very depths of his being. There is nothing at once more sublime, more awful, more glorious, more inspiring, and, just because it is all these things, there is nothing more absolutely sure than this, that when you and I thus take Christ into account, he—ah! think of it,—the very God enters into our very self and henceforth we no longer live but he in us. The divine and the human bound up in this wondrous union,—he, the basis of our life, our life the flowering out of his energy in our soul!

Brethren, let me in his name this morning say to you, "Oh! brother, friend, believer in Christ, fellow-member in this church, open your heart! Take him into account. Count him henceforth into your life, always, in everything. Believe that he is already in you; that he is already there where your affections have their springs, there where your thought has its root, there in the dark machinery of the soul where the will carries on its mighty operations. Take him into account, receive him to your trust and, behold! he is already living in you."

ABRAHAM AND ISAAC.

LESSON FOR AUGUST 25, 1901: GENESIS 22:1-14.

Golden Text: By faith, Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac.—Heb. 11:17.

A CHICAGO TEACHER'S NOTES ON THE LESSON.

ELIAS A. LONG.

Time and Place.

The time is commonly reckoned at B. C. 1871. Isaac, who had been born within a year after the destruction of Sodom, is now a young man. Abraham is 125 years old. Abraham at this time lived at Beersheba, a place some forty-five miles south of the present Jerusalem. Here there was a fine well, which gave the place its name.

Trusting God to the Utmost.

Sometimes we think our faith in God is perfect until there comes a great, mysterious wave of trial leading us to cry out: If God is love, why does he permit this? To so trust him that faith holds true, in the extreme test, is the hardest lesson we have to learn. It was just here that our Master in his last great struggle in Gethsemane was the weakest; yet in which he triumphed in that profound expression of faith, "Nevertheless not my will but thine be done." Abraham must learn—we must learn—to sum up every prayer with these words. The old patriarch had given up much for love and faith in God. He had parted with home and nation in Chaldea. He had given up kindred in Haran; lands in Canaan to Lot; rightful money to the king of Sodom; ease of body and mind to the rescue of his nephew, but his self-surrender must be put to a severer test than any of these. Here is his precious long-awaited for son Isaac, dearer to him than life itself, the joy and solace of his declining years; would he trust God in a supreme test in which love for this one is cast into the balance through offering him as a sacrifice? It is none other than such an extreme trial to which Abraham now is put, and which forms the basis of today's very interesting lesson.

God Wants Living Not Dead Sacrifices.

To Abraham came a command which was discerned as meaning that his late won gift, Isaac, was to become a sacrifice on the altar of burnt offering. God indeed meant that Abraham was to offer his son, but not as a bloody, material sacrifice. What he designed to teach was that the offering which is acceptable to him is the body, will and heart as a holy, living sacrifice. Rom. 12:1. That Abraham in his day should have understood the call as demanding the death of his son, was not unnatural. God often permits our ignorance in spiritual, as in material, things to lead us into the severest trials and the most helpful discipline of our lives. Ps. 73:22; I Tim. 1:13. Abraham now for "many days" was situated with abundant leisure, ease and prosperity. Ch. 21:34; 24:1. He had ample time for meditation in the things of God. The thought presses upon him: "What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits towards me?" Ps. 116:12. "How are all the families of the earth to be blessed in me?" "Have I done enough for God in the daily offerings which out of my plenty have cost me so little?" With such thoughts the news must frequently have reached him of some Canaanitish neighbor offering his first born as a sacrifice to propitiate the wrath of the terrible fire god. 2 Kings 16:3. It was an age when the idolatrous idea of human sacrifices prevailed and was commended by public opinion as the highest token of religious devotion. See 2 Kings 16:3; 17:17; 21:6; Judges 11:30, 31; Micah 6:7; etc. How natural that to Abraham's conscience there should have come the "accusing thought" (Rom. 2:15) "Am I not willing to do as much for the God of love as my neighbors do for their detestable dieties?" Can I do less than give that which is most precious to me?" Then comes the command, perhaps as the still small voice of conscience—which is a voice of God—and accepted by Abraham as requiring him to offer up Isaac in death. While he thus is moved to stop not short of making an offering as bloody as those of his neighbors, God's real design was different. "Lay not thine hand upon the lad" vs. 12. And in that unmistakable mandate there was set forth once for all ways a protest against human sacrifices, while the spirit which prompted the giving up of all to God was commended and accepted.

V. 1. At Ease in Zion. "After these things." After the departure of Ishmael and the covenant with Abimelech, as related in the previous chapter, leading down to Abraham's prosperous, peaceable settlement for "many days" at Beersheba. But to be "at ease in Zion" (Amos 6:1) often is a condition when the discipline of trial most is needed. * * * "God did prove Abraham" R. V. Abraham "was tried" the inspired apostle says. Heb. 11:17. God tries us to bring out the good (Deut. 8:2); but he never tempts any man to do evil. James 1:13. Temptation proceeds from the malice of Satan. This whole life is a testing and an education in testing.

V. 2. Test Assumes Form. "And he said." Just how God spake we do not know, but plainly it was not by clear command as in verses 11 and 12. Possibly it was the "still, small voice." (Kings 19:12; Rom. 2:15) which his children even now plainly hear urging them to duty and to sacrifice, and these sometimes not unmixed with mistakes and discipline. * * * "Take . . . thine only son Isaac." The name Isaac means "laughter." He was the only son of promise; the only son by Sarah; the only son left to Abraham in his home. * * * "Land of Moriah." The mountainous portion of Jerusalem then known as Jebus or Salem, the city of Melchizedeck. * * * "Offer him there." Abraham thought that to offer Isaac meant to kill him, but as verse 12 shows God meant differently. The force of this awful test as accepted by Abraham is seen as we consider that in obeying it he had to contend (1) against his own devoted parental love; (2) against reason, for would not this be to slay the future blessing to mankind? (3) against faith, the very "substance of things hoped for" (Heb. 11:1) in this son of promise. Yet this man of faith offered neither argument nor excuse. If Isaac must die he "counted that God was able to raise him up even from the dead." Heb. 11:19. He trusted that "somehow or other God will provide." V. 8. Sometimes in our greatest trials we can observe no sign of divine love, no reason, no good prospect, but only can say "I know in whom I have believed." 2 Tim. 1:12.

V. 3. "He Staggered Not." "Abraham rose up early." To not a single soul dare he confide his purpose. Gal. 1:16, 17. He started early, a necessary course to avoid the oppressive heat of the Oriental midday. * * * "Saddled . . . ass . . . clave the wood." The ass was loaded with the wood required for the offering. * * * "Went unto the place." In that terrible journey doubtless again and again as the hours wore away Abraham rehearsed all of God's past dealings with him, but only to find strength in his purposes of faith. Rom. 4:20.

V. 4. The Mountain. "On the third day." The time required to pass over the 45 miles to Moriah. A day's journey in the leisurely pace of the east is from 16 to 20 miles; a Sabbath day's journey 2,000 yards. Acts 1:12. * * * "Saw the place afar off." Beheld the mountains round about Moriah. Ps. 125:2.

V. 5. Abraham's Gethsemane. "Abraham said . . . abide ye here." Like Christ in Gethsemane he would be apart from his attendants in his agony and communion with God. Matt. 6:6. * * * "Will go yonder and worship." Isaac alone goes with him, but not yet to share this great sorrow. * * * "And come again to you." Abraham fully expected to perform the awful act of slaying his son, but his clear faith as fully expected that God would raise him from the dead. Heb. 11:19. In confidence therefore he says to his servants that they will "come again." His faith tells him that God's promise concerning the increase of his family through Isaac cannot fail. Acts 2:24. But Abraham's experience helped him; had not God, after his many doubts, given Isaac as promised? Do our experiences help our faith?

V. 6. 7. Heroism of Faith. "The wood . . . and laid it upon Isaac." The father was very aged; the son young and strong, so he could tug up the hill with the fagots. * * * "He took the fire . . . and a knife." The vessels containing live coals as they had no matches in those days. * * * "Where is the lamb?" The tenderness of this scene is only to be surpassed by that of Calvary.

V. 8. 9. Mountain-Moving Faith "God will provide." All ahead must have looked dark and forbidding to the father's eyes, save the one bright star of faith that shined above the great "mountain" in his path. The words in answer to Isaac's question could hardly have been spoken evasively, for the crisis was drawing too near to attempt further evasion. * * * "So they went both together." Isaac, reposing in the faith of his father, said not another word. "He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter and as a sheep before her shearer is dumb so opened he not his mouth." Isa. 53:7. * * * "Bound Isaac and laid him on altar." The scene changes from words to action, which indicates more forcibly than words that Isaac himself is to become the victim. Had there not been the most perfect harmony in the faith of the aged father and of his strong young son in submitting, the trial could not have gone through. No one could dwell in the atmosphere of Abraham's trusting heart without being infected with his faith. Ch. 18:19. Faith kindles faith as fire kindles fire. So our faith and love and virtue and heroism have the power to influence others. Every person is made either stronger or weaker for his contact with others.

V. 10. Hope Thou in God. "Abraham stretched forth his hand." As the last crucial moment for action comes a voice within must have said, "Hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise him for the health of his countenance." Ps. 43:5. All can yet be undone and pass away like a dream. * * * "Took the knife to slay." Then instantly he is thrilled by a voice out of heaven, such as never before had met his ear.

V. 11. Voice out of Heaven. "Angel of the Lord." It was the voice of the Lord himself, even of Jesus, as we may see by V. 16 comparing with Acts 2:25, 36; Phil. 2:11. * * * "Called . . . out of heaven." Now with a distinctness and directness that could not be mistaken. Matt. 3:17. Abraham is notified that it is enough. His offering of the heart's best, this living sacrifice, is regarded as a complete offering. See Golden Text.

V. 12. The Stayed Knife. "Lay not thine hand." The voice from heaven interposes at just the right instant. The Lord's angel forbids the deed of murder. He forever condemns the inhuman superstition towards which all ancient ceremonials of sacrifices perpetually tended. Both father and son truly shall return to the waiting servants, as Abraham in faith had intimated. V. 5. * * * "Now I know thou fearest God." Abraham was tried, not to convince God of what he already knew (Chapt. 18:19), but that he might show to others to the end of time, how by faith he had honored God with that which was dearest. * * * "Not withheld son from me." Here was the actual demonstration that nothing in the world was dearer to Abraham than God and here was the death-blow forever to the offering of human sacrifices. No sinful flesh can serve as a sacrifice to redeem from sin. The Sinless One, the Lamb of God, alone could do that and until the fullness of his time the blood of sinful brutes, without blemish, could serve through continual repetitions as substitutes. Heb. 7:27.

V. 13. Substitution. "A ram caught . . . and offered him." At the opportune moment God provided a beast, which he would accept as a burnt offering at the hands of Abraham; a principle amplified under the Mosaic economy of the acceptance of animal sacrifices for human sins." All such represented "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." Rev. 13:8.

V. 14. The New Name. "Jehovah-jireh." In memory of his deep experiences Abraham called the place by this new name which means "God will see" or "God will provide." God had provided. Abraham's trial gave him a new name for God. In applying the name to the place he erects a memorial, which all may read, to the deeds of the true God. * * * "Of the Lord it shall be seen." Abraham learned that when his limited vision could not see the spiritual vision of God saw. So when we cannot see, the Lord not only will see, but as we offer our bodies a living sacrifice he will provide. As we offer our time he sees to it that a day in his service is more satisfying than a thousand spent in the pleasures of sin. As we offer our talents he sees to it that we are fitted to become rulers over cities. As we offer our money or lands he provides that we get a hundredfold more of that which satisfies the soul. Ps. 107:9.

PRAYER MEETING.

FREDERICK F. GRIM.

HEAVENLY MANSIONS.

John 14: 1-3; I Cor. 5: 1-10.

LET us picture for ourselves the scene of gloom and sadness in that upper chamber where Jesus had met for the last time to eat the Passover with his disciples. At this time he taught them the lesson of humility, and in a very striking and powerful way symbolized the significance of his life work by instituting "the Communion." Judas had gone out into the darkness of the night. The traitorous deed was soon to be accomplished. The crisis in the life of the Master was fast approaching; nay more, was at hand. Defeat was facing him, but its consummation was victory. Shame and ignominy were to be turned into glorification. The cross leads but to the crown.

His disciples were agitated. Their hearts were filled with fear and terror. He must needs speak to them of his departure. Peter was unable to understand why he could not follow him at once. He insisted that he was ready. But alas! Peter's impulsiveness does not have in it the quality of endurance. If he could not stand, what was to happen? The treachery of Judas adds darkness to the scene. If their trusted leader—the head of the kingdom—was to leave, what was left for them? No institution, no prestige, no influence, no army! Ignominious defeat, as far as human eye could see, alone awaited them.

The Divine Comfort.

"Don't give up. To be sure I am going away, but then just trust me. Don't be troubled and dismayed; God still reigns and I am one with him. You believe in him, why not believe in me? Don't worry and vex your soul, but cast all your care upon him." "Why art thou cast down, O my soul? And why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God; for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance and my God."

It was not for some selfish purpose that he was to leave them. He was not to live in luxury while they were left to struggle and toil. But he was still to work. He was to make all ready for them.

With a filial relationship comes the idea of a home—a house with many mansions—a most beautiful figure in which to express the heavenly idea. "The image is derived from those vast Oriental palaces in which there is an abode not only for the sovereign and heir to the throne, but also for the sons of the king, however numerous they may be." John in his Apocalyptic vision has given us a picture of wondrous beauty—shall we say of the renewed earth? If that be true, heaven cannot be less glorious.

If so much loveliness is sent
To grace our earthly home,
How beautiful, how beautiful
Must be the world to come.

With Him Forevermore.

Without doubt this "building of God eternal in the heavens" will satisfy our esthetic taste. And yet all this is but the feebleness of our earth-born speech. External attractions cannot constitute heaven. How many a palace adorned with all that luxury can afford is a veritable hell on earth. It is Christ's presence that makes heaven. He can transform a cottage into a "paradise regained." The great discovery of the present time is that Christ is here, giving us glimpses of that which is to be. What a family reunion it will be! Heavenly companionship is ours to enjoy if we but acknowledge a Father's love and a Father's care. Eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of men what God has in store for them who love him.

DAILY PRAYER.

Topic for August 25, Psalms 34: 1-22.

WILL bless the Lord at all times; his praise shall continually be in my mouth." The best part of prayer is praise. I fear we often forget this. We need to turn back to the Psalms of God's ancient people to learn this lesson of praise. There is no hymnal that can compare with the Hebrew psalmist's scroll of song.

The criticism of our modern Church hymns, by a certain Prof. Somebody, which has been going the rounds of the secular and religious press recently, is so sweeping in its assertions that it needs no answer, but if it shall bring us to a fresh comparison of our modern Sunday school and Church songs with the best of Israel's sweet singer, it may serve to show us the superiority of the book of Psalms. Not that I would advocate the use of the Psalms in singing, not exclusively at any rate, but I would advocate a much more general use of the Psalms in our devotional reading. And I certainly would not advocate the use of Watts' paraphrase, but the much more beautiful rendering of the Revised Version, or the old King James version.

But how shall we pray continually, or without ceasing? I think the true secret of prayer is in what may be called

The Attitude of the Soul.

This is possible even with very busy people, and without this attitude of the soul there is no real prayer or praise. It is in cultivating this condition of mind, and establishing the attitude of the spiritual nature, that the "quiet hour" serves its chief purpose. It is possible to read the Bible and pray every day without much cultivation of the spiritual attitude, and therefore without making any very perceptible progress in the divine life. The praise that is continually in the mouth must have a continual supply back of it in the hidden springs of the spiritual life. And it is this hidden and eternal—this attitude of the soul—this continual turning of the heart and life to God, that constitutes true prayer. The attitude of the body and the environments of life have little to do with cultivating and maintaining this spiritual state. Most of us imagine they do, and excuse ourselves on the ground of our environments; but the spiritual is superior to the merely local if we will have it, so that we may bless the Lord "at all times" and have his praise continually in our hearts. I know the difficulties of maintaining this spiritual attitude, and I count not myself to have attained, but I have caught a glimpse of the glory of the presence of the Lord, possible for every believer. What we need is to cultivate the mind of the spirit.

Prayer Not Selfish.

I wonder sometimes if we are not selfish in our prayers. Prayer ought to expand the soul. This is one sort of "expansion" that I think we need not fear. "O magnify the Lord with me, and let us exalt his name together." It somehow exalts us to exalt the name of the Lord together. I like that familiar expression, "Let us unite in prayer." Do we really thus unite in prayer? Prayer desires for others what we ourselves have found. "O taste and see that the Lord is good." The spiritual mind cannot be satisfied with enjoying its blessings alone. The cloister and the cell are no part of the true spiritual worship of the Church of Christ. Jesus went into the mountain apart to pray, but only that he might gain quiet and bodily rest for further service, for we are told that they pressed upon him so that he had not time to eat or sleep. We need the mountain stillness and the morning hour as a preparation for service.

ABRAM AND LOT.

"Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them."—Matthew 7:12.

Monday—Genesis 13: 1-9.

The choice of Sodom for his home was Lot's greatest mistake. He is the type of that class of men, always a large class, who are determined by one rule alone, by the consideration of worldly advantage. He saw a quick road to wealth, and that was enough for him; at once he turned aside into Bypath Meadow.

But this was a perilous road. Lot must shut his eyes to the moral risk, if he would grasp the material advantage. He must endanger his soul. So it will be, if I am governed by the greed of gain. Spiritual disaster lies inevitably in front of me.

And this was a selfish road. Lot recognized no duty to Abraham, no gratitude, no modesty. He was prompted by nothing higher than the eager wish to benefit himself. May I be kept in mercy from forgetting others in my anxiety to do myself good.

Tuesday—Genesis 13: 10-18.

If I make Lot's choice, I cut myself off from all that is best in life. Of my own accord I enter a society in which there is nothing that will really satisfy. The men and women round me now are shallow, superficial, worldly. These are not the associates who should be mine. But I shall despise myself more than I despise them. I shall think with sorrow of the high thoughts which visited me once, and of the hopes that now I have no means of fulfilling. I am in bondage to the circumstances I have myself chosen. It is my disappointment, my bitterness, my shame, that I have lost my old comrades, my old ideals, my old homelier and godlier ways. I have sacrificed what is best to what is lowest. I have gained the world, but I have forfeited the health and prosperity of the soul.

Therefore let me stay with Abram in the tents up among the hills, and do not let me descend into the enervating and contaminating Cities of the Plain.

Wednesday—Genesis 14: 5-16.

The attack, the capture, the captivity, are God's warnings to Lot that he should never have made Sodom his home. But see how Lot neglects the warnings. For, instead of returning with Abram and abandoning the district of his adoption, he goes back to Sodom.

So it is too often with me. Because the admonitions of God are not very loud, I pay little heed to them. I tell myself that Chedorlaomer might have come to the tents on the hillside as well as to the house in the city. I silence the unobtrusive voice which speaks to me for my good. I assure my heart that I am not being rebuked and condemned at all. And I continue, persistently, rebelliously, in the wrong course.

But I should be influenced by God's whispers as well as by God's thunders. Conscience, quick, tender, sensitive, taught by the Holy Ghost, should be as mighty and royal a power as any angel set in my path with a flaming sword in his hand. If only my eyes were single, my whole body would be full of light.

It is my own truest interest to hearken to every solemn counsel of my Lord. If I will not be profited by his lesser chastenings, he has more awful judgments in store. If Chedorlaomer does not drive me from Sodom, heaven's fire and brimstone will.

Thursday—Psalm 1.

At first I content myself with walking in the "councils of the wicked." It is an occasional companionship. It is a meeting only now and again. For awhile I was with them, and then some better influence calls me away—the remembrance of my mother's prayer, a sentence in a letter from a friend, a verse of the Bible suddenly shot into my mind. But by and by I "stand in the way of sinners." They have gained a greater power over me. I love them too well. I linger in their society. The poison is working; my condition is more fixed and hopeless by far.

And, at last, where do you see me? I am "sitting in the seat of the scornful,"—at home with those who laugh at God and Christ and heaven and hell. I have joined their ranks; I am one of their number. Their resorts are mine; their jeers are mine; their seared conscience and withered heart are mine. O dreary ending of a dreary journey!

The pleasures of sin last only for a season. They have no solid foundation. Ignorance is one of their foundations; I do not see them in their real character, or I should take little delight in them. And carelessness is another; I will not pause to consider. And false and flimsy hopes are a third; I imagine that all will go well though I am far from God and far from righteousness.

Then, too, these pleasures are dependent on my circumstances. In the bright summer they may be sufficient. But the winter comes. I fall sick. I lose my bosom friend. My property is suddenly snatched from me. The fig tree does not blossom, and there is no fruit in the vines. Do they satisfy me now? Nay, I know them for tinsel and fraud.

And they will be torn to shreds at last. They are like the ice palace of the Czars. It glitters in the frosty sunlight of the short days. It looks a desirable home. But with the return of spring it "vanishes into naught." The pleasures of sin cannot abide the day of the Lord's coming, and, if my home is among them, I am houseless and orphaned in that day.

Without the kingdom of God and his righteousness, I am poor, though all else should be mine. I recall the Cæsars of Rome. They ruled from the Euphrates to Gibraltar, and from Scotland to the sands of the Sahara. They had slaves, soldiers, palaces, wealth which I could not count. Were they happy? No. Augustus grew morose and melancholy in his age. Tiberius fled from Rome to conceal himself in the little island of Capri. Nero had to hide at last from his enemies in a miserable hut outside the city. My heart is restless without God.

But with the kingdom of God and his righteousness, I am rich, though nothing else should be mine. Here is a slave of one of these emperors—a boy captured by the legionaries in the pinewoods of Britain. He is in a foreign country. He is destitute of human friends. He is the chattel of a hard taskmaster. But he goes singing about his work. Why? Because God is his Father, Christ his Elder Brother, the Holy Spirit his Teacher and Comforter. His are "the pure lilies of eternal peace." I had rather fill the slave's menial place than be imperial Cæsar on his throne.

Sunday—2 Corinthians 6: 11-18.

Let me make the severance utter and complete between myself and the kingdom of unrighteousness and darkness and Belial.

Perhaps I omit to keep guard over my inner life on one particular day; I am advanced now in my Christian course, and I imagine that I may relax my carefulness somewhat. But just then temptation presents itself, and after years of consistent and gracious living I go down.

Perhaps there is a duty I leave unfulfilled for once—a service which I might have rendered, but from which I shrink. I plead that it is dull, uninteresting, tiresome; I must have something gay and brighter once in a while. And thus I rejoice the enemy, and make sad my Saviour and Master.

Perhaps I forsake my attitude of expectant waiting for my Lord's appearing. I do not bring all my thoughts and words and ways into the light of His Throne, before which I am to stand. But when I have laid myself down to sleep, and my lamp is not burning, there is a cry, "Behold, the Bridegroom cometh!"

"Who would fail for one step withholden?" To the last step of the last day let me run the race and fight the good fight.

CHRIST IN THE LITERATURE OF THE 20TH CENTURY.

Prof. Edwin Mims, Ph. D.

Synopsis of address at Epworth League Convention, San Francisco.

As poetry becomes more and more the expression of the spiritual life, poets will find in Christ the best material for artistic purposes. Within the nineteenth century a larger and fuller interpretation of Christ has come. He is no longer a limited or circumscribed being; rather he is the richest, fullest personality of history. In such books as Henry Van Dyke's "Gospel for an Age of Doubt," and Dr. Gordon's "Epoch of Faith," one can see that men have a finer vision of Jesus than ever before. Science and criticism have to be accepted in so far as they prove facts, but they have not obscured the face of the Master which decomposes but to recompose.

There was a time when Christ was the subject of art and literature; the Pre-Raphaelites in art, and Dante in poetry formed in the Christian religion the most beautiful and truest art.

But the Christ of mediæval art lacks humanity, lacks richness. With the triumph of the Renaissance and the Reformation has come a new sense of the value of humanity and the dignity of human reason. We are beginning to see with Phillips Brooks, however, that the interpretation of all modern movements is found in the human and divine Christ.

One poet of the nineteenth century points the way to the future. Wordsworth, Shelley, Carlyle, Tennyson and Emerson have all contributed to the spiritual interpretation of man and nature, but Browning is the author who has put into art the beautiful idea of the Incarnation. In "Saul," "Cleopatra," "Death in the Desert" and a dozen other poems, he has expressed in art the central truth of the world—

"I say the acknowledgment of God in Christ

Accepted by the reason, solves for these

All the problems in the world and out of it."

Durham, N. C.

ABOUT LITERARY CELEBRITIES.

Sir Edwin Arnold, the author of "The Light of Asia" and many other works, has become practically blind. Perhaps few men can show such strong individuality and strength of mind as the talented editor of the London "Daily Telegraph." While he was taking honors at Oxford, he found time to learn Sanscrit, "for a personal pleasure," he said, and when he left college and became a teacher in a school at Birmingham, he made up his mind to go to India, where he obtained the appointment of principal to the Government Sanscrit College at Poona. Before he was thirty he had been through the Indian Mutiny. He loved India, he revered Orientalism, he was a mystic, but at the same time a man of the world.

Tennyson was fond of telling stories in the Lincolnshire dialect. The following examples are from his lately published "Life," a work of absorbing interest: A Lincolnshire farmer, coming home on Sunday after a sermon about the endless fires of hell, and talking to his wife, said: "Noa, Sally, it woan't do, noa consti-toon cud stan' it." Another was of a Lincolnshire minister praying for rain: "O God, send us rain, and especially on John Stubbs' field in the middle marsh, and if thou doest not know it, it has a big thorn tree in the middle of it." Yet again: Speaking of American poets, Tennyson said: "I know several striking poems by American poets, but I think that Edgar Poe is, taking his poetry and prose together, the most original American genius." When asked to write an epitaph of one line for Poe's monument in Westminster churchyard, Baltimore, he answered: "How can so strange and so fine a genius, and so sad a life, be expressed and compressed in one line?" And this: On Mr. Lowell asserting that "Wordsworth was no more an 'artist' than Isaiah," Lord Tennyson answered: "I consider Isaiah a very great artist—everything he says is complete and perfect."

Browning was a good poet, but an exceedingly bad reader, and not a good conversationalist. Augustus Hare, in the last volume of "The Story of My Life," says of Browning: "I never heard any one, even a child of ten, read so atrociously. It was two of his own pieces, 'Good News to Ghent,' and 'Ivan Ivanowitch,' the latter always most horrible and unsuitable for reading aloud, but in this case rendered utterly unintelligible by the melodramatic vocal contortions of the reader." Very few authors are able to read their own writings in public. It was painful to hear even Dickens when he appeared first in public; but, in his case, he knew his inability and mastered the art of public reading, until he was a passably good reader.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

A little child was one day playing with a very valuable vase, when he put his hand into it and could not withdraw it. His father, too, tried his best to get it out, but all in vain. They were talking of breaking the vase, when the father said: "Now, my son, make one more try; open your hand and hold your fingers out straight, as you see me doing, and then pull." To their astonishment the little fellow said: "Oh, no, pa, I couldn't put out my fingers like that, for if I did, I would drop my penny." He had been holding on to a penny all the time! No wonder he could not withdraw his hand. How many of us are like him! Drop the copper, surrender, let go, and God will give you gold.—John MacNeil.

A charming story is told of the child of a well-known French painter. The little girl lost her sight in infancy, and her blindness was supposed to be incurable. A famous oculist in Paris, however, performed an operation upon her eyes and restored her sight. Her mother had long been dead and her father had been her only friend and companion. When she was told her blindness could be cured her one thought was that she could see him, and when the cure was complete and the bandages were removed she ran to him, and, trembling, felt of his features, shutting her eyes every now and then as if to make sure that it was he. The father has a noble head and presence, and his every look and motion was watched by his daughter with the keenest delight. For the first time his constant tenderness and care seemed real to her. If he caressed her or even looked upon her kindly, it brought tears to her eyes. "To think," she cried, holding his hand close in hers, "that I have had this father for this many years and never knew him."

CONFERENCE OF CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

Realizing that there is always advantage to be gained by the Christian worker in looking through some one else's eyes and from another standpoint than one's own, a conference has been planned, to meet at Sea Cliff, on the north shore of Long Island, at the beginning of September. It is hoped to bring together in this way those engaged in Christian work of any kind, who seldom have opportunity to meet and exchange news and methods, and who know but little of the work outside of their own fields.

Bible study will be given a place each morning, and for the first three days will be in charge of Professor Frank K. Sanders, of Yale. Twilight services similar in spirit to those on Round Top, Northfield, are to be held at a spot remarkable for its natural beauty.

At the opening session, August 31, Rev. Russell H. Conwell, D. D., will speak on "The Unused Missionary Power in the Churches." Sunday, September 1, is to be young people's day, when it is hoped Rev. Francis E. Clarke will make an address. Sunday-school work occupies Monday, and on Tuesday brotherhood work; Wednesday is to be given to the consideration of practical work in the city—rescue, settlement and kindred forms of Christian activity; Thursday, the closing day, will be devoted to world-wide missions. Rev. Arthur T. Pierson, D. D., is to speak on that day. On Wednesday Hon. Samuel J. Barrows makes an address on the topic, "Jesus as a Penologist." Among other speakers announced are to be found the names of Rev. Phillip S. Moxom; Rev. Madison C. Peters, D. D.; Rev. A. H. McKinney, Ph. D.; Rev. Lester Bradner, Ph D., etc. Ample accommodations, including board and lodging, will be arranged for at $1 to $1.50 per day on application to Rev. George W. Carter, Ph. D., at Sea Cliff, N. Y.

THE BROTHER OF THE KINGDOM.

From July 21 to August 2 was held in Marlborough, N. Y., the ninth annual conference of the organization bearing the above title. It is interdenominational, and is formed upon the following basis: "The Spirit of God is moving men in our generation toward a better understanding of the Kingdom of God on earth. We form ourselves into a Brotherhood of the Kingdom in order to establish this idea in the thought of the Church, and to assist in its practical realization in the world."

The scope of this brotherhood is indicated in its program for this conference. There were four series of addresses, one on "Present-Day Questions of Reform," in which Arthur W. Milbury spoke on "Tenement Improvement" and Hon. S. J. Barrows, of the Prison Association; another on "The Church in Modern Society," its institutions and life, catechetical instruction, etc.; a third dealing with such questions as "The Place of Christ in Modern Theology" and "The Kingdom of God as a Christian Cosmology," and a fourth using as object lessons the sociological experiments of the early Anabaptists and of the Pilgrim Fathers. A twilight devotional service on the hilltop closed each day.

At a business session the principles of the brotherhood were formulated and discussed, and then submitted to a referendum of all the members. A public meeting is to be held during the winter in order to bring the purpose of the brotherhood before a larger constituency. Co-operation with the Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip was arranged for, and correspondence is to be entered into with leaders of the Kingdom movement in England, France and Germany.

The work of this brotherhood in the past ten years gives promise of helpfulness for the future.

ACROSS THE WATER.

A great loss has befallen New Testament scholarship in the death of the Rt. Rev. Brooke Foss Westcott, bishop of Durham, whose writings have long been accorded deference as the work of an acknowledged authority on the subjects of which they treat. Among his best known books are "The Bible in the Church," "The Gospel of the Resurrection," "Christus Consummator," "The Historic Faith" and commentaries on the Gospel and Epistles of John and the Epistles to the Hebrews. With Dr. Hort he edited what is regarded as the standard text of the Greek New Testament. He was a member of the New Testament Revision Company.

Sunday schools in Great Britain have only of late years reached an attendance which compared at all favorably with that in the United States. In 1818 there were less than 500,000 enrolled in the Sunday schools there. Now the number is 6,000,000. To stimulate the work of the teachers and to bring the young people in larger numbers to enter on a Christian life, a national mission is to be held during the first three months of next year. The British National Sunday School Union is making the preparations for this movement, of which great things are hoped.

Methodism will have in London next September the most representative gathering it has ever had. It is peculiarly fitting that such an assembly should meet in the historic Wesley Chapel, City Road. Nearly 300 delegates from the United States and Canada are expected to attend this Ecumenical Conference; thirty of them are bishops, nine of whom are connected with the African M. E. church. The opening address at the conference will be given by Bishop Charles B. Galloway.

The Baptist Union of Wales will not enter the National Free Church Union so long as united communion services are held by it. The place where specially they meet their Lord is the one place where they cannot fraternize with other Christians.

Rev. John Spurgeon, father of C. H. and James Spurgeon, and grandfather of Thomas and Charles Spurgeon, celebrated his ninety-first birthday recently, delivering an address at the laying of the corner stone of a new wing of the Baptist church in South Norwood, near the home of the late C. H. Spurgeon. Another grandson, Mr. Spurgeon Page—recently returned from a mission in Africa—delivered an address at the same time, "rejoicing that he was permitted to proclaim the glories of his grandfather's God."

"Tan Maclaren" (Rev. Dr. John Watson) delivered recently an address before the Manchester Baptist College on "Clinical Theology." He thought it not enough that the candidate for the ministry be instructed and become proficient in what are known as theological studies, but he should have a familiarity with the practical work of the ministry—the pastorate—before being thrust into it. He urged that when a student has finished the prescribed course of study he should attach himself for one or two years to an older and an experienced pastor, and thus learn what is to be done in the ministry, and how to do it. This pastora. work he called "clinical," since it contemplates helping those who are sick in mind and soul as well as in body. Dr. Watson believes that the churches are less disposed than formerly to seek a pastor who is simply a great preacher. They demand, more and more, pastoral work, and seek men who will do it, even though they may not be so great in the pulpit as are some who are of no account elsewhere.

CHICAGO AND VICINITY.

The Presbyterians of Maywood will soon break ground for their new church. It will be of brick and will cost $10,000. Their former building was burned last March. The pastor, Rev. George A. Campbell, expects the new edifice to be ready for occupancy by the first of November.

St. Andrew's Methodist Episcopal congregation are erecting an attractive edifice at the corner of Wabash avenue and Fiftieth street. The exterior design is being executed in plain brick of a dark chocolate color, with broad white mortar joints, terra-cotta ornamentation, and slate roof. The interior will be finished in oak and have a seating capacity of 750. The chapel parts will be finished in Georgia pine and have a seating capacity of 450. The entire structure will cost about $18,000.

Rev. J. Knox Montgomery, of Charlotte, N. C., has accepted the call of the Garfield Boulevard (Eighth) United Presbyterian church, and will enter on his new duties on the first Sunday in September.

Dr. J. H. George, the new president of the Chicago Theological Seminary (Congregational) will also occupy the chair of homiletics, assisted by Rev. William M. Lawrence. Dr. Warren J. Moulton, instructor in biblical studies at Yale University, and Professor Shailer Mathews of the University of Chicago will divide the work formerly in the hands of Professor George A. Gilbert.

Emmanuel Methodist church, at Forty-fourth and Park avenues, is holding dedicatory services August 11-18. The church was organized in 1897 as a mission Sunday school.

The installation of Rev. C. B. McAfee, D. D., as pastor of the Forty-first Presbyterian church, is announced for September 24. The moderator of the presbytery, Rev. W. P. Merrill, will preside. Rev. Dr. H. A. Johnston, former pastor, will preach the sermon and Rev. G. W. Wright will offer the prayer of installation. The charge to the pastor will be given by Rev. J. A. Vance, D. D., of the Hyde Park church, and that to the people by Professor J. Ross Stevenson of McCormick Seminary.

Baptist.

Ruggles Street church, Boston, has been compelled from motives of economy to give up the male quartet which for twenty-three years has sung regularly in that church. During the last ten years not one member of it has been absent a single Sunday. The quartet has been favorably known even beyond New England.

Contributions in the state of Missouri for home and foreign missions show marked improvement over last year. For the ten months of the fiscal year ending October 1 there is an advance of $1,500.

Rev. Thomas Stephenson has decided to return to the pastorate of the First church, Pueblo, Colo., and give up the work of state secretary and general missionary.

Thirty have united with the church in Janesville, Wis., since Rev. Richard M. Vaughan took charge May 19, and others are awaiting baptism.

Rev. C. D. Case, Ph. D., has received seventy-five new members during the first year of his pastorate with the First church at Terre Haute, Ind. The membership has now reached nearly 900.

The annual report of the Baptist Missionary Union shows that 579 of the native churches under its care are self-supporting. Of these Burma has 495, Assam 57, India 14, China 6, Japan 1 and Africa 6. The number of outstations is 1,335 and of schools 1,347, with 36,428 pupils. The denomination has 479 foreign missionaries, with a church membership of 112,163. Baptisms on the foreign field in the last year numbered 12,099.

West Park Baptist mission, St. Louis, held services in its new chapel August 11. The building and ground cost $10,000. It will not be dedicated until the return of the Rev. Dr. Williamson, pastor-elect of the Third church.

Rev. Fred D. Hale, pastor for five years of the Third church, Owensboro, Ky., has accepted a call to Bales chapel, Kansas City. With the church he is leaving 885 persons have united during the five years.

Congregational.

The Center church, Torrington, Conn., has made a net gain of ninety resident members for the year, and heads the list of Congregational churches in the country in this respect. The total additions for the year were 109. This is in spite of the fact that Rev. Dr. Chamberlin, the pastor, has been out of health for a large part of the year.

Special meetings held in East Tallahassee, Ala., in May have shown results in a doubling of the membership of Liberty church. The Sunday school, organized in April with forty-eight attendants, has grown to 148, with an average attendance of 115.

The North church, Columbus, O., has long been under a burden of debt. Efforts to remove it were not very successful, so the pastor, Rev. W. Leon Dawson, left his pulpit to the care of his deacons while he undertook the canvass. The necessary amount—$4,000—has now been subscribed.

Three Congregational pastors were on the ground at the county seat of Kiowa county, Oklahoma, to get lots and commence church work. They have a tent.

Home Missionary Superintendent Daley of South Dakota does not stop work on account of the heat. He organized two Sunday schools July 20 after a drive of forty-five miles with the thermometer at 103 degrees in the shade.

Bethlehem church, Los Angeles, has public baths connected with its institutional department, thus supplying a great want. For the month of July 3,000 were admitted to them. Second-hand clothing is given to those in actual need, but to those having employment it is sold at low rates.

At Wardner, Idaho, a series of meetings were begun July 1 on the street in front of the largest saloon and billiard hall in town, from 7:30 to 8:30 o'clock every night. A baby organ was used. Two or three hundred men gathered round the speaker at each service—90 per cent non-church-goers. There is evidence of good results. The meetings have since been held in other places.

At Lawton, Okla., during the opening of the Indian lands, Rev. C. H. Bente, of Seneca, Kas., was on hand with a large number of his former Kansas parishioners—a nucleus for the first Congregational church at Lawton (Fort Sill). A large new tent bore the words, "Congregational Headquarters." There was a choir of young men, and Chaplain Hammond gave a large number of hymn books for their use.

The North church, Columbus, O., has been enabled, by the aid of sister churches, to cancel an indebtedness of $4,000.

Rev. E. Munson Hill, D. D., pastor of Calvary church, Montreal, and a graduate of Beloit College and Andover Seminary, has accepted the position of principal of the Congregational College at Montreal, just vacated by Rev. J. H. George, who comes to Chicago as president of Chicago Theological Seminary.

Fifteen new Sunday schools have been established in North Dakota since the beginning of the year, and at least six church organizations are already under way.

The Disciples.

The Disciples are active in Colorado. One is conducting the Bible studies at the Rocky Mountain Chautauqua, fifty miles south of Denver, and another presides at the Boulder Chautauqua. Three union Sunday-school teachers' meetings are held each week in Denver, for Bible study, under the auspices of the Superintendents' Union, and are conducted by a Disciple. The president of the Ministerial Alliance of Denver is a Disciple, and so is the treasurer of the Arapahoe County Sunday School Association.

Miss Madge L. Kent, of Chagrin Falls, Ohio, a graduate of the School of Pastoral Helpers in last year's class, has been employed as assistant to Rev. G. H. Farley, of Pleasantville, Ky., who preaches for three country churches.

Rev. W. W. Warren died July 31 at his home in Osceola, Mo. He served in the state legislature as representative of St. Clair county.

Christian Memorial church of Rock Island has extended a unanimous call to the Rev. Thomas J. Shuey, of Valparaiso, Ind., to become its pastor. It is believed that Mr. Shuey will accept the call.

St. Louis will soon have four new pastors in the churches belonging to the Disciples: John L. Brandt, of Valparaiso, Ind., at the First church; G. B. Ireland, of Wabash, Ind., at Carondelet; Paul H. Castle, of Centralia, Ill., at the West End, and Howard T. Cree, of Maysville, Ky., at Central church.

Michigan has 1,000 members in the Christian Women's Board of Missions.

A CHANGE BREAKFAST.

Getting Ready for Warm Weather.

As the warm days approach it is well to give some thought to an easy way to prepare breakfast. A food that is already cooked and simply needs to be treated with a little cold milk or cold cream, is ideal on that point, and such a food can be found in Grape-Nuts, at 15 cents per package.

It is sold by all grocers, and is so highly concentrated that not more than three or four teaspoonfuls are required for the cereal part of the meal. This makes the food very economical and does not overtax the stomach with a great volume.

at "a half million by 1905." This board assists congregations in obtaining a church edifice by timely loans at a low rate of interest—just enough to cover the cost of handling. At the present time there are about 2,700 homeless congregations needing buildings.

Since 1875 the members of the Church of Christ in Southern California have increased from 1,000 to 5,000, with thirty-three church buildings and property valued at nearly $200,000.

At the Christian convention at Santa Cruz, Cal., a committee from the Baptist convention at Twin Lakes proposed co-operation between the Baptists and Disciples, so that in small towns and villages duplication of church plants may be avoided. They also proposed that the two bodies unite in upbuilding a college and seminary so as to have one strong institution instead of two lesser ones. A committee of five was appointed by the Christian convention to confer on these points with a similar committee from the Baptists, to be appointed by their state association in the autumn.

Rev. M. L. Bates, who resigns at Newark, Ohio, to accept a call to Warren, has built up a strong church in the five years he has been at Newark. From forty members it has increased to 450, the Sunday school from twenty-five to 300, and the debt has been reduced from $7,200 to $3,000.

Extensive preparations are being made for the missionary convention in Minneapolis in October. This embraces the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, the American Christian Missionary Society, the Christian Woman's Board of Missions and the Church Extension Board.

Mrs. Phoebe C. Dunn, of Marion, Iowa, has left by will $1,000 to Drake University, $1,000 for church extension, $1,000 for the Home Missionary Society, $500 each to the Home for Aged Women and the Home for the Friendless, Cedar Rapids, Ia., and $200 for the Christian church at Hammond, La. Property in Marion, valued at $3,000, is deeded to the Christian church in Marion.

Rev. Cecil J. Armstrong has resigned the pastorate of the South Side church, Lexington, Ky. The membership has almost doubled in the nearly two years he has been there.

The Central and First churches of Lincoln, Neb., have united. Rev. T. J. Thompson is pastor.

Episcopal.

Rt. Rev. Dr. Abram Newkirk Littlejohn, Bishop of Long Island, died very suddenly from apoplexy August 3, at Williamstown, Mass. He was consecrated bishop in 1869. The year previous he had been elected Bishop of Central New York, but declined the office. He was 76 years old.

Rev. H. Percy Silver, rector of St. John's church, St. Louis, has been appointed as a chaplain in the regular army and assigned to the 30th infantry, stationed at Manila.

The Episcopal church has made good progress in Montana the past year. There has been a net gain of fifty-nine baptisms and an increase of forty-seven confirmations and 155 communicants. The Sunday schools have gained twenty teachers and 242 pupils. There has been an increase of $150 in gifts for missions in Montana and $100 in gifts for general missions, while returns for parochial purposes have grown $5,335. There is an increase of $27,891 in the value of church property.

Rev. Frederick William Taylor, D. D., of Springfield, Ill., was consecrated August 6 as Bishop Coadjutor of the diocese of Quincy. Six bishops participated in the ceremonies.

The Lenten offerings of Episcopal Sunday schools for missions amounted this year to $101,247.42.

Methodist.

Saloons have been driven out of Jamestown, O., by a vote of 223 to 106. Rev. U. G. Humphrey, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church, led the fight.

The Campbell Avenue M. E. church, Detroit, has exerted a beneficial and refining influence over the neighborhood by the work of its members in turning an unsightly vacant lot adjoining its building into an attractive flower garden, laid out in the form of a Maltese cross. It is said that not a single chud has injured or picked flowers from it.

Rev. Frost Craft, pastor of the First church of Decatur, Ill., has been chosen as pastor of Trinity church, Denver, to succeed Rev. Camden M. Cobern, who comes to Chicago.

During the past year Methodists in Cleveland have paid off indebtedness on their churches to the amount of $150,000. There are thirty-one Methodist churches in Cleveland. There is still $92,700 to be raised to clear them all of debt.

Presbyterian.

Jefferson Avenue church, Detroit, has secured the Rev. W. H. Culver, of Brighton, Mich., as "boys'" pastor, a new plan of work among the boys and young men of the congregation.

In Michigan the Presbyterians have increased their membership in the last six years from 29,725 to 31,747. Alma College has an endowment of $250,000 and an attendance of over 300 students. Michigan Seminary, at Kalamazoo, has about 100 young lady students, and is well equipped with buildings.

The Minutes of the General Assembly show that the additions to the Presbyterian church by profession of faith during the past year were 54,252, a trifle lower than the average, and the net increase 17,699, which is considerably more than usual and more than double that of two years ago. The total membership now is 1,025,388. Sunday school enrollment also shows a slight gain, and stands at 1,058,110. Every board is out of debt. Gifts to Home Missions reached a little over the million and a quarter mark; those to foreign missions a little over $900,000. The most notable increase was in the gifts to schools and colleges.

Rev. J. D. McCaughy, Ph. D., of Ottawa, has accepted a call to the Park church, Streator, Ill., which has a membership of 550 and a Sunday school of 750.

At Stout, Iowa, a church has been organized and an edifice costing $2,000 erected.

The church at Clinton, Iowa, under the care of Rev. J. K. Fowler, D. D., is making good progress. Twenty-four new members were received at the last communion, nineteen by profession of faith. A home department has been organized in connection with the Sunday school.

The Young People's Christian Union of Eighth Church, Allegheny, Pa., recently voted to expend $100 to start a reading room and gymnasium in the basement of their handsome new church, for the use of the young men of the church and vicinity. It will be ready for use in a few weeks and be open each week day evening.

Rev. Albert A. James has been pastor of the Fairforest church, S. C., since 1851. No less than five churches have been organized within the bounds of this church, and he has the care of all of them. Although 77 years old, he preaches usually at two places every Sunday. He has never taken a vacation. He has had many calls to more remunerative parishes, but has declined them all. In all these years his salary has not averaged over $500 or $600 per annum, with no manse.

Rev. Ira C. Tyson, D. D., of Pueblo,

BREAKFAST ON DRINK.

Coffee Makes Many Dyspeptics

"Coffee and I had quite a tussle. Two years ago I was advised by the doctor to quit the use of coffee, for I had a chronic case of dyspepsia and serious nervous troubles, which did not yield to treatment. I was so addicted to coffee that it seemed an impossibility to quit, but when I was put on Postum Cereal Food Coffee, there was no trouble in making the change, and today I am a well woman.

"One of the lady teachers in our public schools was sick and nervous. Frequently the only thing she took for breakfast was a cup of coffee; I urged her to try leaving off the coffee and use Postum instead. Went so far as to send her a sample from my box and give her directions. She now uses nothing but Postum Food Coffee and told me a short time ago that she was perfectly well.

"It is easy to make good Postum, once a person becomes accustomed to it. Put four heaping teaspoons to the pint of water and after it comes up to a boil, see that from that time on it boils fifteen or twenty minutes, then use good cream and you have a drink that would be relished by the Queen. Be sure and put a piece of butter size of a pea in the pot to prevent boiling over." Mrs. Lizzie Whittaker, Kidder, Mo. Postum is sold by all first-class grocers at 15 and 25 cents per package.

Col., died July 22. His active ministerial life covered thirty-eight years. In 1881 he was moderator of the Synod of New York.

Bellevue College, Nebraska, is to have a new hall for boys, a duplicate largely of the Lowrie hall for girls. When the new one is completed this college will have four residence halls, capable of accommodating 150 students. A Bible school is to be held there from August 12 to August 19. Rev. Drs. William J. Erdman of Philadelphia, Matthew Lowrie, Joseph J. Lampe, Alex. G. Wilson and Stephen Phelps being the instructors.

Open-air meetings were held by Presbyterian ministers and laymen at El Reno, O. T., during the registration rush. On Sunday, July 21, twenty persons expressed their desire to begin a new life, and six confessed that they had backslidden, but wished to make a new start.

FOREIGN MISSIONARY ITEMS.

A co-operative measure among the Congregational, Presbyterian and Baptist bodies of Japan is that of a union hymn book. Rev. George Allchin, who has just come to this country with his family on furlough, had the satisfaction of seeing this plan well advanced before leaving. He has been an earnest advocate of the idea of making a common list of hymns a help to a larger Christian sympathy.

There has been a marked increase in the circulation of the Scriptures in Japan during the past year. The total circulation for 1900 was 137,422 copies of Bibles, Testaments and portions, an increase of 39,000 copies over 1899. The increase in the sale of books on commission, as distinguished from colporteurs, is also gratifying. There were 4,264 sold in the country last year, and 1,402 during the first quarter of 1901. As regards the printing of the Scriptures, Japan has already come to take a high place among the nations. Within the past few years, besides the large editions printed for use in Japan, many thousands of copies of the Scriptures have been printed for circulation in other lands. These issues represent the Chinese, Korean and Tibetan languages, besides two of the dialects of the Philippine Islands.

More than 600 people attended the funeral of Mackay, the pioneer missionary of Formosa, and of these more than 200 were non-Christians who respected him. All the Europeans in north Formosa were present, including diplomatic agents. The mourning and lamentation of the native converts, and especially the pastors whom he had trained, are described as being most extreme.

The 3,400 children now in the care of the missionaries of the American Marathi Mission cost $68,000 a year. The American Board, while in sympathy with this labor of love, does not hold itself responsible for this money. The burden of the $68,000, therefore, falls on the individual members of the small band of missionaries connected with the Marathi Mission. Men and women with salaries just sufficient for their own needs have therefore assumed an expense twice as great as the American Board gives that mission for its general work.

Encouraging news comes from China as to the change of feeling towards the missionaries. Dr. McCartney, a missionary of the Methodist Board, reports that during a journey of 2,000 miles through the interior he had not once heard the epithet "foreign devil," a remarkable fact, for it was in constant use before the Boxer uprising. Rev. J. W. Lowrie, of the Presbyterian Board, writes of a great chance at Pao-Ting-Fu, which was one of the centers of the recent uprising. Here the Boxers destroyed the mission property and caused the death of several of the missionaries. Dr. Lowrie recently held a memorial service on the ruins of the mission buildings, and the Chinese officials expressed to him great regret for the destruction of property and the murder of the missionaries. They also offered the mission sixteen acres of land for the establishment of a new station. Encouraging reports come from other missionaries, though disorder still prevails in some quarters.

General.

The Illinois Christian Endeavor convention will be held at Danville October 3-6. Secretary John Willis Baer of Boston, John R. Mott of New York, Rev. Cleland B. McAfee, D. D., Professor Herbert L. Willett and Dr. S. A. Wilson are on the program.

The Hebrews of New York laid the corner stone of another edifice for the Mt. Sinai Hospital in New York city recently, and the address of the day was delivered by a Christian, President Seth Low of Columbia University. He said: "I hail with joy everything that brings men of different creeds together in a world so full of mystery and so hedged about by the unknown. Men cannot always see eye to eye, even as to the vital things in life, but at least they can recognize that, however much they differ, it is a human eye that looks and a human soul that is troubled or illumined by the vision. I count it not the least of the services which our hospitals have rendered to this community that not one of them asks, when a sick or wounded person is brought to its doors, whether he is Jew or Gentile, Protestant or Catholic."

The pastors of the Baptist, Congregational, Episcopal and Methodist churches of Hingham, Mass., have been holding an out-door conference on the extension of the Kingdom. Addresses were given on Bible Study, Home and Foreign Missions, and Young People's Work.

summer work of the churches is adopted by the First Reformed church of Brooklyn, the Memorial Presbyterian, Grace Methodist and the Sixth Avenue Baptist. These churches unite to hire a resident pastor to attend to parish duties, and noted pulpit talent is engaged for the Sunday services, held in one of the churches.

Union twilight services under the auspices of the Congregational and Methodist churches are held in the park at Gowrie, Iowa, with a union young people's meeting immediately following.

The Forest Avenue church, Kansas City, Mo., is freed from debt. The amount was $5,100. A jubilation meeting was held July 7. Rev. A. W. Kokendoffer thus concludes his ten years' work there.

A new church has been recently dedicated at Pond Creek, Oklahoma.

The Mt. Vernon, Mo., church, Rev. C. E. Brown, pastor, has received fifty-six additions from a series of meetings held in a large tabernacle, H. C. Patterson being the evangelist. From 800 to 1,000 people gathered every night to the services.

A home mission rally was held in a tent one mile east of Ladoga, Ind., July 7. Two thousand people were present and over $100 was given for home missions.

There have been thirty additions to the church at Battle Ground, Ind., within the past eight months, under the ministry of Rev. A. W. Jackson.

Rev. Mr. J. H. MacNeill, who has been pastor of the First Church of Christ at Muncie, Ind., for about three years, has tendered his resignation. It will take effect the last Sunday in September.

After twenty-five years of labor the Church of Scotland's mission at Blantyre, south of Lake Nyassa, Africa, has a most encouraging state of things to report. In addition to the admirable industrial, medical and educational activities, the spiritual outlook is gratifying. In the native church at Blantyre there are 367 communicants and 164 Christian children, making a total of 531 native members, and no less than thirteen schools and 729 scholars. In the church, which is a handsome modern structure, not surpassed, if equaled, by any similar erection between the Cape and Cairo, and is entirely the workmanship of the African converts, the whole mission, teachers and scholars, Europeans and natives, gather for prayer daily. Besides worship on the Lord's day, communion is celebrated monthly, when natives and Europeans sit down together—a spectacle rarely seen elsewhere in Africa.

Dr. John G. Paton has returned to the field of his life-work in the South Pacific, after a vacation of two years spent mainly in pleading the cause of missions. In twenty-two islands of the New Hebrides the people are now under Christian instruction, but there are still from 40,000 to 60,000 cannibals left in other islands of the group, as against 18,000 Christians and 3,000 church members. A hindrance to the work is the traffic in laborers for the plantations in Australia and New Caledonia, which is often a form of kidnapping and slavery.

Open-air Sunday evening services, in which the Methodist, Baptist and Presbyterian churches of Rolfe, Iowa, unite, are held on the lawn of the Presbyterian church, and are well attended.

Five churches in Marshall, Mo., have united in a series of meetings led by Rev. Dr. H. M. Wharton for four weeks in July. Some 200 persons have been added to the membership of these churches. Every night the great tent was crowded with from 2,000 to 2,500 people, and this when the thermometer reached 110 degrees during the day. There was no excitement.

Several of the central city churches of Syracuse, N. Y., unite during August and are supplied by President Stewart of Auburn Theological Seminary, who preaches in the different churches by turns and presides at the mid-week prayer meetings of the church where he preached the previous Sunday. He also attends to calls for visiting the sick or conducting funerals.

Alone in His Glory.

(From the Washington Star.)

A New York man, who has written a book, was telling about it the other day to a friend who had once done him a service.

"By the way," said the author, "I would be delighted to give you a copy of my work if you care for it."

"I should be more than pleased to have it," was the reply; "especially if you will write your name in it."

"All right. There is a bookstore just around the corner. If you will accompany me we will go there and get it. I don't happen to have a copy in my office just now."

After they had stopped to glance at some of the new things in the book store the author hailed a clerk, and, pushing his chest out very far, asked for the novel that he had written.

"Yes, sir," the clerk said. "We have it around here somewhere, I believe, but you are the first one who has ever asked for a copy, and it may take some time to find it. Wouldn't something else do just as well? We have a great many better books at the same price."

Some Boston people and certain Englishmen who are afraid our language is being corrupted by uneducated Americans think "kick," when it is used as a synonym for object or complain is slang. In the First Book of Samuel, second chapter and twenty-ninth verse we may read:

"Wherefore kick ye at my sacrifice and at mine offering, which I have commanded in mine habitation?"

Mr. Miyaki, who came as the representative of the Y. M. C. A. in Japan to the jubilee convention, spoke of his country as "the empire of the rising sun," emphasizing the work of Christian women in that country, and paying a beautiful tribute to his own mother, who was one of the first fruits of Christian instruction in Okayama, where the Pettees and Carys have labored so faithfully. "It is a blessed thing to have a good Christian mother" seemed to mean more from Japanese lips than when spoken by an English voice. He has been for ten years pastor of a church in Osaka, a city of 75,000 souls, where there are four Kumiai churches, all self-supporting. He is also principal of the girls' school in Osaka, now twenty-three years old.

regular one-way fare. Tickets are good to return any time within five days.

Neither of these tickets will permit a stop-over. The stop-over privileges may be had, however, on the $16.00 excursion tickets which are good for return until October 31st. These same rates apply to Niagara Falls, so that by purchasing tickets to the latter point, visitors may enjoy a trip to the Falls without additional charge.

We begin to notice irregularities in our bodily functions, which we have never noticed before. Rev. Jos. I am thankful to God for this wonderful medicine. Although past eighty-one years old, this remedy has helped me wonderfully. Dr. Peter's Blood Vitalizer rejuvenates the old and makes the weak strong. ### Cool and Happy in Summer.

"Oh, dear, is it not frightfully hot? How do you ever stand it?" asked Mrs. Brown one day at noon, as she dropped into her neighbor's darkened parlor on her way home from a "bargain hunting" expedition down town.

"Take a fan," said her hostess, hospitably, "and rest a while. You do not find it warm here, do you?"

"No," admitted the other, wiping her flushed cheeks, and fanning vigorously as several bundles fell from her lap on the floor, "it is cool here, and you look it; how do you manage it?"

"Ah! that is my secret, but I will be generous and give you the recipe."

"Please do, for you know that Mrs. Jackson, Mrs. Jones and I were talking of you the other day, what a wonder you are, and how you never fret about the heat, but go on in the even tenor of your ways, and seem to get some good out of this hot old town."

"I see you have guessed the secret, or part of it; that is, I never fret, or rather I try not to do so. In the first place, it worries poor Mr. Lee, and you know since we lost our money, he is very sensitive about keeping me and the children in town in summer; but I tell him we are well and are having a pleasant time in spite of circumstances."

"Tell me more," again interrupted the visitor.

"Well, to begin with, I never go out in the hot part of the day, unless most urgent business calls me, for you know one need not go to the markets or provision stores more than once a week at most; orders left or sent on Monday will be carried out for the remainder of the week, the man coming every day with the things, or to receive fresh commands. The same way about the groceries, the butter, milk, eggs and fruit—all are left here daily so that no unnecessary journeys in the hot sun are required, and besides such a system of housekeeping, when you have but one servant, is a comfort."

"But I always supposed that way of keeping house was more expensive."

"No, I fancy not; that is, if you keep yourself informed of current prices, and that is easy enough, for a glance at the papers, or an occasional trip to the stores upon a cool day, usually makes one up to date in what things should cost."

"But the children, how do you manage them?"

"Fortunately, our little yard has a tree in it, and we purchased two cart loads of sand, and an old awning, and now Billy and Kitty think themselves at the seashore, and all day long they revel in the sand with their spades and buckets. I got the idea from the Children's Play Grounds, and it works like a charm."

"I have heard of it; my May has been begging me for a sand pile lately; she said all the children come in and have larkly times in your yard."

"That they do and are welcome to. Send May and Edna in any day; they are good little things and no trouble; in fact they are all so amused I never hear any but the happiest sounds of laughter, through the windows, which encourages me in my work."

"But their clothes."

"Clothes," the hostess laughed; "they don't wear any to speak of. Kitty has a couple of gingham frocks, which have been washed so often there is no more color left to come out, and Billy a pair of overalls, these they wear over their little drawers and shirts, and they need no petticoats, or even shoes and stockings. They are bathed, of course, every afternoon, and dressed like small Christians again, and then after an early tea we take them car riding, or sometimes we start still sooner and take our supper along and have an impromptu sail or picnic in the country somewhere. In fact, every evening we do this, and so the children sleep well, and it is good for their father and me, too."

"But your servant's day out?"

"That never worries me a bit. She simply leaves out a little repast for us after an early dinner, and you know all my silver and valuables are in the Safe Deposit in summer, so I do not have to think of those things, and we shut the house up in the most independent manner and go where we please."

many women. What do prizes amount to? Not worth considering. Cannot pay you for poorer work, greater expense and risk to clothes, which you get with an inferior washing powder. Any woman who uses PEARLINE has a prize, and will save enough to buy more and better knick-knacks.

Pearline Saves <sup>652</sup>

"How easy it sounds, as you tell it."

"No easier than it is; the great mistake we Americans make is never giving ourselves rest from our so-called duties. Now, I let the house keep itself in summer, and have no rigid rules, except that we shall eat only the best and healthiest food for the season. You notice that my furniture, ornaments and pictures are covered, so no everlasting dusting."

"They look so cool, too, with your pretty pink cheese cloth covers," sighed the visitor enviously.

"Yes, it is pretty, I think, and I never pretend to keep down carpets or rugs, either, in summer, and the matting you see is cheap, yet durable, and is attractive looking."

"It is lovely," said the other more admiringly, "and you yourself are even more charming in your delightful simple little blue gown."

"Five-cent lawn I made myself, and easily laundered, for you know I find the conventional shirt waist even a grasshopper's burden in the dog days; therefore, all my gowns are on this order, plain and cool in appearance."

"Just the kind men love."

The hostess smiled. "So Mr. Lee says; he declares I am a picture when he comes home from his office, and I serve him with iced tea, or some cool refreshing beverage. Is not that a compliment for a ten-year-old husband to pay?"

"Indeed it is, and I don't wonder you deserve it; accustomed, too, as you were, to have your lovely trips to Newport and Bar Harbor, to be contented now is a miracle."

"Oh, well, I dare say I would like a bit of gay life again, but as I can't have it just now, this town experience is not half bad so long as we keep well, and, at all events, poor Mr. Lee is not at the mercy of his restaurant or club. Besides, we both like the Bohemian side of life occasionally, and find it in these car rides, sails and roof gardens, for sometimes after the young ones are safely in their little 'downys' he and I go out for a regular spree and discover out-of-the-way parks and queer streets, and thus see town from different aspects."

"Then you must have a good maid to leave your children in her care so often."

"Indeed I have. Hannah is a treasure, and I hope she, too, enjoys this hot summer. I see that she has a car-ride quite often, and we try to throw in her way some little pleasure."

"Dear me, I must go, but you have given me some useful hints how to make the best of things," said Mrs. Brown, gathering her bundles together as she bade good-bye to her friend who had discovered how to be cool and happy in town.—Mrs. Russell Wetmore in the Observer.

Epitaphs in a Tyrolean Church-Yard.

A German traveller has discovered some quaint epitaphs in a Tyrolean cemetery.

On a tombstone in a valley of Tux was this inscription: "In pious remembrance of the honest widow Anna Kriedl, forty years long." A miller is thus remembered: "In Christian memory of H—, who departed this life without human assistance."

A farmer whose initials only are given, and who appears to have been the author of his own epitaph, has this memorial: "Here rests in God, F. K. He lived twenty-six years as man, and thirty-seven years as husband."

On the tomb of a man who fell from a roof and was killed are these words, "Here fell Jacob Hosenkopf from the roof into eternity."

This wail of a desolate husband caps the climax: "Tears cannot bring thee back to life, therefore I weep."

Bray's Enemy.

"Please, Mr. Joynes, there's a little boy at the back gate to see you."

"At the back gate? Bring him in, Peter."

"He won't come in, sir; says he's awful busy, and hasn't got time."

"How big is he?"

"About as big as my fist, sir," said Peter.

The good-natured gentleman went out to the back gate. "Well, countryman," he said, pleasantly, "what can I do for you?"

The small boy—he was a very small boy—took off a soft, dirty hat and held it behind him. "I've come to tell you, sir, that Bray's got to be killed."

"Bray, my big Newfoundland dog? And who sent you here with that information?" asked the gentleman, losing all his pleasant looks.

"Nobody sent me," answered the boy, stoutly; "I've come by myself. Bray has runned my sheep free days. He's got to be killed."

"Where did you get any sheep?" asked Mr. Joynes.

"My sheep are Mr. Ransom's. He gives me fifteen cents a week for watching 'em."

"Did you tell Mr. Ransom that Bray had been running them?"

"No, sir; I telled you."

"Ah, that is well. I don't want to kill Bray. Suppose I give you fifteen cents a week for not telling Mr. Ransom when Bray runs his sheep; how would that do?"

As soon as the little shepherd got the idea into his head he scornfully rejected it. "That 'ud be paying me for a lie," he said indignantly. "I wouldn't tell lies for all the money in the world."

When he said this, Mr. Joynes took off his own hat and reached down and took the small, dirty hand in his. "Hurrah, herdsman!" said he. "I beg your pardon for offering you a bribe. Now I know that the keeper of Mr. Ransom's sheep is not afraid of a man four times his size, but that he is afraid of a lie. Hurrah for you! I am going to tell Mr. Ransom that if he doesn't raise your wages I shall offer you twice fifteen cents and take you into my service. Meantime, Bray shall be shut up while your sheep are on my side of the hill. Will that do? All right, then. Good morning, countryman."—Sunbeam.

It's His Customer.

A New York merchant called to a little bootblack to give him a shine. The little fellow came rather slowly for one of his guild, and planted his box down under the merchant's foot. Before he could get his brushes out another large boy ran up, and calmly pushing the little one aside, said:

"Here, you go sit down, Jimmy."

The merchant at once became indignant at what he took to be a piece of outrageous bullying, and sharply told the newcomer to clear out.

"Oh, dat's all right, boss," was the reply. "I'm only going to do it for him; you see he's been sick in the hospital for more than a month, and can't do much work yet, so us boys all turn in and give him a lift when we can."

"Is that so, Jimmy?" asked the merchant, turning to the smaller boy.

"Yes, sir," wearily answered the boy, and as he looked up the pallid, pinched face could be discerned even through the grime that covered it. "He does it for me—if you'll let him."

"Certainly; go ahead"; and as the bootblack plied the brush the merchant plied him with questions. "You say that all the boys help him in this way?"

"Yes, sir. When they ain't got no job themselves, and Jimmy gets one, they turns in and helps him."

"What percentage do you charge him on each job?"

"Hey?" queried the boy—"don't know what you mean."

"I mean what part of the money do you give Jimmy, and how much do you keep?"

"Bet your life I don't keep none; I ain't such a sneak."

"You give it all to him?"

"Yes, I do. All the boys give up what they get on his job. I'd like to catch any feller sneaking it on a sick boy."

The shine being completed the merchant handed the urchin a quarter, saying:

"I guess you're a pretty good fellow, so you keep a dime and give the rest to Jimmy."

"Can't do it, sir; it's his customer. Here you be, Jim."

He threw him the coin and was off like a shot after a customer for himself—a veritable rough diamond. There are many such lads, with warm and generous hearts under their ragged coats.

The House Mother's Prayer.

A friend from the interior writes: "In a little old book of daily readings, 'Bogatzky's Golden Treasury,' I have read today, for the twenty-fourth year, a delightfully simple and helpful prayer. Long since it was copied upon a card and placed in a corner of the glass upon my bureau, and many times I have copied it for my friends, especially for busy mothers, that they also might be helped by its practical thought:

"Lord, preserve me calm in my spirit.

"Gentle in my commands.

"And watchful that I speak not unadvisedly with my lips.

"Moderate in my purposes.

"Yielding in my temper.

"And at the same time steadfast in my principles. Amen."

Here is a suggestion from The Union Signal that may be helpful to some one:

"Even though you do not live in the crowded tenement in the stifling city, the summer days find you feeling faint by the way. You are so busy that your pleasant home and surroundings cannot help you. The King's business requires such haste that you have hastened too much and waste of your own powers has ensued. For the work's sake you need a dose of fresh air yourself. Listen: For the next week eat at least two meals a day out of doors. Do not make work of it. It is play. Sandwiches, a dish of peaches, some 'boughten' cookies and lemonade is a delicious out-of-door menu. In lieu of dragging out the heavy table spread a small dry goods box with a napkin or so. Plates, spoons, glasses, napkins—a lap-lunch under the sky and nerves responding to the balu of air and trees and sky. Quite worth while—for the work's sake, you know!

FOR ONLY

Does This Interest You?

The Christian Century is a new undenominational religious weekly published to meet a wide and growing demand for a paper that is thoroughly evangelical and abreast of the ripest scholarship, an authority on pure literature, and a medium of communication between the different denominations. Its aim will be to give a record and an interpretation of the leading events in the religious world. It will seek at once to mirror and to mould religious thought and life. In the sweep of its vision and the breadth of its sympathies it will endeavor to be as wide as Christianity itself. In a word, it will stand for essential and universal Christianity.

Promoters and Contributors

Behind this undertaking are men of the highest financial standing. The Editorial management is in the hands of Professor W. Douglas Mackenzie, D. D., of the Chicago Theological Seminary, Rev. James M. Campbell, D. D., well known through his numerous books, and Prof. Herbert L. Willett, Ph. D., of the University of Chicago. These men are known as leaders in modern thought and scholarship. Some of the ablest scholars and writers of America and Europe will contribute to its columns. On the list are such names as Dr. Marcus Dods of Scotland, Dr. Washington Gladden, Dr. Amory H. Bradford, Dr. Josiah Strong, Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, Professor Graham Taylor, etc. Dr. Wm. Adamson, editor of The Christian News, Glasgow, Scotland, will furnish an occasional British letter, and an original story by Dr. Clarence A. Vincent, of Galesburg, Ill., will appear in the early fall numbers. During the fall and winter months a series of special numbers will be issued giving Symposiums on the practical aspects of Christian work. These will be followed by a series on the Fad Religions of the day, and these in turn by a series on such vital questions as The Second Coming of Christ. These are but suggestive hints of special features which will combine to make The Christian Century an interesting and timely religious journal.

How You May Aid the Enterprise

In order to secure a wide and speedy introduction of the paper it will be sent as a trial subscription to names not now on the list from the time the order is received till January 1, 1902, for 25 Cents. The management asks the active co-operation of all who are interested in the furtherance of such an enterprise. You can be of valuable service by securing among your friends as large a number as possible of these trial subscriptions. May we not depend upon you to act promptly in this matter? You will certainly not miss this opportunity to supply yourself with this valuable paper for the balance of the year at such a nominal price. Let us hear from you at once with your own subscription and as many more as possible. The regular subscription price is $1.50 per year.

Christian Melodies

BY PROF. WM. J. KIRKPATRICK

Professor Wm. J. Kirkpatrick, the author of CHRISTIAN MELODIES, is one of the leading and best known gospel song writers in the world today. His songs have been sung the world over in almost every town. Some of his songs have been translated and sung in all languages. He has the advantage of many years of experience as a musician and song writer, and has put the best productions of his life time, as well as the best songs of the principal song writers of the country, into CHRISTIAN MELODIES. This certainly insures for this book the greatest variety and the best quality of songs.

A Book of the Rarest Musical Gems

This is the universal pronouncement of all musicians who have used or examined this new and popular song book. All responses from those using the book are enthusiastic praises. "Best book of the kind I have ever seen." "The more we use it the better we like it." "Gets better all the time;" etc. These are samples of expressions received. No other book on the market approaches it as an all-purpose church song book. It is mechanically perfect, neat, artistic and durable. It contains 102 pages and 227 songs.

FAC-SIMILE OF COVER, REDUCED.

PROF. WM. J. KIRKPATRICK.

THE CHOICEST SONGS OF THE CENTURY

Every song writer has a few favorite songs—or those which he regards as his best—and which make for the author his reputation. Every musician has also his own peculiar style. A book written principally by one man does not excel, as it has no variety of style and but a few very good songs. In CHRISTIAN MELODIES, eighty leading song writers have contributed their favorite or best songs. This insures not only a collection of the most excellent songs, but also the greatest variety of style. This is why people never grow tired of the songs in CHRISTIAN MELODIES. Besides its large number of the latest songs it contains a great many of the old songs that have become popular favorites and never die.

No expense was spared in the production of this book. The best songs were secured regardless of their cost. Many very good songs were rejected because not good enough. No other book shows such care and judgment in excluding the inferior and including only the best. No cheap devices or make shifts, such as rivets were used in binding. It is a hand sewed book, which is the best and most expensive style of binding. If you want the most popular, best wearing and most satisfactory all-around song book get Christian Melodies, pronounced by all who have used it, "A Book of Gems." It is the best and cheapest.

DEAR MADAM:

We take the liberty once more to call your attention to that most remarkable plan we have of advertising and introducing Solid Cuevee Silverware—namely, by giving away samples of it. As we told you in our last letter, we believe that from a practical, common-sense point of view Solid Cuevee Silver is actually better than Solid Sterling Silver—and it costs about one-sixth as much. We believe it with all our might. If we didn't we wouldn't be startling the reading public with an offer that involves the expenditure of many thousands of dollars for free samples. Solid Cuevee Silver is the same metal all the way through. We guarantee it to wear for fifty years. It has the color of sterling silver. There is nothing else like it (with the exception of sterling silver) and nothing else just as good. It is harder, will wear longer and will not tarnish as quickly as sterling silver. We can't continue this sample distribution much longer, but once more we renew the offer to you. Here it is: Select any pattern of Solid Cuevee Silver Sugar Shell shown below, and we will send it to you free of charge. You don't have to buy anything to get it. The gift will be unconditional. With the sugar shell we will include a full set of six teaspoons to match. Sell two sets like them and sample set of teaspoons, as well as the sugar shell, is yours without the payment of a cent. If you fail to secure these two orders, retain the sugar shell as a gift in any event, and return the teaspoons at your expense—which will be six cents for postage. You don't have to ask your neighbors for any money in advance. We will ship the goods you sell and give you thirty days to collect and remit. We will also send you a catalogue, showing our full line of Solid Cuevee Silverware, and a copy of "The Home-Furnisher," wherein we illustrate a grand assortment of valuable and substantial premiums for securing larger clubs of orders, including Solid Oak Bed-Room Suits, Book Cases, Ladies' Desks, Dinner Sets, Couches, Cameras, Solid Gold Rings, etc.—premiums that are in keeping with the Quaker Valley reputation. If you desire to work for any of these, we will give you the sample set of teaspoons and sugar shell in addition to any premium that you may earn. Now, please don't throw this paper down and say to yourself: "I'll write to those Quaker Valley people to-morrow." This is not an opportunity to put off and forget. Kindly sign and return the attached request to-day. That is all you have to do. Then the goods will be sent by return of mail. Remember, if you fail to secure any orders, you at least will have an elegant sugar shell worth 50 to 55 cents, for simply making the effort.

EDITORIAL

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES:

The Christian Century is published in the interests of essential Christianity. It is the organ of no party; the advocate of no ism. While welcoming the ascertained results of modern Christian scholarship, it stands for the great evangelical verities which are the foundation stones of the Christian system. It seeks to be tolerant in spirit, practical in aim, and warmly sympathetic towards all the present day problems of religious thought and life. It also aims at being at once a clearing house and medium of communication between the different denominations, so that they may by free and fraternal expression of opinion become better acquainted with one another and may be led to join forces in more aggressive work for the advancement of the Redeemer's Kingdom.

THE PROMISE OF CHRIST.

THE words of Christ's invitation, "Come unto me," were addressed to a world which he knew to be laboring with a certain measure of success, but which in the last issue found no true satisfaction in its endeavors. Wherever there is labor without sufficient sense of compensation in the joy the work produces, it is because the task is of less importance than the worker. The greatness of the soul is such that the enterprises it undertakes must adjust themselves to high ideals, or else it soon becomes weary, as a child who tires of his toys. Jesus understood that men were laboring in the various realms of their activity and with certain consciousness of achievement, but oppressed in reflective moments with a consciousness of inadequate return, of wasted time, of highest results unachieved, and of supreme efforts not demanded by the task. This failure to find rewarding satisfaction in one's work, this sense of a drag upon one's effort, this lack of adjustment to one's ideals, is the secret of evil in human life, for failure of adjustment is sin. It is from this sin that Jesus came to bring deliverance. His promise is rest to the soul. That rest is to be found not in ceasing to labor, but in finding a labor which brings the reward of harmony between the soul and its task. The consciousness of a labor so great that it is worthy to occupy the highest faculties of our nature is in itself a satisfaction and rest. This adjustment is the promise of Christ.

Without the leadership which Jesus introduces into life, a man is out of harmony with himself and his environment; that is, he is out of harmony with God. In this condition he has violated one of the fixed laws of all life, and these laws of life are only the methods by which God is accustomed to work. The relation of the soul to its environment is analogous to the relation of the plant or animal to its surroundings. In the proper soil and with the proper nourishment the plant grows and produces its legitimate flower or fruit. In suitable temperature and with the right food the animal reaches a normal growth. But a rose out of adjustment with nature, in a soil which does not yield nourishment, or in a climate too cold, fails of this adjustment and loses its life. An animal fitted for the temperate or torrid zone misses its vital articulation with its sources of life when removed to the frigid zone, and perishes. A human life unnourished by the springs of being which are in God possesses but a precarious and declining existence, for the true atmosphere of the soul is God; "ye are complete in him." It is this failure of adjustment, this lack of nourishment, which devitalizes human life. In God we live, normally, and move and have our being. Outside of the sphere of fellowship with him there is no true and vigorous life possible. It is because men seek to live without him that they limit their growth and stunt their natures. They are seeking to feed upon lower and unsatisfying things a nature which is nourished only when allowed to thrive in the atmosphere of God. It was this vital mistake which Jesus came to correct. He called men to him, that in the circle of his life they might breathe the atmosphere of God and grow into perfect stature and power. Failure to obtain this vital connection with God is sin.

In this very fact of separation from the source of life lies the secret of that fact of human experience which is clothed in such variety of figures in the Holy Scriptures and which has been discussed in all theological inquiries regarding sin. Frequently in popular definition sin is made to consist in certain particular acts. Rather does it lie in the attitude of the soul toward God, in its lack of touch, in its failure to find itself nourished by the resources of being which lie in him. It is not this or that particular act which constitutes sin in human life. These acts are but the expression of the dominant temper of mind. It is the willingness which man displays to live apart from God that constitutes sin. It is the failure of response to the will and purpose of God which makes up the fact of sin.

At first sight such a definition appears to remove something of the spectacular terror which has been cast over the word "sin" in the popular theologies. And yet it is rather a change of view-point than a transformation of the essential fact. Whatever change has come over the definition of sin within the past few years has served at least to remove the ground from under two mistaken views on the subject, widely at variance with each other, but held with a certain tenacity even yet.

The first is that the whole human race is by nature depraved and rendered totally unable to apprehend the purpose of God or to co-operate in its realization. Man is born as a child of wrath, says this theory, and until supernaturally regenerated rests under the displeasure of an angry God, in whose scheme of government the eternal punishment of such sinning life would be amply justified. Man can do nothing of himself. He is totally depraved. He thinks no good thought, and plans no righteous action until the divine energy is imparted and he rises to his new task with a power bestowed of God. He was helpless before his regeneration. His regeneration itself is of God, and therefore moral responsibility is lessened if not obliterated. The other view stands at the opposite side of the circle and possesses the elements of a cheerful optimism which, equally with the other view, disregards the facts of life. The postulate of this type of thinking is that sin is no serious fact in human life after all. It is rather a misfortune to be easily condoned. Sin is only a half step towards righteousness. Man sins in the act of becoming good. God is too kind to condemn any one, and, for that matter, we are all of us too good to be condemned. This loose, limp and lavender conception of sin is as truly at variance with the teachings of Holy Scripture as the implacable theories of the darker Puritanism. Both views are inconsistent with the teachings of Christ and with human experience. Sin can only be understood in the light of Jesus' teachings. His vision of sin showed it to be an awful fact in the life of man, so awful indeed that he exhausted the vocabulary in the attempt to portray its blackness and its far-reaching consequences.

The figures which Jesus used to describe sin are the most lurid in the language. And its consequences he portrayed in equally graphic terms, such as "the worm that dies not," "the fire that is not quenched," "the outer darkness," "weeping and gnashing of teeth." And certainly we must concede with all men who give our Lord the slightest recognition as a teacher of truth, that he knew more of the matter than any one else who has ever spoken in the name of God. To him sin consisted in the attitude of disinclination to accept divine companionship and guidance. The deliberate choice of the soul not to permit God to have his way with it constitutes sin, and this attitude can only have such consequences as persist until the attitude itself is changed. These consequences will be eternal if the free choice of the soul does not intervene. It is not a question of specific acts to be punished by severe chastisement, but rather of eternal principles at work in the soul itself to fashion its destiny in accordance with its own free choice. The words, "Well done, good and faithful servant," are only the ratification of a determined and persistent course of action deliberately chosen by the man himself. The words, "Depart from me," are equally the confirmation of the will to depart registered in the choosing soul.

The promise of Christ brings the vision of the life of companionship with God made possible through regeneration. But this regeneration itself is not the mysterious thing which theology has been concerned to make it. That there are mysteries in the spiritual life, no one will doubt who has the slightest acquaintance with the baffling problems connected even with physical life; and yet the great facts of religious experience lie on the pages of the Holy Scriptures above the line of misinterpretation. The regenerated life is the highest form of changed experience which human nature can enjoy. New life is mediated through new affections. The regenerated man is so made by the power of a new love working in the soul. The vision of God in Jesus Christ is the method of winning him to this new love. The Word becomes flesh in Christ that we may see God living in terms of our own life. That suffering and pardoning life of God expresses itself through the life and death of Jesus, and that life and death are one great redemptive fact. They cannot be separated, for each interprets the other, and both thus united constitute the vision of a life in perfect adjustment with God, and full of the most rewarding experience. It is this life, both as an ideal and as an object of affection, that allures and charms the soul. The atonement is the adjustment of the human life with God in the act of so falling in love with the life of Christ that the possession of that life and its incarnation once more in our own nature become the supreme passion of the soul.

The life of service and of love is thus made the norm of our own lives. And in this process the divine love manifests itself and we follow it in the person of our Lord, who draws us to him as he promised. We love him because he first loved us, and that love constitutes the fire that burns away the barriers that have separated us from God. The love of God thus revealed meets our answering love, and every act of obedience is an act of love. Faith is love in the act of apprehending and possessing God. Repentance is love in the act of forsaking sin and choosing righteousness. Baptism is love in the act of public consecration and obedience. The acquisition of a Christian character is love in the process of becoming like the object loved. Christian service is love in the act of carrying out the purposes which the loved one holds as the objects of his own life.

Thus regeneration is the genesis of a new life which is adjusted to God, and is the secret of peace and of power. The new life is not merely a reformation but a transformation. The soul is no longer conformed to this world, but transformed by its own renewal. And now for the first time it is able to prove in its own experience what the good and acceptable and perfect will of God is, his divine purpose for all human life. With the regenerated life come new affections, slowly perhaps, but surely. One wishes to be like Christ, and he comes by gradual steps to acquire the tastes and the affections that were in Christ Jesus. A new standard of conduct is set up, not what the world approves, not what others approve, but what Christ approves, and it now becomes the norm of all behavior. The tasks which Jesus undertook now become the rewarding tasks of our own life. Rest, peace and joy are elements which, not without patient and constant effort, and yet with certainty as experience matures, come to be the real assets of the soul. Life is in process of adjusting itself to God. The tasks which had seemed unprofitable because they were less valuable than the soul itself are now transfigured as they become the means for the achievement of the kingdom of God. Seeking first that kingdom and its righteousness, we suddenly discover that the commonplace tasks have grown satisfying and have harmonized themselves in adjustment to a new center of things, related to which they all have their legitimate place; and withal a consciousness of power is growing within us because, vitally connected as we are with the source of life, that life flows through us in resistless tides, and we can do all things through Christ who strengthens us. The will has thus been harmonized with the will of God. It has not lost its freedom, it has rather gained it by accepting the highest control. Liberty is not freedom from restraint, but the consciousness of working in harmony with the highest will. And thus the life of Christ has all the elements that link God and man and display each at his best. Christ is man at his most divine point; he is God in his most human aspect.

"Thou seemest human and divine,
The highest, holiest manhood Thou.
Our wills are ours, we know not how,
Our wills are ours to make them thine."

LAKE GENEVA.

BY THE RAMBLER.

"Come forth, O weary denizen of town,
Bathe in the sunshine, breathe the balmy air,
Shake off the toils of traffic, and lay down
The life-long burden which you seem to bear.
Wait not for death to break thy prison bars,
And send thy ransomed soul to paradise;
But seek, betimes, the free glad life beneath the stars.
For thee Nature has spread a rich repast,
Ambrosia falls like manna from the skies,
And nectar flows in every wayside rill."

LAKE GENEVA is only two hours distant from Chicago. It has won the title of "The Queen of Wisconsin Lakes," and Wisconsin has lakes to the number of about ten thousand. It is nine miles long and from one to two miles in width. It has thirty-two miles of clean, pebbly shore line, and its clear, cool waters are fed from numerous springs which flow into it from the wooded hills by which it is surrounded.

Camp Collie, at which the Rambler sojourned for a brief season, is described as "situated on a promontory, built in the ice ages, and crowned with ancient forest trees; just such a height as a Norman duke would have chosen for his castle." It is at any rate a good place for a summer camp—pleasant, picturesque and restful. It is pre-eminently a home resort.

The pet of the camp was "Baby." Baby is a Baltimore oriole. A high wind pitched her out of her nest when she was in the downy stage. A kind-hearted lady found her and mothered her, giving her undivided attention. She gathered grasshoppers for her, dug angle worms and chewed peanuts, supplying her with an elaborate cuisine. She got books on birds and found out everything that was to be known regarding the habits of orioles. Her untiring devotion met its reward. Baby reciprocated her affection; she refuses to leave her; although she has free range of the woods she has fixed upon a roosting place upon a tree near the cottage of the only mother she has ever known and will come to her at call. She is perfectly devoid of fear and will perch upon the shoulder or outstretched hand of any one who speaks to her. Once she flew on a passing steamer after a friend and was carried around the lake. At another time when chased by the hawks she took refuge on the shoulder of a gardener, burying her head in his whiskers. He caught her and put her into a cage, where she was found and identified by one who returned her to her owner. When the orioles left the woods a few days ago on their southward journey they coaxed Baby to accompany them, but she was satisfied with her present quarters and refused to budge. Her foster parents mean to take her with them when they return to the city. She is to have the freedom of the house, and one room containing a growing tree and flowers is to be especially set apart for her use. Would that every human baby were as well cared for as this baby oriole!

The Y. M. C. A. camp (begging the Visitor's pardon for the abbreviation) is the center of religious life in the lake district. A succession of conventions are held in it during the summer months. When the Rambler visited it the Secretarial Institute and the Athletic Association were both in session. It was a delight to see eighty young men engaged in their sports, finishing up with a plunge into the waters of the lake, where they seemed to be as much at home as on the solid land. There cannot be much of the morbid about the religion of these vigorous young fellows.

At this camp the Rambler heard two sermons, one by a layman, an eastern secretary, the other by a St. Louis pastor. The sermon by the layman, which was on the subject, "Be ye doers of the word and not hearers only," was simple, direct and practical. The speaker struck out from the shoulder. His words were like a bugle blast summoning the hosts of the Lord to action. The sermon of the city pastor was good of its kind, but the kind is not good. It had a suggestion of the free use of commentaries or college note books. The subject was, "The Means by Which God Restores His Banished." It was handled in a very conventional way. The atonement of Christ was represented as being the means of securing God's mercy, instead of expressing it. The one sermon made the Rambler feel as if he could not preach again, the other restored his waning courage.

A visit to Holiday Home, or the Fresh Air Fund, as it is generally called, had in it elements of uncommon interest. There were eighty boys present. These were gathered from the settlements and Sunday schools of the city. They stay at the home for two weeks. When they arrive they are bathed and arrayed in a new suit of clothes. They have a good time, boating, bathing and playing. To see them put to bed in the evening is a sight worth remembering. Some of them at first hardly know the use of a bed, and to sleep between its clean, sweet sheets is to them a foretaste of heaven. The boys are followed by a relay of girls, and these in turn by a relay of tired and sick mothers, seamstresses, scrubwomen, some of whom have not known what it is to have a holiday before in all their hard, bare lives. The attendants say that great as is the pleasure given to the boys and girls, it is not to be compared with that given to those hard-working women in whose dull lives this outing is a green spot.

No less interesting was the visit to the encampment of the McCowen Oral School for young deaf children. This outing for these unfortunates is provided by Mrs. M. A. Ryerson, president of the Society. The improved methods in the education of dumb children were illustrated in the class exercises at which the Rambler was privileged to be present. The dumb are literally made to speak. They watch the motions of the lips and reproduce them. They also write down on the blackboard the equivalents of these motions in sounds. They are able to make fine discriminations, some of them giving all the variations of the vowel sounds with great exactness. These results involve much patient, loving work on the part of the teachers. Why should there not be as much patient, loving work expended in the development of moral defectives?

A trip to Lake Geneva is incomplete without a visit to the Yerkes Astronomical Observatory, which contains the largest telescope in the world. It is situated on a fine plateau on the northwest shore of the lake, one hundred and sixty feet above the water. Its massive dome is a conspicuous figure in the landscape. The observatory itself was erected in 1897 and is 326 feet long; it is in the form of a cross. The dome is ninety feet in diameter and is moved by a driving clock propelled by electricity. The telescope, which is forty inches in diameter or about six inches wider than that of Lick Observatory, weighs sixty tons; the other moving parts weighing twenty tons additional. The observatory is part of the University of Chicago, and is open to visitors on Saturday afternoons. An attendant demonstrates the method of operating the telescope, dome, and rising floor, but no permission is given to make observations with the telescope.

Michael Angelo once went into the studio of a young artist who had just executed a statue to stand in the public square. Angelo saw its grave defects and pointed them out to his young friend. The exultant artist did not appreciate the criticism of his work, and supposed the greater man to be moved with envy. So he told him. In the dim obscurity of his workshop he could not see the defects which were so apparent to the aged critic, and in passion sneered at the opinion given. "Well," said Angelo, not the least disturbed, "the light of the public square will test it."

"The light of the public square will test it." Ah, yes! The light of the public square is to test every human life. Eternal blaze shall pour upon it, and defects unseen by the poorer light of earth will grow to ghastly deformities. The light of the public square will test it!

A DECLARATION OF SPIRITUAL INDEPENDENCE OUT OF PLACE.

THE sum of all earth-born philosophy is that man is sufficient unto himself. In Stoicism this philosophy reached high water mark. Stoicism was the richest and ripest fruit of paganism. In an age of universal decay and corruption it found acceptance among the nobler minds who sought to resist the effeminating influences by which they were surrounded. Of the Stoic it could be said, "His mind his kingdom, and his will his law." He was self-contained, self-restrained, self-reliant. He stiffened his will to meet with stolid indifference the joys and ills of life. Happiness was not necessary and might be dispensed with; pain was an evil and ought to be triumphed over; sentiment was weakness; weakness sin. With the Stoic the end of discipline was apathy. Salvation was by suicide.

As a tendency or force, Stoicism has always existed, although it may not have been always taught as a philosophy. It marks an upward movement of soul. It shows what man at his best can attain. It shows "how sublime a thing it is to suffer and be strong." But it shows also the limitation of human strength; it shows the folly of self-sufficiency and self-complacency. The three noblest Roman Stoics, Seneca, Marcus Aurelius and Epictetus, all confessed that they failed to gain the entire conquest of self. In the strain of life's storms their philosophy gave way, and when overwhelmed with a sense of weakness they knew no source of strength higher than themselves.

From the lips of a finite, fallen mortal a declaration of spiritual independence comes with poor grace. No man is absolutely independent. The roots of man's life are in God. The deepest fact in his nature is his dependence upon the Unseen Power, from whom he draws his life. It is not self-reliance that is needed so much as it is reliance upon God; it is not trust in native strength so much as it is trust in divine strength. When the evil day comes it is better to open the heart to the sunshine than to bare the breast to the blast. When the storm of passion rages it is well to have a stronger hand than our own upon the helm. When the consciousness of weakness is most keenly felt then is the time to keep ourselves in closest connection with the unfailing source of strength. Happy are those who, when they come to the end of their own strength, are able to say, "When we are weak, then are we strong."

It is cold comfort to say to the weak, "Be strong; for to be strong is to be happy." A friend wrote to Coleridge urging him to give up the use of opium. "You bid me rouse myself," he answered. "Go bid a man paralyzed in both arms rub them briskly together and that will save him." "Alas," he would reply, "that I cannot move my arms is my complaint and misery." The struggling soul must be directed to look beyond himself. Instead of rejoicing that his own mountain stands strong; conscious of his weakness, he is to be "strong in the Lord and in the power of his might." Instead of hugging the delusion of his independence he is to "Wait on the Lord and be of good courage; and he shall strengthen his heart."

More helpful than all wisdom is one draught of simple human pity that will not forsake us.

INDIFFERENCE TO CIVIC OBLIGATION.

There is nothing in which the ordinary citizen is so remiss as in the performance of his civic duties. Everything that involves sacrifice of ease and comfort he sedulously avoids. He follows the line of the least resistance. An illustration of this is furnished by the action of the citizens of Columbus, Ohio, to whom, under the system of "referendum," was submitted an important proposition regarding the city sewers and electric light plant. There are 35,000 voters in Columbus; on the questions at issue only 6,000 votes were cast. Dr. Washington Gladden, who is one of the aldermen of the city, is well known as a student of political and social problems. He has been giving at great sacrifice a large part of his busy life to public affairs. This lack of interest in things so important has pained him. He has called attention to the fact that, whereas "on the day before the election on this question from twelve to fifteen thousand persons attended a horse race on a track near the city, only 6,000 voters would go to the polls when a question of the gravest importance involving the finances, credit and health of the city was to be decided at the ballot box." There is no duty before the Church in the present day more imperative than that of enlightening and arousing the consciences of men so that, in the fear of God, they will endeavor to discharge to the full their social responsibilities.

VACATION RELIGION.

It is told of a certain professing Christian that on one occasion when he was not walking in the straight and narrow way he said in defence, "I have served the Lord for twenty years, and it is a hard thing if I cannot now take a day off." A true Christian does not want a day off. He is an ear-bored servant who has given himself to the Lord for ever. His religion is portable; he takes it with him wherever he goes. He cannot leave it behind him for it is part of himself. Of old, Christians were scattered by persecution and they went everywhere preaching the word and disseminating Christian influences. Today they are scattered by the love of travel and the cities send their population over the country, and even to earth's remotest bounds. This changed condition of social life suggests the possibility of a new form of evangelization. To this it is being more and more adjusted, as witness the growth of summer assemblies. And many a struggling country church is given heart of grace by the thought of the reinforcement of strength which is sure to come with the return of the summer visitors. The scattering of forces is not all loss.

And, even when weary workers relax a little, and forego some of the more active forms of Christian service, the cause of Christ may be a gainer thereby. Not only is strength recruited in times of pause, but a new perspective is gained, new purposes are nourished, and new plans are formed. The work which was growing irksome is resumed with redoubled hope and vigor. Knowing their need of rest the Master said to his disciples, "Come ye apart and rest awhile." We are to rest "awhile." Rest must needs be brief, and to be enjoyed must be deserved and must be preparatory to further and better service. But the secret of true rest is found in the Master's word of invitation, "Come apart, not go apart by yourself, but come apart with me." In communion with him the soul finds its true center of repose

CHICAGO NOTES.

The project of running a line of steamers from Chicago to European ports has been temporarily abandoned. The undertaking itself has been found to be feasible, but the high rate of insurance, especially on the St. Lawrence, has rendered it unprofitable. That, however, is a difficulty which can be overcome. Nothing can hinder our great inland city from achieving its destiny and becoming a seaport. And with that will come an increase of influence in the world's affairs.

The tremendous power yielded by the confessional is illustrated by a recent event. A robbery of jewelry had baffled the police when a Roman Catholic priest brought to the owners the looted treasure, amounting in value to about $7,000. The thief troubled in conscience had confessed his crime, and had made restitution. Protestants have no use for the confessional; they believe that while men ought to confess their faults one to another, they ought to confess their sins to God only; yet it may be questioned whether in their system they have sufficiently recognized the instinctive desire of sin-burdened hearts to seek relief by pouring their plaint into a sympathetic human ear.

Frank Howard Collier, a well-known character, has just died. He was a victim of what is known as "circular insanity," which resulted from a blow on the head, received from a political antagonist several years ago. An examination of his brain showed that there was an extosis or bony growth on the inner table of the skull. This was a source of irritation and accounted for the paroxysms of rage to which he was occasionally subject. We are just beginning to learn how intimate is the relation of the physical to the moral nature. Moral conditions have often a physical root, and physical conditions have often a moral root.

The attempt which is being made by the Business Men's League of Chicago to stop bookmaking on the Harlem race tracks is not prompted by any religious motive, yet it is in favor of good morals all the same. The president of the League says: "Most of the men taking part in this fight are doing so in a spirit of self-protection. Any number of us hire salesmen whom we cannot afford to have betting on the races. We have grown tired of shortages among our employes and propose to make a business fight of it." If in any way the gambling evil can be checked, all good people will rejoice.

The ministry is not the only profession that is overcrowded. In the city of Chicago there are 4,403 lawyers or one for every 450 people. The average income for members of the legal profession does not exceed $750. Yet the rate of increase in the law schools in the country is very large, being no less than 343 per cent from 1875 to 1899. It is a fact full of significance that while there has been a large increase in the number of law and medical students during the past few years the number of theological students has decreased. It behooves the Church to find out the causes of this condition of things and the remedy.

It is not merely the individual, but society that suffers by every idle, every selfish, every mean, unjust man.

HEREDITY.

There is no thing we cannot overcome.
Say not thy evil instinct is inherited,
Or that some trait inborn makes thy whole life forlorn
And calls down punishment that is not merited.

Back of thy parents and grandparents lies
The Great Eternal Will! That, too, is thine Inheritance, strong, beautiful, divine,
Sure lever of success for one who tries.

CHRISTOLOGICAL TENDENCIES OF THE TIME.

W. J. LHAMON.

No. 2—Reductio Ad Absurdum.

IT IS a well-known bit of history that the Romans shortened their sword that they might lengthen their empire. Their unparalleled experience in the art of war proved the long sword inefficient as compared with the short one. The stern logic of practice reduced the former to an absurdity and proved the superiority of the latter.

If the reader can be kind enough to indulge an analogy so far-fetched, we are bold to say that something of the same sort is taking place among the creeds of Christendom. Constantly of late we are shortening the creeds of the Church that we may lengthen the kingdom of Christ. We have all but proved the futility of scholastic and high-sounding statements of faith as compared with "the simpler statements of the Galilean fisherman and the beloved disciple." This reduction to an absurdity (let us repeat the phrase) by the stern logic of practice is among the most interesting and hopeful signs of a complete return to the Christianity of Christ. It is a Christological movement not to be ignored by those who would get the gage of religious thought at the junction of these centuries.

1. Experience has proved the futility of creeds as fashioned at length by human capacity. The statement is very bold, and one must rely for its justification upon facts that are patent and formidable. And here is such a fact; there is not one of the great doctrinal symbols of the historic Church that commands the united allegiance of those whose allegiance Christ himself commands. In other words, many loyal followers of Christ reject one or other, or many or all, of these historic creed formulas. There are Christians who are and who are not Trinitarians; there are Christians who are and who are not Augustinians or Calvinists; there are Christians who are and who are not Arminians; there are Christians who are and who are not Socinians. It is so of the whole circle of credal statements. The time was when one must subscribe to the Nicene creed or be denominated a heretic. Now one may be a devout follower of Christ, and be so esteemed, though he chooses to be reverently silent regarding that ancient and sublime symbol. He may humbly decline to enter into the mysteries of the Godhead which it seeks to probe and to explain; he may find himself ill at ease with it because of the questions it raises and does not settle; he may find fault with it because it goes so far and no farther, or he may feel some disturbance because of a suggested pantheism in it; but in any case, it is generally conceded that he may present himself a living sacrifice at the altar of Christ, and be accepted there.

And as to Calvinism, how are the churches over whose heads that symbol hangs to convince the world of its utility when half of them do not believe it and are seeking to have it revised into something less grim-visaged and terrible? If there is one current fact which above all others reduces the creating of creeds to an absurdity, it is this present wrangle of the Calvinists among themselves, some to retain the outgrown creed, and others to get rid of "the old hard shell." And to an onlooker it is one of the strangest conundrums, why they do not throw aside utterly that old, entirely too long, and blunted and dulled relic of mediæval barbarism, and seize the short and vital and "two-edged sword" of the Savior himself.

If a third example of the futility of lengthy formulas may be cited, let it be (reverently spoken) Lutheranism. The Augsburg Confession, the Smalcald Articles, and the Formula of Concord were children of the storm. They came forth from the conflict with Romanism. They are polemic. If ever they were useful they are so no longer. Who among the devout followers of Christ cares now to wield this long sword about total depravity, and human incapacity of will to do God's will, and transubstantiation, and progressive sanctification, and vicarious sacrifice? The really vital factor in the work of Luther was his Pauline doctrine of justification by faith, and his attempted return to the Christianity of Christ. "Luther's single aim," we read, "was the reformation and revival of Christianity, and the restoration of the whole Church in its universal form to primitive and scriptural purity. Denominationalism he knew not. His conception of the Church comprehended catholic Christianity." Luther was entirely too great a man to be a Lutheran. He said: "I beseech you above all things not to use my name; not to call yourselves Lutherans, but Christians." In spite of this, his followers lengthened their creed by the dogmatic insertion of such doctrines as are named above, and departed correspondingly from the creed of Christ, so that in the very face of the great man's serious protest, one of our most gifted Americans has cried out:

"Lutheran, Papal, Calvinistic * * *

All these creeds and doctrines three extant are,

And still the question is where Christianity may be?"

2. It is well known that many of the Lutheran pulpits today refuse to be denominated by Lutheranism, and many of the Presbyterian pulpits by Calvinism, and many of the Anglican pulpits by the Thirty-nine Articles. The necessary inference is that these doctrines have lost their hold upon the thought of the pulpit, and though the sacred desk stands nominally for this or the other of them, the man has passed beyond them. He quietly ignores them. He, being really alive and thoughtful, and seriously seeking a message to his age, has found something better to preach. Thus many a denominational congregation finds itself really married to Christ, but yet like a bride who has forgotten to take the name of her husband.

3. The logic of all these centuries has its conclusion in a reductio ad absurdum so far as the extra-biblical creeds can go toward unifying the body of Christ. To our human, blundering way of progress something is always gained by discovering how not to do things. And surely so many long, long centuries of failure in uniting Christ's followers through credal instrumentalities should teach us that it cannot be done that way. He who prays for the union of Christ's own as Christ himself prayed for it must long since have ceased to offer up his supplications at the shrine of Rome, or Augsburg, or Westminster, or New Haven. There is not one single predominating ism today. In the nature of the case there can be no such thing. The ism, by very virtue of its being an ism, is presumably under-done or over-done, or one-sided, or eccentric, or somehow fragmentary, and whatever is fragmentary can command but a fragmentary portion of men. To command the allegiance of men universally the creed must be universal like the equations of algebra and the laws of the triangle. None but such a universal creed as springs immediately from the life of the universal man, who called himself the Son of Man, can be universally accepted, and can be therefore the center of unity.

So far from uniting, the creeds have divided, and they have perpetuated divisions. They have been the apples of discord of the theological ages. In their present age and decrepitude, with failing vitality, and the proof patent that they are futile, they still do what they can to hold apart the fragments of the Savior's body. Even when men have learned philosophical humility in the presence of the Infinite, and when out of very reverence they would refrain from such dogmatism about God, and the eternal decrees of God, as Augustine and Calvin indulged in, they yet many times cling traditionally to the dogmatism which philosophically they repudiate, and so it comes to pass that traditionally the creeds live and perpetuate their mischief though philosophically incapacitated for such service.

But the logic, the inductive logic, of their failure is before us. The mischief of their fragmentariness is patent. As hinted in a previous article, the philosophical method by which they grew has been displaced in practical ways by a more fruitful method. Their history and the tendencies of the time are against them. Their displacement as authoritative formulas of faith bodes well for the future of the kingdom of Christ. Their passing clears the way for a return to the New Testament presentation of Christ. The return to the New Testament Christ means immediately his presentation of man to man, of God to man, of faith, repentance, forgiveness, sanctification, and life eternal. This is Christology.

We are quite aware that the foregoing would be robbed of much of its force if Christianity were to be considered (as too many, alas, seem to consider it) an experimental science, or one among the various systems of philosophy. Then we might experiment as we do in chemistry, or speculate like stoics or schoolmen. But if Christianity is a revelation, if Christ is final, if his yea is yea and his nay is nay, if his work is a perfection rather than a fragment, then our attitude must be changed entirely. Then our mission is to declare rather than to invent a Gospel. Then we have no business to sit down to peculiar speculations of our own liking, and to the framing of doctrines, and the declaring of dogmas with anathemas quite unsweet, but our whole business is to be the message-bearers of our Christ and our King. The Church is his, the disciples are his, the heralds are his, the message is his. The King's runners are coming; they are beautiful upon the mountains; they bring good tidings of great joy. Let the dogmas stand aside or they will seem more impertinent henceforth than ever in the past.

THE CITY OF PALACES.

BY W. M. FORREST.

INDIA should be governed from a palace, not from a counting-house; with the ideas of a prince, and not with those of a retail dealer in muslins and indigo." So spake Lord Wellesley more than a century ago, and he proceeded to build the stately Government House which now ornaments the capital of India. It was completed in 1804 at a cost of about $875,000. The grounds occupy nearly six acres and lie at the northern end of the spacious park which separates the commercial quarter of the city from the European residence section.

"Princely ideas" must have found congenial soil in the minds of Briton's sons in Calcutta. Little by little unsightly and noisome swamps were reclaimed and transformed into the beautiful "maidan" or park that is now so great a blessing to the city. Spacious buildings for merchants and for government offices were erected, while southeast of the park native huts were cleared away, broad streets were laid out and lined with trees, and many a truly palatial residence was built in its beautiful grounds. There live the favored government officials, the successful professional men, the prosperous merchants of the city. There may be seen the pretentious English Cathedral, and the "Palace" where dwells the "Lord Bishop." In various places may be seen other spacious churches for the convenience of the English-speaking populace. Everything betokens civilization, comfort, prosperity.

Passing from this beautiful district into the public park in the cool of the day, one can witness a gorgeous pageant. The park lies along the river bank for several miles, and noble ocean ships and smaller craft are seen moored or plying up and down near by. Along the broad drives sweep hundreds of carriages, from the gorgeous barouche of the Viceroy, and the almost equally luxurious equipages of titled natives and wealthy citizens, to the ordinary hired cab. All fashionable Calcutta is there, and everybody else who is able is glad either to ride or walk about and enjoy the cool air and gay sights. In the beautiful Eden Gardens, which lie at the end of the park nearest the Viceroy's palace, is a band stand and every evening there is music to delight the throng of visitors. Noble trees of many kinds, choice flowers in rich variety, sweet music by skilled musicians, fashionably attired men and women, high-spirited horses, and costly carriages—what need of missionaries here?

Come with me in the early morning. It is the cool season and the morning air is chill. We begin our walk northward. Soon all palaces are left behind and we see only mud hovels lining the streets. Those wretched-looking bundles of dirty rags by the wayside are men who have lain there in the damp and chill all night. The throngs that are met a little later and grow ever thicker and thicker are men and women going to the toil which will pay them a few cents a day. That building full of kneeling men is a mosque of the "False Prophet." Yonder shrine before which so many stop to do obeisance contains a debased and debasing symbol of a Hindoo god; those paint marks on ears and foreheads indicate his devotees. Many such will be passed before you will find a native church.

And as the day advances, the sun pours its fierce beams into the streets and lanes as we proceed northward. You marvel at the dense crowds that block the way, crowds such as you can see perhaps nowhere else except in China. There is no fashion here; only half-naked women, and three-quarters naked men, and four-quarters naked children. There is no music here, only the chatter and jabber of strange voices. There is no fresh air here; only the stench of plague-stricken districts.

By and by strange sights witnessed on every hand call to mind scenes from an old and familiar book. Yonder goes a wretched paralytic, borne of four. There is a man, blind from his birth, begging by the way. Just now has passed a poor old woman having a spirit of infirmity, bowed together and able in no wise to lift herself up. Then you meet a sorrowing procession, bearing the dead body of a young man, perhaps the only son of his mother, and she a widow. Next a leper is seen, with his face eaten into a horrid semblance of a jack-o'-lantern; while on every side are the hungry multitudes who are as sheep without a shepherd. Yes, it is all so like what the Master saw in the streets of Palestine cities, when he was moved with compassion. And, even as in his day, it is so largely the result and so wholly the symbol of sin's ravages and the soul's deformity.

And it is to these lost sheep that the missionary must go; it is for these that churches and homes and schools must be built. Multiplied are the Christian activities in India's sin-cursed capital, but they cannot do a tithe of the needed work. Many a missionary society in America is truthfully told that all its income could be profitably expended in the city of Chicago. How much more, then, might the like be said of this city, with its manifold miseries, its gross idolatries, its benighted multitudes, its festering corruption! None but Christ could have the love to desire to make such a city his own. None but the servant of Christ could have the courage to undertake to win it for him. Naught but the spirit of Christ in his Church will prompt it to give the men and the money for the accomplishment of the task. Happy the church and happy the people who shall have a part in the regeneration of the city of palaces and of hovels.

COURTESY.

THE REV. ARTHUR B. PATTEN.

WE ARE known by the spirit we show. Courtesy is one of the choicest marks of a gracious and graceful spirit. It has recently been defined as "politeness originating in kindness and exercised habitually." Here, then, is one of the loftiest standards of life. To be courteous is to be polite, always, and out of kindness of heart. So real courtesy is not veneration of etiquette, but rather a deep virtue of soul. And it is more than adaptation to social usage; it is one of the highest applications of social good-will. It is good-will in manners. Only courtesy as thus defined can redeem manners and make them a vocation as well as an art. Surely manners can never become a fine art until they fulfil a vocation of service. We are not to be courteous for the sake of being polite; we are to be polite for the sake of being courteous. We must realize with Tenny-son that true "manners are not idle, but the fruit of loyal natures and of noble minds." True courtesy is not a thing of spots or spasms. It is pervasive and perpetual. It is always on its good behavior towards all classes and conditions of men. To be polite to one's superiors only is the mark of a snob or a spaniel. To be polite within one's set only is to be clannish rather than Christian in manners. To let one's politeness stop anywhere short of universal and uniform courtesy towards high and low, rich and poor, is to stop short of being a gentleman. It is said that James Russell Lowell was as courteous to a beggar as to a lord. He was once seen holding an engaging conversation with an organ grinder, reviewing scenes in Italy, with which they were both familiar.

A greeting, a pleasant word, a hand-shake, a "beg-your-pardon," a kind look, sitting along to give some one a seat on the cars, noticing a child, giving precedence to an older person, saying good-morning genially to a servant in your home—such trifling attentions constitute courtesy. But let them become the prevailing habit of the life, and trifles will have made perfection. Courtesy is thoughtfulness in trifles.

"It was only a glad 'Good-morning!'
As she passed along the way;
But it spread the morning's glory
Over the live-long day."

Some of us, who are not too ungenerous to be courteous at all times, are often too absorbed or absent-minded. A preoccupied head will often cheat a courteous heart of its opportunity. Courtesy must become self-controlled thoughtfulness. Thou shalt think of thy neighbor at the same time that thou think-est of thyself! Often we are not courteous simply because we are stupid. Not to be versatile enough to think of yourself and somebody else at the same time is to be stupid.

Then there are people, not ungenerous at heart, who fail to be courteous because they are bashful. It is so easy for diffident people to blunder. Nothing but the sense of courtesy as a mission can overcome bashfulness. Nothing but the sense of courtesy as a method of service can conquer diffidence. Courtesy considered only as an art is likely to render diffidence more diffident, if not confusion worse confounded. For a person, who feels awkward, to think of appearing beautiful, for beauty's sake, is not at all easy. The bashful man must enter society not to shine, but to serve. He must forget himself in the sense of social good-will. Brotherly love must cast out fear. To be born courteous is to be one of nature's favorites; but to become courteous against odds is to be one of God's friends.

To feel courteous, we must keep sweet, always. To make other people feel our courtesy, we must be thoughtful and genial everywhere. And then, as Lord Chesterfield once said, "A man's own good-breeding is his best security against the world's ill-manners."

"How sweet and gracious, even in common speech,
Is that fine sense which men call courtesy;
Wholesome as air and genial as the light,
Welcome in every clime as breath of flowers,
It transmutes aliens into trusting friends,
And gives its owner transport round the globe."
So. Hadley, Mass.

"Yes, I consider my life a failure." "O, Henry, how sad! Why should you say that?" "I spend all my time making money enough to buy food and clothes, and the food disagrees with me and my clothes don't fit."—Life.

MARRIAGE.

HERE are some marriages which remind us of the poor fellow who said, "She couldn't get any husband and I couldn't get any wife, so we got married." The proverb, "All marriages are made in heaven," ought to be changed into "All true marriages are made in heaven." To put upon heaven the responsibility of those marriages regarding which heaven was never consulted seems hardly fair.

True marriage is the union of two lives, the union of two hearts. It is a spiritual union, the end of which is the perfecting of the natures of two people who have made choice of each other as life companions. Temperamental differences there will be, but the fusing power of a common love will make discordant elements unite; the friction of every-day life will smooth down many angularities of disposition. Care should be taken, however, that individuality be not rubbed out. Oneness of sentiment upon all things is not desirable. Variety is the spice of life, and enough individual distinctiveness should be left to save domestic life from insipidity. A lady was once expatiating to Archbishop Whately upon the singular felicity of her conjugal experiences. She affirmed that in thirty years of married life her husband and she had never once differed in opinion about anything. To which statement the good Archbishop compassionately replied, "It must have been very stale, madam."

But love must not have too much to do in the way of adjusting differences of temperament. The points of agreement ought to outnumber the points of difference. The story is told of a preacher who asked John Wesley what he thought of his marrying a certain woman, well known to both. Wesley advised him not to think of it. "Why," said the other, "she is a member of our church!" "Yes," was the reply. "And you think her a truly Christian woman?" "Yes," said Wesley, "I believe she is." "Well, then, why not marry her?" "Because," said Wesley, "because the Lord can live with a great many people that you and I can't live with."

Human nature is the same after marriage as before, and yet the close relationship which marriage involves is not without its risks. Some people, like gunpowder and fire, are safe only when apart. A Scotch couple had just repeated their chronic quarrel, when the wife called the attention of her surly lord to the example of the cat and dog slumbering peacefully before the fire. "Aye, but tie them together and then see!" was the ungracious reply.

There is something radically wrong when the poetry of life is changed after marriage into commonplace prose. The things that called forth love before marriage will call it forth increasingly after marriage. The common mistake of young people is that they expect too much from each other. They are not angels, and need constantly to bear and forbear, the one with the other. Very wholesome was the Quaker's advice to his son on his wedding day: "When thee went a-courtting, I told thee to keep thy eyes open; now thee is married, I tell thee to keep them half shut."

Mutuality, reciprocity, identity of interests are essential to the happiness of wedded life. When a clergyman once said to a happy pair whom he had just united in matrimonial bonds, "You are now one," it was the wife who inquired, "Which one?" Vain man boasts that he has Scripture authority for being the head, but as the old saying has it, woman is the neck by which all the movements of the head are controlled. Said a bachelor philosopher: "My friend conducted his future wife to the altar—and there his leadership came to an end."

Marriage has its laws, which, if kept, blessing follows, but which, if broken, entail a fearful curse upon the transgressor. Because the ends for which marriage was ordained are great and good, the consequences are terrible in the extreme if it be perverted and abused. No other relationship in life possesses greater power to ennoble or to debase, to bless or to blight. "There are two rocks in this world of ours," says Robertson of Brighton, "upon which the soul must either anchor or be wrecked; the one is God, the other is the sex opposite to itself." A step involving issues so important and far-reaching as those involved in matrimony ought certainly to be taken "discreetly, reverently and in the fear of God." But how thoughtlessly and wantonly do many rush into this most sacred relationship. They marry in haste and repent at leisure.

Sad indeed was the plight of that Scotch lad who, after running his head into the matrimonial noose, returned to the officiating minister and asked him if he could not undo the knot. He was told that it was impossible to go back upon the step which had been taken and that it must be for better or worse. The youth insisted that the marriage could not hold good for "the wife was waur than the deevil." The minister demurred, saying that it was quite impossible. "'Deed, sir," said the poor lad, "the Bible tells ye that if ye resist the de'il he flees frae ye, but if ye resist her, she flees at ye." Said a minister to one similarly afflicted, who was seeking the same remedy, "We should be yielding and forgiving; there are no divorces in heaven." "That's the reason," said the sufferer, "why I am so anxious to get a divorce here."

Look before you leap. "Be cautious! Be cautious! Be cautious, and evermore be cautious! Be not too cautious!" With these words a humorous old parson was wont to preface the marriage ceremony: "My friends, marriage is a blessing to a few, a curse to many, and a great uncertainty to all. Do ye venture?" No objection being made to the venture, he then said: "Let us proceed."

PENTECOSTAL BLESSINGS IN JAPAN.

PENTECOSTAL blessings are following the desire for Christian union in Japan, which has materialized to the extent of an enthusiastic interdenominational co-operation for the purpose of an evangelistic movement co-extensive with the Empire. The work has been progressing some months, and after a brief respite during the hottest months, will be resumed in the fall.

One cannot but believe that a move which has resulted in such immense profit to Japanese and foreign workers alike, will have convincingly demonstrated, to some extent, at least, how large a blessing might be expected from the permanent "corporate union" for which many have been praying.

In the capital city, Tokyo, the fourteen ku or wards, with their almost one and one-half millions of people have been thoroughly canvassed, house by house. Fifty-two churches have co-operated; seventy-four workers in the capacity of leaders; twenty-seven evangelistic bands of 360 members; bills, posters, tracts, Bibles and song books have been distributed to the number of 913,510; prayer meetings, preaching services and street preachings have been attended by 100,000 people; collections have summed up yen 1,357; converts and inquirers, 5,307. After meetings for the thorough instruction of inquirers are being held.

Miss Wirick writes: "Thousands of people have come out to these meetings every night. The houses would not begin to hold them and they would rise up dozens at a time, and profess a desire to become Christians. At a thanksgiving prayer-meeting, 600 were present, and $100 given as a thank-offering. I wish you could have seen the zeal of the young Christians,—boys and girls,—from all the churches, walking the streets with flying banners, distributing tracts and announcements of the meetings. It has been so beautiful, so wonderful! I wish I could make you feel the depth of all the blessing we know and feel in this work. From three in the afternoon till eleven and twelve at night were the usual hours spent in work. The most and greatest of this was done by the Japanese. They are having what they call after-meetings, where all inquirers are being taught, and daily many are being added to the churches. No jeering and scoffing at the meetings—men come to hear! We do rejoice and praise the Lord for all these blessings and souls ready to receive Him." L. D. G.

EXPOSITORY HINTS.

Drifting.

WE ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard lest haply we drift away from them." (Heb. II:1.) We quote from the Revised Version. The writer of these words was evidently impressed with the thought of the possibility of the soul breaking loose from its moorings and being driven upon the rocks, or drifting out into the ocean wastes of doubt and despair. Hence he says: "Take heed; hold on firmly to the things of Christ; see that the cable of faith is strong; see that your anchor can stand the strain of the storm; see that it is cast into good holding ground." The condition described is a very common one.

(1) Many are drifting away from the simple faith of childhood. The scientific, rationalistic spirit of the present day largely accounts for this. We put a query where our fathers put a full period. We seek to prove things before holding fast to them instead of proving them by holding fast to them. If in gaining knowledge we lose faith, what doth it profit?

(2) Many are drifting away from the ancient faith of the church in the word of God. They look upon the old Bible as outgrown; and too often they give it up without a struggle or without demanding a better one in its place. And because spiritual life is nourished by truth those who drift from Bible teachings sooner or later drift from Bible morality.

(3) Many are drifting away from "the things of Christ." They are being carried away from the simplicity of the gospel by the desire for religious novelties. "The things of Christ" may mean the things spoken of by Christ or the things concerning Christ. In either case the revelation of God which culminates in Christ is forsaken.

(4) What is our duty in view of our danger? We ought to give heed; to give earnest heed; to give more earnest heed to the things of Christ. Whatever else we may let go we are to hold on as with a death grip to the things of Christ. The things of Christ are the essential things. He is the living truth. Not from his lips alone, but also from his life do we receive the final revelation of God to man. Faith is often held with difficulty. The gulf streams of this world are strong and treacherous; there are sudden gusts, deceitful undercurrents, raging storms. Our ship will often strain at its anchor, but if we are firmly fixed upon the things of Christ our anchor will hold. It will neither break nor drag, and we shall outstride every storm.

The MSS. of various successful books have been declined by publishers before finally reaching a resting place; but when one considers the natural fallibility of judgment regarding any matter of popular taste and liking, it is really not extraordinary that new writers should quite often make a success in one publisher's hands even although others have hesitated to make the venture.

A short time since, a young author whose book had just been accepted was talking to his publisher, and

Mr. John Habberton, the genial author of "Helen's Babies," happened to be present. The publisher finally turned to the young writer, saying, "Your book has one great element of weakness, which, however, I hope may not be fatal." "What is that?" replied the startled youth, with almost a gasp of consternation. "Well, it has not been rejected by enough publishers; it takes at least four or five rejections to make a phenomenally successful book." The puzzled look of dismay on the young man's face gave way to a smile as his critic turned to the veteran author at his side and asked, "Wasn't that the case with 'Helen's Babies?'" Mr. Habberton, with the courtly bow which his friends knew so well, and which is only one of his many charms, promptly responded, "It was rejected twenty-one times!"

Can any one of our readers give answers to the following questions in authors' names? For instance:

Why does Frances Hodgson Burnett? Just because Robert Burns.

What drove Oscar Wilde?

What gives you Bliss Carman?

Where does John Strange Winter?

Why was Jonathan Swift?

What was Miss Edgeworth?

Who gave Francis Bret Harte?

What did Leigh Hunt?

Through what land did Miss Glasgow?

Did "She" make Rider Haggard?

What exercise made Thomas Hardy?

PLEASANTRIES.

He was about eight years old and was looking over the bookshelves for something to read. A bound volume in red attracted him. It was Pope's "Essay on Man." He read it for a few minutes and then threw it down. "It may be easy on man," he said, "but it's hard on a boy."

A lady, well known as a writer of books on history, told us a few days ago that she once sent to a girls' school an examination paper, in which she asked, "Why did Henry VIII quarrel with the pope?" One girl wrote in reply, "Because the pope had commanded him to put away his wife, under pain of transubstantiation."—Christian Life.

A public library in a London district has a custodian who is devoted to literature, but not to fine white linen. The other day a notice was posted up on the door of the library as follows: This library will be closed next week for cleaning the librarian.

In a few hours the period between "cleaning" and "the librarian" had been deftly expunged.

A well-known critic recently wrote a bitter attack on the work of a celebrated novelist. After it was published, the novelist, a good-natured man, wished to meet the critic who had assailed him, and asked a common friend to bring him up to dinner some evening. When invited the critic replied: "I certainly shall not go! He simply wants to heap coals of fire on my head; and do you suppose I am going to hold the scuttle for him?"—P. McArthur.

Sir Morell Mackenzie at an "at home" chanced to converse with a celebrated authoress, who introduced herself with these words: "I am John Strange Winter." Sir Morell did not read novels and gazed at her wonderingly. She added, "'Bootle's Baby,' you know." "Yes, yes, of course," he answered soothingly. He afterward remarked to his hostess that the poor lady was very mad, indeed. First she had told him that she was a man, then that she was somebody's baby.

Annoyed by the injury done to one of his trees by the driver of the local 'bus, Mr. Kipling recently wrote a vigorous letter of complaint to the 'bus owner, who is also landlord of an inn. The landlord laid the letter before the select company of the bar parlor, who advised calm indifference. Also a Croesus among them offered 10 shillings in cash for the autograph letter. Both advice and cash were accepted. A second and stronger letter followed; and this also found a purchaser, this time at £1, as befitted its increased violence. Boniface again said nothing. To him next day entered Mr. Kipling, briskly wrathful. "Why didn't I answer your letters, sir? Why, I was hoping you'd send me a fresh one every day. They pay a deal better than 'bus-driving!"—Boston Times.

"What ten books would you take if you had to pass the rest of your life on a desert island?" "Oh, I wouldn't take books at all. I'd take things to eat."

"How do you get your books off that high shelf over the door?"

"Oh, I fish them down with this hook-handled umbrella."

"How do you put them up there again?"

"People who borrow my books never bring them back."

The most amazing bull of all the list ever collected or perpetrated is not Irish but English. It is that which appears twelve times a year on the title page of a London magazine, "The Fortnightly Review. Published monthly."

The late distinguished churchman and historian, Dr. Stubbs, was a profound scholar, but possessed withal of a fund of dry humor. Here is a story of him in the Pall Mall Gazette: "Dr. Stubbs was once addressing an audience of Reading high school girls at a prize distribution (he excelled at a prize giving), and expressed his regret that he no longer had leisure to devote to general literature. 'Indeed, my dear young friends,' he added, 'there is but one book which I now find time to dip into at all. Its name begins with a B. Perhaps you can guess at the title.' 'Bible,' came the instant response. 'No, Bradshaw,' gravely replied the bishop." It was on Stubbs and his eulogistic brother historian, Freeman, that Thorold Rogers made an epigram:

"While ladling butter in alternate tubs, Stubbs butters Freeman, Freeman butters Stubbs."

REV. J. A. ADAIR.

THE SAMARIAS OF LIFE.

He must needs go through Samaria.—John 4:4.

GLANCE at the map of Palestine will show that it comprised three provinces, Galilee, Samaria, and Judea. Of these, Samaria was the central province, Galilee lay upon the north, and Judea upon the south. The traveler in passing from Judea into Galilee had no choice but to pass through Samaria. It was this necessity which confronted Christ when he formed the purpose to retire for a season from Judea and inaugurate his ministry in Galilee. The pious Jew in making this journey would have taken a detour through the hill country of Gilead and Bashan and by a circuitous route would have reached Galilee without passing through Samaria. But Christ, with whom time was precious, had little desire to respect the trivial and useless regulations of the Jewish ceremonial law. He accepted the inevitable and passed through Samaria. It is perhaps needless to enter into a full explanation of the reason why Samaria was esteemed a land whose atmosphere was considered contaminating. In large part the enduring enmity between Jew and Samaritan is to be referred to the bitterness which naturally exists between rival races in an uncivilized society. The Samaritans were a conglomerate people formed from a remnant of Jews which were left behind by Shalmanezar when he had taken Jerusalem and had carried a considerable portion of the ten tribes into his kingdom between the Euphrates and Tigris rivers. Palestine then became a dependency of Babylonia and was colonized from the mother country by a host of heathen colonists. The new and foreign population introduced new manners and customs and laws. But in no respect was there observable so radical a change as in religious faith and practice. The polytheistic rites and ceremonies of the Assyrians became grafted on to the monotheistic worship of Israel. Eventually the Samaritans reared for themselves a temple upon Mount Gerizim and the political and religious rupture between them and the purer Israelites of Judea became complete. Hence the Jew despised the Samaritan. He considered him no better than a dog, and many of those who were extremely pietistic in their religious devotion declared that they would sooner touch the vilest leper than the best Samaritan. Hence the Jews had no dealings with the Samaritans, and between Judea and Samaria there existed the bitterest enmity.

It was not in the declared province of Christ's mission to carry the gospel to any but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. Salvation's chiefest privileges were for the Jew. But on the other hand, when Christ's journey lay through a Gentile country he hesitated not to pass that way and to preach as the opportunity came to him the gospel of the kingdom of God. The geographical necessity which confronted Christ did not appall him and he immediately planned to pass through Samaria. Yet the text half intimates that the journey was anticipated more with feelings of aversion than of pleasure. Be that as it may, before Christ there lay the heathen dissolute Samaria. He must needs go through it. What does the necessity which confronted Christ teach us? Christ's life was like our life in respect to its necessities and sufferings and most of its duties. He might have taken an angel's wings and reached Galilee in a speedy flight. But as our fellow man he accepted the inevitable and shouldered his burden and entered Samaria.

The first lesson we may learn is that God often guides his children through unpleasant places. Most men have radically wrong conceptions of life. Success in their thought and estimation is the laurel wreath which rests upon the brow of the shrewd and sturdy toiler for fame. Man is the architect of his own fortune and the carver out of his own earthly destiny. Disaster is the ill wind which happens to blow against him. Death is the hard and inexorable fate from which he cannot escape. So life is with them ever in the region of the improbable. Things happen to them. They come by chance, and it is through chance that the most terrible disasters of life are averted. Some are able to rise a little higher than this into the region of law. Things happen because in the nature of things they must happen and it cannot possibly be otherwise. Death must come, for man sees above and about him a law which declares that man is mortal. Trials must come, for they have been decreed to the human race. Disasters and bankruptcies must come, for that is the law of the financial world. So from the hardest trials of life man can only gain the consolation that it could not be otherwise. It is the hard fate of the world, the common lot of humanity. Some Samaria of difficulty lies before them. They see they must needs pass through it. The best they can do is to strengthen their limbs and lighten their load and plunge into their Samaria, saying, "It must be so; it could not possibly have been otherwise."

Now, all this is poor, wretched philosophy for life. A man is something more than a machine which may at any moment break its wheel and stop. He is better off than the weather-beaten ship which scuds away before the wind and may founder in mid-seas or strand upon the reef, or eventually may make the shore in safety. If life is a thing of chance, the only reason why I live is because no falling stone has as yet crushed me and no pestilential disease has as yet carried me off. Such a theory takes all the soul out of man and all the heart out of his work. And it is not much better for me to say that things happen because I cannot help them happening since they happen in the nature of law. Such a view makes a man a prisoner and we would all be awaiting the execution of the sentence which rests upon us. At the most we would be compelled to say: "It cannot be long before there will be wrecked upon me the vengeance of law and before me I shall behold the destruction of all that I hold as nearest and dearest to my heart." Such thoughts make life terrible in its present gloom and in its future anticipations.

And now I would turn to the human Christ and would ask him why he went through Samaria. Does he say that happened to be the shortest road into Galilee—a matter of chance, or I had to go that way, for there was no other road over which I had time to travel—a matter of human limitation and law. Ah, no, he says, I was guided that way. Behind the law, behind the chance, there was the purpose of a heavenly Father. He who set before me my life work bade me go through Samaria. My friends, with how much grandeur does this thought invest life! The unpleasant places of life are in God's hand and under his control. Nothing can come to me in an accidental way. Everything has some end in view. He has some purpose which I cannot know. When Samaria lies before me I may know that God has put it there, and from him there will come grace to trudge on over its unpleasant ways and turn its desolation into a source of strength.

There is another thought in this connection. In these unpleasant places we are taught lessons of duty. There is nothing so uncommon among us as to ask, when unpleasant places lie around us, what is the meaning of these? Why must I go through Samaria at all? We fancy at such times that to know the mystery of God's leading would ease our pain, assuage our grief, and give our pilgrim feet new strength. So it would, my brother, and you need not remain in ignorance as to why God is leading you over roads which you would rather not travel. You may know the enigma of human bitterness and grief by biding God's time. Christ as omniscient knew why he must go through Samaria. There was a woman there who must be saved. She had found life to be a scene of unrest. Heaven was anxious to rescue her from her sinful past. So Christ passed that way with his gospel message and on Sychar's well he met the anxious soul. He spake to her and she listened and upon her troubled soul there fell the sweet, harmonious music of heaven. Our Samaritans are to teach us lessons of duty. We are not quite so eager to learn them as Christ was. Man's unwillingness to do what God wants him to do is about as comprehensive a definition as I know of sin. In creed and in theory most men please God, but when it comes to duty, what one of us is there who does not most miserably fail? We do everything but our duty. God has to drive us sometimes to do that. There are men and women as needy as she who sat on Sychar's well, but how seldom do we exchange with them the word of greeting and bid them journey with us up to heaven.

Around about us there are scores of opportunities that the best of us never use. And it is the sad fact that most of us are compelled to go through some spiritual Samaria before we will ever confess our willingness to do God's will. Our friends are dying in their sins, but we have never volunteered to point them to the Lamb of God. One by one they must be taken from us, and in mourning over our remissness we first form the resolution to be a missionary to our own household. Or perhaps in our pride we have said we would not confess Christ before men. By-and-by the crape is hung upon our door and we say among our tears, I see it now, I will avow my discipleship before men. Or we have been so busy in getting gain and improving our business prospects that we have forgotten about the better and greater interests of the soul, and then mortgages have been foreclosed and our trade has dwindled and we pass through the Samaria of financial difficulty. But you come out the richer, for though you should be penniless, God and heaven are still your undoubted possessions. So we pass through the Samaria of trial to enter the heaven of peace and rest. Sensual souls may decry the trials which teach us duty as being the inflictions of omnipotence. Not so does the soul which has been in the furnace and has come forth resplendent and purified. He is thankful that there are Samaritans of trial to hasten and gladden the day of eternal joy.

These Samaritans are for our discipline. Christ had attained to perfection and needed not to reach it by the rough, hard path of discipline. Yet the experience of that Samaria journey sent him down into Galilee with a gladder heart. Nothing comes to us fortuitously. The most mysterious suffering is not accidental. The blackest clouds have God behind them. God means to work for our good; he smites to heal, he slays to raise again. The Samaritans into which he sends us mean for us all discipline. We do not suffer because that is fated by law to be our lot. We suffer because the present suffering is working out for us an exceeding and eternal weight of glory. To the Christian all the sadnesses of life are the subdued notes, not the discordant ones, in life's true harmony. The disciplining influences of earthly providence are seldom appreciated at the moment we experience them. "Thou shalt know hereafter" is the law of all discipline. Therefore, the boy who is to become a philosopher troubles his head over words of one syllable. And the child imputes the cruelest motives to the father that chastises him, but learns eventually that love was behind the most overt exhibition of parental wrath. So it is not until the Samaria has long been past that we understand why we were led exactly that way.

The Scripture history fairly bristles with incidents of those who have gotten grace and gained glory through discipline. Take the life of Paul. You ask why he was mobbed in Jerusalem and half killed at Lystra and manacled at Cæsarea. You ask why, when he was hastening to Rome, the Euroclydon tempest blew against him and on a broken ship he was driven to a barbarous isle. You ask why, when Rome was reached, he was hindered by Providence from thundering in the Roman Forum about repentance of sins and justification by faith, and was compelled to preach with a tent-maker's bench for a pulpit to the few curiosity seekers that chanced to resort to him. Read as mere history, Paul seems to have been the object of the vindictive wrath of some cruel fatality. But listen to his glad refrain: "If I must needs glory, I will glory in the things which concern my infirmities." The meaning of all his trials was now seen. Such great things Paul had suffered for God's sake and thereby he became the mighty apostle of the Lord who speaks to us by his life across the lapsing ages of time. You ask again why Paul was not stricken down till he had imbrued his hand in Christian blood and manacled the best of men and women in chains and blasphemed the Name to which he sang eventually his sweetest praises. Again there comes the answer: For discipline. There was to lie behind him the dark and ruined past, so that by its remembrance he might be prepared for a better, grander future. And it is the same necessity which confronts us. The Mount of Beatitudes, the Hill of Transfiguration, the Holy City of Jerusalem, are only reached via rough, trying, unpleasant Samaria. But you need not repine, my brother. No hill shall be too steep for you to climb, no way too rough for the tenderest feet. Follow in God's leading. A brighter land than Samaria is just before you.

Finally, let me exhort you not to fear the Samaritans of life. If you fancy you stand upon the border of that dreaded country, do not draw back from entering it. It is God who presses you onward; he will lead you through. 'Tis not all of life to be free from trial and to lead a happy-go-lucky existence of sunshine. 'Tis not all of life to turn it into a way of sorrow, a march to a crucifixion. It is all of life to make present sorrow work out heavenly happiness and to prevent the somber joys of time from winning us away from the sublimer joys of heaven. Rest can never be appreciated without effort. The song in heaven has as its prelude the tear on earth. Samaria leads to Galilee.

ISAAC THE PEACEMAKER.

A CHICAGO TEACHER'S NOTES ON THE LESSON.

ELIAS A. LONG.

Isaac the Son of Promise.

ISAAC, the son of Abraham and Sarah, was born at Beersheba, forty-five miles southwest of Jerusalem, B. C. 1896, according to the usual reckoning. He was a man of many attractive qualities, but was lacking in the rugged powers that gave Abraham and Jacob great prominence. He may be classed as a commonplace man, the least conspicuous of the three Hebrew patriarchs. Perhaps as a son of old age he was not physically as strong as the usual plains man type. We know that he was for many years afflicted with feebleness and loss of eyesight. As a child Isaac had been a rich blessing; his name, which means laughter, showing this. His faith and patience were manifest early in life as seen in his submission to be offered by his father; likewise that he was not consulted in the choice of a wife. Gen. 24:2. That he was not destitute of heroism was shown by his willingness to be offered at Mount Moriah, and equally in his daring to do right under the trying circumstances of today's lesson. His was a devout, gentle and refined mold of mind, indicated in part by his lonely meditations at eventide (Ch. 24:63) and the highly poetical strain of his blessing upon Jacob. Ch. 27:27-29. His action in meeting his estranged brother Ishmael at the funeral of their father shows commendable qualities. Gen. 25:9. That his influence was clearly on the side of faith in God is indicated by a New Testament writer. Hebrew 11:20. Isaac persevered in faith and at last gained the victor's crown. Math. 8:11; Luke 13:28.

The Living Sacrifice Exemplified.

In the last lesson it was seen that the Lord accepted the offering of Isaac as a living, not as a dead sacrifice. In today's Story of the Wells we find much instruction from the career of Isaac as indicating how the bodies of God's children in the ordinary acts of life may be offered as a sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God, "our reasonable service." Rom. 12:1. By the events reported we see that Isaac through self-denial appears in the divine role of peacemaker. He sacrificed inclinations dear to the natural man to become such. He followed the steps of Abraham's dealing with Lot. Ch. 13:9. Indeed, he was walking in harmony with the Divine One who long before had designed the Great Sacrifice, both living and dead, in the interests of peace. How reasonable, therefore, that Isaac, made in the divine image (Gen. 1:26) and in measure partaker of the divine nature (2 Peter 1:4), should offer up the peacemaker's sacrifice observed in our lesson. How greatly more valuable to the world was Isaac's life and example of self-denial than could have been his bleeding body offered in idolatrous fashion on Abraham's altar. Only as our lives are presented as living sacrifices are they capable of yielding the greatest blessing to the world and to ourselves. Luke 9:23.

V. 12. Seeding by Faith. "And Isaac sowed." From verse 1 we learn that famine prevailed in Palestine, the second calamity of this kind recorded. Ch. 12:10. For self-preservation, seemingly, Jacob started for Egypt, a land free from crop shortages. While on the way he received a command not to flee, but to remain in Gerar and there raise a crop. Verses 2, 3. * * * "In the same year." In that year of famine, Isaac with faith in the Lord's word sowed the land. Thorough tillage conserves moisture; it would tend at that time to help crops, where trusting to the rude tillage then in vogue, would involve continued disaster. Famines are mostly confined to heathen lands where improved culture is lacking. * * * "A hundred fold," a general term for a great yield. Matt. 13:23. * * * "The Lord blessed." They that sow as the Lord commands indeed find a joyful harvest. Psalm 126:6.

V. 13. "Godliness is Profitable." "Waxed great and went forward." He was getting ahead. Isaac in inheriting his father's property did not become a prodigal son. Luke 15:12. God blesses the labors of his true followers (Matt. 6:33). * * * "Grew until became very great." His success gained momentum. But he as well grew in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord. 2 Peter 3:18. The verses which follow show this. In his case the cares and riches and pleasures of life did not choke the seed of God's word. Matt. 13:22.

V. 14. "The World's Enmity." "Possessions of flocks and herds." Isaac's wealth consisted of sheep and cattle. He was very far from being a rich man in the modern sense. Many of us are rich without appreciating it. Paul considered himself a rich man. 2 Cor. 6:10. * * * "Philistines." Dwellers of the plains of Palestine, which land derived its name from this tribe. Like the Egyptians they were of another race, the descendants of Noah's son, Ham, while Abraham was of the line of Shem. * * * "Envied him." Isaac's prosperity incited the envy of those less prosperous, a common occurrence. Likely the cultivating of the soil was taken as an indication of permanent settlement. With increased riches, cares and anxiety increased; most of the envy, strife and wars of this world may be laid to the same cause. Ch. 37:11; 1 Sam. 18:9; Prov. 27:4.

V. 15. Acts of Hatred. "All the wells." Good wells possessed a value in that semi-arid land hard to be computed by those who have water in abundance. To make improvements by digging wells, in those early days of loose property rights, conferred a sort of ownership. * * * "Philistines filled them with earth," a common course in tribal warfare. Rather than have these signs of previous occupation remain they would rob the country of the much-needed water. One mark of Satan's work is that which destroys things of inestimable good. Note the vast destruction of useful food-grains in making alcoholic poison.

V. 16. The Diplomatic King. "Abimelech." A Philistine king of Gerar bearing this name as an official title. * * * "Go from us." Instead of pursuing guerilla warfare with one whose influence and power he feared, he comes with a diplomatic compliment to Isaac's greatness. Unenlightened as he is, he yet knew enough of human nature to understand the value of a kind and courteous request. * * * "They are mightier than we," because God had blessed his inheritance and his industry.

V. 17. The Living Sacrifice. "Isaac departed thence . . . dwelt there." Isaac had a right to dwell there, for Jehovah had said "unto thee and unto thy seed I will give all these countries." Verse 3. He had the power to dwell there, for in battle his herdsmen surely could have conquered the Gerar cowboys. But such success would have been the cause of strife for years to come, and he was a man of peace. Here then was presented the offering acceptable to God and blessed of him. Rom. 12:1. Isaac "departed thence" giving up (1) the human love of displaying power, giving up (2) home and property rights, (3) his new farming prospects, (4) the profit of his labor—all for peace. He indeed used weapons against his neighbors but only such as are by us to be employed against the world. 2 Cor. 10:4, 5. He learned that the meek should inherit the earth. Matt. 5:5. Like Abraham, in dealing with Lot, he tried "giving up" and found that it worked well. Dr. Bushnell said, "If I had my life to live over again, I would not push." * * * "In the valley of Gerar." The country around Gerar some miles to the southwest.

V. 18. Honoring His Father. "Digged wells again." At first Isaac was permitted thus to improve the country unmo- lested and until possibly his industry was accepted as a sign of permanent location in Gerar. * * * "Philistines had stopped them" in violation of the covenant of peace entered into years before. Gen. 21:25-27. Even now men choke the wells of spiritual truth by their traditions, thus damming back the waters of everlasting life." * * * "Names by which father called them." Probably renewed the names as a partial security of title to them. His right to those old wells seems not to have been disputed.

V. 19. Living Waters. "Servants digged . . . in the valley." Isaac was wiser than to set his men digging wells on the mountain tops. Valleys of humility offer richer wells of blessing than the hilltops of pride. * * * "Found well of springing water." To dig new wells is as important as to open up old wells that have been filled up. The upspringing water is a figure of the living water which Christ gives to thirsty souls. John 4:14; 7:38.

V. 20-21. Trial of Faith. "Herdsman of Gerar did strive." Like the Philistines they did not want this improver of the land with them. Doubtless, in part at least, it was a case of race hatred, such as generally exists today toward the sons of Abraham. All race hatred is wrong. But the world's hatred extends to others besides the descendants of Isaac. John 15:18-21. * * * "The water is ours." Yet Isaac had the promise of the land (verse 3) and had made valuable improvements. * * * "Called the well Esek," meaning "strife." As verse 22 explains, Isaac would rather give up his claims and move than to strive. * * * "Digged another well." The new well brought forth new opposition. * * * "Called it Sitnah," meaning hatred, spitefulness. The word is from the same root as Satan, an adversary or hater. The hatred of the men in Gerar seems to have grown into spitefulness.

V. 22. Faith's Reward. "Removed from thence," indicating further self-surrender. Four times Isaac thus departs, but instead of a trail of blood he left a trail of blessings, nothing less than wells in a dry land. Some of these wells remain unto this day. We, too, may open wells of blessing in life's desert places. * * * "Digged a well and so they strove on." He patiently went from well to well until he wore out their hatred. He overcame evil with good. Rom. 12:20, 21. People very soon tire of quarreling with those who rather than quarrel with them will walk away. * * * "Name of it Rehoboth." The name means broad, vast, wide domain. Here Isaac found room and rest before proceeding to his home at Beersheba. So we as peacemakers may find sweet peace and rest. * * * "The Lord hath made room." Isaac did not forget the hand that guided. He did not say "my power and my diplomacy hath made room for us" (Dan. 4:30), but he recognizes in it the hand of God. * * * "We shall be fruitful." An expression showing Isaac's faith in the promises.

V. 23. The Home Going. "Went up to Beersheba." He traveled to the paternal home, the place of his birth and where his father had passed his latter days. Around Beersheba clustered many memories dear to the contemplative mind of Isaac. Here he had passed his childhood, here he had married. This place, located at the southern border of Canaan, was one of the landmarks of the country, as Dan was at the north.

V. 24. The Comforter. "The Lord appeared." The Angel of the Covenant; the Messenger of Jehovah. Ex. 3:2. Isaac sought peace and righteousness and found the God of all comfort in a sense more real than ever before. * * * "The same night." We must recall what Isaac had given up to those who had insulted him. Very likely his servants complained of such yielding. But God brings him comfort and without a day's delay. He never withholds his blessings from the one who comes with a living sacrifice. Rom. 12:2. * * * "God of Abraham"—the same Almighty One whose care and companionship for Abraham had already become a tradition. * * * "Fear not." God's cheering word of comfort sounded forth from beginning to end of the Scriptures. * * * "For I am with thee." Here is an added assurance of the bestowal of perfect peace to the mind of this promoter of peace. But the same, "I am with you always" comes no less surely to us. Matt. 28:20; Hebrew 13:5. * * * "Multiply thy seed." A renewal of the covenant made with Abraham. * * * "For my servant Abraham's sake." The influence of men lives beyond their earthly lives. A man wants to think of his future influence, as well as of the things of time or of a monument of stone. We, too, have the power to send forth waves of influence for good or evil that will continue to widen out far beyond the limits of our earthly life.

V. 25. 'Sacrifice of Praise.' "Builled an altar there." The altar would carry with it the thought of forgiveness, consecration, prayer and worship. Like Noah and Abraham he placed God and worship first and in so doing sets up his standard as a worshiper of the one true God. * * * "Called upon name of the Lord." Isaac was a prayerful man. He offered the "sacrifice of prayer and praise. Heb. 13:15. Prayer and communion with God was the source of his moral strength. Worship with Isaac was not a matter of externals, but one of spiritual communion with the Lord. * * * "Pitched tent." The tent is the symbol of the nomadic life. "We daily pitch our moving tent a day's march nearer home." * * * "Servants digged a well." Their large herds and flocks needed much water. Religion, in Isaac's case, included diligence in business as well as fervency in spirit. He did not neglect the wants of the body. In Isaac's scheme of things work went with prayer. * * * "Let us make a covenant." V. 28. Isaac won his enemies. He had blessed them by returning good for evil, wells for strife; and now his influence becomes so great that in verse 28 we see them come seeking to make a treaty. Truly "when a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him." Pro. 16:7. The main lesson is the duty of giving blessing instead of cursing. May we be helped of the Lord to the end that we may be peacemakers even at the cost of personal sacrifice.

FIVE-MINUTE SERMON ON THE GOLDEN TEXT.

BY PETER AINSLEE.

ESUS CHRIST is the Prince of Peace and all who belong to him must contribute to peace-making. There is no choice in the matter. The choice comes on our deciding for Jesus Christ. Having decided, we accept his authority and become his servants. Our hearts are a part of his empire and we recognize him as the emperor of our lives. His doctrines are accepted without hesitation and his words are supreme. He is our master and we are his servants. Our dispositions may be opposed to peace-making, for some people are naturally quarrelsome, but we must practice the disposition of Jesus. Our's was necessarily wrong at the start, but his disposition is the model. Our disposition may be so deeply rooted that we may become discouraged, but keep at it. Our way is wrong. His way is right. We must give up all that is opposed to Jesus. It is like taking an ignorant boy and teaching him to speak correctly. His bad grammar cannot be taken from him as you would a bad tooth, but it requires constant practice to remove the wrong and implant the right. The disposition of peace-making has to be cultivated and that continually. You would not take impure food to one who is sick, then why tell one, who is easily irritated, some unkind remark that has been made about him. Bad thoughts in your heart do far more harm than bad food in the stomach.

The chief thing is to be a child of God and the chief characteristic of a child of God is that he is a peace-maker. We prove the first by the second. Nothing has priority of this. The highest distinction in the world is to be a child of God. This is not a thing of words, but it is actual living. God lives and his children must in some sense live like him. Nations quarrel and fight, and usually over a matter so small that if it were individuals, the court would find them guilty and perhaps give them thirty days in jail. We are only semi-civilized yet and we are unable to see that what is wrong for one man is wrong for ten thousand or what is wrong in an individual is also wrong in a nation. Wars are wrong. Jesus taught "My Kingdom is not of this world; if my Kingdom were of this world, my servants would fight, but my Kingdom is from above," and again, "They that take the sword shall perish with the sword." Christians had better suffer, had better be wronged than to violate one of the chiefest principles of the Master. There must be individuals of peace before there can be a nation of peace. Now we are nearer a nation of bull dogs, always ready to fight, but when Jesus gets hold of the human heart we will count surrender a gracious thing—an unconditional surrender to the Prince of Peace. We become his and he becomes ours by our loyalty to him.

Our Father hear us as we pray and help us as we desire to live like Jesus. Amen.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR.

CHARLES BLANCHARD.

SPIRITUAL ACQUAINTANCE.

Topic Sept. 1. Ref. Job. 22:21-23.

THIS is a part of the great divine drama of human life. It has its problems, old as the sufferings and sorrows of the race; yet new and as perplexing as the unsolved mysteries of youth. How these old questions beat up against the soul, like the ceaseless surges of the surf along the shore. They throb in the heart-beat of the world today, despite our desperate commercialism. Multitudes rush madly on, without pause to hear or patience to heed. But still the old problems meet men everywhere in the midst of the busy mart, in the midst of abounding plenty and blighting poverty. And sooner or later, unless the soul has bartered its birthright for a mess of pottage, every man must struggle with one form or another of the manifold mystery of human existence.

Three Great Problems.

There are three great problems in this wonderful drama of Job, the suffering saint and the servant of God: The problem of sin, the mystery of human suffering and the struggle after God. The first and second we all have to meet practically, whether we will struggle bravely and victoriously, or drift with the current of environments, or the prevailing customs of social and religious life. It is the sorrowful truth that what appears to be the vast majority of mankind simply accept things as they are, and go on sinning and suffering, without seemingly much conscious effort to stem the tides of evil, setting shoreward on the shoals of time. Many have come to accept sin as a matter of course, and suffering, if not as a consequence, as something simply to be endured. There is the element of the pathetic in all this. It is just this that gives the drama of this ancient Seer its intense human interest. But it is not the larger truth. The problems of sin and suffering find their only sufficient answer in the solution of the deeper and nobler problem—

The Struggle After God.

This Eliphaz, the Temanite, was a conceited young fellow. He assumed to settle off-hand the perplexing problems of sin and human suffering. And spiritual mysteries were very simple matters with him. He says to Job, with vast assurance, as if he had settled the whole business: "Acquaint now thyself with him and be at peace; thereby good shall come unto thee. Receive, I pray thee, the law from his mouth, and lay up his words in thine heart. If thou return to the Almighty thou shalt be built up, thou shalt put iniquity far from thy tabernacles." All this is glibly spoken, and there is much of spiritual truth in it. It is worth our while to heed young Eliphaz, who would have been a leader in the Christian Endeavor Society at Teman, down in Edom, if he had known of the Endeavor movement! Unfortunately he was born too soon. There are some in these last times who are like Eliphaz—they have sounded the deep things of the Almighty. The great spiritual mysteries are spoken of with glib lightness. They talk easily of things that the angels desired to look into but were not able. They speak of the "simple Gospel," of the forgiveness of sins, of sanctification, of the gift of the Holy Spirit, in the cant phrases of the times, with wonderful confidence, but often with little real evidence of spiritual knowledge or acquaintance with the Master of men. They are not insincere but superficial. Spiritual stupidity, unthinking, seemingly utterly unconcerned about the profoundest questions of spiritual life, is something terrible. Spiritual superficiality is almost as bad—they are characteristic of the age. I don't want to be pessimistic and a growler, but I make this appeal for greater depth, humility, sincerity and nobler consecration, devotion—for better spiritual knowledge and acquaintance with the Master, whose we are and whom we serve.

Read Job's reply to Eliphaz in the next chapter and mark the humility of the old Seer, while his soul cries out in anguish: "O, that I might know him! That I might come even to his seat!" And again listen to his cry of faith, in the midst of the mysteries: "But he knoweth the way that I take; when he hath tried me I shall come forth as gold." May this be our prayer and our assurance.

GOD'S PROMISE TO ABRAM.

"Fear not, Abram: I am thy shield and thy exceeding great reward."—Genesis 15, 1.

Monday—Genesis 15: 1-18.

God is strangely condescending and tender. He makes his covenant with Abram; and a covenant is a promise which is ratified by a sign or token. He supports his words, as men need to support theirs, by a solemn religious sanction. And it is thus that he stoops to tie himself with me, giving security that his stipulations shall be kept and fulfilled. By the sacrifice of Christ he confirms his greatest and sweetest assurances.

But it may be necessary to wait patiently for God. When Abram had slain the appointed victims, what followed? For a time, only silence and suspense. I may have to pass through Abram's experience. I must depend on God's sovereign grace with unreserved submission. I may need to wrestle long before the answer comes. I may have to spend my tears apparently for naught. Yet only apparently.

For at last God's promises are fulfilled. Perhaps through gloom and sorrow, like that thick darkness which girt Abram round, and which was symbolic of the sufferings awaiting his family. But fulfilled exceedingly above thought and hope.

Tuesday—Genesis 17: 1-8.

"When Abram was ninety years old and nine"—thus long had he tarried for the execution of God's word. Many a summer and winter had passed over him since he bade farewell to his country, and yet the hopes with which he entered Canaan seemed as far as ever from being realized. No sign had appeared of the fulfilment of the promise. Abram remained a childless man. Had God forgotten his word? And must the ownership of the land go to someone who was no blood descendant of his own?

Nay, just when his perplexity is greatest, there comes to him the definite and explicit assurance that his deepest longings are soon to be carried out. "God never is before his time, and never is behind." When my perturbed spirit requires him most, when the burden is heaviest to bear, when in the midnight neither moon nor stars appear, the voice of the Lord reaches me, a good and comfortable voice. Then he is a shelter for me, and a strong tower from the enemy.

Wednesday—Deut. 1: 1-11.

So, at long length, Abraham's descendants enter the good land and large. Why "at long length?" Why does God keep me waiting for the incorruptible inheritance? Why does he not lavish its wealth on me at once?

The delay ripens and confirms my character. Through postponement, through hopes deferred, through conflicts and storms, through the trials of the pilgrim road, I learn to trust the higher strength, to submit to the Divine will, to be strong, and of a good courage. It is good for my soul to tarry the Lord's leisure.

And the delay conforms me to the image of God's dear and perfect Son. He reached his glory only by the way of the Hill Difficulty and the Valley of Humiliation and the Valley of the Shadow of Death. It is well for me to tread in his steps. It is an education, an honor, a blessedness. And the delay brings me a larger acquaintance with God's exceeding grace. I learn more of him. Thus it is best for me to gain the Holy Land only in the season appointed by the King.

Thursday—Psalm 105: 1-15.

God is a faith-keeping God. He "remembers his covenant for ever, his word to a thousand generations."

Then I need not fear that his Church and Kingdom will suffer final defeat. Through temporary eclipses, through days of storm, through winters of frost and cold, his chosen may be led. But he is pledged to conduct them to a wealthy place, and he cannot falsify or forget his plighted troth. By and by his army will be victorious, his cause will prevail.

And I should be sure that not one good word will fail of all that he has promised my individual heart. I sometimes question it. Perplexities, delays, tempests of temptation, heavy and agonizing bereavements—these are allotted me. But he is sanctifying me all the while. He is perfecting that which concerneth me. He is bringing me nearer the House of God.

And I ought to repay his fidelity with my faith. To God's Yea, simple, strong, sufficient, I should respond with my Amen. I should stand rock-like on the immovable Rock of Ages. I should grasp firmly the firm and abiding things. Mine should be a soul delivered from unbelief, from dubiousness, from all unworthy misgivings and fears.

How blessed is the new covenant! It speaks to me of a religion which is spiritual. Not on tables of stone, external, hard, its law is written, but on the inward parts of the heart. God's will has the glad and ready assent of my intellect, my conscience, my affection, my will. He has enthroned himself in my very soul.

It speaks to me of a religion which is close and tender. "I will be their God, and they shall be my people," the King of kings says in these last days. In his own Son he assumes my nature and descends to my level. In his own spirit he comes and abides within myself. "Nearer is he than breathing."

It speaks to me of a religion which is within the reach of everyone. "They shall all know me," says God, "from the least of them unto the greatest of them." Let me be humble and unnoticed, my opportunities meager, my outlook limited, I may be dignified and gladdened by Father and Son and Holy Ghost.

And it speaks to me of a religion which will not withdraw its gifts and treasures. Like the ordinances of sun, and moon, and stars, and sea; even more permanent and enduring than they are God's mercies in Jesus Christ. When he forgives me, it is for ever. When he loves me, it is to the ages of the ages.

Saturday—Hebrews 6: 9-20.

"If George says Verily, there's no altering him," so the neighbors were accustomed to think and say about young George Fox, when he was a boy at home in his father's house. But there is only one person who has the right to say Verily or Surely. And that person is God. He is eager to say it to me this new morning, "Surely I will bless you." "I myself will do it," he tells me. What I cannot win for myself, he gives me freely, for the sake of Jesus Christ his Son—the forgiveness of my sins, the new heart, his own friendship, his own love. "Surely, surely I will"—it is his strong asseveration to my doubting soul.

And once he begins, there is no finding out where he will end. In what an expressive way he phrases his promise, "Surely, blessing I will bless"! It is just as if he said, "When I commence to do you good, I will go on and on, forever and forever. I will send you pardon first, and then, afterwards, strength and holiness and peace and victory and heaven, everything your heart can desire. Surely one golden link will be joined to another. Surely, blessing I will bless."

Sunday—Hebrews 8: 1-13.

May I make all things—my thoughts, my motives, my words, my acts—after the pattern I have seen on the Mount, the Mount where the Cross of Jesus stands.

This is the pattern which should regulate my idea of sin. That God's own Son should need to spill and shed his blood to wash out my stain; what a light the fact throws upon my malignity and foulness! The horror of my sin, the ill desert of it, the indignation it should kindle—I see them all on the Mount where my Savior dies for me.

And this is the pattern which should inspire my assurance of pardon. The cross is the disclosure of the saving grace of the Father, and the saving virtue of the Son—Jesus has shunned no pain, no desertion, no loneliness, that the river of salvation which flows out to me may be a full and victorious flood.

And this is the pattern which should constitute my model of obedience. Christ bore the will of God, and I must seek grace to endure as he endured. Christ did the will of God, finishing a great work on Calvary; and the same passion of zeal for the Father must urge me forward, the same passion of love for men.

General Church News

CHICAGO AND VICINITY.

Dr. T. W. Powell, of the Rogers Park church, has gone to the Iowa assembly at Iowa Falls, where he delivers a series of normal lectures to Sunday-school teachers.

After a week of special services the new Emmanuel Methodist Episcopal church on Park avenue was dedicated August 18, the sermon being delivered by Rev. A. D. Traveller, followed by the formal dedication of the building by the Rev. J. G. Armstrong, the pastor.

Memorial Baptist church, on Oakwood boulevard, just completed, is on the site of the old frame structure. The base is of brown stone, with molded brick and terra cotta for the superstructure, with roof of red Spanish tile. The plan of the auditorium is that of a Greek cross, surmounted by a large square tower. The cost of construction was $55,000.

The union tent meetings held during the month of July at the corner of Adams and Morgan streets, under the auspices of forty-seven Christian Endeavor societies, and in charge of Rev. Milford H. Lyon, had a total attendance of over 12,000, an average of 400 each night. More than 300 persons responded to the invitation to become Christians.

Under the auspices of the Disciples of Christ in connection with the University of Chicago, a house for young women who are attending the University or the South Side Academy has been established. Miss Alice Lloyd, formerly principal of Madison Institute, Richmond, Ky., is at the head of it. It is intended to give such oversight and direction to those within this house as shall make it a real Christian home.

Mr. James H. Todd has recently arrived from New Zealand to occupy the position of superintendent of the men's department at the Moody Institute. Mr. Todd is a graduate of the school, and on leaving in 1894 went to China as a missionary. He has spent the last two years in New Zealand, teaching the Bible and evangelizing. He is the son of Rev. A. B. Todd, a Presbyterian minister of national repute out there. In his new position Mr. Todd will relieve Mr. Torrey of detail work connected with the men's department.

The attendance at the University of Chicago for the year ending July 1, as reported by the annual register, was 3,520. This shows an increase of 300 over the preceding year. The classification shows 372 in the Divinity School and 471 in the College for Teachers. Of the total, 676 were women and 1,844 men. This record places the University by the side of the University of Michigan in the competition for second place among American universities, Harvard holding first place with an attendance of more than 4,000. Yet the expense for tuition at the University of Chicago is much higher than that in the state universities.

The growing interdenominational comity is finely illustrated in the announcements made by the Chicago Theological Seminary Quarterly, some of which we mentioned last week. Dr. William M. Lawrence, pastor of the Second Baptist church, Chicago, will be associated this year with the new president, Dr. George, in the department of Homiletics, giving a special course of lectures on preaching. Prof. Shailer Mathews, of the University of Chicago, will share with Dr. Warren J. Moulton, of Yale University, the work of the New Testament department during the ensuing year. The foreign field will contribute its important part in training the ministry through the lectures and personal intercourse of Rev. C. N. Ransom, the seminary's representative on the South African field.

The first Sunday in September is rapidly coming to be identified in the religious calendar as Bible Study Sunday. Several years ago the American Institute of Sacred Literature of Hyde Park, Chicago, organized a movement for the observance of one Sunday in the year which should be devoted by pastors to sermons upon Bible study, its necessity and some methods for its pursuit. The Institute has offered suggestions for discourses upon this theme, and is willing to send a postal card requesting it. If the preacher has a plan for his people to pursue, he will recommend it. If there is a denominational plan which can be used this will be set forth. In case nothing of the kind offers itself, the Institute supplies suggestions regarding its own courses. But this matter is subordinate to that of securing general co-operation in the movement for reviving systematic Bible study in all the churches. It is not yet too late to secure material and prepare for the observance of the day. The last number of the Biblical World contains full outlines from eminent preachers as hints toward the preparation of sermons for Bible Study Sunday.

The attendance of students at the University of Chicago for the year ending July 1 is reported by the Annual Register as being 3,520. This shows an increase of more than 300 over the preceding year. The registration in the different departments was: Divinity school, 372; Graduate school, 994; Senior college, 435; Junior college, 622; unclassified, 626; College for Teachers, 471. Of the total, 676 were women and 1,844 men. This shows remarkable growth in the attendance at the university, and places it by the side of the University of Michigan in the competition for second place among American universities, Harvard holding first place with an attendance of more than 4,000. When it is remembered also that the expense for tuition at the University of Chicago is much higher than that in state universities, it will be seen how large has been the gain in the student list. There is nothing in these figures, however, to alarm the friends of the small college, for it is becoming more fully recognized that the very work done by the higher universities requires the more careful attention to the work of the small college as a prerequisite. But the promise of an institution like the University of Chicago with its growing plant, equipment, faculty and student body is significant of great things in the educational future of America.

Adventist.

The Adventists have decided to raise $10,000 to buy a new location at Battle Creek, Mich., and erect a parochial school building expressly for their children.

The Adventists have bought and paid for $19,000 worth of farm land near Berrien Springs, Mich., and will at once proceed to spend $150,000 upon new college buildings. The buildings will be located on a high bluff within sight of the village of Berrien Springs.

The Michigan conference of Seventh Day Adventists are holding a camp meeting at Lansing. The development of the Adventist faith has been very rapid in recent years. At the World's General Conference at Battle Creek in March, 1901, delegates were present from more than thirty conferences in the United States, and from England, Europe, South America, Africa, the West Indies and many other parts. At that time many offered their lives for the work in foreign fields.

Baptist.

Rev. Dr. McMasters is doing a good work at Tama and Toledo, Iowa; a debt of $1,100 has been paid at the former and a church to cost $3,500 is being built at Toledo.

Dr. A. B. Chaffee has resigned the presidency of the Forest Avenue church, Des Moines, Ia., to become president of Bishop College, Marshall, Texas, which is under the fostering care of the Home Mission Society.

A summer resort for the Baptists of Michigan is to be located near Cadillac, Mich., fifty-three acres of land lying between Big and Little Clam lakes, and south of Idlewild, having been bought by the Osceola Baptist Association.

The Good Will Home at East Fairfield, Me., has been compared to the Muller orphanages of Bristol, England. Founded less than twelve years ago by Rev. George W. Hinckley, it now includes eight cottages for boys, with fifteen in each, under the care of a matron. Many of these are the gifts of individuals. A fine brick and stone school building costing $20,000 is a memorial of Charles E. Moody of Chicago. A mile away is the girls' department, having two fine cottages and a school building. Half way between is a stone chapel. In an adjoining pine grove there is an auditorium set apart for an annual assembly, which is attracting great interest in New England. A large open space is devoted to athletic sports. This year twenty-eight tents were full of visiting boys.

The sixth annual meeting of the Pine Lake Christian Culture Assembly, held at the Baptist grounds near La Porte, Ind., closed Aug. 4. Rev. E. S. Stucker, of South Bend, Ind., gave five lectures upon "The Story of the Establishment of Christianity as Told in the Acts and the Epistles." His sub-topics were: "God's Opportunity; or, The Fullness of the Times;" "Beginning at Jerusalem; or, The Jew First;" "Scattered Abroad; or, The Beginning of Gospel Missions;" "The Church in Antioch; or, The Gospel for the Gentiles; and "Among All Nations; or, The Gospel for the Whole World." Much interest was aroused by Mr. Stucker's valuable presentation of his subject. Rev. J. E. Conant had charge of the religious hour and spoke daily upon the work of the Holy Spirit, and closed with a sermon on Sunday evening upon, "How We May Be Filled With the Holy Spirit." Illustrated lectures were given in the evenings by John Powell Lenox, "Oberammergau, 1900—an Experience"; Miss Mary G. Burdette, "Home and Home Life on Home Mission Fields"; and by Rev. E. S. Stucker, "A Trip to the Orient." Miss Anna M. Phillee, of Fort Wayne, Ind., gave an evening of readings, and a concert was given under the direction of Clark R. Parker, of Indiana.

Congregational.

At Bethany church, San Francisco, six children belonging to five Christian Chinese families were baptized Aug. 4.

At Durand, Mich., the congregations are steadily increasing, over 250 people attending the evening service August 4. Rev. J. F. Fryer is the pastor.

Rev. E. B. Allen, for seven years the pastor of Pilgrim church, Lansing, Mich., goes to take up work at Washington Street church, Toledo, Ohio. Rev. C. M. Burkholder of Waukegan, Ill., has accepted the pastorate of the Second church, Toledo.

A mission among the Japanese at Los Angeles was started in April by Rev. W. C. Pond, D. D., superintendent of California Chinese mission work. Miss Alice G. Harwood, who had been for several years a missionary in Japan, was placed in charge of the work. It has been quite successful.

The new town of Park City, Oklahoma, situated at the head of the Wichita Forest Reservation, has a Congregational church started. Rev. Henry Hammer, who was for five years a missionary in Africa, has secured a fine location of four lots for church and parsonage buildings. The churches in this unique town are all to be located on one street, called Church street.

Miss Mary Holbrook, a member of a well-known family of Holbrook, Mass., has established a fund of $5,000, the income from which is to help maintain public worship in the Winthrop Congregational church of that town. It is also given to perpetuate Miss Holbrook's annual gift, as she has been accustomed to give yearly to the church an amount about equal to the income from $5,000.

At the First church, Zanesville, Ohio, the congregations have been large throughout the summer, especially in the evening. The services have been of a varied character. During the last month the pastor, Rev. J. Alex. Jenkins, has been reading an original story and giving brief addresses on the subjects suggested by the incidents in the various chapters. At the communion, August 4, twenty-one adults were received into the church, making a total of thirty-seven during the present pastorate of three months.

The Sturges Memorial church, South Port Huron, Mich., which was organized Aug. 1, has grown out of a Sunday-school started in August, 1865, as part of a system of local home missionary effort devised by five consecrated men. This special work fell to C. G. Meisel, who has been superintendent most of the time. The school was self-supporting from the first, and the teachers have been chosen from its membership. The society in connection with it owns a church building, and turns over all its property to the church.

The eighty-fifth annual report of the Congregational Education Society shows more money raised in the west than in any previous year. Larger appropriations have been made by the society this year, but all outstanding claims are paid and the society is clear of debt, with a small surplus in the student aid department. The number of men receiving scholarships has been 139. The year TWO Christian Century Jenks . . . . closes with twenty-one academies upon the list of the Education Society, as against seventeen last year. The four which have been added are the Benzonia academy, Michigan; Gates academy, Nebraska; Southern Collegiate institute, Albion, Ill., and Weiser academy, Idaho.

The Disciples.

Prof. Hugh McDiarmid of Hiram College died rather suddenly August 15 of typhoid fever.

Geary, a new town in Oklahoma, has a Christian church just organized, a Sunday school and a weekly communion service.

Rev. W. T. Adams has been at Chanute, Kas., for two years and has received 190 into the church there and at Yates Center.

New church buildings are going up at Springfield, Chambersburg, Georgetown and Chapin, Ill., and a $2,000 parsonage at Lafayette is about completed.

The Salamonica church, Richmond, Ind., the oldest house of worship in Jay county, celebrated its sixty-second anniversary August 11. Two of the charter members are still alive.

Forty-one accessions are reported at Gravett, Ark.; twenty-three at Forest City, Ark.; twenty-two at Salem, Ia., and thirty-five at Buda, Texas—all the results of special meetings.

Nineteen "meetings" are in progress or have just closed at as many different places in Kentucky. They are all reported as successful, the additions to the churches varying from seven to thirty-one.

Rev. H. A. Northcutt has just closed a two years' pastorate of the church at Kirksville, Mo., during which time 296 members have been received into the church and the building has been enlarged at a cost of $6,500.

Rev. H. D. Williams, pastor of the Christian church at Mankato, Minn., has refused, in response to the earnest request of his people that he remain with them, an advantageous offer of a college position at Canton, Mo.

Rev. Thomas J. Dixon, of Kansas City, has been appointed army chaplain in the regular army. He hopes to be sent to the Philippines. He has been pastor at different times of the Sheffield, Westport Avenue and Garfield Avenue churches.

J. E. Parker, state evangelist, just closed a meeting at Gilchrist, a mining town, Mercer county, Ill., with forty-four additions. He is now in a meeting at Aledo, same county. Both are new points. A church will be organized at the close of the meeting.

The daily press of Minneapolis, where the national conventions of the Disciples of Christ are to be held in October, are publishing a series of articles written by prominent members of that church, dealing with various features of its life and work. This is especially valuable, as the Disciples have only a limited membership in the region of the Twin Cities, and as they expect to have a very large convention, this plan will secure some knowledge of them to the people of Minneapolis before they arrive.

Episcopal.

Rev. J. G. Barry, of Batavia, Ill., has been elected dean of St. Paul's cathedral, Fond du Lac, Wis.

A new building is to be added to Bethany Home, Glendale, Ohio, which will accommodate 100 more children. Hitherto the Home could only take care of forty.

Rev. Frederick A. DeRossett, archdeacon of Cairo and rector of the Church of the Redeemer, Cairo, has been called to the rectorship of St. Paul's pro-Cathedral, Springfield, Ill.

Through the efforts of Rev. William N. Guthrie, rector of the Church of the Resurrection, Fern Bank, Ohio, a parish house has been erected for St. Andrew's Mission, Addyston. The mill people will be benefited by this acquisition.

In the American branch of the Episcopal church the clergy have increased from 2,989 in 1873 to 5,011 in 1900; and the communicants from 235,000 in 1873 to 712,997 in 1900, or at a ratio 40 per cent greater than that of the population. In 1877 this church had 365 missionaries in the domestic and foreign field, with contributions amounting to 213,376. It has today 1,623 missionaries, with contributions amounting to $596,105.

In Cuba, within three years, Episcopal interests have grown to a clergy list of five, a lay workers' paid list of five, five missionary stations, two schools, an orphanage and one church. The orphanage is owned, a lot adjoining, and there is one small chapel at Matanzas. In the school are 205 children and in the orphanage fifty-two girls. A lot has been purchased for a new church in the residence section of Havana and there is $5,000 in hand toward its construction.

Methodist.

The Rev. John F. Goucher recently gave $1,000 to Soochow University in China, under the management of the Methodist Episcopal Church South.

The Methodists of Anderson, Ind., have let the contract for the construction of a new church to cost $16,692.

Rev. Chas. Bayard Mitchell, who has been pastor of the Hennepin Avenue church, Minneapolis, for four and a half years, will go to Cleveland in October, after he returns from the Ecumenical conference in London.

The German Methodist church of Sheboygan, Wis., celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of its organization August 9-11. The congregation has a very fine church building, is practically free from debt, and in a prosperous condition. Rev. C. F. Neitzel is now in charge.

Rev. S. D. Hutsiniller, D. D., of the Central Methodist church of San Francisco, has accepted a call to the pastorate of the Hennepin Avenue church, Minneapolis. He is said to be the ablest man in the Methodist body on the Pacific coast, and has been much in demand, having had many calls to other churches.

The Epworth League of Roberts Park church, Indianapolis, Ind., sustains a gospel wagon which visits the worst parts of the city regularly each week. It contains an organ and seats for about fourteen persons. The speaking and singing are not noisy, but attractive, and many even from saloons listen respectfully.

The corner stone of the new St. John's church, St. Louis, Mo., on Washington avenue and King's Highway, will be laid September 12, and the first annual meeting of the reorganized Southern Methodist Church Extension and City Mission Society will be held the same day. Bishops Hendrix, Candler and Lane will take part in both events.

The new church building at Valley Falls, Kas., was dedicated Sunday evening, Aug. 4. In the morning the Rev. Edwin Gill, of Burlingame, Kas., preached and made an appeal for money to enable the house to be dedicated in the evening free from debt. The amount called for was $550, and the amount raised was $570. Mr. Gill was a former pastor at Valley Falls. He preached the dedicatory sermon in the evening. Rev. Mr. Foresman, of Council Grove, Kas., another old-time pastor, was also present. Rev. G. W. Braden is the present pastor.

Presbyterian.

Tent meetings held in Omaha under the leadership of Rev. Merton Smith have had a very good attendance. About 800 attended the first service, and several, mostly men, expressed a wish to lead a Christian life.

The tent meetings at Grace church, St. Louis, have been held for five weeks and the interest in them seems to be increasing so that on the evening of Sunday, August 11, chairs had to be placed outside the tent and were all occupied.

Rev. William Carter has just completed the second year in his pastorate of the First church, Kansas City. During the two years 202 members have been received; $4,000 given to benevolences and $10,269 to church expenses.

Fifty-six persons united with the Second Presbyterian church of Pittsburg in July, forty-six being on confession of faith. Almost nine hundred persons have united with the Second church under the pastorate of Rev. Edward S. Young, and the net active membership of the church now numbers about 1,300.

The Presbyterian church of Grand Forks, N. D., has recently adopted, at the suggestion of the pastor, Dr. Frank Hays, personal work for its members which has resulted in forty-six uniting with the church. It is noteworthy that almost every one who attends the Sunday school of this church outside of the primary department carries a Bible to school.

The Presbyterian Board of Home Missions finds itself in need of men for mission fields in the West. Six are needed for New Mexico and Arizona, others for stations in the Northwest. Men of strong intellectual and spiritual power, of tact, and judgment are wanted. The fields are sometimes remote from railroads and are often vast in extent, therefore requiring men of robust physique. Men ready and equipped for such missionary service are invited to correspond with the secretary, Rev. Dr. Charles L. Thompson, of the Board of Home Missions in New York.

The synod of Mexico, the Presbyterian body which has just been organized, contains four presbyteries, with about forty pastors. Three of the presbyteries were formerly connected with the general assembly of the Presbyterian church north, while the other was under control of the southern Presbyterian body. The Mexican organization is now wholly independent of the larger bodies, although as a matter of courtesy it will make annual

READY COOKED FOOD.

Famous Around the Camp Fire.

People going into camp should not forget to take along a goodly supply of Grape-Nuts, the ready-cooked food. This can be eaten dry and does not require any preparation by the cook, or the food can be made into a variety of delightful dishes, such as puddings, etc.

One of the favorite methods by old timers is to drop three or four heaping teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts into a cup of coffee. The Grape-Nuts add a peculiar and delicious flavor to the coffee and give one a more piquant article of food than even the famous doughnuts and coffee of old New England.

People who cannot digest coffee should not forget that Postum Food Coffee, if properly made, furnishes a very delicious beverage, either hot or cold, closely approaching the flavor of the mild and delicious grades of Java.

reports to both. Rev. Arcadio Morales, who is by some called the Moody of Mexico, was elected moderator of the new synod and the standards of the northern church were adopted. These the Cumberland Presbyterians will not accept, and the churches of that body in Mexico have not therefore entered the federation.

Three prominent teachers of theology in the divinity schools of the denomination have addressed a pastoral letter to the clergy and laity of the Southern Presbyterian church, calling attention to the steady decline in candidates for the Christian ministry—from 402 in 1896 to 317 in 1900. The cause of the decline is said to be "a low tone of piety.... Temporal interests absorb attention; church discipline is relaxed, family religion decays. Parents prefer to see their sons prosperous business men.... After the desolations of the war and the loss of fortune there is a return of peace and prosperity. Riches begin to increase and our people set their hearts upon them. Any permanent and healthy change must begin in distinct recognition of this painful truth."

At Winona Lake, Ind., a large industrial school and preparatory college for poor boys is to be established under Presbyterian auspices. The school, however, is to be strictly non-sectarian, and is to follow decidedly new and original lines. Work on the school structure is to begin this fall. It is the intention to open the institution next September with at least 300 poor boys in attendance. All that will be required of them in exchange for their clothing, lodging, food, and instruction, will be earnest labor three hours every day in the factories that will be on the grounds. It is estimated that it will cost $75 a year above this labor to keep each one of the boys. A hundred or more cottages on the ground, the Inn, the Winona Hotel, the Swiss Terrace and other hotels have already undergone changes that will make them good dormitories and homes during the winter months. The facilities are quite sufficient for 2,500 students. Already several of the factories have been pledged direct support. A Warsaw man will equip the cheese factory and will contract for the output, turning the plant over to the institution in fee simple.

Religious services in eight different languages are held every Sunday at St. Agnes' Roman Catholic church at Chicago Heights, Ill.

At Ladoga, Ind., during a recent union meeting, the stores, which are usually open in the evening, were closed during the hours of service.

The ministers of Chetopa, Kan., arranged to hold union open air services during the hot weather and they have proven a great success. Large crowds attend, and they hope to reach many who do not attend church.

There are about 600 Protestant churches of all bodies in Mexico and the progress making by Protestantism in Mexico is rapid, as under the Diaz government many of the influential educators are selected from Protestant ranks.

The famous Joe Jones is holding a union meeting at Oskaloosa, Kas. A large tent was procured and erected beside the Presbyterian church, and this was filled Sunday evening, August 11, to overflowing. He is arousing much interest by the fearless way in which he speaks and shows people their real condition.

The Christian and Missionary Alliance at its annual collection day at Old Orchard, Me., received over $40,000, about $1,200 being in cash and the balance in pledges. The largest single contribution was $5,000, and the smallest fifteen cents. Volunteers for service in the foreign mission field were called for and 200 people responded.

American Roman Catholics contributed during 1900 for foreign missions $71,230, the amount being sent to the Central Council of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. The headquarters of the propaganda are in Paris, France, and from there the money is sent to support weak missions in all parts of the world. The American contribution is much larger than previous ones.

The Christian Workers' Conference at Wheaton, Ill., was attended by over 400 people, including about 100 ministers. Many came long distances, such as Omaha, Minneapolis, Memphis, Tenn., and Oberlin, O. The various speakers, Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, Rev. R. A. Torrey, Rev. Milford H. Lyon, Rev. Dr. Johnston Myers, and others have promised to assist in a similar conference next year.

The Young People's Christian Federation has been organized in Alton, Ill., consisting of all the young people's societies in the city. The objects of the federation as set forth are "the united efforts of Christian young people in Christian work, to do aggressive work to crystallize sentiment in favor of better citizenship, to assist the city administration in securing a better state of public morals and to co-operate for the purpose of bringing about moral reforms."

The eighty-fifth annual report of the American Bible Society shows a slight increase in the receipts from individuals, auxiliaries, collections, legacies and the Bible house. The total issues of the year, at home and abroad, amount to 1,554,128. Of these 580,513 were distributed in the United States and 973,616 in foreign lands. The total issues of the society in eighty-five years amount to 68,923,434. The year's work in China shows a loss of less than 60,000 in circulation. During the eighty-five years of its life the society received from the Christian public of America $30,805,390, including trust funds.

The Bible Study Congress in connection with the Pan-American Exposition at Buffalo was successful in many ways. It brought out speakers from all parts of the country, representing various points of view in Bible study, and proved distinctly to those who were in a position to attend most of the sessions, that the purposes and methods of those who are promoting Bible study throughout the world are closely allied and not vitally different. Such gatherings cannot fail to promote a greater harmony of method in this most important field, and it may be hoped that this is the first of a series of Bible study conventions which shall be held annually and offer a platform for the consideration of those matters which pertain to the study of the Bible and to its popularization.

SENSIBLE TO QUIT.

Coffee Agrees With Some People, But Not With All.

"Coffee has caused my son-in-law to have nausea and pain in the stomach and bowels.

In my own case I am unable to drink coffee without having distress afterwards, and my son, eleven years old, has had dyspepsia, caused by drinking coffee.

We all abandoned the use of coffee some months ago and have been using the Postum Food Coffee since.

Each and every one of us have been entirely cured of our troubles and we are naturally great friends of Postum. I have tried several different ways of making it, but there's no way so good as to follow the directions properly; then we have a delicious drink."—Mrs. A. F. Moublo, 331 Lynn St., Malden, Mass.

unprecedented as opportunity for forward work in China. Thirty thousand native Christians perished at the hands of "Boxers." The fact that so many died for their faith has gone through China like an electric shock. While notoriously careless of human life, Chinamen realize that none among them would die for Confucianism, Buddhism, ancestral worship or any form of religion recognized among them. That so many died, often gladly, for Christianity has impressed the Chinese markedly and they are saying that there is something in the new western religion that they have not but must have. Hence the opening for missionary effort at this time.

Mr. Wagner says of one of the colporteurs in the district of Hermosillo, Mexico: He travels all over the country introducing the Scriptures, from whence start Sunday schools and churches. I know of some fifteen places where the work was begun through the introduction of the Word of God by Sr. Florentino Pina." Many interesting incidents are recounted by Mr. Wagner as witnessed by him in a recent trip. In one place where they stopped they found a woman engaged in reading her Bible, who when she bought the Bible could not read, but was then reading the New Testament through for the eighth time. In another place five of the brethren formed a mining company to develop a prospect. They laid aside enough copper for a bell and put an article in the agreement that one-fifth of the proceeds of the mine was to be used for the Congregational church there. They have sold the mine since and by the time all the installments are paid will have about $2,700 for their church.

Here is an incident of the revival in Japan: A young son of the ancient and well known Tobe family, being profoundly interested in the recent evangelistic movement, devoted himself with all his energy to the work of distributing announcements. One day at school a great crowd of his companions began to ridicule him. "Oh," they shouted, "you've become a Jesus kozukai (a term signifying the lowest kind of menial service), haven't you? What a fool you're making of yourself!" Yoong Tobe did not show the least degree of shame. On the contrary he bravely faced the crowd and said, "Isn't that all right? The Jesus doctrine is a doctrine which saves people. I am very glad to be a kozukai if I can help to save people." This manly reply completely silenced his persecutors. Not one of them had another word to say. One of the boys who heard this answer is the son of a Christian who had been very remiss in his Christian duty. The lad repeated the incident in his father's hearing and the latter was cut to the heart by a sense of his own neglect of duty, and from that day returned to his loyalty to the Lord.

The Indian Witness publishes a letter from Bishop Warne urging that total abstinence, which is the practice and teaching of the missionaries and missions, be made universal. "Indian Christians from all missions," says Bishop Warne, "are rapidly becoming a distinct community, and will more and more intermarry and become more closely related and associated. The fact, therefore, that there are some missions in which the Indian Christians are not total abstainers is becoming a very serious question in various parts of India." "We have a constant fight," writes one of his correspondents, "to prevent the custom of wine drinking at weddings and baptisms from taking hold among our people. The members of various churches consider themselves one community and intermarry freely, and, while we do our best, we are not always successful in keeping wine from these mixed marriage feasts. When one party is from a church where wine is tolerated, it is only natural that they should want their church customs followed." "One of the most difficult things we have to do," writes another, "is to guard our young people against this infection from a sister church." Another says: "The drink is creeping into the zenanas. We quite frequently find the women are so intoxicated that we are unable to talk to them." Several cases where mission workers have been wrecked by the drink habit are referred to.

SUNDAY EVENING SERVICE.

Various plans are being tried this summer with reference to the Sunday evening services. In many cases the churches dispense with a second service altogether; in others, it has been given into the care and management of the Christian Endeavor Society. This has worked well in many instances, and fair-sized congregations have attended. The topics have been varied; there has been plenty of music with good speakers on special subjects. More frequently perhaps the churches of the town have united, holding the evening service in each church by turns, the pastors or their "supplies" likewise preaching by turns, but always in one of the other churches and not in their own. This plan does not usually bring together a much larger congregation than would be found in any one of the churches were the services held separately, for people do not feel a sense of responsibility for attendance at a union service.

One kind of union service, however, seems to be meeting with more success than others, and that is the out-door one. We have chronicled some of these in our general news columns. There is generally a park or other convenient place for meeting, and many will attend such a service who will not go inside church walls. Regular churchgoers also are attracted to an out-door evening service in warm weather who otherwise would stay at home, having attended one service at their own church and feeling therefore relieved of further responsibility during the vacation season. When all the churches unite and the service is made a town affair in which all alike have a common interest, the attendance is much increased. A special chorus choir of volunteers, with one or two good solos, helps to make the service attractive, and in some places the local band gives a sacred concert for fifteen minutes. The sermons or addresses are short and direct. Sometimes a collection is taken for expenses.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION WORKERS AT LAKE GENEVA, WIS.

The eighteenth year of the Young Men's Christian Association encampment at Lake Geneva will close September 1. The attendance has considerably exceeded that of any previous season. During the latter part of June the ten days' conference of students, modeled after the famous Northfield college gathering, was attended by four hundred and sixty students and professors, representing one hundred and seventy institutions and fourteen states. Four different lines of Bible study were carried on under Prof. W. W. White, of Montclair, N. J.; Jas. W. Raine, of Oberlin; Augustus Nash, of Cleveland, O., and C. V. Hibbard, of the Northwestern University. Addresses were given by L. D. Wishard, E. T. Colton, John R. Mott, Harry Monroe, H. P. Beach, W. W. Cooper and others. The subject of foreign missions occupied a prominent place in the program. At the close of the session it was found that an even one hundred students had enrolled as missionary volunteers, declaring it to be their intention "if God permit" to become foreign missionaries. Another interesting fact was that 158 leaders of Bible classes among students were present.

The Young Women's Christian Association conference was held July 2 to 11, the total attendance being five hundred and twelve. Much the same lines of work were carried on as in the students' conference.

Then came the Conference of Volunteer Workers in city, town and railroad associations. A noteworthy feature of this conference was a strong series of lectures and papers on what may be termed the technique of Young Men's Christian Association work. Notable among these papers were a series of three papers on "The Association as a 19th Century Movement," by Rev. Dr. W. Douglas Mackenzie, of Chicago; a paper on "The Model Association," by H. B. Tileston, D. D. S., of Louisville, Ky.; an address on "Some of the Elements of Christian Character," by Dr. Jas. G. K. McClure, of Lake Forest; and two papers on "The Association Polity" and on "The Student Movement as It Relates to the Entire Association Movement," by Dr. John M. Coulter of the University of Chicago. Considerable attention was given to religious work among boys. Papers and addresses were given by M. C. Otto, of Milwaukee, and E. M. Robinson, of New York city. The Bible study in this conference was under the direction of Dr. J. R. Sampey, of Louisville, and consisted of daily lectures on the Prophecies of Isaiah.

The summer school, which opened July 23 and continued one month, was attended by eighty-six students, most of whom are engaged in the work of the Association, either as general secretaries or as physical directors. Among the subjects taught in addition to four different Bible courses were Church history, Association history and economy, Association work in foreign lands, Association boys' work, anatomy, physiology and hygiene, first aid to the injured, and other courses relating to the theory and practice of gymnastics, athletics and aquatics. An Athletic Meet of the central section of the Athletic League of North America was held on the grounds, Aug. 17. The meet was participated in by teams from Chicago, Omaha and Ke-wanee.

The summer work at Lake Geneva is supplementary to the work carried on in the Secretarial Institute and Training School in Chicago during the fall, winter and spring. A large number of visitors have taken advantage of the outing features of the encampment, in addition to those who have enjoyed the educational program; the total number of students and visitors for the season being in the neighborhood of two thousand.

CHRISTIAN MELODIES

BY PROF. WM. J. KIRKPATRICK

Professor Wm. J. Kirkpatrick, the author of CHRISTIAN MELODIES, is one of the leading and best known gospel song writers in the world today. His songs have been sung the world over in almost every town. Some of his songs have been translated and sung in all languages. He has the advantage of many years of experience as a musician and song writer, and has put the best productions of his life time, as well as the best songs of the principal song writers of the country, into CHRISTIAN MELODIES. This certainly insures for this book the greatest variety and the best quality of songs.

"Book of Rarest Musical Gems"

This is the universal pronouncement of all musicians who have used or examined this new and popular song book. All responses from those using the book are enthusiastic praises. "Best book of the kind I have ever seen." "The more we use it the better we like it." "Gets better all the time," etc. These are samples of expressions received. No other book on the market approaches it as an all-purpose church song book. It is mechanically perfect, neat, artistic and durable. Contains 192 pages and 227 songs.

Choicest Songs of the Century

Every song writer has a few favorite songs—or those which he regards as his best—and which make for the author his reputation. Every musician has also his own peculiar style. A book written principally by one man does not excel, as it has no variety of style and but few very good songs. In CHRISTIAN MELODIES eighty leading song writers have contributed their favorite or best songs. This insures not only a collection of the most excellent songs, but also the greatest variety of style. This is why people never grow tired of the songs in CHRISTIAN MELODIES. Besides its large number of the latest songs it contains a great many of the old songs that have become popular favorites and never die.

No expense was spared in the production of this book. The best songs were secured regardless of their cost. Many very good songs were rejected because not good enough. No other book shows such care and judgment in excluding the inferior and including only the best. No cheap devices or make shifts, such as rivets, were used in binding. It is a hand sewed book, which is the best and most expensive style of binding. If you want the most popular, best wearing and most satisfactory all-around song book get Christian Melodies, pronounced by all, "A Book of Gems."

BOOKS

"The Fate of Endilloe," by Silas K. Hocking. Frederick Warne & Co.: New York; 334 pages. Price $1.50.

Silas K. Hocking occupies in England as a novelist much the same place that E. P. Roe did in America. He is immensely popular. Over a million copies of his books have been sold. English provincial booksellers are reported to have at his publishers a standing order of so many dozen of Hocking's next. The popularity of Mr. Hocking's books is merited. They are thoroughly wholesome; they are simple and direct in style, and while their plot is conventional and their material homespun, yet in their construction they show not a little dramatic instinct and art.

It would be hardly fair to Mr. Hocking to say that in "The Fate of Endilloe" he is seen at his best. His strongest work is done where he reveals the heart of Cornish Methodism, which he knows so well. In this story he is upon his native heath of Cornwall and he works with material which is plastic in his hand. The interest is sustained by touching here and there upon practical social issues. The story if not profound is interesting and useful. It is a good book for the Sunday school library.

The Crisis, by Weston Churchill. The Macmillan Co.: New York.

The historical novel is history made pleasant and easy; and as most people move naturally in the line of the least resistance, the historical novel, if well written, is sure of a wide constituency. The Crisis is an historical novel. It deals with the war of the rebellion. Its plot is laid in St. Louis, which was one of the storm centers of that eventful period. The conflict of ideas which led eventually to the conflict of arms is graphically described. The color is put on the canvas with a strong hand like the scenes on the stage of a theater. There is a kind of virility in the story which is closely allied with coarseness. The story itself is not organic, but is constructed in a carpenter-like fashion. It is suggestive of the diligent ransacking of old newspaper files. It lacks the qualities which belong to enduring literature, being after the order of good newspaper reporting, but it is informing, interesting, dramatic and popular—and these qualities are certain to secure for it a wide and a deservedly wide acceptance.

"All Things New" is the title of a booklet of thirty pages, by Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, and published by Fleming H. Revell Co. It sells for ten cents. In it are thoughts more precious than the gold of Ophir. It is along the line of Mr. Morgan's best work; and is fitted to be of great benefit to "new converts," for whom its message is specially intended. It deals in a forceful and practical way with the new fact, the new responsibility, the new perils, the new resources and the new activities of the Christian life.

"Around the World in Bookland with Missionary Guides and Interpreters" is not the title of a book, but of Fleming H. Revell Co.'s new missionary catalogue. In missionary literature this publishing house easily takes the lead. A glance at this catalogue of sixty-six pages is sufficient to show how wide is the field covered and how important are the contributions which have been made to missionary literature.

LITERARY NOTES.

"How to Remember: By Memory System and Without." By Eustace H. Miles. A companion volume to the popular "Art of Thinking."

"The Bunkum Book." An oblong 4to. volume of drawings in color with funny verses, by Aubrey Hopwood. The illustrations by Maud Trelawny.

"Gobbo Bobo: The Two-Eyed Griffin." A new book of fairy tales by Herbert E. Inman, author of "The One-Eyed Griffin," "The Owl King," etc. Introduces the legendary and historic characters of old and new London, who all come to life when "Big Ben" strikes thirteen. A delightful mix-up.

"Nonsense Songs," by Edward Lear, author of "The Book of Nonsense." An entirely new edition with very clever drawings in color and in black and white, by L. Leslie Brooke, who is fast becoming recognized as a very able delineator of humor for children.

Mr. Ernest McGaffey, the Chicago poet, has been appointed by Mayor Harrison to a city office which pays a salary of $4,000 a year. We regret to be compelled to add that Mr. McGaffey's appointment was made not as a recognition of his splendid merits as a poet, but because he is a Democrat, and as such has a considerable following in his ward.

Professor Isaac Taylor Headland of Peking university, who remained in this country long enough to witness the large appreciation shown to his "Chinese Mother Goose Rhymes," the most unique child's book ever published, sailed recently from Vancouver to resume his duties at the University in China. It is understood that before sailing he left in the hands of his publishers, the Fleming H. Revell company, manuscript of his new book, "The Chinese Boy and Girl," which will be published early next fall. It is to be full to overflowing of "good things" from the Chinese play ground. In addition to the games played by Chinese boys and girls, their toys, shows and entertainments, stories told to them, juvenile jugglery, and the many pastimes are to be all described and fully illustrated. The two books will undoubtedly form the greatest contribution to the folklore of any country ever presented.

THE HOME

The Sculptor's Vision.

"So common are my tasks," I said;
But as I spoke complainingly,
A quaint old legend I had read
Came back to me.

A sculptor,—runs the story sweet,—
Sought marble without flaw or stain,
And tools for his high purpose meet;
But sought in vain.

In every clime, in every land,
He sought, but naught he found sufficed;
For he would carve, with reverent hand,
The head of Christ.

No marble pure enough he found;
And worn, and spent, and spirit sore,
He gave the weary, toilsome round
Of journeying o'er.

Sadly he bowed in contrite prayer;
"O Lord of love, forgive," he cried;
And lo! a vision passing fair
Stood by his side.

"Look up, dear heart, be comforted,"
The voice was strangely low and sweet,
"Thou needest not to carve my head,
'Tis far more meet

"That thou shouldst shape thy life by mine,
And in thy daily ministry
That thou shouldst show my life in thine Continually.

"Count no task common, if to me
Thou render it with willing heart;
True ministry I hold to be Life's noblest art."

The vision passed; with holy aim
Upon his life the sculptor wrought,
Which like unto his Lord's became,
With service fraught.

'Tis but a legend, but it taught
This lesson passing sweet to me:
No service which for Christ is wrought
Can common be.

—Edith Virginia Bradt, in Forward.

Perhaps nothing appeals more forcibly in the way of benevolence to the minds of most people than the call to aid in fresh air mission work of one kind or another. Not every one can give money, but there are other ways in which an opportunity may be given some tired city worker to breathe fresh air and rest heart and eyes by being in the midst of green trees and grass with an uninterrupted view of blue skies. Cannot some suburban or country homes admit for a week or two some one who cannot afford to pay board in addition to railroad or car fare? Are there not other homes where the owners are themselves going away for a change and meanwhile might let some city family have a like opportunity for refreshment of soul and body in occupying these vacant houses? Even a city dwelling would afford much comfort to many persons compelled to live in cramped quarters during the hot summer weather. Let some of the weary clerks in our stores who go home night after night to stuffy little bedrooms in cheap boarding houses have the rest your pleasant rooms will give them. It will be better for your house than to keep it shut up for weeks without airing and your own vacation will be twice as enjoyable in the satisfaction you will have as you think of the pleasure you are giving some one else.

Premature Maturity.

This paradoxical phrase expresses only in a measure the conditions under which all too many of our American boys and girls are growing up to the estate of manhood and womanhood. They are old before the full heritage of youth is theirs. They are paradoxes, child-men and child-women, problems to themselves and their elders, alarming problems to men and women on whose hearts are laid mighty desires for the welfare of the nation.

There is a great deal said about the New Woman. Here, in our midst, is what might well be termed the New Child. He is an unnatural, deeply to be pitied little individual, who, with a child's tender helplessness and a child's embryotic judgment, combines the self-directing will and choice of the adult, as well as a heterogeneous acquaintance with life-facts good and evil, minus any wisdom concerning them. "There are no children these days," mourned a grandmother in our hearing the other day. Is it not true? Visit, haphazard, ten or twenty American homes and take notes of the behavior of the children, to their parents, to friends, playmates. Do they not in large measure conduct themselves according to their own wills, eating, dressing, playing, coming and going as they desire?

The street education of thousands of American children far outmeasures the education of the home and schools. Walk the streets of any of our cities out of school hours. From babies just able to balance themselves on their little feet up to the older boys and girls, every child who can possibly evade parental orders to the contrary—orders too shamefully scarce—is "out" and stays out, selecting his own companions, living a life apart from adult supervision. At 11 o'clock at night on almost any of Chicago's respectable streets, all through the summer, children and young people may be seen romping about and visiting, not even "in sight of the house," but off and away whence fancy bids them. Of the children of the poor, it may be said, this street running is an inevitable result of crowded, uncomfortable living rooms. That is true. But do the spacious, comfortable living apartments retain the children any better?

Thus, this education of the streets goes on. At unbelievably early ages—at twelve in one of the cases stated—these children find themselves in a relationship of sex which they do not comprehend. The rapids of life have the frail little barks at their mercy and these abnormal lives, these premature maturities, are hurried to meet life-problems that buffet and perplex their parents. They are overwhelmed, dismayed, disappointed. They thought that to live was to have "such a good time!" When the struggle overtakes them, is it very strange that some of them seek escape by the door of death—a door they might have known but little of had they been permitted their full heritage of babyhood and childhood. When our children are prepared for maturity, when they do not put away childish things before that maturity comes, that they may lay them aside naturally when it does come, such things will not be.—Union Signal.

Dick's Lesson.

"Dick, put on your shoes."

"Yes, mother, in a minute."

"No; do it at once."

"But, mother, can't you see I'm busy?"

And Dick looked up from a monkey he was drawing on a slate.

"That's always the way with you," chimed in Dick's younger brother, Dan, who was always being held up as a rebuke to his brother's continual tardiness.

"Never you mind," and Dick's good-natured brow crumpled up for the moment. "I said I'd put them on in a minute, and I will if you'll give me time."

"My dear," interposed his mother, quietly, "if an engine was coming along the track at the rate of fifty miles an hour, you could not take the time to get out of the way, could you?"

Dick flushed, and had the grace to feel ashamed. Procrastination was his besetting sin. His brothers plagued him and his mother warned him, but all in vain; Dick still continued to "put off," and as yet no serious accident or inconvenience had arisen therefrom.

The minute went by, two, three and four, and still Dick drew on his slate.

Mrs. Swain sighed, and was just about to speak to him, when the door opened and in bounded Harold, Dick's older and favorite brother, panting and glowing with excitement and quick running.

"Dick, the fox is out—broke loose about five minutes ago. She and Brown's dog are in a fight. Come quick or Topsy will be killed."

Topsy, the fox, was Dick's own especial property, purchased for him when she was only a few weeks old.

She was inclined to be vicious and savage at times, and no one but Dick had the courage to interfere during her frequent fights with "Brown's dog."

But that very morning he had locked Topsy securely in her house, as he of late had had occasion to do pretty often. Now, how came Topsy to be out and in a fight with that mean little cur of Brown's?

Dick dropped his slate, and was just making for the door, when his mother rose hastily and detained him by main force.

"Dick, you are not to go out in your stocking feet, do you hear? It was just the way you were taken sick last spring. Topsy can wait, and if she is killed, you will be justly punished for your disobedience."

"But, mother, where are my shoes?"

And Dick nearly burst with impatience and smothered rage, as here, there and everywhere he looked; but all to no avail—the shoes could not be found.

How was Dick to know that that model of propriety, Dan, had carried off the shoes and hidden them?

So Dick fumed and raged, and at last made a final dive for the kitchen, where he happened to catch a glimpse of the fighting animals from the window.

Then everything was forgotten—shoes, mother and all—and seizing a heavy stick

Dick started out the door; then, regardless of consequences, he threw himself between the enraged combatants, and, with one blow, sent Brown's dog off, howling dismally.

The victory was Dick's, and amid the general applause of his brothers he led off Topsy, who still showed her little white teeth savagely.

It took some time and considerable trouble to get her back into her house again, for her blood was up, and she showed a very evil disposition to fight with Harold or Dan, who discreetly kept at a safe distance.

She knew Dick, and became slightly pacified, as before leaving her he patted her several times gently.

"She'll be all right in the morning," he said, as he walked away briskly.

His shoes had quite suddenly entered his head, and feeling rather anxious as to what his mother might say, he started on a run, and then, all of a sudden, stopped with a cry of pain.

"Well, what now?" and his two brothers joined him in some amazement.

"Oh, take it out, can't you?" groaned poor Dick, sinking to the ground, "it's a thorn, I guess, or glass. Oh, it's gone clean through my foot!"

Harold stooped down, anxiously, and tried to do as he was bidden, but Dick's heel had come down on a good-sized thorn with full force, and the sharp point broke off and remained in the flesh even after the principal cause of the trouble was removed.

Dan felt rather conscience-stricken as he saw Dick's distress, and kindly offered to support him to the house, which offer Dick accepted gratefully, and he hobbled along on one foot.

It was on the tip end of Mrs. Swain's tongue to tell Dick it served him right for his disobedience, but she saw he was really suffering, and instead laid him on a sofa and examined the wounded foot carefully and tenderly.

It was beginning to swell and looked sore and inflamed where the sharp point still remained hidden.

She tried to pull it out, but with no success, and, greatly to Dick's disgust and mortification, a doctor was sent for, who quickly removed it, but not without forcing from Dick a sharp cry of pain.

The wounded foot got well, of course, in time, but the most wonderful thing was that Dick actually profited by the lesson.

He started out by keeping in mind the old maxim, "Never put off till tomorrow what you can do today," and Mrs. Swain was agreeably surprised to notice how fast he improved.

Even Dan, the "family paragon," condescended to speak a word of approval, which was saying much for Dick's success.—The New World.

Its aim will be to give a record and an interpretation of the leading events in the religious world. It will seek at once to mirror and to mould religious thought and life. In the sweep of its vision and the breadth of its sympathies it will endeavor to be as wide as Christianity itself. In a word, it will stand for essential and universal Christianity.

EDITORIAL

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES:

The Christian Century is published in the interests of essential Christianity. It is the organ of no party; the advocate of no ism. While welcoming the ascertained results of modern Christian scholarship, it stands for the great evangelical verities which are the foundation stones of the Christian system. It seeks to be tolerant in spirit, practical in aim, and warmly sympathetic towards all the present day problems of religious thought and life! It also aims at being at once a clearing house and medium of communication between the different denominations, so that they may by free and fraternal expression of opinion become better acquainted with one another and may be led to join forces in more aggressive work for the advancement of the Redeemer's Kingdom.

THE SERVICE OF CHRIST.

AT first glance the words "Take my yoke upon you", which follow the invitation of Jesus, seem less gracious than the invitation itself, for almost inevitably the yoke suggests associations of servitude which are disagreeable, and which would limit the acceptance of the invitation to a comparatively small group. No one wishes to be a servant. The social customs alike of ancient and modern times render a position of this kind undesirable in all but extraordinary circumstances. And yet no acceptance of the invitation can be considered which does not include submission to this authority, the acceptance of this yoke. One may seek in what way he pleases to modify the severity of the figure. He may turn from the contemplation of the yoke as an instrument of labor worn by beasts of burden and by slaves in carrying their loads, to the military custom of the Romans, who after victory set up spears in the form of an arch, with two uprights and the cross-bar, under which captives taken in war or inhabitants of conquered cities were compelled to pass in token of their submission to the conqueror's authority. This was termed "passing under the yoke" and implied submission to the victors. This perhaps seems a less degrading figure than the other, and yet the authority is none the less specific and exacting. In taking the yoke of Christ one accepts the results of his atonement, consents to receive his direction, and to conform to his method of living. Nothing less than this can be thought of.

It is involved in the very nature of the new relation which the believer sustains to Christ.

And yet it is not an ungracious subjection which is thus imposed, but rather the yoke is the symbol of an authority so rewarding and uplifting that he who was before a slave to his own worse nature, though apparently free, now becomes a free man by entering the service of Christ. For liberty is not gained by throwing off restraint. Men fancy themselves free because they have refused all authority over their lives, when not infrequently they are the most servile of slaves, in bondage to the worst possible masters, self and sin. But he is a free man who submits to the highest master and finds in his service self-realization and joy. A bar of iron lying useless in the foundry yard might seem to a careless beholder to be free. To be sure it has no obligations. It is performing no work, it is adjusted to no purpose; and yet it is not free, because it has not attained the place for which it was intended and is simply a useless bit of refuse. But if it be grappled and fashioned into the shaft of a great ocean greyhound, or into the driving-rod of some Corliss engine, it attains its right, it enters its true sphere, it finds its real freedom. A tree of the forest felled to the ground and lying half-covered with leaves, might seem at first glance to be free. It is utterly irresponsible, it has no function to fulfill, and no man is demanding of it any service. Yet it is in no sense free. It waits to attain its freedom when the hewer shall come to shape its rough body into lines of symmetry, and the builder shall fling it across the chasm that yawns roofless at the top of some cathedral, where it can support with its giant strength the arches that rear themselves upward to the ridge. Only then has it found its true place, the liberty of a great and noble service. So of man's life. It wastes itself in the fancied freedom of unrestraint, until finding adjustment to Christ it learns its true place, its normal function, and its true sense of happy service. This happiness and freedom come with the acceptance of the yoke of Christ, and they come in no other way. Only when the soul is reaching upward to its highest endeavor does it feel the consciousness of rest and satisfaction in the very labor it performs. He who is the King of truth brings into our lives the sense of the mastery of truth, and freedom in the tasks which it prescribes. "Ye shall know the truth," said Jesus, "and the truth shall make you free".

The whole of Christian life consists in such enrichment of one's nature as shall permit him to render the true service for which the Master and society wait. There are various conceptions of Christianity which prevail in the Church. There is the definition which makes religion the acceptance of a form of belief; that is the dogmatic. There is that which makes it a method of worship, with definite forms and ceremonies; that is the liturgic. There is that which considers it a process of self-denial and abnegation, in which the supreme business of life is to give up that which is most desirable, and so mortify the flesh; this is the monastic. Again, Christianity is defined to be a state of soul, an emotional apprehension of God through love for Jesus Christ, the enjoyment of a Christian experience, a possession of God through pious reflection and meditation; this is the so-called experimental. Still further, there is the understanding that Christianity consists in such activity as constitutes the business of the kingdom of heaven. It is the out-putting of force. It is the undertaking of affairs. It is the ceaseless accomplishment of tasks. This is the active. Now, none of these definitions express the whole truth, and yet all of them make approaches to it on various sides. Christian life must include every element of this list in due proportion, but none of them serves as a true definition or point of exclusive emphasis. The real secret of the life of Christ in the soul is that impartation of vitality which constitutes a new life, a regeneration, and which enriches the nature by constant increments as the development proceeds. Christ declared that he came to give life and to give it abundantly. No meager, starving, emaciated, scanty thing was this Christian life which he brought, but a rich, full, exhaustless fountain of vitality, a well of water springing up into everlasting life.

Therefore the teaching of Jesus regarding the obligations of his followers to take his yoke, to bear his cross and to follow him are only the counterparts of his insistence upon the possession of a life which is great enough and rich enough to pour itself out into inexhaustible streams upon the parched and arid soil of a social order cursed with commonplace and religionless living. The service of Christ can only be done by one who is himself enriched by the indwelling Christ. The Master calls us to himself and asks us to accept his yoke that we may receive his offered life, his imparted righteousness; not for ourselves, but for the sake of the world in which we live, and which, groaning and travailing in pain, waits for the revealing of the sons of God. A scanty and barren life can never enrich others. The word of Christ to us, following the imposition of his yoke, is "Be ye enriched", "Receive ye the Holy Spirit", "Accept the life eternal", which life we find to be a present and vital force within us; "Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness", "Follow me into the fullness and richness of my life, and then I can send you forth as living examples of the truth, known and read of all men". Christian service thus becomes a delight. The soul searches for opportunities of service as for hidden treasures, and finds at last the secret of the Master's words, "My yoke is easy and my burden is light".

ON THE SHORES OF LAKE MICHIGAN.

By the Rambler.

WHEN Chicago throws out a large part of its population during the hot Summer months it scatters a goodly number of them along the shores of Lake Michigan. The Rambler has recently been visiting some of the resorts on the Western shore and he has been struck with the heroic efforts made by the people to have a good time. It is sometimes quite pathetic to see how they try to make themselves believe that they are succeeding in their purpose. They prefer to fool themselves than admit that they have been fooled. In spite of mosquitoes, sunburn and freckles, crowded quarters in tents and cheap boarding house, poor fare and discomforts manifold, they keep up the pleasing fiction that they are having a perfectly lovely time. Who will say after this that optimism is dead? Emerson says that life would be tolerable if it were not for its amusements. Yet its amusements serve a good end. They break up the monotony of life. And if our holidays do not afford much rest they bring change. And, what is more, they bring a sense of freedom. For a man to have the lake between him and his store, or factory, or office, and have one or two weeks of glorious freedom when he can literally do what he pleases, is worth all the price which he may have to pay for it. But what a pity it is that he does not sometimes use his freedom to a better purpose!

One Sunday the Rambler dropped into a Methodist class meeting. He had not been in one for many years, and by closing his eyes he could imagine himself listening to the time-worn testimonials of years gone by. The same old Shibboleths were repeated, the same old stock phrases were employed to express new experiences. If an untheological expression may be allowed, it seemed to the Rambler that everyone who rose up to testify tried to go one better than his predecessor. Some told how long they had been perfectly sanctified. It was impossible to help wondering what their families and neighbors might have to say about it. It is never well to profess too much. The testimony of the life is more eloquent than that of the lips, and it is more convincing.

On the same Sunday the Rambler heard two preachers. One was a young man of the evangelistic type. He chafed on the bits in the attempt to show his mettle. His pace was killing. After a while he will slow down and work with less friction. He may not then be quite as interesting, but he will be more useful. There is one thing he did which is not wise. He scolded. He lashed his people with a whip of scorpions. Perhaps they deserved it, but evidently they did not like it. When the whip fell upon the raw flesh they winced, and in their eyes was a look which forbade the possibility of future retaliation. It is strange what a long time it often takes a young preacher to find out that more flies are caught with honey than with vinegar.

The other preacher was a man in middle age, perhaps a little beyond it. He represented that large class by whom the bulk of the world's work is done—the two-talent men. On his face were lines which spoke of battles fought and won. His sermon, which was of average ability, was constructive, practical and helpful. The Rambler heard the young minister spoken of as a driver; this minister is a leader. And as most people would rather be led than driven, the older man has the wider influence.

When at Saugatuck the Rambler visited the summer camp of the social settlement of the Forward Movement, which is under the direction of Dr. George W. Gray. This camp is situated in a park of two hundred acres of beautiful timber land, which stretches three-quarters of a mile along the shore of Lake Michigan, and runs back to the Kalamazoo river. The camp itself consists of a large cottage with dormitories capable of accommodating eighty people at a time. The promoters of this camp believing that what is given for nothing is not valued, charge the boys and girls whom they bring from the settlement a dollar and a half a week for board. As soon as one outing is over many of the children begin saving their pennies for the next. Those who are too poor to pay the dollar and a half can pay their way by working two and a half hours each day. But no one is assisted who has not done all in his power to meet his necessary expenses; the motto of the camp being: "Help to Self Help."

The Rambler touched at Macatawa Park in time to hear echoes of the Assembly. The attendance this year was not as large as usual; but the interest in the meetings was unabated. The leading feature was a course of lectures by Prof. R. R. Lloyd of the Pacific Theological Seminary on the subject of "The Teaching of Jesus in the First Three Gospels." The sub-topics were, "The Teaching of Jesus about God; about Himself; about Spirits, Holy and Unholy; about the Kingdom of Heaven; about Man; about the Gospel and the Old Testament." These lectures, which were distinguished for their scholarly qualities, provoked a good deal of discussion.

At the Macatawa Park Assembly each lecture is followed by an open parliament, at which the audience has the opportunity of speaking back, an opportunity which is generally taken advantage of very fully. Macatawa Park Assembly is somewhat unique. It has an importance far beyond its numerical size. It has been a sort of theological clearing house. The freest possible discussion of religious questions has been allowed. The right of private judgment has been respected, and a fine spirit of toleration has prevailed. It has been largely a preachers' assembly, and its main value has consisted in the spirit of Christian fellowship which it has engendered. Brethren who have not been able to see eye to eye have learned to respect each other's convictions and have come to see that oneness of faith may exist where there is difference of opinion. One of the most noteworthy things in connection with the Assembly is that the representatives of the various churches present group around new centers. The dividing line—if there is such a thing—is between liberals and conservatives, and that line runs through all the churches alike. But the line is a very shadowy one after all. Of the present-day movement towards Christian union that Assembly is at once an expression and a producing cause.

"The ills we see

The mysteries of sorrow, deep and long,
The dark enigmas of permitted wrong

Have all one key:

This sad, strange world is but our Father's school;
All chance and change His love shall grandly overrule."

THE DIVINE CLOTHED WITH THE HUMAN.

IN Judges vi: 34 it is said that "the Spirit of the Lord clothed itself with Gideon." This is an unusual form of expression. The usual form would have been "the Spirit of the Lord entered Gideon," thus becoming entempled or enfleshed in him; or, "the Spirit of the Lord came upon Gideon," enveloping him, enrobing him, making him the medium of divine expression and activity. The figure used is startling in its boldness. The Lord does not clothe Gideon with himself; he clothes himself with Gideon. Gideon is the visible agent, the Spirit of the Lord is the unseen actor.

In this figure the self-action of God is made prominent. The putting on of Gideon is God's own act. He makes Gideon what he becomes. When the figure is that of man becoming clothed with certain moral qualities it is generally the action of man that is brought into view. When, for instance, the wicked are clothed with shame, they clothe themselves with shame; when a good man becomes clothed with honor or humility he clothes himself with these graces; when a man is clothed with power he clothes himself with power; and when he is clothed with God he clothes himself with God. He himself puts off the old man and puts on the new. This is the usual way of stating it. There are exceptions, however; as where God is said to clothe his priests with righteousness and with salvation. But here God does not clothe man with something; he clothes himself with man. He limits himself by covering himself with a mortal body, and this he does that he may accomplish a practical, definite object. There is always some reason why he wishes to clothe himself with any particular man.

By clothing itself with Gideon the Spirit of the Lord took possession of him and worked through him. It became alive within him, moving him inspiring him, strengthening him, endowing him with wisdom and courage. Cromwell has been called the battle ax of the Almighty; that is, what Gideon became when the Spirit of the Lord clothed itself with him. What Gideon seemed to do alone he did through the Spirit of the Lord working in and through him. He was made of use because he was used of God.

By clothing itself with Gideon the Spirit of the Lord became dependent upon him. If Gideon failed Jehovah failed; if Gideon succeeded Jehovah succeeded. The battle cry of Gideon's band, "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon," shows how completely the human and the divine had become blended in their thought. The Lord's sword and Gideon's sword were one. Gideon could accomplish nothing apart from the Lord, and the Lord could accomplish nothing apart from Gideon.

Gideon was not a man of marked power or prowess. When the angel of the Lord found him in the hollow of a rock threshing a bundle of wheat while hiding from the marauding Midianites and addressed him in the words, "The Lord be with thee, thou mighty man of valor," Gideon was confounded. His stammering reply was, "Wherewith shall I save Israel?" Then was given the divine commission, "Go in this thy might and save Israel from the hand of Midian; have not I sent thee?" God's chosen instrument was diffident and slow until he realized that God was with him and in him. Then he became strong and brave as a lion; for he knew that it was God's way to take the "weak things to confound the mighty and things that are not to put to naught things that are."

But we are not to think that the Spirit of the Lord clothed itself with Gideon against his will. He was willing and anxious to be used of God. When he was chosen as the instrument of God he was resting upon his flail musing upon the vanished glory of Israel, and praying for the return of better days. God will not clothe himself with any man who is not ready to be made his instrument in doing some hard things. Every incarnation is for redemption; and redemption is through sacrifice.

ECHOES FROM THE CHICAGO PULPIT.

The Essential Life.

THE first of four weekly sermons delivered by Dr. E. Benjamin Andrews of the University of Nebraska in the tent on the campus of the University of Chicago was on "The Essential Life." He said: "What is the real reason for God's interest in the human race? It is this: Man is created in God's image; he has descended from God and has in him the nature and the blood of God Almighty. Man is the best thing known in the universe. He is the son, the child, the offspring of God and, being such, he is near the Divine Maker. What does it mean for a soul to be lost? To lose the soul is to lose the God quality, the divinity out of it. What comes from getting away from God and losing the soul is not punishment, as we are often taught, but rather ruin, and ruin may be defined as the loss of ability to realize the purpose and end of the structure God has created."

Criticises Christian Science.

Rev. John Wells Allen at the First Christian church, Grand boulevard and Forty-seventh street, took occasion in his sermon from Romans, i, 16, to discuss Christian Science. He said: "There are multitudes who have lost sight of this supreme purpose of Christianity. I was in a Christian Science prayer meeting the other evening. There was a splendid audience present, well-dressed, well-behaved, intelligent people. Why it should be called a prayer meeting would be hard to tell, for there were no prayers offered. There were many testimonials given, but all about physical healing. The Christian Science movement has no vision of the spiritual ministry of Christianity. Denying the existence of matter, it keeps in sight always the work done on the body. Christ's work is in the sphere of the spirit. He 'saves his people from their sins.' The power through which he saves them is the gospel, the revelation of God's love to men. In the gospel we have God's picture of his love for us, and this is the mighty power he wields for the salvation of everyone who believes."

Conversions Past and Present.

Rev. Pearse Pinch used as the basis of his sermon at Forrestville Congregational church the conversion of the 3,000 at Pentecost as the result of the first sermon. He said: "They are saying scornfully now that it takes 3,000 sermons to convert one soul. The fact is that the situation has radically changed as regards the hearing of the gospel. It came at first as the announcement of tremendous facts fresh in the world's history. Today the preacher faces hearers who have known the story from infancy. The habit of growing up godless and indifferent over truth that can mean no less for being known a long time is the fatal habit of our Christian times. In some forms of death a state of stupor and indifference is the index that the end is near. We may grant that preacher and hearer are under a common infirmity, but it is poor wisdom and poor grace in those who hear out of ears grown dull to truth, to gloat over the unhappy preacher who cannot move them. The hearer, if he is wise, will exert himself to shake off the sleep of death."

Christ the Imperishable Factor in Human History.

Speaking on this subject, Dr. Henry I. Rasmus of the Grace Methodist church said: "There is no intelligent man who will call into question the great fact that Jesus Christ is the supreme question of every age. You can no more paint Christ than you can paint a sunburst or a thunder storm on Mount Hood. Renan, the brilliant French skeptic, declared that biographers of Christ diminished rather than increased the luster of his character, and this idealist, after dethroning Christ, raised him yet again to the throne of ideality, and said concerning him that among the sons of men there should appear none greater than Jesus. Strauss, the great German rationalist, said that you have to go outside of the Jewish race to find an explanation of the character of Jesus. He declared him to be the unique character of history, the modeler of a humanity. Thus have the greatest intellects of every age been compelled to acknowledge the supremacy of Jesus. If you can discover what the Christ of yesterday was, and what constituted his mission, it is an easy matter to determine what the Christ of the age must be and what his mission is."

Christianity and the Labor Problem.

The steel workers were counseled not to strike by the Rev. W. H. Carwardine in his sermon at the South Chicago Methodist Episcopal church. "If you are bound by contract to the Illinois Steel Company that contract is a serious obligation," said he. "The right of contract is a sacred matter that can only be broken by the absolute failure of the one party to keep the conditions. You all remember the sad lesson of the Pullman strike. In the name of all that is good let us not have another experiment of that kind. Capital must be conciliatory and generous. Labor must go slow before resorting to a national sympathetic strike. That man has never lived who is safe enough to rule another man. Monopoly is the violation of the just principles of democracy. If democracy fails in America it will be monopoly that will give it the death blow. The labor problem is a deep and many-sided one, and requires to be handled with great care. We are gradually approaching a crisis in the evolution of social conditions. The whole fabric of human society is based upon labor. Three steps have marked the upward trend toward industrial freedom—slavery, vassalage, employment. What will the next step be? It may be that embodied in the idea of the co-operative commonwealth. It may be some form of modified socialism. I hope it will be a system of society based more than ever upon the application of the teachings of Jesus Christ to social conditions."

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

The death of Bishop Westcott, so well and favorably known as a Biblical scholar of the front rank, and co-laborer with Dr. Hort and Bishop Lightfoot in notable Biblical enterprises, removes one who has been conspicuous in the Christian world for a generation, and an author on Christian teaching and history, not only in the Church of England, but throughout the world. He was with Dr. Hort, the editor of the Standard Greek New Testament, and was the author of several works on New Testament introduction and exegesis.

This time it is the Jews who want a university. It is to be established in New York City and the location is to be Washington Heights, so that students may have the advantages of Columbia university if they so desire. Lecture arrangements are being made and temporary offices opened. The name of the new institution is the "New York University for Jewish Theology, History and Literature." Its projector is Rev. Dr. Isadore Singer, who has a Jewish encyclopedia so successfully floated as to make possible an income of $60,000 a year for the starting of the new university.

The convocation orator at the University of Chicago on Thursday of this week is Professor Caspar Rene Gregory of the University of Leipsic. This honor is well deserved by Dr. Gregory, who, though a native of Philadelphia and a graduate of Princeton, where he was assistant to Professor Charles Hodge for three years, has become one of the few American professors in German universities, and the author of several notable works on New Testament textual criticism. Among these perhaps the most prominent is a "Prolegomena to Tischendorf's Greek New Testament." The subject of Dr. Gregory's address will be "Education and Labor." The convocation takes place at 4 p. m. on the Quadrangles.

The latest development of the strike situation in the vicinity of Chicago reveals a division of sentiment among the workmen, some placing loyalty to the union above the contract pledges which they have made to their employers, and others, as in the case of the most of the South Chicago men, believing that the obligations incurred in the contracts made were to be sacredly observed. Whatever may be one's estimate of the situation as a whole, there can be no question regarding the dangers involved in any breach of faith, such as the one threatened in this instance. No cause can flourish at the price of the good faith of its advocates. It would be better for the workmen to suffer some grievances rather than demonstrate their low estimate of their word. There should be some better way out of the difficulty.

We are glad to see that interest in the cause of temperance is growing throughout the country. The earnest efforts being made in Chicago to keep liquor from being sold within the precincts of Hyde Park, Evanston and other prohibition territory are paralleled by endeavors elsewhere exerted to maintain and widen the effects of prohibition sentiment. There can be little doubt that this subject of temperance which has too long been regarded as one of the by-products of our civilization, to be taken up or dropped as other issues might permit, is coming rapidly to occupy a place so commanding and imperative that even political interests will be compelled to defer to it. One of the encouraging signs of the times is the fact that business corporations and mercantile houses are making total abstinence one of the requisites for employment. Thus business sagacity combines with the common moralities to dictate the necessity of a temperate life and a purer city.

For a religious newspaper to reach its ideal is difficult; for a new religious paper to reach its ideal at once is impossible. In a letter received from a prominent Canadian minister in which the Christian Century is complimented for fulfilling the promise of its promoters, the thing at which we are aiming is so well expressed that we quote and adopt the words of the writer. He says: "The work of today is not to spend time proving that there is a spiritual kernel in the Old Testament or in the New Testament. It is to take the ideals of the two Testaments and make them glow in modern forms of life. The people who are interested in sifting from the Old Testament the good grain are few compared with those who are after the good grain itself. The crying need is to find modern means of carrying it to them. It is the problem of spiritual transportation. By what conveyances shall we carry to men eternal life in the midst of time? To fulfill in some measure this work of spiritual transportation is the mission of the Christian Century."

The strike situation is engrossing the attention not only of this country, but of the industrial world. That the results will be far-reaching there can be no doubt. Dr. Washington Gladden, pastor of the First Congregational Church of Columbus, O., in a sermon last week said:

"This country is watching a great struggle which threatens to bring disaster and misery to great multitudes. The capital of the steel corporation is more than one-half the national debt, and its direct control of the resources of civilization is unexampled. No monarch in the world possesses a tithe of the power to affect directly labor and the livelihood of the people as that which has been placed in the hands of a few men at the head of this great corporation.

"A startling evidence of their power is seen in their threat to move extensive mills from places where public opinion does not wholly approve their policy. The punishment is something terrific. Consider what it means to have an industry employing half the population of a considerable city suddenly wiped out. All other industries are paralyzed, and blight falls upon the entire community. The corporation is strong enough to sacrifice $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 to gain an advantage of this kind. Its power to turn populous cities into solitudes is an appalling fact. The ruling motive of the corporation is self-aggrandizement and gain, and the possibilities of injury are appalling.

"We are all to blame for this stupendous conflict. The foundation of order and prosperity in the nation is unity, good will and mutual sacrifice, and until it is thoroughly established such industrial wars as this can hardly be averted."

THE HEAVENLY GIFTS.

Harriet Prescott Spofford.

What gifts, what myriad gifts, are given to all
As rains upon the just and unjust fall!
Blue sky, and winds that bear the breath of flowers,
Gray mists, and shining threads of summer showers,
Sunsets blown red from battlements of even,
Sunrises opening all the gates of heaven,
The emerald sheen of harvest-fields at hand,
Dark bloom of distant valleys rainbow-spanned,
Purple of mountain-forms that take the soul
Close to the stars where drifts their silver shoal, Infinite seas that lead the thought away
Into a world of everlasting day,
The hope that lifts us like an angel's wings,
And makes us glad among immortal things,
Song, love, and sorrow, and the joyous tear
When delicately music meets the ear,
The beauty of the little child, the strength
That feeds the hero's arm, the happy length
Of summer days to lovers, and the night
When through the sleet the fires of home flash bright,
Then on our knees the will to bless the Power
That follows us with love from hour to hour,
While roars the storm with purifying breath—
O lovely life, and just as lovely death!

CHRISTOLOGICAL TENDENCIES OF THE TIME.

W. J. Lhamon.

NO. 3.—THE BIBLE.

The recovery of the Bible is the recovery of Christ. Whatever has helped to put this transcendent literature into the hands of the nations has helped the Christward movement. Gutenberg and his printing press; Luther and his German translation; Wycliffe, and Tindale, and Coverdale, with their various English translations and editions; the hundreds of translations of recent years, and the millions of copies in many languages issued by the great Bible houses; the wide-spread study of the Bible in schools and colleges and universities; and not the least of all, its sovereignty over the pulpits of many lands—all these facts are imperative in their Christological effects.

And they are imperative for this reason: The Bible is not the literature of theology, but of Christ. From Genesis to Revelation it is Christological. Such a statement demands enlargement.

By theology is meant that body of speculative and many times contradictory dogmas that have characterized the historic Church, first the Roman Catholic portion of it, and thereafter the Protestant portion also, since the various Protestant dogmas have their roots far back in the method and spirit of Rome. Of this body of beliefs erected into dogmas the Bible is entirely innocent. It has indeed unwittingly furnished proof texts for every clashing creed in the whole catalogue of them, just as it has been distorted into the proving of an innumerable company of conceits that have never risen to the dignity of dogmas. But the time is well nigh passed for even such forced contribution from its sacred pages to the work of error. We have measured the meaning of context upon text, and we have discovered the difference between literary and scientific statement upon its sacred pages, and we have learned that its wholesome exhortations were never meant as the framework of pugnacious disputations. The world is rapidly attaining to a scientific rather than a fragmentary and distorted conception of its teachings, and such a conception once fully attained will be forever fatal to distracting dogmas.

But the Christological tendency of the Bible is its paramount tendency. From its earliest pages it deals with sin and salvation, and therefore with the sinner and the Savior. Its description of the fall embraces the hope of recovery. "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head and thou shalt bruise his heel." This first promise, this protevangelion, is the mountain rill from which there springs the majestic river of Messianic revelation. On down through all the history of the Hebrew people flows that stream. It is to be traced by the way of the promises to Abraham, the typical worship instituted by Moses, the songs of David, the fierce warnings and winged promises of Isaiah, the lamentations of Jeremiah, and the apocalyptic visions of Daniel, until it issues in the cry of John the Baptist, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." The Old Testament throbs with the expectation of the Messiah. Through the vision of the coming "One like unto the Son of God," its varied books rise up into the glorious unity of optimism; and this is but the sublime effect of that Hebrew spirit which, through all the vicissitudes of history, remained unconquerable. Jesus fills the Old Testament in prophecy as he fills the New in History, and the wonderful influence of the expected Redeemer upon Hebrew history is surpassed only by the influence of the Crucified Redeemer upon subsequent history.

One feels in turning away from the dogmatic literature of the historic Church to the Messianic literature of the Old Testament that he has passed into a different world. Take, for instance, theology at its climax and prophecy at its climax. Let us assume that theology has reached its highest achievements in its presentation of the Trinity; let us reverently suppose also that the Nicene creed is true and final, finite, and though it leaves problems unsolved quite though it deals constantly with the factor of the in-as many as it has solved. What we seek here is simply to exemplify the difference in literary atmosphere between the Christ in prophecy and the Christ in the creeds.

Here, then, are portions of the trinitarian statement: "Whoever would be saved must first of all take care that he hold the catholic faith. Which, except a man preserve whole and entire, he shall without doubt perish eternally. But this is the catholic faith, that we worship one God in trinity and trinity in unity. Neither confounding the persons nor dividing the substance. For the person of the Father is one; of the Son another; of the Holy Spirit another. But the divinity of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit is one, the glory equal, the majesty equal. Such as is the Father, such also is the Son, and such the Holy Spirit. The Father is uncreated, the Son uncreated, the Spirit uncreated. The Father is infinite, the Son infinite, the Spirit infinite. The Father is eternal, the Son eternal, the Spirit eternal. And yet there are not three eternal beings, but one eternal being. As also there are not three uncreated beings, or three infinite beings, but one uncreated and one infinite being. In like manner the Father is omnipotent, the Son is omnipotent, the Holy Spirit is omnipotent. And yet there are not three omnipotent beings, but one omnipotent being. Thus the Father is God, the Son is God and the Holy Spirit is God. And yet there are not three Gods, but one God only."

This is in part the dialectical statement of the doctrine of the Trinity from the school of Augustine. Here in contrast are selections of Messianic prophecy. Let us begin with this beautiful description of the Messianic age:

"The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad;
The desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose.
It shall blossom abundantly,
And rejoice even with joy and singing.
The glory of Lebanon shall be given unto it,
The excellency of Carmel an! Sharon;
They shall see the glory of Jehovah,
The excellency of our God."

And again:

"How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him
That bringeth good tidings,
That publisheth peace,
That bringeth good tidings of good,
That publisheth salvation;
That saith unto Zion, Thy God reigneth!"

And again:

"Who hath believed our report?
And to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?
For he shall grow up before him as a tender plant,
And as a root out of a dry ground.
He was despised and rejected of men;
A man of sorrows and acquainted with grief;
And as one from whom men are hiding their face,
He was despised, and we esteemed him not.
Verily he hath borne our griefs,
And carried our sorrows;
Yet we did esteem him stricken,
Smitten of God and afflicted.
But he was pierced for our transgressions,
He was bruised for our iniquities;
The chastisement of our peace was upon him,
And by his stripes we are healed."

Perhaps without further quotation the contrast is sufficiently striking. The reader may pursue the contrast at any length, traveling far outside of statements of the Trinity on the one hand and into other than the Messianic portions of the Old Testament on the other. What we assert is that he will find everywhere in dogmatic literature a spirit foreign to that of the Hebrew literature.

And if this is true of the Old Testament, it is, if possible, more emphatically so of the New Testament. Contrast, for instance, the Calvinistic statements with the sermon on the mount or with the parable of the Good Samaritan, or the Prodigal Son! Or take the dialectical statements above in contrast with the 5th, or the 14th, or the 17th, of John, or the 2nd of Acts. Between them and these there is a great gulf fixed.

By a practical, rather than a speculative, age there is one thing that cannot be missed in the study of the New Testament. The supremacy of Jesus is the Alpha and Omega of that body of literature. From its first word to its last it testifies to the unique and transcendent position of the "Word that was made flesh and dwelt among us." The Gospels, the Acts, the Epistles and the Revelation have their reason for being in the fact of Christ. These writings are filled, just as their authors were, with the Spirit which glorifies him. They present him as the only mediator between God and man, and in this lonely position they give him final values for both God and man. He is the climax of man; he is the revelation of God. Anthropology and theology are to be studied in and through him. He is the revelation of man to himself and of God to man. In him the study of man ceases to be anthropological, and the study of God ceases to be theological, and both become Christological. Stated otherwise, the New Testament compels a Christological view of both God and man in their relation each to the other.

Should the above seem radical above measure the writer begs to defend himself by the quotation which follows, and which may be taken as indicating even more emphatically than this paper the Christological tendency of the times. It is from Dr. George A. Gordon's plea for the recognition of the consciousness of Christ in its bearings on religious thought. He says: "As the case stands, theology is as vast and lurid a denial of the objective worth of the mind of the Master as the extremest form of modern scientific speculation. Take any one of the great systems, from that of Augustine to that of the latest champion of New England theology, and compare it thought for thought, position for position, with the consciousness of Christ, and it will appear that if the one is true the other cannot be. The result has been that in traditional orthodoxy, the highest in Christianity, the absoluteness of the Divine Love has always been under the suspicion of unreality, while the terrible theology has seemed the true version of the ultimate fact. The consciousness of Christ as the authentic revelation of the character of the Infinite is the great beginning of theology. The present imperative call is for the fearless logic of this fundamental idea."

WITH CALCUTTA'S STUDENTS.

W. M. Forrest.

THEIR name is legion, for they are many. From all parts of India they come, and from Burmah and Ceylon. But they are most largely Bengalees, since Calcutta is in that province, and the Bengalee has shown himself the most apt of all India's sons at intellectual pursuits. The University of Calcutta is only an examining and degree-conferring body, like its prototype, the University of London. Hence many men who do not pursue their studies in any of the city colleges come up at examination time. Altogether there are about ten thousand candidates for degrees examined annually.

Of this number, multitudes do their regular work in some one of the twenty odd colleges of the city. These colleges are Christian, Brahma, Mohammedan and Hindu. Their students are chiefly adherents of the two religions last named, and of these the Hindus are doubtless largely in the majority. Bare-headed, clad in their graceful Indian costumes, carrying their books under their arms, standing or walking about the streets in the college neighborhoods, they form interesting groups. Generally intelligent looking and cleanly, they are in striking contrast to the ordinary throngs of coolies.

But they seem little like the young men who go about the streets of our American university towns. Their general bearing betokens a lack of that manly independence and sturdy virility which are common to the American youth. There is an equal want of the effervescence of spirits and buoyancy of young manhood that make a college community at home so lively. Nor is there to be found in many of these men that ardent pursuit of learning for its own sake which makes possible the independent scholar. But there are good reasons for all this.

These dark-faced, dreamy-eyed lads belong to a race that has been held in subjection by one domineering conqueror after another for centuries. They and their ancestors have always dwelt in a land of enervating heat. Pernicious social customs have bequeathed to them a bad legacy. Early marriages have wrought such physical degeneracy that one of their own countrymen has been constrained to admonish them that "the children of children must ever be the slaves of slaves." The "joint family system" has tended to destroy all sense of individuality and all power of initiative, leaving the man impotent to do anything the whole family does not suggest and approve. Moreover, our Calcutta student is a heavily burdened man. As a rule he belongs to a family whose chief bequest to the rising generation is a mountain of debt. And he will have numerous relatives dependent upon him to his dying day. Since he is part of a "joint family" and has, perhaps, been educated chiefly to make him more useful to that family, they have a legal right to a fixed part of his income. And what an income! Many B. A.'s are glad to get a salary of thirty rupees a month; fifty rupees is good pay. How many American lads would feel inspired to toil up through common school, and high school, and college, in the hope of earning from ten dollars to seventeen dollars a month, and sharing it with their worthless cousins? Who, then, can wonder that such a student is not very aggressive, or sportive, or original.

Yet it is on these very students that the hope of India's ultimate regeneration must rest. The people of this land will never be led out of darkness until her own sons become the leaders. And the college men of any country are its natural thought-formers and character-moulders. The foreign missionary's highest hope is to prove instrumental in raising up Christian workers from among the children of the land. At this time, when India is preparing for a great change, for better or for worse; now when college students are so accessible and impressionable, it is a rare privilege to teach them Christian truth. Open converts from among them may be few. All the facts noticed above make it improbable that it should be otherwise. On the one side stand immemorial custom, venerated systems, strong social ties; on the other, revolutionary practices, the alien religion of a conquering race, the snapping of all the cords that bind to the past and present. Between these stands the lad who is weak in body, infirm in purpose, and unfitted by nature and nurture to act as a unit upon his individual judgment. Let him break with the past, from pure love of truth, and all the terrific anathemas and bitter persecutions of outraged religious and social forces will fall upon him. But let the good seed of the kingdom be sown broadcast in the minds of India's college men, let the forces of Christian civilization, education and evangelization continue to work throughout the land. Thus, little by little, old prejudices may be worn away, new ideals and purposes may become the property of all. Then the approaching crisis will suddenly come, and the cropped hair, and proclaimed them to be renegade people, stirred by a common impulse, will no longer need to tread the wine press of the wrath of their gods alone, but may arise in the strength of a united multitude and so be born to Christ, a nation in a day.

The bare hope of such a consummation is enough to make it worth while to improve every opportunity for labor among the students. The promptness with which hundreds of them have already put themselves within the reach of Bible teaching is a sign of promise. Believing that the entrance of God's Word giveth light, both those who labor to teach that Word to India's sons and those who support the work should rejoice in the knowledge that it is finding its way into long-darkened minds.

* THE CITY OF DESOLATION.

The streets of Jerusalem in every age have been thronged with the same motley multitude; cool-looking, white-shirted market venders from the stalls; no shirted sweat-hot artisans from the cellar workshops; dyers, designated by their badges of bright-colored threads; tailors, in heraldry of ornamented needles; carpenters, wearing their symbol of square and compass—of which they were as proud as the scribe was of the pen stuck behind his ear; fishermen from Galilee and the coast jostling the fruiterers with great baskets on their heads; bare-legged, dirt-tanned laborers from the fields; half-naked children of either sex playing with equal carelessness, whether they knocked over the piles of fruit and black bread that stood upon the stone pavement, or were themselves knocked over by the sharp hoofs of asses or the spongy feet of camels. These exponents of common, toiling humanity made way for the gay tunic-clad aristocrats of the upper city of Sion, white-robed priests from the Temple Mount, gray-sheeted women from the Cheesemakers' street, and ladies in black silken garments and caps of coins, who were borne in palanquins from the more fashionable Street of David.

But in the year 167 before our era all these had disappeared.—as suddenly and completely as the sea-mullets and blackfish are driven out of the shallows in the bay of Joppa by an invasion of sharks.

The costumes and speech of the new crowd on the streets were foreign, chiefly those of Greek and Syrian soldiers, with broad-brimmed hats, loose-knit, iron-linked corsage, tight leather leggings, and short, stout cleaver-like swords hanging from their girdles. Here and there one stood stock still, sentinelling his corner of the street, with the point of his sarissa or long spear gleaming ten cubits above his head, while his broad circular shield held abreast made an eddy in the living current as it swept around him. These were the soldiers of Antiochus Epiphanes.

Mingled with them were many foreign civilians, as their dress indicated; merchants whose belts were well filled with gold to purchase what the soldiers might steal; colonists to resettle the lands from which the conquered people were expelled; and hordes of hucksters and harlots who followed the armies of the time as dust clouds come after chariots.

Nor were there wanting in the crowd those whose curved noses contradicted the disguise of their newly

By the courtesy of the Fleming H. Revell Company we have received permission to publish a chapter from a forthcoming volume by Dr. James M. Ludlow, entitled "Deborah." We have examined the advance sheets of this volume, and seldom have we read a story so full of life and color, so full of dramatic interest and so true to its historical setting. We have selected for quotation the second chapter of the volume with the above title.

Jews: men who preferred to retain their ancestral property by denying the faith of their fathers.

One afternoon the crowd in the Street of David became suddenly congested. Through it a man, venerable with age, was vainly trying to make his way. His long white locks, which curled downward in front of his ears and mingled with the snowy beard upon his bosom, betokened his Jewish race; while the broad fringes of white and hyacinth upon his outer garment designated him as one of the Chasidim or Purists, who preferred to part with their blood rather than with their religion. The old patriot made no retort to the jostling and gibes of the crowd, but his deep-set eyes flashed hatred from beneath their shaggy brows, and told of the tragedy in his soul even more eloquently than if his lips had poured forth fiery speech.

"You can't swim up this stream, old man," said a soldier, giving the frail form a twirl that made it face the other way.

"It is the Nasi himself, Chief of the Rabbis," whispered a young Jew in Greek cloak to a soldier. "Heraclides club me, if you haven't caught the biggest rat left in the hole. But Apollonius has given protection to the Nasi's house. Be careful."

"Protection to his house! Why then did he come out of it? Fetch him along. Strip him naked, and warm his toad's blood in the new gymnasium."

With this insult the soldier tore the outer garment from the old man's back. The Jew was dazed for the instant by the Greek's audacity, and mumbled within his sunken lips the words of the Prophet: "I gave my back to the smiters, and my cheek to them that plucked off the hair."

He then raised his eyes heavenward, apparently unconscious of a staggering blow between his shoulders from the flat of a sword. He stood a moment until he had completed the sacred sentence: "For the Lord God shall help me; therefore shall I not be confounded; therefore have I set my face like a flint."

"Face like a flint," does he say? Let's see if it will strike fire like a flint," shouted one, smiting the old patriot on the mouth with the palm of his hand.

This dastardly deed drew blood which stained his white beard. But it brought a quick retaliation from an unexpected direction; for a blow like that of a catapult fell upon the assailant's head.

"By the thunderbolt of Zeus! that made you see fire," cried a comrade, as the coward reeled into his arms. "Captain Dion's fist is as heavy as the hammer of Hephaestus, the blacksmith of the gods, and makes the sparks fly as well. I'll wager, Ajax, that you saw the sky full of stars, or else your head is harder than an anvil."

By the side of the venerable Jew now stood a young Greek officer. If Hephaestus had need of an assistant blacksmith the shoulders of Dion would have attracted his notice; yet it is doubtful if the goddesses of Olympus would have allowed so graceful a man to be consigned to the celestial workshop. His face, too, was peculiarly attractive. Topped with a brush of light hair and lighted by his blue eyes, it was beautiful, but without a trace of femininity; a blending of dignity, intelligence, courage, and kindly feeling, though the latter quality was just then outglowed by rage.

On his well-curled head was a chaplet of myrtle, for he was returning as victor in the day's sports at the new gymnasium which, as an intended insult to the religious prejudices of the people, the Governor, Apollonius, had recently built against the southern wall of the Temple plaza.

"Bravo, Dion! If you had hit the Thebian boxer yesterday like that, they wouldn't have called for another round."

Dion faced the crowd, and with utmost detestation in his voice, exclaimed: "If I had been here yesterday, this crew of cowardly knaves had not hanged the babes to their mothers' necks, and thrown them from the walls. Let one of you garlic chompers dare confess any part in that beastly business, and I will heave him over the walls into Gehenna, where other carcasses rot. Who touched those women?"

As Dion looked from face to face his blue eyes flashed like the sword point of a fencer feeling for an exposed spot in the breast of his antagonist. The challenge was not taken, one venturing to say:

"It was done at the governor's orders."

"I pronounce that a lie. Who repeats it?" cried Captain Dion.

A fellow officer suggested that it might have been ordered by Apollonius, since the women had plainly broken the new law and had circumcised their brats.

"Shame on you, comrade!" said Dion. "They were women and mothers, and I would say as much to the king's face."

The old Jew, hearing the reference to the scene which he himself had been compelled the day before to witness, turned boldly to the crowd of Greeks, and, with uplifted hands, repeated this imprecation from one of the Psalms of his people:

"Let your children be fatherless and your wives be widows! Let your children be vagabonds and—"

But Dion's hand was firmly laid upon the speaker's mouth.

"Nay, hold your breath, old man. If you give us much of it that way this crowd will take the rest of it with the hangman's rope."

Dion gently took the Jew's arm. "You must go back to your house. Come, I will see you safely within doors, if you will stay there."

"No, I will go to the house of the Lord and worship, for it is the ninth hour," replied the determined man.

"That you cannot do," said Dion, kindly. "Don't you see that the Temple gate is burned and that soldiers are guarding the opening? Your worship is no longer permitted there. Your sort of priests are all gone."

"Then," said the patriot, "I will be my own priest. Surely the Lord will accept an old man's last worship on earth before he goes hence."

"Nay, my good man, but the priests of the new religion are at the Temple. Tomorrow they celebrate the feast of Bacchus. If you go there, they will crown you with ivy and make you drunk in honor of the god. You must go home and stay within doors."

"Then let me go—to my own house! My God! Why was it not my sepulchre ere I saw what the prophet foretold?"

Captain Dion led him safely along the street of David, the crowd giving way as it gazed upon the two and remarked the contrast between the half-mummied saint and the strong-limbed, festive-crowned youth.

"Old Elkhiah is about the last of this damnable race left in Jerusalem. It is a wonder that Apollonius has given him tether so long."

"Perhaps Dion knows the Jew," responded some one. "The captain is as good a Greek as ever drew sword or loved a woman, but his nose isn't straight on a line with his forehead. See, it has a Jewish twist."

"A fine observation," laughed another, "for one always follows his nose, and that may account for Dion's kindness to some of these rebels."

"Don't insult Captain Dion!" said one. "He's close in with Apollonius. Besides, he's a good fellow. He always gives a weaker man his handicap in the arena without having it ordered."

"True, or you would not have won yesterday. But I wish he wouldn't interfere with the sport of the men. I know that it is cruel, but the sooner the bigots are exterminated the sooner it will cease. Were it not Dion's friendship for that Glaucon—as Elkhiah's fool of a son now calls himself—we would soon find out what the old Jew's house has for us. They say his cellar is as good as a gold mine."

"Better kill off Glaucon and let the old man die himself. You saw that his life is about burned out, and his old body only like a heap of ashes with a spark in it," was the humane response.

Dion paused by the oaken door in the wall of the Jew's house. He took from a little pouch at his belt a pinch of aromatic sawdust of sandalwood and dropped it upon a small square altar whose brazier emitted a thin curl of white smoke, clouding the entrance. This was an altar to Zeus, which the governor had commanded to be placed at all the houses which were still occupied by the Jews. Just above the altar the lintel had been torn by the destruction of the Mezuzah or wooden box which, according to the Hebrew custom, contained the sacred sentences from the Law, and through the small apertures in which a visitor to any Jewish home could see the word "Shaddai," the Almighty One, and thus make the common salutation, "Peace be to this house," into a prayer. Dion's worship at the little altar by the gate was marred by a muttered curse upon Apollonius for the needless insult perpetrated by this act of sacrilege.

The Greek had scarcely time to knock at the outer entrance when the door flew open, and with the cry "Father!" a young girl's arms were about the old man.

She drew him inside and stood with her left arm supporting, while she raised her right hand as if it were a shield to protect him.

Captain Dion was familiar with the finest statuary in Athens and Antioch, but thought he had never seen anything to match this—the white head and beard of age shielded by the raven locks of youth and beauty. He would tell Laertes, his sculptor friend, of this pose.

The girl was apparently about seventeen years of age, tall and lithe, with sufficient muscle to give that exquisite grace which only accompanies strength. Her hair, bound about the temples with a single fillet of silver, fell in wavy profusion of jet black upon a white linen chiton. This was gathered at the shoulders, and left fully exposed a neck which might have illuminated a copy of Solomon's song. Beneath the breasts the garment was girdled with a rope of golden threads, and thence fell below the knees. Her ankles were wound with long white sandal lacings, which were in harmony with the silver band that bound her brow. Her arms were bare. In her haste she had not put on her outer garment, and thus stood revealed in a more exquisite modeling of nature than she would have chosen had she known that she was to be beneath so critical an eye. Yet she could not have been more charming had she practiced for hours before her mirror of polished brass, and passed her proud old nurse Huldah's inspection before she made her debut at the gate.

Dion noted that the girl's features were perfect, but strictly on the Semitic model. Her face might be a hard one, for it well fitted the tragic feeling of the moment; or it might be sweet as any he had loved to dream about, for it also fitted the intensity of filial affection and solicitude she now displayed. The Greek seemed transfixed by her eyes. These were enlarged by her surprise, and their pupils gleamed from their deep black irises with the fire of excitement.

"A Jewish Athena!" thought Dion, as in a brief sentence or two he begged the girl to be more prudent in the care of her father. Surely there was no scorn of the Jewish race in the profound bow with which he took his departure, nor in the hasty glance he stole as the door was closing.

He plucked a leaf from his myrtle crown and dropped it upon the altar. As he went away he sighed a prayer for the maiden and grumbled another curse upon the king's cruelty. Then he whistled a sort of musical accompaniment to his thought, which ran something like this:

"That girl is Glaucon's sister. He never told me that he had one." He shrugged his shoulders. "Well, in that he was wise, since he only knows me for a Greek adventurer, and thinks my honor like his own, a spur on the heel, to be used or not according to one's inclination. But, by the arm of Aphrodite! what a woman! Beautiful as a lioness and as brave, too. Strange that the Jew could be father of both her and Glaucon—of a lioness and a jackal! Glaucon and I must be good friends, though I despise the fool. Why doesn't he fight for his house? I would—especially with that woman in it."

Dion stopped and stood a long time looking at the narrow strip of sky visible between Elkhiah's house and those which lined the opposite side of the street. There were no angels in the blue ether; but something prompted him to take from his bosom a piece of onyx enclosed in a casket of gold and to look at a sweet face cut into the stone.

"I wonder if she was anything like Elkhiah's daughter!"

He put the intaglio back into its pocket and went away.

THE LAND OF STORY BOOKS.

At evening, when the lamp is lit,
Around the fire my parents sit;
They sit at home and talk and sing,
And do not play at anything.

Now, with my little gun I crawl,
All in the dark along the wall,
And follow 'round the forest track,
Away behind the sofa back.

There, in the night, where none can spy,
All in my hunter's camp I lie,
And play at books that I have read
Till it is time to go to bed.

These are the hills, these are the woods,
These are the starry solitudes;
And there the river by whose brink
The roaring lions come to drink.

I see the others far away,
As if in fire-lit camp they lay,
And I, like to an Indian scout,
Around their party prowled about.

So, when my nurse comes in for me,
Home I return across the sea,
And go to bed with backward looks
At my dear land of story books.

THE ATONEMENT,

Editor of Christian Century—

Dear Sir: A month or so ago you had an editorial on necessity of a united church, in which you indicated that almost every belief that was Christian ought to be united in one organized body. I was much pleased with the tone of that article, also with your claim that your special work will be toward a united church. In this week you have an article on the Atonement, however, with which many Christians will never harmonize, and it will be little use to work toward one church if all of its members must believe in the atonement as outlined by you this week. If you will pronounce the word as it really means—at-one-ment—that is, reconciling man to God, then I believe in it. I do not think the death of Christ made God any more willing to forgive my sins than he was before; but it draws me to God, and this is done as much by his life as his death. Jesus died, not to atone for my sins, but he died because he was here, and it was necessary for him to pass into the other life some way; he might have done so in a chariot of fire, without having tasted death, but then he would not have brought life and immortality to light; in order to do this, he must die as other men; be consigned to the tomb, and then issue forth alive, and this in a way that the fact might be established. His life was as much given for man while he was living as when he died.

Then, again, you speak of the work of the Holy Spirit as if it were a personality different from God, and who had an especial part in the work of salvation. I do not believe in a triune God. I do not pretend to understand God's mode of existence; but it must be as one, whatever the mode. The words, pneumotis hagin, translated holy spirit, seem to me sometimes to be only another name for God himself, and at other times those same words ought to be translated spirit of holiness, and in no sense do the words indicate to me a trinity of being. I believe in one God, and one person in that God.

We shall never understand the mode of God's existence alike, and we shall perhaps never understand Christ's place in the scale of being alike, and the only ground upon which the church of the future shall become organically one, will be through a loving spirit of toleration for each other's views, held together by love to God and love to man. The united church will stand upon the New Testament, each member reading and interpreting it as seems to him right and fair. Hence, I should accord to you the right to believe the atonement as you define it this week, and you should accord to me the equal privilege to understand that matter in my way. Perfect freedom should be the ruling feature of such a congregation.

Henry, Ill.

J. M. Kirkpatrick.

We publish this letter alike for its own sake and because it gives us the opportunity of defining our position. Our correspondent has missed entirely the thought of our article in question. We do not believe that the atonement of Jesus was the means of changing God's heart and securing his mercy. The atonement was the outcome and expression of God's love, not the means of its purchase. Furthermore, its object was not the reconciling of God to man, but the reconciling of man to God. It is man who receives the at-one-ment. In this we are at one with our correspondent. With regard to the ground of organic union we believe that it is found only in the one foundation. But oneness of faith may exist in spite of diversity of opinion. Faith in Christ being the essential thing in Christian experience, is also the essential thing in Christian union.—Editor.

PLEASANTRIES.

The best definition of a trust is that given by Thomas B. Reed, who says that "a trust is a large body of capitalists wholly surrounded by water."—Green Bag.

An author who was eulogizing his own works as containing much "food for thought" was taken aback by the remark of a friend, "They may contain food for thought, but it is wretchedly cooked."

Overheard at the Salle des Capucines during the delivery of a lecture by the famous X.: "How full he is of his subject!" said one of the hearers. "Yes, but how slow he is in emptying himself!" was the reply.—L'Intransigent Illustré.

"I dunno how Bill's a-goin' to vote in this election," said the campaign worker. "I've hearn tell he's on the fence." "He wuz thar," replied the neighbor, "but one o' the canderdates let fall a dollar on the off side o' the fence, and Bill got dizzy an' fell over."

"Did you ever hear the joke about the guide in Rome who showed some travelers two skulls of St. Paul, one as a boy and the other as a man?" asked an American of a German friend, who claimed that he had acquired the real New England sense of humor. "No," said the German, beaming in anticipation of a good story. "Tell it me at once, mein friend, dat joke."

McJigger—"I see you've got a parrot." Thingumbob—"Yes, and he's the wisest bird you ever saw." McJigger—"Says a lot of clever things, eh?" Thingumbob—"No; never says a thing. That's where he shows his wisdom."—Philadelphia Press.

Little Maybelle had just returned from her first child's party, looking particularly well satisfied and contented. "Well, dear," said the fond mother, "did you have a pleasant time?" Maybell heaved a long sigh as she answered: "Just mejum. I bit one children and scratched another."

Mr. Whistler once painted the portrait of a distinguished novelist. When the portrait was finished the sitter did not appear satisfied. "You don't seem to like it," Whistler said. The sitter said, in self-justification, "You must admit that it is a bad work of art." "Yes," Whistler replied, "but I think you must admit that you are a bad work of nature."

Field Marshal Von Moltke, in proposing the health of the kaiser, rarely used more than eight or nine words. In 1884 a wager was laid on the question of his not exceeding this number. But it so happened that for once he prefixed to his usual form of words, "Meine Herren," ("Gentlemen"). The disconsolate loser of the bet sorrowfully remarked: "He's aging, is Moltke. He's getting garrulous."

OUR PULPIT.

JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH, OR THE SPIRITUAL ADJUSTMENT OF MAN.

Rev. James M. Campbell, D. D.

"Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." Romans 5:1.

WITH a great many people the term "justification" has ceased to have any meaning. To conserve the reality for which this term stands the thought of the past must be translated into the language of the present. In attempting to do this the present writer would suggest the advisability of using the term, adjustment, as an equivalent for justification.

The primary meaning of justification is undoubtedly the act of rightening or making right with respect to the law. That it is generally used in the New Testament in a legal or forensic sense there cannot be a shadow of doubt. But it is equally true that the essential idea of the word is the complete adjustment of man in all his inner and outer relations. Granted that the mould in which that idea is cast is forensic, what of it? The essential thing is not the form of the figure, but the ethical truth which lies at the heart of it; and the ethical truth which forms the vital core of the word justification is unquestionably the spiritual adjustment of man.

An interesting and instructive use of the word "justify" is found in connection with typesetting. A compositor is said to justify a line or column of type when he spaces it properly or fills it out exactly, so as to adjust it or make it even. In this use of the word, which is evidently a survival showing the sense in which the word was formerly understood, there is a suggestion of its true ethical import. A justified person is one who has been brought into proper alignment. He is completely adjusted in all his relations Godward and manward, heavenward and earthward.

1. He is adjusted or put right in relation to God and to God's law, which means that he is first of all adjusted or put right with respect to sin. For sin is a violation of law—a violation, in other words, of that eternal principle of right and order which God has established in his universe. Every sin brings into the soul and into the world an element of disturbance. It is like a harsh discord in music or like the breaking of a wheel in a complicated machine. Every sinner has times when he feels out of harmony with the moral system of things under which he lives. He is out of his place and he knows it. Even in his most complacent mood he is haunted with the uneasy feeling that there is something within him sadly out of joint. And when he faces the situation he begins to ask, How can I be put right? How can this disturbing element be expelled from my soul? How can my life be made to chime with the music of heaven? It is the old question, "How can man be just before God?" How can a sinner be put right in the sight of God?

The mission of Christ was to set humanity right, and this he does by restoring the relationship between God and man which sin had disturbed. He came to make peace through the blood of his cross, not by wiping out the consequences of sin, but by securing its pardon. His cross awakens repentance; repentance secures pardon, and pardon ends estrangement and restores lost harmony. The forgiven soul does not tremble at the thought of meeting God. He does not shrink from God's presence with the shame of his sin upon him. All is made right between him and the Father. He is treated as if he had never sinned. The Father's love flows out towards him unimpeded. In that restored love he is happy. He tastes the blessedness of "the man whose iniquity is forgiven and whose sin is covered."

But not only is he put right in relation to the law which he has broken, he is also put right in relation to the law which he now endeavors to keep. He is inwardly rectified. A new principle of obedience is implanted within him. A new power enters him capable of producing righteousness. "The righteousness which law was unable to produce, the righteousness to which he himself could never have attained, is realized through Christ, who is "the end of the law for righteousness unto every one that believeth." Those who come into union with Christ and receive his life become partakers of his righteousness.

Justification is no legal fiction. It is not the making of a man out to be righteous in the sense of making him out to be what he is not; still less the making of him out to be righteous on the ground of the righteousness of another. When a man is justified he becomes a straight or righteous man, as distinguished from a crooked man, which is the Old Testament description of a sinner. He is declared righteous because he is righteous. He is incipiently, germinally righteous. The fountain of a new life has been opened within him.

Justification or adjustment is thus a two-sided unit, consisting of the forgiveness of sin and the impartation of righteousness. Forgiveness of sin or deliverance from condemnation is everywhere ascribed in Scripture to the suffering and death of Christ; while the inward adjustment of the soul to the law as a standard of action is ascribed to the impartation of the righteousness of Christ. Note the contrast in the two following texts: "In whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of our trespasses." Eph. 5:7. "Him who knew no sin he made to be sin on our behalf that we might become the righteousness of God in him," II. Cor. 5:21. This twofold adjustment which Christ effects brings peace with God. "Being adjusted by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ," Rom. 5:1.

2. When a man is justified he is put right in relation to himself. The bitterness of man's guilt comes from the fact that he has no one but himself to blame for the disturbance which it has wrought. Sin is voluntary. It is something that might not have been, that ought not to have been. It is evident, therefore, that before inward harmony can be restored man must be put right not only with God, but also with himself. An upbraiding conscience must be satisfied, guilty fears must be hushed. From the censure of a wronged soul there is no escape. What matters it if men commend if the heart condemns? An accusing conscience creates a storm in the breast which no forthputting of will can quell. The mire and dirt are being constantly cast up, polluting every joy and mixing with muddy impurity life's best experiences. A man must get right with his conscience before he can be at peace.

The adjusted soul is "made whole every whit." He is "cleansed from all sin." The burden of his guilt is taken away. Let it be noted that while the ground of adjustment is objective, the adjustment itself is subjective. It is something which takes place in the court of the soul, and not in the court of heaven. It is the man himself who is adjusted. In view of Calvary's sacrifice which reveals the measure of divine mercy and the method of its bestowal, his conscience is set forever at rest.

The satisfying of the conscience leads to the sanctification of character. Restoration to the filial relation begets the filial spirit. New motives, new purposes, are awakened. God is loved, goodness is loved, all that God loves is loved. Inner harmony is restored. The soul is adjusted to the law as a moral imperative resting upon the entire life. The commands of the law are no longer grievous, its yoke is no longer heavy. A new and powerful motive to obedience is furnished. The bondage of fear is displaced by the liberty of love. "Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid. Yea, we establish the law."

A Salvation Army convert, tortured with the remembrance of a past delinquency, rose up in a public meeting and said: "Some years ago I stole a sum of money from my employer; no one has known of my sin but myself and my Lord. The burden of guilt weighs heavily upon my conscience, and I have resolved to make instant restitution; for I find that I can never be right with myself until I make everything right with the man I have wronged." This man was seeking personal adjustment. No mere belief in the general mercy of God could satisfy him. He had been vainly trying to make himself out to be right, now he sought to be made right; he had been vainly trying to get on the right side of his conscience, now he sought to be right with his conscience; he had been vainly trying to get right with the Lord while he was not right with himself, now he sought to be right with the Lord by being right with himself.

When a man is adjusted in relation to himself he has peace. For the disobedient there is peace only in obedience; for the wrong-doer there is peace only in doing right; for the rebellious there is peace only in submission; for the impenitent there is peace only in repentance. Adjustment of self and peace are cause and effect. When the human will sinks into the divine will; when the mutinous spirit of man bows before the sceptre of divine authority, man feels at peace with himself, for he knows that he has done what is right. The kingdom of God is first righteousness and then peace. There is no peace, there can be no peace for the wicked. "The work of righteousness shall be peace, and the effect of righteousness quietness and assurance forever." Isa. 32:17.

3. The justified soul is adjusted or put right in relation to his fellow men. He looks upon them in a new way; he treats them in a new way. Formerly his one thought was, what can I get out of them? Now his one thought is, how can I serve them?

The root of social discord is selfishness; and yet in our competitive industrial system selfishness is tacitly accepted as the legitimate rule of social action. It is said to belong to the system. If that be so, then so much the worse for the system. There is something radically wrong when in the sphere of business it is thought to be an unavoidable thing that man should be set against man, and class against class. But is it? Not unless Christianity is an unrealizable ideal.

Social adjustment is an integral part of the work of Christ. Christ is the great reconciler. In him all social jarrings and discords are harmonized. At his cross the rich and the poor meet together. Master and servant accepting his authority as supreme recognize their mutual interests and rights; they become adjusted to each other in all their social relations; they act towards each other as brethren. When there is love for Christ there is love for man; and love is the great social adjuster.

The problem of sociology, which is the adjustment of man to his social relations, is at bottom a religious problem. It is the social side of religion. The question which all social reformers are asking is, How can men be adjusted to each other so that they may live together as children of a common Father? Views may differ as to the changes which must needs take place before the social system is itself adjusted in all its parts, but among Christian believers there can be no difference of opinion as to the power that is to adjust man to things as they are, so that as the servant of Christ he may serve the present age by lightening his brothers' burdens, lessening their sorrows, increasing their happiness, enlarging their life and sharing with them in every way possible whatever he possesses that may contribute to the general well being. Christianity, while working for the world's betterment, adjusts man to his social duties in every stage of human evolution. It not only gives new light, it gives new power. It puts man right and keeps him right in all the complex relations in which he stands to his fellowmen, enabling him to fill up the measure of his social obligations.

4. The justified soul is adjusted or put right in relation to the world in which it dwells. His wishes harmonize with God's appointments; the arrangements of God's providence are joyfully accepted; all conflict with God is ended, his plans are followed, his will is done.

R. S. Crockett tells the story of a Scotch minister who "cast out" with his Maker. He was crossed in love, and like many a fool in similar circumstances he threw the blame upon God. He lived for years a lonely and secluded life, "taking his revenge on God for denying him the desire of his heart." Chancing to meet the commonplace woman whom he had idealized he was disillusioned, and a disappointment changed into a deliverance. Adjusted to the facts of his life, "he made it up with his Maker" and became a transformed man. To be out of adjustment with one's environment is to be unhappy. Adjustment to the divine will brings inward tranquillity. The friction and worry that wear out life are taken away when we can say, "If I cannot bring my circumstances to my will I can adjust my will to my circumstances."

It cannot be too strongly emphasized that this complete adjustment of man in the whole circle of his relations is by Christ, through faith. Man has gone wrong, but he cannot put himself right. He is without strength to rectify himself. It is Christ alone who can bring him into right relation to God, to himself, to his fellowmen, and to his surroundings. "A man," says Paul, "is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ;" that is, by the faith which has Jesus Christ for its object. It is only as a man comes into vital union with Christ, and has his spirit living in him, that he can be spiritually adjusted. "In him all that believe are justified from all things."

Let every one who has come to see the utter futility of trying to bring a sinful, ill-regulated life into harmony with the divine order offer the prayer, "Lord Jesus, thou Divine Adjuster, I yield myself up into thy hands. Make me right within and without. Put me in my right place in the world. Enable me to do the right things. Adjust me in everything to the Father's will. Amen."

JACOB AT BETHEL.

Lesson for Sept. 8, 1901: Gen. 28:10-22.

A CHICAGO TEACHER'S NOTES ON THE LESSON.

Elias A. Long.

Jacob and Esau.

JACOB was the son of Isaac and Rebekah and twin brother to Esau. Jacob, a home-loving young man (Ch. 25:27), became especially attached to his mother, while the wild, daring life of Esau, a hunter, made him a favorite with his father. The natures of the brothers were quite different; to which we may attribute that remarkable episode, the transfer of the birthright from Esau to Jacob. Esau was inclined to look more to present, material things, while Jacob was more visionary, looking ahead. Hence it was that present hunger tempted Esau to prize a mess of savory pottage close at hand more highly than a birthright in the distance. The birthright means rights and privileges of the first-born, which include a double portion of the inheritance (Deu. 21:17), and the judicial authority of the father (2 Chron. 21:3). Because Esau by shortsightedness despised his birthright (Ch. 25:34), he is styled "a profane person" in Heb. 12:16. It was an extremely foolish act, yet thousands made incomparably worse bargains by selling their eternal birthright. Jacob obtained this advantage through low, sinful measures. By his conduct he earned the title of Jacob the Cheater. Urged on by his mother, Rebekah (Ch. 27:15-16), he had taken unbrotherly advantage of Esau's hunger to gain the latter's rights. Then he used deception to move Isaac into irrevocably altering his will in his own favor (Ch. 27:18-29). The time of this lesson was probably about B. C. 1780. Beersheba, the family home, was about forty-eight miles southwest of Bethel, which latter place lay some twelve miles north of Jerusalem.

A Great Lesson of Hope.

This is a lesson of surpassing hopefulness for the race. It is an honest account of an eminent man who was a great sinner and was remarkably rescued to a life of godliness. If Jacob, the cheater, the lying trickster, can be transformed into Israel, a prince with God, what hope for sinful humanity. And what a catalogue of sin-transformed lives this case heads in Bible history. There is the murderous David transformed into a man after God's own heart; the despised publican Matthew changed to be the great evangelist author to the Jewish race; the cursing, lying Simon converted to be the powerful Pentecostal preacher, and the bloody Saul transformed into a meek and long-suffering hero of faith. With such a record of God's power unto salvation no sinner needs despair. It illustrates the great lesson of "the riches of God's goodness and forbearance and long-suffering in leading sinners to repentance" (Rom. 2:4). Another lesson, and indicated by the golden text, is that of the human soul's greatest discovery; the recognition of God's living presence, his love, his personal nearness and his guidance in the case of all who incline their hearts toward him, as their Lord and Savior.

V. 10. Sin-Broken Home. "Jacob," the cheater, was a sinner who knew not God's presence (v. 16). Had he waited in faith he would have gained God's promised blessing without resorting to lie and trickery. * * * "Went from Beersheba." The real reason for Jacob's disgraceful flight was his sin, which led to Esau's sinful hatred and retaliatory threat of murder. Ch. 27:41. From the days of Eden (Gen. 3:24) sin and its results have driven men from home into sorrow and exile. Sin is the enemy of the home. The pretended reason to Isaac for Jacob's departure was the obtaining of a wife. Ch. 27:46. Notice that all the trouble recorded at this stage can be traced to that common beginning of evil in all ages, the giving way to appetite. Ch. 25:34. * * * "Toward Haran." Haran, the old family settlement, some 450 miles northwest. Jacob went forth alone with nothing but his staff (Ch. 32:10), a poor, spiritual prodigal, whose soul had been feeding on the husks of sin.

V. 11. The Striving Spirit. "Lighted upon a certain place." Leaving Beersheba with its hallowed memories, the self-seeking Jacob was led to this place where, all alone, he found room for reflection. This was at Luz, later known as Bethel. And the Spirit of God striving with him (Gen. 6:3) made this to be a night of "distress" so deep that it never was forgotten by Jacob. Ch. 35:3. It was his first night from home, driven by the malice of his active brother, who might yet overtake and slay him. In those hours of solitude and terror he must have seen what a miserable failure he had made of his life's prospects. Taking mean advantage of his hungry brother, he finds himself a fleeing outcast, in want of life's necessities. He who stole a blessing has so soon become a poor wandering shepherd seeking employment. * * * "Tarried there all night." Like a common pilgrim of that land he slept out wherever night overtook him. * * * "And he took stones . . . for his pillow." Perhaps he only took one stone (v. 18), hard and cold. This would add to the cheerlessness and distress.

V. 12. The Cry and Answer. "Answered me . . . in my distress." See Ch. 35:3. That this poor man cried and the Lord heard him (Ps. 34:6) is evident from this reference to the present night's experience, made many years later. Jacob must first have called, so that God could have "answered." * * * "And he dreamed." God's will was not then embodied in his written word, hence he revealed himself to men in various forms, including dreams, as here, in answer to Jacob. Unlike Jacob, we have the light of the word (Ps. 119:105), and the Light of the World for our guidance, and dreams to us mean little or nothing. * * * "Behold," a word indicating something remarkable, out of the ordinary. * * * "A ladder." In mercy this beautiful emblem appeared to Jacob, leading him to turn his thoughts upward from things seen. Abraham in his hour of discouragement was told to look upward at the stars. Christ commanded his followers in similar circumstances to look up. Luke 21:28. Now in his desolation Jacob learned that heaven and earth are not far apart, and are connected. He had passed over many a mile to this spot, but the ladder suggests that true progress is by slower method, step by step, in an upward direction. * * * "Set up on earth . . . reached to heaven." Jesus seems to have taught that this ladder indicated himself. John 1:51, 3:13, 14:6. By Christ God came down to man; by Christ man ascends to heaven. * * * "Angels of God ascending, descending." The word "angel" in the original means "one sent" and is employed to denote any agent used in executing God's purposes and in ministering to the needs of his people. Heb. 1:14. Jacob saw what the eye of faith constantly sees in angelic ministries. Whenever the distressed soul reaches up to God in prayer, in faith, in repentance, there is the heavenly ladder.

V. 13. Love for Sinners. "Behold the Lord stood." He stood in his loving kindness, not to charge with guilt or to punish for sin. In mercy he makes no less than seven promises, designed to fit the case of this distressed seeker for light. Men in their extremity are always more accessible. * * * "And said." This was in dream language, but so vivid was the impression made that Jacob could affirm he heard God saying what follows. * * * "I am the Lord God of Abraham, of Isaac." The one true God of all generations, not one of many Gods, according to idolatrous notions. While it is true that the lives of patriarchs are not signalized by freedom from sin, yet it also is true that they turned away from low deities, the embodiments of men's lusts and present indulgencies, and chose at the price of self-denial the one true and holy God far better than themselves, upon which to center their love and hope. * * * "The land whereon thou liest." The land long before promised to Abraham. God's promises never wear out. * * * "To thee will I give it." Of all Abraham's descendants, God saw that Jacob's heart was fittest to be the channel through which the covenant blessing should flow. The converted cheater becomes the leading figure in sacred history, the partner of God in fulfillment of the divine purpose. God knew his heart. There are many sinful Jacobs to whom it is a comfort to know that of however poor stuff they are made by nature, God can make of them, if they but yield to him, vessels unto honor, meet for the Master's use. 2 Tim. 2:21.

V. 14. Midnight Promise. "Thy seed as the dust." The old family promise of 160 years before to Abraham now is repeated in detail. "As the dust" means beyond computation. Already the figures, as the seashore sands and the stars, had similarly been applied. * * * "Shall spread west, east, north, south." Shall spread in all nations. This in spite of race hatred has been most strangely fulfilled. When any one questions the strength of God's promises, point to the Jews. * * * "And in thy seed all . . . be blessed." Jacob's descendants in prophets, priests and people, with all their defects were, before the Christian era, the best people the world had. Even as captives in Babylon and Persia, leaders like Daniel, Ezekiel, Amos and others were as a fountain of moral health and blessing. Christ came of Jacob's seed. Jews became the first preachers of the gospel and Jewish synagogues the first preaching places.

V. 15. Personal Nearness. "I am with thee and will keep thee." What a cluster of precious promises came to the needy, conscience-stricken Jacob in that night of awful experience. If this solitary outcast will but accept God's mercy the Lord will be close to him as a personal companion. But God, through Christ, is nothing less than this to us. Matt. 28:20 * * * "Will bring thee again unto this land." Some forty years later this promise was fulfilled. Ch. 35:67. * * * "I will not leave thee. A most gracious promise to come now at the turning point of Jacob's life. So God will be with us as we break from old associations to meet new trials. His love, his compassion, his comfort, his power, his adaptation to our needs, through Christ will never fail.

V. 16-17. The Great Discovery. "Surely the Lord is in this place." That night there came to Jacob's soul its greatest discovery. He found that God and his love were as surely present as the very atmosphere which compassed him about. It was an assurance that never departed from him. It brought Jacob—as the same great discovery ever brings us—into a new world and life, with new aspirations and hopes. "Behold all things are become new." 2 Cor. 5:17. Only as we grow to be wiser, to live more with God, do we come to the comprehension that he is in every place. * * * "And I knew it not." "The Lord, all the while, had been afraid." Jacob's great discovery leads to the further discovery of himself (Luke 15:17), a poor sinner standing naked before the Most High and Holy One. But godly fear comes not from the terror, but from the excellency of the Lord. * * * "How dreadful is this place." It is a fearful thing for unclean flesh to stand before the living God. Heb. 10:31. * * * "This is the house of God." How consoling to think of this desolate place and hard pillow converted into the very dwelling place of God. In truth it was Jacob's own heart that had become God's dwelling place. * * * "This is the gate of Heaven," alluding to the ladder which served the angels as an entrance to heaven.

V. 18. Pledge of Gratitude. "Rose up early in the morning." He observed his religious duty promptly. Men of Jacob's active inclinations and strong religious convictions are early risers everywhere. See Gen. 19:27, 21:14, 22:3; Exod. 24:4, 34:4; Josh. 3:1, 6:12, 7:16, 8:10; Acts 5:21, which contain a sufficient hint to modern followers of God. * * * "Poured oil upon the top." In that land oil was used for light, for food and for alleviating pain. In this symbolic use it became an emblem of the Spirit who enlightens, revives and heals. To pour such a precious article over anything symbolized its dedication to a divine purpose.

V. 19. In Remembrance. "Called the name of that place Bethel." Jacob applied a name that through future generations should say, This is the house of God. Bethel means house of God.

V. 20. Vow of Consecration. "Jacob vowed a vow." This is the first recorded vow. It shows the deepness of Jacob's experience that he bound himself to certain religious acts. This, together with his confession (v. 16), his consecration (v. 19), his offering of tithes (v. 22), may be taken as ample proof of his conversion. True, his spiritual growth henceforth was not rapid; he had yet many lessons to learn, but the trend of his life was upward. * * * "Saying, if God will." Not implying doubt or the making of terms, but recognizing the great promises, which must have come to him with stunning force.

V. 21. Seeker of Peace. "Came again to my father's house in peace." He left it in a storm, he longs to return in peace. * * * "Then shall the Lord by my God," implying that he now is a child of God.

V. 22. Faith with Works. "And this . . . shall be God's house." Having marked the spot and consecrated it with a vow and offering of tithes, he can go on his way rejoicing. He had opened his heart and his treasure to God. "I will surely give a tenth unto thee." He offered to God as Abraham before had offered to the priest of God. Gen. 14:20. Our religion ought to be worth as much to us as to Jacob. Then, because Jacob inclined his heart toward higher things, God took him in training and gradually he became Israel, the prince with God. He grew better and better and rose higher and higher until we find him at last a veritable saint, who, with Paul, could say, "By the grace of God I am what I am." 1 Cor. 15:10.

FIVE-MINUTE SERMON ON THE GOLDEN TEXT.

By Peter Ainslie.

OD is here and everywhere. His presence is not like the rising and the setting of the sun, but it is perpetual. To flee from him is folly. As I write he looks over my shoulder, as I walk he is by my side, as I sleep he is looking right into my face, as I go about my daily duties he is with me. He is my comfort, my joy and my salvation. He keeps me from sin, breaks up plans that are wrong and banishes all imaginations that are hurtful to the soul. What a presence! Surely he is here now, as I write and as you read, and he becomes a living presence indeed to the extent of our recognition of him. He is in a hand's touch. He wants your acquaintance. He wants to hear your voice. He wants your confidence. The apostle says, "Be courteous," and certainly it is a very common courtesy to speak frequently with one who is with us all the time. This was Paul's conception when he wrote, "Pray without ceasing." As my companion, and I walk all the day through the rushing tides of humanity on the streets, through the fields or sit in a room, certainly I do not count it a burden to occasionally make a remark to him. It comes as natural to say a word or two every few moments. May it not be just as true as to our speaking with God, who is ever with us? I wonder if he ever feels lonely because we are so cold and formal in our talks with him. With some of us a whole day and a night pass and not so much as a word between us and our God. Are we really acquainted? It is said that he knoweth them that are his, but do we know him, who is ours? You may say because he is unseen he is unreal, but all friendship is based upon the spiritual, which cannot be seen. My friend and I really love, but I only see my friend by his works, for the mere flesh and bone is not my friend. With this as a beginning point, are we not able to take hold of the personality of our God? The eye can not see him, but we can see his works; we know that he is, and, more, too, we know that he is ever present, that he is the friend of all friends and the chief of lovers. Then is not his presence a benediction? He is pure and holy and altogether without sin and that which is most mysterious to me is that I, but dust and ashes, should be taken into his friendship and sought after as a daily companion. He loved the whole world and he will love us unto the end. He is here and he is everywhere and his very presence is an unanswerable argument for his tender Fatherhood and his eternal love.

Our Father, thou art not far away. Forgive us of unrighteousness and help us that we may recognize thee always. Amen.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR.

HELP FROM ABOVE.

Topic for Sept. 8: 2 Kings 6:15-17.

TWO of the most interesting characters in the chronicles of Israel are Elijah and his successor, Elisha. Though differing greatly, they are strangely associated in the stirring events of the period. The element of the romantic is not wanting in the history of each. Elijah was a bold, daring prophet, facing Ahab and Jezebel in their career of desperate wickedness until King Ahab came to fear his presence more than the enemies of Israel. He dogged the miserable king until he cried out in fear and desperation, "Hast thou found me, O mine enemy?" And he answered, "I have found thee, because thou hast sold thyself to work evil in the sight of the Lord."

Elisha was more retiring in his disposition, though not a whit less courageous. He depended more on the manifestation of ### Spiritual Forces.

His history is worthy the careful study of this materialistic age, from the emphasis of the unseen and spiritual. The chief point of the lesson is this emphasis of the reality of spiritual presence and power.

The heart of the king of Syria was sore troubled at the mysterious manner in which his best-laid schemes for entrapping the king of Israel miscarried. He accused his servants of treachery, demanding, "Which of us is for the king of Israel?" And one of his servants answered: "None, my lord, O king, but Elisha, the prophet, that is in Israel, telleth the king of Israel the words that thou speakest in thy bedchamber." So he sent to Dothan, and encompassed the city about with a great host of chariots and horsemen. This greatly frightened the servant of Elisha and he cried out, "Alas, my master! How shall we do?" And he answered, "Fear not, for they that be with us are more than they that be with them." And Elisha prayed and said, "Lord, I pray thee, open his eyes that he may see." And the Lord opened the eyes of the young man and he saw and, behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha." O for more of this

Spiritual Vision!

I think we need to pray the prayer of Elisha for his servant. Lord, open the eyes of young men! It is one of the sorest needs of our times. I am not pessimistic when I affirm that what our young men lack is spiritual vision. And when I say this I am not forgetful of the great work of the Christian Endeavor movement, of the Young Men's Christian Association, of the Students' Volunteer Movement, and of the large number of young men in Christian schools. Still the vast majority of our young men, even those in our churches, lack spiritual vision. They are so encompassed about with the occupations and pleasures of the world that they forget the unseen and eternal God of Elisha, reveal it unto us, and to our young men, in the midst of the world's mad clamor, that they that be with us are more than they that be with the enemies of youth and young manhood! Fathers, mothers, sisters, brothers, preachers of the gospel of redeeming grace, let us pray this prayer. Pray for spiritual vision, for open eyes, that our young men may see visions, as the people of Elisha prayed, and as the prophet Joel foretold should be one of the evidences of the reign of the Holy Spirit. The Christian Endeavor movement will accomplish its greatest mission in inspiring our young men to spiritual vision, and the recognition of the supremacy of spiritual forces.

ABRAHAM'S INTERCESSION.

"The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much."—James 5, 16.

Monday—Genesis 18, 1-8.

I may still have moments on the Mount such as Abraham had when he entertained the visitants from heaven.

At my conversion does not God seclude me from the crowd, and whisper a word of grace into my ears, which is meant for me alone, and give me the hidden manna to eat, and greet me by the new name which is known only to Himself and myself? At great and thrilling seasons afterward in the spiritual life, when, as I pray and meditate alone, I am filled with the grace and enlightenment of the Holy Ghost, I am admitted to a marvelous nearness of communion. And other days of heaven there are on earth, when the gates of pearl are open to me and I walk the streets of gold.

If my Lord gives me such foretastes of the better country, may they enable me to live as its citizens now and here.

Tuesday—Genesis 18, 16-22.

Sin brings sorrow and destruction in its train. It is a law not for the city and community only, but for the individual. Let me lay it earnestly to heart.

Sometimes I am deceived by the prophets who speak smooth things. Men nowadays will hardly allow such a word as "Wrath." The violation of the divine commandments must be condoned and passed over. And it is true that God is merciful; but it is true, too, that he is the God of retribution, and justice, and holiness.

And sometimes I am deceived by the appearances which promise escape and immunity. Circumstances seem favorable to the commission of what is evil and wrong. But God's insight and foresight—ah, how wide-reaching they are, how exact, how inevitable! I cannot foil One so wise.

And sometimes I am deceived by the delays of providence. It is for repentance that my day of grace is lengthened out, it is not for carelessness and rebellion.

So let me improve the gracious respite. Meanwhile there is forgiveness with God, and plenteous redemption. I would seek his mercy. I would claim his pardon. I would enter the glorious liberty wherewith he makes me free.

Wednesday—Genesis 18, 23-33.

My praying is conformed too little to the pattern which Abraham has set me. It is too selfish. My outlook should be much larger. My soul should be less wrapped up in its own wants and its own sorrows. I belong to a kingdom of priests—priests who are intended, who are set apart, to make supplication for saints and for sinners, and for sufferers everywhere. "Beloved, let us love one another; for love is of God; and everyone that loveth is born of God and knoweth God." And the language of love, its mother tongue, is prayer.

"A frequent intercession with God," says William Law, "earnestly beseeching him to forgive the sins of all mankind, to bless them with his Spirit, and to bring them to everlasting happiness, is the divinest exercise that the heart of man can be engaged in." It must be a divine exercise; for not only did Abraham, the father of the faithful, practice it, but my Lord Jesus Christ abandoned himself to it often and gladly. And let me seek to learn better the blessed art.

Thursday—Genesis 19, 12-23.

In Jesus Christ is the City of Refuge, the way of escape from death and sin. He is the revelation of God's ceaseless and immeasurable and eternal love.

In him I have the satisfaction of sovereign justice. My own conscience, once it has been thoroughly aroused and awakened, feels what a difficult thing absolution is. It demands that sin like mine shall not be lightly passed over. It wears itself to find an availing sacrifice and atonement. "What shall I do unto Thee," it cries with Job, "O Thou Preserver of men?" Jesus is God's answer. I behold him, I flee to him, I rest in him; and my soul has life and peace. He is the Lamb who takes my sin away.

And in him, too, I have the grace which brings me into accord with the mind and government of God. My imagination, my intellect, my will, my heart—he renews them all. If he lays bare to me the ghastly wound of my nature, he does it as a Good Physician who can purge away that moral virus which is destroying me.

Thus he gives me sweet and sure release. He is my Zoar, my Shelter, my Home.

Friday—Exodus 32, 7-14.

Moses is the forerunner of Christ. He is so in more respects than one, and, not least, in his intercessions.

Christ pleased not himself. The sins and sorrows of others haunted him still. He bore them on his heart before God. He besought for them mercy to pardon and grace to help.

There were his own disciples and friends; I am sure he prayed for them individually. There were the men of his country and time, the men whom he was eager to save but whom he found it hard to win.

There was his Church in every age and land. He saw the many obstacles and changes and defeats which it would encounter. He saw how the patience of the saints would be exercised, and how the unbelievers would scoff, and how the little flock would be disposed to yield to fear. He had a great deal to think of when he knelt and prayed. He had a great multitude to supplicate for, this Remembrancer of the Lord who gave him no rest.

Perhaps I was in his thought and affection then. Perhaps my face was familiar to him when he prayed with strong cryings and tears.

Saturday—Job 42, 1-10.

Job, too, heralds and adumbrates Jesus, he prays for his friends—his friends who have been forgetting to act a friendly part towards him.

In that delightful little book, "A Day in Capernaum," Dr. Franz Delitzsch pictures Jesus, after the toil of many hours in teaching and healing, climbing upward in the evening by a stony and overgrown way to a hill that sloped down to the margin of the lake. His gaze swept over land and sea, and rested on the towns round about with greetings of peace. By-and-by he extended his arms, and pressed the whole world to his heart, and fell down with it before God. Then, after a long time of silent and intimate fellowship, he rose and walked quickly back to the town, lying now in profound sleep. The mother-in-law of Peter opened the door for him when he knocked. "Again so late, Rabboni, my Lord," she said, as she looked into those deep eyes of his; and he passed within, to snatch the shortest rest before the labors of the new day were begun.

That was not an occasional thing with Jesus, my Lord and Savior. It was his manner of living during all the months that he ministered here. And O that I might follow in his steps! O that I might learn to intercede for my friends, and for my enemies as well!

Sunday—James 5, 10-20.

I have been reading the sermons of William Guthrie, the old Covenanter of Fenwick. It is not a sickly and slipshod godliness which he inculcates; he bids his hearers rise to something better than the conventional religion of the crowd. "No almost," he says, "can reach perfection, for it hath not the nature of the thing." The saints must be "all in all or not at all."

And there is nothing he condemns more sternly than the prayers of most Christians. How pithless they are! how blunt! how feeble! lame of foot so that they cannot run to God's Throne, palsied in hand so that they cannot grasp his arm and hold him fast! "They have no bones, strength, nor edge; they will never pierce heaven." "See, sirs," he entreats the members of his congregation, "that ye stay still at his door until ye get an answer; be not like those who shoot blunt-shot, and never look where it goes."

Nay, nay; like Abraham, like Moses, like Job, like Elijah, like my Lord Jesus Christ, let my prayers be "the supplications of a righteous man which avail much in their working." Let me have done with those poor and wingless petitions which can never make their way to the presence-chamber of the King of kings.

Still freshening strength we borrow.
For where the vanguard halts to-day,
The rear shall camp to-morrow."

THE NORTHFIELD SUMMER CONFERENCES.

The personality of Dwight L. Moody, some have asserted, was the main factor in making the work at Northfield, Mass., a success. Particularly with reference to the summer conferences for Bible study and Christian workers was this believed to be true. Himself so largely inspired of God he had the power to inspire others. His earnestness and enthusiasm were contagious. He had the faculty of "making things go." But with his personal inspiration gone, his forceful presence removed, the question was raised whether people would feel the same attraction to the Northfield conferences. That doubt has been effectually removed by the evidence the summer season now drawing to a close has brought. The attendance has been larger and the interest deeper than on any previous occasion. The stability of Mr. Moody's work is a strong proof of the real greatness of the man who built it up, not to make himself famous, but on foundations for the extension of Christ's kingdom in the hearts of men.

The Northfield Student Conference, June 20-July 7, under the direction of the International Young Men's Christian Association Committee, far exceeded in attendance any previous year, and the large number of representatives from foreign countries was very noticeable. This conference followed out the usual course of training and in the matter of Bible Study classes formed a new and thorough course divided into the freshman, sophomore, junior and senior divisions. The Personal Work class was made more prominent this year than hitherto. Among those who addressed this conference were Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, Mr. Robert E. Speer, Rev. Alexander McKenzie, D. D., of Cambridge, Mass.; President Seth Low, LL. D., Columbia University, and Dr. J. Howard Taylor of the China Inland Mission.

In due sequence, from July 12-22, came the Young Women's College Conference, embracing college, city missionary, and other workers connected with the Young Women's Christian Association, and following similar lines of study to that of the young men. It had a strong list of platform speakers, including Dr. Campbell Morgan, Mrs. Margaret Sangster, Mrs. Lucy Waterbury, Mrs. A. W. Montgomery, Prof. W. W. White of Montclair, N. J., Dr. and Mrs. J. Howard Taylor of the China Inland Mission, and Mr. Robert E. Speer.

The General Conference of Christian Workers, in which Mr. Moody always took a very special interest, having as his aim for it, the deepening of Christian life and service, met for its nineteenth session August 1-18. Fully 3,000 persons attended it. The pivotal thought for the conference was given in the words from 2 Cor. 9:8: "God is able to make all grace abound toward you, that ye, having all sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work." Rev. G. Campbell Morgan expressed the belief that "we are just on the borderland of one of the most marvelous spiritual movements the world has ever seen." The opening words of an address by Rev. A. T. Pierson give the key note of his thought: "There is no indwelling of the Holy Spirit without the indwelling of the Word of God, in connection with spiritual faithfulness in all life's duties." Rev. Samuel Chadwick of Leeds, England, is prominent in the Wesleyan body there and has had special success in evangelistic effort. He is a new speaker at Northfield and was found to be helpful and uplifting in his addresses. In addition to the meetings held morning and evening, institutes to meet the needs of different classes of Christian workers were held and proved very popular. This new feature consisted of a Young People's Institute under J. Willis Baer, a musical institute under Prof. D. B. Towner of Chicago, and an institute on Christian doctrines under Rev. R. A. Torrey of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago. The Missionary Day was an especially interesting one. Meetings began at 6:30 a. m. and continued until 9 p. m. and a large number of the missionaries present gave addresses. There were in attendance about ninety different missionaries who have been in the field, both home and foreign.

A post-conference course was held from Aug. 19-26, under the direction of Rev. G. C. Morgan and Rev. Samuel Chadwick, by whom lectures were delivered daily.

A noticeable feature of these Northfield gatherings is the obliteration of denominational lines. The sermons and addresses do not reveal the denominational affiliations of the speakers, and these conferences therefore accomplish much towards bringing the members of the various religious bodies closer together as in meeting here they discover upon how large an extent of common ground they all stand.

WINONA BIBLE CONFERENCE.

The seventh annual Bible Conference, which opened at Winona Lake, Indiana, on Sunday morning, August 18th, with a record-breaking attendance, still continues. The opening sermon was preached by Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, who is director of the conference. He is well known throughout this and other countries and is a leader of evangelistic work in the United States. Although he has been sick the greater part of the summer, he has not lost interest in Winona, and the result of his work is this large Bible Conference. At least one thousand ministers are in attendance with hundreds of Christian workers, including home and foreign missionaries. Almost every denomination is represented. Lots are being sold and cottages erected. The Winona hotel has been remodeled and enlarged, but the growing attendance makes it necessary to have other hotels and boarding houses. These will no doubt be erected during the coming fall and winter.

On the grounds are the following speakers: Rev. John McNeil of Scotland, who has preached every evening, and will continue to do so until the close of the conference; Rev. George T. Purves, D. D., New York; Rev. James M. Buckley, editor of (Methodist) Christian Advocate, New York city; Rev. Cornelius Woelfkin, D. D., Brooklyn, N. Y.; Rev. W. G. Moorehead, D. D., Xenia, Ohio; Rev. George L. Robinson, D. D., Chicago, Ill.; Rev. L. W. Munhall, D. D., Philadelphia, Pa.; Mr. S. D. Gordon, Cleveland, Ohio; Mr. S. H. Hadley, of the McAuley Mission, New York city; Mr. Todd B. Hall, the detective evangelist, Baltimore, Md.; Rev. A. A. Fulton, D. D., of Canton, China; Rev. Alexander Patterson, Chicago, Ill.; Rev. R. A. Walton, D. D., Owingsville, Ky.; Mr. John Willis Baer, of Boston; Rev. Arthur J. Smith, of New York; Rev. Mr. Hotchkiss of Africa; Rev. Mr. Fenn of China, and many others.

A number of denominational meetings have been held and steps will be taken by those representing these denominations to have buildings or homes for each erected on the park, so that they can come to Winona each year and be as one family. It was the unanimous vote at all these meetings that Winona should be made a center of inter-denominational power and inspiration that will tell on the evangelization of the world. This is the greatest Bible Conference ever held in the West, and one of the greatest ever held in this country. There are at last 5,000 people on the grounds.

THE CHRISTIAN MOTHERS' UNION.

The National Christian Mothers' Union is a department of the American Society of Religious Education, an undenominational organization having headquarters at Washington, D. C. This department has for its specific object the associating of American mothers into local unions for the purpose of reading, conferences, and discussions on themes pertaining to motherhood. Especially does it undertake to discover and make popular the best methods for child culture, confident that these methods must recognize the value of the religious element in child training. The scope of its work includes affiliated organizations for young women, fathers and young men, and children. The last named are the Nature Study Circles of children which carry on their work along lines laid down by the Bureau of Nature Study, Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y. A Prayer Circle has been formed under the direction of a superintendent for purposes of united and systematic prayer in connection with the work of the organization.

The second annual meeting of the Christian Mothers' Union of New York state was held August 1 at Round Lake. Practical topics were treated in the addresses, as "Vacation Playgrounds," by Miss Anna B. Cairns of Lansingburg, N. Y.; "Girls and Their Influences," by Miss Augusta M. Britton of Brooklyn; "Homeless Children," by Mrs. E. W. Simpson of Troy; "Religious Training of Children," by Rev. L. J. Dean, D. D., of Troy; "The Child of the Future," by George E. Gorham, M. D., of Albany; "Advantages of a College Education," by Prof. Jared W. Scudder of Albany.

A Mothers' Conference was held at the same place July 22 to August 4, when the following topics were rendered: "Home Ideals"; "Girls and Their Friends"; "Health and Heredity"; "Rewards and Punishments"; "How to Teach Temperance in the Home"; "Right and Wrong Amusements"; "Industrial Training." Mrs. C. W. Edwards of Albany is the secretary of the union. She will gladly give information to those desiring it.

CHICAGO AND VICINITY.

The First Baptist church for colored people has just been organized at Chicago Heights through the efforts of Rev. Mollie B. Craft, the first regularly ordained woman minister for the colored race. Mrs. Craft was ordained in Milwaukee in 1898. She is a graduate of the Howe Baptist Theological School work began in the North, much of it being in the mining and lumber districts of northern Michigan.

Bethany Baptist church has a better attendance at its Sunday school during hot weather than some other city churches. There were 198 on the morning of August 4. There were but few empty seats at the evening service.

Holy Trinity English Lutheran church, Chicago, has secured as its pastor Rev. D. W. L. Hunton, pastor of St. John's Lutheran church, Wilkesbarre, Pa.

The Christian Commercial Traveling Men's Association will begin a two-days' rally in the First Methodist Episcopal church, August 31. The object of the convention is to establish a state camp, which probably will be located in Chicago. Several states have already organized camps, Iowa being in the lead. The national association was organized two years ago with only three members. One year later it had a membership of 600 drummers, and now 1,700 are enrolled, thus showing the rapid growth of the organization. National President S. E. Hill and National Secretary John H. Nicholson have promised to be present at the convention.

The pastors of the Rockford Methodist Conference are largely in favor of the appointment of Rev. D. M. Tompkins of Belvidere, Ill., as presiding elder.

Rev. E. G. Sanderson, now resident in Chicago, has recently been appointed superintendent of the department of agitation in the Illinois Anti-Saloon League. He comes here from Ohio, where he had charge of the Cleveland district, and before that he had charge of the Twin City district in Minnesota.

Professor Caspar Rene Gregory, D. D., LL. D., of the University of Leipzig, Germany, will deliver the oration at the summer convocation of the University of Chicago, on the campus, August 29.

Calvary church Sunday school, Sioux City, Iowa, is remarkable for the large percentage of boys attending it. Since Rev. Parker Smith became pastor, nine months, the total increase in membership has been seventeen.

One hundred members have been added to the church at Fort Scott, Kan., during the past year, about half of them the result of the special meetings. Rev. Edwin M. Griffin, the pastor, has gathered a fine band of young men workers and the outlook is encouraging.

At Independence, Iowa, a $1,500 pipe organ is a new possession dedicated August 25.

Rev. George Finley of Battle Creek, Mich., is going to the Philippines as a missionary.

Rev. Dr. Augustus H. Strong, president of the Rochester (N. Y.) Theological Seminary, desires to remove the institution to New York city. There would be heavy financial loss on buildings. No definite action has yet been taken.

Congregational.

Some Congregational churches in Minnesota have discovered the advantages of Sunday evening service held out of doors. In Merriam Park, the various churches have united in a service on the side of a hill. At Hopkins, Rev. J. B. Richardson holds the service in a lot, adjoining the church. University Avenue church, St. Paul, is using a large tent.

Rev. Andrew M. Brodie, D. D., has resigned as pastor of the First church, Manistee, Mich., to accept a call to the Congregational church at Hinsdale, Ill. He is very highly esteemed in Manistee.

The church at Elliott, Iowa, was reopened August 11, after being repaired. The Methodist, Christian and Wales Congregational church people united with the Elliott church in the services, each of the pastors taking part. The church is under the pastorate of Rev. Owen Thomas, who was called to the pastorate nearly three years ago from Hiteman, Ia., where a strong church was built under his care.

The Congregational Sunday school at Kelleyville, Ill., has been held under the trees in summer and in some cabin, if anywhere, in winter. Recently a building has been erected, and though not completed, a service held in it. The rough, scoffing crowd who gathered were quieted by the singing of gospel songs.

There was great rejoicing August 15 in the dedication at Williams Bay, Wis., of the new house of worship—the only English Protestant church in the village. The members of various denominations have worked together with great harmony under the leadership of the young pastor, Rev. W. R. Dixon. Under his direction the music on this occasion was plentiful and enjoyable. The property cost about $3,000 and the church has pledges sufficient to clear it of all debt.

Rev. C. H. Bente of Seneca, Kan., has closed a five years' pastorate to take up work at Lawton, Oklahoma. During this period about seventy-five or eighty have joined the church. All benevolences have increased. The parsonage has been repaired and enlarged, and Sunday school rooms and a fine pipe organ have been added to the church. The church unanimously adopted a resolution expressive of their sense of loss, and of the love and respect of all who knew him. Just before his departure the church and citizens presented him with a purse of $150.

The Oklahoma Summer Bible school held its second annual session at King-

They will be in southern India until September 1st, and thereafter in Bombay. They left May 1st, and are expecting to be absent until November.

Federation of the interests of the various Congregational societies has been most successfully tried in the Republican Valley, Nebraska. A systematic presentation of the whole field of Congregational benevolence was made at each meeting and the offerings of the churches were largely increased.

The Disciples.

There are 1,675 churches of Christ in Missouri but nearly 1,000 of them have no regular preaching, not even once a month.

The Church Extension Board secured lots in all the important towns at the opening of the Indian lands. Rev. J. M. Monroe of El Reno, Rev. A. B. Carpenter of Norman, and Rev. V. Williams, the field superintendent, have been located with tents at Anadarko, Lawton and Hobart, respectively, and are holding services and gathering congregations. At Sickles also lots have been secured.

Slida, Colo., is a town of 4,000 people having eighteen saloons and four large gambling houses. It is a difficult field for church work, but the Church of Christ there is self-supporting, and at the mid-week prayer meetings the attendance is seldom less than forty. The Christian Endeavor Society conducts a prayer meeting at the poor house one Sunday afternoon in each month, and has placed a Bible in each room of the largest hotel, also in the hospital and poor house. The Christian Woman's Board of Missions Auxiliary supports a teacher in a foreign land. This church also contributes to the state work.

As a result of a meeting at Troy, Texas, eighty-two have been added to the church.

The colored people at Waco, Texas, have laid the corner stone of a $2,500 house.

Rev. Paul McReynolds says that the membership of the church in Redlands, Cal., has nearly doubled in the past year, and they are building a beautiful little church.

The Macatawa Assembly has enjoyed some very helpful Bible Study lectures by Prof. Lloyd of Oakland, California.

Rev. Jesse Walden died August 17 of pneumonia at the home of ex-Senator Napier, Lancaster, Ky. For the last ten years he had been engaged in evangelistic work throughout the state.

The Northwest Ohio Ministerial Association of the Disciples of Christ held two sessions, one at the Walbridge Park, on the banks of the Maumee river, and the other in the Central Church building, Toledo. The attendance was good. Various ministers spoke on the topic: "How to Get all the Members of the Church to Work." Miss Shaffer of St. Louis presented the needs of the "Benevolent Association of the Christian Church," whose headquarters are in that city. J. A. Lord of Cincinnati, Ohio, delivered the afternoon and night addresses on "The Freedom of the Truth," and "Doctrines and Present Conditions of the World."

Ocean View, Delaware, has the only congregation of the Disciples in that state. It was organized forty years ago. They have just completed a new edifice which was dedicated August 11. At the morning service $500 was asked for to remove all debt on the building. The membership only numbers fifty, not one of them worth over $2,000, and the majority less than $500, yet $607 was pledged at once, of which $200 was paid on the spot.

The Disciples of Christ have rented the Unitarian church building in Winona, Minn., and will hold services there. Rev. William Boice is to be the pastor of this new work which is under the direction of the Minnesota Christian Missionary Society.

Episcopal.

The Girls' Friendly Society of Massachusetts sustain summer homes for women and girls who have not the means for vacation expenses. "Broadview" has a family of fifty-eight persons, and "Restcroft" one numbering fourteen. These homes opened June 22 and will close September 18. A chapel is attached, seating seventy.

Rev. Charles Trotman, rector of the Church of the Redeemer, St. Louis, has just completed three years of medical study and has received the degree of M. D. Rev. Mr. Higson, who is taking charge of Mr. Trotman's parish while the latter is in Europe, is in the midst of a similar course. Their object, it is understood, is simply that they may be more useful in their parishes by relieving suffering among those who cannot afford a physician's services.

The ladies of St. Paul's church, Alton, Ill., have cancelled the last of the indebtedness on their church, having paid up a mortgage of twelve years' standing. The mortgage was made when an accidental landslide caused the whole east side of the rectory, adjoining the church, to cave in. The building was wrecked and has since been out of the possession of the church. It will now be turned over to St. Paul's for the use of the rector, Rev. H. M. Chittenden.

Methodist.

The deaconesses connected with the Methodist work in Milwaukee have arranged for a two weeks' outing for twenty-five mothers and 100 children from Milwaukee. The Wisconsin Central furnished transportation to Waupaca, the Waupaca electric road and the boat line on the Chain o' Lakes gave free conveyance to Camp Cleg-horn, which with hotel, tents and sixteen acres of ground on the bank of the Columbia Lake, was donated by the Good Templars who own grounds, for the visitors without a cent of cost for the two weeks. The board of the Wisconsin Veterans' Home, the people of Waupaca and the farmers around the camp unite in furnishing provision for the company.

Rev. A. H. Henry of the First Methodist church, Salt Lake, has accepted a call to the Mountain View church at Butte, Mont. His five years' pastorate in Salt Lake has been very successful. Rev. Dr. James F. Albritton, whom he succeeds at Butte, will exchange places with him, becoming his successor at Salt Lake.

The Methodists are making a strenuous effort to secure the endowment of a number of beds in the general hospital at Seattle which is under their care. The institution is finely equipped and conducted.

At the Utah Methodist Conference held at Ogden, August 16, the work was reported to be in a very encouraging condition. There has been an increase of 20 per cent in the membership of the churches during the past year and an advance of $420 in the receipts from collections. Dr. W. A. Spencer of Chicago delivered the principal address of the evening. He stated that the Methodist church membership was equal to that of all the other evangelical denominations.

The tent meetings being held in St. Paul, Minn., are attracting large audiences. Bishop Joyce preached at the opening of the series, but, for the most

A NOVEL WAY.

To Keep Grape-Nuts Crisp.

A novel way of opening a package of food is shown on the Grape-Nuts package, where a line indicates that a slit should be made with a knife, and the package squeezed, which makes it gap enough to pour out what is needed for a meal, then the package automatically closes, preserving the contents from the moisture of the air.

As a rule, Grape-Nuts packages are not kept on hand very long in any family, but it is well to know how to keep the contents of the package in prime condition. Grape-Nuts Food is ready cooked, very crisp, and can be served immediately with a little cream or milk. This feature is of great advantage to those who appreciate ease and convenience in preparing breakfast.

part the preaching is done by the pastors. The tent is placed in the heart of the business part of the city and the meetings will be continued until September 1.

Presbyterian.

The Arlington Hills church, St. Paul, Minn., laid the corner stone of its new building, August 14. Rev. A. E. Driscoll, the pastor, has been active in the forwarding of this enterprise which was just started fifteen months ago. The building is now partially completed and it is hoped that it can be dedicated about December 1. Addresses were made on the occasion of the corner-stone laying by Mr. D. R. Noyes, who has done much to foster the growth of the church, Rev. D. D. McKay of Minneapolis, Rev. J. N. McInnis, Rev. F. H. Shedd and Mr. Thomas Dixon.

The Philadelphia evangelistic campaign has an average weekly attendance of 15,000. Seven tents are being used. One Christian worker is given entire charge, in addition to the speaker, in connection with each tent, in visiting from house to house and in following up the inquirers. Some workers have visited seventy-five homes a day. In many of the homes where the workers at first were not welcomed, they are now urged to visit and conduct cottage prayer meeting.

The Rev. Malcolm J. McLeod of Pasadena had the pleasure of welcoming thirty-seven to membership at the recent communion; of these fifteen were by confession of faith.

Alma College, at Alma, Michigan, is building a new hall, five stories high, stone and brick. It will accommodate 100 young ladies with their teachers, giving them sitting rooms and bedrooms.

Though a town of 500 inhabitants, Summerland, California, has never had an orthodox church until very lately, when, acting under the authority of the Presbytery of Santa Barbara, the Rev. W. E. Dodge of Montecito organized Bethany church. The membership is composed of people from the various denominations. The congregation has bought four lots, located on a commanding site, and is building a neat and commodious house of worship.

At the August communion service twenty-two persons were received into the church at Fremont, Nebr., eighteen on confession of faith. The Rev. C. W. Weyer took charge of the work June 1.

The Second church of Lincoln, Nebr., is moving forward steadily under the pastoral oversight of the Rev. B. M. Long, D. D., who welcomed twenty-eight new members at the July communion, making nearly 200 accessions since he took charge of the church two years since. Two wide-awake mission schools are in progress, one supported by the Sunday school, the other by the Senior C. E. Society. Nearly 900 are enrolled in these schools. The pastor teaches a class of seventy-five young men and women.

The first church of Racine, Wis., has received $1,000 as a memorial of Mrs. M. B. Erskine, presented by Chas. Erskine, Mrs. Miles and Mrs. Crosby. The gift is to be expended immediately on repairs about the church property. The organ is to be entirely rebuilt and remodeled.

The fifteenth annual meeting of the Cumberland Presbyterian Sabbath school assembly of Missouri, in session at Pertle Springs, near Warrensburg, Mo., is the largest that has been held since the organization of the assembly fifteen years ago. The attendance has reached the 3,000 point. Professor Sylvester Burnham, D. D., of Colgate University, Mrs. Mary Foster Bryner, Rev. Judson Smith, D. D., of Boston, Rev. Z. T. Sweeney, late U. S. consul-general to Turkey; Miss Frances Magbee of Elkhart, Ind., and others have taken part.

General.

Rev. Joseph Jones of the Jerry McAuley Cremorne Mission has been holding services in one of the worst places in New York City—the Haymarket dance hall. A band of loyal helpers from the Young Men's Christian Association and some of the large missions have assisted him.

The Brooklyn Christian Endeavor Union is sending a delegation of men on the trolley cars making evening trips to Coney Island, to sing hymns on the cars to counteract the influence of the vile songs sung by the young men who travel on that line.

Foreign Missionary Items.

Twenty-nine members of the adult C. E. Society of the Bombay church, India, are engaged in street preaching, sixty-five in Sabbath-school work, and a good number in tract distribution, visiting hospitals and other efforts. These responsibilities have led the church to feel that the evangelization of this country must be accomplished by Indian Christians.

The twenty-fifth anniversary of Central Turkey College (Congregational) and the plans for a summer school to be held at the close of the meeting of the conference drew a larger attendance of college graduates and delegates and visitors from neighboring cities than usual, and gave special importance to the educational interests of the mission. Considerable time was given to the discussion of the establishment of a Home Missionary Society, plans for which were formulated a year since. One strong point in favor of establishing this society is the fact that over one-third of all the churches in this field are already wholly self-supporting, and that many of these stronger churches have been for a considerable time carrying on small and independent missions in various places.

Mrs. W. M. Upercraft writes of some work in Western China as follows: Mr. Upercraft, with native colporters, has visited and worked in many parts of the district, including the Lalo field, where he succeeded in getting into closer touch with interesting and needy people. Accompanied by native women, I had also made visits—too few and short—in several of the country places. In some places inquiries sprang up, one, two or three at a time. But the largest number came from a district practically unworked by the missionary—Tien-chuan, a mountainous region lying about twenty miles northwest of Yachow. The gospel first entered this field through colportage work. Gospel portions fell into the hands of some of the men, who read them eagerly and realized that they had found something for which they had long sought,—a Savior who could take away sin and give peace to their hearts now and a sure hope beyond the grave. There were many hungering souls who gladly received the Bread of Life, both men and women. The climax of numbers was reached in the third month, when seventy or

HARD TO PLEASE.

Regarding the Morning Cup.

"Oh, how hard it was to part with coffee, but the continued trouble with constipation and belching was such that I finally brought myself to leave it off.

"Then the question was, what should we use for the morning drink? Tea was worse for us than coffee; chocolate and cocoa we soon tired of; milk was not liked very well, and hot water we could not endure.

"About two years ago we struck upon Postum Food Coffee, and have never been without it since. We have seven children. Our baby now eighteen months old would not take milk, so we tried Postum and found she liked it and it agreed with her perfectly. She is to-day, and has been, one of the healthiest babies in the State. I use about two-thirds Postum and one-third milk and a teaspoon of sugar, and put it into her bottle. If you could have seen her eyes sparkle and hear her say "good" to-day when I gave it to her, you would believe me that she likes it.

"If I was matron of an infants' home, every child would be raised on Postum. Many of my friends say, 'You are looking so well!' I reply, 'I am well; I drink Postum Food Coffee. I have no more trouble with constipation, and know that I owe my good health to God and Postum Food Coffee.'

"I am writing this letter because I want to tell how much good the Postum has done us, but if you knew how I shrink from publicity, you would not publish this letter,—at least not over my name."—Milford, O.

more came in to spend three or four days that they might hear the gospel more fully. So wholly absorbed were they that the parade of the city god, which attracts thousands of country people, failed to elicit any sign of interest from them—they did not even go to the end of the lane to see it go by! Special meetings were held for men and women. The latter seemed to drink in the truth for which (to use their words) they "had been seeking for long years." And when, on Sunday evening, some sixty or more men and women arose on opposite sides of the chapel, indicating thus their desire to be saved and follow Jesus, do you wonder that our hearts were full of a great joy?

Another report from China says: Recently two Chinese rai elders, accompanied Mr. Dodd on a week's pastoral round of six villages in two sub-provinces. It was a week of hard traveling through mud and mire. It was also a week of hard work. Six adults were examined, and they with eleven children were baptized. The communion was administered five times in as many places. Immediately following this tour, two other elders spent two days in a similar work, examining seven adults and assisting in two communions. All this hard travel and hard work was done by these four elders, simply as a part of their duty as members of the session, and without pay. One of them is a carpenter, who would have commanded twenty-five rupees per month had he stayed at home. Another had planned to raise a building to be used as a rice granary, on the morning of the very day on which he afterwards cheerfully went out on church work. Surely the Kingdom is coming.

HELP YOUR PREACHER.

Many a preacher has utterly failed in his work because of lack of support and sympathy and encouragement from those with whom he labors. He has a great deal of human nature in him, just like others, and appreciates kindness and sympathy as much as any one else. There are many things you can do that will encourage him in his work, and some things that will have the opposite effect. The purpose of this article is to show how you can help your preacher make a success of his ministry.

First of all, he ought to stand very close to you in his personal as well as pastoral relation. If he is a little backward in this respect try to show him by your affable manner that you are deeply interested in the success of his work, and that you regard him as your friend. Take him into your confidence, advise with him and be free to tell him your feelings, and it will not only help you, but will place him in a position where he can no doubt be a great blessing to you. Don't repeat to him every little criticism and slur that you may hear concerning him and his work. He knows he is not perfect, and he has his faults, and to tell him these things continually will only annoy him and discourage him the more in his work. But when you hear any one speak kindly of him tell him, for it will inspire him to do his very best. Kind words are always a helpful tonic. The beautiful sentiments expressed in the motto of the Elks will always be productive of good: "The faults of our brothers we write upon the sands; their virtues upon the tablets of love and memory."

Then always be in your place at all the public services of the church. Don't let your presence be determined by the state of the weather, but remember it is your duty to be present at these services. You are needed at Sunday school and at the mid-week prayer meeting, and your presence will be an inspiration to him in his work, for when he feels that his people are deeply interested in spiritual things and in the success of the church he realizes that his work is not in vain. You will also help your preacher by giving him good attention while he preaches, and you will help him still more by praying for him before you go to the house of worship. When the services seem dull to you and his preaching dry don't blame him always for it, but remember that the fault may be with you. Your physical condition may be such that you are in no fix to enter heartily into the worship. There are very few men who can preach to a listless or a prayerless congregation. If you can make him feel that you are in sympathy with him and are praying continually for his success, it will go a long way to bring out of him all the service that he is capable of rendering you.

Don't expect too much of him. Don't criticize him unnecessarily. Don't speak unkindly of him to others. Don't blame him for every little thing that goes wrong in the church. But give him your support, give him your encouragement, and you will not only be a blessing to him, but he will be a blessing to you.

Midway, Ky. GEORGE W. KEMPER.

"How often people's books are better than themselves, how often they are better than their conversation! It is not that these things are in fact the souls of these persons, and what they would be but for some contingent circumstances that make them otherwise; these things are the men without their persons and passions and personal weaknesses."—Lord Houghton.

BOOKS

The Practical Life Work of Henry Drummond, With Bibliography, by Cuthbert Lennox, and with an Introduction by Hamilton W. Mabie. James Pott and Company, New York. 227 Pages. Price one dollar net.

The author who writes under the nom de plume of Cuthbert Lennox was intimately associated with Professor Drummond in the Edinburg Student Movement. He writes in large measure from personal knowledge and gives an inside view of Drummond and his work. Very little is attempted in the way of analysis of character. Drummond is allowed to speak for himself, and the works which he did are allowed to bear witness of him. This work is not a condensation of the larger work of Professor George Adam Smith. It has a place of its own. In a measure it is supplemental to that work. It furnishes a mass of new material, and whereas Professor Smith's book gives Drummond as he appeared to the circle of his chosen friends, this book gives Drummond in the many-sidedness of his rich and eventful public life. It is hence a book for the people, and ought to find a large audience.

The personality that stands revealed in these pages is altogether an attractive one. In Drummond's character strength and beauty were harmoniously united. Men might question his orthodoxy; no one ever questioned his sincerity. He rung true. He was free from cant and affectation. His religion was natural and human.

No doubt he owned not a little to birth and breeding. He came from a good stock; but what nature began, grace completed. The air of distinction which he carried with him was not connected with social aloofness. In his manner there was nothing of condescension; he did not require to come down to the level of the workingman among whom he labored, for he met them upon the common plane of humanity. His touch was not official, but brotherly.

With a wisdom that is rare he recognized his own limitations, and in his teaching and work kept to his own chosen line. The burden of the Lord which was upon him he carried joyfully, but he did not believe in picking up some other man's burden. He had his own vision of truth and hence his own message. There were wide regions of truth into which he never sought to enter. As one of his intimate friends said of him, "He had no quarrel with the traditional evangelism, but there were many points in the traditional evangelism on which he simply laid no emphasis. He found the heart of Christianity in a personal friendship with Christ and it was his ambition as an evangelist to introduce man to Christ." In the same way he restricted his activities, devoting himself to a limited number of special causes. To one application for his assistance he replied: "I have never had time to make a specialty of Temperance and am quite unable to lecture on the subject." To a request that he would give an address to business men he sent the laconic reply, "I do not know the species."

Of the varied aspects of his character and work this book gives a realistic picture. It throws light upon the unreasoning opposition which he met from the narrow evangelicals because of his views on evolution and inspiration. He saw, as he himself expressed it, that "if science is to become religious, religion must become scientific;" and he sought to mediate between science and religion; but the world has a way of crucifying its mediators. The partisan gets the backing of his party; the man of independence stands alone. So in spite of his immense popularity Drummond was a lonely man. His friendship with Moody was one of the most potent influences in his life. This friendship continued to the very last. The two men had looked into each other's souls. Drummond said of Moody that he was the "biggest human" he had ever met, and Moody, when the charge of heresy was brought against his friend refused to withdraw from him the hand of fellowship. Now that they have met where the strife of tongues is never heard and the shadows have passed away, they are both well satisfied that what God had joined together no man was allowed to put asunder.

A Practical Treatise upon Christian Perfection by William Law, Edited by L. H. M. Soulsby, Longmans, Green and Co., London and New York.

William Law, "the greatest of English mystics," is spoken of by the historian, Gibbon, as "a pious man who believed all that he professed and practiced all that he enjoined." He was one of the most important factors in shaping the religious experience of Whitfield and Wesley. The latter characterizes his best known book, "A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life," as one of the most remarkable books ever written.

It is about two hundred years since William Law wrote his books, yet they still live. They have always had a chosen circle of readers who have prized them above all price. They are written in a simple and direct style, in English pure and undefiled. They search the soul as with a lighted candle. They are unsparing in their condemnation of sin and hold up before the Christian the loftiest ideals. Their conception of the Christian life may be a trifle too much after the monastic fashion, their separation between the secular and the sacred may not be in harmony with modern thought.

yet there are in them elements of permanent worth which give them a place among the masterpieces of devotional literature.

The volume before us is one of Law's most characteristic works. In this edition it has been somewhat abridged; but in such a way as not to destroy the continuity of its thought, or the power of its appeal. It is gotten up in a manner inviting to the eye, as a devotional book should be.

THE HOME

The "Noisy Seven."

I wonder if he remembers—
That good old man in heaven—
The class in the old red schoolhouse
Known as the "Noisy Seven."

I wonder if he remembers
How restless we used to be,
Or thinks we forgot the lessons
Of Christ and Gethsemane.

I wish I could tell the story
As he used to tell it then;
I'm sure that, with Heaven's blessing,
I could reach the hearts of men.

That voice so touchingly tender Comes down to me through the years—
A pathos which seemed to mingle
His own with the Saviour's tears.

I often wish I could tell him—
Though we caused him so much pain
By our thoughtless, boyish frolic—
His labors were not in vain.

I'd like to tell him how Harry,
The merriest one of all,
From the bloody field of Shiloh
Went home at the Master's call.

I'd like to tell him how Stephen,
So brimming with mirth and fun,
Now tells the heathen of China
The tale of the Crucified One.

I'd like to tell him how Joseph,
And Philip, and Jack, and Jay,
Are honored among the churches,
The foremost men of their day.

I'd like, yes, I'd like to tell him
What his lessons did for me,
And how I'm trying to follow
That Christ of Gethsemane.

Perhaps he knows it already,
For Harry has told, maybe,
That we are coming—coming Through Christ of Gethsemane.

How many besides I know not
Will gather at last in heaven,
The fruit of that faithful sowing,
But the sheaves will surely be seven.
—Selected.

Which Duty.

Two neighbors were standing at the top of the steps that led to Mrs. Benson's broad, vine-wreathed veranda. Mrs. McNair, who had just run in for a minute's call, and was now taking her leave, paused and looked to the east, where the hills were glowing with autumn's russet and gold, and beyond a rim of blue water sparkled in the sun.

"How lovely!" she exclaimed, involuntarily.

"Yes," answered Mrs. Benson, "some say it is a pretty view. I don't get much chance to notice it myself. Takes most all my time looking after the inside of the house."

"Oh, but you mustn't forget to look outside now and then, too," laughed the visitor. "One gets shortsighted living in doors all the time."

"Well, I don't know; the work has been given us to do, and I guess we're intended to do it. There isn't much gained by shirking or complaining."

"No, indeed; but there are a good many little things in a house, you know, that have to be done over and over, and one doesn't want to get little-minded doing them."

"I often say to myself when I go about my work, or when I settle down to a heap of darning, 'This is what has been given me to do—it is for the Master's service, it is for the Master's service,' and it helps to keep me contented," replied Mrs. Benson.

"But are you not afraid of becoming too contented?" persisted Mrs. McNair. "What do you mean?"

"Why, the Master might have some other service for you to do, and you would be so contented with the darning that you'd never know it."

Mrs. Benson looked into the bright face half smiling, half serious, with a somewhat puzzled air.

"I try to do the duty that comes first," she said, somewhat vaguely.

"But suppose the second one is the more important," said the visitor. "You know, people sometimes get holes in their minds or hearts as well as in their stockings, and I'm always afraid if I put too much care on the one I may overlook the other. I believe in doing our duty, too; but I often have to stop and ask myself, 'Which duty?' There are so many, you know."

"But you surely do not think a woman ought to neglect her housekeeping?" said Mrs. Benson.

"Oh, no; we must be thorough housekeepers; but, as we are more than machines, machine labor, it seems to me, does not clear us of responsibilities."

Mrs. Benson looked off into space, and a slight shade crossed the somewhat colorless face.

"My mother was a good woman," she said, presently. "She was faithful to her household duties and to her children. She brought us up in the fear of the Lord, and to do humbly and thankfully the duty that was set before us. I don't know that I can improve her way or service."

"No," replied Mrs. McNair, heartily, "we cannot improve on the spirit of our mother's training, but the letter of it may need some alteration. As times change, needs change. Our children are open to some dangers that our mother's children were not—changes that come of different social standards and aims, and of less firmly rooted beliefs. We must be alive to these things and to our increased responsibilities, or we shall not have the success our mothers had."

She ran lightly down the steps.

"Oh, may I have one of your pretty pink asters? What a mere hint of color!

One cannot help wanting to smell it, it looks so fragrant, but I suppose we mustn't ask everything of one plant."

Mrs. Benton was more deliberate in her movements. She followed her guest down the steps, and, gathering some pale-purple and pink asters, stood thoughtfully with them in her hand.

"There must be something in what you say," she began, "but it often seems to me there's too much running after this and that nowadays—conventions, and societies, and ladies' aid, and no knowing what all. I often say I find enough to do to keep things straight at home, and I don't see how other women find time for so much running about."

"I know," replied Mrs. McNair, "there is danger both ways; but there is a golden mean for everything, and I'm trying to find it for this; and when I do, I'm going to stick to it."—The Lookout.

On the Pan-American Esplanade.

It was a hot, still evening on the Esplanade; but round the Court of Fountains a refreshing breeze played. The cooling plash of softly falling waters; wreaths of colored lights floating like glorified water-lilies on the rippling surface of the water; the regular, musical dip of the gondolier's oar; and brilliant illuminations beneath the quiet radiance of a glorious full moon, lent a dreamy, fairy-like witchery to the scene. Prosperous-looking men and gayly dressed women, merry boys and girls, and bright-faced young men and maidens passed constantly to and fro, laughing and talking blithely, or pausing to listen to the strains of melody floating forth from the band-stands close at hand.

Around the stand where Sousa's perfectly trained men were playing, a large and appreciative throng had gathered, drinking in, spellbound, the exquisite harmony of the combined instruments. As selection after selection was rendered, each was succeeded by a burst of enthusiastic applause. Suddenly upon the evening air fell softly like a prayer, the sweet, familiar strains of "Nearer, my God, to Thee." The effect was instantaneous and remarkable. Laughter and talking ceased, and over every face stole an expression of reverent awe. Young and old, careworn and thoughtless, worldly and spiritual, every listener was deeply moved. Tears were in many eyes; men's hats were silently removed; and even the most frivolous and light-hearted were brought beneath the magic spell as the melody rose and fell in softly swelling cadences.

When the third movement or variation began, the audience by a common impulse began to sing, softly at first, then louder and louder, until the volume of song carried one irresistibly back to the days of a great Christian Endeavor convention. As the last note died away, a moment's hush succeeded; then applause, fervent and long-continued, filled the air,—applause such as not even the loved "Star-Spangled Banner" or "America" itself, the air so dear alike to American and Briton, had power to evoke. The old, familiar fireside hymn had gone straight to the hearts of the hearers, and awakened an instant response.—Alice Miller Weeks, in The Christian Endeavorer World.

Speak Like You Do When You Laugh.

A baby of three years, says a recent writer, once preached me a sermon, and I pass it on for the benefit of other downcast and despondent ones who need to learn to "rejoice evermore."

"How is the baby?" I asked, drearily, standing at the foot of the staircase leading up to a chamber where the little one lay ill. I was tired, unhopeful; my mood came out in my tone.

"Peak like you do when you laugh," called the weak little voice upstairs; and if ever I felt rebuked by an angel, that was the moment. It has come to me a hundred times since; I hope I am brighter and cheerier for it.

"Speak like you do when you laugh." That means sparkle and gladness and good will. Those fretful lines at the mouth-corner don't come from laughing. The weary ones around the eyes have another origin. But the plainest outward sign of despondency is that in the tone. The sick feel it; that is why "visitors are forbidden." Little children are infallible weather prophets; they will not "take to" you. And you and I—just common working men and women, neither sick nor young nor old, but busy and often tired—we love—yes, that is the word—we love the bright, loving, laughing, happy voice. "Speak like you do when you laugh."—Selected.

The Mother's Loving Eyes.

One of the greatest artists tells a story of his school days. He was the son of a widow, and he was sent to a grammar school, and only once a month could he see and speak to his mother. But she loved him so dearly, and so desired to be near him, that she took a house which overlooked the school play-ground, and every day, when the boys were at their games, she was watching at the window. He soon found it out, and from that time he was ashamed to do anything wrong or mean. He always thought of those loving eyes; they seemed to be watching him even in his chamber, and it helped to keep him straight and true. Boys, God's love is stronger than a mother's, and if we were to go to Africa or China, his love would still follow us. He is always watching us.

Let us not do anything that we can not ask his blessing on. It seems a wonderful power, does it not, to know and see all and hear all? One of the grand attributes of our heavenly Father is his omniscience; that is, knowing all things. Another is his omnipresence; that is, present in all places. Another is his omnipotence; that is, possessing unlimited power.—National Advocate.

Meaning of State Names.

Alabama is believed to mean "the land of rest," though one authority claims the name means a glade or thicket of trees.

California bears the name the Franciscan monks gave to Cortez, and is explained as meaning calida fornax, "hot furnace." It is probable the name was taken from a romance published in 1510 describing California as an imaginary island abounding in gold and jewels.

Illinois took its name from the Illinois tribe of Indians, who in turn were really the Illini or Illiniwok, "the men."

Kentucky is a native name, and means bloody ground. Many conflicts took place there in early days.

Oklahoma means "the beautiful land." Strange to say, it consists of prairie.

The name Oregon is derived from the Spanish oregano, "wild marjoram," or "wood sage," which grows abundantly in that state.

Rhode Island may have taken its name from the ancient island of Rhodes or from the name of an early settler, but it is probable the name came about because of the fine anchorage and roadstead between the island and the mainland.

Wisconsin takes its name from the Wisconsin river, which was derived from Miskonsing, "wild, rushing channel," bestowed on it by Joliet.

Montana means land of mountains.

Maryland was named in honor of Queen Henrietta Maria, being called Terra Mariae in the charter first given.—Chicago News.

Tom's Bees.

Tom walked along the country road, his hands deep in his pockets and something on his mind which tied his forehead into a perfect hard knot of lines. He wasn't even whistling, which was very unusual; he had tried to begin, but his lips drooped down so at the corners it seemed impossible to pucker them.

If he had only begun to be anxious a little bit sooner—but how could a fellow keep letting things slip out of his mind when other things so much more interesting were everywhere about him?

The trouble lay in a certain promise, made nearly three months before and promptly forgotten—a promise to pay one dollar into the King's Workers' treasury at the end of the quarter. Surely nobody ever saw three months fly by so rapidly before, but the end of the quarter had almost come and he hadn't a dollar—nor a dime—nor even a cent!

The worst of it was that he had spent that much for things he didn't really need, and his conscience gave a twinge that made him jump as he remembered his self-denial box as empty as it could be. If he had thought to tell mother sooner, she would have helped him remember, but as it was she only looked grave and told him that a pledge was a very solemn thing and that he must keep it by all means. But she didn't say one word about helping him, and Tom knew that she had peculiar ideas about boys giving their own money, not somebody else's.

On the whole Tom felt so blue that old Don walked beside him quite soberly and sympathetically instead of capering over the fields as he usually did.

Tom spoke to him at last. "It's just this way, Don, I'd pray for it but I'm ashamed to. It looks so mean for a fellow to use up everything on himself and then ask God to give him something extra to do good with. No, sir, the most I'll do will be to ask him to show me some way to earn it myself, and if he will I'll promise not to shirk. Let's crawl through that hole in the hedge, Don, and I'll kneel down in the shade and ask him about it."

A little later Tom and Don saw a very queer object hanging from a bare branch over in the field, and going closer to examine Tom uttered a shout that made the echoes ring. "Bees, Don—a swarm of 'em. Come quick!" Away they sped—the two brown feet and the four black ones—over the dusty road till home was reached, a suitable box and an old window screen procured, and then Uncle Bob hurried back with his excited nephew and Don. There it was, to be sure, a big swarm, and they got it safely housed and the screen over it almost before the bees realized what was happening. Tom had a rapidly swelling eyelid, and a finger that smarted and burned, but he didn't complain—it was part of the price he had to pay for the privilege of earning the money. "I promised I would work fair and square, and I did, Uncle Bob, didn't I?" he asked anxiously.

"That's what you did, sir. Who did you promise?" asked Uncle Bob, shouldering the precious load.

"God," replied Tom reverently. "And I think I ought to help carry it home, please, Uncle Bob."

He sold the bees for exactly one dollar, after he had kept them forty-eight hours under the apple trees and tramped several miles to find a purchaser. He was much surprised, when the screen was taken away, to find on it several inches of honeycomb.

"If I'd begin things like they do, right straight, I guess it'd be better," he declared.

That night he and mother had a good talk about it. "I know God helped me to see that swarm," he said as he balanced the silver dollar on his knee. "'Cause I felt so sorry I hadn't been looking at anything till I prayed. Then I felt so good I lifted up my head, and there was the answer to my prayer!"

"Yes, laddie," said mother, "that is always the best way out of trouble. Ask God to help you, then lift up your head and look for his answer."

The very next day Tom's dollar clinked heavily down into the collection box to join several companions, all bent on a mission of helpfulness.

The sting on his eye was pretty sore, and his feet were blistered from his long walk, but his heart was light and his conscience clear, for he had kept his promise.—Elizabeth Price in The Christian Work.

Unless there is a reserve of enthusiasm stored on the hills the humblest wheel cannot be driven in the valley. He who contributes just this one rare thing—self-sacrificing devotion—to his cause has done his part. Six hundred English dragoons once received a foolish order and rode to their deaths like heroes. "Magnificent," said a French general, "but not war." It was magnificent, and perhaps it was war; for it fired the imagination of England and raised the standard of duty for a country.....One who can plan is good; far better is the man who can stimulate.....History affords at every turn some impregnable fortress that was a despair of the wise and prudent, but was carried by some enthusiast with a rush. He cast his reputation, his life all into the breach, and his body made the bridge over which the race has entered into its heritage.—Ian Maclaren.

Former Judge Henry E. Howland has a deservedly high reputation as an after-dinner speaker. It is his practice to connect five minutes of serious talk with twenty-five minutes of storytelling. All his stories are apropos and most of them are new. At the dinner of St. David's Society the other night the judge was in a happy vein. The anecdote which was received with the greatest laughter was that of the little boy who was considerably puzzled by the theory of evolution. One day he said to his mother:

"Mamma, am I descended from a monkey?"

"I don't know," she answered; "I never met any of your father's people."—New York Mail and Express.

Christian Melodies

BY PROF. WM. J. KIRKPATRICK

Professor Wm. J. Kirkpatrick, the author of CHRISTIAN MELODIES, is one of the leading and best known gospel song writers in the world today. His songs have been sung the world over in almost every town. Some of his songs have been translated and sung in all languages. He has the advantage of many years of experience as a musician and song writer, and has put the best productions of his life time, as well as the best songs of the principal song writers of the country, into CHRISTIAN MELODIES. This certainly insures for this book the greatest variety and the best quality of songs.

A Book of the Rarest Musical Gems

This is the universal pronouncement of all musicians who have used or examined this new and popular song book. All responses from those using the book are enthusiastic praises. "Best book of the kind I have ever seen." "The more we use it the better we like it." "Gets better all the time;" etc. These are samples of expressions received. No other book on the market approaches it as an all-purpose church song book. It is mechanically perfect, neat, artistic and durable. It contains 192 pages and 227 songs.

FAC-SIMILE OF COVER, REDUCED.

PROF. WM. J. KIRKPATRICK.

THE CHOICEST SONGS OF THE CENTURY

Every song writer has a few favorite songs—or those which he regards as his best—and which make for the author his reputation. Every musician has also his own peculiar style. A book written principally by one man does not excel, as it has no variety of style and but a few very good songs. In CHRISTIAN MELODIES, eighty leading song writers have contributed their favorite or best songs. This insures not only a collection of the most excellent songs, but also the greatest variety of style. This is why people never grow tired of the songs in CHRISTIAN MELODIES. Besides its large number of the latest songs it contains a great many of the old songs that have become popular favorites and never die.

No expense was spared in the production of this book. The best songs were secured regardless of their cost. Many very good songs were rejected because not good enough. No other book shows such care and judgment in excluding the inferior and including only the best. No cheap devices or make shifts, such as rivets were used in binding. It is a hand sewed book, which is the best and most expensive style of binding. If you want the most popular, best wearing and most satisfactory all-around song book get Christian Melodies, pronounced by all who have used it, "A Book of Gems." It is the best and cheapest.

Does This Interest You?

The Christian Century is a new undenominational religious weekly published to meet a wide and growing demand for a paper that is thoroughly evangelical and abreast of the ripest scholarship, an authority on pure literature, and a medium of communication between the different denominations. Its aim will be to give a record and an interpretation of the leading events in the religious world. It will seek at once to mirror and to mould religious thought and life. In the sweep of its vision and the breadth of its sympathies it will endeavor to be as wide as Christianity itself. In a word, it will stand for essential and universal Christianity.

Promoters and Contributors

Behind this undertaking are men of the highest financial standing. The Editorial management is in the hands of Professor W. Douglas Mackenzie, D. D., of the Chicago Theological Seminary, Rev. James M. Campbell, D. D., well known through his numerous books, and Prof. Herbert L. Willett, Ph. D., of the University of Chicago. These men are known as leaders in modern thought and scholarship. Some of the ablest scholars and writers of America and Europe will contribute to its columns. On the list are such names as Dr. Marcus Dods of Scotland, Dr. Washington Gladden, Dr. Amory H. Bradford, Dr. Josiah Strong, Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, Professor Graham Taylor, etc. Dr. Wm. Adamson, editor of The Christian News, Glasgow, Scotland, will furnish an occasional British letter, and an original story by Dr. Clarence A. Vincent, of Galesburg, Ill., will appear in the early fall numbers. During the fall and winter months a series of special numbers will be issued giving Symposiums on the practical aspects of Christian work. These will be followed by a series on the Fad Religions of the day, and these in turn by a series on such vital questions as The Second Coming of Christ. These are but suggestive hints of special features which will combine to make The Christian Century an interesting and timely religious journal.

How You May Aid the Enterprise

EDITORIAL

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES:

The Christian Century is published in the interests of essential Christianity. It is the organ of no party; the advocate of no ism. While welcoming the ascertained results of modern Christian scholarship, it stands for the great evangelical verities which are the foundation stones of the Christian system. It seeks to be tolerant in spirit, practical in aim, and warmly sympathetic towards all the present day problems of religious thought and life! It also aims at being at once a clearing house and medium of communication between the different denominations, so that they may by free and fraternal expression of opinion become better acquainted with one another and may be led to join forces in more aggressive work for the advancement of the Redeemer's Kingdom.

POSITIVE PREACHING.

ONE of the questions constantly rising for decision in our church life relates to the character of the preaching demanded in a time like this. There are those who maintain that preaching is a lost art, or at least a practice that is out of date. There are, on the other hand, those who still concede to it all the value it had in the times of the reformers, when the pulpit was not only the instrument of inspiration to a higher life, but as well the platform of public education and the forum of public debate. Neither of these attitudes toward preaching is tenable today. Preaching is good or bad as it adjusts itself to normal standards or fails so to do. Whatever else may be said regarding it, there are two attitudes sometimes observed in preachers which are unnecessary and mischievous. One is that of the champion of newer thought, who imagines that it is his business not only to assure his people that he is up on all modern questions, but equally that he is determined to bring them into line with the latest results of scholarship. This he does usually in one of two fields—biblical criticism or scientific study. Perhaps both of these disciplines are championed by him. He is the vindicator of criticism and takes frequent opportunity to explain its character and merits and to denounce the reactionary and conservative type of mind which does not accept its results. Or, on the other hand, he is a professed student of science. Evolution is a plain and simple proposition to him, to which he has given complete adherence and which he now seeks to propagate among his people with an air of lofty possession, or of serene contempt for any one whose views differ from his own. He regards it as the function of the minister to champion all the new light that can come from these sources, and he has no patience with men whose faith is of that simple order which does not owe its origin and growth to the latest teaching.

Such a man as this utterly mistakes his calling and the needs of the times. Biblical criticism is a science which finds its true place in the class-room and the study. It is not for public use, save as its results inform and inspire helpful preaching. Nor does it require any support from such preachers as have been named. They generally do the cause to which they believe themselves devoted far more harm than good. The raw and callow statements of half-fledged advocates of any theory are far more likely to do it discredit than the strenuous opposition of its opponents. Neither higher criticism nor evolution demand any such defence. As methods of study, they are both with us and apparently they have come to stay. They are being accepted by men of all types of thought in the quiet and undemonstrative fashion in which any truth adjusts itself to experience and research, but neither of them lends itself to public discussion, simply because they both form the inner framework of explanations of the Scriptures and of human life whose vitalization and value depend on much more important elements. What the congregations demand of the preacher is not the technique, but the life of his subject, not speculation or theories, either partial or complete, but the living message which has already become incarnate in his own life, and which he seeks to make supreme in the lives of his people. Rightly understood and used, biblical criticism and evolution are aids to the proper understanding of the Bible and human life which are giving, and are still further destined to give, vital and emphatic value to the Gospel and to open the way for an evangelism and a pastoral service such as the Church has never yet enjoyed. But they are not subjects for pulpit discussion.

On the other hand the Church does not need ministers who are seeking to defend in the same dogmatic fashion what they conceive to be the faith once for all delivered to the saints. There are preachers, and perhaps their number is almost legion, who imagine they are called to defend the Scriptures against higher criticism or the inroads of evolutionary science. These men mistake their calling for two reasons. Biblical criticism and evolution are not to be disproved by any mere statements, however positive. In an atmosphere of careful investigation they appear to have vindicated themselves long since, and no one cares any longer in the manner of a debating school to discuss the question of their validity and value. For this reason the preacher who is opposed to them and takes that opposition into his pulpit is simply wasting his time and committing the same sin that his radical brother commits who uses his preaching to propagate these matters. What the Church demands is a Gospel of positive conviction that has been inwrought into a life of service. No preacher is ever able to deliver a sermon greater than the sermon of his own life. If that life has been enriched and vitalized by biblical criticism and scientific study let him give his people the value of his positive and aggressive faith in the verities of the Gospel, without stopping to harass them by the subtleties of the laboratory process. If, on the other hand, he feels that he could not preach the Gospel in any other fashion than as he first learned it, that every other view is essentially wrong and pernicious, and that criticism and evolution are both passing fads, let him preach his message, throwing all his power and earnestness into its positive proclamation, leaving all questions of theory for his own private reflection. Any other method fails of its results. Time is lost, power is wasted, the people are unsatisfied, and the Gospel loses its promised effect. The preacher with definite convictions, with a strong and urgent message, and with the spiritual needs of his people constantly before his mind, is the one demanded by his age.

THE PRACTICE OF SYMPATHY.

By the Visitor.

ONE of the experiences which is often coming to an individual is that of appeals for help from the unfortunate and dependent. These calls are so numerous, especially where the individual occupies a position of prominence, such as is likely to be the fortune of the pastor, teacher, physician or successful business man, that there is likely to grow up a disposition to resent any such interference with one's time and possessions, and to experience a certain hardening of the heart. Yet perhaps no discipline is more needed than that of cultivating an attitude of sympathy toward those who make such appeals, even though one has come to realize that the majority of these requests are misleading and fraudulent. One might far better make several mistakes on the side of helpfulness than to disregard one real appeal. And this is true both from the point of view of the good to be done, and from that of the results in the life of the giver. We are set in a social order which is full of distress, and cries for help are heard on every side. This is a part of our training in Christian life. To be removed from these demands would be to pass our lives in the luxurious indolence of a Buddha before his awakening. A world shut in from the sufferings of humanity is only a child's paradise, and a nature that has not learned to respond with some true offers of help is one that has not yet learned either the duty or the satisfaction of sympathy.

Money is perhaps the smallest item that is demanded by the social needs of our time. Very frequently it would be the most harmful of gifts. What is really essential is something much more valuable than this, namely, one's self, one's time and earnest thought, a careful consideration of the needs of the one who calls for help, and a resolute determination to help him think his problem through. It is a joy to feel that such responses are being made every day and all around us in forms of which we rarely hear and with results the most gratifying. One generally finds what he seeks. If we are looking for a world of hard-hearted, indifferent and ungenerous people, we shall be likely to find it and feel that the age of sympathy is past. But if we really search for the kindly deeds of our fellow citizens, we shall be astonished to find how numerous and gracious they are, and shall ourselves be stimulated to undertake similar tasks. Indeed, it may be affirmed with confidence that no person has learned the fine art of Christian living until he has definitely determined with himself that he will expend a certain amount of his time and resources in the care of the unfortunate, the poor and the helpless.

It is a joy to come unexpectedly upon instances of this unheralded type of beneficence. They seem like "rivers of water in a dry place, and as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land". They restore confidence in human nature, and sweeten the whole day's experience. They lead us to believe that the kingdom of God is really coming in the hearts of his people. The Visitor was interested and astonished not long ago to hear in a very quiet manner the story of one of these simple yet costly acts of helpfulness on the part of a friend of his, in whose nature the transaction revealed an altogether new element of generous and painstaking sympathy. This friend is a professional man of wide acquaintance and unusual tasks which require the employment of his whole time in the regular duties of his calling. There came one day totally unannounced to his door a man who told him the story of the long journey which he and his family, a wife and several children, had taken from Britain to this country and on to Chicago in the hope of finding employment. Resources were exhausted and the man knew only two people in the city, and these simply by report. Of these two the Visitor's friend was one. By the merest chance he happened to be at home that day, though he had expected to be gone by that time on his summer vacation. He knew but little, if anything, of his visitor, and was apparently under no obligation to take up his cause. He was in the midst of a most exacting literary task which demanded every moment of his time. Yet, dropping all these obligations, forgetting the apparent folly of the man in undertaking such a long and objectless ocean voyage to an unknown country, with no adequate information and without resources, he threw himself at once with energy into the labor of securing a home, of raising a small purse to defray present needs, and of getting employment for his helpless caller. The Visitor knows of at least two or three days' time totally given up by his friend to this cause, which only the claims of a common humanity and of the religion of Jesus could have enforced. It was a joy to know such things were happening, even though the story was reluctantly told, and will probably never be known in its personalia beyond a circle of ten or twelve.

Another instance comes to mind. A lady of refinement and wealth recently spoke to the Visitor about some of the perplexities of her life. She is fully aware of her responsibilities and is generous to a fault, but she said that the problems that most troubled her were not those of money assistance to the needy but that which cost far more, the giving of advice, of counsel and of sympathy where only these would avail. In the conversation there came up the case of a poor woman of her acquaintance who is even now passing through days that seem almost unutterably sad and dark. Deserted by her husband, reduced from circumstances of comparative comfort to the care of a family, with no preparation for such experience, and with debts already pressing for settlement, too proud or too wise to accept financial assistance where no repayment seemed possible, she had appealed to the Visitor's friend, not for money, but for that which it was much more difficult to give, sympathetic direction. And as the sad story unfolded itself, the Visitor felt afresh the significance of the statement made of our Lord that "virtue had gone out of him." These experiences of attempting to put one's own life blood into the veins of the despairing, the discouraged, the unresourceful, are of the most difficult. It is literally giving one's life for others, and where it is sympathetically undertaken, it always leaves the double consciousness of a great out-put of nerve force and a supreme and rewarding satisfaction that one is thus following in the steps of his Master, who went about doing good, and who gave his life a ransom for many.

Perhaps no one feels the pressure of such demands more keenly than the sympathetic pastor and the teacher in the college or university. They know of troubles which never reach the ears of any other class of people. Members of the congregation who have met with reverses can only confide in their pastor, and he must give that which is better than gold, sympathy and advice. The teacher in the college or university is even more closely pursued by such demands as come through the experiences of young men preparing for life work, who have been disappointed in the arrival of funds, or who have met with unexpected disasters in planning for their educational course. Sometimes they need money, but more frequently they need courage, which can only be supplied from some other and stronger nature. Let no one think that these demands do not take strength to meet and to answer adequately. Usually it is confidence that must be restored, hopes that must be revived, courage that must again find its vacant place in the heart. But all the time the value of the experience has been with the man who rendered the help at the time of need. His was the discipline, the culture, the rewarding consciousness of life imparted and of success assured by his out-put of faith and hope.

Such an experience, however trying and exhausting, is worth all the effort and anxiety it costs. Its rewards are abundant in the individual soul. It opens the door to a truer likeness to Christ than can be found in any other service, and it brings its own compensations in the life that holds forever precious the memory of moments when the impartation of life saved another from absolute despair. Every Christian ought not only to accept the duty of sympathy whenever called upon by the unfortunate or the discouraged, but he ought to seek as for treasure the privilege of following his Master in this the most characteristic of his activities, and of learning the secret of that life out from which went virtue to strengthen the world.

"The common problem—yours, mine, every one's—
Is not to fancy what were fair in life
Provided it could be, but, finding first
What may be, then find how to make it fair
Up to our means."

GOD-MADE MEN.

IS MAN the architect of his own life and character? So it is often said. But has God nothing to do with the shaping of human life and character? Very poor work of it any man will make who takes the shaping of his life into his own hands.

We hear a great deal about self-made men. Many who pride themselves in this distinction are forward, on all occasions, in announcing to the world that they have made themselves what they are. They owe no one anything, not even God. Regarding a certain person who had a weakness in this direction some one wittily remarked: "Mr. So and So. is surely a very devout man." "Why do you think so?" "Because he shows such profound reverence for his maker." This doctrine of human self-sufficiency has one advantage. It relieves the Lord of a great deal of responsibility.

Those who undertake the making of themselves have a big job on their hands. The magnitude of the task before them might well fill them with dismay. What any one can do for himself amounts to little. It is what God does that counts. As the work which the sculptor expends upon a piece of marble converts it into a thing of priceless value, so the transforming work of God upon us and in us makes character valuable. In the picture galleries of Europe admiring groups of art students may be seen gathering around the works of the great masters. As they pass from picture to picture they may be heard saying: "This is a Raphael." "That is a Rubens." "That is a Rembrandt." How do they know? They know by the peculiar touch of the master's hand, the distinguishing touch of his power and genius. In the same way Christian lives bear the marks of the hand of the Divine Master. They give unmistakable signs that the Heavenly Artist has been at work upon them. The beauty of the Lord their God is upon them.

This was St. Paul's doctrine. "Ye are God's workmanship," said he to his Ephesian converts. He wished them to see that in the sphere of the spiritual God was the worker, the world the workshop, and Christian character the workmanship—the finished article. His words mean that all that is good in man is from God. Whatever gifts any one possesses he has bestowed; the new life in the soul is his creation; all heavenward impulses come from his inspiration; all excellence of character is attained through his efficacious help. In spiritual attainments men are not so much what they have made themselves as they are what God has made them. A good life needs God for its explanation. As well might we expect flowers to bloom and fruits to ripen were the sun blotted out of the heavens as expect the graces of a saintly character without the brooding presence of God. Apart from God man can do nothing. Apart from God he is nothing.

The noblest specimens of human kind are not self-made men, but God-made men; men whose hearts God has touched; men whose characters God is moulding; men whose activities God is directing; men with whom God is having his own way; men who are co-operating with God in his grand design in their lives; men who are God's willing instruments in the accomplishment of his purposes in the world.

A recognition of the part that God is playing in the making of life cuts at the root of spiritual pride.

It leads a man to give God the glory for anything good in his life. It makes him ready to say with John Newton: "I am not what I ought to be; I am not what I wish to be; I am not what I hope to be; I am not what I once was, but, by the grace of God, I am what I am."

NOTES AND COMMENT.

Plough Versus Gun.

Dr. R. J. Gatling, who invented the famous rapid-fire gun bearing his name, has turned his attention toward farm machinery and proposes to revolutionize existing agricultural methods. Dr. Gatling is the inventor of a motor plow, which he asserts will accomplish from a comparative standpoint on the farm what his gun did on the field of battle. The claim is made by the great inventor that his plow, under the guidance of one man, will break the surface of a thirty-acre field in a single day. Dr. Gatling will do more for the world by his plow than by his gun. It will build up rather than destroy. May the day soon come when guns shall be beat into plows, and men shall rejoice in the victories of peace more than in the victories of war.

Is the Church Losing Its Hold Upon the Working Classes?

We believe that there is a temporary abatement of interest in the Church on the part of workingmen, especially in the centers of population. But this is not as deep or as wide as many suppose. The Church is still close to the hearts of the people, and to it all classes instinctively turn for sympathy and support in the struggles of life. It is a great mistake, however, to estimate the influence of the Church by attendance upon her services. Many things not known before are conspiring to keep people from going to meeting with the old-time regularity. The demands of business life are so imperious and absorbing that it is simply a physical impossibility for some people to give as much time as formerly to attendance upon church or to church work. New adjustments require to be made, especially with regard to the evening service. The church exists for the people, not the people for the church. The church is an agency and not an end; and in so far as she fulfills her work of social ministry will she keep a firm grip upon the affection of the common people.

Change in Church Buildings.

The total value of church property in the United States is estimated at $316,187,000. Of this sum $45,000,000 is said to go into steeples. Leaving aside for the present the idea of the utility of the esthetic, this vast expenditure of money in church buildings must to people of a practical turn of mind seem out of all proportion to what is given to meet the growing demands for the support of religious and philanthropic work. And the case looks still worse when we consider the very limited use which is made of these costly structures. For the most part they are open only one day in the week. There is a growing conviction that this valuable plant, which often represents not a little true sacrifice, ought to be made more productive. One of the signs of the times is the combination of the ecclesiastical and the social, which is aimed at in the modern church edifice. The newly awakened social consciousness, within the church, is expressing itself in stone and lime. Still greater modifications are demanded to make the house of God the home of the people.

The Quiet Hour.

One is glad to notice in our day a growing appreciation of the value of devotional reading as an aid to private devotion and as well to family worship. Frequently a brief passage of Scripture, illuminated by a short paragraph by some one competent to speak upon the theme, would encourage families to engage in such well-timed and valuable group worship as should prove an inspiration through the day and a help throughout life. We are learning with pleasure that this use is being made of the "Quiet Hour Notes" in the Century, prepared by Dr. Smellie. Those who have read these notes will appreciate their timeliness and directness of suggestion regarding the biblical passages to which they relate themselves. We shall be glad to know that similar use is made of these passages by a much larger circle of our readers.

CHICAGO NOTES.

The Omaha World-Herald says: "Mr. Wambold of Chicago has two hearts. And thus we note again the uneven distribution of things. Here is a man with two hearts while the steel trust hasn't any."

A joint meeting of the Citizens' League and the Methodist Preachers' Union will be held in the auditorium of the Y. M. C. A. on Monday, Sept. 2d, to plan a campaign against saloon-keepers who sell liquor to minors and in other ways violate the law. This is a movement in which all Christians ought to join.

President William R. Harper of the University of Chicago has been decorated with the Cross of the Legion of Honor by the French government. This entitles him to rank among the greatest statesmen, soldiers and literary men of that republic. He also is entitled to an invitation to every state function of France.

The plan of Dr. M. M. Parkhurst, president of the Anti-Saloon League, to establish a system of espionage by employing Sunday school children to watch the saloons is meeting with well-nigh universal condemnation. To turn the Sunday school children of the city into spies would be to do evil that good might come. In enlisting the young people against the saloon the standard of school-boy morality must not be lowered.

The customary account of Chicago brag comes in a statement that a saving of $5,000 a year could be made in ink alone if the people of the city would stop dotting the "i" in the name of the city. But what would Chicago be if it was not right on the dot? The wit of the woolly west appears in the expressed desire of some Montana gentlemen to start a bad actor downhill in a barrel—in order to have him appear in a new role. So of a young eastern man who was hanged in Nevada—he had to go away from home to get the noose.

A series of meetings are to be held in Steinway hall to further the Ruskin Hall movement in this country. The motto of this movement is: "We depend upon the helping hand backed by the righteous fist." The object of these meetings will be to promote a revival of interest in labor reform. Walter Vrooman, founder and president of the co-operative colleges of which Ruskin Hall at Oxford is perhaps the best type, is the leader of this movement. His immediate object is to establish labor colleges in this country and to plant the seeds of co-operative industries.

Peculiar ceremonies marked the opening of the new Hebrew synagogue on West 12th street. Certain privileges were auctioned off to the highest bidder. The privilege to open the door of the new synagogue was sold for a hundred dollars. The privileges of carrying the volumes of the law, the gold and silver service of the temple, also brought large sums. This arrangement put the most coveted privileges in the hands of men of wealth. It is strange how mammon is allowed to invade the sanctuary. In Beecher's church the best pews were sold by auction to the highest bidders.

Harper's Weekly indulges in a fling at Chicago. It says: "The musical taste of Chicago is improving. The bandmaster in charge of the concerts at Lincoln park asserts that ragtime no longer satisfies the souls of his audience, and says that the people clamor wildly for Bach fugues, selections from 'Parsifal' and 'Götterdaemmerung' and other such light but refined entertainment. This is interesting from a psychological point of view. A western educator has recently written at length on the efficacy of good music as a reformatory power. He claims that his statements are based on results as well as theories. If music has proved an effective means of reforming the criminal classes, why should there not be hope for Chicago?"

Few men are exposed to greater temptations than commercial travelers. A few years ago it was a rare thing to find a traveling man who did not drink and gamble. Largely through the agency of "The Christian Traveling Men's Association" a wonderful change for the better has taken place. These associations are called Gideon's Bands. They wear a distinctive badge and when they meet they strengthen one another in the ways of righteousness. The Gideons of the state of Illinois held a two days' rally at the First Methodist Episcopal church Aug. 31 and Sept. 1, to which all traveling men and the general public were invited. Regular meetings of the Chicago camp take place every Sunday evening in some churches, and noonday meetings in Willard hall every Saturday. The speakers at the rally were traveling men.

The Faith Bible mission, which was opened in a vacant store a year ago at 947 North 40th avenue, is run upon the following principles: It is non-sectarian; the Bible is its creed; it interprets God's Word literally; it counts all God's promises faithful; it passes no collection basket; it asks no human being for money. And yet by the circulation of its reports among Christian people it makes its wants widely known. This it finds to be an effective business method. In its recently published circular its promoters say: "In former years we engaged in all sorts of schemes to raise money for the church and found it hard work. We have during most of this year carried on four missions in different communities by means of the unsolicited offerings that God directed his children to give." What charming simplicity! And now the hint is dropped that further "unsolicited offerings" would be acceptable to provide a home for the mission.

SERMONIC HINGS.

Word for Tired People.

At the Forty-first Street Presbyterian church Rev. Cleland B. McAfee, D. D., preached on "A Word for Tired people." He said: "Weariness is neither a curse nor a sin. It is a sign of healthful effort, of laying out of one's strength in service. The weariness that comes from abuse of powers, from long days and short nights, has no approval in the example of Jesus, but the other sort has. He grew so weary at times that he could sleep through a perilous storm. He called the disciples aside not only for their own rest, but that he also might rest."

God's Way of Saving Men.

Referring to the trial of Abraham and to the part which trial plays in salvation, Rev. R. A. Torrey of the Chicago Avenue church remarked: "There are different ways in which men are tried. Some are tried by Satan, some by circumstances of their lives, and some are directly tried by God himself. The last is the highest honor in the way of trial that can come to man, and is reserved for those only who through faith in Jesus Christ are on that spiritual plane where other trials and testings would be no temptation to them whatsoever. These trials are not required to show God what is in the hearts of men toward him, but are necessary for the development of the men themselves, who are thus brought into new experiences of the power and greatness and love of God."

ILLUSTRATIONS.

There is a line in nature which is called the line of repose. There nature seems indifferent, absolutely unmoral. You sink below this line of repose; and, like the drowning man who cannot swim, you seem to feel hands clutching at you from the darkness to drag you down. Nature seems hostile and demonic. Above the line of repose, when you exert your efforts with nature, hands seem to bear you up and on. Nature seems to be, in principle, love. Jesus had risen to the height of this, working with the forces of the universe, till he felt that nothing was beyond his power; he was at one with the will of God; he had overcome the world. He felt even that he could lay down his life, and take it again.

An iceberg stranded on the coast of Newfoundland, and was two or three years melting, during which time the trees bore no fruit. The iceberg was the cause of the frost, not God's laws; hence the harm done. If sin strands near the altar of God, there will be a frost in the temple. Sometimes an individual is the cause of such frosts, and until the cause is removed there will be no fruitfulness. Such frosts cannot be remedied by man. It is little use lighting a bonfire and letting off fireworks to scare away winter. Fires are good enough in their place; but not as a means of bringing about the needed revival. Nor will novel and patent appliances raise the state of the spiritual atmosphere.

CONTRIBUTED

They who tread the path of labor follow where my feet have trod;
They who work without complaining do the holy will of God,
Where the many toil together, there I am among my own;
Where the tired workman sleepeth, there I am with him alone.
I, the peace that passeth knowledge, dwell amid the daily strife;
I, the Bread of heaven, am broken in the sacrament of life.
Every task, however simple, sets the soul that does it free;
Every deed of love and mercy don to man is done to me.

CHRISTOLOGICAL TENDENCIES OF THE TIME.

W. J. Lhamon.

No. IV. The Pulpit.

A great change has passed over our conception of Christianity during the last hundred years. Its determining factors were then supposed to be such metaphysics as concerned themselves about the eternal decrees of God, original sin, renewing and confirming and sanctifying and sustaining grace, the helplessness of the human will, and almost any number of associated questions, or corollaries springing from them. Dr. Lorimer in treating of the "regeneration of theology," a phrase which he credits to Professor Dorner, speaks as follows: "A hundred years ago it was common for divines to expound the glorious counsels of the blessed Trinity in a sober, matter-of-fact way, and to refer to motions and resolutions as though they were recording the proceedings of a court of Arches or an earthly Presbytery. Without any doubt or misgiving they assured the people that Deity from all eternity had enjoyed perfect blessedness in the contemplation of his own perfection, but that presently he found that he could get an additional revenue of glory by creating rational creatures who should sing eternal halleluiahs. Then followed a motion to this effect, and eternity gave place to a parenthesis of time. Man was made and the temptation ordained, and all that everlasting peans might be sung to God. The fall was described over and over again with extraordinary ingenuity and its deplorable consequence summed up in language such as this: God could not permit his image to abide by the ugly effigy of the devil; everything done by an unregenerate man is a mere sham and dead form of holiness. If the natural man should begin to relent, to drop a tear for sin and repent, he does nothing but sin; for man, aye, even the new-born babe, is a lump of wrath, a child of hell."

The author quoted assures us that such pulpit presentations are inconceivable today in enlightened communities, and that should an angel visit the earth he would have reason to modify the apocalyptic cry and to proclaim aloud: "The Augustinian theology has fallen, has fallen!"

There comes to my table as fair a representation of sermonic literature as comes perhaps to the average man of the pulpit. I am not able to recall a single distinctively theological sermon that has fallen in my way during the last ten years. Volume after volume of sermons may be taken up and examined with the discovery that they are distinctively Christological. Here is one by a Presbyterian, and the title of it, "For Christ's Crown," is an index to the contents of it. I am personally acquainted with the author of this volume of brilliant homilies, and once in a pleasant social hour he told me his experience, how he had passed from the faith of his childhood to infidelity, and from infidelity back again to faith by the Calvinistic way under the rigid discipline of Dr. Hodge. But, judging by this volume of sermons, his Calvinistic training is of the least consequence to his pulpit work.

Here is another volume of sermons by a leading Presbyterian, entitled "Facts That Call for Faith." And what are the "facts that call for faith"? They are God, and Christ, and the Bible, and the Lord's day, and prayer, and death, and the resurrection of Jesus, and a longer catalogue of similar ones. In this volume of "facts" there is not one distinctively theological sermon.

And here again are volumes of sermons by leading Baptists. One after another they are taken up, and upon examination they prove invariably to be Christological. "The Attractive Christ," by Dr. MacArthur, is so; "A Year's Sermons," by Dr. Maclaren, is so; and the works of Dr. Lorimer are well known to be so. It would almost seem that the students trained in Calvinistic seminaries have entered into a conspiracy to preach Christ and ignore Calvinism and its related speculations the moment they leave the seminary threshold.

In further exemplification of the theme I take up the last sermon magazine that happened to light in my study, and this is what I find: Two sermons by Methodists, three by Presbyterians, one by a Baptist, one by a Lutheran, and one by a Disciple. Not one of them is devoted to Calvinism, or to Arminianism, or to hereditary depravity, or to consubstantiation, or to any sort of scholastic speculation. These are some of the themes: "What the Opening Century Demands of Young Men;" "The Force That Moves the World;" "The Old Testament as Literature;" "The Difference Between Law and Gospel;" "The Bible and the Christian Endeavor Life." These are practical and ethical themes, and the treatment of them justifies their promise. They find their inspiration in Christ and in his revelation.

The great preachers and evangelists of the last generation have been Christological. Spurgeon was so, though his Calvinism blazed out occasionally. Usually he forgot it and preached Christ with wonderful power. Beecher was so, and if Talmage is logical at all he is Christological. Phillips Brooks loved both men and God as he saw them revealed in Christ, and from that fountain of love came forth his sermons. Moody was never spoiled by a theological course of study, and Chapman preaches Christ directly, and John McNeil is a canny Scotchman who couldn't preach one hour with the metaphysical trammels of the creeds knotted about his brain.

The pulpit can never go back to the hair-splitting of a by-gone age. It may do many inadvertent things; it may yield to the demand for sensationalism; it may become radical in its championship of popular movements; it may even seek in a languid way here and there to revive some show of interest in the discussions of the thirteenth to the eighteenth centuries, but it cannot go back to those centuries. The apostolic and the pagan currents of thought can never meet in the modern pulpit as they did in the ancient creeds. The souls of men have escaped from the trammels of Augustinianism, and never again will they suffer themselves to be caught between the upper and nether millstones of such discrepant teachings as those of Christ on the one hand and those of Augustine on the other. We have recovered Christ, and he has recovered his pulpit. His apostles are once more sounding out their story of him in a multitude of tongues far greater than those that were emphasized by the Pentecostal flames. And there is this peculiarity about the modern mind; while it refuses to be dominated by an inexorable logic which conflicts with the logic of the heart, and which by very virtue of its repellent conclusions raises suspicions of fallacy somewhere along the borderland of infinite, it turns gratefully to the fact and the personality of Jesus, and to all such facts working in history and literature as have their sources unmistakably in him. Jesus has thrown over the modern pulpit at its best the spell of his truth and love. And men are more and more clearly discovering that when that spell is broken the power of the pulpit is gone. If Christ is to be the Savior of men he must first be the Savior of the pulpit, and the men out of the pulpit are not among the last to make that discovery. It will be well for the men in the pulpit to have absolute convictions upon the need of a Christological attitude there.

We rejoice in the belief that Dr. Gunsaulus is right when he says, "People were never as willing—nay, so desirous to go to church as now, if Christ is there to get them on their feet. Without him they will not stay to hear your dream of a better day, and with him they will not tolerate any depreciation or any defamation of the soul of man."

Let the pulpit of this age be the pulpit that Christ himself created, the pulpit of the mountainside and seaside and fireside; the pulpit of the day of Pentecost and of the home of Cornelius; the pulpit of Mars Hill and of Ephesus and of Corinth and Philippi and Rome before St. Paul went hence to be with the Lord; let the pulpit be apostolic and Christological, and we shall not soon be listening to the notes of its swan song.

Alleghany, Pa.

WE FORGET.

So many tender words and true
We meant to say, dear love, to you;
So many things we meant to do,
But we forget.

The busy days were full of care;
The long night fell, and unaware
You passed beyond love's leading prayer
While we forget.

Now evermore through heart and brain
There breathes an undertone of pain;
Though what has been should be again,
We would forget.

We feel, we know, that there must be Beyond the veil of mystery
Some place where love can clearly see
And not forget.

WHAT OF CHRISTIANITY IN INDIA?

W. M. Forrest.

THE last century was one of continuous missionary activity in India. Christian work prior to that time was so sporadic and inadequate that no one could expect any wide-spread or favorable results from it. But after the labors of the past one hundred years some may be disposed to think that the power of Christianity to conquer India has been fairly tested. A bare statement of what has directly resulted from the presence of the missionary in this great country may prove discouraging to those who value only what can be exhibited in statistical tables. But a better insight into the real merits of the case is sure to result from a careful study of the general effects and actual difficulties of Christianity in India.

The labors of the nineteenth century, added to the desultory efforts of all preceding centuries, have gathered together upwards of two millions of professed Christians. Out of a population of nearly three hundred million, that may seem little enough. Since the greater number of them are Christians of the first generation, and have come out of the grossest idolatry and superstition, they are perhaps even more imperfect than were many of Paul's converts in the first century. Moreover, they are won largely from the lowest castes, and become outcasts when they become Christians, no matter what their previous condition. Hence it need occasion no surprise if it is found that their influence in the country at large is not even in proportion to their small numbers.

To enliven this view of the situation there are, however, several matters worthy of consideration. The last half of the century differed very much both in the number and efficiency of its missionaries, and in the number of converts won. Notable triumphs have been achieved in the supplying of the missionary with indispensable lexicons, grammars and other aids to the speedy mastery of the vernaculars. A Christian literature has been built up for the help of converts and to influence others. Valuable experience has been gained as to the best way to preserve the lives and increase the efficiency of the missionaries, the wisest manner of employing native assistants, and the surest means of reaching the non-Christian and of training the convert. From simply looking at these direct results of past toil and experience it would seem most reasonable to expect decades in the future to achieve what required centuries in the past.

But the chief ground for hope must be found in what are only indirectly the results of missionary activity. No one who is familiar with the history of India, and with the present trend of thought among its educated men, can fail to see that a great change is gradually coming over the land. Whether resulting from contact with western civilization or from modern secular education, or from Christian evangelization, this gradual change can best be characterized as the progressive Christianization of Indian thought and life. It began so long ago that men can be found in India who actually believe it always was so, and is a native product. There are many who maintain with apparent honesty that mothers never sacrificed their babes by throwing them into the Ganges, where they were devoured by crocodiles. Yet both the practice and its prevention through the efforts of Christian missionaries are matters of no very ancient history. Hinduism, past and present, undoubtedly has good mingled with its evil; many notable ethical and philosophical insights are the products of its sages and are enshrined in its sacred books. But the system, as a whole, which in one form or another has dominated India for more than three thousand years, cannot bear the light of history, for it is condemned by its fruits. The blasphemous conclusions of its philosophy, the debasing developments of its popular idolatry, the barbarous cruelties of its caste regulations, bear present and lasting testimony to the fact that whatever divine truth and power may be in it are held down in unrighteousness. Many abominable practices, such as widow-burning, it has given up only under pressure of Christian laws backed by severe penalties. Others, like the actual marriage of little girls, which results in their torture and death at the hands of their brutal husbands, are still struggling to maintain themselves.

But the notable thing is that India's sons have learned to blush and apologize for many things that they have not yet the strength to abandon. Where it is possible, they prefer to deny that they ever practiced certain iniquities. When history testifies against them they attempt to claim the credit for abandoning these things. In other cases they attempt to harmonize the practices with true morality. Meanwhile, there is constant talk about the Fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man, and numerous other matters foreign to Indian thought and contradicted by immemorial religious and social practice. But these are all claimed as the product of Hinduism, and the missionary is further annoyed by the Hindu apologist's decking out his gods in Christian virtues and setting them up as the ethical and spiritual rivals of Christ.

It is doubtless both provoking and immoral to attempt to save the honor of Krishna, the chief incarnation of the supreme Hindu deity, by denying the truthfulness of the gross stories told of him in the Puranas. Nor is it pleasant to hear some Arya-Somaj preacher declaring the God of the Bible a monster of injustice and iniquity, while it is well known that neither he, nor any other Indian, knew aught of the inconsistency between immorality and deity until they learned it through Christian teaching. All this indicates that India is giving formal assent to the excellence of Christian ethical teaching, while not yet sufficiently advanced to make it all-controlling in its life. But to the extent that they are trying to make their religion moral, and endeavoring to give currency to ideas of divine fatherhood and human brotherhood, the Hindus are proclaiming the power of Christ. And whether as foes or as friends of the Nazarene, the various somajes, and reform societies, and individual advocates of purity in religion, are proclaiming at least a part of the gospel of Christ. "Some, indeed, preach Christ only of envy and strife. What then? Only that in every way, whether in pretense or in truth, Christ is proclaimed, and therein I rejoice, yea, and will rejoice."

This process of saturating India with Christian sentiment may continue long before the land becomes Christian. The East is proverbially slow, so slow indeed that some think it can never traverse the distance between Hinduism and Christianity. But wise men know that it does move. The late G. W. Steevens, in contemplating the scant results of British rule in India, says: "Every loophole of optimism seems closed—except one. When all is said and done, we have been in India only a little over a hundred years—in many parts of it hardly fifty. To immemorial India that is like half an hour. To move the East is a matter of centuries; and yet it moves. In the East it is especially fatal to say 'Too late' too soon. It is far too early to despair of India yet. It is not only the land of ironies, it is also the land of patience." With how much greater truth may all this be said in relation to our religion here. The work has been well begun. It is especially encouraging now because of the opportunities for teaching the Bible to the thousands of students at the universities. The regeneration of the land may tarry long or it may come as a sudden revolution. Who knows at what time there may arise from among her own sons India's Paul or Luther unto whom shall the gathering of the people be? When a solution has become saturated by the absorption of all of a salt that it can take up, the slightest jar may instantly send down the beautiful precipitate. So may any sudden shock cause the progressive saturation of India with Christian thought to eventuate in the salvation of the whole land. But whether it come speedily or linger long, it becomes not the West, which received its Christianity from the Orient, to draw back from the work until it sees India clothed and in her right mind, sitting at the feet of Christ. If it be God's will that for every year of the Church's century-long neglect of India, and for every dollar hoarded at the expense of missionary activity, another dollar be poured out here, and the life of a soldier of the cross be laid down on this alien soil—still, as of old, let it be said, "Thy will, O God, be done."

DOWN EAST AND ROUND ABOUT.

Wm. H. Walker, Ph. D.

EW ENGLAND again! It is always a delight to visit this sacred and picturesque soil. Here are the same old shaggy hills, tossing their pines and birches and maples, the same elm-arched, Gothic aisles through the country towns, and the train is always crashing through the rocks or bending lovingly toward the hazy valleys. The streams are just as crystal, and their thicket-covered banks are just as verdant as ever, and, alas! there are the same tufts of juniper in the rocky pastures. I grow starved if I linger too long in New England. I miss the generous fields. Nothing but little strips of corn and potatoes cut on the bias in the corners of the stone walk! The crops have a timorous air, as if they were apologizing to the rocks and woods for growing at all. Of course, it is different down on the broad reaches of the Connecticut valley, but, unfortunately, the trimmest fields there are given to tobacco; bad luck to it! I long for the waving gold of a western wheat field. But then again I look out at the tangled masses of feathery fern and at the rocks and stone walls mantled with gray lichens, and up the forest aisles of the hillsides and down on the great peaceful farm houses, rambling on and on and merging at last into diminutive barns.

and my eyes moisten, and I realize that dear old New England has its compensations, even if it cannot boast a respectable wheat stack.

Illinois—why, you could chop a square mile anywhere out of the northern two-thirds of it, and use it as a sample by which to sell any farm in that section. Everywhere the same lazy swells, the same bunches of poplars and orchard about the farm buildings, the same endless files of corn, the same creeks too tired to think it worth while to run. But the corn is stocky, and it grows in a self-reliant way, as if life were worth living, and all natural forces were there to be defied.

I wonder why farms always get tangled up and lost in a flat, marshy country. There is northwestern Indiana. The soil looks rich enough and vegetation is rank. Crops grow well when they are cared for. But there is a dejected, down-in-the-heels air about it all. Poor farm buildings suggest poor farmers and poor farming. The ague must get into the fields. There are miles and miles of untutored swamp. I am told that Chicago's chief fur supply is from down that way. Perhaps the land is worth more given up to trappers and skunks than it would be for corn and potatoes. By and by the surface rolls up, the soil grows sandy, generous farm houses appear and the eye rejoices in evidences of prosperity.

There are disadvantages about through trains and sleeping cars. Every now and then there is a hiatus in the country as memory roams over it. That is what Ohio is to me, excepting only its rim. Far out of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania is too busy to let you think of farming. Furnaces, factories, mills, mines, railroads—criss-crossing, climbing up, down, winding around and boring through—the Conemaugh turbid, men in squads and regiments, all working as if this were the busy day of the year. One is well up into the Alleghanies before the stray farms assert themselves and the old log cabins come out here and there. On the eastern side the fields sweep up to the summits, and the farm houses looking out on the Juniata are ample and homelike. But it is beyond Harrisburg that the country becomes a veritable garden of the Lord. Never have I seen farms more exquisitely clean and beautiful, nor farm buildings more tasty and inviting, whether they be spick and span modern frame structures or ancient stone landmarks, hale and hearty; and over it all the golden splendor of ripening or garnered grain—with the inevitable tobacco now and then.

New Jersey's chief crop is advertising boards. I would like to mount a battery of naval guns on flat cars and send it out for target practice on these abominations. I vow I will suffer forever before I will "stop pain with Omega oil" and every tooth in my head shall go to ruin before I will resort to Sozodont. If we cannot get rid of that chump of a boy in blue jacket and white derby, spilling fine cut out of a white bag and ogling the gander, we shall become a nation of idiots by irresistible suggestion.

I wonder why that shank of Canada between the Niagara and the Detroit is so tedious! It used to be a wilderness of stumps and stubs, but they vanished many a year ago, without making it more interesting. The soil is rich, though of an ochre cast. The country is flat, but no flatter than many another land that the eye loves to linger upon. Crops are diversified without giving the impression of variety. The monotony must be due to the wretched farm buildings, unpainted, unshaded, unkempt. People take no joy in their farming. I leave it to some wiser student of comparative psychology to determine why crossing a river should make such a difference in the mental traits of people as manifested in their cultivation of the soil. Wilmette, Ill.

SOME NEW TESTAMENT WORDS.

"Mystery."

In common parlance, sanctioned by the dictionary, the word "mystery" means something incomprehensible through being above human intelligence. This use is strengthened by the allied word "mystify," which is practically equivalent to "bewilder." Now, it is safe to say that, in almost every New Testament passage in which the word "mystery" occurs the full significance of it will be lost by such an interpretation.

The mysteries of ancient Greece, the most famous of which were at Eleusis, were religious gatherings to which no one was admitted who had not undergone certain initiatory rites. Under an oath of secrecy certain traditions respecting the gods and sacred things generally were handed down from generation to generation within this privileged circle. In some respects the institution of Freemasonry may be regarded as the nearest parallel in the modern world. The essential feature of the doctrines of the Mysteries was that they were revealed to the initiated, but hidden from outsiders.

For centuries before the time when the Epistles were written, the word mystery had been in common use in this connection. Accordingly Paul adapted it to serve the purpose of Christian theology. That it does not mean something which cannot be known is clear from 1 Cor. 13:2. Its general meaning is "something which has been hidden from some, but revealed to others."

In several passages it refers to the teaching of salvation through Christ, which had been hidden from the ancients, but was now made known. It has this reference in Rom. 16:25; 1 Cor. 2:7; Eph. 1:9; 3:9; 4:19; Col. 1:26, etc.; 2:2, 4:3, and Rev. 10:7. In the last of these passages it denotes the complete fulfillment of this Divine purpose when Christ returns. The teaching of God's good will toward the Gentiles is included in some of the above passages and is expressed also in Eph. 3:3, etc., and Col. 1:26.

Occasionally the word is applied to things concerned generally with the kingdom of God, as in Luke 8:10 and parallel passages. Certain single events relating to that kingdom are denoted in Rom. 11:25, as also in 1 Cor. 15:51, which is often misinterpreted, as though it meant the announcement of a difficulty which could not be explained. "I show you a mystery," means really "I make clear to you something which you would not otherwise understand." The stewards of the mysteries are, of course, those who are entrusted with the duty of making these revelations of hidden things.

In one passage the reference to the Greek Mysteries is obscured by the translation of the authorized version, though the revised gives some indication of it. The literal rendering of Phil. 4:12 would be, "I have been initiated into the mystery both of being filled," etc.

Said Adolph Monod, in his latest words, "One warm blundering man will do more good in the Church than a dozen frigid wise ones."

Many seek truth as a new mental diversion.—Rev. Dr. Purves, Presbyterian.

In the olden times there was an idea that the body was the mother of all evil.—Rev. Dr. Carter, Episcopalian, Louisville, Ky.

One of the gratifying features of all Christian workers today is the great demand for Christian reunion. As a plea for Christian union the Disciples of Christ as a religious body exist.—Rev. A. A. Smither, Christian church, Los Angeles, Cal.

Purity of worship comes only when human culture has so far advanced that man's fear has been replaced by love.—Rev. Dr. Utter, Unitarian.

Personal liberty is a sort of circle about the individual bounded by the laws which protect the rights of others.—Rev. Dr. Crafts, Presbyterian.

A business without religion has no soul or conscience and is not consistent with a man's expressed religion.—Rev. George R. Stair, Baptist.

Impartiality is seen in God's demands of men. There is one law for all men and one standard of holiness for all men in every nation.—Rev. J. W. Quillian, Episcopalian.

Grace will help us little if it is not re-enforced by grit. Few men make their lives noble because they dare not be singular.—Rev. Dr. Madison Peters, Baptist.

Man should be a constantly enlarging and improving reality to the Christian. Sin and shame, pain and gloom, should not blind the Christian to the perfect man.—Rev. J. C. Youker, Methodist.

Never was there a time when so much might be accomplished for humanity and never was the Church's responsibility greater than now.—Rev. J. D. Rankin, Presbyterian.

God has set bounds beyond which no man can go. We are men and we have the capacity and abilities of men only. The true attitude for one is one of humility.—Rev. Dr. Eaton, Universalist.

Almighty God reveals his truth, and it is an outrage and an insult to the Divine God to meet this revelation with contention that we cannot understand.—Rev. Father Hoardman, R. C.

In this age the brotherhood of man needs to be emphasized. God has linked us together; we cannot cut these bonds asunder if we would.—Rev. S. B. Moore, Christian church.

How many homes are sorely in need of religious instruction! We spend fortunes to house and feed an army of criminals and neglect to give attention to children which would prevent crime.—Rev. L. M. Zimmerman, Lutheran.

How many men there are who need help and sympathy. Men need help when they are down. Any man can find so-called friends when he is prosperous, but let misfortune come and too often his friends are gone when he needs sympathy.—Rev. G. B. Townsend.

Faith in God for the saving of the soul and its admission into heaven is worthy our prayerful consideration.—Rev. George Adams, Methodist.

No social organization which does not make not only possible but necessary for all its citizens some sort of useful employment is a tolerable condition under which to live. And this work which a man is entitled to have must be a reasonable work and suited to the capacity of the worker.—Rev. Wm. T. Brown, Congregationalist.

There is no personal devil—no inherent dualism of good and evil. Through ignorance men misuse laws and forces, and evil results. The evils of social life outweigh all the evils they suffer from the forces of nature. People born in evil surroundings, with criminal tendencies, are not to blame.—Rev. R. A. White, Universalist.

Man has the instinct which craves for God. Men have thought that this new knowledge would wipe out our faith, but it has not yet been digested and translated into the vernacular. When it is, men will find that instead of faith being something you have to apologize for, it is the highest attribute of the human being to thirst for God.—Rev. Dr. Rainsford, Episcopalian.

It is hard to find a materialist nowadays, and it is true we are not as easily frightened by that word. Men have circumnavigated the globe of thought and are getting back to their ancestral position where they can say, "We believe in God, the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth."—Rev. Dr. Patton, Presbyterian.

While thoughts are forces and men create from within the atmosphere in which they move, it must not be forgotten that life readily conforms to surroundings, and that the whole being, mental, spiritual and physical, must be sought for in Christ in order that the work of the Church may not be circumscribed.—Rev. D. E. Marvin, Congregationalist.

OUR OWN.

If I had known in the morning
How wearily all the day
The words unkind
Would trouble my mind
I said when you went away,
I had been more careful, darling,
Nor given you needless pain;
But we vex "our own"
With look and tone
We might never take back again.

For though in the quiet evening
You may give me the kiss of peace,
Yet well it might be
That never for me
The pain of the heart should cease.
How many go forth in the morning
Who never come home at night!
And hearts have broken
For harsh words spoken
That sorrow can ne'er set right.

We have careful thought for the stranger,
And smiles for the sometime guest,
But oft for "our own"
The bitter tone,
Though we love our own the best.
Ah! lip with the curve impatient;
Ah! brow with that look of scorn,
'Twere a cruel fate
Were the night too late
To undo the work of morn.

PLEASANTRIES.

A Gladstonian Error.

Gladstone, in "Gleanings of Past Years," Vol. 1, p. 26, causes Daniel to walk unscathed through the furnace seven times heated.

Bacon's Mistake.

In his essay on "Vain-glory," Bacon says: "It was prettily devised of Esop, the fly sat upon the axletree of the chariot-wheel and said: 'What a dust do I raise.'" A writer in "Notes and Queries" points out that the fable is by Laurentius Abstemius.

Eloquent Rags.

Talking about the way boys were admitted to his home, Dr. Barnardo said to an interviewer:

"I was standing at my front door one bitter day in winter, when a little ragged chap came up to me and asked me for an order of admission. To test him, I pretended to be rather rough with him.

"'How do I know,' I said, 'if what you tell me is true? Have you any friends to speak for you?'"

"'Friends!' he shouted. 'No, I ain't got no friends; but if these 'ere rags'—and he waved his arm about as he spoke—'won't speak for me, nothing else will.'"

More Work, Fewer Words.

"Lots of folks who would like to do right, think that servin' the Lord means shoutin' themselves hoarse praisin' his name. Now, I'll tell you how I look at that. I'm workin' here for Jim. Now, if I'd sit 'round the house here tellin' what a good fellow Jim is, an' singin' songs to him, I'd be doin' just like what lots of Christians do, but it wouldn't suit Jim, and I'd get fired mighty quick.

"But when I hustle among the hills, an' see that Jim's herds are all right, an' not sufferin' for water an' feed, or bein' off the range branded by cattle-thieves, then I'm servin' Jim as he wants to be served."—Presbyterian Review.

Which Foot Gets Tired.

A lady was watching a potter at his work, whose one foot was kept, with a "never slackening speed, turning his swift wheel round," while the other rested patiently on the ground. When the lady said to him in a sympathizing tone, "How tired your foot must be!" the man raised his eyes and said, "No, ma'am, it isn't the foot that works that's tired, it's the foot that stands! That's it."

If you want to keep your strength, use it. If you want to get tired, do nothing. As a matter of fact, we all know that the last man to give a helping hand to any new undertaking is the man who has plenty of time on his hands. It is the man and woman who are doing most who are always willing to do a little more.

Only Half True.

The following is an opinion doubtless to be shared by many Americans who heard Matthew Arnold lecture during his stay among us. After his return to London, at the close of his first American tour, he visited Mrs. Procter, the widow of "Barry Cornwall" and mother of Adelaide Procter.

The lady was then eighty years old, and in giving Mr. Arnold a cup of tea, she asked, with the pardonable frankness of age:

"And what did they say about you in America?"

"Well," said the literary autocrat, "they said I was conceited. They said my clothes did not fit me."

"Well, now," commented the old lady, "I think they were mistaken as to the clothes."—Youth's Companion.

Ecclesiastical Wit.

Probably no two ministers in the country are better known than Bishop J. H. Vincent of the Methodist Episcopal Church and Rev. Dr. P. S. Henson, for many years pastor of the leading Baptist church of Chicago.

Bishop Vincent was the leading spirit in the Chautauqua assemblies and always on the lookout for attractive speakers. Dr. Henson had prepared a lecture entitled "Fools," and he was eagerly engaged to deliver it at Chautauqua.

There was an immense audience, and Dr. Vincent introduced him, saying:

"Ladies and gentlemen, we are to have a great treat this evening, in the shape of a lecture on 'Fools' by one——"

Here there was a look of consternation in the faces on the platform and a ripple of laughter through the audience. Pausing until this subsided, the speaker continued:

"Of the brightest men in the country."

This witty surprise caused tumultuous merriment, which did not subside for a moment after Dr. Henson came forward. There was a gleam in his eye, and everybody was curious to hear how he would treat this unique introduction. He began:

"Ladies and gentlemen, I am not half as big a fool as Dr. Vincent——"

Here the laughter broke again with redoubled vigor. Pausing, in his turn, until it had quieted down, he continued:

"Would have you believe?"

The lecturer made a graceful bow to his introducer, and the roar that greeted this ready sally was such that it was some time before he could begin his lecture.

THE BABY.

Where did you come from, baby dear?
Out of the everywhere into the here.

Where did you get your eyes so blue?
Out of the sky as I came through.

What makes the light in them sparkle and spin?
Some of the starry spikes left in.

Where did you get that little tear?
I found it waiting when I got here.

What makes your forehead so smooth and high?
A soft hand stroked it as I went by.

What makes your cheek like a warm, white rose?
Something better than any one knows.

Whence that three-cornered smile of bliss?
Three angels gave me at once a kiss.

Where did you get that pearly ear?
God spoke and it came out to hear.

Where did you get those arms and hands?
Love made itself into bonds and bands.

Feet, whence did you come, you darling things?
From the same box as the cherubs' wings.

How did they all just come to be you?
God thought about me, and so I grew.

But how did you come to us, you dear?
God thought about you, and so I am here.

George Macdonald.

OUR PULPIT.

PITY OF GOD IN CHRIST.

W. Douglas Mackenzie, D. D.

TEXT: John 5:3. In these lay a multitude of them that were sick, blind, halt, withered; and a certain man was there who had been thirty and eight years in his infirmity. When Jesus saw him lying and knew he had been now a long time in that case, he said unto him, Wouldst thou be made whole?

JESUS is the picture of God's pity. As you see him moving across that distant land, through those far-off days, you must clothe him with pity as with a garment. Whenever he goes he beholds distress, much of it conscious, physical, bitter, crying out; much of it unconscious, spiritual, dumb, deadly. You must picture him looking with his own eyes of clear insight, of melting tenderness, eyes that had the most royal look in them, condemning wrong, and eyes that had a yearning look as of one who would fain get rid of all evil and see work done that is too great to be done at once. You must behold him moving thus as Pity among men, and ever as he moves you must say to yourself, That is the revelation of God's pity. Every movement of tenderness, every word of kindness, is the movement and word of the Eternal Love. The eternal, all-pervading pity of God has figured forth once for all in that one Man's form, and moved with holy power among the sinful, among the broken hearts of Palestine.

When Jesus, we do not know why, perhaps drawn only by his pity, came there where all that sick folk lay around that pool of Bethesda, he found, with the quick, searching glance of the Savior of mankind, the one man who needed help most. It was a strange scene he came to. I suppose you have heard others speak of the depressing effects of living for a while at some health resort where all the talk every day was about ailments; where this one recalled the symptoms of yesterday and that one prophesied the symptoms of tomorrow; where nothing could be thought of but the cure for this ailment and the value of that other remedy. People who are in health are filled with dismay when surrounded by conversation of this kind from morning until night, and they say, "How depressing this is." How depressing it must have been to see those people who lay around Bethesda—the large basin of spring water where they washed the sheep before they took them up to the altar of God. Because this pool was made by a spring that bubbled up at intervals, troubling the surface of the calm waters, people had somehow got it into their heads that if they could plunge into it just at the moment when it was troubled they would be cured. Perhaps this water had produced real alleviation of some diseases, as many waters have done, and the sick folk of those days imagined there was magic in it. They came to believe that only a few could be cured if they plunged in at the very moment the water was troubled. Some could not move as fast as others, for the nature of their ills prevented them, and there was one man who had not been able to move fast enough for eight and thirty years. For eight and thirty years he listened to that talk, watched some arrive, be healed and go; watched others die there and saw them dragged off by officials to be buried somewhere! He, himself, had tried time after time in the earlier years, hoping that he might be there first and take the saving plunge into those waters of life; and the years passed, ten and ten and ten and nearly ten years more; and now, when Jesus comes round and finds the man who has been there longest, the man who needs help most, he asks him this question, "Wilt thou be made whole?" Does it seem either a mocking or an unnecessary or a cruel question to ask? "You have been here a long time, my friend; do you really want to be cured? You have haunted this place for many years; do you really want to be healed?" Was it in mockery and in cruel derision that the words were spoken? Nay, it was necessary to ask them. A man who has been eight and thirty years suffering and waiting has got into despair. He now thinks the thing is impossible; and because the thing is impossible he does not think of it very much as a personal matter now. The very desire, mayhap, has grown weaker, the very anxiety has grown duller, and now does he really yearn every day to be cured? Perhaps he does not. There are many cases where prolonged sickness has killed the very idea of cure; where prolonged ill-health has destroyed the very thought of ever regaining health itself; no condition can be more sad than that, and, therefore, when Jesus asks him, "Wilt thou be made whole?"—Ah! and there is that look, a look that sometimes you think you see in some people's faces if they are only good enough, but a look that was never seen in perfection except in that one face, the look that was itself a message of hope from the very heart of God. That look, filled with power, spiritual, pure and bright as heaven, would thrill a man to whom he addressed a question like that, and the man's heart would beat again, the old desires awaken again, the long dead hopes suddenly shine again, even the pulse would beat a little faster that had been growing slow and slender for eight and thirty years. "Wilt thou be made whole?" The very question aroused the passion for life. It was the kindest thing to say to the man; to make him whole by first asking him that question, "Wilt thou be made whole?"

Is it not the same in the spiritual life? For all these stories are told in this gospel as signs, meaning more than you see on the visible side, more than you hear in the mere reference to external facts. There is a spiritual side to them all. And is there not a question like that that ought to be asked of every human being now—the question, "Wilt thou be made whole?" There are sometimes coming about a church people who have for a long time given up the hope of becoming Christians, people who have felt that not for them is the Divine cure, not for them were these experiences that others speak of, not for them the light that comes from above into the heart of man, not for them this sense of forgiveness, this new hope, the joy of the Christian soul; they have given up desiring it because they have given up hoping. A great many keep on going to church partly because it is their habit to do so, partly because they know they ought to do so, partly because there is working underneath the dull feeling, "Well, some day the light may break and I will give it a chance; I will always be at the pool." To such people this is God's word today, "Wilt thou be made whole?" Do you really desire to be made whole? If Christ could now ask you that question, looking in upon your character, upon your heart, looking in upon your conscience, upon your will, "Do you desire life eternal? Do you desire to be cured?" what would your answer be? Do not you feel the desire? Does not the pulse beat a little faster? Do not you say, "Oh, that I might behold his face and hear that voice! Oh, that I might feel that spiritual hand laid upon my heart and that gift of the Everlasting poured into my soul!"

Jesus asked the question and then gave the blessing. He had suddenly said, "Wilt thou be made whole?" and then when the man explained to him that his hope was gone, that he had failed through eight and thirty years, Jesus, without further ado, said, "Arise, take up thy bed and walk." Arise, take up thy bed and walk! Do something! Do something! There must have been a strange feeling of energy which passed throughout that man's frame; for the very word of Jesus conveyed the power. The Divine Word is always creative; indeed, we know how, even within the range of human experience, a strong word of a strong person will sometimes give an access of energy to another. That which we read in small print in our life must be read in large print in God's life; his word must have a mightier power, a power as much greater as he is greater than we. If you will take Christ at his word you will find that his word is powerful. People are always looking for power outside faith, outside the very word of Christ, accepted by the heart. They do not realize that the Spirit of God flows along the channel of a man's faith. When a man has this faith in Christ and acts on it, then there may come at first only a tiny streamlet, a faint trickle of new hope, but it grows; and the late terrors are being broken down, as doubt after doubt goes, as sin after sin is given up, as one generous deed after another widens the channel and hope after hope deepens it. As a man's faith becomes larger because he is doing more and yielding more, then more of the might of the Spirit of God comes into his life. But you must be content to have the Spirit of God in proportion to the channel. Will you begin, then, this morning, you who have wandered long and have often heard the word of Christ and then said, "Is this for me?" just begin by putting that in the opposite way—"This is for me! This is for me!" Say it over and over until you force the channel open. Say it over and over until the first tiny tricklet of joy comes into your heart and you know the waters of life are flowing from the river that springs from the throne of God down to your heart.

Jesus found this man afterwards in the temple. The man had gone there, most likely and most rightly, to give thanks. He may have expected to receive there the congratulations of his friends. But he had gone there because there was no other place for a man who had been kept by his condition out of the temple and away from God for eight and thirty years; nowhere to go first, but the very presence of Jehovah. As he went he met one after another of his acquaintances, no doubt, who looked at him and said, "Where did I see that man before?" and the friend walking with him said, "I thought I recognized that face." And then they looked at each other with a sudden and startling recollection. "Is that the man we used to pity and give coins to?" They ran after him and plucked him by the arm and said, "Are you that man?" and the face that was so changed said, "Yes, I am." One after another of the human beings who knew congratulated him, and one after another of those human beings who hated Jesus cursed him. And he went to the temple and there he gave thanks to the everlasting God. While he gave thanks Jesus met him and spoke to him, "Behold, thou art made whole. Sin no more lest a worse thing befall thee." Worse than thirty-eight years of prolonged sickness and hope deferred and deep despair and a gradual loss of human consciousness! Worse than a return to the brutal life because the man could not do anything human with the poor, maimed, helpless body he had! Could anything be worse than that? Surely, even death would not be worse than that. If you had asked the man at the beginning of the thirty-eight years he would have said, "Rather would I die now and have it over with than live all that time in utter misery and uncertainty and gloom." What is worse than that? Jesus says that worse things will come if the man does not give up sinning. Usually interpreters make up their minds that this suggests that the form of disease from which he suffered was the result and penalty of sin. There are, of course, various kinds of diseases which come as the reward of sin, and it is true, also, that, in any case, every form of sin works itself out in the physical as well as in the spiritual world. But when Jesus speaks to him about sin and says he must sin no more lest a worse thing befall him, he surely is making him think directly of God and his religious experience. He cannot have thirty-eight years of suffering again. It is somewhere in another region, after another form, that this worse thing may come to the man if he persists in his sin. Jesus warns him, as he faithfully and honestly warns every man, that sin has its retribution in the spiritual and in the eternal world, and that every soul which trifles with sin must reckon with this fact and confront this inevitable reality. Do not let us be deceived into a superficial carelessness in our own lives and characters. Do not let us allow ourselves to think so superficially of God as to imagine that we can mock him, choosing sin and hoping at last to reap blessing all the same. Let us remember that from the tender heart of Jesus, the faithful heart of Jesus, came this warning, this terrific warning of the worse thing. It must be the worst conceivable that must come to the man who chooses the worst kind of life to live.

But why did Jesus say that to the man? You see he did not speak to the man about sin first. He was not like some people you have heard of, who will always preach to a man before they give him food if he is starving and who will speak to a man about his sins before they attend to his diseases. I do not myself believe in the existence of many such inhuman creatures. But observe that Jesus has the very opposite plan; that Jesus, first of all, with his royal generosity, gave that mercy to the man's physical life and then, when he met him in the temple, he proceeded to deal with the deeper danger. Perhaps the man was too glad, or rather glad in a superficial way, merely elated without humility, merely gratified without faith. Perhaps Jesus saw that the man's character had not been changed. Thirty-eight years of sin do not of themselves improve a man's character. There are sins that people do not give up, although they suffer the evident retribution of them. They go on loving the sin in spite of the fierce penalty which they have experienced. There is nothing harder in the world than to separate sin from a man's soul, to kill our love of our special form of sin. It needs more than retribution to tear it from the heart, more than passing penalties of this world's experience, to rid a man of that shame which has been the secret root of his character and the secret cause of his misery. It takes more than the misery to cure the man. And Jesus, knowing all that, comes close to him and says quietly, but firmly, "You have been cured of that disease; the great thing to be attended to now is that sin of yours; that sin that you used to pursue and have not got out of your heart in thirty-eight years of discipline; that which today still has its grip upon your affection and your will. You must get rid of that. It must be separated from your soul; for, remember, now, after this healing, if the grasp of that foul hand upon your heart is still loved and welcomed by your very soul, then not thirty-eight years of lying at the pool of Bethesda, but something worse must come."

Do you hear and see the pity of God speaking through that warning of Jesus? Do you hear him speaking to your own heart about your own sin, oh, soul of mine? Do you hear it as it falls out of the Unseen upon your spirit now and says, "My child, go thou, sin no more"? It is God's pity for you that speaks through another man this morning and warns you and calls you and exhorts you and pleads with you. Oh, listen to that pity and let it melt your heart to penitence, for Christ's sake!

JACOB A PRINCE WITH GOD.

Lesson for September 15, 1901: Gen. 32:1-32.

*Golden Text: Men Ought Always to Pray and Not to Faint

A CHICAGO TEACHER'S NOTES ON THE LESSON.

Elias A. Long.

Time of Lesson.

THE date of this lesson is computed at B. C. 1739 or 1740. But all dates in Jacob's life are uncertain. Some think from Gen. 31:38 and 31:41 that Jacob served Laban for two periods of twenty years each. As generally reckoned ninety-seven years of Jacob's life precede and fifty-seven years follow the great interview at Peniel.

The Victory Over Self.

This lesson is about yielding up self in order to greater usefulness. Jacob was a self-made man. He had left his boyhood home, a poor wanderer; he returns as a man who had greatly prospered in his life occupation. Naturally of a strong, rugged, crafty character, he, mentally and physically, felt himself to be a match for any man. It is well to be self-reliant, provided we recognize that in God we live, and move, and have our being, and accordingly subordinate all we are and have to him. Jacob, like many of us, was slow in learning this lesson. Realizing his ability to more than hold his own in his dealings with men, he must learn that no man can be a match for the strength of God. Chosen to be a pioneer in the kingdom of God, until he can be brought to a full surrender of self, he will be unfitted for his great mission. If he will not sacrifice his extreme self-confidence it must be wrested from him; the Jacob-nature must be broken before he can become the initial link in God's broadening work for humanity. This stage of discipline in Jacob's life closes with the fervent prayers of the present chapter and the answers thereto.

V. 1-2. Headed for Canaan. "Jacob went his way." Towards the promised land as commanded. Ch. 31:13. * * * "Angels of God met him." This occurred at Mahanaim as he proceeds to enter the land. The angels are sent to encourage and assure him of the Divine Presence. Jacob recognizes them as God's host. V. 2. Others in later ages have thus recognized the angels. Ps. 103:21; 148:2; Luke 2:13.

V. 3-5. Embassy to Esau. "Messengers to Esau." No sooner does Jacob find himself free from Laban, his father-in-law, than he realizes that he has another even more formidable enemy to deal with, Esau. The meeting with him is anticipated by dispatching an embassy before venturing his caravan into the country. * * * "Unto the land of Seir . . . Edom." The country lying east and south of the Dead Sea occupied and permanently settled by Esau and his descendants. Deut. 2:12. * * * "To tell my Lord . . . find grace in thy sight." He will thus test Esau as to whether he may be favorably received.

V. 6-8. Alarming Response. "Esau . . . and four hundred men." The wronged brother's answer came in tones most terrible to this man of peace, as the words regarding Esau's formidable force could mean nothing less than war and destruction. Instead of an angel host as at Mahanaim, it is the warlike host of an avenger that he has to contemplate. * * * "Jacob . . . greatly afraid and distressed." Jacob has now to reap from the sin he has sowed when he had cheated Esau many years before. That sin had been the bitter curse of his lifetime. His sin found him out. Num. 32:23. All his camp must have been shaken by the alarming news of Esau's coming, for Jacob even feared that his wives and children would be slaughtered. V. 11. The anticipations were something awful. * * * "Divided into two bands?" But Jacob will do his best. He devises the scheme of breaking up his caravan into two separate sections (V. 7) in the hope that at least one will escape. V. 8.

V. 9-12. Prayer with Planning. "Jacob said." But besides planning Jacob was driven to God in earnest prayer. In his distress, as on the occasion many years before, noted in our last lesson, he cries to the God for help. The prayer in its profession of humility and reliance on God is a model for all ages. It makes clear, that with all of Jacob's continued faults, and his slowness of growth into a saint, the state of his heart is such as to promise ultimate sainthood. It is the petition of a kind, devout husband and a tender father. * * * "I am not worthy." He is amazed at the grace of God so soon following his former sinfulness.

V. 13-20. Weapons of Peace. "The present for Esau." True prayer, with humility of heart, leads Jacob to soften towards his brother in the desire to leave nothing undone for appeasing his brother in his long time grudge. In this Jacob shows his shrewd, worldly wisdom tempered by a kindly, peaceable heart. * * * "Every drove by themselves." The large offering tells us of Jacob's great fear and distress, amounting to little less than a panic-stricken state. The present consisted of 580 animals, a drove each of goats, sheep, camels, cattle, and asses. Vs. 14-16. * * * "Unto my lord Esau." Besides the present, which he wisely planned to send in one detachment after another, he sends words of lofty esteem indicating real humility towards his brother, as before in his prayer he had shown humility towards God. The humble spirit often proves the entering wedge of relief in the troubles of life.

V. 21-23. A Busy Night. "So went the present over." The droves were dispatched at once, even the same night, for Esau then was on his way and no time can be lost. * * * "Himself lodged that night." Taking a brief rest before carrying out further plans. * * * "That night took wives, servants, sons . . . sent over." All of these must be forsaken in this close approach to God. Matt. 19:29. * * * "Passed over Jabbok." Jabbok was a stream flowing west into the Jordan, emptying into it about thirty miles north of the Dead Sea.

V. 24. The Seeming Adversary. "Jacob was left alone." As on the occasion of his Bethel dream. Jacob now, by God's grace, is to learn that not Esau, but himself is his greatest enemy. * * * "There wrestled."

Jacob had long prided himself on his physical as well as his mental strength in overcoming obstacles (Ch. 29:2, 10), hence an actual physical encounter takes place, aimed at the many-sided Jacob-nature. When we are strong, then are we weak. Pride goeth before a fall. * * * "A man will fall by him." It was an angel, and none other than God manifested in the flesh, as V. 30 shows. Doubtless, it was the Lord Jesus himself who thus condescended to impart the needed lesson to Jacob, demonstrating by an active parable God's omnipotence and man's feebleness. It is no harder to believe that the Angel of God wrestled with Jacob for his spiritual profit, than that the same angel should have visited Abraham's tent. Let us not understand this wrestling as being in the nature of "wrestling in prayer" either actually or symbolically. We need to be impressed that God is always more eager to give truly good things, than we are to receive them. But this wrestling led to true prayer (V. 26), which followed Jacob's surrender in utter helplessness to God.

V. 25. Fighting Against God. "He prevailed not." The Divine wrestler allowed the contest to proceed, permitting Jacob's confidence in his own power to continue for a time, that the great lesson involved might be the more forcible. Men now are often permitted to go on in seeming success, fairly fighting against God, as if they had "flesh of brass," when in truth they are very frail. Job 6:12; Acts 5:29. * * * "Touched . . . his thigh." The sinew of his thigh (V. 32), the strongest in the human body. * * * "Out of joint as wrestled." At length Omnipotence is manifested by a single touch, which renders Jacob perfectly helpless. Persons full of vigor often are in mercy touched by infirmity, made helpless on beds of pain, to the end that they may realize man's weakness; and be brought to consider interests supremely greater than those of earth.

V. 26. The Helpless Suppliant. "Let me go for day breaketh." The first words are those of the Divine One speaking to the truly helpless Jacob, now clinging to his opponent in despair. To Jacob this evidently was a challenge to test his strength now entirely broken. * * * "I will not . . . except thou bless me." Here we find Jacob advancing from wrestling to prayer as now he realizes that his contestant is none other than God himself (V. 30), to whose mercy he appeals. This prayer, according to Hosea 12:4, was a most pathetic supplication uttered in weeping. The strong Jacob at last reaches the end of his conspicuous self-reliance. Body and heart broken, with the fountain of his tears opened, the helpless man clutches his strong victor and utters the true, although brief, prayer here expressed. He at last finds the weapon of a meek and guileless spirit wherewith both God and man may be conquered.

V. 27. Confession of Sin. "What is thy name?" The question means little less than, "What is thy character?" for names in that day were bestowed as an indication of character. Jacob—like Peter when he denied the Savior—although he before had seen and knew the Lord (Ch. 28:16; Luke 22:32), yet his conversion heretofore had not been complete. * * * "And he said, Jacob." The humble man confesses his sin in freely acknowledging that name, Jacob, "Supplanter" and trickster. If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. 1 John 1:9.

V. 28-29. The Answered Prayer. "Thy name . . . no more Jacob." Very promptly comes the asked-for blessing; but only because Jacob's heart now was fit to receive. Twenty years before God had come into the life of Jacob, but had not yet been received to an extent that lead him to do away with all craft. At last the conversion is complete; his character reaches a permanent change. Henceforth, in place of an ignominious name, he is to wear a glorious one. If our names on the records of to-day are not actually changed with conversion, we may obtain the good name that is better than great riches. Prov. 22:1. * * * "Israel." A spiritual hero of God. Be it said to the credit of his descendants, this name, rather than that of Jacob, was the ideal of the poets and prophets of the race. * * * "As a prince . . . hast thou power with God and man." He was to have power even with Esau. This power had already begun to manifest itself, after the prayer of Vs. 9-12, in the sending of gifts and gracious messages instead of an armed force. No one can stand against earnest, persistent supplications, made in true faith by one who believes he shall receive. No one can persistently show the love of God towards even an estranged brother, without having power to prevail with him. From this moment dates the true patriarch in Jacob. But there were some later missteps.

* * * "And Jacob said tell me . . . thy name." We all desire to know more of God. In the incarnation of the Son is found the granting of the natural desire to look upon, and better understand, the Infinite. * * * "Wherefore ask . . . after my name." The knowledge of God's name, as indicating the divine character, was too deep for Jacob's capacity, then and there to be disclosed. Jacob, however, was learning God's character through his experience with the Divine acts. * * * "He blessed him." This blessing was God's answer to Jacob's inquiry. The blessings of God always increase with our increased knowledge of God's adorable qualities. We have very many ways of knowing God, which Jacob had not, chiefly in the person of his beloved Son, and through his completed word.

V. 30. Place of God's Face. "Jacob called the name Peniel." The name means "The face of God." Years before Jacob named a resting place Bethel, meaning the house of God. God had remained the same, but Jacob had been led into new experiences and thus nearer to God. * * * "I have seen God face to face." There are different ways of seeing God. In some senses man cannot see God and live. See in the case of Moses. Ex. 33:20. Yet in some other manner Moses saw the Lord face to face. Ex. 33:11. Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God; shall see him even now. Matt. 5:8.

FIVE-MINUTE SERMON ON THE GOLDEN TEXT.

By Peter Ainslie.

THINK that it was Dean Alford who said, "The earnest desire of the heart is prayer." This is a prayerful state, but it could hardly be called prayer. It is the normal condition of the heart to so live that it would not be out of place by conversation or act to turn at once and say, "Let us pray." That is continual prayer, if several times through the day we have found a quiet place to stop our thoughts from all things else and pour out our best affection to God, and then to keep in a spirit ready to pray whatever comes upon us. We must pray continually. It is not only our privilege and chief duty, but we commit sin if we neglect to pray. It is an insult to God. It is casting indifference upon salvation, which he both wrought out with such enormous cost; and taking the affairs of universal government and individual destiny into our own hands. A man who does not pray is conceited and blasphemous in all his acts, but to pray is not going to prayers. You may laugh at the Roman Catholic counting his beads—you say that there is no prayer in that, and yet if you say your prayers as indifferently as the Roman Catholic counts his beads there is no more in your prayer than in his beads. He counts his beads and you say your words with just as little concern. In many things Protestants are gradually becoming Roman Catholics. They deny the Catholic form, but maintain the Catholic spirit, which is frequently pure formalism. Now, prayer is talking to the Almighty—the most exalted position in this world. To hold conversation with God is bound to make men better. He promises to hear and to answer. If the answer is longer coming than we think it ought to be, remember that God knows more than the best of us. We must not despair; we must not get discouraged; we must not faint; we must remember it is God to whom we are speaking and he has promised to do for us as we need and his promise cannot be broken. Impossibility is written there. In his own time and in his own way he will do. It is far better that that should be the case than that the answer should come in our time and in our own way. He is looking ahead. He knows the heart and sometimes there is no place for the blessing if it were to come—no heart preparation, and it would be like pouring water into a bucket without a bottom. God sometimes has to wait a long time, not on his own account, but on our account. It lays foundations. He builds from the hidden depths. Then pray, pray continually; pray without discouragement. Do not let God know that you faint in your prayers, but trust him at his word.

Our Father, here we are again. Thou art so good and we have said it a thousand times. Help us to be courageous in our approach to thee. Amen.

TRUE HONOR.

Topic Sept. 15: Ref. John, 5:41-44.

NOTHING is the superlative character of Jesus indicated more strikingly than in his renunciation of the honors of the world.

The Supreme Choice.

The temptation of Jesus in the wilderness is impressive in its relation to this matter of choice. The first form of temptation appealed to his physical appetite. It is first because it is just here that ordinary men are most easily overcome. Failing in this appeal the tempter twice approaches the Master in the most subtle form of temptation—the appeal to his love of applause and honor. All noble souls desire to be known and honored. Only the ignoble can be indifferent to this natural craving for the recognition and reverence of mankind. I do not think that Jesus was indifferent to this, but he recognized the supreme choice. That the temptation came with great force is shown in the intensity with which he repelled the approach: "Get thee behind me, Satan; for it is written, thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve."

The temptation following appealed to the innate love of the human heart for the spectacular. "Cast thyself down from the pinnacle of the temple." This would win instant recognition and the acclamation of the populace. It is a lower form of temptation, but perhaps the most subtle of all. Its appeal is to the desire for quick recognition. The applause of the hour is more attractive to some temperaments than the more enduring honors of statecraft, or the exercise of kingly authority.

The character of Christ is revealed in the manner in which he resisted and repelled the temptations that assailed him, in the solitude that surrounded his soul, in the crisis of the beginning of his earthly ministry. Out of the loneliness of the wilderness waiting came the renunciation of the honors of the world, and the supreme choice of his humanity and his divine sonship. It was this victory that made it possible and easy for him to say, in the midst of the popular demonstration that greeted him later, "I receive not honor of men." No one can truly say this, as the Master did, who has not made the supreme choice of God and his service.

The True Life of Faith.

The relation existing between the true life of faith and the choice of the world's honor is vital. "How can ye believe, who receive honor one of another, and seek not the honor that cometh of God only?" And we may still ask, "How?" Few, indeed, among politicians and professional men can make any just claim to the true life of faith. The Scribes and Pharisees of Jesus' time were politicians, with the law as their party shibboleth. But they had made void its great principles by their traditions, seeking the honors of men and the emoluments of office. And for the same causes they rejected the One who came in the Father's name.

THE QUIET HOUR.

[The International Bible Reading Association Daily Readings.]

By The Rev. Alexander Smellie, M. A.

ABRAHAM AND ISAAC.

"By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac; and he that had received the promises offered up his only begotten son." Hebrews 11, 17.

Monday—Genesis 22, 1-8.

"God will provide," Abraham said. And what does God provide?

Bread when I am hungry; it seems natural to begin there. No doubt Abraham had something else in his thought; but I cannot lose altogether the promise of bodily sustenance which so often has been drawn from the words. My God will supply my daily need—it is a staff for me to lean and rest upon, a staff which will not break nor fail nor disappoint.

Help when I am helpless; that, also, is what God provides. He did it for Abraham. He opened for him a path to the discharge of a duty which seemed impossible. If I am ready in my weakness to do whatever he enjoins, I shall find that heaven itself furnishes what is necessary for my burnt-offering. The work, the battle, the sacrifice, which are too difficult for me, are not too difficult for God.

And salvation when I am burdened by sin: that, too, he provides. It was a lamb for the altar that he prepared on the bare mountain-top of Moriah. On the green hill of Calvary, not far off, in the end of the days, he prepared a better Lamb, the Lamb without blemish and without spot. I am healed by his stripes. I have rest by his sorrow and life by his death.

Thus all my wants are met.

Tuesday—Genesis 22, 9-19.

"In the Mount of the Lord it shall be provided."

Yes, in the Mount of the Lord. In the place where I look to him, and plead with him, and wait for him. Outside there is only a waste wilderness of famine and death; there, there alone, he is certain to meet with me. But it is a happy thing that I do not require, as Abraham required, to spend two slow days of footsore walking, along rugged paths, up hill and down dale, before I can arrive at the Mount of the Lord. Wherever I am, the sanctuary may be where I cry and he responds.

It may be the pew where I have often brought him a cold and heartless worship, or the pulpit where I have often failed to speak as his ambassador should. It may be the home or the neighborhood or the situation, in which everything seems to shut out from me the lustre and the bloom and the fragrance of the skies. It may be the corner of a field, to which I turned aside to supplicate his mercy. It may be a sickroom, or the darkened chamber of sorrow, within those walls for the first time prayer becomes a living and prevailing force.

Anywhere and everywhere I may discover the Mount of the Lord. Anywhere and everywhere I may be alone with him. But I must be there if I am to enjoy the provision of his love.

Wednesday—Genesis 26, 1–5.

The child is blessed for the father's sake.

If I have a godly ancestry, then the covenant of the Lord is made with me. His love was not exhausted with the life and death of my parents; so profoundly did he care for them that his love descends for their sakes on my head. It would be hard indeed, to tell how far it will descend, or when its influence will cease; it seems unchangeable as God is himself.

And if I have a godly ancestry, I breathe from the beginning the healthiest atmosphere. The very air of a Christian land and a Christian household is salutary and invigorating. When the divine commandments and the gracious Gospel have been known for ages, everything is leavened and elevated and ennobled by them. I cannot be too thankful for the difference they make.

And if I have a godly ancestry, I have had the best teaching and the sublimest example. I can never estimate how much I owe to the lessons of those who have gone before me, to the holy lives which lie behind me. It is a thought both inspiring and solemnizing that I am the heir of such a heritage. Sparta is my birthplace—nay, not Sparta, but Zion; let me adorn it.

It is a great responsibility, as well as a great benediction to be the child of a good father.

Thursday—James 2, 14–25.

Out of my faith works must flow—such works as Abraham's, when at God's commandment he was ready to offer up his only son. Yet into the doing of these works faith will continue to enter; I can never perform them unless I trust implicitly in the grace and power of my sufficient Lord.

Is it the discipline of my own soul, and my growth upwards to spiritual perfection? Is it the conquest of other souls for my Savior and King? Is it the leavening of the world with his truth? I am powerless before such tasks. Some portions of the road are rough, and some are steep, and some are dark, and some are slippery; and my heart is discouraged because of the way. The world is ever pressing on me, and the flesh drains the life out of the spirit, and manifold conflicts exhaust my strength.

Thus it is essential that even into my works I should carry faith—faith in my Redeemer, and Keeper, and Friend. When I go forward confiding in him, I discover that impossibilities are gloriously attainable. I may say Farewell to fretfulness, and impatience, and despair. The fountains of my refreshment are in the heart of God, and they are perennial and inexhaustible—fountains of an eternal youth.

Friday—Romans 4, 1–15.

Let me carry Abraham's triumphant faith into the matter of my salvation. In spite of the multitude of my sins, in spite of the accusations of my conscience, let me believe God in Jesus Christ. He will in no wise cast me out.

What did William Guthrie say two centuries and a half ago? Listen, my soul.

Thy sin can be no excuse to thee for refusing the offer of peace and salvation through Christ, since any man who will is allowed to come and take. . . . The great God of heaven and earth hath sovereignly commanded all who see their need of relief to betake themselves unto Christ Jesus, and to close cordially with his device of saving sinners by him, laying aside all objections. . . . Canst thou say that thy sins and condition are such as that thou durst not adventure upon Christ's perfect righteousness for thy relief, notwithstanding of the Lord's own command often interposed, and in a manner his credit engaged?"

Surely, doubting heart of mine, thou wilt not, with all thy unbelief and fear, say that?

Saturday—Micah 6, 1–8.

Wherewith shall I come before the Lord?

Not with the religion of observances. Ecclesiastical forms and ceremonies, rites, and penances, and gifts, feasts, and fasts, and sacraments—I can easily attach an undue importance to them. I may put church-going in the place of Christ-going. I may rest in the outward act rather than the inward surrender.

And not with the religion of moralities. That is external, while God looks on the heart. That is careful of human requirements, but often careless of divine. That fails to satisfy the profoundest needs of the soul. "It's all too little," as Thomas Chalmers said in the days when he practiced it.

And not with the religion of emotions. I may have much feeling, and yet not be a child in the family of the Father. I may mistake my feeling for the work of the Holy Spirit. I may put romance and yearning, excitement and tears, in the room of saving grace. Redemption is deeper than emotion.

It comes to this, that the religion which God approves is centered on Christ and not on myself. When he is mine, observance and morality and emotion all get their fitting recognition. Now I do justly; now I love mercy; now I walk humbly with my Lord—now, but not until now.

Sunday—Hebrews 11, 15–19.

Abraham accounted that God "is able to raise up, even from the dead."

I must understand my complete impotence; I must see and confess that there is no skill nor power, outlet nor victory, in me; I must find myself at my wits' end, at the lowest extremity, on the verge of destruction; and then he will interpose. I am driven to the edge of the precipice before his salvation arrives. It is not that he has any pleasure in seeing me in desperation. But he wants to take out of me every vestige of self-reliance and self-righteousness. He wants to make me depend wholly on himself. He wants to draw from me the cry, "My foot slippeth," in order that I may throw my whole soul into the thanksgiving, "Thy mercy held me up."

So, if I would experience the riches of his goodness, I must comprehend first how much I need them, and how they must come to me of his pure love alone; beggared and bankrupt I must take them freely, as one who has nothing to pay.

"Man's weakness, leaning upon God,
Its end can never miss."

WHAT GENTLE WILL MISSED.

If Shakespeare were on earth to-day
And writing those great works of his, no doubt
The critics would have something nice to say
Concerning each book, as he brought it out.

And this, or something like it, they would write:
"Will Shakespeare's 'Hamlet's' clever in its way,
But rather crude—still let him try; he might Write something that will be worth while some day."

General Church News

ACROSS THE WATER.

A sign of the times may be noted in the choice of Dr. W. T. Davison as president of the English Wesleyan Conference. For nine years he has held the professorship of Biblical Exegesis in Richmond College, and for eleven years the chair of Systematic Theology at Handsworth College, Birmingham. In this country he will be remembered by his delivery of a notable address on "Inspiration and Biblical Criticism," during the last Ecumenical Methodist Conference here. This election by a church noted for its conservative and evangelical spirit, of a leading biblical scholar who is in accord with the progress of modern thought on biblical subjects, indicates a recognition of the fact that an acceptance of the results of scientific criticism is not incompatible with earnest effort for the saving of men.

Hugh Price Hughes, the famous English Wesleyan preacher, has broken down in health from overwork, and absolute rest has been ordered for at least six months. He represents the "forward movement" in British Methodism and has made The Methodist Times a strong paper. The West London Mission has been conducted by him and Rev. Mark Guy Pearse almost entirely, and his withdrawal from it will be a great loss.

Thousands gathered at Keswick in the Lake district of England, during the last week in July, for the annual meetings now so widely known. Three main services were held each day in the tents, one seating 2,400 and the other 1,200, which were usually well filled. Additional services were held in halls and churches in the town. Personal responsibility for the salvation of the world and entire consecration to God were the principal themes. Ten missionaries from various lands spoke at one meeting to at least 3,000 hearers, and a large number of young men and women responded to their appeal for helpers.

Dr. George F. Pentecost, once pastor of a Baptist church in Boston and later of a Congregational church in Brooklyn and now in charge of a Presbyterian congregation in London, proposes to return to this country and take up evangelistic work.

The "Christian Commonwealth" of London, formerly edited by Dr. W. T. Moore, and representing in general the interests of the Disciples of Christ in England, has been sold to Mr. Albert Dawson, and will be continued as an interdenominational journal. Mr. Paul Moore, who has been the acting editor and manager for some time past, is on his way to this country to reside.

The only denomination which has so far succeeded in raising its twentieth century fund is the United Wesleyan Free church of Great Britain. It has even out-run its aim of $500,000, having secured $9,000 surplus. It has good cause to be proud of this showing, as it gives an average of over five dollars per member and only twenty members failed to give something to the fund.

Rev. F. B. Meyer has been elected president of the London Sunday School Union for 1902. Mr. Meyer's energies and activities as pastor, preacher, writer, organizer and leader of religious movements seem to be inexhaustible. His last Sunday evening service before his vacation was the anniversary of the fourteen Sunday schools connected with his parish, which enroll 4,700 children.

A message of high emprise was that given by the late Bishop of Durham to the miners on July 20. Recognizing that it was probably his last opportunity, he dwelt on the advance in material prosperity, urging that spiritual progress ought to be no less rapid, and as his last word to them, he testified that in a long and laborious life he had found the love of Christ to be the most prevailing power to sustain right endeavor. It was the secret of a nobler life. The watchword of untiring service to God and man was "the love of Christ strengtheneth us," and he asked his hearers to take these words to the home, the club and the mine, and act upon them.

The Methodist Ecumenical Conference to be held in City Road Chapel, London, September 4-17, will have 500 members, 200 of whom go from this country. The program contains the names of many American and Canadian Methodists, President Little of the Garrett Biblical Institute, Evans-ton, being amongst them. Bishop Williams, the colored bishop of Augusta, will read a paper upon "Methodism and Christian Union." Rev. Dr. C. B. Mitchell of Minneapolis is, we believe, the only Methodist pastor of the United States who will deliver an address. His subject is "Is Methodism Retaining its Spiritual Vitality?"

At the advent of the Australian commonwealth into legislative life, there was much discussion whether the proceedings should be opened with prayer. The churches were alive to the importance of this initial action and strenuously urged the affirmative. They carried their point. Standing orders providing for an opening prayer have been adopted by both houses of the commonwealth parliament.

In New Zealand the Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Methodists have united in the production of a single interdenominational journal. To each denomination is assigned an official section of the paper, which redounds to the common benefit of all the readers. The initial numbers are said to give satisfaction, but how the project will work in the long run is yet to be determined.

A happy revival of old customs was inaugurated recently when the Bishop of London held a solemn service of benediction on board the ship "Discovery" for its band of explorers about to sail for unknown Antarctic seas. He gave a touching and inspiring address to the sailors and their friends.

The dome of St. Paul's Cathedral is showing alarming cracks in its walls. Dean Gregory will urge parliamentary opposition to the proposed underground road which might imperil the foundations.

The Continental Mission Conference has just held its tenth meeting in Bremen, Germany, in the garden house of Mr. F. Victor, a Christian merchant. Forty-six foreign missionary specialists were present, leaders and officers of the great missionary societies—German, French, Dutch, Danish and Scandinavian. Some of the topics under discussion this year were "Principles and duties of Protestant Missions on the ground of the experience of the nineteenth century;" "Missions and Transmarine Politics in their Reciprocal Relations;" "The Financial Independence of Native Churches in Its special importance for the position of the Native Trader" and "How to Meet Romish Competition on the Mission Field." Papers were read on "The Human Rights of Natives in the Colonies;" "How to Suppress the African Liquor Traffic;" and "How To Provide the Press with Mission Information." This gathering meets once in four years and does much to promote comity and wise co-operative action. A committee of German missionary societies has charge of all matters of common interest between the conferences.

During the six months ending June 30 there were 6,148 conversions from Roman Catholicism to Protestantism in Austria. These figures are published by a German political leader and the cause of such large defection from the Catholic ranks is said to be due largely to priestly interference with racial aspirations.

In France also there is prospect of decided increase in the numerical strength of Protestantism. While the Romish church still retains a strong hold on the people and in many parts of the country they know no other religion, yet over 200 priests have left the Church of Rome during the last two or three years and most of them have joined Protestant churches. Increased success in the work of evangelization is also evident.

THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE.

Various happenings of late indicate a steadily growing sentiment in favor of temperance in quarters where it certainly would not have been found a few years ago.

At a recent meeting of the Minnesota Federation of Labor delegates from the retail liquor dealers' association were refused seats by a twice-repeated vote, the second being made even more emphatic than the first, being eighty-eight against admittance with only eleven in favor. The first vote was on the recommendation of the committee on credentials, the second, the next day, when an effort was made through the resolutions committee. The verbal expression of opinion was strong to the effect that the business was not a legitimate one.

An editorial in a Louisville paper said recently: "It is plain that the business conditions of today require the services of sober men. No others need apply." The New York Sun says: "Even the Tammany general committee, once called a collection of red noses, is now full of total abstainers; many of the great political leaders are total abstainers, and the same is true of the great leaders in finance, in trade and in the professions. Strict abstemiousness is the rule among them." The action of large corporations in refusing to retain in their employ men who drink or who smoke cigarettes is doing much to deepen the conviction that intemperance interferes with business and must therefore be ruled out.

At the international convention of the Roman Catholic Order of Foresters just held at Dubuque, Iowa, there was a strong sentiment in favor of shutting the doors against saloon keepers for the reason that such persons are considered to be very dangerous risks. When the vote was taken there were only nine votes lacking of the two-thirds required to bar them out of the order. The Catholic order of Knights of Columbus at their convention at Put-in-Bay last month passed a strict anti-treating resolution.

The Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America, which numbers over 85,000 persons, closed its annual meeting August 9. Resolutions were passed condemning the treating custom, reaffirming a belief in total abstinence as the best remedy for the evils of intemperance, and urging co-operative effort with non-Catholic associations against this common enemy. Archbishop Ireland was eloquent in enforcing the advantages of total abstinence. Rev. A. P. Doyle of New York, the secretary, reported an increase of nearly 100 new societies with 4,190 members.

The National Congress of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union was held at Buffalo, N. Y., this year. Nineteen states were represented. "Vice in the Philippine and Other Islands and our Duty to our New Possessions" was the title of a paper by Mrs. Susanna M. D. Fry of Illinois and a careful and important paper on "The Relation of the National W. C. T. U. to other Organizations" was given by Mrs. Katherine Lente Stevenson of Massachusetts. "Does the New Century Call for New W. C. T. U. Methods?" was the question considered by Mrs. Cora Seberry of New York; a discussion followed. Miss Anna Gordon gave a comprehensive paper on "A Quarter of a Century of Results from the Crusade Movement Through the National and World's W. C. T. U." Mrs. Margaret Dye Ellis of New Jersey opened up a vital question of the day in her paper on "The Anti-Canteen Law and the Sale of Liquor in Soldiers' Homes." This paper will be printed to help in the campaign to be earnestly waged this winter. On this subject the congress expressed its sentiments very definitely in the form of a declaration.

A conference of national temperance societies followed the congress, at which twelve national societies were represented and many church organizations. The body was thoroughly representative. Resolutions were adopted to petition Congress to prohibit the sale of liquor on military reservations and soldiers' homes, and to discourage its use in the army, and "to provide such an improved army ration, in quality, quantity, and efficiency of preparation as will make it unnecessary to resort to the profit on the sale of liquor." Special attention is to be given to law enforcement, and to the securing of needed legislation to fix responsibility on the proprietors of saloons and the owners of real estate on which liquor is sold, for all illegal acts committed on such premises, and to forbid the selling of Internal Revenue tax receipts in prohibitory territory.

In Topeka two weeks ago a liquor seller received the most severe sentence for violation of the prohibitory law that has ever been imposed since the law was adopted. Convicted on fifteen different counts of his indictment, he was fined $7,500 and given 1,350 days in jail. A few examples like that would stop the business of law defiance in Kansas.

A significant movement is on foot to remove the bars from the ferry boats of the S. P. R. R. Co. on San Francisco Bay. It has been endorsed by several of the strong churches of Oakland.

There is great rejoicing among temperance workers over the passing of a bill by the English Parliament forbidding the sale of intoxicants to children under sixteen years of age.

At a railway Y. M. C. A. meeting held at Galesburg, Ills., in August, Conductor W. R. Robinson of the Burlington Railroad, said he remembered years ago when there would be a case of beer in the way car of the freight, and engineers, brakemen and firemen would drink on the trip. "Engineers," backs to persons who write the most interesting, detailed and truthful descriptions of their experience on the following topics:

1. How have you been affected by coffee drinking and by changing from coffee to Postum?

2. Do you know any one who has been driven away from Postum because it came to the table weak and characterless at the first trial?

3. Did you set such a person right regarding the easy way to make Postum clear, black and with a crisp, rich taste?

4. Have you ever found a better way to make it than to use four heaping teaspoonsful to the pint of water, let stand on the stove until real boiling begins; then note the clock and allow it to continue easy boiling full fifteen minutes from that time, stirring down occasionally? (A piece of butter about the size of a navy bean, placed in the pot will prevent boiling over.)

5. Give names and account of those you know to have been cured or helped in health by the dismissal of coffee and the daily use of Postum Food Coffee in its place.

6. Write names and addresses of 20 friends whom you believe would be benefited by leaving off coffee. (Your name will not be divulged to them.)

Address your letter to the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich., writing your own name and address clearly.

Be honest and truthful; don't write poetry or fanciful letters; just plain, truthful statements.

Decisions will be made between October 30th and November 10th, 1901, by three judges, not members of the Postum Cereal Co., and a neat little box containing a $10 gold piece sent to each of the five best writers; a box containing a $5 gold piece to each of the 20 next best writers, a $2 greenback to each of the 100 next best, and a $1 greenback to each of the 200 next best writers, making cash prizes distributed to 325 persons.

Almost every one interested in pure food and drink is willing to have their name and letter appear in the papers, for such help as it may offer to the human race. However, a request to omit name will be respected.

Every friend of Postum is urged to write and each letter will be held in high esteem by the company, as an evidence of such friendship, while the little boxes of gold and envelopes of money will reach many modest writers whose plain and sensible letters contain the facts desired, although the sender may have but small faith in winning at the time of writing.

Talk this subject over with your friends and see how many among you can win prizes. It is a good, honest competition and in the best kind of a cause.

MORE BOXES OF GOLD And Many Greenbacks.

To secure additional information directly from the people, it is proposed to send little boxes of gold and green-he said, "used to start out with whisky bottles in their pockets; dispatchers used to stagger to their work. But there is a great change today and the life of the railroad man is vastly different and much better."

CHICAGO AND VICINITY.

The First Congregational church received this week a letter from the Rev. William A. Bartlett of Lowell, Mass., accepting its call to the pastorate. He comes to a difficult field to take up the work left by the beloved Dr. E. P. Goodwin whom he counts it an honor to succeed. Mr. Bartlett's work in Lowell has been successful and it is hoped he will be able to lead the First church in an aggressive work in a most needy neighborhood.

James W. Bashford, the president of Ohio Wesleyan University, has been called to the presidency of the Northwestern University, Chicago.

Dr. H. C. Scotford finds encouraging signs of prosperity in his work with Trinity Congregational church. The congregations and Sunday schools are growing both there and at the Evangelical church on Vincennes Road, where he holds evening service, the morning being given to Trinity. A movement is on foot to secure a new location for Trinity church half way between the two churches and thus secure the consolidation of the two in one organization.

Rev. Dr. Marvin G. Hodge, in the Baptist ministry since 1843 and long pastor of the church at Janesville, Wis., died at River Forest, August 26. He had been a resident of Oak Park for a year or more. In the church there his presence and help were much appreciated.

William A. Sunday, the former member of Captain Anson's baseball team, now engaged in evangelistic work, will conduct special revival meetings at the Sacramento Avenue Methodist Episcopal church from Sept. 1 to 16.

The largest summer convocation in the history of the University of Chicago was held in the tent on the campus August 29. Dr. Gregory of the University of Leipsic delivered the convocation address on the subject of "Education and Labor." He had hoped to have as many laboring men as possible in his audience and expressed disappointment that the hour set prevented their attendance. More degrees were conferred at the close of Dr. Gregory's speech than at any other summer convocation. Sixty-three bachelors, fifteen doctors of philosophy and eleven masters' degrees were given.

The annual announcement for the season of 1901-1902 by the Young Men's Christian Association has just been issued. The membership of the central organization has been increased to 4123, not including 245 members from branch associations, who use the rooms of the central body. The evening school is the largest in numbers in the country. Twenty-nine different nationalities are represented, with 126 different occupations. The total enrollment is 1,797, and the day school has 212 students. In the physical section new bathrooms have been arranged, and the handball court is not excelled in the country.

Rev. J. W. Ferner, pastor of the First Congregational church, Sedalia, Mo., has accepted a call to the Millard Avenue Congregational church, Chicago.

The Ridgeway Avenue Presbyterian church closed its tent meetings August 25. The interest manifested has been encouraging. Eleven persons were received into church membership Sunday, August 25. The pastor, Rev. H. C. Buell, has been assisted in these meetings by Rev. Messrs. G. P. Williams, Alexander Patterson, D. K. Campbell, Dr. David B. Griegg, H. W. Stough of the Third Congregational church, Oak Park, and Evangelist W. A. Sunday.

The Illinois Anti-Saloon League, which has been represented in Chicago by Rev. M. M. Parkhurst, D. D., as superintendent of the Chicago district, has opened a state office in Chicago at 830 Association Building, the present headquarters of the Chicago district. The new office will be in addition to the one maintained at Springfield, and will be in charge of Rev. E. G. Saunderson, assistant state superintendent, formerly superintendent of the Cleveland district of the Ohio Anti-Saloon League. The Chicago office will have control of the Agitation department of the state work, and while all lines of League activity will be pushed, special attention will be given to promoting the interests of the Illinois Anti-Saloon League Local Option bill which attracted so much attention during the last session of the legislature. The Illinois League is one of thirty-eight state and territorial leagues which are affiliated with, and constitute the American Anti-Saloon League.

Baptist.

Mrs. Johanna M. Lovelace of Turner, Kan., has made an offer to the Kansas City, Kan., Baptist Theological Seminary of a free gift of ninety acres of land, valued at $50,000, lying just outside the limits of that city. The gift is made on condition that $5,000 be raised to purchase a building now on the property to be used for seminary purposes. Mrs. Lovelace also agrees to give $2,000 toward the running expenses of the seminary the first year. It is proposed to make the institution the principal Baptist school in the West. A charter was secured recently.

Dr. B. H. Carroll, secretary of the Texas Baptist Educational Commission, says that the denomination has in three years expended in the correlated schools $307,000, and that by November the last $50,000 of debt on the entire Baptist school system of the state will be liquidated. The total valuation of Baptist schools in Texas is $700,000. Last year these schools matriculated between 2,000 and 3,000. Every school is now so incorporated that it is impossible to contract debt in the future.

The Rev. Mr. Happell and the Fond du Lac Baptists have promptly started work in the new community around the railroad shops at North Fond du Lac. They secured a lot from the railroad company, a chapel costing $600 has been built and dedicated, and regular preaching and Sunday school sessions will be started at once.

The Iowa Falls Assembly was a success. Rev. T. W. Powell, D. D., was among the lecturers, also Rev. J. W. Cathcart, Ph. D., and Dr. A. B. Chaffee. Rev. J. K. Richardson, D. D., of Des Moines, conducted the outline studies of the Bible. Rev. G. E. Gowdy gave his three lectures, "In the Land of the Pharaohs and Pyramids," "Five Hundred Miles on Horseback Through Palestine," "Wonders of Athens, Rome and Pompeii." They were both valuable and entertaining. A new departure this year was "Business Men's Day." The stores in the town were closed from two to four. The Iowa

HEALTHY SCHOOL-MA'AM.

Found Out How to Feed Herself.

Many school teachers, at the end of their year's work, feel thoroughly exhausted and worn out, physically and mentally. The demand upon the nerves and brain of a teacher is unusual and unless they are well fed and fed upon properly selected food, it is natural that they should run down.

A little woman teacher at Gobleville, Mich., who has been teaching regularly for a number of years, has always found herself thoroughly exhausted at the end of the season, until within the last year she has made use of Grape-Nuts Food with the result that she closed the year as a robust, healthy, strong, vigorous woman, having gained in weight from 90 pounds to 126; her nerves strong, face bright and cheery, and really a wonder to all her friends, who constantly comment on her color and strength. She knows exactly to what the change is attributed, for in the years past, living on ordinary food, she has almost broken down before the school year closed, whereas since using Grape-Nuts, this change has been brought about; evidence prima facie of the value of Grape-Nuts Food for rebuilding the brain and nerve centers.

The name of the teacher can be given by the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

Falls band furnished the music. "Woman's Day" has always been one of the best things on the assembly program.

The best meeting in the history of the Michigan Baptist Assembly was that held at Orchard Lake, Mich., August 13-19. The attendance was over 600. On the program were the names of Rev. Herbert L. Stetson, LL. D., for eleven years president of Des Moines College and now at Kalamazoo college; Rev. Edward Judson of New York, Rev. J. W. Conley, D. D., and Rev. R. E. Manning of Chicago, and others.

A revival meeting held at Blue Fork, Mo., resulted in sixty-one conversions. Fifty-eight were added to the church.

Congregational.

Rev. Charles A. Riley of Moline, Mich., has been called to the pastorate of Barker Memorial church, Grand Rapids, the present pastor, Rev. John T. Walker, having recently resigned to go to the church at Eaton Rapids.

A midsummer rally is a regular custom of Kansas City Congregationalists. Olivet church was filled on this occasion, Sunday evening, August 18. There was special music. Rev. J. B. Toomay of Carthage presented "The Weakness of Congregationalism," as regards Missouri. His points were: an inadequate ministry and the prevalent idea that the Congregational church is a "Yankee" church, for eastern people only. State Sunday School Superintendent J. P. O'Brien spoke of "The Strength of Congregationalism"—its democracy and its supremacy of individual conscience in matters of interpretation. Dr. Judson Smith of the American Board told the story of the martyred missionaries of China.

The corner stone of the new edifice for the Fort street church, Detroit, Mich., was laid August 19. Nine of the twenty-five charter members who organized the church twenty years ago, were present.

Rev. Thomas R. McRoberts of St. Joseph, Mich., absolutely refuses to unite in marriage any couple who are not permanent residents of the county where the license to marry is issued.

A church exhibiting unusual interdenominational comity was recently organized at Garfield Creek, Colo., where Rev. Royal L. Melendy has preached for several months. There were twenty charter members representing nine denominations. Eight of these were immersed.

Pilgrim church, Kansas City, has just closed a twelve days' tent campaign. From 400-600 people heard the gospel every evening and the community has been stirred. Afternoon meetings for boys and girls have had an average attendance of 100 and have done much good. Rev. Frank Fox of the First church preached at the night services.

At Edelstein, Ills., Missionary Van

Auken has been holding services. The interest was so great that they were continued twelve days. People who had seldom been seen at church came and the missionary drove over 150 miles to have personal interviews with one and another. Sunday, August 18, twenty-one new members were received, fifteen upon confession. Ten were heads of families.

Twilight services held at 6:45 on Sunday evening at South Kaukauna, Wis., have been an attractive and successful feature of the summer's work. A special musical program by the choir, or the singing of familiar hymns led by a cornet or violin, or just an old-fashioned "sing" such as the people enjoy in their own homes at the twilight hour, occupies the time till the room grows quite dusk. Then follows a brief practical talk by the pastor, Rev Isaac B. Tracy, and after a few moments of silent meditation and prayer and without any formal dismissal, the people quietly rise and go out. On several occasions the service has closed with the singing of a solo or quartet, without the lights being turned on.

The Disciples.

A movement is on foot in Iowa for the organization of a co-operative work among the Bible-schools for evangelistic and educational purposes, similar to the Bible-school co-operations which have for many years been in successful operation in Missouri, Nebraska, Illinois, Indiana and Kentucky.

Rev. Hernon P. Williams of Jefferson, Iowa, announces the resignation of his pastorate so that he may go as a missionary to the Philippines.

Rev. Joseph F. Harter died August 26 at Salemonica, Ind.

The first ministerial institute of Nebraska preachers was held at Cotner university, August 4-19. There was a good attendance. Rev. C. A. Young, of The Christian Century was the principal lecturer from outside the state. His topics were the Life of Christ and Prophecy, and the strong, spiritual teaching he gave was thoroughly appreciated. The president of the university, Rev. W. P. Aylsworth, treated of homiletics and pastoral theology in a very helpful way.

A very successful revival meeting has been held at Ladoga, Ind., by Rev. Allen Wilson. The attendance was from 1,000 to 2,000. Thirty-one men alone accepted Christ.

The Christian church, Little Rock, Ark., a year ago established a home for working girls. It was much needed, for board at respectable places at prices such girls could pay was very difficult to obtain. The church rented a house of nine rooms, furnished it and secured a matron. Many applicants had to be turned away for lack of room. In March, 1901, a larger house was rented and has now twenty-five boarders. It pays all its running

The Cause of Many Sudden Deaths.

There is a disease prevailing in this country most dangerous because so deceptive. Many sudden deaths are caused by it—heart disease, pneumonia, heart failure or apoplexy are often the result of kidney disease. If kidney trouble is allowed to advance the kidney-poisoned blood will attack the vital organs or the kidneys themselves break down and waste away cell by cell.

Bladder troubles most always result from a derangement of the kidneys and a cure is obtained quickest by a proper treatment of the kidneys. If you are feeling badly you can make no mistake by taking Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney, liver and bladder remedy.

It corrects inability to hold urine and scalding pain in passing it, and overcomes that unpleasant necessity of being compelled to go often during the day, and to get up many times during the night. The mild and the extraordinary effect of Swamp-Root is soon realized. It stands the highest for its wonderful cures of the most distressing cases.

Swamp-Root is pleasant to take and sold by all druggists in fifty-cent and one-dollar sized bottles. You may have a sample bottle of this wonderful new discovery and a book that tells all about it, both sent free by mail. Address Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y. When writing mention reading this generous offer in this paper.

expenses, which is all that was desired or expected.

Rev. R. F. Thrapp, who began work at Jacksonville, Ill., September 1, has been pastor at Pittsfield, Ill., for over three years. He leaves the church in flourishing condition, 175 having been added during his pastorate.

Rev. George L. Snively concluded a pastorate of four years at Jacksonville, Ill., on August 25. There have been 400 additions to the church there during that time. He now becomes general secretary of the National Benevolent Association, with headquarters at St. Louis, Mo.

The annual convention of Christian churches of Audrain County, Mo., was held at Mexico, August 19-21. There are sixteen congregations in the county, with a membership of over 2,000. The church at Mexico has 560 members, 470 of whom are regular contributors to its work—a good proportion, surely. Among the speakers on this occasion were Rev. Messrs. G. A. Hoffman and J. H. Crutcher of St. Louis.

Dr. T. H. Andrews, late of Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, Pa., says: "A wonderful remedy which gave me most gratifying results in the worst forms of dyspepsia."

Episcopal.

Bishop Morris, of Oregon, has issued a pastoral letter, taken from his annual address to the convention, urging the better keeping of Sunday, for whose proper observance he suggests four rules:

"First—With attendance at church and the Holy Communion unless absolutely prevented.

"Second—With rest and recreation that is not only innocent in itself, but in keeping with the worship in all good conscience, and with carefulness for example as well as for personal duty.

"Third—In trying every Lord's Day to make some other life brighter by some specific good deed. Let not the sun of Sunday go down upon a life that has not let some of its Christian light shine upon some one else.

"Fourth—In acting upon the spirit of the canon which does not conflict with innocent recreation and need by no means be buried in the Book of Canons, viz., 'All persons within this church shall celebrate and keep the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday, in hearing the Word of God read and taught, in private and public prayer, in other exercises of devotion, and in acts of charity, using all godly and sober conversation.'"

And he adds very cogently, especially in this season of summer holidays, that "we have neither Sunday nor week-day to squander in idleness or frivolity wherever we may be."

The Training School for Female Church Workers in Boston will be open early in November, when Miss Clara Carter will take charge of the preparatory dispensary class and also deliver a course of lectures on the Book of Common Prayer. Mrs. P. F. Hall will speak every week on missions, with special reference to Indians and colored people. Mrs. G. Lowell is to lecture on "The Acts of the Apostles," while the Rev. Messrs. A. P. Greenleaf and G. A. Strong will render assistance by giving instruction on Biblical subjects. The students who have taken the preparatory dispensary course are admitted during the months of April, May and June to practical work in the Boston Dispensary. No fee is asked for the lectures. For students living in the house the charge will be $200, which covers board and lodging.

Bishop Moreland of Sacramento has been visiting the Hupa Indians in Humboldt County, Cal. He says: "Up and down the valley for miles we drove, visiting the people in their homes, and seeking to bring Christ near to the hearts of these children of his. A group of maidens came to us seeking baptism, which, after careful teaching, was administered. This seemed to be but the first sheaves of a great, ripening harvest. All next day groups came voluntarily seeking Holy Baptism. First was a band of tall young Indian men. "We want to be Christians," they said; 'teach us to love Jesus and to be like him.' Then came boys in large numbers. At length we chose out the brightest and most forceful boys and girls, taught them, and secured sponsors for them. Many who wished to be baptized we postponed until a priest can be sent to prepare them and to follow up their baptism. In all I baptized twenty-two and confirmed two, marrying also with the Church's blessing several couples who had taken each other to man and wife in Indian fashion or without ceremony. It was a satisfaction to administer confirmation to the agent himself, for on an Indian reservation he is an official whose example is potent for good or evil. Our public services and preaching were attended largely, and the serious impressions deepened and spread. God's Holy Spirit was plainly at work in the hearts of his red-skinned children, and I was impressed with the rareness of this opportunity to win a whole tribe to Christ. Much of our success was due to the vigilance of the agent in keeping corrupt white men, liquor-sellers and panderers off the reserve, so that the devil was not permitted to debauch these child-like hearts with his worst vices. Thus they opened to the sunshine of God's love, and responded naturally to the warmth of Christ's great heart, brooding over them and forming his image within them. We gave each convert a cross to wear, and a picture of the face of Christ for his cabin walls."

Methodist.

Rev. George Voglesong, late of Elyria, Ohio, and one of the pioneer Methodists of the state, died August 19.

A series of camp meetings have been held on Cedar street, St. Paul, from August 19-30, under the auspices of the Methodist Ministers' Association.

The Central German conference of the M. E. church holds its annual session September 4-9 in Detroit, Mich. Bishop Andrews will preside. All the important business will be transacted in the English language. German Methodism was organized in 1839 by Rev. Wm. Nast, D. D. It now has 1,000 churches valued at $4,000,000; 500 parsonages valued at $1,000,000, and it numbers 58,000 communicants in this country and 17,000 in Germany. It supports one academy, two theological seminaries, two orphan asylums, an old people's home, several hospitals, and over 300 deaconesses.

The Detroit union of Epworth Leaguers has nearly completed payment for the Epworth Home at Lake Orion. Many children and others have been given an outing at the cottage during the summer. One little girl confidentially remarked to the matron: "It's queer to be eating three times a day. We never do at home."

One of the foremost men in the Methodist church South, Rev. W. M. Leftwich, D. D., died suddenly at Los Angeles, August 21. Regret is felt by the congregation of the Francis Street church, St. Joseph, Mo., at the departure of Rev. W. F. Packard, who has been their pastor for four years. More than $33,000 has been collected under Dr. Packard's direction for benevolent purposes, and the condition of the church's finances is considered good; 220 members have been added to the church during his pastorate.

At a meeting of the graduates and friends of Lane Seminary, held at Winona, Ind., a resolution was adopted as follows:

We, the alumni and former students of Lane Seminary, assembled in the parlors of the Moody Memorial Building, desire to express our appreciation of the fact that Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, a graduate of Lane, has presented this splendid building to the Winona Lake Association for the use of ministers on small income, and we hope it will stand for many years as a monument to Dr. Chapman and as a blessing to those who may share in its hospitality.

Rev. Henry L. Dickerson, of Indianapolis, was chosen president, and Rev. J. K. Gibson, secretary of the meeting. The organization was made permanent.

The Andrew Presbyterian Sunday school of Minneapolis increased its attendance during the month of August by having special music each Sunday and an address by some one from outside its own membership.

The revision committee of the Presbyterian General Assembly met at Saratoga Springs August 28 to confer on reports from the sub-committees appointed June 18 on the three divisions of the work to be done.

Mrs. T. M. Sinclair has offered to erect a new edifice for the Third Presbyterian church of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, as a memorial of her husband, who started the church some years ago. She will spend $30,000 on the building.

Rev. A. M. Campbell of Princeton, Ind., has been called to the Wagoner Place Union church, St. Louis, and will enter on his new duties the last Sunday in September.

Trumbull Avenue church, Detroit, Mich., celebrated its twentieth anniversary by sending out Rev. James S. Cunningham and his wife as its personal representatives in Africa. A service of ordination was held August 25. The church assumes their support and provides them with an outfit for their work.

The United Presbyterian church of Winfield, Iowa, has received from Mr. John McCulley a fine farm of 429 acres, he retaining the use of it during his life.

The United Presbyterians sustain a missionary boat, "The Tidings," at a cost of $1,500 a year. Its mission is to visit with the Gospel message the islands in Puget Sound. That it is needed is evidenced by the fact that Mrs. Gerald of Gerald's Cove for five years did not see the face of another woman and during twenty years has only had three opportunities of attending divine service.

The Bohemian church in the country seven miles east of Tyndall, S. D., welcomed thirty-two young people into communicant membership recently. This is some of the fruit of the labors of Rev. John Linka, who has been pastor there for eight years.

One of the most important meetings held at Winona Lake, Ind., this year was that of the evangelistic committee appointed at the Presbyterian General Assembly in Philadelphia last May, the object being to formulate plans for the holding of evangelistic meetings all over the United States. A sub-committee was appointed, Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D. D., of New York chairman, to prepare a list of available evangelists for churches. Rev. Dr. Balcom Shaw was appointed chairman of a sub-committee to suggest conferences of ministers, arrange special meetings of Presbyterians and to send leaflets outlining such meetings for ministers as were inaugurated by the

General.

The Wisconsin State Sunday School convention is to be held at Waukesha, Wis., September 17-19. A very strong and practical program has been prepared. Mr. Marion Lawrence is to speak on "Organization for Evangelization" and "The Big-Boy Problem." W. C. Pearce, Mrs. M. Jaeger, Alfred Day, G. C. Haun and others are among the speakers.

Among the many influences for good started by Christian Endeavors is the Sailors' Home at Nagasaki, Japan. It is the work of the floating society of seventeen members formed in 1894 on the cruiser Charleston.

A colportage wagon was dedicated Sunday afternoon, August 25, at Fargo, N. D., to be used by the American Publication Society. It will travel all over the state for the sale of Bibles and religious reading matter in all languages. The children of the state contributed the money for the harness.

Union tent meetings under the leadership of Messrs. Williams and Alexander were begun August 25 on the West Side of Des Moines, Iowa. Most of the churches have omitted their evening services and joined in the meetings.

The Evangelical church at Industry, near Abilene, Kan., has just paid off its debt with a crop of wheat. Last autumn the pastor, Rev. Mr. Bruner, together with a number of the leading members, rented forty acres of the ground near the church building. The work of seeding and the seed grain were contributed. At harvest this year it was found advisable to hire the cutting done, but the thrashing was contributed. The yield was 950 bushels, of which one-third was paid for rent and the remainder has just been sold for enough to pay off the $350 mortgage on the edifice. The congregation is planning to sow another field this year to raise funds for improvements and church expenses.

FOREIGN MISSIONARY ITEMS.

Mrs. Boyce, missionary at Jalapa Mexico, writes:

"In August, 1898, I took an Indian woman from Las Vegas as cook. Petra had not been in our house a month when her mother wrote her to leave the house of the Protestants at once. Petra was well satisfied with her place so did not obey. A second letter came even more emphatic for her to leave our house. As this order was unheeded, the old lady came down to Jalapa to take her daughter away by force. As good fortune would have it, I saw her as she came in the front door and recognized her as Petra's mother. I received her most effusively and in my best Spanish put my house at her disposition and insisted on her staying in our house (or hers in Spanish) as long as she was in Jalapa. The reception I gave rather disarmed her, and she stayed for dinner. In the afternoon Anita was practicing. The piano was a novelty to the woman. She went over on the corridor and stood just outside the door to listen. I went into the parlor and told Anita to play a hymn, and we sang it. One hymn followed another in Spanish. I asked the old lady to come in and sit down. She did so and was delighted with what we sang. We told her they were the hymns we sang in our services; and as it was Wednesday I asked her if she would not like to go to service with us. She assented, but poor Petra was in consternation, as she feared some outburst on the part of her mother. She accompanied us, however, and came away so delighted that when she now comes to Jalapa she comes on Wednesday so that she can attend service. She bought a New Testament and reads it faithfully. And now, stranger yet, when Mr. Boyce went to Las Vegas on May 29 he wrote to her two days before that he was going. He was surprised to find her waiting at the train. She took him to her house and while her daughter was getting lunch she said she would speak to a neighbor woman who was a believer. In a moment she returned with the woman, the wife of the judge of Recorder's Court. So greatly had she interested the woman in the gospel that she bought a Bible at once and subscribed to our paper, El Faro. Services were held the two nights Mr. Boyce was in the town, in the old lady's house, and almost all who were present had become interested in the gospel through this woman who two years and a half ago came to our house because she so hated the Protestants."

About eight years ago, when Christian Endeavor had little more than come into existence in New South Wales, there was a camp of aborigines on the shores of Botany Bay, some seven miles from the city of Sydney, the metropolis of Australia. Degraded, neglected and despised, these dusky children dragged out a miserable existence, subsisting on a mere pittance from the government. Their condition at once appealed to those who had pledged themselves "to strive to do whatever He would like to have them do," and several Endeavorers began to visit the camp and to try to lead the natives to Christ. It was found absolutely necessary to be on the ground on Sundays to protect the aborigines from their white visitors and to prevent the frequent and fearful quarrels; so for months pairs of young Endeavorers went out in turn from the various societies interested and used to sleep "on the cold ground" under a protection manufactured out of sacks, and at the tender mercies of millions of bloodthirsty mosquitoes. But they stood it until money was raised for a church building with the necessary accommodation to protect the missionary pioneer from the elements and the mosquitoes. Then a young lady was found willing to leave home and take up her abode among the blacks at the camp. The remuneration was miserably pitiful, for the Endeavorers were but few yet and means were very circumscribed. But she went with a heart full of love and the results of all the efforts and prayers were abundantly evident at the next colonial Christian Endeavor convention, the first in the great town hall of Sydney, with five thousand present, when in response to the roll-call an aboriginal society of more than twenty strong rose, most of them active members, and sung "When the roll is called up yonder, I'll be there." Since then the work has gone steadily on and has resulted in the formation of an "Aborigines' Missionary Society," the only one in New South Wales, with a young and most enthusiastic Endeavorer at its head. It now employs three missionaries; has built several churches, plain and rough, of course, but suitable; has well-nigh all the camps along the central coast evangelized; is sending out the blacks themselves to carry the gospel to their fellows, and is winning as jewels for the Master's crown hundreds of those who were thought to be "too low down to possess a soul."

"Saying" and "Praying."

Mr. Moody once related this pretty incident concerning his own little son: "My wife came down one evening and said she had had some trouble with one of the children. He was not willing to obey, and he had gone off to bed without asking her forgiveness. I went up and sat down by the side of the little child and said, 'Did you pray tonight?' 'I said my prayers.' 'Did you pray?' 'I said my prayers.' 'Did you pray?' 'Well, papa, I told you that I said my prayers.' 'Yes, I heard you, but did you pray?' The little fellow was stuck; he knew he hadn't prayed. How was he going to pray when there was something wrong in his heart? He could not do it.

"Well, now," said I, 'are you going to go off to sleep without praying?' After a struggle he said, 'I wish you would call mamma.' She came up and was glad to forgive him, and then he wanted to get out of bed and pray. He had said his prayers, but now he wanted to pray. Lots of people say their prayers, just as a salve to their conscience, and go out and do some mean, contemptible thing after they have said their prayers. But they hadn't prayed, and that's the difference."

BOOKS

Mission Problems and Mission Methods in South China—Lectures on Evangelistic Theology—by J. Campbell Gibson, M. A., D. D., Glasgow. Fleming H. Revell Co. Illustrated; 332 pages. Price, $1.50.

The author declares that his work is not "an apologetic of missions." But that it undoubtedly in no small measure is. Nor is it any the less valuable on that account. The description given of mission work in South China furnishes the material for the discussion of mission problems and methods. The author looks upon the mission work in the Swatow district, to which he has given his life, as a fair sample of mission work in general. The evils due to the presence of "rival sects" in mission fields have, he thinks, been greatly exaggerated. Instead of looking upon one another as rivals, missionaries have been wont to recognize one another as helpers.

In trying to present a true science of missions, our author proceeds to the development of his theme in a logical manner. His introductory chapter is upon the proving of the Gospel. The question, "Does the Gospel work?" is answered with a decided affirmative. The conditions within which the Gospel has to work are next considered. This calls for a careful study of Chinese literature, philosophy, religion and life. The first stage of mission work is evangelistic. Then come the founding and organization of the church; after that the cultivation of Christian life and character within the church, together with the adjustment of the church to her external relations—that is, the adjustment of the church to the heathen world, in the midst of which it has been planted. The treatment of all the points is characterized by sobriety of statement, a careful balancing of contending forces, and an utter freedom from everything savoring of special pleading. A more fair and reasonable interpretation of missionary facts it would be difficult to find.

Dr. Gibson believes that all men are fundamentally and essentially the same. He has faith in human nature; and he has faith in the Gospel of Christ, and in its adaptations to the manifold needs of human nature. He maintains that the Chinese people, though apparently immobile, have a real plasticity, which in the past has enabled them to adapt themselves to the stress of changing circumstances. He says: "China is now in a critical condition. Her great powers and possibilities are being thrown into the melting-pot, not, I believe, to be consumed, but to be purified of their dross, and recast in new forms, worthy of the gold, silver and precious stones, which shall stand the trial of the Great Day."

We predict for this volume a place among the few standard works on missions.

Pitfalls of the Ballroom, by Geo. F. Hall, author of "Tabernacle Talks," etc., with a preface by Sam P. Jones, the Evangelist. Laird & Lee, Chicago.

This book, which is illustrated by a portrait of the author, has the merit of being easily understood. It is plain, unvarnished talk. It handles the subject without gloves, and sometimes without delicacy. Every rag of conventionality is stripped off, and the naked reality is made to appear just as the writer sees it. Sam P. Jones likes it, and he says in his introduction that every time the writer churns he gets butter. The greatest defect of the book is its overstatement. The writer reluctantly admits that there is dancing and dancing. Considered merely as the grace and rhythm of motion, he says that he would be the last to raise his voice against it. Nor would he "object so strenuously to the old-fashioned quadrilles, reels and cotillions that our grandparents in their simplicity and purity used to enjoy." But the modern dance in all its forms he cannot away with. It is evil and evil only. He has evidently been unfortunate in seeing dancing only at its worst. All that he says touching the influence of the ballroom we heartily indorse, even if we do not always like the way in which he says it. In this pleasure-loving age the Church has to raise her voice with renewed emphasis against the evil tendencies of the ballroom. That way ruin lies. When modesty is destroyed the enamel of virtue is rubbed off; when the safeguards of social purity are broken down, the soul is imperiled; but as the author admits the evil is not in dancing per se, but in the associations with which the modern dance is frequently connected, which means that our social amusements have to be purified rather than destroyed. To do this is the work of Christianity.

One thing which disfigures the pages of this book, and discounts the force of its burning plea, is the uncharitable way in which the author sometimes allows himself to speak of brother ministers who fail to see eye to eye with him on the subject of dancing. He says that many of them "fear to open their mouths on the subject lest they lose their position." "Thousands of ministers are chicken-livered when it comes to denounce sin at close range." "For the most part the clergy contents itself (sic) with the preparation and delivery of the good, old-fashioned expository or topical sermons, attendance upon pink teas and chicken dinners, with now and then a little dissipation in the study of higher criticism." Not a very charitable view of the class of men to which the writer belongs and which he still professes to love! A little spice of charity towards preachers who may be guilty of mistaken opinion rather than of invincible ignorance, and a little clearer discrimination between the evils of a custom and the custom itself would have made this earnest plea for "whatever things are pure" more convincing and effective.

In the Arena for September the leading place is given to an article by Dr. George D. Herron, on "The Recovery of Jesus from Christianity." It is painful reading and shows how a Christian thinker when once he breaks away from his moorings inevitably drifts further and further out on the shoreless sea of religious negation. After saying some complimentary things about Jesus as "the strongest and loveliest figure that has ever come to be our symbol and prophecy," he says: "Yet Jesus cannot solve the problem of economic and social freedom. He is not equal to the socialist revolution. We shall love him and understand him, and he will abide with us; but it will be by other forces than his that the free age will be brought in. The work that now lies before man must be done in the name of men, and the common life of the working class must become the world's new savior." How unutterably pathetic are these words in which faith in Jesus as a Savior is publicly renounced. Our hope is that the renunciation may not be final.

THE HOME

O GOD FORGIVE.

The little sins that, somehow, now seem great,

The certain faults I have, yet wholly hate,

The yielding to temptations that await,
My constant strayings from paths right and straight,

O God, forgive!

The hasty words I did not try to check,
That in their train can oft bring ruin, wreck,

The pages of my life with stain and speck,

The months and years so full of flaw and fleck,

O God, forgive!

The deeds that ever loom up dark as night,

And cloud my sky, e'en when the sun is bright,

That are abomination in thy sight,
And on my coming days have caused a blight,

O God, forgive!

The foolish murmurings, day after day,
Although thy goodness ever paves my way,

The light and trifling things I often say,

The many times I cannot even pray,
O God, forgive!

—Mrs. Findley Braden in The Presbyterian.

The Judge's Mother.

Mrs. Smith had a paper to write for her club. The subject she had chosen was: "How can women uplift the coming generation?"

She was puzzled to choose the best of the many ways which suggested themselves to her. Should it be through art, lecturing, literature or general reform?

She confided her difficulty to old Judge Adams, who was sitting with her husband on the veranda.

"I can only give you my experience," he said. "I was one of five brothers. All were men who exercised a strong influence in the world, and each one of us owed his bent and force of character to our mother.

"Our father died when we were children. Mother made us what we were. Until we were gray-haired men we went to her whenever we were in perplexity. 'Mother,' we would say, 'what is the right thing to do in this case?' She knew nothing of law or politics, but she always knew the right. I think," said the judge, gravely, "that my mother influenced the next generation to her own more strongly than any other human being I ever have known."

"She no doubt had a powerful mind and a broad education?" asked Mrs. Smith.

"No." The Judge smiled. "She got her hold on us in very simple ways. I remember one of them. When we came home from school on cold days, mother was sure to be waiting beside a big fire. Off came our wet shoes and stockings; she rubbed the cold feet warm with her own hands. Then there was always a huge brown jug waiting before the fire with roasted apples and sugar and hot water in it, and each one had his mug of the delicious stuff; and we sat and grew warm, and joked and laughed, and no doubt opened our little hearts to the dear, wise woman. All day long she was our comrade. We carried to her all our secrets and miseries when we were men, as we had done when we were boys. Two of us were ministers, two legislators who helped to form the laws of new states, but I doubt if one of us ever took an important step in life without being influenced by the opinion of that one good woman."

Mrs. Smith looked uncertainly at her paper on which she had scribbled "artists, lecturers, civil and political reformers."

"You think, then," she said, "that woman's strongest hold upon the world is at home, through love and a Christian life?"

The Judge's eyes twinkled. "I can tell you only what I know. I cannot decide for the world," he said.—Youth's Companion.

The Missionary Puzzle.

"I can't go out for a week!"

Master Johnny Amsden's face displayed a vast amount of disappointment.

"Not for a full week," said the doctor, drawing on his gloves.

"Why, doctor, I've just got to go out."

"What for, I'd like to know," demanded Dr. Maxwell, gazing down upon him, quizzically. "What is there of such importance that you must disregard my orders, eh?" and he pinched Johnny's ear.

"Why, I'll tell you," said his youthful patient, confidentially; "it's about the missionary society."

"Ho, ho!" cried the doctor. "Do you dabble in associations for the furnishing of gingham aprons and silk hats to the South Sea Islanders?"

"I guess you don't know much about missions and missionaries, Dr. Maxwell," said the boy, with gravity.

"Maybe I don't. Do you?"

"Our society supports a missionary in China and a native preacher in Burmah," replied Johnny with pride. "It's the Burmese missionary that the measles interfere with."

The jolly doctor threw back his head and laughed again. "I guess these measles of yours'll not hurt any missionary in Burmah," he said. "They're not as contagious as all that. You've got 'em pretty light, you know. You'll be out in a week."

"But I've only got this week to earn my dollar in."

"What dollar?"

"Why," said Johnny, seriously, "each of us agreed to earn a dollar extra for the Burmese preacher, and were to have a meeting next week and tell how we got the dollar. We're to earn 'em ourselves, you know. I was troubled a good deal about how I should earn mine, so the time slipped by until this week, and it's the last one."

"How are you going to earn it?" inquired the doctor, with a twinkle in his eye.

"I promised to help Mr. Smith, the market man round the corner, every night for a week; he said he'd give me a dollar. So you see, doctor, if you don't let me go out, I can't keep my promise."

"Humph! haven't you a dollar of your pocket money left?"

"Oh, yes, sir. But that wouldn't be earning it."

A school for both sexes, located at Hiram, Portage County, Ohio, 35 miles southeast of Cleveland.

A SPLENDID LOCATION.

Beautiful scenery, pure air, excellent water. An ideal college town, modern, up-to-date, lighted by electricity and having a fine system of water-works.

The buildings are comparatively new. Main building commodious and convenient in all its appointments. Music building for the accommodation of our large and growing music department. A library and observatory building just completed, the gift of Abram Teachout, and a Warner & Swazey's nine inch telescope, costing approximately $5000, the gift of Lathrop Cooley.

LIBRARIES AND APPARATUS.

A large and well equipped chemical laboratory. Two other laboratories, Physiological and Physical. A well selected library, large additions to this library will soon be made. A good museum. A large and wellfurnished gymnasium.

COURSES OF STUDY.

Four Classical Courses—Regular, Ministerial, Legal and Medical. Four Scientific Courses—Regular, Philosophical, Legal and Medical. Four Literary Courses—Regular, Ministerial, Legal and Medical. Five Special Courses—Music, Oratorical, Business, Art, Teachers. Special elective courses in any variety.

CORPS OF INSTRUCTORS.

We have a strong body of Professors and Instructors, twenty-four in number. They are for the most part specialists of large attainments and are thoroughly abreast of the times.

Literary Societies and Religious Organizations. Hiram has five literary societies of unusual strength and vigor; two Christian associations that contribute much to the religious life of the school. Several departmental and social organizations of special interest and value.

EXPENSES.

Expenses are very moderate. Good table board can be had for $2.00 per week, club board for $1.25 to $1.75. Room rent for 50 cents to $1.00 per week. Tuition for four to five dollars per term for each study. The three leading items of board, tuition and room rent may be reduced to about $125.00 for the college year of 38 weeks.

INDUSTRIAL DEPARTMENT.

Under the auspices of the T. W. Phillips' Loan fund an industrial department is being established that will assist about fifty young people. It is believed that students admitted to this department may reduce the entire expense of the year, including tuition, to about $900, and those who do considerable work may reduce expenses to sixty or seventy dollars (and for catalogue to E. V. ZOLLARS, Hiram, Ohio

"It looks, then, as if I should have to furnish you the means of earning that dollar, as I am the one who keeps you indoors. Of course, the measles can't be blamed."

"Oh, no, sir! I don't mean that," cried Johnny.

"Of course you didn't," cried the doctor with a wink. "You'd rather go out and be assistant to a green grocer. But as you're so fond of working in a store, I'll give you a job that would puzzle the best boy that Smith ever had."

Johnny looked at him in some doubt.

"I'll pay you a dollar if you do it, too," said the physician, smiling. "I'll let you use your brains instead of your hands. If you're bright enough you can earn your dollar."

"But what is it?" cried his young patient.

"It's a problem—a puzzle—and you're to work it out, and here it is: 'There was a groceryman who had an eight-quart jug full of vinegar. The grocer had an order for four quarts, but had only a three-quart and a five quart measure in his store. He told his boy to get four quarts of vinegar for his customer, and he was not allowed to pour out and waste any of his vinegar, and he had no other vessel to help him out but the two measures. How did he do it?'"

Johnny looked at him blankly, and the doctor laughed again.

"Well, that's a sticker," said the boy.

"Think so, do you? Well, the other boy did it. If you want to be a grocer some time, you'll have to learn to do such things, maybe. Now, you've got twenty-four hours to do that sum. Good-by!"

The doctor started for the door, still laughing. Mary, the maid, came to let him out; but Johnny ran after him, and asked just as the man was stepping into the vestibule: "Doctor! doctor! it isn't a joke, is it? You can really do it?"

"Of course, you can, if you're as smart as that grocer's boy was."

"Just give it to me again," said Master Johnny. "If one boy did it, I can do it," and the doctor repeated the problem.

But after he had studied over the thing a good hour without arriving at an answer, Johnny began to believe that the grocer's boy was pretty smart.

"An eight-quart jug, a three-quart measure, and a five-quart measure—and that's all! he did it! I'll go down and see cook."

Now, cook was fat and jolly, and didn't mind little boys "messing" round in her kitchen if she wasn't bothering about her dinner.

"Are you bothered today, cook?" asked Master Johnny, looking in at the door.

"No, honey; everything's doing beautiful."

"I want to know how you'd measure four quarts of vinegar if you had an eight quart jug full and only had a three-quart and a five-quart measure to turn it into? Or, no! I don't want you to tell me; for that wouldn't be fair. But I want to know if you think it can be done."

Cook thought some time with great gravity. "Laws, honey!" she said at last, "I don't see how it can be done, nohow. But I got an eight jug ye're, an' measures. You kin play they ain't graduated, and you can fill the jug with water, an' try to do it. Warm water, of co'se, so you'll not get cold." "What's 'graduated measures?'" asked Johnny.

"See them lines on the tin there?" said cook, holding up the measure. "Those are for pints and quarts, though that's a three-quart measure. There's a five-quart one. There's the jug. Now, don't spill the water on my clean floor."

Johnny thanked her and set to work on the practical working out of his problem.

He had a jug full of water and two empty measures to begin with. First he poured the three quart measure full, then emptied it into the five-quart measure. Then he poured the three-quart measure full again, and filled the five-quart measure out of it.

The water stood thus: Five quarts in the five-quart measure, one quart in the three-quart, and two in the eight-quart jug. He seemed no nearer the solution of the problem than before, but after a little cogitation he poured the five-quart measure full back into the eight-quart jug.

Then he poured the one quart he had in the three-quart measure into the five-quart measure. Next he filled the three-quart measure again out of the jug, and emptying it into the five-quart measure, had solved the problem. There were four quarts in the five-quart measure and four quarts in the jug, and he hadn't wasted a drop.

When the doctor came the following morning, Johnny was ready for him. The doctor seemed to be greatly surprised at his success, and parted with the dollar for missions with apparent regret; but Johnny thought afterwards that maybe the physician knew more and cared more about missions than he appeared to.

Anyway, Johnny was well enough the next week to go to the missionary meeting and put the puzzle to the society, and they bothered their heads over it half the afternoon, and Johnny finally had to invite them to his house, where he could illustrate the solution with the jug and measure in question.—S. S. Visitor.

There is a pretty custom in the imperial family of Germany which dates from time immemorial. On the birthday of one of the royal children the empress goes through the stock of toys which has been accumulating since the child's last birthday and sends all, except a few special favorites, to the sick children in the hospitals. The present Kaiserin, who is the most motherly of women, has paid special attention to this custom, and on the occasion of little Princess Victoria Louise's birthday, which occurred some time ago, her majesty packed with her own hands a large case of dollies, picture books and little dishes, all in a fair state of preservation and had them sent to the little sufferers. The sick children are always told who sends the presents, and in past years this has resulted in the saving of some curious and interesting relics. In this way the battered tin soldiers which amused the children of Old Kaiser William have been saved from the wreck of time.—Sunday Afternoon.

A HANDSOME FACE

Is sometimes made disagreeably plain by the presence of blotches, pimples and skin eruptions. A poor complexion is the bane of many a woman's life. Miss L. Sanheitel of Manistique, Michigan, says, among other things, in a letter which space will not permit to be published, "On account of my sal-low complexion, pimples and skin eruptions, I hated to go down town and do my shopping, and even felt embarrassed when at church. Two bottles of Blood Vitalizer removed all the eruptions." Pure blood means a good complexion. Dr. Peter's Blood Vitalizer is the remedy. Sold only through special agents or the proprietor direct. ## EDITORIAL

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES:

The Christian Century is published in the interests of essential Christianity. It is the organ of no party; the advocate of no ism. While welcoming the ascertained results of modern Christian scholarship, it stands for the great evangelical verities which are the foundation stones of the Christian system. It seeks to be tolerant in spirit, practical in aim, and warmly sympathetic towards all the present day problems of religious thought and life. It also aims at being at once a clearing house and medium of communication between the different denominations, so that they may by free and fraternal expression of opinion become better acquainted with one another and may be led to join forces in more aggressive work for the advancement of the Redeemer's Kingdom.

THE SCHOOL OF CHRIST.

SIGNIFICANT among the words which connected themselves with the invitation of Jesus is the expression, "Learn of me." In this utterance Jesus is revealed as a teacher who calls men to himself to learn the things which he is accustomed to teach, and naturally the thought of the hearer turns to this aspect of our Lord's work in the three categories of his characteristics as a teacher, the truths that he taught, and the teaching quality of his life.

It has been affirmed frequently in late years that Jesus was a teacher, with the apparent purpose of including in this statement all the qualities of his ministry, and of divesting him of every attribute of power which did not lie in the realm of his utterances. Frequently the doctrine of the prophethood of Jesus is of precisely this character. He is exalted as a teacher for the very purpose of refusing him the elements of Saviorhood and redemptive power which lie at the heart of his ministry. Against this tendency no protest can be too emphatic. It would be better to decline to see any of those qualities which link Jesus with a long line of the world's greatest teachers than to permit him to sink to the mere level of a declaimer of ethical principles and a fashioner of new maxims. We need have no hesitancy in comparing Jesus with those teachers who have enriched human life. We need not fear to speak of him in the same breath with Buddha, Confucius, Zoroaster, Mohammed, Moses, Samuel and Isaiah, but it must never be implied that these names rank as equals. Jesus retains his unique superiority above them all, standing head and shoulders above the inspired writers of Holy Scripture, as they tower over the heads of the ethnic prophets.

Thus fortified against the danger of regarding Jesus merely in the light of a teacher of ethics, we have leisure to consider the aspects of his life as an instructor of men. And first, we naturally consider the characteristics of his method of teaching. Here we are astonished to find that he seems at first to have no method, or rather, his teaching was so simple and direct as to apparently elude definition by its very naturalness. He used the simplest possible language. His vocabulary was that of the common people. They understood everything he said, even children might fully comprehend most of his utterances, except as he touched upon those mysteries of the kingdom of God which have fascinated the maturest minds in all the years. Jesus spoke in figurative language, using constantly illustrations from daily life, which made his words the more telling. In this he was thoroughly oriental. Abstract terms were rarely employed. Truth always had an added value through the instrument of illustration. Even the most spectacular and startling utterances of Jesus were in close keeping with the methods of the time, and were understood by the people as figures of speech, making plain the subtler truths of a moral and spiritual order. Jesus accommodated himself as well to the life of the people in his use of modes of thought with reference to nature and history.

He never disturbed familiar conceptions regarding the world or the Scriptures, except as these were at variance with the purposes of the kingdom of God. He described the operations of nature in terms not scientific, but popular. He spoke of the Scriptures as men were accustomed to use them. Yet where popular ideas were at variance with the essentials of his teaching, he never spared the ideas of his time, nor the teaching of the schools. Sometimes he was abrupt and almost harsh in his statements, apparently choosing to startle his hearers by a statement almost shocking in its character rather than permit them to rest in ignorance or indifference. Withal, there was a sense of urgency and deep moral purpose in him which convinced his hearers that he was moved by a passion to do the Father's will and finish his work. It was not mere curiosity that drew men to him, but rather the consciousness that he was sent from God, and his influence upon their lives was that of a strong and urgent will creating in them a new desire to live a holy life and to realize the ends of the kingdom of God.

The second inquiry leads to the substance of Jesus' teachings. And here a variety of themes present themselves, though upon closer inspection they are all seen to be related to his central theme, the kingdom of God. Jesus came to reveal the Father. This was his great message, and the kingdom of God is only the form in which his teachings regarding God and his plan for human life are set. Indeed it is the business of any prophet or religious teacher to speak of God. This is what we always expect from him. A preacher's business is to reveal God to men, and if he has no vital and thrilling message on this theme he may well spare his speech on all things else. Jesus lived constantly in the atmosphere of the Father's life, and spoke out of the fullness of his own rich experience the things which humanity needs to know. This teaching he threw into the familiar form of discourses on the kingdom of God, since that was the great theme in Jewish minds in his day. The words had an inviting sound. Men were everywhere discussing the kingdom. Jesus chose the phrase because it secured attention and enabled him to deal with the facts of his ministry under the popular title. But his teachings included most explicit and final statements on the great themes of all prophetic discourse, such as sin, the nature of man as responsible to God, the redemptive possibilities which lie in human life submitted to the authority of God, the attainment of righteousness and holiness as qualities within the reach of all, the persistent effects of sin or of goodness in human character, and the mission of Jesus himself as the revealer of God and the redeemer of men. These were the great themes upon which our Lord was constantly speaking. They form a body of teaching which is a source of appeal in all moments of doubt regarding the final truths of our holy faith. It is to Jesus one must go whenever questions arise as to the standard of conduct. He is the final prophet of the world. His teachings superseded those of Moses and Elijah, of Isaiah and Jeremiah, since these were only partial interpreters of the truth. The word of the transfiguration mountain needs constantly to be sounded in the ears of a generation apparently almost as willing to claim finality for the words of other teachers as for those of Christ, "This is my beloved son, hear ye him."

NOT WRESTLING BUT CLINGING,

IN the struggle of Jacob by the brook Jabbok the crisis of his life was passed. He entered into the struggle as the supplanter and came out of it as the Prince of God. His life is divided into two parts—before Jabbok and after Jabbok.

Jabbok must not be confounded with Bethel. Bethel marked the beginning of a new life. There Jacob, a lonely exile on the way to Padanaram, prayed in trouble under the stars, and had a vision of the unseen. The good work then begun in him was after years of severe discipline consummated at Jabbok. After that Bethel was revisited, and with a clearer vision and a purer motive the covenant of his earlier life was renewed.

The scene at Jabbok has come to be accepted as the figure of prevailing prayer—"a symbol of prayer that does not become weary until it wins the blessing." We are enjoined to imitate Jacob and wrestle with God in prayer, and keep wrestling with him until he is constrained to bless us. Is this a proper attitude to assume? That such an inference is based upon a mistaken interpretation of this incident in Jacob's life can, we think, be made clear. All that Jacob got for his wrestling with God was a strained thigh. When he ceased wrestling and clung to God in weakness his petition was granted.

Jacob's boldness and stubbornness are not to be commended. He was a masterful man, self-willed and perverse. He was one of those quiet, firm men who will have his own way. Believing himself able to force the fulfillment of the promise, he took things into his own hands. The crisis came. A mysterious person appeared to him clothed with divine authority, demanding complete and irreversible submission. Jacob resisted. The stranger wrestled with him until the breaking of the day. Jacob continued unyielding. For a time he seems to have been allowed to have the upper hand in the struggle. Then came his needed lesson. His divine antagonist, after asking him in vain to let him go, "touched the hollow of his thigh; and the hollow of Jacob's thigh was strained as he wrestled with him." A single touch of divine power showed him that resistance was useless. At that moment the scales fell from his eyes. He saw how sinful he had been in contending with the Almighty. He had come to an end of his own strength. He became limp and nerveless. His wrestling ceased. "Who am I that I can withstand God?" was the thought that rushed through his mind.

Instantly he changes his course. Ceasing to wrestle with Jehovah as an enemy to be mastered, and clinging to him in weakness as a friend to be intreated, he cries out, "I will not let thee go except thou bless me." Then was it that he was blessed. Where strength failed, faith prevailed; where wrestling had wrought defeat, faith brought victory. Jacob had no power over God, but he had power with God. God did not permit himself to be forced. In Hosea 12: 4 it is said that Jacob "wept and made supplication." His tears were his weapons. He was successful not as a combatant, but as a supplicant. He was knighted on the field not for his prowess, but for his trust.

The thing that Jacob secured at Jabbok was not victory over God, but victory over himself. He had aspirations. His higher nature contended for supremacy over his lower nature. There was a conflict going on in his soul such as his twin-brother Esau never knew, hence in spite of his manifest imperfections he is taken as the type of the spiritual man, while Esau stands as the type of the natural man. Out of his long, hard struggle he came forth at the end purified. Through much tribulation he entered the kingdom.

After his experience at Jabbok, Jacob was a changed man. His self-will and obstinacy gave place to docility and meekness. No longer did he try to be master of his fate. He was willing to let God have his own way with him. And for this he was honored. "Thy name shall be called no more Jacob, but Israel; for thou hast striven with God and with man and hast prevailed." The Vulgate reads, "Thou hast had power with God, and thou shalt prevail against men." Soon afterward, in his meeting with Esau, trusting no longer to cunning and intrigue, he prevailed against his enraged brother by his gentleness and conciliation. A noble victory!

Lessons from this incident:

1. Do not strive with God. There is no need to wrestle with him to overcome his opposition; no need to tease and worry him in order to wring a reluctant blessing from his hand. He is willing to give, willing to bless.

2. Cling to God in faith because you believe in his love and grace. He is not like the unjust judge who granted the request of the importunate widow in order to avoid further trouble. Your loving Father delights to answer your request. Go to him, therefore, with a faith that will not be denied. Cleave to him with a hold that will not be unloosened until the blessing is bestowed. Say with Charles Wesley:

Yes, I must maintain my hold,
'Tis thy goodness makes me bold;
I can no denial take
Since I plead thy mercy's sake.

3. Be submissive. If you must wrestle, wrestle with the devil, wrestle with yourself, but do not wrestle with God. It is by the power of utter helplessness, and not by the power of native strength, that any man prevails with God. When I am weak then am I strong.

And when my all of strength shall fail
I shall with the God-man prevail.

The moment of self-despair and self-distrust is the moment of victory, if then the soul will only cleave to God, saying in humble trustfulness, "I will not let thee go except thou bless me."

BIBLICAL PREACHING.

IT is a satisfaction to observe that the preaching of the Bible is becoming more common and popular. We hear on all sides of men who are preaching series of sermons on the books of the Scriptures or on Bible characters, or are preaching straight through a given portion of the Bible, and the reports indicate that this type of preaching is finding an acceptance on the part of the audiences such as no other preaching has secured. There is, no doubt, a certain type of preacher who will still persist in believing that so-called sensational themes are the most drawing. We may expect still to be afflicted by reports of sermons on what are presumed to be the interesting things of the hour, the latest literary sensation, the discussion of some of those time-worn themes which, under new guise, are constantly galvanized into a semblance of life for the curiosity of seekers who wait upon the ministry of men apparently incapacitated for dealing with the great facts and experiences of our holy faith. But it is a satisfaction to believe that those preachers who are really serious in their attempts to teach the Bible in their regular ministries are appreciated by their people. Many instances of this kind have come to light in recent days. We know of a pastor who preached during the late spring and early summer months on New Testament Books to audiences that grew continually. Another performed a similar service for different portions of the Old Testament. Still another took up a careful and yet popular study of Bible characters. A fourth gave a series of discourses on the Gospel of Matthew, and yet another dealt with the work of the prophets in historical sequence. From all these and many others, we have the reports of eager attention and growing audiences.

It is unquestionably true that this kind of preaching exacts a severer type of preparation from the preacher than the ordinary methods of taking miscellaneous themes, in many cases, already familiar to the preacher from frequent repetition. The minister who sets out to preach a series of sermons on the Holy Scriptures from the standard of history and literature, and to gain in this manner a platform from which to impress the lessons of the Word of God, undertakes a task which is truly ambitious, and which will demand from him the most careful and laborious preparation, but the rewards are ample, not only in the increase of interest, but in the positive value to his people of such a type of preaching. We are convinced that a return to this form of tasks, which was much more common a half century ago than today, but for which the literary aids provided at the present time are immeasurably beyond those of that earlier period, will prove to be not only a vast improvement over the ordinary type of preaching, but as well an intellectual and spiritual stimulus for the ministry itself, whose constant danger is that the Bible, the greatest source of power in preaching, will be neglected in all regards but those of the sheerest necessity for actual and limited pulpit preparation. Biblical sermons are indeed demanded and appreciated. The price of their successful presentation may be high in study on the part of the minister, but he will be amply rewarded by the results.

IN WHAT SENSE IS JESUS OUR EXAMPLE?

A Question, and Answer.

If we say "I will do as Jesus would have me do," how may we find out what he would have us do? Does the Bible teach that Jesus is our example in everyday business life? O. D. Maple, Cameron, Ill.

It is the satisfaction of the Christian to believe that Jesus is an example in every act of life. There is no situation in which one cannot confidently turn to the life of the Master and find in it the solution of such difficulties as may arise. This solution does not lie in the discovery of circumstances in his life just like those in our own, but rather in the recognition of the governing principles of his behavior, the ideals which he taught and embodied, in correspondence with which all conduct is to square itself. It is fortunate that our Saviour did not give explicit instructions or even illustrations of conduct upon all matters pertaining to our life. We should have only been perplexed by the multitude of things set down. The New Testament is not a book of rules or principles. A few illustrations are given, showing how Jesus conducted himself in accordance with the principles of his teaching and life. Observing these we may carry the application of the principles to every event of our own experience. Different minds may interpret with slight difference the application of these principles to the individual, but there can be no great difference arising out of a sincere desire to follow Jesus. Nevertheless each must face the problem for himself and determine what Jesus would do in the given circumstances of his own career. (See editorial in this issue on "The School of Christ").

The kingdom of Christ is the kingdom of the cross. Those who attempt to take the cross from the Christian's shoulders do, in effect, aim to remove the crown from his head.—Secker.

A NATIONAL TRAGEDY.

Like a thunderbolt out of a clear sky came the news of President McKinley's attempted assassination. As we write, his life still trembles in the balance, while from a grief-stricken nation prayer rises unceasingly to heaven for his recovery. It was a cruel fate that struck him down in the heyday of his popularity, and at the very moment when he was receiving the plaudits of a multitude assembled to do him honor. No president since Lincoln's day has held a warmer place in the hearts of the people. Not only has he worn the flower of a blameless life, but he has ever been an active, positive force on the side of social righteousness. His love for his mother, his chivalrous devotion to the wife of his youth have won for him the tenderest regard. It is a dreadful reflection that our modern social order could produce a wretch so base as to have it in his heart to seek the death of such a man. Yet this would-be assassin calmly and coolly declared, "I am an anarchist and have only done my duty." In contrast to his blood-curdling declaration are the first words of the wounded President, "May God forgive him."

From the heart of the nation comes the prayer, "God save our President," and with it is joined the prayer, "God comfort and sustain the sorely anguished wife."

A TEST OF CHARACTER.

In his letter to the Philippian church Paul says: "This I pray, that ye may be sincere and void of offense unto the day of Christ." (1:10.) The word "sincere" literally means sun-tried, or sun-tested. The figure seems to have been drawn from the familiar occurrence of taking a piece of cloth and holding it up to the sun in order to test its quality. Paul was a tent-maker, or rather a maker of goats' hair cloth, of which tents were made, and in the manufacture of which his native province of Cilicia was famed. In taking the fruit of his looms to the merchants he must therefore have seen them holding up the cloth to the sun that they might examine its texture. So here he prays that the Philippians might be able to stand the test of the light and thus be "void of offense unto the day of Christ."

Self-examination has not been thorough and complete until the character has been sun-tried. We have all to come to the light that our deeds may be made manifest whether or not they have been wrought in God. The light of day declares every man's work of what sort it is. Character that will not stand the test of light needs reforming.

COUNT TOLSTOI AND HIS VIEW OF DEATH.

Count Tolstoi, the greatest of all the Russians, has been sick. His sick room has been one of the world-centers of interest. His death would be a relief to the Russian government. Official Russia fears and hates him, but the Russian peasantry love him tenderly and passionately. They know that he is their friend. He is not a professed revolutionist, but he teaches revolutionary ideas—ideas before which every throne founded upon unrighteousness would totter and fall. His books are not for the Sunday school library. They are strong meat which only the strong can digest. The charge that they are purient is utterly false; but they are terribly realistic. They tear away with a remorseless hand all disguises and concealments, and expose to view the festering sores of Russian social and official life. No wonder that they are proscribed. The evils which they denounce demand redress, and only by keeping them out of sight can social revolution be prevented.

Count Tolstoi, now partially recovered from his illness, recently told a friend something of impressions gained. "I did not recognize those around me distinctly," he said. "I seemed to be slipping softly but surely into beatitude. Now there is the painful impression of returning through bog and quagmires to terrestrial existence. I regret every moment of the time between this world and the next."

To an interviewer he said: "I am feeling better, and, to tell the truth, I am rather sorry for it, as I love to be ill. Sickness and suffering destroy what is mortal in man solely to prepare him for something better." And, lowering his voice, he continued: "Don't let Sophie Andrejevna (the countess) hear us. Between you and me, I wouldn't like to get well again. If I do I promise you to write down the thoughts on life and death—if there is such a thing as death—that have crystallized in my brain during the past weeks while I lay here prostrate, undisturbed, happy. Their upshot is that death is but an incident, an episode in our present existence, while life itself never terminates. Hence death has nothing terrible; it portends only an intermezzo in eternal life. As the slave looks for the liberator so I look for death—look for it any moment, would welcome it under all circumstances."

THE FAILURE OF THE STEEL STRIKE.

The effort of the Amalgamated Association of Steel Workers to get their members who are employees of the Illinois Steel Company to violate their contract with the company and join the strike having failed, the failure of the strike is inevitable. The strikers have suffered from bad leadership. Arbitration is now out of the question. The only course left is for the strikers to resume work upon the proposed terms and keep their powder dry for a juster issue. Those who imagine that the collapse of this strike means a death blow to trades unionism are greatly mistaken. Trades unionism has its abuses, but it grows out of the newly awakened spirit of brotherhood which is characteristic of this age, and is one of the agencies for social unification and progress. It is really a conservative force, and constitutes one of the most powerful bulwarks against social anarchy. The principle for which it stands must continue to grow, and upon the purification of its motives and the improvement of its methods the welfare of society depends.

One small life in God's great plan,

How futile it seems, as the ages roll,
Do what it may, or strive how it can,

To alter the sweep of the infinite whole!

A single stitch in an endless web,

A drop in the ocean's flow and ebb,

But the pattern is rent where the stitch is lost,

Or marred where the tangled threads have crossed;

An' each life that fails of the true intent

Mars the perfect plan that is Master meant.

Between Us.

In our next issue will be given the first of a series of symposiums on practical questions. The subject of the symposium will be "How I Begin the Winter's Work."

Another feature of our next number will be the first installment of a story by Dr. Clarence A. Vincent of Galesburg, Ill. The story, which will be in four parts, is entitled "How John Wellman Commenced the Twentieth Century."

The two following issues will contain respectively symposiums on "The Young People and the Church," and "Revival Methods." Brief contributions on these topics are invited.

In the present issue will be found the first letter from our British correspondent, Dr. Wm. Adamson of Windermere.

Multiplied testimonies of appreciation are reaching us. But lest we should be exalted overmuch we are reminded at times of our failure to reach the ideal. We are, however, pressing on. If not yet an ideal paper, we are a paper with an ideal, an ideal which we intend unrestingly to pursue. In the arduous work we have undertaken we bespeak the co-operation of all those who with us seek the enlargement of the kingdom of God. We invite attention to the special trial offer referred to on the last page of the paper. May we not confidently look for a hearty response?

Several American ministers have been traveling and preaching in England during the summer. Among these is Dr. Pentecost, who has returned for a few weeks to his old church at Marylebone and expects to go from London to Manila on a mission for the American Board. Another American in London is Dr. Broughton of Atlanta, Georgia, the pastor of one of the largest Baptist churches in the south. Dr. Lorimer of Tremont Temple, Boston, has been preaching at Regent's Park Baptist chapel in London. Meantime, several English and Scotch ministers have been to America on similar journeys, though, unlike the American visitors to England, who for the most part remain in London, the Englishmen who come to this country are scattered widely and do more traveling.

CHICAGO NOTES.

The Congregational Ministers' Union was alone in attempting to hold a meeting on Monday last. The subject was vacation experiences; and the pale and time-worn jokes of the brethren regarding the big fish that got away failed to elicit much interest. Surely some more edifying topic might have been found.

Chicago public schools opened this week with a large attendance. The enrollment will probably reach 275,000. No other city in the Union except New York has a better showing. Last year the maintenance of public schools cost $7,250,000, or an average of $25 per capita. Nine new buildings have been erected for occupancy this year.

On Labor Day, Sept 2, an army of sixteen thousand union men marched through the streets. A better-dressed or finer-looking lot of workmen it would be impossible to find elsewhere. More impressive than the display of banners and devices was the general appearance of physical vigor, manly independence and marked intelligence displayed by the men themselves. Merriment and good order everywhere prevailed.

The arrival of the steamer Midland Queen direct from Manchester, England, last week, is an event of some significance. This was the first foreign-built ship to come direct from a European port to Chicago. It will not be long before government will improve the waterway between the lakes and the ocean, thus adding another strand to that wonderful system of intercommunication by which the nations of the earth are being bound together.

The meeting held in the Auditorium of the Y. M. C. A. on Labor Day, under the auspices of the Citizens' League, for the suppression of the sale of liquors to minors and drunkards, was not largely attended, but the interest manifested in protecting the boys and girls of the city from the baleful influences of our 6,300 saloons was apparent. Praise was given to the mayor for his readiness to co-operate with the officers of the society in the objects which they have in view. This is a work in which there ought to be greater enthusiasm especially on the part of Sunday school superintendents and pastors.

John P. Magrady, a Chicago photographer, claims to have discovered a perpetual light. The secret of this light is the combination of chemicals in a vacuum. These chemicals, which are four in number, when brought into contact in a glass or porcelain globe, dissolve and throw out a strong and beautiful white light. The globe will continue to give light so long as it remains perfectly sealed. The inventor has had one of the lamps burning steadily for seven months. The light is of dazzling brightness, a test showing it to be of thirty-six candle power. If the claims of the inventor be fully substantiated a revolution will be wrought in the methods of illumination.

An interesting episode occurred at Trinity Reformed church on Sunday last, when Vice-President Roosevelt occupied the pulpit. He preached an impressive sermon from the text, "Be ye doers of the Word, and not hearers only." He pleaded for earnestness, for openness, for steadfastness and for sincerity in religion. "Heroism does not consist in doing striking deeds alone," he said. "It is in the little things of daily life that the noblest heroism is proved. A man might perform one famous, gallant deed and yet be a coward in the worst sense. The greatest heroes are those whose names are unknown of men but whose thoughts and deeds, though small by the popular measure, are mighty and unselfish in the eyes of God. No man, not the best of you, lives out the best that he learns in his church. If he but tries to follow the Word, to do it, he has accomplished much. But to hear it only, and then fall short of practice, is worse than folly. I do not like to see a man slack in any of the works of life. If a thing is worth doing it is worth doing well, with all one's heart. That only will give satisfaction. A sentence of Milton's has always appealed to me, 'A man that can stand the shock of contact with the world can stand the contact of a Christian life and lead an active life in both.' The greatest satisfaction in life is to look back upon duty well done."

CONTRIBUTED

Until We Die.

O life, we know that some day it must be
Thy warm, dear sun shall set to rise no more,
And through the soul's unbarred and swinging door
The mist shall sweep that rolleth in from sea.
Yet from that hour of night we would not flee,
For sunset ever holds the dawn in store,
And death is life which leadeth still before,
After the opened gate hath set us free.

Nay, 'tis the unseeing eye, the unheeding ear,
The hands that falter e'er the heart hath failed,
The heart that finds love's tasks too stern and high—
'Tis shrinking life, not loss of days, we fear,
These things, not death, whereat our souls have quailed—
Life, grant that we may live until we die.

"IS THERE A PLACE FOR DOUBT AND A FOUNDATION FOR FAITH?"

By George Luther Cady.

Part I.

MR. VAN DYKE calls this an "Age of Doubt" and Dr. Bradford calls it "The Age of Faith." It is both. They labor in vain who attempt to abolish faith and make it all doubt, and no less vain is the labor of those who would crush out doubt and keep it an age of faith. You cannot have one without the other. If it were not pre-eminently a time of vigorous faith, doubt would have no reason for existence, for it is a parasite; without doubt faith could not thrive, for it would be an age of mere credulity, but not of faith. Paradoxical as this seems, it is one of the eternal antinomies of the human mind. Yet do we not look upon every doubt as evil and every doubter as willfully perverse, to be avoided as a case of smallpox? All true men stand some time at the parting of the ways and the sign-board is all blurred or the vision is dimmed. They cannot honestly toss a penny for the choice of the way, but must sit down and work out their own salvation with fear and trembling. Doubt is the signal the mind throws out to warn the world that it is doing serious work. I do not mean that supercilious, shallow-brained doubt which thrives because it thinks it is smart, which shrugs its shoulders because it does not care for truth, but that doubt which doubts like Descartes in order to find truth. Men despair of this age because it is an "Age of Doubt;" rightly viewed it is the most hopeful feature about it. Every age of doubt has been the messenger sent before the face of truth to make straight the highway and clear away the rubbish. The "Leben Jesu" of Nathan Strauss fell upon the Christian Church with almost paralyzing terror and men saw in it the greatest foe of their faith that had appeared, but it opened the way, or rather, forced the way open, for the most magnificent study of the Man of Galilee since the Gospels. The study of Christ is a modern study and our bookshelves owe to Strauss the fact that they possess a Geikie, an Edersheim and a Farrar. The second effect was, as has been pointed out by Prof. Nash, the modern eager and thorough study of the sources of our knowledge of the Lord. There has followed all the deep research of modern criticism; and while many a devout soul has held his breath for fear his faith in the Bible was being destroyed, today the Bible needs less defence and apology than ever—it is more usable, more believable, more available than it has ever been in the history of the Church. Modern criticism has made the Church its everlasting debtor—the Bible needs no apology for its contents. So modern philosophy owes its triumphs to the morning when Descartes lay in bed and doubted everything that could be doubted.

So it is with all true strong souls! The man who sits with mouth wide open and eyes shut like a young robin swallowing whatever is brought to him, never winking or making a wry face, has credulity, a few half-masticated traditions, but no real faith. It is not unreasonable to say that no man has a faith for which he has not struggled or a religion over which he has not agonized. Religion, like character, is not a gift nor is it hereditary; it is a victory—the crown given only to the one who has scars. I like the young man or woman who sees Doubt, big, brawny and brainy, coming down the highway of life, and does not whine nor whimper, nor allow the foe to see his back, but buckles on his intellectual armor and wrestles for his spiritual foundations and earns his faith. Browning says:

You call for faith;
I show you doubt, to prove that faith exists.
The more of doubt, the stronger faith I say
If faith o'ercomes doubt."

There are few strong men who have not an experimental sympathy with Carlyle when the Everlasting No had peeled authoritatively through all the recesses of his being, and the Everlasting Yea had recorded its undying protest, and he says: "It is from this hour that I incline to date my spiritual New Birth; perhaps directly thereupon I began to be a man."

Tennyson became the poet of faith only because he knew the deeps of the sea of doubt and he sings of himself as well as of his friend:

"You say, but with no touch of scorn,
Sweet-hearted, you whose light-blue eyes
Are tender over drowning flies,
You tell me, doubt is devil-born.

I know not: one indeed I knew
In many a subtle question versed,
Who touched a jarring lyre at first,
But ever strove to make it true:

Perplex in faith but pure in deeds,
At last he beat his music out.
There lives more faith in honest doubt,
Believe me, than in half the creeds.

He fought his doubts and gathered strength.
He would not make his judgments blind,
He faced the spectres of his mind,
And laid them; thus he came at length

To find a stronger faith his own."

The man who has seriously and honestly wrestled with his doubts will have a sword of faith which does not sound back with the dull thud of a stick when he meets the foes of active life, but one which has the true ring of a tempered steel. There is room for the profoundest optimism for a man or an age of doubt if met with sympathy and not suspicion.

What was the difficulty with David in "The Reign of Law"? Granting that the book is a very beautiful nature study, but a most superficial study of religious experience; that to put a young man fresh from the hemp fields through Darwin, Tyndall, etc., in eighteen months is a little too swift pace for our gravity, yet if David was not an intelligent, we must concede that he was an honest and a representative doubter. If the author had made a good study of adolescence he would have known that his hero (?) was characteristic of that period, but not of maturity. What was his difficulty? It was not the dissensions of the church, for a religion that is worth having is worth keeping in face of church quarrels; a man may be forced to live without the church in such cases, but he is not forced to live without Christ. Neither was it the conflict of science and religion, for brighter minds than his have found room for evolution and the Bible, for Darwin and Christ in the same brain; all the leading men of science in the university with which I am connected are firm believers in the Bible and active workers in the churches. The difficulty with David was that he found no sympathy. The whole story reads like a tragedy of errors; the abuse of the pastor in his study, the cry of the thick-brained mother, and the brutal kick of the father, but no one to stand beside him as did the sweet girl later and say, "You will need me all the more!" "You cannot cure blindness by striking it across the eyes;" neither can you make men to know God by being godless toward them! There is no time in all life when a young man needs help so much as when he stands in the valley of decision, at the parting of two ways; and it will all depend upon whether he gets sympathy or ostracism how he will come out.

Starbuck closes his chapter on adolescent doubt with these words: "Instead of trying to crush doubt it would be wiser to inspire earnestness and sincerity of purpose in the use of it for the discovery of truth. If doubts are evil, it is because there is a wicked nature behind them. Doubt is a means of calling up and utilizing the latent possibilities of one's nature. If there is a boundless substratum of healthy life on which to draw, and if there is a high degree of earnestness in the desire to know truth in order to use it, doubts are rather to be met and mastered than to be shunned."

JUST BE GLAD.

O heart of mine, we shouldn't Worry so.
What we've missed of calm we couldn't
Have, you know!
What we've met of stormy pain,
And of sorrow's driving rain,
We can better meet again,
If it blow.
We have erred in that dark hour
We have known;
When the tears fell with the shower,
All alone.
Were not shine and shower blent
As the gracious Master meant?
Let us temper our content
With His own.
For we know not every morrow
Can be sad;
So, forgetting all the sorrow
We have had,
Let us fold away our fears,
And put by our foolish tears,
And through all the coming years
Just be glad.

NAZARETH OF TODAY--A MEMORY.

F. M. Blatchford.

IF you could only see it, and know that through all those silent years of our Lord's life he saw it, too. Yes, he saw the same little town up in the hills of Galilee. It does not crown the hill-top quite as a fortress would, for the top of that hill is not a point or a plateau, but a depression within the hill itself like a deep saucer. You must climb up from the town of Nazareth to get the wide view of earth and sky and sea. Jesus Christ must have taken that climb many times to look off toward the setting sun; or to see the glories of a new day streaming up from the east; or in the star-light to be alone with God. For in the stress of his after life he seemed to gain rest from his arduous service by just this habit of his boyhood, of communing with his Father on the heights in the silence of night.

But listen now to this incident which happened to a little citizen of the Nazareth of today, and realize that there was something in this little Syrian maiden which suggests that she might have been a fellow-citizen of the wonderful Child nineteen hundred years ago. This little girl was at the Virgin's fountain. She was standing erect and triumphant, for she had just finished her family washing! If you could have but seen her, with her great, dark, glowing eyes, her abundant dark hair, only half seen for the bright kerchief which in part bound it in tidiness and in part covered it from the hot Syrian sun. Her only garment was a striped, gay cotton slip coming below her knees. She had but nine or ten years in her age, but in spite of her extreme youth she was swift and practiced and self-reliant in all her motions. Just why she was doing a little woman's work there was no way of knowing. Perhaps her mother was ill and depended upon her; perhaps there was a sick baby who claimed all the mother's care; or perhaps there was no mother at all in the home except this little embryo one.

But to go back from these imaginings to the real little girl standing by the low stone parapet which surrounds the hard flagging by the well. Her pottery jar had been filled from the abundant living water of the fountain, and was leaning against the well. Her washing was done and the wet garments patted and pressed into a blue cotton cloth by those swift, tiny, brown hands. This bundle, rather larger than an ordinary cottage loaf, was placed on her shoulder. Then with one knee on the step, the little unconscious athlete swung up to the top of her head the jar of water. One could but watch in mute admiration a feat so graceful in the beautiful child. No plodding service dully and clumsily performed, but a little girl radiant with life, doing a service because she loved. A moment she stood still to find her perfect poise, and then very slowly and carefully one small foot was placed on the step below and then the other until the stone pavement of the narrow oriental street was safely reached. One could but love her more with every new motion, and give her an affectionate following as her steps became faster and she was about to disappear around the corner of the shadowed street. But just at that moment came a swift figure—was it a boy or a lurking spirit of evil? He had a scarf in his hand, and with a swing of his arm snapped it at the little bare feet of the water carrier. One could not fly to catch that trembling jar! The instant of arrested progress was enough to lose the wonderful poise. The little clinging hands tried to save its fall, but failed, and down it came with a crash. It broke in a thousand pieces, splashing the water over the damp stones. The destruction of the water jar was complete, but was as nothing beside that broken-hearted child. First, she was speechless with fright and terror, then looking at the waste about her, she dropped on her knees and sobbed bitterly. She was at once surrounded by helpers, a new jar given her and soothing, sympathetic words. But the sorrow for what is ruined had entered her heart, and she would not soon be comforted. The poor little boy had not seen these consequences. He was chagrined, and fearing the revenge of public sentiment, he flew like a bird of ill omen down the nearest passage he could find.

Let us not forget that the heart of a little child can break, and let us not forget that we have near us these little fellow-citizens of Jesus Christ who need comforting. George Eliot has truly said: "These bitter sorrows of childhood! When sorrow is all new and strange, when hope has not got wings to fly beyond the days and weeks, and the space from summer to summer seems measureless."

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

By William Adamson, D. D.

GENERAL feeling pervades the Christian Church on both sides of the Atlantic that the New Century should be in a prominent degree a Christian Century. In order that it may be so, to the extent possible, the two great Anglo-Saxon nations of the United States and Britain must join hands before the cross and him who died there, reconsecrate themselves to his service and pledge themselves to work for the extension of his kingdom. Such a union of heart and effort would go far to the elevation of the race and the advancement of those things which are dear to the heart of our common Lord and Saviour. It was therefore with no common feelings of gladness that I saw the first number of your "Christian Century," and I said to myself, "This is what is required to give an impetus to the cause of humanity and of God." May your expectation be more than realized, and may thousands be, by your agency, raised to a higher spiritual platform than that which they have previously occupied, and be led to live more for the glory of the Master, whose Spirit is ready to energize every soul willing to receive a blessing. If we are straitened it is in ourselves and not in God.

The United Free Church.

It may be ancient news to some of your readers to tell them about the union of the Free Presbyterian churches in Scotland. There may be some, however, who do not understand the ecclesiastical condition of the land of Knox, Chalmers, Guthrie, Wardlaw, and Morison. Up to the end of last year there were three large Presbyterian churches which had the same creed and form of church government. There was first the Established Church of Scotland, which, historically, is the mother of us all. Secondly, there was the Free church, which sprang out of the famous disruption in 1843, when Chalmers and his large following left the State church and constituted a church which has had a remarkable history. And thirdly, there was the United Presbyterian church, formed by the union of the secession and relief churches which originally broke away from the Established church on matters pertaining to the true headship of Christ, and the power of Caesar in the ordering of the house of God. After prolonged negotiations the two last-named denominations were united in October of 1900, and now are known as "The United Free Church of Scotland." Its churches and ministers are about as numerous as those of the State church and the membership numbers very nearly half a million. It seems to me that this body of Christians will constitute the church of the future for the nation. It has within it the resources necessary for consolidation and expansion. On the human side its most important element of strength is the men fitted and furnished for the work of the ministry in its largest sense, devout, earnest, scholarly, and withal humble. Amongst them are such men as Principal Rainy, Professors A. B. Davidson, Denney, Orr, Dods, Salmon and Geo. Adam Smith, and the Rev. Drs. Alexander Whyte, Stalker, White-law and Hastings. Besides those, who from age and experience occupy the foremost rank as leaders of thought, there is a large number of young men who will make their power felt, and even now are commanding attention as preachers and writers on some of the most fundamental doctrines of religion. I do not attempt at present to give the reasons why I believe there never was a church more richly endowed with able, erudite and devoted teachers and preachers than the United Free Church of Scotland. My conviction is recorded all the more freely because I do not belong to this communion.

It is also to be noted that a remarkable change has passed over the professors and pastors of this church as to doctrine within the last half century. They do not stand doctrinally where they stood in 1843 and after, and they are moving further from the standards year by year. The original leaders of the Free church were firm and narrow Calvinists. Dr. Candlish wrote with all his energy, which was not little, a defense of a strictly limited atonement; though before his death he seems to have departed from this view of the extent of the work of the Saviour. Principal Cunningham—the theologian of the Disruption—was a thorough and consistent adherent and expounder of the doctrines of the Westminster Confession of Faith. Professor Gibson's chief work was entitled "Man's Natural and Moral Inability to Believe the Word of God." And the doctrine that a sinner was regenerated by the Holy Spirit through belief of the gospel was looked upon as a heresy which demanded the expulsion of the pastor who held it. Very different ideas and spirit are at present declared and manifested in the pulpits of the same churches. The love of God for all men is the burden of the message delivered, and no one says that it should be anything else. Today the living faith of the church is not that of the third chapter of the Confession of Faith, but that of the Scriptures, as defined in the Declaratory Acts, by which, as a minister said to me, they are now enabled to preach without reserve from the words, "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in him might not perish but have everlasting life." The evangelical spirit and the personal piety of the ministers of this section of the household of faith have prevented some of their ablest men from being diverted from the Cross by the movement among many in sympathy with the theories of the higher critics. Some of the professors and pastors have taken a foremost place as advocates of the advanced views, but at the same time they have held fast to the great verities of the Lord's true divinity, his Atonement, Resurrection, Ascension and Intercession. Of other churches and matters I will, D. V., write again.

THE P. S. A. IN F. B. MEYER'S CHURCH.

By Willard B. Thorp.

HE "Pleasant Sunday Afternoon" has become so well established an institution in England that the letters P. S. A. in Sunday announcements are as well understood as C. E. among us. The organization apparently corresponds pretty closely to what we would call a Men's Club, and its work centers about a Sunday afternoon meeting for men only. Having some little curiosity to see what these meetings would be like, I took the opportunity afforded by a Sabbath in London to attend the P. S. A. at Dr. Meyer's church in Westminster Bridge Road. The interior arrangement of the church is in what we would call the Episcopal style, with stone arches, reading desk, pulpit and choir. On entering the church at 3:30 I found about 300 men assembled. They were plain men with rough faces, most of them apparently from the laboring classes. It was about such an audience as might assemble at our Sunday afternoon Y. M. C. A. meetings. From allusions made during the meeting I judge the vacation season had somewhat reduced the attendance. On the platform were half a dozen officers and speakers, behind them a band of ten pieces, and at the right a choir of perhaps sixteen male voices. The chairman, apparently a minister, announced that the choir would sing "Jesus saves." The singing called forth a hearty round of applause, which was the first feature of the service which would strike a visitor as novel. The audience was evidently in a pleasant mood and liked to hear itself applaud. It applauded pretty nearly everything except the prayers, including some very indifferent solo singing and the announcement of the amount of last Sunday's collection. It joined earnestly in the Lord's Prayer after a brief prayer by a minister. It did not sing very well, although the one or two gospel hymns were printed on a leaflet. Some visitors were present from a P. S. A. in Yorkshire, and at the suggestion of the chairman they rose in their seats and were applauded. One of the officers was asked to say a few words which "might help the collection a bit," and managed to combine an earnest religious exhortation with a good-natured plea for funds. The band played with more noise than music during the collection. Then a lawyer appeared in the high pulpit, and after the hand-clapping had ceased, gave a capital short talk of perhaps twelve minutes in which one or two personal anecdotes and bits of description were used to point a spiritual truth. He dropped his h's badly, but his talk was interesting and helpful. Then the minister who was supplying the pulpit that day gave another brief talk from the platform, in which he spoke of himself as coming from a P. S. A. in Reading, 700 strong. At the conclusion of his talk the limit of one hour had evidently been reached and the meeting was dismissed with hymn and benediction. I waited a little to see if there would be any special evidence of attention to strangers, but did not find any. The men dispersed quickly, and the monthly paper of the P. S. A. was being cried in the vestibule.

What, on the whole, was the impression produced by the service? I have purposely described it without any attempt to idealize, and perhaps have dwelt too much upon the little infelicities that would strike a critical visitor. But no one could be present without feeling that it was a thoroughly wholesome and helpful meeting and that good was being done. In the morning I had attended service in Westminster Abbey. It was stately and beautiful, and Canon Gore's sermon was a careful balancing of different sides of truth. But of the two services I have no hesitation in affirming that the "brief, bright, brotherly" meeting of the P. S. A. was calculated to do more good to those who attended. There was something in the earnest words of exhortation that might well serve to steady a man amid the temptations of the great city. There was a reminder that he was a soldier and that he must make his life a battle. It struck the note of moral appeal which every one of us needs to have struck for him continually, and which the Abbey service failed to strike, although I doubt not its congregation of tourists needed it quite as much in their way as the crowd of rough men and boys on Westminster Bridge Road.

AN ILLUSTRATION.

R. W. Gammon.

SI I was returning from the city one winter's day on a suburban train, a friend of mine took a seat with me. Our talk drifted to the events of the day, and he told me that he had been down to help his sister to change cars at Dearborn station. I gathered from his conversation that his sister had married some years before and had moved to the far West. The day previous he had received a telegram from the sister announcing the death of her youngest child, that she was taking the body to Michigan for burial, that her husband could not come, would her brother help her to change cars? He had done so, but was prevented from attending her on her journey by sickness in his own family.

After relating these circumstances he was silent for a time and then made this remark: "Strange what changes the Master can make in a human life! My sister was a laughing, harum-scarum girl, always ready for fun, for a good time—the latter to her always meant something out of the ordinary. When her black eyes began to snap, father and mother, who are staid Quakers, knew that trouble was brewing; my sister was constantly doing something that outraged their feelings; between a good sober way of doing and the outlandish one she generally chose the latter. Our aunts, uncles, and grandparents predicted disaster for Florence, the creature of moods and impulses. That was fifteen years ago. How different she was today! The circumstances were so depressing—that cold northwest wind whistled mournfully through the car sheds, the sky had a dull leaden hue portending a storm, the rattle of the vehicles on the frozen streets made me shiver. As my sister and I went down between the long lines of cars we passed a truck upon which was a little box. A spasm of pain shook my sister's frame, a look of agony for a moment was on her face, she murmured, "There's Roger!" and I knew that we had passed the body of her little one. The tears sprang to our meeting eyes, but the look of pain was gone and in the face where so often before fun and outbreking mischief had reigned supreme I now saw peace, trust, and victory. When parting from her in the car I told her I was glad she was so brave and triumphant. 'Yes,' said she, 'the Master is with me and one of the old hymns has been giving me comfort all this day.' Then she spoke for me these comfort-lines—

Not now, but in the coming years,
It may be in the better land,
We'll read the meaning of our tears,
And then sometime we'll understand.
God knows the way; he holds the key,
He guides us with unerring hand,
Sometime with tearless eyes we'll see;
Yes, then up there we'll understand.

"I left her there to continue her sad but triumphant journey—triumphant because Jesus had transformed her life."

My friend left the train at the next station, and as I journeyed homeward I had a new view of Jesus, the Master of Life.

CHURCH LETTERS.

D. A. Wickizer.

ONE of the serious problems that confronts our city work is how to save the people who move from the rural districts into the cities. Thousands of Christian people come to our cities and never find fellowship with Christian churches. Many times this is because coming from smaller places they are afraid of city churches. Others find it so convenient to take a vacation, having been in service for many years and never before had a good opportunity for such a

Can we not introduce among us a system of granting church letters that will save many of these people to the cause of Christ, and spare our pastors of much labor that is largely wasted? We understand that many times it is necessary to spend more time with a sinner who has in his possession a church letter, that we may persuade him to place the same with a congregation, than it would be to convert a sinner not in possession of such an instrument.

Why can we not introduce among us the following method: When a member moves to another place let the church order that the pastor or clerk shall send to the pastor or elders of the congregation where the said brother has moved, a letter of recommendation, and upon receipt of that letter they shall enter his name upon their church records as a member with them. Then they can send their calling committee to wait upon this brother and welcome him to their work and fellowship, and without intermission and without loss to the cause he enters at once upon his Master's work.

Brethren, send a word to the Century concerning this subject. If the above plan meets your approval commend it; if you have something better let the churches know what it is. The churches can not afford our present system that furnishes so great an opportunity for loss.

GROWTH OF LIBRARIES.

SIXTEEN million dollars were given to American libraries in the year ending July 1. The gifts cover nearly every state of the union, but they are by no means equally distributed. Of gifts in money the north Atlantic states, from Maine to Pennsylvania, received five-sixths of all, and seven-twelfths of the money for buildings. Of what was left the lion's share fell to the north central states, from Ohio to Kansas. These absorbed four-fifths of the remaining gifts for buildings and nearly half of the gifts in money. To the south Atlantic states came only $637,000; to the south central only $275,000. The distinctively western states, from Montana to California, showed gifts of $590,000. Of course Mr. Carnegie is to be credited with a greater part of this beneficence, more than $11,000,000 of the $16,000,000 coming from him. Next in significance is the gift of the John Carter Brown Library, with an accompanying endowment, to Brown University at Providence. The whole exhibition, however regarded, is one of which the nation may well be proud, as indeed it may of the general public library statistics for the year, for, according to the reports of the Education Bureau, there are 5,383 essentially public libraries, with over 1,000 volumes, in the United States, an increase of 25 per cent in five years, coupled with a still greater increase in volumes, from 33,000,000 to nearly 45,000,000. Here again the north Atlantic division is far in the lead, with more than half the books, and nearly half the organizations. New York, as might be expected, has most, but Massachusetts presses her close in both regards, and in proportion to wealth and population has a long lead over any, save possibly her neighbor, Rhode Island.

AMERICAN COLLEGES.

There are 629 universities and colleges and forty-three schools of technology in the United States. The total value of the property possessed by institutions for higher education amounts to $342,888,361, a gain of about $31,000,000 over the amount for the preceding year. The endowment fund amounts to $154,120,590. The total income for the year, excluding benefactions, amounted to $27,739,154. The value of gifts and bequests during the year 1898-9 amounted to $21,925,436. Some $2,500 is invested for each student who is now enjoying the advantages of any of the institutions of learning.

Classical courses claim by far the greater number of students in American colleges. In the college year 1898-9 in those courses there were 35,595 students out of the 147,164. In the same year 21,860 were taking the general culture courses, 9,858 general science courses, 2,593 instruction in agriculture, 4,376 in mechanical engineering, 2,550 in civil engineering and 2,320 in electrical engineering; 1,032 students were studying mining engineering, 627 architecture, 9,501 pedagogy and 6,698 were taking business courses.

The number of degrees conferred during the year for work done was 15,087—10,794 on men and 4,293 on women. Thirty-eight different varieties of degrees were conferred and in some cases only one candidate received a degree—musical doctor, for example. Seven hundred and thirty-five honorary degrees were conferred.

In 1872 the number of students to each 1,000,000 of population was 573; in 1880 it had increased to 770, in 1890 to 850, in 1893 to 1,037, while in 1899 the number was 1,196.

LEPROSY IN THE UNITED STATES.

According to scientific investigations, directed from Washington, which have been going on for several months, there are about 275 reported cases of leprosy in the United States. It is thought probable that the real number may be nearer 1,000. For various reasons physicians who have cases of this disease in many instances either fail or refuse to report them. But the number reported is sufficiently large to occasion some alarm. Seventy-four of the known cases are in New Orleans, chiefly among the Italian population. There are twenty-three in Minnesota, mostly among Scandinavians in the rural settlements. There are fifteen cases in North Dakota and two in South Dakota, among the same people. So far as has been ascertained, there are none in Michigan nor in Indiana; Chicago has five cases, and New York six. Boston has none.

It is noteworthy that nearly all of the two hundred and seventy-five reported victims are foreigners. The Scandinavians seem peculiarly susceptible to the disease. They either had it when they landed in America, or contracted it shortly after landing. Every one of the cases in the Dakotas and Minnesota is located in the country, in localities rather remote even from small towns. The disease seems to be spreading most rapidly in Louisiana, and for several years there has been agitation there in favor of efficient supervision and control of all leprosy patients, either by the state or by the government.—Boston Transcript.

PLEASANTRIES.

"Brother Jones has sent us a mess of greens," writes a Georgia editor. "May the good Lord send us some bacon to boil with 'em."—Atlanta Constitution.

"Now, Sammy, have you read the story of Joseph?" "Oh, yes, uncle." "Well, then, what wrong did they do when they sold their brother?" "They sold him too cheap."

A little girl, being examined for admission into the church, was asked: "Why did the Israelites make a golden calf?" The prompt reply was: "They had na as muckle sillar as wad make a coo!"

Mike Donovan, when he visited the cemetery, noticed on a tombstone the following inscription: "Sacred to the memory of a lawyer and an honest man." "By the powers," said Mike, "that's a strange custom, to bury two men in one grave!"

"And so, John, you ha' become an Independent?" said the clergyman of the Established church. "'Deed, sir, that's just true." "Oh, John, I'm sure ye ken that a rolling stane gathers nae moss!" "Aye, that's true, too, but can ye tell me what gude the moss does to the stane?"

During the discussion at a meeting of the Trinity College Historical Society upon the slight consideration attached to life by uncivilized nations, a speaker mentioned the extraordinary circumstance that in China if a man were condemned to death he could easily hire a substitute to die for him; "and," the debater went on, "I believe many poor fellows get their living by acting as substitutes in that way!"—London Spectator.

Father (severely)—"My son, this is a disgraceful state of affairs. The report says you are the last boy in the class of twenty-two." Henry—"It might have been worse, father." Father—"I can't see how." Henry—"There might have been more boys in the class."—Boston Traveler.

They tell a story to the effect that when the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals proposed to establish a branch in a leading city of Spain the municipal body courteously accepted the proposal and offered to hold a grand bullfight at once to furnish the funds.—Troy Times.

The mother of one of our soldiers in the late war was busy packing a box containing food to send to him, and the servant was watching the operation. Having put in the last article, the mother said: "I guess that is all, Nora; we will now nail it up." "Excuse me, mum," said Nora, "but how will he ever open it without we put in an ax?"

As a train was moving out of a Scotch station a man in one of the compartments noticed that the porter, in whose charge he had given his luggage, had not put it into the van, and so shouted at him and said: "Hi! you old fool! What do you mean by not putting my luggage in the van?" To which the porter replied: "Eh, man! yer luggage is ne'er such a fool as yersel'! Yer i' the wrang train!"

People who "lay themselves out" to talk always remind me of the delegate at the political convention, the worthy whose enthusiasm was so contagious that a reporter, weary of the dry bones of things, asked him for a summary of his views on the burning question. "What do you think of the situation?" he asked. "What do I think?" exclaimed the vociferous one. "Young man, you mistake my employment. I'm not here to think; I'm here to holler!"—Philadelphia Times.

A military Tory candidate for Parliament was addressing a meeting of voters in an English village at a by-election which took place toward the end of 1892. The candidate was known to be strongly in favor of flogging in the army, and this was being used against him with damaging effect. Defending himself, the orator urged that no necessary disgrace attached to being flogged. "Why," cried he, "I was flogged myself once, and it was for telling the truth." "And it cured 'ee naw doubt," said a rustic in the meeting.

The smallest service we can do,
With seal of love divine,
Will some one's fainting faith renew,
The heart to God incline;
We are not left to work alone,
But stand as servants true,
Each little kindly action known
By him we may not view.

OUR PULPIT. THE PERFECTING OF MAN.

W. Douglas Mackenzie, D. D.

Text: Matthew 5: 48: Be ye also perfect as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.

EVERY one who lives a rational life feels that there is some meaning in it, and that the meaning is not to be found merely in its details. He cannot explain his manhood by stating the amount of money he possesses, or the business he pursues, or even what family relations he has. He knows and we know that the meaning of his life is more than the sum of these. Every man knows that the meaning of his life, if it is to be worth thinking of, can only be described by the word that enters into the above title—the perfecting of man. No man would be content with a religion that does not promise to perfect him. He knows that a religion which is to be true and final, on which he can cast his whole strength, must be one which aims solely, ultimately, at perfecting his manhood. Accordingly, it is of great importance to us that Christ, our Lord, and his apostles after him, do put this word in a significant way into every part of their teaching and that they speak to us about the perfecting of man. They will not trifle with our affections, or our interests, or our impulses in any direction whatsoever. They will not tell us that we are to be content with anything else than the best we can conceive. They will not allow us to sit down satisfied with anything beneath the infinitude of heaven itself. They tell us that we are to aim at the perfecting of man. And the inspiration of the Gospel, and the meaning of the religion of Jesus Christ, is that it offers to us the perfecting of man.

1. What is Perfection?

What do we mean by perfecting? No doubt the word may be used easily and lazily in a negative way. But the idea of perfection as applied to any fact ought to be most positive and most noble. We shall find then that two ideas which are very closely related to one another are included in it. When the artist has fashioned for us a noble statue and we stand before it, saying, That is perfect, he has drawn us on to that assertion because he and we cherish together a certain ideal. We see that what his hands have wrought represents as fully as we desire the ideal that we had in mind; and we rejoice and are filled with gladness because his mind and ours were at one and meet and greet each other in his triumphant work. Accordingly we call that perfect which fulfills its ideal.

Now, some one has an ideal of you and you will never be perfect until you represent it concretely, actually, in the man you are. You may have, you ought to have, some glimpse of that ideal in your own mind; and if you are worth anything, my brother, you know that you do not come anywhere near it. But for us, instructed in the Christian religion, there is something more wonderful, more terrible, than that. We find that even our ideal falls short of the real ideal. No man yet has ever seen the beauty of his manhood as God sees it. No man ever yet has proposed to himself to become anything so glorious in strength, so perfect in spirit, as that which God proposed when he fashioned him and set him in the world with the nature out of which it must be made. The idea of perfecting, then, means on one side of it the embodying of the ideal, the realizing of the most perfect intention that could be formed, in some one individual fact.

But the word perfecting has a slightly different meaning when we take an instrument in our hands and say, That is a perfect instrument. The idea now is of a practical end outside itself, some use to which it can be put. A man who fashions a knife skilfully and perfectly, makes a knife so perfect in shape and so true in steel that it is perfectly adapted to the work of a knife. If it is a good instrument, it will cut well, last well, hurt less than any other instrument more clumsily made. When a man builds a church we call it a faulty church if it does not fit into the use that it ought to serve as a place of worship, an inspiration of worshipful feelings, and as aiding in every way it can the worshipful attitude of mind and heart. In the idea of perfecting any object we include then, these two ideas, that it shall embody some ideal and that it shall serve some true purpose.

2. The Perfection of Man.

Now, when I speak of the perfecting of man, do I mean merely one of those two things? No, I mean both of them. There is an ideal somewhere, of perfect manhood, and there is a wonderful use to which manhood can be put. That man only is being perfected who is traveling towards that ideal, or who is becoming useful for the end of his own individual manhood. When, therefore, we speak about the perfecting of man, when we hear Jesus saying, Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect, when we are urged to cherish the idea of perfection by an apostle, and told that the ministers of the church are to lead us towards a perfect or full-grown manhood, let us remember that all this is meant. The perfecting of man! If God has formed the ideal of me, what sort of a man should I be, and what a miserable thing have I become! If God has formed his ideal of you, what sort of man or woman ought you to be! And how do you feel yourself in relation to God's ideal of you? On the other hand, if we are to be perfect for the uses of God, how useful have we been for God? Has he obtained anything through us? His ideal of our perfection is not to end in simply the fashioning of a beautiful statue, warm with the flush of life upon it, for other spirits to surround with artistic admiration. If he has formed an ideal of you and me, it is of us living and of us moving, of us active amongst our fellowmen, of us as we shake hands and greet one another, as we deal with one another in business, as we pray alone, as we work in public. The ideal is one of the uses to which you and I can be put in our relations among men. The perfecting of the man, therefore, must mean the perfecting of the individual and the perfecting of the race at once.

3. The Command Which Condemns.

Our Lord gave to us this command. Be ye perfect, and this ideal is held up to us by the Christian religion. Now, if that were all religion had to say about it, there is no command that could crush more cruelly in despair than that. Be ye perfect as your Father which is in heaven is perfect! As perfect as he is, who is removed above all temptation, above all change, as he who dwells in the perfection of his everlasting life, who is faultless, pure as light, who is ineffable love, who is all power and all wisdom and all righteousness, so that you cannot think of anything, of any form of perfection, in which God does not perfectly surpass your conception of it. We are to be perfect as our Father which is in heaven is perfect. People talk sometimes of the Sermon on the Mount as the program, or essence and summary of Christianity. It would be the program of our doom if we had no more. That sermon is the setting forth of the ideal, the perfecting of man; and if that was all, it had been too much; too much for the vitality, for the hope, for the energy of the best men in the race. It is the best men who despair mostly easily; it is the loftiest souls and most sensitive natures that would go down in gloom if that only had been what Christ gave us—the perfected man depicted in a divine sermon. He gave a great deal more. He came to put within our reach the instruments for the perfecting of man. Yes, Christianity is the force that sets this work in motion. It is the energy that enters into a man and for the first time makes it possible for him to live upwards towards the ideal that is ever far off as long as he is in this world, the ideal of himself as he begins to see it away beyond in the heart of his God. It is the Gospel of Jesus Christ that first of all arouses in men the desire for this intelligible, practical, real, hope of becoming perfect, and it is the same that provides for us the ministries through which that is to be attained.

4. The Ministries of Perfection.

Ordinarily when we speak of the Gospel of Jesus Christ as being useful for the perfecting of man, we mean the preaching of his redemptive work; and that is the soul of the thing. But, taking that for granted, let us look at this fact, that when the apostle speaks about our being led forward into a perfect manhood, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ, he is speaking of the ministries of the church, he is speaking of those kinds of work about which we are engaged here, he is speaking about the ways in which men meet one another for their Christian work. He holds that these are means which are being employed of God for the perfecting of the individual man. It is not in isolation that you will do it, it is not in isolation you will be able to realize it. It is not simply going home and sitting alone, refusing all fellowship with others who have the same ideal, the same faith, and going down to business tomorrow, sturdily setting yourself to work to obey Jesus Christ, that you will reach the goal—the perfecting of your manhood. It can only be when you take to yourself all the other social influences that you will make most progress. They will help you, they will rebuke you, they will comfort you, they will give you the best dreams of yourself and put into you the best strength for their realization; and these influences can only be found in the fellowship of Christian people. All the churches of all denominations are in their different ways aiming at this thing. Ask any one of them, What are you aiming to secure for your people in this world? and they will tell you, Their salvation. When a man is being saved, he is not only saved from something but unto something, saved to the perfecting of life. All these institutions and labors are for this one end, the perfecting of human beings, as many as can be perfected, by bringing them into the fellowship of God through Jesus Christ. That is the honest desire of the church. Some churches are very cold, some are very stupid about it. Some churches have hypocrites among them, some are not very earnest. But take the churches, as a whole, through the generations, through the various congregations, the various denominations, and you will be amazed when you come to measure it—amazed at the amount of force employed week after week toward this one end of lifting people up to look at what they ought to be, and then putting some hope, some faith, some loyalty, some energy into their souls to carry them toward their ideal. And therefore it is that I urge every young man that has come to Chicago, every young man here tonight, as you value the perfecting of your nature, to get into spiritual fellowship with some community of Christian people. You will have much to criticise, but go and be thankful for what you get. You will have many faults to find, but not so many in others as in yourself. Go and get into fellowship with Christian people, for it is your only safety and the only road on which, so far as most of us are concerned—unless you are a genius of the first order and then we shall soon find you out—the only road by which we are able to travel up that steep hill toward the perfecting of man.

5. The Momentous and Inevitable Choice.

Some will say, What right have you to command me in any tone of authority to become perfect? What right has the Church to speak with such authority? What right has a minister to do it? Cannot I go away and sit down and say, "I do not want perfection, do not want anything of the kind, however attractive you make it, however real and powerful you make it? I do not want it because I have something else I like better. I have got this habit, that indulgence, yonder relationship. I am content with these, and I want to go on with them. I do not want to cut any of the cords of the heart that bind me to the living world around me. I do not want your perfecting of man."

Jesus presented to men an alternative: Become as perfect as your Father, or lost. With him there is no third choice. Become as perfect as your Father, or lost. That is why we speak so urgently, that is why the Church feels its august authority when it confronts a heathen world or a selfish heart with the message of God: Be ye perfect as your Father. That is your only alternative: Be ye perfect or lost. Prof. James of Harvard has told us that alternatives presented to people always contain within themselves certain characteristics. For example, you may tell me tonight when I start to go home, that I must walk on one side of the street or the other. That is true. The choice is an imperative or inevitable one. But he would go on to tell us that, although it is an inevitable choice and I must make it, yet it is a trifling choice; it is not momentous. It does not matter very much whether I walk on one side of the street or the other. The choice is trifling, although it is inevitable. But there are choices which are both inevitable and momentous. Every man must choose his career and it is momentous. So every man must choose whether he will be a good man or a bad man. If he do not choose deliberately to be a good man he has chosen to be a bad man. There is no escaping the choice; every man must make it and does make it. It is inevitable and it is, beyond all words, momentous. It will mean everything to me ultimately whether I choose to be a good man or a bad man. When Jesus Christ says to every man and woman in this church tonight, Be ye perfect—or lost, your choice is not trifling; it is momentous. You are making a decision that affects your very self at its very deepest. You will go out of that door resolved to be perfect as your Father and to use all the means toward that end—or lost. Having made the choice God may give you another chance, for God is very merciful to us. He has given us all many, many chances; but we have made our choice so far as we have gone, to be perfect as our Father or not; to be on that road with Jesus Christ, or else on the road of the lost. I do not know of any other way of putting it. If I could soften it for you I would fain do so. I dare not soften it for myself. I would then be lost. If I by a hair's breadth reduced the infinite value of goodness itself, I would have taken a long step downwards to the lost for myself. Hence I dare not soften it for you!

But, my brethren, it ought to be in all tenderness and love that this message tonight comes to its close. It must be with that positive message, Be ye perfect as your Father is perfect. Aim at the perfection of your manhood. There is something you are good at, is there not? You are good at your business. You are a good husband. You feel that you are among the best, perhaps. You have been a good man as a son and a brother; you are a good man as a friend. But do you know that there are directions in which you fail? You know that your manhood is not all round reaching up to the perfection of God, and you know now that you have no right to stop short of anything but the perfecting of the whole man. To do so is the fatal sin. But Jesus Christ, the perfect man, is at your heart's door tonight, and the man who admits Jesus Christ into his heart, like the boat when heaven's breezes fill its sails, has begun to move toward the perfecting of his manhood, the home of his Father which is in heaven.

TEMPERANCE LESSON.

Lesson for September 22, 1901: Prov. 23:29-35.

Golden Text: Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging; and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise.—Prov. 20:1.

A CHICAGO TEACHER'S NOTES ON THE LESSON.

Elias A. Long.

Sacrificing to the God of Se If.

RECENT lessons have treated of denying self for higher, nobler ends. Today we have a lesson which contains impressive warnings against sacrificing to self. This is a kind of indulgence that is very common. We set up the idol of self, to which we freely sacrifice money, time, talents and very much else that is precious. The chapter begins and ends with the habits of men of whom Paul says "whose God is their belly." Phil. 3:19. Here we have pointed out the proneness to indulgence at great men's tables (V. 1); the warning against striving for riches, and their transitoriness (V. 4, 5); of extravagance (Vs. 6-8); of violence to the weak (V. 10); of licentiousness (V. 27, 28); and lastly to drunkenness, a close companion to every form of sacrificing to self. This common sin of drunkenness is to be considered today.

The Cup of Poison.

The reason why wine, Satan's choicest snare, is so terrible in its effects is because it is a poison. As such it destroys more lives than war, famine and pestilence combined. The fact that it intoxicates indicates its poisonous nature, for intoxicant means poison. The word is from the Latin "toxicum," poison. A man that is intoxicated is poisoned. Because the system is tolerant to slow poisons makes such no less injurious and deadly with time. A chemical analysis of liquor used in America shows that besides alcoholic poison, those who imbibe such take into the system arsenic, alum, aloes, blood, chalk, copperas, gypsum, henbane, lime, lead, logwood, nux vomica, opium, oil of vitriol, turpentine, resin and many other harmful ingredients. See golden text.

V. 29. Rum Has God's Hate. "Who hath woe?" Where the gospel of self-worship is celebrated in the devil's deceptive drink songs and in the maxim, "Let us eat, drink and be merry, for to-morrow we die," (1 Cor. 15:32), the Bible plainly points out the drunkard's woe, the drunkard's poverty and rags (v. 21), and the grief upon grief of him who thus sacrifices to self. Is. 5:11, 18, 20, 22. The Bible is wholly against this sin which aims at the eternal damnation of souls. 1 Cor. 6:10; Gal. 5:21; Matt. 24:50, 51. We nowhere else have characterizations of the awful consequences of drink that surpass those of the Scriptures. So vicious was the example of the habitual drunkard on the children of Israel, that God's command required for the greater good nothing less than that he be put away by death. Deut. 21:20, 21. * * * "Who hath sorrow?" One of the most common indications of alcoholic poison is that found in the inevitable headache after intoxication. In addition come the unstrung nerves, wasted strength and depressed spirits that bring sorrow. With these there is that which is even more tangible to others in the loss of wages, of self-respect, often home; for drink breaks up thousands of homes every year; the sorrow of the discouraged wife, the famished children, with their rags and poverty. This is a picture repeated thousands of times in our fair land. Every confirmed drinker sacrifices to this god of self time, strength, health, money, clothes, pride, honor, conscience, self-respect and at length God's most precious gift, the soul. * * * "Who hath contentions?" The poison is the "wine of violence." Ch. 4:17. It entices men and then unchains the tiger of hate and contention. Of the quarrels, fighting and murders committed under the influence of drink, the daily newspapers make ample record. Judges tell us that ninety-nines of all crime and pauperism is caused by the drink habit. * * * "Who hath complainings?" R. V. The drunkard in his misery at length complains against God, against society, against his family, against circumstances, against everything. It is the usual condition of the devil-deceived mind to lay the blame everywhere but upon self, the one who breaks God's commandments. * * * "Who hath wounds without cause." Some wounds may be carried with honor, those of the soldier for his country or the engineer at his throttle; but the drunkard's bruises tell only of shame. Phil. 3:19. Physicians testify that drunkards in sickness have less chances for recovery because of the poison in the system. * * * "Who hath redness of eyes?" Red, blearing eyes that go with a fiery face, changing that which God has made comely into the utmost repulsiveness. Children shun, women fear, and everyone loathes the drunken sot. With the repulsive face goes the breath foul beyond expression and too often, as in the case of the drunkards of Ephraim, the tables "are full of vomit and filthiness." Isa. 28:8.

V. 30. The Questions Answered. "They that tarry long at the wine." The ways are many, the answer is brief. The word "tarry" expresses much. The snare of the winecup is set forth in shops where lights and mirrors glitter and pleasant fellowship is provided, to the end that both young and old may tarry. The saloon tends directly to a waste of time, neglect of work, diminished strength for work and the drunkard's lethargy. In the tarrying place, too, is where the evils of treating, so strongly condemned by the prophet of God, are promoted. Habak. 2:15. The law would lay hold of the murderer who, for pleasure or gain, propagated small pox or Bubonic plague, but in propagating, by treating, the use of alcoholic poisons that kill thousands, the laws are yet inadequate or ineffectual. And at that, where diseases but kill the body, strong drink leads to soul murder. * * * "They that go." It is after all an act of one's own choosing. The drinker is personally responsible. The Bible lays much stress on avoiding the first steps, "Enter not in the path of the wicked, go not in the way of evil men, avoid it, pass not by it, turn from it and pass away." Ch. 4:14, 15. * * * "To seek mixed wine." Drinks are combined in various ways to render them more palatable or more attractive. They are made largely thus by the addition of spices and drugs that are harmful. The man unprincipled enough to sell that which kills, will not hesitate to add to his gains by evil preparations.

V. 31. Palatable Poison. "Look not thou upon." The wise man here advocates the only safe course. Indeed, his words are a command; they prohibit. Let this injunction be obeyed and the liquor business would be at an end. The Scriptures implore men to avoid this common temptation. "Be not among the wine bibbers" (v. 20 Ps. 1:1); "look not thou upon." V. 31. "Forsake the thought of (Isa. 55:7), consent thou not." Ch. 1:10; "Be not deceived thereby (chap. 20:1); "enter not the path thereof" (Ch. 4:14), for thou canst not see the end. * * * "Red, when it giveth its color." Its color and sparkle as it appeals to the sense of sight. Besides the color of liquor, the place of its sales is fitted to appeal strongly to the eye. Handsome mirrors, glittering lights, fanciful glass work, globes and goblets, everything made to sparkle and lead into the unseen snare. "And the harp and the viol, the tabret and pipe and wine are in their feasts." Is. 5:12. * * * "When it goeth down smoothly." R. V. It refers to the delight there is to the toper in the flow of liquor down the throat.

V. 32. The Serpents Poison. "At the last." Three short words, but of eternal moment. God in his love will bring the mind to dwell on the end. Satan deludes by calling the thing by other names; the evil "good." Is. 5:11,20; Gen. 3:6. But God has recorded what should be a warning to the race. * * * "It biteth like a serpent." Before the bite, however comes nausea, pain and headache, that the drinker may be warned to avoid the greater suffering. The drink serpent's poisonous bite in the end produces misery and sorrow for gladness promised. There may be agreeable excitement for an evening, only to be followed by the long drawn misery of mind and body. Is proof wanted on this point? Then visit the alms houses, asylums and jails and see the wretched victims of the drink habit. The career may have begun by enjoying the pleasure of sin for a season, but at last the stings of physical pain, and the fearful looking for the judgment of God, can only be expressed by the deathly wound of the serpent. * * * "Stingeth." Injecting poison into the system. * * * "Like an adder." The sting of creeping reptiles is of all wounds the most dreaded. Whenever poisonous serpents abound they are responsible for many deaths. This is the Bible's truthful way of expressing the pain and terrible consequences of alcoholic poison. But there is far more than the terrible physical effects. After destroying the body, it has power to cast into hell. Luke 12:5. "No drunkards shall inherit the kingdom of God." 1 Cor. 6:10. Through drink the soul loses the God quality, the divine image, and is brought to that which is lower than the beasts. The career which had enjoyed the possibilities of a Godly nature and eternal existence is brought to the utter ruin of hell.

V. 33. Horrors of Poisoning. "Thine eyes shall behold strange things." R. V. The word "things" in the original is in the feminine plural form of the participle. The reference may be to the fact that drunkenness and impurity of thought with unchastity go closely together. It doubtless refers especially to the horrible disorder of the imagination, delirium tremens, at last reached in the drunkard's career. Nothing can be more terrible than the suffering at this stage of alcoholic poisoning. The vivid picturing of slimy snakes on the bed and in the room, the mental terror and suffering is something dreadful to behold. * * * "Thine heart shall utter perverse things." The Hebrew, according to Dr. Taylor Lewis, means "topsy turviness." The drunkard's heart dwells upon evil imaginations showing the depraving nature of this sin; and the drunkard's tongue speaks wildly and incoherently. Neither his will nor his words are under control. No reliance is to be placed in his statements; he easily commits that other sin of lying. Any person with experience in rescue mission work has often heard the statement, "I have not been drinking," when the fetid odor of the breath plainly tells of the spoken falsehood.

V. 34. The Reeling Sot. "Lieth down in the midst of the sea." The picture of the giddy sickness and reeling walk is the common mark of the drunkard. Dr. Neeley says: "They are giddy and they are sick; they are much in danger, too. The drunkard's mind reels like the landsman who tries to walk the deck of a ship in a storm. Some scholars understand the writer to mean that the man who indulges in intoxicants is like one unconsciously drowning."

V. 35. Contemptuous Speech. "They have stricken me." This represents the drunkard as talking to himself. He is not willing to acknowledge his sin, but blames others. Sin in its very nature is contemptuous. * * * "I was not sick." In his stupor he satisfies himself that no harm has come to him. * * * "Have beaten me, I felt it not." In his bestial condition he is, after a manner, happy for the time. He congratulates himself on receiving no injury, although carrying bloody hurts that long will make his appearance repulsive. * * * "I will seek it yet again." It is a stimulant for an hour, but the fire never shall be quenched. When the drunkard wakes the fierce craving for the poison is fiercer than ever before. This of all the dangers of drink is the worst. Then comes the devil's whipcrack, "just once more," and which no man in his own strength can resist. He will, if it be possible and at any cost, obtain more drink. He will buy, he'll sell, he'll steal, he'll kill for the strong drink that is killing him. Utterly losing all will power he becomes weaker than a child. Even a babe if burned, shuns the fire, but the drunkard, burned and scarred by the fierce fire within, will seek the cause yet again. In that recurring condition is found the complete answer to every pretty argument that is urged for moderate drink. The lowest sot living did not start out to be a drunkard. He began as a moderate drinker. Let it be impressed that the only safe course is never to touch the first drop, or having begun never again to touch it. Every drunkard at first was a moderate drinker. No one ever yet became a drunkard who refused the first drop. Let this rule of combined Scripture precepts be fixed in every mind: Think not, look not, touch not, taste not, handle not.

FIVE-MINUTE SERMON ON THE GOLDEN TEXT.

By Peter Ainslie.

WINE makes fools of men and women. Things look quite different from what they really are. Wrong becomes right and right becomes wrong. Reason becomes unreasonable and folly becomes wisdom. The man that was is not the man that is. Wine has driven out manhood and the animal becomes supreme. A drunken man, otherwise upright and honest, will lie and steal when under the influence of wine. The meaner self laughs at all that is holy in man and wine becomes a mocker. Intemperance sweeps the world like a fire. It is no stranger wherever civilization is. No class is fortified against it. I have seen young men in the very flower of manhood go down before it. I have seen old men, broken in years, lie down in drunkard's graves. I have seen women, the saddest sight of all, lie drunk on the streets and the better class scarcely able to articulate because their tongues were thickened by wine. Property gone, homes broken up and hearts crushed, all because of strong drink. It is the chief enemy of the Anglo-Saxon. I cannot say of all the world, for there are some nations who do not drink at all and some very little, but the Anglo-Saxons are the chief of drinkers, and wherever their civilization goes drunkenness goes with it. They work as hard to make drunkards in foreign territory as the missionaries do to make them Christians.

There is some conscience on this question and that conscience is growing, but there are not enough Christians who follow it. "Do not look upon the wine" must be the Christian's position. Total abstinence is the high ground and safe stand. If one is not willing to do that for his brother, he is a poor keeper and cares little for Jesus, who taught us the holy lessons of sacrifice and self-denial for our brother's good. Christianity does not say so much in words as it proves a good deal in acts. Keep wine out of your food. Keep it away from your table and keep yourself in the company of Jesus that you may bear him to the lost world. Put down every passion until all passion shall burst forth in simple love for the Son of God, whose we are and whom we serve.

Our Father, it is the self-surrender we want. Help us to hate everything that contributes to the drink traffic. Amen.

THE SALOON POWER DOOMED.

Topic Sept. 22: Ref. Ps. 37: 1-10.

THE constant note of optimism running all through the prophets and the psalms, and speaking in words of marvelous good cheer in the Gospel, is one of the things that must impress the sympathetic reader of the Bible. It is altogether worthy to be called the Word of God from this prevailing note of victory over evil. While the actual record does not always, seemingly not often, warrant this optimistic strain, yet the everlasting hopefulness of the prophets, and of the Master of men, thrills through all the pathetic pages of this wonderful story of the human race, fragmentary but strikingly true in its outlines, to all the experiences of men, in all the ages.

I have to confess that it is hard to maintain this optimistic spirit in reference to the saloon question. In spite of all efforts at reform, it does seem that the consumption of intoxicants is on the increase. At any rate, statistics seem to indicate that fact. We cry, "The saloon must go!" but it stays! And back of it is the most malignant combination of the forces of evil that ever dominated the social and political life of any people. It is the very embodiment of iniquity. We all know this; society understands this, and yet we sit down helplessly and permit this octopus of the infernal deep to suck the very life-blood of the nation. We who call ourselves Christians and Endeavorers do this supinely—shall we not confess the truth—sinfully? Now I have made my confession and yours, and what of it! You catch the note of pessimism in this. It is the reflection of prevailing public sentiment. What can we do to overcome the saloon power? Create

A Better Public Sentiment.

This is of first importance in all efforts at righteous reform. You know the devil's chief weapon in the mouths of Christians is "You can't do it!" That creates public sentiment, and public sentiment makes the political conscience of the times.

The saloon power is doomed whenever the popular sentiment is thoroughly aroused to the economic considerations involved in this problem. The materialistic sentiment of the age will reinforce the moral and political convictions of the nation. Then it will be a struggle to the death! Our modern industrial system cannot tolerate this enormity. It means the saloon power against the industrial systems of the world. The problem is complicated and made doubly difficult by reason of the fact that the manufacture and sale of liquors is a part of our great industrial compact. But it is self-destructive in the very nature of this anomalous condition. It is no legitimate part of our industrial, social or political life. When we come clearly to recognize this, the liquor traffic must go.

Let us strive to this end. Make public sentiment. Reach man's moral conscience through their material concern. Emphasize the economic aspect of the question. But let us not forget that "no drunkard can inherit the kingdom of heaven." Remembering this, let us beseech men as brothers who perish by the way. Wapello, Iowa.

THE QUIET HOUR.

[The International Bible Reading Association Daily Readings.]

By The Rev. Alexander Smellie, M. A.

ISAAC THE PEACEMAKER.

Monday—Genesis 26. 12-25.

"Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God."—Matthew 5, 9.

After Esek and Sitnah, Rehoboth. After Contention and Enmity, Broad Places and Room.

The wrathful man will not always strive. Two sides are needed to make a quarrel; and if I refuse again and again to be angry, I shall by-and-by be left in peace. Lord, implant in me the meek and quiet spirit. In the long run it is best for myself—my adversaries will cease to trouble me if they find it impossible to pick a quarrel. And who knows but, by suffering joyfully "the whips and scorns" to which they subject me, I may win them in the end?

There is a spiritual lesson for me in Isaac's experience. Just now it is my Esek and Sitnah period; in my own heart and life "Zion in her anguish with Babylon must cope." How many are my antagonists, and how far off sweet peace often seems to me! But, one day, I shall come to Rehoboth. One day, I shall walk at liberty in the broad places of the heavenly city. There, where sin has ceased to tempt, there is nothing to hurt or to annoy.

Thus my golden age is in front of me.

Tuesday—Genesis 26. 26-33.

Pleasant it is when there is no strife betwixt my neighbor and myself. Let me love him with the love of forgiveness, freely pardoning every hasty word and every unkind and unbrotherly deed. Let me give him the love of forbearance, remembering that his point of view is different from mine, and that I cannot expect him to travel always along my road. Let me cherish for him the love of sympathy, for he has sorrows which I can soothe, and burdens which I can strengthen him to carry. And let me bring him, too, the love of active helpfulness and co-operation, doing with my might everything I can for his welfare. Thus let there be a covenant betwixt me and my neighbor.

Still pleasanter it is, however, when there is no strife between my God and myself. Is the breach which my sin has caused healed and ended? For the dear sake of Christ who died, has God sworn his oath of friendship with me? Have I sworn my oath of faith and obedience and consecration with him? Is there this Beersheba in the story of my pilgrimage? Once an enemy, but now a loved and honored child; once in the far country, but now at the King's court and in the Father's house—O that it may be so!

Wednesday—Genesis 21. 22-32.

"God is with thee in all that thou doest," said Abimelech and Phicol to Abraham. If my life should convey the same impression, how happy shall I be!

It gives dignity to character when God is always present. Nothing is common or unclean. Everything is on the altar. Outsiders, like these Philistines, are impressed and awed. Then am I a priest of the Lord, however humble my place may be in the world.

It gives strength to character when God is supreme. I am lifted above all care for human applause or human dissent; it is a small thing that I should be judged of man's judgment. And onlookers note this tranquility, steadfastness, courage; and wish to have it themselves.

It gives joy to character when God is consciously near. How constrained, how fettered, is the life which is ever in a fret of anxiety about the world's approval! But I soar into an ampler air, I live at ease, when I refer everything to my Father in heaven. And others envy me my gladness. "I sing to God," Jenny Lind said once to John Addington Symonds. Whether I eat or drink, or whatsoever I do, let me do all to God.

Thursday—Proverbs 16, 19-33.

Better it is, the wise man says, to rule one's spirit than to capture a city. It certainly is more arduous. Courage, strategy, resource—these enable the general to prevail over the enemy, and at length to enter the leaguered town. But nothing short of the grace of God will empower me to conquer myself. A divine wisdom is needed here, a supernatural strength, an indwelling Holy Ghost, an omnipotent Lord.

And it is more beneficent. With what loss and misery to besieged and besiegers the city is overcome! Wounds and death and widowhood and orphanhood—such is war's mournful harvest. But if I am master of myself, "lord of myself though not of lands," my heart is at leisure to soothe and sympathize. I can be the succourer of many.

And it is more Christlike. He captured no city—Jesus, my King, of grace and glory. He did not come to the world with pomp of arms and military retinue. But he ruled himself. When he was reviled, he reviled not again; when he suffered, he threatened not. He never lost his temper nor parted with his peace. I would be like Christ.

Thus is it best to rule my own spirit.

Friday—Colossians 3, 9-17.

The love of neighbor and friend, the "charity which is the bond of perfectness," is found only in the household of the saints. It is a flower which does not flourish in the gardens of the earth.

There is, let me thank God, abundance of kindness outside the Christian family. There are courtesy, consideration, generosity, graciousness, in many who do not own allegiance to Jesus as Savior and King. Sometimes the gentleness and the liberality of the citizens of the world put me to the blush. They outrun my own.

But the truest charity is discoverable only in those who know the grace of God in Christ; they have kindled their torches at those great altar fires. Now, when I have been saved by a mercy I can never fathom, do I seek the loftiest and most lasting blessings for others. Now do I understand the priceless-ness of their undying life. Now have I caught something of my Lord's passion and compassion, and yearn, like him, over souls. Yes, I would love after the fashion of Jesus.

This is the love which changes men. This is the love which brightens the world. This is the love which anticipates heaven itself.

Saturday—1 Corinthians 13.

Love is the transcendent thing. Love is the sum-mum bonum. With all my getting, let me be sure I get love. I cannot prophesy; the speakers, the messengers of God who move and thrill others, are few in number. I cannot penetrate into hidden and recondite mysteries; the knowledge which is deep, and broad, and high is the prerogative of the minority. My faith may not be of the strong and prevailing, and triumphant order. My hope may be a song bird which often "trails a broken wing." But I can love; and love is best of all.

Upward to God and Christ let my love soar, like the lark which sings at heaven's gate. Round about to my brothers and sisters in the Church of Jesus let it travel unweariedly. Down to those who are wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked, let it descend with a willing heart.

Sunday—Matthew 5, 1-12.

Jesus blesses the graces which are quiet and unassuming. Their work and influence may be very potent, but they make little noise. The poor in spirit, the meek, the merciful, the pure in heart, are not among those who sound a trumpet before them.

Jesus blesses the graces which the world dislikes. It thinks highly of the merry-hearted, the forceful, the successful, the men and women who are not hampered by too tender and scrupulous a conscience. But teach me, my Lord, to prefer before the commendation of society and the applause of men thine own "Well done!"

Jesus blesses the graces against which my own heart cavils and rebels. I am inclined to pride, to self-assertion, to ride roughshod over opponents, to hanker after darling sins, to love the sunny side of the hedge, and to refuse all persecution for righteousness' sake. But let the divine Spirit inhabit me, and I shall make Christ's standards my own.

There are no beatitudes like the beatitudes of Jesus.

The Herald and Presbyter heard of a minister who, when asked at a higher life camp-meeting whether he "had got holiness," replied, "None to speak of." That minister was right. The more holiness a man has the less he wants to speak about it. Humility is one of the undoubted fruits of the Spirit.—Presbyterian (Canada.)

---

The Rev. Dr. Stalker once delivered an address in Exeter Hall on "A Young Man's Religion," which should be read and laid to heart by all men, young and old. He said religion was (1) "Not a creed, but an experience"; (2) "Not a restraint, but an inspiration"; (3) "Not an insurance for the next life only, but a program for the present."

---

Who art thou that complainest of thy life of toil? Complain not. Look up, my wearied brother. To thee heaven, though severe, is not unkind. Heaven is kind, as a noble mother, as that Spartan mother, saying when she gave her son his shield: "With it, my son, or upon it." Thou, too, shall return home in honor. Doubt it not—if in the battle thou keep thy shield.—Carlyle.

VACATION BIBLE SCHOOLS.

A new feature of summer work undertaken by the city churches in the east has been the vacation Bible schools. At Elmwood Temple, Providence, R. I., Rev. E. T. Root has taught a "vacation school" for two weeks, taking up the geography of the Bible, classification of its sixty-six books and an analysis of Genesis. Map-drawing was a leading feature. The engraving of "Picturesque Palestine" were used, each view being located on the map. Twelve pupils were awarded diplomas at a public review Aug. 29. This is the third summer that such a school has been held by Epiphany Baptist church, New York, and several other New York churches have followed its example this year. The Epiphany school is held in the East Side Institute on East 74th street, and the children are taught different branches of manual training as well as the Bible. Interesting occupation is combined with instruction so that the children are attracted and held.

Surely all our city and town churches might do a most helpful work by sustaining such schools as these while the public schools are closed. The children would thereby be kept off the streets, where they are receiving an education decidedly detrimental, and would be the happier and the healthier for having "something to do" during the long summer days. Much variety of subject in connection with Bible study might be introduced along lines that are not touched in the public schools.

BAPTISTS IN MINNESOTA.

A delightful summer gathering place does Minnetonka afford and the high bluff overlooking Cook's bay, to which has been given the inartistic name of Mound, is excellently adapted for an assembly meeting. The grounds occupied by the Baptist assembly of Minnesota cover nearly 600 feet of lake frontage, giving beautiful locations for the tents. There is ample room for athletic sports, which were by no means neglected by those who gathered there from August 15 to 31. About 1,000 people enjoyed the meetings. Devotional services were held each day from 8:30 to 9, led by Rev. F. C. Lovett and Rev. F. R. Leach. Three periods of fifty minutes each were filled by lectures, Bible study and conferences. The afternoons were left free for rest and sports, the evenings given to lectures, concerts and camp fires. Among the lecturers were Professor Shailer Mathews of the University of Chicago, whose topics were "Jesus in the Light of His Times;" and the Book of Galatians; Dr. E. Y. Mullins, of the Southern Theological Seminary, who spoke on "How to Study the Bible," "The Church for the Twentieth Century," and "The Apostle Paul as a Missionary." Rev. E. M. Stephenson of Chicago discussed Sunday school methods, evangelism, etc. "Some Perils of the Twentieth Century Church" were discussed. One day was given to the women's missionary work at home and abroad, and one to the Baptist Young People's Union. In connection with the latter a discussion was held on the question: "Resolved, That the Young People's Society shall do away with the feature of its pledge." The prevailing opinion seemed to be on the affirmative side.

The Baptist mission work of the state has been carried on on a larger scale than for many years past, the force of district missionaries increased, a city missionary partly supported in St. Paul, work begun in many new places and several churches organized. Having done so much this year, the theme at the state convention in St. Paul in October is to be "Our Next Conquests."

CHICAGO AND VICINITY

In connection with the Northfield Extension movement a series of special meetings will be held in the early part of November. These meetings, which will last for three weeks, will be conducted by Rev. G. Campbell Morgan. One week will be given to Evanston, one week to the west side of the city, and one week to the south side. At the noon hour meetings will also be held in a down-town theater.

The Third Congregational church of Oak Park has all the money—$8,000—for the new edifice raised. Rev. H. W. Stough, the pastor, has devoted his vacation to a canvass for the last $2,700 and the final success of his efforts was gladly announced to the congregation September 1.

Presbyterianism has lost one of its strongest lay members in the totally unexpected death of Henry C. Durand, president of the board of trustees of Lake Forest University. A sudden attack of apoplexy Sunday morning, September 1, ended his life within twenty-four hours. The Durand art institute and the Lois Durand dormitory are his gift to the college, also the boys' dormitory of the academy. His beautiful residence in Lake Forest is eventually, by his will, to become the property of the university. These are only a portion of his many beneficences. He was ever active in the affairs of the kingdom of God.

Arthur B. Dale, assistant secretary of the Central Y. M. C. A. of Chicago, has accepted the position of general secretary of the Y. M. C. A. at Evanston. The West Side Y. M. C. A. has secured the services of Mr. E. E. Davis as assistant secretary. Mr. Davis is a traveling salesman, formerly a student at Northwestern University, and a graduate of the training school of the association in this city.

Rev. S. B. Dexter, who closes his work at Humboldt Park Baptist church September 15, has received into the church during his three years' pastorate 140 persons, baptizing 101.

The Baptist Chinese mission is finding great encouragement in its work lately. August 18 nine Chinamen expressed a desire to become Christians. Between 200 and 300 Chinese gather round the gospel wagon on the Sunday evenings.

Professor Robert F. Harper, Ph. D., of the University of Chicago, has gone to London for a year's study at the British Museum.

Plymouth Congregational church has greatly improved its edifice during the absence of the pastor, Rev. Joseph A. Milburn. All the windows, except the memorial window in front, have been filled with modern opalescent glass; new carpet and pew cushions in the auditorium are of a soft, dark-green, and the whole effect is one of much beauty. Gas lighting has been replaced by electric lights, and the

KNOWLEDGE OF FOOD.

Proper Selection of Great Importance in Summer.

The feeding of infants is a very serious proposition, as all mothers know. Food must be used that will easily digest, or the undigested parts will be thrown into the intestines and cause sickness.

It is important to know that a food can be obtained that is always safe; that is Grape-Nuts.

A mother writes: "My baby took the first premium at a baby show on the 8th inst., and is in every way a prize baby. I have fed him on Grape-Nuts since he was five months old. I also use your Postum Food Coffee for myself." Mrs. L. F. Fishback, Alvin, Tex.

Grape-Nuts food is not made solely for a baby food by any means, but is manufactured for all human beings who have trifling, or serious, difficulties in the stomach and bowels.

One especial point of value is that the food is predigested in the process of manufacture, not by any drugs or chemicals whatsoever, but simply by the action of heat, moisture, and time which permits the diastase to grow, and change the starch into grape-sugar. This presents food to the system ready for immediate assimilation.

Its especial value as a food, beyond the fact that it is easily digested, is that it supplies the needed elements to quickly rebuild the cells in the brain and nerve centers throughout the body.

acoustic properties have been improved. Over fifty persons have been added to the membership of the church since Rev. Mr. Milburn entered on the pastorate last April.

Mrs. Stewart, the wife of the pastor of the Third United Presbyterian church, Rev. E. B. Stewart, was invited to address the parents and friends of the children in the primary department of the Sunday school September 2, and at the close of her remarks was surprised with the gift of a handsome gold watch. She is the superintendent of the primary department.

Professor Willett, who is supplying the pulpit of Dr. Loba, pastor of the Congregational church at Evanston, during his six months' leave of absence in Europe, has had uniformly large audiences from the first, the auditorium having been crowded even through the heated term. After a vacation of two weeks he will resume preaching there the 15th of the present month.

Rev. R. N. Van Doren, pastor of the Baptist church at Port Huron, Mich., comes to Chicago, October 1, to join the editorial staff of The Standard. Several years ago Mr. Van Doren was pastor of the Baptist church in Oak Park, so that he will resume now familiar relations with Chicago religious life and work.

Avondale Methodist Episcopal church has requested the return of Pastor Harlow V. Holt for the seventh year.

Rev. J. H. Whiteside, for four years pastor of the United Presbyterian church at Findlay, Ohio, has accepted a call to Evanston, and enters on his new charge this week.

Rev. Elijah A. Hanley of the Chicago Divinity school has accepted a call to the Logan Avenue Baptist church of Cleveland, Ohio.

Association Men, the bright monthly periodical of the Young Men's Christian Association, hitherto published in Chicago, has been purchased by the international committee from the private corporation which has owned it heretofore, and its place of publication will in the future be New York City. Mr. Frank W. Ober will continue as its editor, assisted by Mr. Raymond P. Kaighn of Holyoke, Mass. The paper will be enlarged and further improved.

A feature of the work of the past year in the Lorain, Ohio, Association has been the organization of Men's Bands in several of the churches for evangelistic work.

There are now six Baptist churches in Youngstown, Ohio. The First church has nearly 600 members.

The Bethlehem church in the Auldrain Association has had a series of meetings through the month, which has resulted in 100 conversions and about seventy-five additions to the church.

The Baptist Missionary Union has a petition from 7,000 Filipinos in one particular district of Panay, who have petitioned the union's agents in the Philippines to come and labor among them. They live in seven villages, clustered around the town of Janiway, which would be the center of operations should the union answer the petition in the affirmative.

Congregational.

The opportunity offered for educational work in the South by the acquisition of the J. S. Green college at Demorest, Ga., and three other buildings, with more desirable land, is one that has long been needed and desired. The location is a very desirable one. It is 1,500 feet above the sea level and is centrally located. The college is chartered and the titles of the property are being vested in the American Missionary Association. The students have already come from Georgia, the Carolinas, Alabama, Florida and Texas. There have been 50 students the past year and the opportunity is large for the year to come.

The First Congregational church, Sheffield, Ala., was organized August 25, with fourteen members. This mission was begun a few weeks ago by Rev. R. J. McCann of Florence, Ala., and a few earnest workers in Sheffield. They rented a vacant store and fitted it up for services. One of their number put his cabinet organ in the meeting house and the people contributed liberally for the work.

A series of Bible Institutes have been conducted recently in Los Angeles and adjacent cities. The speakers have been Rev. A. B. Prichard and Rev. D. M. Stearns.

Rev. Andrew B. Chalmers has resigned the pastorate of the First church, Saginaw, Mich., to accept a call to the Grand Avenue Congregational church of New Haven, Conn.

A union meeting was held at Plymouth church, Youngstown, Ohio, August 22, to testify to the regard entertained for Rev. P. W. Sinks, who is leaving the pastorate of that church, which he has held for three and a half years. Rev. Mr. Lloyd of the Christian church, Dr. Frazier of the Tabernacle Presbyterian church, Rev. J. B. Davis of the Elm Street Congregational church, and Rev. Chas. F. Wiseman of Newton Falls, all gave words of appreciation. Mr. Sinks has rescued Plymouth church from an almost hopeless condition of debt and helped to put it in a position for successful work. He now goes to Ridge-way, Pa.

Rev. Wm. B. Humphrey, son of Rev. S. J. Humphrey, has been pastor of Plymouth mission, Buffalo, for the last five months, and during that time twenty-two have been added to the membership. It is under the care of the First church and this year assumes $100 more of self-support.

Rev. Chas. F. Allen became pastor of St. Luke's church, Elmira, N. Y., a year ago last July. He found a discouraged church, with a heavy debt. Under his inspiration the church has itself raised $2,250 and outside friends have contributed $1,500 for a pipe organ. A gymnasium has been fitted up in the basement of the edifice, with reading and game rooms. The debt has been placed on a no-interest basis, and the Home Missionary aid received has been reduced $100. All the activities of the church have been stirred up and are at work. Over fifty persons have been added to the membership during the year.

The only English-speaking church in Oliver County, N. D., was organized by the Congregational Home Missionary superintendent in July. The nearest church was 150 miles away; so there could be no council for organization. The membership was of various denominations. It contained the names of three school teachers, a merchant and several substantial ranch-

MUSCULAR PASTOR.

Muscles Built up by Common Sense Habit.

"For years I have not been able to drink coffee, as it made me very nervous and gave me a headache. No one loved coffee more than I and it was a severe trial to abandon its use. Nearly three years ago I saw Postum Cereal Coffee advertised and concluded to try it.

I have been so well pleased with it and its healthful effects that I have used it ever since. I carry packages with me when I visit other places.

When I began to drink Postum, my muscles were flabby, as my habits are sedentary, but for the past two years my muscles have been hard and I never felt stronger in my life than I do now at sixty years of age, and I attribute my strength of muscle to constant use of Postum. I drink it three times a day. I feel so enthusiastic about Postum that I cannot recommend it too highly wherever I go. Wishing you great success, yours truly," Rev. A. P. Moore, 474 Rhode Island St., Buffalo, N. Y.

The reason Postum builds up the human body to a prime condition of health, is that when coffee is left off, the drug effects of the poison disappear and the elements in Postum unite with albumen of the food to make gray matter and refill the delicate nerve centers all over the body and in the brain. This sets up a perfect condition of nerve health, and the result is that the entire body feels the effects of it.

men. The meeting for organization took place in the village blacksmith shop.

The Disciples.

The Christian church in Dayton, Ohio, has a Chinese Sunday school of twelve persons. Two are faithful members of the church. A third was recently baptized.

The convention of the Southern California churches at Long Beach was by far the best ever held. The reports from the churches have shown very decided increase in all lines of work. Power gave several addresses and sermons that were very helpful.

A meeting recently held at Sunny Side, Ky., in a tobacco barn, has resulted in the organization of a church with fifty-five members.

The ninth annual session of the Christian churches in the Eighth District of Illinois convened August 30 at Carbondale. The sixty-one churches show a membership of 4,938. The corner stone of the new church at Carbondale was laid. Rev. H. G. Bennett is the pastor. A copy of The Christian Century was deposited within the stone. The new edifice will cost $10,000 and will be a handsome building. Miss Anna Hale organized at this convention an auxiliary of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, with fifteen members.

Rev. I. J. Spencer has announced a new program for the Sunday school of Central church, Lexington, Ky. Its sessions will be held for one hour, from 10 to 11 a. m., and will consist of singing, Scripture reading, prayer and class recitations. At 11 a. m., without any intermission except for transfer to the auditorium of the church, the church worship will begin, participated in by old and young, and followed by a sermon on the subject of the morning lesson. In the grading of the pupils, church attendance and what they learn from the sermon will be included, as well as the record of class lessons. The church choir will lead the singing also during the school hour. A kindergarten will be conducted in the parlor upstairs during the church service hour.

The twentieth anniversary meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary in Minnesota was held September 4 in St. Clement's church, St. Paul. The address was delivered by Bishop Morrison of Iowa. Bishop Edsall spoke in the evening. A brass lectern, given by the members of St. Clement's church as a memorial of Bishop Gilbert, was unveiled. There were 114 delegates of the Woman's Auxiliary present, representing twenty-eight parishes. Nearly three hundred women were in attendance at the afternoon session. Addresses were made by Miss Sybil Carter, who has charge of the work among the Indian women; Mrs. C. B. Brunson, former president of the auxiliary, who has charge of a school for colored girls in Virginia, and Miss Mary Milnes, archdeaconess of Michigan. Mrs. Hector Baxter of Minneapolis presided. The united offering for the year amounted to $1,229, and the Red Mite chests yielded $670.

Rev. Dr. Morgan Dix, rector of Trinity parish, New York City, has presided over the House of Deputies at the last five General Conventions of the Church, but he will not attend the coming convention and the question of his successor in this important office is being discussed. Dr. Dix has been a model presiding officer.

At a cost of $6,000 St. Paul's church, Minneapolis, is to be moved from Hennepin avenue and Twelfth street to Bryant and Franklin avenues.

Methodist.

Rev. Edward Schell, formerly national secretary of the Epworth League, has accepted a call to the First Methodist church, Frankfort, Ind.

Rev. W. M. Brown, pastor of St. Paul's M. E. church, St. Joseph, Mo., baptized by immersion four persons August 23. The ceremony was performed at the bathing pavilion on the lake shore. This was the first public baptism by immersion by the Methodists here.

In these days when reverence for old people is often lacking a good object lesson was provided by St. Paul's church, Indianapolis, September 1. A special service was held for old people and many over eighty even were present. Rev. C. Claude Travis spoke from the text, "The hoary head is a crown of glory if it be found in the way of righteousness." An old-fashioned love feast followed. The old persons, as they entered the door of the church, were met by a committee and given a white card to which was fastened a head of wheat, with a bow of white ribbon, and on which was written passages of Scripture appro-

During the ten years of ministerial service at Greenfield, Ind., of Rev. D. W. Evans of the Methodist Protestant church, he has admitted to membership over 750 persons. There was an interval of two years between his two five-year terms. Two new church edifices have been built under his care.

The annual Epworth League convention for the Greencastle, Ind., district, which was held August 27-29, was devoted to the study of the Bible and the art of teaching from it. Dr. J. F. #### Presbyterian.

The congregation of the Shelby, Ohio, church have a new church well under way to take the place of the one burned recently. The new edifice will be on a main thoroughfare in the center of the city, and will cost about $25,000. Rev. E. M. Page, D. D., the pastor, has had so much work on hand that he has taken no vacation this summer. Besides his city services he has one each Sunday in the country, going alternately to two places. He frequently conducts revival services in other parishes. During his three years' pastorate he has added 150 to his own church.

Rev. E. G. Mathena, D. D., pastor of the Olivet church, San Francisco, died very suddenly while preparing for his morning service. He had one of the largest Sunday schools and Christian Endeavor societies in the city, being specially successful as a pastor among young people and children.

The committee on creed revision, after satisfactory work at the session in Saratoga, adjourned to meet December 4 in the Church of the Covenant, Washington. It was agreed that the results of their deliberations should not be given to the public until after the next meeting. President Stewart of Auburn Seminary and a member of the General Assembly's evangelistic committee has held a conference with the pastors of the Twin Cities and arrangements are to be made for a series of special meetings in the churches during the winter, and if it seem desirable, tent meetings will be held next summer.

St. Paul has lost a philanthropic worker by the death of Wilford L. Wilson, a prominent member of the House of Hope church, having been its first elder in 1856. He was also president of the Humane society, vice-president of the Society for the Relief of the Poor, an influential member of the board of the Christian Home for Women, and was more or less intimately connected with a number of other charitable organizations.

CHRISTIAN MELODIES

BY PROF. WM. J. KIRKPATRICK

Professor Wm. J. Kirkpatrick, the author of CHRISTIAN MELODIES, is one of the leading and best known gospel song writers in the world today. His songs have been sung the world over in almost every town. Some of his songs have been translated and sung in all languages. He has the advantage of many years of experience as a musician and song writer, and has put the best productions of his life time, as well as the best songs of the principal song writers of the country, into CHRISTIAN MELODIES. This certainly insures for this book the greatest variety and the best quality of songs.

"Book of Rarest Musical Gems"

This is the universal pronouncement of all musicians who have used or examined this new and popular song book. All responses from those using the book are enthusiastic praises. "Best book of the kind I have ever seen." "The more we use it the better we like it." "Gets better all the time," etc. These are samples of expressions received. No other book on the market approaches it as an all-purpose church song book. It is mechanically perfect, neat, artistic and durable. Contains 192 pages and 227 songs.

Choicest Songs of the Century

Every song writer has a few favorite songs—or those which he regards as his best—and which make for the author his reputation. Every musician has also his own peculiar style. A book written principally by one man does not excel, as it has no variety of style and but few very good songs. In CHRISTIAN MELODIES eighty leading song writers have contributed their favorite or best songs. This insures not only a collection of the most excellent songs, but also the greatest variety of style. This is why people never grow tired of the songs in CHRISTIAN MELODIES. Besides its large number of the latest songs it contains a great many of the old songs that have become popular favorites and never die.

No expense was spared in the production of this book. The best songs were secured regardless of their cost. Many very good songs were rejected because not good enough. No other book shows such care and judgment in excluding the inferior and including only the best. No cheap devices or make shifts, such as rivets, were used in binding. It is a hand sewed book, which is the best and most expensive style of binding. If you want the most popular, best wearing and most satisfactory all-around song book get Christian Melodies, pronounced by all, "A Book of Gems."

General.

The annual Southern camp meeting of the Christian and Missionary Alliance was held near Atlanta, Ga., for ten days in August. It is interdenominational in character, and has several hundred missionaries in the foreign field supported by free-will offerings. Several of these, returned from abroad, were at the meeting. Last year $160,000 was contributed for the work of the Alliance. The meetings were conducted by Rev. A. B. Simpson, president, and Rev. W. F. Meminger, field superintendent. Divine healing is one of the strong points of belief by the members, and the Scriptural custom of anointing with oil is followed.

Denominational co-operation is working well at Terminal Island, Southern California. Immanuel chapel has a variety of evangelical preachers; a Congregationalist superintends the Sunday school, while an Episcopalian "sees that the lights are trimmed and burning."

The Hebrew women of Minneapolis have organized for the purpose of providing free burial for destitute Hebrews who may die in that city. Articles of incorporation have been filed.

The Bible Study Conference recently held in Buffalo is spoken of by The Commercial of that city as "one of the most remarkable religious conferences in history." It considers that it should be looked upon "as the first mile-stone in the direction of a broad-minded, undenominational, united Christian movement in this country. So successful has the conference been, in fact, that already there is a movement under way to hold a similar gathering in St. Louis during the Louisiana Purchase exposition, which is to be held in that city in 1903."

Mr. F. S. Brockman of the Young Men's Christian Association at Hongkong was lately invited by the commander of the Kentucky to come on board that battleship and organize a Christian Association among the men serving their country there; and the captain of the Newark forwarded a similar request for his own command. On one of the British battleships near by, Mr. Brockman saw one of the best known captains of the English navy kneeling amid his men praying with them and for them. Previously he had been requested to visit the British warship Hermione at Shanghai, where he found revival services were being conducted by two of the non-commissioned officers. A meeting for Bible study and prayer was held every night on deck. These unusual events began with the labors of certain missionaries who, cooped up in the seaports during the troubles at Pekin, had devoted themselves to Christian work among their own countrymen lying on ship-board in the harbor.

The tent meetings in Philadelphia, which we have reported from time to time, have had a most successful experience. While Rev. John McNe was there he spoke to ten congregations, averaging not less than 1,500 each service, and at the final service professing Christians were requested to give place that non-church goers and inquirers might be accommodated. A large number of his hearers came out in open confession of Christ. By the consent of the municipal authorities open air meetings are now held upon the steps of the city hall daily at the noon hour. These services are largely attended by business men and working people.

The Missouri State Sunday School Association meeting at Chillicothe, August 29, put itself on record "as standing squarely in favor of the use of the Bible in the public schools of the commonwealth," and the delegates pledged themselves to use their influence to that end. A committee of five was appointed to create and foster public sentiment on the subject in the various counties of the state. A similar committee was chosen to co-operate with the St. Louis World's Fair managers, provided the exposition is not opened on Sunday. For the coming year's work of the association $5,000 was pledged. Among the speakers were W. J. Semelroth, Rev. O. O. Smith of Grinnell, Ia.; Marion Lawrence of Toledo, Mrs. Millie M. Clark and Rev. Davis Errett, who spoke on temperance. Mrs. L. L. Allen read a paper on "How to Prepare Our Children for Church Membership."

The Young Men's Christian Association are establishing a branch in Leadville, Colo. It is said to be much needed there.

A year ago a lady was living near a town where fifty Italians came to work. She became very much distressed at the heathenish way in which they lived, for she discovered that they never went to church and that the nearest Roman Catholic priest had not taken the trouble to look them up. Most of them could speak no English and she could speak no Italian, so she was at a loss to know how to help them. Discovering that almost all of them could read in their native tongue she purchased copies of the New Testament in Italian and gave one to each man. It was not long before one of the leaders came to her and asked if there was a church where they could go and hear that Book read. He said most of the men were reading it, many of them with much interest. She con-

The men were so interested and grateful that other meetings followed until now that church has what might be called an Italian annex, and the results of the work are most gratifying. The priest, says the Congregationalist, is now indignant over what he considers an encroachment upon his territory.

Foreign Missionary Items.

Mrs. Hubert Brown, a Presbyterian missionary, writes from Coyoacan, a suburb six miles from Mexico City:

"It was in January of '98 that we began to hold Wednesday night prayer meetings in Coyoacan. In July of that year we opened Sunday morning services and since that time both have been continued with growing interest. In April, 1900, two young people made a public profession of faith in Christ. The second Sunday of this month seven others took their stand. It costs to be a Protestant even in liberal Mexico and petty persecutions by the members of one's family are frequent occurrences. But the work is growing. We have nineteen young men with us now. They have not very comfortable quarters, are very much crowded, sleeping two, three or five in a room. Such a thing would hardly be possible in the north, but from five a. m. to ten p. m. they live with doors open and mostly out of doors and they don't mind close air at night. The material is being hauled for a small dormitory; we need also new class rooms and a larger dining room. The building of our own house will have to wait, much as we wish it, for there are more young men asking for admission to the school and we would like to take fifty if possible. Pray for God's blessing upon our work."

Miss Ellen M. Stone says of the work for women in the Salonica station, Turkey: "In every place which we have visited during the nearly 140 days of touring between April, 1900, and July, 1901, there has been the eager plea for a longer stay, that we might enter more homes. At last the walls of opposition, which for two years prevented us from reaching even one woman in Mitrovitsa, have fallen, and during our third yearly visit, last spring, we were rejoiced by invitations to five homes, and the opportunity to meet many women." Varvaritsa, a tiny hamlet of sixteen houses hidden away among the hills, was occupied last autumn for the first time by one of the Bible women. The one Protestant brother here returned to his home last year at Easter after serving a term in the prison of the "seven Towers" in Salonica, upon the accusation of having fed brigands. His soul was filled with zeal for his neighbors and friends, and he gladly welcomed the Bible woman to his one-roomed house for a month, while she taught the women and children who came to her. Schools were maintained last year for the first time in two new places—Drama and Prishtina. In the latter a young graduate of the Monastir Girls' Boarding school, the daughter of the leading Servian family in that place, has carried on a school with thirteen little Servian pupils. Miss Stone speaks of their joy in this first Servian evangelical school and in the tactful, successful work of its young teacher.

BOOKS

Truth Dexter, by Sydney McCall. Boston: Little, Brown and Co., 1901. Cloth; pp. 375. Price $1.50.

This volume is by an author otherwise, for the most part, unknown, and yet it is attracting wide attention because of its sustained interest and its admirable portraiture. The heroine is a young and unsophisticated southerner, who is transplanted from the quiet simplicity of an Alabama plantation to the totally different atmosphere of Boston, where she develops with amazing rapidity and gains at last the regard of the husband who at first had married her to save her grandmother and herself from a perplexing situation. The character of Truth is fascinating if not always convincing. Craighead, the husband, is a sombre figure, around whom move the rapidly shifting scenes of the story. The most delightful portrait is that of Mrs. Dexter, the grandmother, a fine and high-bred southern lady, whose delicacy of instinct and serenity of soul stand in striking contrast to other characters displayed. Not the least interesting of the factors introduced is the radical antagonism of northern and southern ideas and the difficulty of adjustment experienced by the opposing opinions once brought into contact. Craighead's father is the logical embodiment of the most unmitigated and persistent hatred of the South, which finds reconciliation well-nigh impossible. Mrs. Wiley's character is that of the typical adventuress, fortified by social position and wealth. That she does not wreck the lives of the young people is no fault of hers. The time is the present, and state questions of very recent interest are freely discussed. Perhaps one's most serious quarrel with the book is that since it is so interesting it is not stronger, and contributes nothing to permanent literature.

Codex Christi, or What Would Jesus Have Me Do?—A Digest of the Teachings of the Lord Jesus Christ on Duty to God, Duty to Fellowmen, and Duty to Self. By William Edy Dawson, LL. B. Fleming H. Revell Co., 171 pages. Price, $1.25.

This book is along constructive lines. It is not an original book, but it is a useful one. It is specially adapted to supplemental Sunday school study, in advanced Bible class work. It seeks to apply that knowledge which is of all forms the most valuable, namely, the knowledge of duty. This, of course, implies the knowledge of God, for knowledge of duty comes as the revelation of the Divine will. It also implies the knowledge of Christ if duty is to be looked at from the Christian standpoint, as it is in this volume. The two questions, "What would Jesus do?" and "What would Jesus have me do?" are brought again and again to the standard, "What has he by word or life said I ought to do?"

The book, as the title indicates, is divided into three parts. In the first part, on duty to God, the duties specified are faith, repentance, love, fear, service, obedience, and worship. The second part deals with duties to different classes of men. The third part deals especially with the self-ward duties which have to do with the development of the intellectual and religious natures.

The classification of subjects is not always happy. Things overlap. The treatment can hardly be called scientific, yet for practical purposes many may find the volume suggestive and serviceable.

God's Books, An Inquiry Respecting the Books of Judgment, by John Williams; with Introduction by I. N. McCash, LL. D. Printed for the author by M. A. Donohue & Co., Chicago.

This is a maiden effort. There are in it many signs of promise. It has lofty aspiration and a clear purpose. Its aim and scope is to discover in the fields of nature corroboration of the sublime statement of Holy Scripture, so often and so variously enforced, that an exact registration is made of all we do and say and think, and that those writings in God's books are prepared against the day when every one of us shall give account of himself to God." Not only are the experiences of man preserved in memory, but in the world of matter the history of man can be traced. All the forces of nature are against evil and on the side of good. The Bible and nature have one author, and hence religion and science are one in their teaching. This suggestive booklet of eighty-two pages can be obtained from the author at twenty-five cents. ## THE HOME

THE SECOND PLACE.

Unto my loved ones have I given all,—
 The tireless service of my willing hands,
 The strength of swift feet running to their call,
 Each pulse of this fond heart whose love commands
 The busy brain unto their use,—each grace,
 Each gift, the flower and fruit of life.
 To me
 They give, with gracious hearts and tenderly,
 The second place.

Such joy as my glad service may dispense,
 They spend to make some brighter life more blest;
 The grief that comes despite my frail defense,
 They seek to soothe upon a dearer breast;
 Love veils his deepest glories from my face;
 I dimly dream how fair the light may be Beyond the shade where I hold, longingly,
 The second place.

And yet 'tis sweet to know that, though I make
 No soul's supremest bliss, no life shall lie
 Ruined and desolate for my sake,
 Nor any heart be broken when I die.
 And sweet it is to see my little space
 Grow wider hour by hour; and gratefully
 I thank the tender fate that granteth me
 The second place.
 —Susan Marr Spalding.

At the Breakfast Table.

"Mamma! Where's my shoes?"
 "I put them in their place in your closet, dear. Make haste we're at breakfast," called mamma from the dining-room.
 "I'll be late to school just because folks don't leave my things alone," scolded Jack, hurrying in with his shoestrings dangling and a scowl on his face.
 Mamma was discreetly busy with her coffee cups.
 "Hominy, Jack!" asked papa, cheerily.
 "O dear! I don't like hominy. Why don't we always have oatmeal?"
 "Papa likes hominy best, so we take turns," explained mamma, trying to avert the storm.
 "Might have 'em both," muttered Jack, his voice muffled by a large mouthful of the despised cereal. "Is there griddle-cakes then?" he demanded, presently.
 "This is ironing morning. Katie couldn't fry cakes to-day."

 "What else is she made for?" savagely.
 "Jack!" Papa looked up suddenly from his paper. His son subsided for a few moments and table-talk went pleasantly on.
 "It looks like the beginning of a hard storm," papa said, glancing at the raindrops on the pane. "The youngsters had better go to school prepared for wet weather."
 "Yes, the rubbers-and-umbrella brigade to-day," smiled mamma.
 "O need I wear rubbers?" complained Jack. "Nobody but little kids wears 'em a day like this. I won't get wet. Need I?"
 "O yes, dear, you always walk through all the puddles, you know, and you have a cold already."
 "I think it's mean, I do! None of the other big fellows have to wear rubbers like babies. Got my thick boots all on. I think you're real mean, so there!" with a burst of angry tears.
 "Jack, leave the table," said his father, sternly. "Go and put on your rubbers without a word, and then come and apologize to mamma for your rudeness. It's too bad, dear," looking at mamma's sad face. "Your meals are spoiled continually by such tantrums. I will put a stop to them, if I have to whip Jack twice a day."
 "But the whipping would only make his temper worse; you've tried that. I've another idea simmering. We'll talk of it to-night"—as Jack came sulkily back.
 "Good-morning!" cried Jack dashing into the dining-room next day.
 "Morning!" returned papa gruffly.
 "What's this, Evelyn — oatmeal? Haven't you learned that I don't like oatmeal? I want hominy."
 "We had it yesterday, John, if you remember; but I'll see that it is made to-morrow."
 "That won't feed me to-day"—pushing away his saucer. "Well, what next? Fish-balls? Umph."

 "I thought you liked them," said mamma, anxiously.
 "Plenty of things I like better. Have you mended those gloves of mine, Evelyn?"
 "Why, no, John; you didn't ask me to. I'll do it now."
 "No, I can't wait. I should think you might keep my things in better order. I'm behind time for the train, anyway, breakfast was so late." And off rushed papa without good-bye, slamming the door angrily and leaving a dark shadow behind him.
 It had not lifted at dinner that night. Papa grumbled at the cooking, found fault with everything, and was so ill-tempered that the meal, usually accompanied by much fun and pleasantness, was more dismal than breakfast had been. Jack held his breath in dismay. His admired papa, always cheery and courteous, so cross; and worst of all, so rude and unreasonable to gentle mamma. Finally affairs reached a climax.
 "Don't know where the key to my desk is, Evelyn? And what am I to do now without it? You must have mislaid it. Strange you can't leave my things alone. I think it's a shame—"
 But mamma had suddenly covered her face with her handkerchief and left the table.
 "Mamma," whispered Jack, stealing into her room and her lap in the dark.
 "Well, dear?" Her arms closed around him.
 "Mamma, what ailed papa? If I was a man, I'd—I'd punch him!"
 "Should ill-temper always be 'punished,' Jack? Perhaps papa didn't think; perhaps he was just cross at everything."
 A sudden recollection lashed through Jack's mind. Were not those his own excuses, often used?

and if one lets a temper get out from under control it is hard stopping it. It grows worse every day, until it becomes stronger than a man himself, and makes life miserable to the man and everyone about him. Can't you see for yourself how it would be?"

Jack meditated awhile. "Mamma, did papa ever have a temper like mine?"

"Very like, he says, though we can hardly believe it, he controls it so well. Perhaps he was willing for you to see to-day what your temper might become if you let it grow worse, as you are doing now. Do you think we have had a pleasant day, Jack?"

"Jiminy, I guess not! It's been awful!"

"And it all came from the unpleasantness of one person, Jack."

There was a long pause; then Jack suddenly announced with conviction: "Mamma, I believe papa was just putting his temper on, and I know what for. But if I am as ugly usually as he has been to-day, I guess I'd better begin to stop!"

And he did.—Congregationalist.

Her "Pleasure Book."

A helpful book was that kept to the end of her life by a lovely old lady, whose serenely beautiful countenance was unmarred by lines of care or irritation. So placidly happy was she that a woman given to fretfulness, and almost annoyed by the unassailable peace that shone from the other's face, once asked her the secret of her content.

"My dear," said the elder woman, "I keep a pleasure book."

"What?"

"Yes," a pleasure book. Ever since I was a girl at school, I have kept a daily account of all the pleasant things that have happened to me. I have put down only the pleasant things; the disagreeable ones I have forgotten as soon as possible. In my whole experience I can not recall a day so dark that it did not contain some little ray of happiness.

"The book is filled with little matters—a flower, a walk, a concert, a new gown, a new thought, a fine sentiment, a fresh sign of affection from my family—everything that gave me joy at the time. So if ever I am inclined to be despondent, I sit down and read a few pages in my book, and find out how much I have to be grateful for."

"May I see your book?"

"Certainly."

Slowly the peevish friend turned the leaves. How insignificant the entries seemed! How much they meant! "Saw a beautiful lily in a window." "Talked to a bright, happy girl." "Received a kind letter from a dear friend." "Enjoyed a beautiful sunset." "Husband brought some roses home to me." "My boy out to-day for the first time after the croup."

"Have you ever found a pleasure for every day?" inquired the fretful woman wistfully.

"Yes, for every day, even the sad ones." The answer came in a low tone.

"I wish I were more like you," said the discontented woman, with a sigh. Then she looked at her aged friend, and a beautiful reverence grew in her face. "I don't think," she said, as her eyes filled, "that you need to write them down any more on paper. Your pleasure book is written in your face."

American Women as Inventors.

Miss Elizabeth L. Banks writes under this title in the June number of Cassell's Magazine. "In the early years of the century," she says, "one notes that most of the inventions had to do with weaving, spinning, sewing, and women's wearing apparel. After Mrs. Kies invented her straw and silk weaving apparatus, she was followed by a Mrs. Brush with a new and improved corset. Then came a process for whitening leghorn straw, and a new work-table. The years flew on and brought curious devices in the way of hoop-skirts, muffs, and methods for cutting and fitting dresses. Afterwards came devices for amusing children, then time and labour-saving inventions for the busy house-wife and mother. With the advent of the sewing machine there came suggestions and improvements that only a woman could have thought of, and when, about a quarter of a century ago, women began to take posts as clerks, stenographers, typists, etc., there rushed into the patent office original pens and pencils and automatic erasers. During the past ten years American women do not seem to have been devoting themselves to any one particular line of inventions, which means that their lives and minds have broadened, and there is hardly a subject or a pursuit which in the last decade the American woman has not considered when she has gone forth inventing. She has not only taken into consideration the peculiar wants of her own sex or both sexes. She has gone a generous step further, and given her attention to patenting ideas designed to benefit her mankind exclusively, as witness the invention of a moustache guard to enable a man to drink tea and coffee comfortably and neatly; the pantaloen tree, a continual blessing in a man's wardrobe; a machine for making cigarettes; a necktie clasp and holder, and shirt-front protector."

Giving Through Prayer.

She was a girl who had just begun the training for her life work. The work that she had chosen was a noble one; sometimes it commanded high wages in the world's market; the girl's thought about it was curious. "I never want to earn more than six hundred dollars a year," she said. "I'm afraid that if I had more than that I should be too selfish with it."

"I don't see why you should feel that," a friend argued; "the more you earned the more good you could do with it."

The girl shook her head. "I couldn't trust myself," she replied briefly.

Ah, but can one ever trust one's self? It is so easy to think that it is the narrow circumstances, not the narrow soul, that shuts one in! It is so easy to forget that one can be exactly as selfish with six dollars as with six hundred or six thousand.

"All my life," a woman said the other day, "I have longed to help. So many, many things I could do if I had only a little money; so many bits of joy I could put into lonely and sorrowful places; so many ways I could find of lifting discouraged hearts. I have dreamed it and planned it a thousand times. But all my life I have had to struggle to make ends meet. It seemed strange to me often, as if God were keeping from tired and heartsick ones gladness that they might have had. Then suddenly, in my prayer one day I saw myself. It came to me with terrible condemnation how, month after month, and year after year, my prayers were for myself and those dearest to me—how seldom I remembered the poor and sorrowful to whom I had thought that I was ready to devote my life. If I cared so little that I did not even tell the Father about them, how dared I think for one moment that I was worthy the trust of money? I don't ask it any more. I ask God to cleanse me of selfishness."

Is not the lesson for all of us who long to "help?" We sigh for strength or money or talents or wider opportunities, and all the time the mightiest power in the universe is within reach of every one of us. In all the world there is no soul so poor or so weak that it may not, at any moment, have access to the king of kings. Ours the shame if we go into that great presence with our hearts full of our own small wants.—Forward.

Mistakes of Women.

One of the mistakes of women is in not knowing how to eat. If a man is not to be fed when she is, she thinks a cup of tea and anything handy is good enough. If she needs to save money, she does it at the butcher's cost; if she is busy, she will not waste time in eating; if she is unhappy, she goes without food. A man eats if the sheriff is at the door, if his work drives, if the undertaker interrupts; and he is right. A woman will choose ice cream instead of beefsteak, and a man will not.

Another of her mistakes is in not knowing when to rest. If she is tired, she may sit down, but she will darn stockings, crochet shawls, embroider doilies. She doesn't know that hard work tires. If she is exhausted, she will write letters, or figure her accounts. She would laugh at you if you hinted that reading or writing could fail to rest her. All over the country women's hospitals flourish because women do not know how to rest.

Another mistake on the list is their constant worrying. Worry and hurry are their enemies, and yet they hurry them to their bosoms. Women cross bridges before they come to them, and even build bridges. They imagine man's fortune and run out to meet it.

Women are not jolly enough. They make too serious business of life, and laugh at its little humors too seldom. Men can stop in the midst of perplexities and have a hearty laugh. And it keeps them young. Women cannot, and that is one reason why they fade so early. There are other reasons, but we will pass them now. Worry not only wrinkles the face, but it wrinkles and withers the mind. Have a hearty laugh once in a while; it is a good antiseptic, and will purify the mental atmosphere, drive away evil imaginings, bad temper, and other ills.—Buffalo Times.

THE PRAISE OF A SEPTUAGENARIAN.

Mr. Louis Schmidt, New Castle, Indiana, is very enthusiastic about the well-known herb remedy, Dr. Peter's Blood Vitalizer. "There is no doubt about its being an excellent remedy," he says, "because it cured me of that terrible asthma and dropsy, which troubled me for years. In spite of my seventy-five years, I can now work in the fields. My appetite is splendid, my limbs are normal and not swollen as before. I enjoy sound sleep, and need not tramp the floor all night long looking for rest." Dr. Peter's Blood Vitalizer is no drugstore medicine. It is sold by special local agents, or the manufacturer, Dr. Peter Fahrney, 112-114 South Hoyne avenue, Chicago, Illinois.

Some of the ablest scholars and writers of America and Europe will contribute to its columns. On the list are such names as Dr. Marcus Dods of Scotland, Dr. Washington Gladden, Dr. Amory H. Bradford, Dr. Josiah Strong, Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, Professor Graham Taylor, etc. Dr. Wm. Adamson, editor of The Christian News, Glasgow, Scotland, will furnish an occasional British letter, and an original story by Dr. Clarence A. Vincent, of Galesburg, Ill., will appear in the early fall numbers. During the fall and winter months a series of special numbers will be issued giving Symposiums on the practical aspects of Christian work. These will be followed by a series on the Fad Religions of the day, and these in turn by a series on such vital questions as The Second Coming of Christ. These are but suggestive hints of special features which will combine to make The Christian Century an interesting and timely religious journal.

THE HOUR OF NATIONAL ECLIPSE.

A nation's hopes have been blasted. The dreaded blow has fallen. The assassin's bullet has done its fatal work. With hushed hearts we bow before the inscrutable mystery of the untimely death of a good and useful ruler. Out of this dark event may there come good issues, of which we, in the sharpness of the present sorrow, dare not dream. The President is dead; but the Lord lives and reigns; and in his hands are the destinies of the nations.

THE TEACHING POWER OF JESUS' LIFE.

THE most impressive element in Jesus' power as a teacher lay in his life; for whatever Jesus did he was still teaching, and the lesson of his life itself is as important an aid to faith as any of the doctrines he taught. To watch Jesus and to gain a knowledge of his way of living is to enter his school in the fullest sense and to "learn of him." Jesus called men less to a consideration of the things he taught than to the study of his own life as normal and ideal, the possession and imitation of which are to be characteristics of his students. The quality of Jesus' life which constituted its outstanding feature was his abiding consciousness of the Divine Presence, which made the life of God more real to him than any other experience. To him the reality of God's life was more impressive than any argument which could be framed to prove it. It was axiomatic; it was certain; it was a fact of daily experience. To live thus in the presence of God is the privilege of the pupils in the school of Christ. This sense of divine companionship revealed itself in Jesus' constant use of prayer. Prayer was to him not simply a petition for blessing, but it was the enjoyment of companionship with God. Of him it might have been said in far truer sense than of Enoch of old, "He walked with God." Prayer was the natural speech of this intimacy. Again, our Lord loved and was saturated with the words of Holy Scripture. The Old Testament was the subject of his constant study and reflection. Its great words had fastened themselves in his mind. Its most important portions, like Deuteronomy, Psalms and Isaiah, were known to him from childhood, and he frequently quoted them in his conversation. He possessed the Scripture with a consciousness of its value and of its limitations. He used it as an instrument because of its appeal both to his own life and to that of his fellow-men. As a product of the Spirit of God in the hearts of Jewish saints and prophets, it had the promise and potency of new forms of spiritual teaching yet to issue from that same Spirit in his work with the generation of believers in Jesus. The Old Testament was yet to be completed by the New, and Jesus was thus the center and inspiration of the whole, himself the possessor and lord of both covenants. It was his to use and to reject, to approve and to condemn. That which was temporary and imperfect in the Old Testament he quietly laid aside. That which was abiding he impressed upon his hearers by constant reiteration.

Once more, the student in the school of Christ, studying his character, seeking its secret, observes his serenity and calmness in all situations. This was not alone a poise of temper or a mastery of himself, though this self-possession and quietness was one of the secrets of his extraordinary power with men. But there is a still higher serenity which finds its place in our Lord's character. It is that calmness of conscience in the face of the highest ideal, which astonishes the world. Kant declared that the starry heavens and the moral law filled him with amazement. It was the demand of the moral law, with its majestic imperative which allured and yet baffled him, that made him believe in the future life as the only means of attaining so august a standard of conduct. He felt the appalling chasm between his ideal of righteousness and his actual embodiment of it. Yet Jesus, who possessed the clearest vision of the perfect life which has ever been experienced among men, lived in the serene and satisfied consciousness of complete attainment. This thought is nothing less than thrilling to any sensitive and eager mind, and makes Jesus the moral miracle of the world. Then, too, his sympathy for man, his love of every class, his power of inciting men to noble purposes, his wonderful reserve force which made him equal to every emergency, his inexhaustible resources, the wholeness and sanity of his mental and moral life, his unflinching optimism in the face of apparently appalling difficulties and the seemingly hopeless task of securing the regeneration of human nature—these things constitute some of the outstanding features of our Lord's nature which make him the supreme teacher of men, and draw the world to him for the study of his life as the norm of all human experience and the living embodiment of a divine life in terms of human experience.

When men are asking the question, as so many are doing, How can we know what Jesus would have us do? it needs to be remembered that his teachings take less the form of particular decisions upon matters of daily life than of an attitude of soul which is itself illuminating and illustrative of the will of God for our human life. Those who would know what Jesus would have them do may find an infallible answer to every question which arises in their own experience, by appeal either to the things which Jesus taught or to his own attitude and bearing when confronted with the various problems of human life. It is fortunate that he did not seek to give explicit instructions. The variety of circumstances in which men are placed would have made such a task impossible. He gave rather an illustration of how a life in perfect harmony with God adjusts itself to every human experience. No one who studies attentively the life of Christ need be long in doubt as to what he ought to do in given circumstances. Each one must come to his own free choice. Two men in a given situation might decide to go in opposite directions, where it would be impossible to tell in which path lay absolute truth. Where the pathway is obscure one must follow his own deliberate and prayerful convictions as to what Jesus would have him do. Two men might question as to their duty in a time of national commotion, such as the breaking out of war. One man decides that if he does as Jesus would have him do, he must give his life to the defense of his country, and so he enlists. The other decides that the Spirit of Jesus is opposed to war and that no cause can justify his taking up arms. He therefore declines to enlist. For either to do as the other does, would be wrong, since each by deliberate attempt to submit to the will of Christ has reached his own conclusion. Yet such instances of opposite tendency are rare, and as the Spirit of our Lord becomes more prevalent they will grow rarer still, until with the truly enlightened body of believers trained in the school of Christ, public service and private conduct will alike be regulated by obedience to the mind which was in Christ Jesus, and is also in those who submit themselves to his Spirit and "learn of him."

 And therein stay.

COLLEGE DEGREES.

BY THE VISITOR.

OW and then the subject of academic and honorary degrees is brought to mind by the discovery of some unusually crooked method by which they are being secured by the unworthy but aspiring. In general there seems to be but little conscience on the subject in America, either on the part of those who are seeking for them merely as ornaments, or of those institutions which confer them for a price without exacting from the candidate a suitable course of study as a preparation for their reception. To be sure, the reputable institutions in this country, as in Europe, are careful to maintain a high standard of scholarship and an adequate course of preparatory study as prerequisites for the degrees given in course, and only confer the honorary degrees on men distinguished in some particular manner by notable service to science, literature or the public welfare. But the zeal to secure and the willingness to confer, when exhibited by cheap men and cheap schools, tend to bring the whole matter of degrees into disfavor and ridicule in the minds of the discerning.

Of course, the root of the evil lies in the inflated airs assumed by small academies, who call themselves colleges and universities, and arrogate to themselves the right to confer university degrees. At first sight it might seem that such institutions ought to be limited by charter to the privileges that lie historically within the range of academic function. But even the cheapening of the entire scheme of degrees, which results from this unregulated assumption of rights on the part of the small school, is less to be feared than the attempt to restrict such offenders by law. The atmosphere of learning ought to be free and unhindered, and wherever external authority limits the freedom of either an instructor or an institution, greater harm is sure to be done than can be compensated by the advantage gained. The only remedy to be hoped is the growth of the institutional conscience and a certain self-respect on the part of college officers, which, both by recognition of what is respectable and fitting in educational work and by a desire to uphold the sacred traditions of sound learning, will prevent those breaches of academic propriety so frequent in recent years in American schools, in the bestowal of unearned honors on unworthy men by unfledged institutions.

The fault no doubt lies primarily with the college. It may be taken for granted that many men who lack entirely the requisites will seek degrees. The college and university have always been looked to as the upholders of academic propriety and the defenders of the honors they have created. It is theirs to refuse bestowments that degrade the fair fame of such degrees as bachelor, master or doctor. To see an institution which is conspicuous by its meagerness of foundation and requirements conferring any or all of these degrees is not only a travesty on education, but a disgrace to both the school and the recipient. When an institution which is scarcely more than a fair academy persists in conferring the baccalaureate degree, or a college with a course barely sufficient to entitle its graduates to enter the upper classes of reputable universities, claims and exercises the right to dispense the degrees of master and doctor, the value of all degrees is cheapened in the minds of unacademic people, and in educational circles the school and its beneficiaries are the objects of the contempt they deserve.

The Visitor heard the remark made, only recently, by a young man who was unwilling to spend the time demanded for a degree he wished. "Well, I don't need to waste any such time to get that degree. — College will give it to me for five dollars and a quarter of the residence you require."

The college named offered a course which by no stretch of the imagination could be regarded as affording competency to confer any degree beyond that of bachelor. Such schools gain for themselves an ill name in educational circles, and subject even their best and most industrious graduates to suspicion and special scrutiny when they present themselves at the doors of the higher universities. Some of the western states are particularly afflicted with this curse of "inflation" in college catalogues and programs. It is often the case that a school, the most prominent feature of which is a "business college," or a "school of oratory," or a "college of music," secures the addition of some linguistic, scientific and literary courses, and an affiliation with a neighboring law or medical school, and starts out in business as a "university." Its dominant purpose being commercial, it regards its so-called "honors" as commodities to be had at a fixed price. In such an atmosphere one is likely to find masters of arts, and doctors of laws and of philosophy multiplying.

In one of our middle western states statistics show that more doctors of philosophy were created in a recent year than all the German universities combined produced in the same period, and it is a recognized fact that of the dozen schools thus responsible, not more than one or two have the slightest academic right to confer any degree higher than that of bachelor. Perhaps these schools may be said to "rise by degrees"; but their fall in educational esteem is far more rapid.

The singular feature of this business is that the denominational schools are the worst offenders. The state institutions, for the most part, maintain a fair standard of respectability in the matter of honors. It is the church schools that transgress the line of good usage. A member of the faculty of a denominational college said to the Visitor not long since, "Yes, our school is a great sinner in this regard. It seems to be the rule that a minister who has preached for three years after graduation without conspicuous scandal, and can produce ten dollars, is entitled to the degree of doctor of divinity." This no doubt explains the fact that so many "D. D.'s" are let loose upon the public. But any school which is an offender of this sort is sure to pay the penalty in time.

Another short cut to degrees is by the correspondence method. Men have learned the fact that the honors are wanted. Not yet prepared to abandon entirely the demand for study as a prerequisite, they have devised the convenient makeshift of allowing "non-resident" work—i. e., reading or study at home, to stand as the full complement of a college course. It need hardly be said that no degree given by correspondence is worth the paper it disgraces, or would receive the slightest recognition from any reputable institution. Correspondence work has its place, and a valuable one, in education, where it is the only means at hand, but it can never be recognized as a substitute for resident study, or as competent to earn a degree. Yet only a few weeks have passed since the Visitor met a man who had widely informed the little public of his town that he was a doctor of philosophy of the University of Chicago. When the statement was made to the Visitor he doubted its correctness, and took pains to inquire somewhat more fully into the matter. When asked for explicit information the "doctor" fell back upon the assertion that he had never been in residence at the university, but had gotten his degree by correspondence. Knowing this to be impossible, the Visitor asked for dates and facts, and the confident recipient of the degree discovered that his honors had come from an institution calling itself "The National University, of Chicago," in which title the "National" was sufficiently inconspicuous to leave the misleading title to do its work. It turned out that the only "correspondence" required was the interchange of business communications necessitated by the acceptance of an advertised offer and the payment of the small fee demanded. This bogus diploma mill is now on the way to a final closure, and with it will go one more source of fraudulent degrees.

There is no short cut to academic honors. If they are earned in a reputable institution or are conferred in recognition of really meritorious service by a competent school, they may be worn with a consciousness of honesty and appropriateness. Otherwise they bring only disrepute to the institution bestowing them and to the man who wears them.

HOW TO BEGIN.

Call attention to a symposium in this issue on "How I Begin the Winter's Work?" During the past two months there has been a letting down of effort; the grasp upon the serious work of life has been loosened; the bow has been un-bent. Now the churches and pastors are beginning to pick up the fallen threads; they are trying to get a grip upon things; they are trying to get the machinery of church activity set in motion.

Making Up the Work.

Some are taken up by their work. They are pushed into it; they are carried along by it. They do things because they are forced upon them. They come up to them with shrinking; they are relieved when they are over. Others take up their work eagerly and gladly. They have been thinking about it, planning for it; and now with recruited energies and revived hopes they enter upon it enthusiastically.

A New Purpose.

Like the artist who, when asked, "What is your best picture?" answered, "The next," many a pastor is determined to make the next year's work his best year's work. Divinely dissatisfied with past attainments, painfully conscious of the discrepancy between the ideal and the actual, he is determined to press on to higher things. He wants to forget past failures and successes; he wants to outdo his past; he wants to be wiser, holier, more largely successful in his work. To fulfil his high calling is his settled purpose.

A Condition of Success.

A prime condition of success is concentration. It is impossible to be intensely interested in or intently employed on a multiplicity of objects at once. Power is lost in the measure in which it is divided. It gains force when it flows in one channel. Preachers are not to be men of one idea, but they are to be men of one work. They are to say, "This one thing I do." They are not to leave the ministry of the Word to serve tables; they are not to scatter their fire. Like the racer in the Olympic games, they are to make a straight course for the goal.

Methods of Work.

To suggest methods of work for another is always a hazardous thing. Nothing ought to be allowed to hinder the free play of personality. Mechanical methods are to be sedulously avoided. They are always fatal to the truest success. Yet methods of some kind are necessary. Work to be effective must be reduced to a system. No general will succeed who does not have a plan of the campaign; and no preacher will succeed who does not map out his work with care, and resolutely keep himself to the things he has planned.

The Personal Equation.

That, after all, is the important thing. It is the powder behind the ball; it is the man behind the gun; it is the force that makes the method employed effective. Christianity is a life and it needs for its propagation the service of living souls. Professional work can never take the place of personal work. Every Christian is to be a worker. The church is the pastor's force rather than his field, and his highest success will be realized not in doing the work himself but in getting the entire church at work

THE REAL FOE OF THE WORKING-MAN.

When addressing the union workmen of Galesburg on Labor Day, Bishop John L. Spalding of Peoria gave utterance to these bold and true words: "The foe of labor is not capital, but ignorance and vice. In the whole English-speaking world at least its worst enemy is drink. More than a combination of all employers, the saloon has power to impoverish and degrade workmen."

We are simply beating about the bush when we ignore the influence of the saloon as a breeder of poverty and crime. It is a sad blot upon our boasted civilization that an institution which works against the welfare of society is legalized and fostered. The saloon is a social anomaly, and ought to be rooted out.

MINISTERS' MEETINGS AND ANARCHY.

The ministers' unions of the city sent expressions of condolence to Mrs. McKinley when her husband was shot down. They also joined in prayer for the President's recovery. And now, while mourning the cutting short of a valuable and good life, they are discussing the question of anarchy and are considering what can be done to stamp it out. To stamp it out is an impossible task; it can be brought to an end only by supplanting it with something better. The growth of brotherhood means the decay of anarchism. While denouncing undue license of speech we cannot afford to violate the principle of civil liberty upon which our nation is founded. Drastic measures may be needed, but they must not be allowed to imperil our free institutions. Nor will a spasm of reform avail much. When evils exist the only remedy for revolution is reform. And when men are wrong, the only way to save the state is by making them right.

PRESIDENT WILLIAM M'KINLEY.

An Appreciation.

It is too early to attempt an estimate of the character and work of our late President. We need perspective in order to measure public men. One thing is sure, his place in history will be a high one; and he will hold a high place largely because of his heart qualities. Few rulers were ever better loved. He lived for the people. He kept his finger upon the nation's pulse. It was not his to be a leader in the way of giving expression to the ideas and sentiments struggling to the birth in the nation's heart. He waited until public sentiment voiced itself before taking action. He felt that he was the servant of the people, and his one great aim in public life was to carry into effect the will of the people as he interpreted it.

But above all, the influence of President McKinley will be felt in the coming years because of his moral qualities. He was a good man, an affectionate and chivalrous husband, a high-minded gentleman, a humble and sincere Christian. Not only is his fame secure, but his memory is blessed.

What an inexpressibly precious legacy has been left to this nation in the words of Christian faith and hope in which President McKinley breathed out his soul! He fully realized that his hour had come and his mind turned to his Maker. He whispered feebly "Nearer, My God, to Thee," the words of the hymn always dear to his heart. Then in faint accents he murmured, "Good-bye, all, good-bye. It is God's way. His will be done, not ours."

With this sublime display of Christian fortitude the President soon after lapsed into unconsciousness.

A remarkable scene took place Friday night in front of the Inter Ocean office. A week had elapsed since the shooting of President McKinley, and a great crowd, massed in Monroe street and the adjacent alleys, was waiting in silence for the last word from the room of the dying President. The crowd grew larger instead of smaller after midnight, but all stood in silence listening to the Inter Ocean bulletins from Buffalo. At last, when the official message came announcing the President's death, some one started "Nearer, My God, to Thee," and the crowd of thousands sang it through. Then, after prayer, the people turned to "America" and "The Battle Hymn of the Republic."

Theodore Roosevelt, Our New President.

In the hour of national calamity it is no small comfort to know the reins of power have passed into safe hands. Our new chief executive is a God-fearing man, a man of indomitable courage and inflexible principle, a man who has already given abundant proof of the honesty of his purposes and of the purity of his patriotism. He has never sought political honors; they have been thrust upon him; and the duties of the high positions which he has occupied have been discharged with consummate wisdom and ability. He promises to be true to the principles which guided Mr. McKinley in his administration. That he will rise above partisan influences and aims no one doubts. He will be himself, and he will be President. He may not always satisfy the politicians, but he will win more and more the confidence of the people, and he will increase the respect of the nations of the world for the government of which he is the head. As he assumes the onerous duties of his high office may he have the sympathy and prayers of all good people.

PRAYER.

It is not prayer,
This clamor of our eager wants
That fills the air
With wearying, selfish plaints.

It is not faith
To boldly count all gifts as ours—
The pride that saith,
"For me his wrath he ever showers."

It is not praise
To call to mind our happier lot,
And boast bright days,
God-favored, with all else forgot.

It is true prayer
To seek the giver more than gift,
God's life to share,
And love—for this our cry to lift.

It is true faith
To simply trust his loving will,
Whiche'er he saith—
"Thy lot be glad" or "ill."

It is true praise
To bless alike the bright and dark;
To sing all days
Alike with nightingale and lark.

"HOW DO I BEGIN THE WINTER'S WORK?"

NEVER twice the same. The value of variety in method cannot be overstated. Ways of doing things quickly stale. That which succeeded yesterday will fail tomorrow. Successes are self-exhausting. Two things, however, always face the preacher. 1. His own preparation. There is the body preparation which, let us trust, has been happily secured by a sane vacation—a vacation not spent in the distractions of a summer school, but by lake side or in forest unvexed by academic fret or stir. Then the mental preparation and spiritual girding are of deepest concern. Fresh, stimulating books are to be read and the idler quickened into the worker. Strenuous church life must always wait upon the white heat of the minister. 2. Having fitted himself for work the preacher will then bestir himself to bring others into the same fervor of enthusiasm and livingness of endeavor. The how of it, as has been stated, must be well nigh infinitely flexible.

Last year the circular letter, say, played a large part in the call to work; it may be used this year, but no large dependence can be placed upon it.

As to my own special plans, the emphasis will be placed upon two undertakings: (1) Called meetings of the regular guilds of the church, at which endeavor will be made to awaken them to earnest work. (2) Neighborhood meetings. The church having been districted, the workers in each district will meet to go over the situation carefully in that district, striving to fall upon ways by which backsliding Christians can be restored to active lives and the unconverted brought to Christ. These nuclei of workers should count for much in the winter campaign and should be looked to for hearty and intelligent co-operation in evangelistic enterprise. Much else besides, but these hints will serve.

GEORGE H. COMBS.

Kansas City, Mo.

I do not know that my methods are at all distinctive. I first undertake to clear the desk. The summer brings a large accumulation of unforwarded mail matter which must receive examination however superficial. Nothing is worse than to begin the fall impeded by the accumulation of the previous months. Next to a clear conscience, for effective work, is a desk with a clear top.

Some forms of pastoral work are immediately pressing. The aged, the sick, those who have suffered bereavement during the summer, I try to call upon as quickly as possible. I usually plan a course of sermons for the early fall during the summer vacation, and have them fairly outlined, but do not begin preaching them for the first few weeks of the early autumn. The first fall meeting with the church committee and the deacons I count of importance for the sense of co-operation which it brings, the value of the suggestions made and the impetus which is given the church work at the outside. To get every one to work as quickly as possible, and not allow the fall to drag along listlessly is the ideal of every earnest pastor. The season of church work is much shortened by the growing habit of absence during the summer, and there is little time to waste in getting to work in the fall, especially as the later months in the season are sure to be hurried and broken in upon. I try to plan for solid study, thoughtful preaching and other pastoral work in the first months of the new year, knowing well from experience how swiftly the last weeks of the season slip away.

Oak Park, Ill.

WILLIAM E. BARTON.

Sept. 1st I send out a call to arms and insist that each select individual work for the year.

Second, I hold a young people's rally with the same end in view.

Third, I plan a series of morning sermons on great themes and advertise same faithfully. The course this year is on "Great Whats of the Bible."

Fourth, I plan house visitation for pastor and wife.

Fifth, I have the parish divided into fifteen districts and appoint a pastor's assistant in each district.

Sixth, I cuff the deacons and stir up the ushers.

Seventh, I let the choir severally alone.

Torrington, Conn.

JAMES A. CHAMBERLIN.

1. I am back from my vacation fresh and feel equal for any work. This is a good start.

2. I try not to live in a former, nor in a future parish, but in my present one. Sufficient unto the day is the work as well as the evil thereof.

3. I find out who have passed through trial during my absence and at once call upon them.

4. I next walk around my parish and also through my library and get a fresh general view of my field and tools.

5. I call a meeting of the chief officers of each department of the church. It was held last night. I asked for a frank expression about the work in hand. We talked for two hours. The value of some methods tried was established; of others questioned.

Chief result was in getting the attention of officers on the work to be done. Emphasis was put upon the importance of letting no stranger attend a service without a friendly greeting and without ascertaining his address, if he be a resident. They all favored a children's sermon, a missionary concert, a monthly hymn (to be committed), a course of daily Bible readings for the whole church and more spirituality.

6. Already I am having a swamped feeling in view of the multiplicity of demands on a pastor's energy and sympathies, and I am praying that I may through the year possess the peace and equilibrium of a well-rested man, and cheerfully leave undone the things I cannot do. I desire to keep physically, mentally and spiritually sound this year, so as to better live and preach the good news of God in Christ. I desire to escape on the one hand mere wheel-turning methods that passes for activity, and on the other hand a morbid, introspective, judgment-passing pessimism that passes for spirituality. I pray to live for the year a sane, well-balanced, tireless life for Christ.

Oak Park, Ill.

SYDNEY STRONG.

1. By rejoicing in the summer's victories.
2. By welcoming in love those who return from vacations and not questioning their faith because of this outing.
3. By careful filling of all gaps in the working force.
4. By determined effort to strengthen every department.
5. By untiring work of eldership upon the church roll—the prayerful considerations of each name and appropriate action with regard to each.
6. By prayer and planning for winning souls to Christ in local field and in the world.
7. By emphasis of the fact that "Christian service is not a picnic, but a campaign."

CHAS. S. MEDBURY.

Call on all members at once; have a meeting of all officers of the church and all presidents of organizations to consider policies and plans for coming year; consult officers of various societies in order to tighten up cords loosened in summer; preach two or three rousing work sermons in the morning and evangelistic sermons in the evening; use cards, church paper and daily papers to recall attention to the church; have rallies in Sunday school and elsewhere.

Spirituality is the power of the church. There is no large service apart from the manifestation of the Holy Spirit within. We open our autumn work by a recognition of our spiritual needs and seeking divine wisdom and grace. Our longing is to have a season of spiritual refreshing—our plan to learn the will of God for our work.

JAMES W. FIFIELD.

We begin the fall work at California avenue with a series of morning sermons on the "Life and Teaching of Jesus," and with plans and good prospects of clearing our edifice of all indebtedness.

Chicago.

D. F. FOX.

I am planning a series of sermons on "A Twentieth Century Christian's Theology." Congregations are large. Interest enthusiastic. A "men's club" is to be organized soon; also a class for systematic Bible study along the lines of the Institute of Sacred Literature, Chicago. Other aggressive lines of work are being planned and carried forward.

Dubuque, Iowa.

FRANK G. SMITH.

In beginning my winter's work I am governed much by the conditions of my congregation. I generally do much visiting, trying to see every member of my church, and as far as possible every member of the congregation. I generally preach a series of sermons at night, and make them as evangelistic as possible. In the mornings I preach on some fundamental theme for awakening and inspiration.

Chicago.

JOHN T. CHRISTIAN.

Personally I begin the winter's work with two series of sermons. For the morning: "Encouragement for Christians from Peter's Epistles"; for the evening a series to young people on "Some Stones in the Edifice of Character." As a congregation we are right in the thick of building a $50,000 church. We are "getting busy."

Oak Park, Ill.

C. S. HOYT.

"How do I begin the winter's work?" I hardly know, except that the germ of things for a year at least seems to grow out of a fresh perception of the function of the human will in things religious, as well as all other things. Spiritual life, like all life, is, as the psychologists would say, the "motor reaction" of ourselves on the world. This is just a key note.

Chicago.

F. E. DEWHURST.

I begin my winter's work by keeping the summer's work well in hand, thoroughly organized. Then fall and winter finds the church ready to go forward at the first command; otherwise the church must spend much time recovering what she has lost in summer.

Wichita, Kan.

CHAS. E. BRADT.

We begin our winter's work by a continuous effort to deepen the Christian life of all the members so that we may be workers together with God in extending the kingdom of his will.

GEORGE A. CAMPBELL.

I do not cease the summer's work, but simply merge it into the fall and winter as naturally as the seasons follow.

Chicago.

ROLAND A. NICHOLS.

From a symposium on the above subject in a ministers' meeting we give the following notes:

The central aim of all Christian activity ought to be to help people to know God.

Personal contact of soul with soul is the end sought in all methods, and whatever can secure that best is best.

Organization is good only as life works through it. Channels are useful only as water flows through them.

Every church is a problem by itself, and demands study as a separate entity. The Procrustes method won't work.

Aims have to be considered before methods. The thing to be aimed at must be considered before studying how to reach it.

If we listen to the whisperings of the Divine Spirit we will be directed in our work. God is ready to reveal his will to those who are ready to do it.

To compare notes with others and learn of their methods is often suggestive, but each once must adapt accepted and successful methods to special conditions.

More systematic Bible study in the Sunday school is demanded. In some instances the second preaching service ought to be dispensed with and some form of Bible instruction be adopted.

Where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty. Each one is to be free to use methods of work suited to himself. To adopt another man's methods is to repeat the folly of David when he tried to fight in Saul's armor.

The preacher must not be expected to do all the work. Instead of depending upon an official class called the Christian ministry, we ought to foster the ministry of the whole body of believers. To every man his work.

"IS THERE A PLACE FOR DOUBT AND A FOUNDATION FOR FAITH?"

BY GEORGE LUTHER CADY.

Part II.

HERE, then, shall we find faith's foundation? It is strange that beside such a superficial study of religious experience given in "David" in "The Reign of Law," Mr. Allen should have also (unconsciously?) given us one of the clearest insights into real religion in "Gabriella." She, too, had been caught in the nineteenth century revolution; for on the same day on which Darwin, who swept many a David from his feet, was born, there was born also Abraham Lincoln. In the cataclysm of the great rebellion her family and fortune were swept away, but like the rose her life and faith were the sweeter for being crushed. She caught up the sword which David had flung aside and won the victory of a serene life. "As staff to her young hands, cup to her lips, lamp to her feet, oil to her daily bruises, rest to her weary pillow, was reliance on Higher Help." * * * Religion, not forms the spiritual life of women. In the whole history of the world's opinions no dogma of any weight has ever originated with a woman; wherein, as in many other ways, she shows points of superiority in her intellect. It is man who tries to apprehend God through his logic and psychology; a woman understands him better through emotions and deeds. It is the men who are concerned about the Urim and Thummim of the tabernacle; woman walks straight into the Holy of Holies. Men constructed the Cross; women wept for the Crucified. * * * 'My church is the altar of Christ and the house of God,' replied Gabriella. 'And so is any other church.' * * * What I regret is that you should have thrown away your religion on account of your difficulties with theology. Nothing more awful could have befallen you than that. * * * I am sorry that you should have been misled into believing that Christianity is nothing more than one of the religions of the world, and Christ merely one of its religious teachers. I wish with all my strength you believed as you once did, that the Bible is the direct revelation from God, making known to us, beyond all doubt, the resurrection of the dead, the immortality of the soul in a better world than this, and the presence with us of a Father who knows our wants, pities our weaknesses, and answers our prayers.' * * * She had been drawn to that part of worship which lasts and is divine; he had been repelled by the part that passes and is human."

Of course one is met at this moment with the callow freshman who has an unflinching belief in the traditional physiology and psychology which places woman as the inferior in mental capacity and processes and accords to man the time-honored chieftainship as the normal race type. But the new psychology is robbing man of his prestige and now is beginning to view the child and the woman as the real type and norm. It is returning to the deep psychology of Christ when he affirmed, "Except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." This has been brought out so plainly by advanced psychologists that I must quote from them.

Havelock Ellis says in his "Man and Woman": "The greater variability of men, while it produces many brilliant and startling phenomena, also produces a greater proportion of worthless or even harmful deviations and the balance is thus restored with the more equable level of women. Women, it is true, remain nearer than men to the infantile state; but, on the other hand, men approach more nearly than women to the apelike and senile state. * * * Nature has done her best to make women healthy and glad and has been on the whole content to let men run somewhat wild!"

Likewise writes Prof. Patrick of this university in the Popular Science Monthly, May, 1895: "The geniuses have been men for the most part, and so have the cranks. Woman loves the old, the tried and the customary. She is conservative and acts as society's balance wheel. * * * From mental differences the doctrine of woman's inferiority receives no support—inferior, no doubt in philosophy, science and invention, and in her conception of abstract truth and justice, but superior in intuition, in charity, in temperance, in fidelity, in balance. Here woman approaches the child type. * * * If woman is more like the child than man is, then she is more representative of the future being. The matter, in fact, reduces itself probably to this, that woman, like the child, represents race type, while man represents those variable qualities by which mankind adapts itself to its surroundings. Every woman is, as it were, a composite picture of the race. * * * If superiority consists in adaptation to present environment—then man is superior; but if it consists in the possession of those underlying qualities which are essential to the race—past, present and future—then woman is superior."

It is a noticeable fact that all the characteristics which distinguish the savage from the civilized man and have marked the progress of civilized society, that all the virtues which are held out as the terminal toward which we strive, are childlike and feminine. We are daily becoming more like women and it would be hard to picture the perfect man except in child and womanly terms. Is it not possible that the perfect man and society will be that which most perfectly conforms to and incorporates the intuition and spiritual insight which belong to woman? Perhaps the sneer that is often made that the Church is composed of women is the most severe criticism that could be passed upon men and the greatest compliment that could be paid both to woman and the Church. What if all this time we men have been deflecting from the true while the woman has been truest to nature because most religious? What if the conceit which often surrounds the scepticism of the callow freshman is as though a man should boast of being a degenerate? What if men are below and women are true to God's ideal of the human race and never so true as when she points us to God? Perhaps Goethe said a more profound thing than he knew when he exclaimed:

"The Eternal Woman leadeth us Upward and On!"

And what if she never leads us so truly as when in the image of the mother in simple childlike faith we bow at her knee and learn to say, "Our Father"?

The reason why woman is more religious and the safer religious guide is that she founds her religion on experience, while man appeals to his logical faculties. In this she is unconsciously the more philosophic of the two, for philosophy as well as religion makes experience the supreme court of knowledge. Her "I have felt" is amply sufficient to "melt the freezing reason's colder part." She best represents that faith which Dr. Bradford has defined as "the willingness to follow the intuitions, the spontaneous convictions, the affirmations of the heart, always with good reason, but without waiting for the intellect to be convinced." The person who in the hour of crisis can drop his bucket down into a past and bring it up sparkling, brimming full of a deep, rich experience, may be called illogical and unscientific, but his experience is irrefutable and immovable. It is the only abiding foundation of faith.

THE SPIRIT OF THE LORD.

PROF. J. EDGAR MCFADYEN.

IN every art the master is free. He can create and control. Rules do not determine him; precedents do not bind him. Where the spirit of the master is, there is liberty. He breaks old laws and makes new ones. He even dispenses with laws, not because he despises them, but because he is a law unto himself. The law is in his heart, and he expresses it as his will. His fingers move across the organ keys, and he fills the listening air with forms, now soft as the moonlight, now wild as the storm. They are born, not of rule, but of the spirit.

And as in art, so in life. Where the Spirit of the Master is, there is liberty. Yet who enjoys it? Are we not the veriest slaves, bound by our past and our parentage, our habits and our education and our society? From behind the thick walls and the barred windows we look out upon a world of moving life and beauty. But we cannot reach it; for we have not the Spirit of the Lord. Let that Spirit but stir within the heart of any prisoner, and the walls, be they never so thick, and the bars, be they never so heavy, will vanish as before the breath of God, and he shall be out in the open again, with the blue above him, and the spacious kindly earth around him, free to move whithersoever the Spirit leads him.

For the Spirit is sure to carry him somewhere, not impossibly into yet untrodden paths, not improbably among wild beasts. But he will walk and not be afraid; for he is led of the Spirit, and the Spirit knows.

The world with its social and international problems, the Church with her perplexities of creed and organization, need now and ever men filled with the Spirit. Men there are, enough and to spare, of the letter; men who cannot take a brave step forward unless they see the footprints of a bolder man than they. Not by such are the new heavens and the new earth ushered in. The world is lifted and moved by men of the Spirit, for they alone enjoy the freedom under which progress is possible. They strike a blow as the world needs and the Spirit bids, and do not tremble though their blow should be the first; some blow must be first. Meaner natures hide behind convention; will do nothing which cannot be supported by precedent. Free men create precedent, and thereby show the deepest respect of all for the past. To them the past is not an incubus but an inspiration. All that is best in it was created by men who looked at life and Scripture with their own eyes and reached their own conclusions; and we do them the deepest of all wrongs when we look or try to look through their eyes and abide or try to abide by their conclusions. All that is permanent in the work of the fathers is the spirit in which it was done. Their institutions and results are not final for us any more than are ours for the man of the aftertime. The free man would neither bind nor be bound.

Difficulties and doubts demand originality, and that only the man of the Spirit possesses. He cannot be commonplace, even if he would; the Spirit will not let him. He sees problems, many and hard enough, in Church and state; learns for their solution all that the past can teach, and trusts for the rest to the Spirit within him. "If ye are led by the Spirit, ye are not under the law." Christ was beside himself; so said his own kin. He had a devil; so said the leaders of the Church. And all because his methods were not conventional; all because he was free, obeying the impulse of the mighty Spirit within. So the men of the Spirit have often been branded as fools and heretics by a world which they turned upside down—small wonder!—and oftentimes they have had to fight single-handed, with their back against the wall, not counting their life or their reputation dear to them, if only they were privileged to do what they could for a thankless generation, and to testify to the might and immortal presence of the Spirit, who strengthened their heart when hosts encamped against them.

Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty. Liberty, but not license; for liberty is only possible within the law. The free man is only free to act in the Spirit of the Lord, to move within the world of hopes and energies created by him. But what a world! For all things are yours, and ye are Christ's. If liberty is law, yet law is liberty. The heart made free by the indwelling presence of Christ will express her emotions, her hopes, her faiths, in language which may send a thrill of astonishment through the conventional religious world. There is so much unreality everywhere that the world will always marvel, as it did of old, when it hears the voice of one who speaks with authority, and not as the scribes: and it may seek to silence such a voice by ridicule, by excommunication, by the cross, according to the temper of the age. But till it is silenced the speaker must speak, and the thinker must think, and the fighter must fight; for the Spirit must fulfill itself. On the face of dark and troubled waters the Spirit moves; moves because it must. The Spirit—for wind and spirit are alike in the Greek—the Spirit bloweth. And to men, stifled in the atmosphere of precedent and prejudice, welcome are the breezes that blow from the Alpine heights of some strong nature in whom the Spirit dwells. The Spirit bloweth where it listeth, not in the wake of some other spirit, but where it will; for it is original and free. Jesus breathed his Spirit upon twelve unheard-of men; and ancient faiths crumbled at their touch. He breathed upon a German miner's son; an old church tottered, and a new world burst into being. If he breathe upon us, may we not do things as great as these?

DISMEMBERING THE CHURCH.

REV. HENRY A. BOMBERGER.

HERE is some danger of a man's being over-organized. Three legs, for instance, would be to him a calamity. Such a thing we should call "organization run wild." A cow may have several stomachs, but not a man. There are some branches that only sap a tree's life, and add nothing to its beauty. It may be so with a man. He might be "organized to death," but not likely.

On the other hand, a thousand times more men are suffering and dying of disorganization—if the books tell the truth. Here is by far the greater calamity. Four-handed men (and churches) are few; no-handed men (and churches) are numerous. And as between four-handedness and no-handedness give us the former.

This is a parable of the Church.

There are those who continue their cry for the Church. As though God's temple and the God of the temple were not in accord! As though the owner of a hand should say to the hand of the owner, "What have I to do with thee?"

"The Church is sufficient in itself," they say. "Away with these added organizations; the Sunday school, the Young People's Society, and such—away with them! Why must the Church drag along all of these? They are not the Church; they but burden her, and retard her progress. Away with them!"

Brethren, there is one body, but many members, and all these are members of the same body.

You come to me and say: "Friend, you have my pity and some rebuke. Why do you weary yourself with carrying these legs of yours wherever you go? They but burden you and drag you down. Moreover, they are not you. They consequently detract from your honor. Away with them!"

Sure enough! Fine logic! Off go my legs! And I?—am still here.

"And these arms, my brother! It is time you assert yourself. Why suffer such tyranny? Back to Ego! These are not you! How long will you continue to drag them here and there? Away with them!"

How true! • The argument holds at every point. Off go my arms! And Ego?—is still here.

Other instruments of my life follow—vehicles of thought, weapons of will, tools of conscience—these external things that are not me, until, alas! poor Ego! What am I? Such a man!

The poor, suffering Church is often made to pass through similar surgery, a narrow knife and keen of edge, insidious and crafty, that pierces to the dividing asunder of me and mine. These organs and instruments by which the Church is made real and mighty, by which she actualizes herself, by which she works out that which God has worked in, by which she becomes a tangible realization, something with pith and point and power, which are not the Church, but which are essential to the Church, that she may live and move and work, touching men, lifting men, leading men—these are cut off and cast away.

There can be but one result—a disorganized Church, legless, armless, headless, heartless, lifeless, useless! What a Church!—The Sunday School Times.

GETTING STARTED.

ONE of the great things in life is to get started. The shores are lined in every direction with craft of all sizes which seem unable to get themselves launched; they are eager for the water, but they fail to reach it. A host of men and women are in this position; they are bewailing the fact that they are not at work, and are going about in every direction seeking for openings, but they find nothing to their mind. Now, while it is true that there is nothing more difficult in many cases than to get a start in life, it very often happens that the inherent difficulty of the undertaking is immensely increased by the lack of practical sense on the part of the man or woman who is making the endeavor. Gasper Becerra, in Longfellow's poem, waited a tedious time for the wood fit to receive the image which he meant to carve when the proper material came to hand. Despairing at last of securing what he was waiting for, he picked up the thing nearest—a piece of burnt wood—and carved his image out of that. It was a wise decision, but it would have been wiser if it had been reached earlier. Too many men and women wait for "just the thing" they want, not knowing that just the things one wants are very difficult to get, and when gotten, often turn out to be the very things one does not want.

The true way to get a start in life is to take the first chance of getting into the race. It may be a very inferior and unattractive chance, but it is a chance nevertheless. It takes one out of his stationary, waiting position, gets him into the field, loosens his limbs, and puts him into training for whatever lies before him; and it often happens that these very unpromising chances are straight roads to fortune. No man ever succeeds who refuses to do anything until he can do it on his own terms; the man who succeeds is the man who is willing to do the thing on any honorable terms. We must begin as servants if we wish to end as masters. We must take what we can get if we hope finally to get what we want. The first opportunity is the best opportunity if it really opens a door into life.—Selected.

A STUDY IN CHARACTER.

HOW JOHN WELLMAN COMMENCED THE TWENTIETH CENTURY.

CLARENCE A. VINCENT, D. D.

Chapter I—A Birth.

JOHN WELLMAN is forty-five years old. His life, thus far, has been spent in the state of Illinois. His grandfather moved from Massachusetts late in life and secured a section of rich land. His father, David Wellman, inherited these acres and by the passing of time and successful husbandry became a prosperous farmer. Though cut off by long distances and sparsely settled country from the privileges of school and church, David did not permit his household to grow up in heathenism. On Sunday all but the necessary work of the farm was laid aside, and at the usual hour of church a service was held in the cosy sitting-room. A lesson from the Scriptures was read and explained to the children. The old songs of the Church of Christ were sung. Then a sermon was read from a book of Emmon's sermons, which David had secured from the East. A prayer, in which all joined, and the singing of another hymn or of the Doxology closed the service. The remainder of the day was spent in a quiet but happy way, in reading, in conversation and in rest. Each weekday was full of work. David toiled early and late at the varied and irksome tasks of a farm. Sarah, his wife, had all the cares of the house, and in addition, the education of the children. After the morning's work was done, in which each member of the household had his part, the children spent the time till noon in study. The afternoon was for the older children a time for work and for the younger ones a time for play. After the supper dishes were washed and put away, while Sarah sewed and darned, David and the children engaged in the simple yet healthful games of that day. Then for a few moments the old Bible, which the grandfather had brought from the Massachusetts home, was taken from a shelf and a lesson was read, with now and then an explanation that interested the children and applied the truth to their needs. The prayer that followed was not a dry repetition of formal petitions but the talking of a man face to face with God and the bearing of each member of the family up before him. At the close the gentle voice of the good wife and the varying voices of the children joined in repeating, "Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name."

In such a home John Wellman grew up. He met and mastered his tasks each day in the spirit of fidelity. He was quick to learn and had, at the age of fourteen, progressed as much in book learning as the boys in the East with the advantages of school. He was a boy of perfect health and was full of pranks. He was kind-hearted and the large family of children, though he was not the oldest, followed him as their leader. He was sure in the saddle and quick with the gun. He always seemed to know where the game was and he usually brought back the largest bird for the table. He was one of those strong-limbed, keen-minded, manly fellows that grew up on many of the farms in the new country.

But the time came when he was to leave home.

His father and mother had hoped that he would buy a farm and settle near them, but he longed to be out in the world of commerce. He had read an article in a weekly paper several years before that spoke of the opportunities for a young man in the rapidly growing cities of the West. This he had never forgotten. In the day-time he pictured himself as a man of wealth and power, and the dreams of night only repeated the thoughts of the day. He had told his parents of his ambition, and they had promised, at last, that if at his nineteenth birthday he still was determined upon this course of life, they would give him permission. That day had come and with it the coveted assent. For months he had decided that he would make Chicago the city of his choice. He had read of its rapid growth. He had heard of boys who had gone there from the farm and were becoming the princes of trade. Chicago should be the field of his victory. As the day of his departure drew near, his heart grew faint. He had never half appreciated how dear his home was to him. The kindness and sterling integrity of his father stood out in new clearness; and the tender-hearted mother who had mended his clothes, taught him his lessons, and at whose knee he had learned to lisp his first prayer, how could he leave her! It was the night before his departure. The meal was eaten in silence. No games were played that night. The clothes, carefully washed and mended, were packed in a satchel. The Bible was taken down and John detected in his father's voice, as he read the great promises, the wavering of a deep but controlled emotion. It seemed to him, as his father prayed, that God was in the room. The prayer was full of thanksgiving for God's redeeming mercy, for the precious promises of his Word, for home, for children, for the joy of living. It was full of petitions for special blessings, and when in turn he prayed for John, the father poured out his soul for his dear boy, that he might be kept in all his ways, that the love of God and the grace of Christ might ever abide in his heart, and that his life might be an unselfish and useful one. When now and then during the night John awoke, he could hear his father's and mother's steps as they walked back and forth in the sitting-room, or the sound of their voices in conversation, and he knew they were thinking and talking of him. Over and over again that night he declared, with the vehemence of Peter, that he would be true to his training and would realize the hopes of his parents.

Before light the household was astir. No one but the younger children could swallow the inviting breakfast. While David was hitching up the team, Sarah was putting up a lunch for her boy. As the sound of the wagon drew near the house, she put her hands upon his shoulders and, looking with a mother's love down through his eyes into his very soul, she said, "My boy, none but a parent knows the sadness and the anxiety of this hour. We shall miss you at every turn. Your shout and laughter will no longer cheer us. Your quick step will no longer set our hearts beating. But it is best for you to go. We would not have it otherwise. Night and day our love will be with you and our prayers for you. Remember your father's and mother's God and that the greatest among men are those who do the Christliest service." Pressing a kiss upon his forehead she turned away. As the wagon bore him on, looking back at the turn in the road, he saw his mother standing in the door and caught sight of her waving hand.

The ten miles to the village were passed with cheer by all save David, for the future is the youth's world. The girls were wondering where John would stay in the big city, and the boys were imagining what kind of work he would secure, and how long it would be before he would be rich. And they were looking forward to the time when they should visit him, or perhaps some of them would go to the city also. Before they knew it, the station was reached. There was just time to purchase the ticket, for, one of the boys announced, "the train is in sight." When the brothers and sisters had covered John with kisses and had spoken words of farewell, David took his boy's hand and held it for a moment, looking tenderly at him, and leaving as he turned away, a kiss upon his lips and a small package in his hand. Then the train bore him away.

PLEASANTRIES.

"Ah, parson, I wish I could take my gold with me," said a dying deacon who was very wealthy, but very selfish. "It might melt," was the minister's very consoling reply.

An intelligent farmer, being asked if his horses were well matched, replied: "Yes, they are matched first rate; one is willing to do all the work, and the other is willing that he should."

"Captain, we are entirely out of ammunition." "What! entirely out of ammunition!" exclaimed that officer. "Yes, entirely out," was the reply. "Then cease firing," was the prompt command.

Some people are born to be contrary, and they fulfill their mission with religious zeal. They are like the Irishman's frog, who, he said, always stood up when he sat down and always sat down when he stood up.

It is said that during one of Mr. Moody's meetings a worker approached a young man with the question, "Are you a Christian?" The young man looked up, smiling good-naturedly, as he replied, "Oh, no, sir; I am one of the choir."

When the godless master, seeing that his boat was drifting seaward, in sudden terror asked his negro e: "Sambo, shall we pray, or shall we row?" who gave the answer worthy of a Christian statesman: "Master, let's mix 'em!"

An old darkey arose recently in one of the South-prayer meetings and exclaimed: "Brithren and ern, I've been having a drefful time since last we e together. I've been chawing hard bones and allowing bitter pills. I'm afraid I've broken every : of the ten commandments, but, thank the Lord, haven't lost my religion!"

No matter how old some of the jokes in any book y be, some new ones will be discovered in any such rk as that appropriately named "American Wit and mor." On the first page is what purports to be the nouncement over the bar of the Van Ness house Burlington, "If you don't see what you ask for, ant it!" This deserves consideration both for its humor and its admirable philosophy of discontent. A statement which is old enough, but still so new when it gets around again that it deserves restatement, is the remark of a man whose salary was smaller than his family: "If pride goes before a fall I'd like to see pride start a little ahead of the price of coal and provisions."

Whether or no its theology was up to high-water mark, there is a touch of both humor and pathos in the prayer of a Gloucester fisherman: "Make us as good Christians as circumstances permit." We once heard an eminent doctor of divinity start out on his long prayer with this utterance, "We thank thee, O Lord, that we have not been as bad this week as we might have been."

A long-winded convert rose in a Salvation Army meeting to give his experience. Having spoken for some time of his boyhood, he came on to a later phase, when the captain, seeing he was tiresome, placed his hands on his shoulders, and seated him with the remark, "Now, brother, we'll take you in sections! Your military history can come off tomorrow."

Rossini was one of the most indolent men that ever lived, yet he wrote operas against time, as it were. "The Barber of Seville," for instance, was written and mounted in less than a month, which fact gave rise to Donizetti's cogent witticism. Upon being told that Rossini had finished his opera in thirteen days Donizetti replied: "It is very possible; he is so lazy!"

FATE.

I feel that I am quite as smart
As Edward Bulwer Lytton, Bart.

I'm also every bit as bright
As Walter Scott, the Scottish knight;

And in my own peculiar way
I'm just as good as Thackeray.

But, woe is me that it should be,
They got here years ahead of me.

And all the tales I would unfold
By them already have been told.

WHO FOLLOWS CHRIST?

He calls not where the silver light
Lies on the waveless sea,
Where idly rock the pleasure-boats,
And summer winds move merrily.
His course is o'er the stormy deep,
He calls to stress and strain,
Who mans the life-boat for his sake
Must toil all night the wreck to gain.
Where wild winds rage and billows roar,
And death is waiting nigh,
The Christ calls, "Who will follow me?"
He must be brave who answers, "I."

Yet round about the Master stands
A group of hero souls,
And he is in good company
Who in that list his name enrolls.
No coward hearts, no wavering wills,
Are in that matchless crowd;
But those who lift the cross on high,
And serve their Master, meekly proud.
Is it too much to ask of thee
The labor and the loss?
Unworthy thou to follow him;
Heroes alone can bear his cross.

OUR PULPIT.

CHRIST'S PROPHECY OF HIS DEATH.

W. DOUGLAS MACKENZIE, D. D.

Text: Mark 8:31-33.

JESUS was the most perfect teacher and therefore he knew exactly when and how to unfold each step of his revelation to the minds of his disciples. He did not tell them first what they could only understand last. He moved toward those things which they could not possibly grasp, through those things that were more familiar to their thought, more easily apprehended by their hearts. If Jesus had spoken to them of his cross when first he called them to follow him, they had not followed him. He must first win their confidence. He must first have their love. So it is that Jesus does not begin to teach them about his death until after they have confessed with a loving enthusiasm that they believe him to be the Messiah. Then he began to teach them that he, the Son of Man, whom they had just called the Christ, must suffer many things and be rejected by the elders and chief priests and the scribes; that is, be cast out by Israel—the very Israel he had come to save—and be killed, but after three days rise again. Why was it necessary, as Jesus said, that the Son of Man should thus suffer? The word which he used is a very strong one—"must suffer." Rather should it be translated, "It is necessary that the Son of Man suffer many things and be rejected and be killed and be raised after three days." Now why and whence the necessity?

First of all, let us look at this fact. It was necessary that the Son of Man should die because of the character of the men with whom he had to deal. He was to be rejected by the chief priests, the elders, the scribes; Israel acting officially was going to reject him. Jesus saw that the roots of their hostility were so deep in their characters that it must result in a final struggle between them and him. They would be determined to carry out the purpose of their hostility. They could not understand his spirit. In the first place, they had that picture of an earthly Messiah. It was too dear to them to give up. They would not lose the hope of seeing the king on Mount Zion reigning over the literal kingdoms of the world. They would not soon give that up for the other spiritual kingdom which he described and which seemed to them so impalpable as to be unreal. The men that were bound up in the earthly, the external, the institutional, the temporal, the selfish, they had no appreciation for that other form of religion which Jesus was presenting to them, and so they hated him for it. Such hate has roots so deep that it must issue only in a final struggle that must mean his death.

His death! Why? Not every man who has enemies has to die. Why, if he can work such wonders as he has proved abundantly, cannot he overwhelm those weakling rulers of Jerusalem? Why, if a whisper that reaches the throne of God from his heart so swiftly could bring legions of angels to his assistance, why does he not bring them? Why does he contemplate the possibility of his being overwhelmed and crushed by those people of Jerusalem? If he has in his heart that great consciousness of infinite power, why does he say that they will succeed? Because it would mean his defeat if he tried to defeat them in that way. The kingdom which he is founding he has described to others: "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." If he crushed those who were hostile to him, that would not be meekness, and he would lose his inheritance—if his teaching be true. He has taught men that they must love their enemies, that they must bless them that spitefully use and entreat them, that they must pray for them; and shall he who says that they must love and bless and pray for their enemies, and that the kingdom of God can never be established until men learn to do that—can he who has said that love so real, so self-forgetful, so omnipotent over all the impulses of self-preservation, is henceforth the law of human life, the force which shall reorganize society and make the world the reflection of heaven—shall he go forth and break that law, dragging the earthly powers of Israel into physical destruction? If his own teaching be true, when the soldiers come to arrest Jesus, he must not lift a finger, he must not strike a blow, he must not summon a soldier. If his own teaching be true and the kingdom he has pictured be the real coming kingdom of the glorious God, then he must consent to have his blood spilled, to have his body broken, to have his name defamed, to have his character blackened, to have all his love flung back in his face and his very patience called weakness and cowardice. He must deny, resign himself.

The Cross at the Heart of It.

But the necessity is also to be found elsewhere. It was necessary that he should die, because only by his supreme sacrifice could the kingdom of God be established, the forgiveness of men granted. Sometimes, nowadays, people dream of new religions. Sometimes men wonder if some other form of teaching, some other kind of gospel, many not come to take the place of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. There is one reason why no other gospel is ever able to compete with this, no other teaching match itself against the teaching of the New Testament. There is no other religion which the world has ever heard or dreamed of that has a cross at its heart. If you think of the cross simply as a symbol of cruelty; if you think of the cross as Peter did, merely as the symbol of humiliation and defeat; if you think of it as suggesting the hatred of men and the capacity of humanity to ignore what is best and trample it in the dust, then I grant you the cross of Christ is a sorry story on which to found a gospel of redemption. But if the cross of Jesus Christ came out of his own heart; if he spoke of it months before it came; if he carried the woe of it deep in his soul, as the hour drew nearer to him; and if, when his heart shrank and agony took hold of his soul in the fixed contemplation of its horrid oncoming, he looked round upon his disciples and upon his enemies, and around upon the sick and sinful—"Oh! for the love of these I must go forward to that"; if in the cross of Jesus Christ there shines out the loftiest, intensest expression of the purest love that ever man heard, or that ever God could utter, then the cross of Jesus Christ can have no substitute and no victor over itself. That which tells most of the holiest and mightiest love must be God's last, because his greatest, message to the human soul.

Jesus knows that the world will never believe in the love of God till God has paid the utmost cost of the most perfect love. As long as God offers his love and has not paid love's utmost cost there is a margin of doubt left for the human soul; there is the possibility that the soul may be mistaken. There will be a haunting suspicion, arising from the depths of guiltiness within, which says, "How can I be sure? How can I risk everything upon God? How can I go down to my death and say, I lean wholly, confidently, triumphantly upon God? How can I be sure that there is no chance of failure, no remainder of doubt, no possibility that I may be wrong when I say God will even take sin and blot it out? How shall I know it unless the love on which I rest everything has proved itself to the very utmost degree?"

That cross, then, is necessary. If God would have the world roll its great heart upon his heart, it is necessary. If God would have the man who knows most of the bitterness of sin and the yearning of weakness bring his sin and his weakness to him, it is necessary. If God would have the widow with her streaming eyes, the parents that have lost their children, and the children their parents, come to him and say, "We have unutterable peace in thee," it is necessary. It is necessary that the Son of Man should suffer many things and be rejected and be killed, and be willing to endure it all for his love of men. But when that is done; when love, the love even of the Infinite, has reached the utmost possibility of love's sacrifice, then the world shall know God is sure, then it may come and rest all the weight of its sins, its apprehensions of disaster upon him; and he will change the dread into glad expectancy, and fear of his wrath into confident love of himself.

Peter's Failure to Understand.

The apostle Peter could not understand it. That one word, it is "necessary," did not convey its full meaning to him at first. All the wealth of suggestion that we now see wrapped in that intense phrase was lost to him. He heard it only from the outside. He thought that it meant simply the power of men to kill him, the liability of Jesus to defeat and death. He thereupon took, as it were, his Master by the sleeve and led him aside. When they had gone a few steps he began to protest in his Master's ears, and to say, "Lord, this be far from thee. Thou must not use language like that. Thou wilt destroy their faith. Thou wilt cloud their expectation. Thou wilt make their loyalty uncertain. Thou wilt bring to an end the work that is just being begun in the new-found confidence and enthusiasm of this group of disciples; if thou sayest thou art going to be defeated, how can we believe that thou art the Messiah? This be far from thee to speak in this way."

"Get thee behind me, Satan!" That word bursts like a thunderbolt out of a clear sky. Why was it spoken? Because the necessity of the death of Jesus is not in the hatred of men, but in the love of the Everlasting God. "Get thee behind me, Satan," for thou wouldst cloud that love. "Get thee behind me, Satan," for thou hast used my beloved apostle to tempt me to stand back from the horror in front of me, and so dim the shining of the light of the love of my Father, which is in heaven. "Get thee behind me, Satan," for thou, Peter, thinkest not according to the ways of God. Thou art judging of life and of death, even of crucifixion, as men judge it, and not as God intends it. Thou art not at his standpoint. Thou art not where he issues his commands which my soul hears and my soul shall obey. Thou art not in sympathy with the love that has appointed me to die. Thou only understandest the hatreds and the fears and the defeats, and the burials of men and of all their hopes. Thou thinkest not the things of God, but of men.

Our Sin Made His Death Necessary.

My friends, his death was necessary, because you and I had sinned. The world's sin is so terrific a fact that it needed that of which we have been thinking. Your sin and mine, do you see it not? Do you feel it not? You and I need it all the more if sin has so blinded us that we see it not, so dulled us that we feel it not. Your sin and mine is so awful a fact in the view of God that it needed that of which Christ spoke to his disciples. But, on the other hand, your forgiveness is so great in the thought of God that it is worth that. It was worth the while of the living God to undertake a transaction which today astounds the minds of men, and seems to large numbers of them incredible because it is so glorious. Your forgiveness was so great in his view that it was worth that sacrifice out of the depths of the heart of Jesus Christ. Have you and I known anything, tasted anything, of the glory of being forgiven? Have you and I ever looked into the full depths of the love of God in the cross of Jesus Christ and said, "There, that is the picture of my soul, of what my forgiveness means to my Father which is in heaven itself. If I do not appreciate it down here amid all this muddle and confusion and contemptible littleness of my life; if last week I walked under the sky of this love and never once beheld its glory; if I walked on last week with all the voices of God speaking to me of the wonder of his forgiveness and his cleansing love, and I loved other things far more, and something so much that I chose it instead of that—oh, how dark my soul is! How half-killed, or more than half, this heart of mine!"

Wake up, oh soul, this morning! Wake up to the news, the greatest news in the universe! Come, listen to the story of the perfect love, the world's dream, the world's hope, God's deed, God's gift unto men. Read the story as we shall read it together, not only in the printed page, but in the loving act, when the Church of Christ this morning breaks to us the bread of life, pours out to us the cup of love and says, "Eat of it, drink of it, all you who know the love of God. Realize yourself that he thinks of you now, that he looks in with a wondrous purpose upon your heart now, and that he intends you this morning to receive his love in this loving messenger, to go out to live your life again saying, "I walk in a sacred world, for all things are touched with the glory and the power and the light of the love of God in Jesus Christ my Lord, who for my sake suffered many things, and was rejected, and was killed, and after three days rose again."

"Who doeth good by loving deed or word,
Who lifteth up a fallen one or dries a tear,
Who helps another bear his heavy cross,
Or on the parched and fevered lips doth pour
A blessed draught of water, clear and cool,
Becomes coworker with the Lord of all,
Secures a rightful share in his success,
And the happiness that springs therefrom."

The Quarter's Lessons.

Genesis is a Greek word meaning origin. Not only have we in this quarter's lessons the story of the beginning of the world and of created things, but likewise we had an insight into the love of God as indicated in his revealing himself by uttered word, in order that his creature man might become wise unto salvation. Emphasis is laid upon the fact that man was created in God's image, to become a partaker of the divine nature, in order, as later revelation shows, to share the glory of God with the first-begotten Son forever. The workings of sin, the mistakes and discipline of men, by God's mercy, are all brought in this quarter's lessons.

Lesson 1. God the Creator of All Things—Gen. 1: 1-2: 3.

Golden text: In the beginning God.—Gen. 1: 1.
Topic: Beginnings.

Verse topics: 1—Creation of Matter. 2—Chaos and the Spirit. (The spiritual, not the natural, is the great source of all power and existence. God is a spirit.) 3-5—First Day. Divine Days. 6-8—Second Day. Separation of Waters. 9-13—Third Day. Clothed Continents. (The vegetable kingdom was a preparation for the higher animal kingdom, as plant organisms can live on mineral products and animals cannot.) 14-19—Fourth Day, the Clearing Skies. 20-23—Fifth Day. Origin of Life. 24-31—Sixth Day. Age of Mammals. 26—Divinity Reproduced. (This the last and crowning act of creation involved the calling forth of true sons and companions of God.) 27—Superlatively Favored. 28—The Family.

Lesson 2. Beginning of Sin and Redemption.

Golden text: Where sin abounded.—Rom. 5: 20.
Topic: Human Choices.

Verse topics: 1—Friendly Tempter. (As love of God is the basis of man's devotion, the Tempter would begin his attack by destroying this love.) 2—Parleying with Evil. 3—Restriction. 4—The Lie: No Harm. (His aim was to destroy faith in God by declaring his word to be a lie. Without remonstrance the woman listens.) 5—All these Give Thee. 6—Self-Gratification. (We do not mean to fall into evil ways, but only to taste.) 7—Shame in Sin. (They sought by their own efforts to cover their sin and shame. 8—The Evil Conscience. 9—Love Calling. 10—From Peace to Fear. 11—Seeks Confession. 12—Excuses for Self. (Blame upon every one but self Adam blames the woman, blames the creator of woman; the woman in verse 13 blames the serpent.) 13—The Truth Out. 14—A Horror to Man. 15—Promised Victory. (It is not a warfare without bruises and suffering; the trail of sin is marked by blood all through the Bible.)

Lesson 3. Noah Saved in the Ark—Gen. 8: 1-22

Golden text: Noah found grace—Gen. 6: 8.
Topic: Divine Salvation.

(Wherever Abram had a home, God must have an altar for sacrifices.) 9—The Journey.

Lesson 5. Abraham and Lot—Gen. 13: 1-18.

Golden text. Whatsoever ye would.—Matt. 7: 12.
Topic: Life Decisions.

Verse topics: 1-2—In Egypt. 3-4—Return to the Altar. (We, like Abraham, make our choice to keep close to God and his altar or like Lot we pitch our tent toward worldly Sodom.) 5-6—Rival Shepherds. 7—Works of Flesh. 8—The Walk of Faith. (The true child of faith is a peacemaker. "We be brethren," then let us act like brethren, for we need the love and the strength that grows out of union.) 9—Fruits of the Spirit. (To a man of faith in God's precious promises, nothing in this world is large enough to afford a basis for strife. He that kneels conquers.) 10—Walking by Sight. 11—A Ruinous Choice. (He journeyed away from God's altar and the influences of the godly.) 12—Moral Risks. 13—Contagious Conditions. (Lot subjected himself and family to moral contagion more hazardous than leprosy or smallpox.) 14-15—Reaping as Sowed. (Lot reaped the snares of the world; he lost property, family, honor, reputation; his life almost; he suffered in mind; he was overtaken by gross sin and at last lives in penury in a cave.) 16—Incredible Increase. 17—Gift Confirmed. 18—The Hebron Altar. (This is the third altar mentioned. Abraham became a light to the world.)

Lesson 6. God's Promise to Abraham—Gen. 15: 1-18.

Golden text: I am thy.—Gen. 15: 1.
Topic: Faith's Trials and Rewards.

Verse topics: 1—Shield of Jehovah. (With Jehovah as a shield, why fear what man can do. God wants us to be strong behind the shield of faith. 2-3—Trials of Faith. 4—Wait on the Lord. 5—Sign of the Stars. (To Abraham the stars became a sign of posterity. To us they are blessed signs of other promises. "They that trust many to righteousness shall shine as the stars forever." Dan. 12: 3.) 6—Faith's Deeper Renewal. (He will go on trusting and waiting for the blessing to come in God's own way and in God's own time.) 7—Deliverer from Idolatry. 8—Inquiring Faith. 9—Condescending Response. (Abraham shall know by the most high God binding himself in a pledge after the manner of men to perform his promise.) 10—Fruits of Faith. 11—Ravenous Birds. (Thus we should drive away the birds that devour the seed of the word. Matt. 13: 4-19.) 12-13—Egyptian Bondage. 14—Brighter Prospects. 15—Hope of Immortality. 16—Growth in Sin. 17—Covenant Ratified. 18—Conditions. (Had Israel's faith been equal to God's promises, the promised land might have been gained sooner and held longer.)

Lesson 7. Abraham's Intercession—Gen. 18: 16-33.

Golden text: The effectual, fervent.—Jas. 5: 16.
Topic: Availing Power.

Verse topics: 16—Entertaining Strangers. 17-18—Secret of the Lord. (What was hidden from worldly-minded Lot was disclosed to God-fearing Abraham.) 19—Ideal Patriarch. (Patriarch means the father ruler.) 20-22—Beloved Lot's Danger. (The worst slums in modern cities could not be so utterly fallen as was the city of Sodom.) 23—Friend of Sinners. (Abraham prayed and wept for Sodom as the Master prayed and wept for Jerusalem.) 24—Sin Very Grievous. (Sodom was like a gangrened limb which required to be amputated.) 25—Religious Judgment. 26—Salt of the Earth. 27—Holy Boldness. 28-29—Enlarging Vision. 30-31—(Nothing can better please God than when we show our interest in the great work of redemption, by working and praying for sinners.) 32—God's Patience. (Abraham ceased asking before God ceased answering. Every true prayer is answered, if not by a "yes," it is none the less answered, if by a "no.")

Lesson 8. Abraham and Isaac—Gen. 22: 1-14

Golden text: By Faith, Abraham.—Heb. 11: 17.

Topic: Living, not Dead Sacrifices.

Verse topics: 1—At Ease in Zion. 2—Test Assumes Form. (Just how God spake, we do not know. It was not as in verses 11, 12. Possibly it was the "still small voice.") 3—He staggered not. (God indeed meant that Abraham was to offer his son, but not as a bloody material sacrifice.) 4—The Mountain. 5—Abraham's Gethsemane. 6-7—Heroism of Faith. 8-9—Mountain-Moving Faith. 10—Hope Thou in God. 11—Voice out of Heaven. (It is enough. His offering of his heart's best, this living sacrifice, is regarded as a complete offering. Rom. 12:1.) 12—The Stayed Knife. (God thus forever condemns the inhuman superstition towards which all ancient ceremonials of sacrifice perpetually tended.) 13—Substitution. 14—The New Name. (As we offer our bodies a living sacrifice God, too, will provide.)

Lesson 9. Isaac, the Peacemaker—Gen. 26: 12-25.

Golden text: Blessed are the.—Matt. 5:9.

Topic: Living Sacrifice Exemplified.

Verse topics: 12—Seeding by Faith. 13—"Godliness is Profitable." 14—"The World's Enmity." 15—Acts of Hatred. 16—The Diplomatic King. (Unenlightened as he is, he yet knew the value of a kind and courteous request.) 17—The Living Sacrifice. (Here then was the offering acceptable to God. Isaac gave up the love of displaying power; home and property rights; his new farming prospects; the profits of his labor—all for peace. Rom. 12: 1.) 18—Honoring His Father. 19—Living Waters. ("In the valley" of humility richer wells of blessing are offered than on the hilltops of pride.) 20-21—Trial of Faith. 22—Faith's Reward. (Four times Isaac thus departs, but instead of a trail of blood, he leaves a trail of blessings, wells in a dry land.) 23—The Home Going. 24—The Comforter. (God never withholds his blessing from the one who comes with a living sacrifice. Rom. 12: 2.) 25—Sacrifice of Praise.

Lesson 10. Jacob Bethel—Gen. 28: 10-22.

Golden text: Surely the Lord.—Gen. 28: 16.

Topic: The Rescued Sinner.

Verse topics: 10—Sin-Broken Home. (From the days of Eden sin and its results have driven men from home.) 11—The Striving Spirit. 12—The Cry and Answer. (A ladder, a beautiful emblem showing that true progress is by slow course, step by step, in an upward direction.) 13—Love for Sinners. (The converted Cheater becomes the leading figure in sacred history, the partner of God in the fulfillment of the divine purpose.) 14—Midnight Promise. 15—Personal Nearness. 16-17—The Great Discovery. (Jacob found that God and his love were as surely present everywhere as the very atmosphere.) 18—Pledge of Gratitude. 19—In Remembrance. 20—Vow of Consecration. 21—Seeker of Peace. 22—Faith with Works. (Our religion ought to be worth as much to us as to Jacob.)

Lesson 11. Jacob a Prince with God—Gen. 32: 1-32.

Golden text: Man ought always.—Luke 18:1.

Topic: Victory Over Self.

Verse topics: 1-2—Headed for Canaan. 3-5—Embassy to Esau. 6-8—Alarming Response. (Jacob has now to reap from the sin he had sowed when he had cheated Esau many years before.) 9-12—Prayer with Planning. 13-20—Weapons of Peace. (True prayer with humility of heart leads Jacob to soften towards his brother in the desire to make reparation to his brother.) 21-23—A Busy Night. 24—The Seeming Adversary. (It was an angel and none other than God manifest in the flesh as verse 30 shows. This is an active parable teaching God's omnipotence and man's feebleness.) 25—Fighting Against God. 26—The Helpless Suppliant. (Jacob at last reaches the end of his conspicuous self-reliance.) 27—Confession of Sin. 28-29—The Answered Prayer. 30—Place of God's Face. (Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. Matt. 5: 18.)

Lesson 12. Temperance Lesson—Prov. 23: 29-35

Golden text: Wine is a mocker.—Prov. 20: 1.

Topic: Sacrificing to the God of Self.

Verse topics: 29—Rum has God's Hate. (The Bible is wholly against the sin of drunkenness which aims at the eternal damnation of souls. Wine is a poison; intoxicant is from the Latin "toxicum," poison.) 30—Questions Answered. (Drunkenness is after all an act of one's own choosing.) 31—Palatable Poison. (The wise man here advocates the only safe course. Indeed his words are a command; they prohibit.) 32—The Serpent's Poison. ("At the last," three short words, but of eternal moment.) 33—Horrors of Poisoning. (Delirium tremens in time is reached. Nothing can be more terrible than the sufferings at this stage of alcoholic poisoning.) 34—The Reeling Sot. 35—Contemptuous Speech. (This represents the drunkard as talking to himself.) "I will seek it again." (All will power is lost. Even a babe, if burned, shuns the fire, but the drunkard, burned by the fierce fire within, will seek it yet again.)

FIVE-MINUTE SERMON ON THE GOLDEN TEXT.

PETER AINSLIE.

EW things are so sweet to us as the memory of the mercy of the Lord. He is long-suffering. He has compassion. He is full of pity. He knows our weakness and he is plenteous in mercy. That is our God, and with such knowledge who would not have such a Father? The point of difference with the whole world is that some declare that he is such a God and others declare that he is not. It is not an argument I wish to raise, but I wish to set before you this one question: What is he to you? You know him and do you realize his mercy? It exists and the fact is beyond dispute. How are the circumstances with you? The ability to see depends upon fear. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge. We look above us, we look around us and we look within us and God's mercy is everywhere—beauty set in the world frame. For all our needs he has brought a remedy and he gives to us his best at the asking. We approach him in his way, we wait before him and sometimes unknowingly we receive the gift, or if it is delayed, it is not because he does not love or care, but he is building up in us a place for the promised grace or such a blessing is not then the need of the heart. Be willing to leave all things with him—just do, comply, and he is always faithful.

His mercy is from everlasting to everlasting—the richest rainbow in the world. Away back in the ages he was full of mercy, he is now and he always will be. The stream, if you wish such a figure, never ceases to flow—mercy widening like the river widens into the sea. He is the Father and you are the child. You may forget him, but he cannot forget you. He is always calling, always loving and his best is within a hand's touch. He has spelled out his mercy into all the languages of heaven and earth, and these shall all blend into a universal harmony. Nature, science and thought shall sit together as the trinity for the everlasting adoration of him whose mercy is eternal.

AN IDOLATER.

The baby has no skies
But mother's eyes,
Nor any God above
But mother's love.
His angel sees the Father's face,
But he the mother's, full of grace;
And yet the heavenly kingdom is
Of such as this.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR.

CHARLES BLANCHARD.

THE GROWING KINGDOM.

Topic Sept. 29: Ref. Ps. 72: 1-20.

HIS is one of the beautiful Messianic prophecies. No doubt it was a prayer for Solomon in its primary intent, but its marvelous sweep forbids the conclusion that it referred wholly to the earthly kingdom of Israel. It is a dream of world empire beyond Nebuchadnezzar, or Alexander, or Caesar, or Charlemagne, or Napoleon. One of the striking characteristics of the Hebrew prophecies is the daring dream of universal dominion. It is the more remarkable from the small extent of area of Palestine proper, and of the kingdom of David and Solomon in its widest scope. Surely the seers of Israel saw beyond the limitations of physical boundaries and forces, and caught some glimpses of the glory of Messiah's kingdom, whose dominion is from sea to sea and from the river unto the ends of the earth.

There is inspiration in the thought of this universal reign of Immanuel. Once this majestic idea enters the mind and possesses the heart, the life is forever lifted up thereby. This conception is the basis of the true missionary spirit. It is in harmony with the great commission of the risen Christ. O that all our endeavors and all our churches might get this vision of the glorious reign of our glorified Redeemer! In our talk of expansion and of commercial supremacy let us not forget that the only true glory and conquest comes by way of the cross. Christ and him crucified is still the wisdom this old world needs in the commercial centers of America, Europe, China, as in Corinth in Paul's time.

"An Handful of Corn."

"There shall be an handful of corn in the earth upon the top of the mountains; the fruit thereof shall shake like Lebanon; and they of the city shall flourish like grass of the earth." It is suggestive that Jesus used the figure of the sower of the grain to represent the growth of his kingdom. It is to be thus natural, quiet, yet marvelous in its increase. The figure of the handful of wheat sown in the earth upon the top of the mountains is most striking as a picture of the wonderful development of Christ's kingdom. The fruit thereof shall shake like Lebanon. It is the picture of waving fields of golden grain upon the mountains, overflowing into the valleys, until all should be blessed by the miraculous increase. The cities should share in this general prosperity.

Mountain Top Blessings.

What we need—what our churches and Endeavor societies need—are mountain-top views of Christ's kingdom, mountain-top blessings of spiritual enthusiasm in his service. We need this as a preparation for the humdrum or hurry-flurry of our modern diversified life. Spiritual vision is the greatest need of the average church member today. We have commercial vision, and talk of American commercial growth and supremacy; but our vision of Christ is dimmed. O that David's prayer might become ours: "Blessed be his glorious name forever! And let the whole earth be filled with his glory! Amen and amen!"

THE QUIET HOUR.

[The International Bible Reading Association Daily Readings.]

BY THE REV. ALEXANDER SMELLIE, M. A.

JACOB AT BETHEL.

"And Jacob awakened out of his sleep, and he said, Surely the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not."—Genesis 28: 16.

Monday—Genesis 28—1-9.

It has been said that Satan is not an independent power, like God, existent from eternity. He is a created being; he is a fallen spirit; he is an archangel who has transmuted himself into an archfiend. Therefore he cannot originate; he can only defile and injure. He is, as the Schoolmen called him, Dei simius, the ape of God; and all that he has ever done has been a caricaturing and marring of what God has done before him. His tares are his miserable copy of God's fine wheat.

I see much the same thing in the way in which ungodly men imitate many of the actions of the Christian. Esau does what Jacob has done, but does it in a blundering and unsatisfactory fashion. The words, the practices, the manner of life, of the child of God cannot be assumed by the outsider; when the attempt is made—it is sure to break down—there will at best be only a distortion and a parody. I must be inside the family myself; I must be taught from above; I must be inhabited and controlled by the divine Spirit. I cannot trick myself out in the trappings and lineaments of the saint.

Tuesday—Genesis 28—10-22.

A runaway from home, a self-banished outcast, a clever and over-reaching schemer—he does not seem a likely person to receive the benediction of the King of kings. A rocky desert, a barren and forsaken spot—it is not the place where I should expect God to reveal himself in grace and mercy and peace.

Ah, but it is just when my heart is most consciously guilty, is aware that by all its planning and skill and effort it has only brought on itself misery and ruin, is bewailing the exceeding sinfulness of its sin, is at its wit's end, that he comes near, to pardon, to deliver, to cleanse, to crown. When my night is darkest, and neither moon nor stars appear, God is closest to me.

And is there any spot on earth where I may not see the ladder and the angels? No. In the bleak wilderness, and down in the heart of the city slum, and in the very midst of thronging temptations, and in the darkened room where I sit beside my dead—anywhere, everywhere, God may seek me out and bless me. And then, I praise his name.

Wednesday—Genesis 27—6-17.

Isaac and Rebekah are not blameless in the matter of their children's sins. If their home is religious, it is not thoroughly religious. The father is too easy-going, the mother too crafty. God is not "a Presence felt the livelong day, a wholesome Fear at night." Let me give my children a home frankly and avowedly Christian.

I owe it to the nation. The well-being of the commonwealth is broadbased on the love and the truthfulness and the purity of the family circle.

I owe it to the Church. Why is it that, with all her activities, the Church does not make the progress she should? One reason is that the life of her members in their own households is not always a godly life.

And I owe it to the children themselves. I give them strength for the conflict of faith, power over temptation, brightness and joy, an invigorating discipline preparing them for wider fields of action, when I teach them by my own example to find in God their Friend. And certainly I owe it to Christ.

Thursday—Genesis 27—18-29.

I would abhor Jacob's secret sin of deceit. I would be true.

God in his grace has given me a great name, that of Christian, and I must not stain it by anything mean or unworthy.

I would be true to my friend. He expects it of me, this honesty, this honor, this conscience, lie at the basis of our relationship. He deserves it of me; he has treated me well, he has shown his love in a hundred ways, and I make a shameful return if I mislead him.

I would be true to my God. I would not bring him any shows and semblances, any tinsel and fraud. I would not profess an affection for him which I do not feel.

Friday—Genesis 27—30-40.

My heart bleeds for Esau: he has to be content with a poor and paltry second-best. But he has himself to blame. He has shown himself so crass, so earthly, so blind to what is spiritual and holy.

Often there comes a time in a careless and godless life when it is roused to understand the value of the blessing which hitherto it has despised and neglected and refused. Sometimes, alas! the awakening is too late. The blessing is gone. God, having been often rejected, has passed on his way. His Spirit does not always strive. His grace is not always available.

But many a time the awakening leads to good results. If I cannot, after turning away again and again from what is high and heavenly, after bestirring myself only at the eleventh, or the ninth, or the seventh hour, do everything for God I might have done, and receive from him every gift I might have received, still his pardon may be mine, his favor, his friendship, his love.

Best it is when I am his from the outset. Best it is to yield myself to God in his own Now—Now, the acceptable time, the day of full and free and eternal salvation.

Saturday—Genesis 35—1-15.

Jacob is sent back to Bethel—back to where he met with God at first. My Christianity should be continually progressive. It should leave what is behind, and reach forward to what is before. Today should be better than yesterday, and tomorrow better than today. I ought not to need the return to Bethel. I ought to be perpetually advancing to new revelations, new experiences, new achievements, new benedictions.

But—let me say it with regret and shame—it is not so, I retrograde. I lose my first love, and forget my first works. I turn aside into By-path Meadow. I linger in the delicate plain called Ease. I fall asleep in the Enchanted Ground. There are sad halts, relapses, falls, in my progress.

Yet how good is my God to me! Since I will not go steadfastly forward in his name and through his grace, he conducts me back to Bethel. He converts me a second time. He restores my soul. He says to me, "I heal thy backslidings, and now, my child, run the race once more courageously and unflinchingly, looking unto Jesus."

Sunday—Isaiah 41—8-14.

Jacob is not one of the sublimest and most heroic of the chosen people; he does not stand on the same level as Abraham or Joseph or Moses or David or Isaiah. Yet here is God, many hundred years after his death, still associating himself with him, and still making gracious mention of his name. It is a lesson of abundant encouragement to me.

Suppose that I have no dazzling genius, that my lips stammer and falter, that my home is in a quiet place, that the offerings are small which I can consecrate to the kingdom and the King, that my mistakes and sins are many, he does not forget me, he keeps me in continual remembrance, he diadems me with a glory I do not merit. "If there be first a willing mind," he assures my heart, "it is accepted according to that which a man hath."

General Church News

A MISSIONARY CONFERENCE IN THE LEVANT.

An interdenominational missionary conference was held at Brummana in Syria, August 13-18. Professor Samuel Ives Curtiss of the Chicago Theological Seminary who has been traveling in the Holy Land, was present at it and writes of having greatly enjoyed the meetings. Over 200 missionaries were in attendance. They came from Palestine, Syria and Asia Minor. Some from Egypt were prevented from coming by a ten days' quarantine that was in effect at the time.

The general subject of the conference was "The Privileges and Possibilities of a Life in Christ." Rev. F. B. Meyer preached with great power and blessing. Papers were given by various missionaries on "The Ideal Missionary," and "Missionary Contact and Training of Evangelists," etc. Bible work, Christian literature, Sunday schools and Young Men's Christian Association work received attention. Rev. H. H. Jessup, D. D., spoke of the theological school for all Arabic-speaking missions in the Levant. One of the services on Sunday was conducted in the Arabic language. Devotional services were held at sunset each evening, led by different missionaries.

The inspiration for work and the practical helpfulness of conferences such as these between the representatives of the various missions can hardly be estimated. They are invaluable in their results, the sympathetic co-operation engendered thereby being particularly stimulating and enjoyable to the more or less isolated missionaries.

Rev. F. B. Meyer on his return from this conference expressed the belief that a great work is being accomplished by the missionaries in Syria in the training of native Christians to carry the gospel to their countrymen. The Beyrout Protestant College has now 500 students and the city itself has been transformed by the efforts of American missionaries.

A SUGGESTIVE BIBLE-SCHOOL INSTITUTE.

A Bible-school institute of a week's duration recently held at Toulon, Ill., in the church of which Rev. E. W. Hicks is pastor, was particularly helpful. Several persons attended from neighboring churches. Some details of the program will, we think, prove suggestive to other churches and schools.

At 9:30 a. m. each day there was analytical study of the Book of Acts, each person under the direction of the leader making an independent study so as to learn how to study any book of the Bible. At 10:30 an hour was given to lesson preparation and teaching methods. Reasons why certain methods are right or wrong were shown. How to gain attention, to make an impression on the scholar, to question and to illustrate, were considered, and correct principles given. Especial attention was devoted to successful primary teaching. At 11:30 a. m. there was an open conference for general discussion and miscellaneous questions.

Childhood and child nature were the topics taken up at 2:30 p. m., especial use being made of "Picture Work," by Prof. Walter Hervey and "The Point of Contact" by Patterson Du Bois. The purpose, organization, management and program of the Sunday school or Bible school was next considered, including the home class department. Practical plans for grading, graduation and post-graduate work were taught.

Each evening was occupied by a consideration of some phase of Bible-school evangelism for half an hour, followed by a lecture. The topics of the lectures were as follows: "Jesus as a Teacher"; "How We Got Our Bible"; "What Manner of Child Shall this Be?"; "Studying the Bible As a Whole"; and "The Training of the Conscience." There was a different lecturer each evening.

The work of many Sunday schools would doubtless be much stimulated and helped by the attendance of its teachers upon an institute similar to this. There is a growing demand for more fully trained Sunday school teachers.

A GOOD SHOWING BY THE DISCIPLES IN IOWA.

The annual meeting of the Iowa Christian convention was held in Cedar Rapids, Ia., September 10-12. It opened with an address by Rev. George L. Snively of St. Louis, recently elected secretary of the National Benevolent Association. It was a masterful speech abounding in quotations from sacred and profane literature to establish the truth that the Church must care for the aged, the sick and the orphans in order to carry out the principles of the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ. Addresses were also made by Rev. G. W. Muckley and Rev. B. L. Smith from full minds and hearts.

The work done by the convention this year is evidenced in the following statistics: Ten new congregations organized; twenty-four churches dedicated; cost of same, $95,200; nine buildings in process of erection; number of conversions, 427; accessions, 543; Bible schools organized, ten. This is certainly a first-class showing of work accomplished in one year.

A departure from the usual course was the organization of a Bible school convention; William Orr, of Clarinda, being made president, and Rev. W. B. Clemmer, of Des Moines, secretary. An evangelist is to be put in the field; the fund for the support of his work being raised by the Bible schools of the state and individual gifts. Mr. Bryan, a leader of Bible schools in Missouri, was largely the inspirer of this new movement. Drake University Bible school was requested to establish a correspondence normal course for Bible school workers.

Another new feature in this convention was the forming of an assembly to be known as "An Assembly of the Churches of Christ in Iowa." Its principal object is to protect the churches from unworthy members. It is to be an incorporated body, with an elaborate constitution and a corps of very efficient officers: President, Rev. J. M. Rudy; secretary, Rev. I. S. Carter; and treasurer, Rev. J. H. Ragan. The board of trustees consists of one member from each missionary district. The membership is constituted of those preachers in the state who pass muster, sign the constitution and pay a membership fee of $1 per annum.

Drake University and its work was the theme of speeches by Dean Haggard, Prof. Lockhart and Chancellor Craig. Ex-Governor Drake will give the last $50,000 of the first $100,000 of the half million additional endowment now being raised. The aim is to

PASTY FOOD

Too Commonly Used.

The use of pasty cereals is not advisable. A physician says: "Pasty cereals are very indigestible and a bad thing for the stomach, causing a depressed feeling and quite a train of disorders, particularly of the intestines and nerves.

Cereals, such as wheat and oats, can be cooked long enough and well enough to fit them for human use, but the ordinary way of cooking leaves them in a pasty condition."

A gentleman from Evansville, Ind., whose name can be secured upon application to the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich., says: "My physician prohibited the use of oats and wheat for I was in a bad condition physically, with pronounced dyspepsia. He said the heavy paste was indigestible but that Grape-Nuts, being a thoroughly cooked food and cooked in such a manner as to change the starch into grape-sugar, could be easily digested. I have become very fond indeed of Grape-Nuts and all the uncomfortable feelings have disappeared. I have gained nearly twelve pounds in weight and none of the distressed, full feeling after my meals that I had formerly. Grape-Nuts Food has done the work."

make this institution owned and controlled by the Disciples, a great university. The chancellor reported two gifts of $10,000 each and a number of smaller gifts. The convention ordered ten per cent of all missionary money paid to Drake and pledged its hearty support, regarding this university as the greatest missionary force of the state.

The sermons of the convention this year were given by Rev. L. H. Stine of Quincy, Ill., and were of high literary merit, spiritual and sound.

All in all the convention was the best of many years.

The Christian Woman's Board of missions reported contributions of $6,729.88 for the year, with $806.28 from the young people. This is a gain of $836.28 in the total over last year. Thirty-five auxiliaries are on the Roll of Honor, having averaged five cents per month per member for state work. The total amount of money raised in the state for all purposes, including subscriptions for the Tidings, local expenses of auxiliaries and state fund, makes a grand total of $9,400.81.

CHICAGO AND VICINITY.

Rev. H. B. Hazen, late pastor at Beaver Falls, Penna., but now studying at the Chicago Divinity school, has undertaken the pastorate of the South Park Baptist church.

Rev. William T. Meloy, D. D., presented Sunday, September 8, his resignation as pastor of the First United Presbyterian church, after almost twenty-four years of service. He is the second oldest Protestant clergyman in point of service in this city. He was called to Chicago in April, 1878. He found the church deeply in debt and with a membership of only fifty-nine. He has since seen eight churches grow from that seed. In all his twenty-four years of service he has had but one vacation, when he made a three months' tour in Europe.

Several of the Chinese Sunday schools of this city, including those of the Eighth Presbyterian, First Congregational, Covenant and Mrs. Waters' Mission, held a union picnic in Douglas Park two weeks ago. About one hundred Christian Chinamen, with their wives and children, enjoyed the outing.

Belden avenue Presbyterian church held tent services on the church lawn during the first ten days of September. Rev. Dr. Carrier, the pastor, conducted the two Sunday evening services and Dr. D. B. Greigg preached on the other evenings. Many Christians were quickened and others brought to recognize the claims of the gospel.

The Rev. Messrs. Morrill, regularly ordained Baptist ministers and graduates of the Baptist Theological Seminary at Rochester, N. Y., are carrying on a unique work among the sailors of the Great Lakes. They have built a gospel ship out on the prairie which looks like a stranded vessel. Inside are a number of small rooms and one large one which will seat nearly 1,000 people. Here services are held or in summer weather on the deck. There is a kitchen in the stern where free meals are served to the needy. The Morrill Brothers also have a gospel wagon in which they visit the slums. They have previously been engaged in mission work in British seaports and in the slums of New York.

The membership of the Lexington Avenue Baptist church is now 489, a fact which demonstrates the need for the larger building which it is hoped to begin this fall. The present edifice only seats 300.

Rev. T. M. Colwell, who died September 4, was one of four brothers in the ministry. He had been pastor of Baptist churches at Barry and Mendota, Ill., and in Lowell, Mass. The sermon will be preached by Rev. S. Parkes Cadman of Brooklyn, and the other speakers are men of note or workers in important fields. Entertainment will be provided for officers, speakers, life members and duly elected delegates from the churches. Applications for entertainment should be made early to Wm. Spooner, chairman of the entertainment committee. Information will be cheerfully given by Rev. Wm. E. Barton, D. D., pastor of the First church, and chairman of the committee of arrangements.

MORE BOXES OF GOLD.

And Many Greenbacks.

To secure additional information directly from the people, it is proposed to send little boxes of gold and greenbacks to persons who write the most interesting, detailed, and truthful descriptions of their experience on the following topics:

1. How have you been affected by coffee drinking and by changing from coffee to Postum.

2. Do you know any one who has been driven away from Postum because it came to the table weak and characterless at the first trial?

3. Did you set such a person right regarding the easy way to make Postum clear, black, and with a crisp, rich taste?

4. Have you ever found a better way to make it than to use four heaping teaspoonsful to the pint of water, let stand on stove until real boiling begins, then note the clock and allow it to continue easy boiling full 15 minutes from that time, stirring down occasionally? (A piece of butter about the size of a navy bean, placed in the pot will prevent boiling over.)

5. Give names and account of those you know to have been cured or helped in health by the dismissal of coffee and the daily use of Postum Food Coffee in its place.

6. Write names and addresses of 20 friends whom you believe would be benefited by leaving off coffee. (Your name will not be divulged to them.)

Address your letter to the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich., writing your own name and address clearly.

Be honest and truthful, don't write poetry or fanciful letters, just plain, truthful statements.

Decision will be made between October 30th and November 10th, 1901, by three judges, not members of the Postum Cereal Co., and a neat little box containing a $10 gold piece sent to each of the five best writers, a box containing a $5 gold piece to each of the 20 next best writers, a $2 greenback to each of the 100 next best, and a $1 greenback to each of the 200 next best writers, making cash prizes distributed to 325 persons.

Almost every one interested in pure food and drink is willing to have their name and letter appear in the papers, for such help as it may offer to the human race. However, a request to omit name will be respected.

Every friend of Postum is urged to write and each letter will be held in high esteem by the company, as an evidence of such friendship, while the little boxes of gold and envelopes of money will reach many modest writers whose plain and sensible letters contain the facts desired, although the sender may have but small faith in winning at the time of writing.

Talk this subject over with your friends and see how many among you can win prizes. It is a good, honest competition and in the best kind of a cause. Cut this statement out for it will not appear again.

At the last service every foot of space in the hall was occupied. The collection was taken up in the cigar box in which the poker chips were kept. The young people of one family desired to be baptized, but supposed there was a fee of $10 for each baptism, so they agreed to let the youngest sister, an invalid, be baptized alone. ## CHRISTIAN MELODIES

BY PROF. WM. J. KIRKPATRICK

Professor Wm. J. Kirkpatrick, the author of CHRISTIAN MELODIES, is one of the leading and best known gospel song writers in the world today. His songs have been sung the world over in almost every town. Some of his songs have been translated and sung in all languages. He has the advantage of many years of experience as a musician and song writer, and has put the best productions of his life time, as well as the best songs of the principal song writers of the country, into CHRISTIAN MELODIES. This certainly insures for this book the greatest variety and the best quality of songs.

"Book of Rarest Musical Gems"

This is the universal pronouncement of all musicians who have used or examined this new and popular song book. All responses from those using the book are enthusiastic praises. "Best book of the kind I have ever seen." "The more we use it the better we like it." "Gets better all the time," etc. These are samples of expressions received. No other book on the market approaches it as an all-purpose church song book. It is mechanically perfect, neat, artistic and durable. Contains 192 pages and 227 songs.

Choicest Songs of the Century

Every song writer has a few favorite songs—or those which he regards as his best—and which make for the author his reputation. Every musician has also his own peculiar style. A book written principally by one man does not excel, as it has no variety of style and but few very good songs. In CHRISTIAN MELODIES eighty leading song writers have contributed their favorite or best songs. This insures not only a collection of the most excellent songs, but also the greatest variety of style. This is why people never grow tired of the songs in CHRISTIAN MELODIES. Besides its large number of the latest songs it contains a great many of the old songs that have become popular favorites and never die.

No expense was spared in the production of this book. The best songs were secured regardless of their cost. Many very good songs were rejected because not good enough. No other book shows such care and judgment in excluding the inferior and including only the best. No cheap devices or make shifts, such as rivets, were used in binding. It is a hand sewed book, which is the best and most expensive style of binding. If you want the most popular, best wearing and most satisfactory all-around song book get Christian Melodies, pronounced by all, "A Book of Gems."

man, of the Presbytery of Ferrukhabad baptized 270 adults.

United States Consul Robert McWade, in a report from Swatow, China, dealing with the plague, pays the following tribute to the American missionaries:

"It is due to our self-sacrificing missionaries that I should report to you that nowhere in any of the plague-stricken sections, towns or villages, have any of them faltered in their labors. When the awful pestilence was doing its deadly work there, they could be found ministering to those in the early stages of the disease and comforting and consoling the dying. I found the same conditions, the same heroism, when smallpox and cholera were epidemic. Leprosy is always here—contagious and repulsive. Its victims experienced the same tender and solicitous care from the fearless American missionaries of all denominations. During my visits to the leper villages or settlements on the outskirts of Canton I invariably hear of this good work and see many evidences of it. We have every reason to feel proud of our missionaries, men and women."

Growth in the grace of giving is noticeable in China among the Chinese converts. Several months ago, Dr. Denman invited written questions from all members of the Chieng Rai City congregation. Of those submitted, the majority pertained to the matter of giving. These questions elicited a series of sermons, and gave occasion for many private talks on the subject of proportionate giving. At first there was some opposition, especially from the oldest and only wealthy elder (wealthy from the Laos standpoint). But gradually he and the rest have been led by the Spirit. When the matter of a church building was agitated, this elder agreed to be one of three to give collectively as much as all the rest of the congregation put together. In addition to this, an offering was made for the India famine sufferers, to which the native contribution was eight rupees plus. A few of our members tithe, and one man does more. Without any missionary coaching whatever, he recently brought Rs. 10 to the church treasurer and said he wanted to pay the Lord what he owed him; said he had just sold six cattle, and had previously dedicated one of them to the Lord. It is evident that it was not the runt that was dedicated, for the whole six brought only Rs. 51, while the Lord's cow alone brought Rs. 10. As this man is poor, having almost nothing outside the money received for these cattle, and as his bright-eyed but shy little girl brings bananas to sell to us on Fridays and Saturdays to get pennies to give to the Lord on Sunday, it is evident that this man is at least a double tither.

At Durban, Africa, in the Zulu mission the evening school is booming. In two weeks the number on the roll leaped from thirty and forty to 150 and the average attendance is so large as to require the employment of assistants. One boy who began with the alphabet was in two months able to begin reading the Testament. Such a school labors under two serious disadvantages. The boys cannot come until 7 or 7:30 o'clock, and yet unless furnished with a pass they must be in their barracks, often a mile distant, by the 9 o'clock curfew. Again having but one room which must also be used for church meetings, the school can be held but three nights a week. The fees are therefore necessarily low and do not cover the cost of teachers. How the deficit is to be met is a question; but there should be no question about placing this department on a sure footing.

A beginning is reported in one of the outstations of Smichov, Austria, through the agency of a yeast peddler, an ignorant and illiterate woman, not a Christian, who, during the winter months, used to borrow Christian books and in the evenings her neighbors would gather, each contributing a mite toward the needed kenosene, and a farmer of the village would read aloud. In such ways the seed is sown.

How to Work for Christ. A Compendium of Effective Methods. By R. A. Torrey. Fleming H. Revell Co. 518 pages. Price $2.50.

This encyclopedic work by the superintendent of the Moody Institute of Chicago has much to commend it. It is plainly and incisively written; it gives the results of a wide experience; it does not deal with theories, but with conditions; it affords specific directions regarding things upon which many wish to be informed, and about which the writer has earned the right to speak. Mr. Torrey is a sublime dogmatist. He knows whereof he affirms. No shade of doubt or hesitancy rests upon his utterances. Perspective he has none. That there may be another side to the question which he is discussing seldom occurs to him; and if it does he brushes the thought aside without ceremony. This makes his method of presentation simple and easy; but with thinking people it discounts the value of his utterances as a teacher and leader.

The title of the book is something of a misnomer. It ought to have read "How to Work for Christ Along Evangelistic Lines," for that is the subject of which it treats. As to the question of how to work for Christ along the quieter and humbler paths of everyday life, it has nothing to say. There are many devoted Christians whose lives are filled to the brim with service for the Master, who on reading this book would be forced to say, "If this is all that is meant by working for Christ, then we are not in it." They have heard no divine voice calling them off to evangelistic work. Their field of service lies in other directions.

But within its self-imposed limits this is a helpful book. It is a compendium of methods which Dr. Torrey has found effective, and which many may find suggestive. It deals, however, too much with commonplace details, and has little or nothing to say of underlying principles. The things laid down with much elaboration are generally the things which common sense would suggest. This may, after all, be a merit, as most people require to be reminded of the value of the common. The book is divided into three parts. Part one deals with personal work and shows how to get hold of different classes of people so as to bring them to Christ. Under this head something more ought to have been said about bringing Christ to men; for it is the kind of Christ who is preached that determines the drawing power of the truth, and the results which will follow when men are brought to him. Part two treats of methods of Christian work, such as house-to-house visitation, cottage meetings, open-air meetings, revival meetings, etc. Here much sensible advice is given. Part three deals with teaching and preaching the Word of God. This is a treatise on homiletics. It shows how to prepare a sermon, and gives samples of the kind of sermons which should be prepared. In these sermonic outlines there is little that is suggestive of the modern spirit, or of the inbreathing of the free Spirit of God. They are narrow in their thought, and yet their very narrowness gives them a sort of intensity and power.

This book comes out at an opportune time, when plans are being made for the winter's work. And while many will find it outside of the sphere of things in which they live and work, others will find in it stimulus and direction. Like every other book which deals with methods, it will be useful to those who can use it.

The Divine Pursuit, by John Edgar McFadyen, B. A., M. A., Professor of Old Testament Literature and Exegesis, Knox College, Toronto. Fleming H. Revell Co. 209 pages.

This is a notable book. It consists of a series of devout, thoughtful and suggestive meditations which it is a joy to read. Every page is rich in poetic fancy and in spiritual insight, and is fragrant with the spirit of true devotion.

The first impression received from reading this book is that in style and in the general trend of its thought it resembles the devotional works of Dr. George Matheson. A comparison is therefore inevitable, and no higher praise can be given than that it does not suffer by the comparison.

It is said by publishers that the demand for devotional books is not as large as it was a few years ago. This is partly the result of the flooding of the market with cheap and thin devotional books, made up of pious platitudes. The demand for devotional books of the high quality of "The Divine Pursuit" is sure to return, for what the Church needs, she will ultimately want.

We have already enriched our pages with several chapters taken from advance sheets of this book. We give elsewhere in this issue one more extract, which will afford a fair sample of the excellence of its contents.

"Romanizing Tendencies in the Episcopal Church" is the title of a trenchant sermon by Rev. Thos. Dowling, D. D., of Los Angeles, Cal. Dr. Dowling does not condemn ritualism in itself, but its abuse. He notes with alarm the introduction of the errors of Romanism into a church which has been called "the bulwark of Protestantism."

Here is one specimen among many which is published by the League of the Holy Cross, and circulated by thousands in the Church of England, in which the priest is put before the very father and mother, and the child is taught as follows: "It is to the priest only that the child must acknowledge his sins if he desires that God should forgive him. Do you know why? It is because God, when on earth, gave to his priests, and to them alone, the divine power of forgiving sins. Go to the priest, who is the doctor of your soul and who cures you in the name of God. I have known poor children who concealed their sins in confession for years; they were very unhappy; were tormented with remorse, and if they had died in that state they would certainly have gone to the everlasting fires of hell."

The church that can tolerate such teaching within its borders is in a bad way.

Little Things.

"Only a smile, yes, only a smile
That a woman o'erburdened with grief Expected from you: 'Twould have given her relief,

For her heart ached sore the while;
But weary and cheerless she went away,

Because, as it happened, that very day
You were 'out of touch' with your Lord.

"Only a word, yes, only a word
That the Spirit's small voice whispered
'Speak;'

But the worker passed onward un-blessed and weak,

Whom you were meant to have stirred

To courage, devotion and love anew, Because when the message came to you,

You were 'out of touch' with your Lord.

"Only a song, yes, only a song
That the Spirit said, 'Sing to-night, Thy voice is thy Master's by purchased right;'

But you thought, 'Mid this motley throng

I care not to sing of the city of gold—
And the heart that your words might have reached grew cold,

You were 'out of touch' with your Lord.

"Only a day, yes, only a day!
But oh, can you guess, my friend,
Where the influence reaches, and where it will end,

Of the hours that you frittered
away?

The Master's command is, 'Abide in Me;'

And fruitless and vain will your service be

If 'out of touch' with your Lord."

"All There."

Perhaps the most valuable suggestion that can be made here to the great host of students about entering or re-entering schools of various grades, is that they gather up all their energies for the one thing before them. If young people begin their school work, planning at the same time to be a "social success," to have a great many evenings for pleasure, or to be active in all the games and recreations of their companions who are not in school, they will not likely make the year a very profitable one. Half-heartedness never accomplished much that is worth while.

It was a saying of Goethe, in German, "Wo du bist, sei alles"—"Where-ever thou art, be all there." Whatever you are going to do give your whole self to it. Some people never get more into any work they do, even into their than a fraction of their whole selves play. It would be a good thing if every pupil in any school this year should determine to be all there—to put all his life into his studies. This does not mean that he must renounce all pleasure, that he must be a recluse, a dull bookworm, that he must miss many good things he would like to have. It means only that he will make his school work the first thing, that he will determine to master every problem, that he will falter at no hard task, that he will not trifle nor loiter, that he will shirk no duty, no responsibility, that he will always do his best.

At the last commencement in one of our colleges, there was one member of the senior class who failed to receive his diploma. It was said by the professors and by his classmate that he was by no means a dullard, that his failure was not for want of capacity, but that his dishonor was the legitimate outcome of his indolence. From the beginning of his college course he was never "all there" in anything he undertook. This was as true of his social life and of his play as it was of his studies. He never brought more than half of himself to anything. If he had failed after doing his best, solely because of his lack of natural ability, there would have been no dishonor in his missing the prize. As it was, however, there was nothing to palliate the humiliation of his failure.

What has been said about school life applies as well to all kinds of work and duty. Many people are taking a new start this month. Many college and university graduates are beginning their life-work in the world. Indeed it will do no harm to any one, young or old, to make a fresh beginning, and here is the lesson for all: Give your whole self to it. Whatever may have been possible a generation or two since, it is not possible now, in this first year of the twentieth century, to make anything worth while of one's life without putting all one's energy into the striving. "Wherever thou art, be all there."—Forward.

Any Other Way.

"A telegram for Miss Archer."

Every head in the schoolroom was lifted in quick surprise and expectation. Florence Archer left her desk and went forward, with changing color, to receive the yellow envelope whose seal so often covers faithful messages.

The message was clear and concise, but entirely inexplicable; "Take the 9 P. M. express on P. & B. Meet me at Fluvanna Junction, 8 A. M. to-morrow, Thursday."

The rest of the day was spent in hurried preparation. Many of Miss Archer's friends opposed her going; even Miss Hall, the principal, seemed doubtful.

"Surely, my dear, your father did not know the difficulties in the way, or he never would have made such a plan for you. Does he know that you will have to drive twelve miles after dark to meet this 9 o'clock express?"

"Certainly, he does, Miss Hall. Father is perfectly familiar with all these routes," answered Florence, who continued her preparations amid the protests of her friends.

"Please, girls," she cried at last in desperation, "don't mention the subject again. My father is the wisest man I know; he is the kindest man I know; if there had been any other way better than this, he would have chosen that way. I am sure that he has made the best plan that could be made for me under the circumstances. Now you must help and not hinder me."

This decided stand silenced Florence's troublesome advisers; it silenced her own doubts and anxieties for the time.

At last she was ready for the first stage of her journey. It was very cold and dark when she started for her drive. Part of the way the road was a narrow pass round the base of a cliff on the right, with a deep gorge on the left. Florence got out again and again and walked over the most dangerous places, while the driver led his horses.

"How could my father give me such a journey?" she thought and again she settled it with the loving answer of faith: "If there had been any other way that was better, father would have taken that way."

Altogether, it was a most uncomfortable and tiresome journey and it was not until the lazy winter sun of another day had gotten up, that Florence reached Fluvanna Junction.

Then from her father's strong, loving arms she was set down in a "Vestibule Limited" and the first face to greet her there was her dear mother's.

When the three were comfortably seated, the father said:

"Now, little daughter, I am prepared to answer questions without stint; but first let me ask one: What did you say when you read the telegram?"

"Of course I was surprised, father," she said.

"Of course."

"Of course I was perplexed."

"No doubt."

"I did wonder a little why you hadn't told me more about it."

"Very naturally."

"Then"—Florence's sweet face was as bright as the new day—"then I just said to them all: 'My father has done the best he could; if there had been any other way for him to do that was better, he would have done that way!'"

Her fond father gave her a bear's hug; then Florence heard the story:

Her mother, whose health was delicate, had been ordered to Florida and had agreed to go only on the condition that Florence should go with her. But the very day the decision was reached word came from the weather bureau that a big storm and a big drop in temperature were traveling in from the west.

"We had to outrun that storm, you see, Florence, for the mother's sake; and the only way to get you in our possession was to give you that disagreeable night journey," said her father.

"Was it disagreeable?" asked Florence, lying back in delicious repose. "I had forgotten it. I would take a dozen such journeys gladly, to go on such a lark with you and mother."

"I might have explained the situation, but there was no time for a letter," continued her father, "and even a long and costly telegram would have left you uneasy, for you would have feared that I was keeping back something."

"I am sure I should."

"So my child, I deliberately chose for you the physical discomfort and the mental perplexity."

"Your way was the very best possible, father," said the happy daughter.

Florence accepted thankfully and joyously her happy winter. But as the years went on other trials and difficulties and doubts met her, as they meet every human being. She could not always see why they were sent; but always there arose before her that night's journey with its hidden meaning and its happy end.

"Shall I not trust my Heavenly Father, too?" Florence would ask herself. "Do I not know that if there was any other way through life better for me than this, that my Father would have chosen that way for me?"

Then faith would whisper: "When you see your Heavenly Father's face you will say to him, too, 'Thy way was the very best possible way.'"—Elizabeth P. Allen, in the Advance.

"Be on the Watch."

A gentleman stopped suddenly before a sign that told him messenger-boys were to be had inside. He hesitated, and then went in:

"How many boys have you in just now?" he asked.

"Six," was the reply; "it's dull today."

"Then they're all here," said the gentleman, looking around, while the boys themselves were all attention, wondering "what was up."

"Boys," said the gentleman, eyeing them scrutinizingly. "I suppose you know there is an exhibition of trained dogs to-night?"

The faces of the boys showed that they were perfectly aware of that fact, and that they might even give him some points in regard to it.

"Well, I'm looking for a boy to take a blind man to see it."

A titter was the first response; then followed a variety of expressions, as: "A blind man!" "You're foolin'!" "What could a blind man see?" and "You can't guy us that way!"

"I'm not guying; I am in earnest," said Mr. Davis, and then, looking at one of the boys who had said nothing, he asked:

"Well, what do you think of it?"

"I think I could do it," was the reply. "Yes, I'm sure I could, sir."

"How do you propose to make him see it?"

"Through my eyes, sir. That's the only way he could see it."

"You're the boy I'm after," said Mr. Davis, and he arranged for him to meet the blind man.

The exhibition was in a large theater, and the blind man and his guide had a box to themselves, where they could disturb no one; but Mr. Davis, from his seat in the audience, knew that the boy was telling what went on so that the blind man could understand, and others in the audience became interested in the messenger-boy and his companion, who, though carrying on an animated conversation, seemed absorbed and excited over everything that went on. Indeed, no one applauded more heartily than the blind man himself.

The following day Mr. Davis again appeared among the messenger-boys, and after a few words with the manager said:

"Boys, there was a chance offered every one of you yesterday—a chance for lifting yourselves up in the world—but only one of you grasped it. My friend, the blind man, has felt for some time that he might get much pleasure out of life if he could find some young eyes to do his seeing for him, with an owner who could report intelligently. My stopping here yesterday was with the thought that possibly such a pair of eyes could be found here. It was an opportunity held out to every one of you, but only one understood and grasped it. For the rest of you it was a lost opportunity; for my friend is delighted with the experiment—says he is sure I hit upon the one boy in town who will suit him, and has offered him a good position with a fine salary. Messenger-boys are easy to get, but a boy who can make a blind man see is at a premium. And yet you might—well, you see, that boy, although he did not know it, was on the watch for a good opportunity, and when it came he knew how to manage it. It is the only way to keep good opportunities from slipping away, boys; you must be on the watch for them."—Anne Weston Whitney, in Sabbath Recorder.

WHEN MY MOTHER TUCKED ME IN.

Ah, the quaint and curious carving
On the posts of that old bed,
There were long-beaked, queer old griffins

Wearing crowns upon their heads,
And they fiercely looked down on me

With a cold, sardonic grin;
I was not afraid of griffins
When my mother tucked me in.

I remember how it stood there,
With its headpiece backward rolled,

And its broad and heavy tester
Lined with plaitings, blue and gold,
And the great old-fashioned pillows Trimmed with ruffles, white and thin,
And the cover soft and downy
When my mother tucked me in.

Sweet and soft her gentle fingers,
As they touched my sunburnt face;
Sweet to me the wafted odor
That enwrapped her dainty lace;
Then a pat or two at parting,
And a good-night kiss between;
All my troubles were forgotten
When my mother tucked me in.

Now the stricken years have borne me
Far away from love and home,
Ah, no mother leans above me
In the nights that go and come,
But it gives me peace and comfort,
When my heart is sore within,
Just to lie right still and, dreaming,
Think my mother tucked me in.
—Bettie Garland, in New Orleans Picayune.

Does This Interest You?

The Christian Century is a new undenominational religious weekly published to meet a wide and growing demand for a paper that is thoroughly evangelical and abreast of the ripest scholarship, an authority on pure literature, and a medium of communication between the different denominations. Its aim will be to give a record and an interpretation of the leading events in the religious world. It will seek at once to mirror and to mould religious thought and life. In the sweep of its vision and the breadth of its sympathies it will endeavor to be as wide as Christianity itself. In a word, it will stand for essential and universal Christianity.

Promoters and Contributors

Behind this undertaking are men of the highest financial standing. The Editorial management is in the hands of Professor W. Douglas Mackenzie, D. D., of the Chicago Theological Seminary, Rev. James M. Campbell, D. D., well known through his numerous books, and Prof. Herbert L. Willett, Ph. D., of the University of Chicago. These men are known as leaders in modern thought and scholarship. Some of the ablest scholars and writers of America and Europe will contribute to its columns. On the list are such names as Dr. Marcus Dods of Scotland, Dr. Washington Gladden, Dr. Amory H. Bradford, Dr. Josiah Strong, Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, Professor Graham Taylor, etc. Dr. Wm. Adamson, editor of The Christian News, Glasgow, Scotland, will furnish an occasional British letter, and an original story by Dr. Clarence A. Vincent, of Galesburg, Ill., will appear in the early fall numbers. During the fall and winter months a series of special numbers will be issued giving Symposiums on the practical aspects of Christian work. These will be followed by a series on the Fad Religions of the day, and these in turn by a series on such vital questions as The Second Coming of Christ. These are but suggestive hints of special features which will combine to make The Christian Century an interesting and timely religious journal.

How You May Aid the Enterprise

In order to secure a wide and speedy introduction of the paper it will be sent as a trial subscription to names not now on the list from the time the order is received till January 1, 1902, for 25 Cents. ## EDITORIAL

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES:

The Christian Century is published in the interests of essential Christianity. It is the organ of no party; the advocate of no ism. While welcoming the ascertained results of modern Christian scholarship, it stands for the great evangelical verities which are the foundation stones of the Christian system. It seeks to be tolerant in spirit, practical in aim, and warmly sympathetic towards all the present day problems of religious thought and life. It also aims at being at once a clearing house and medium of communication between the different denominations, so that they may by free and fraternal expression of opinion become better acquainted with one another and may be led to join forces in more aggressive work for the advancement of the Redeemer's Kingdom.

"Let his great example stand,
Colossal, seen of every land;
And make the soldier firm the statesman pure,
Till in all lands and through all human story,
The path of duty be the way to glory."

—Tennyson's Ode to Wellington.

AN AFTERMATH.

OUR country has been swept by a tempest of emotion. After the storm is beginning to come a calm in which the still small voice of reason may be heard. A dramatic incident occurred in the Virginia Constitutional Convention when Judge Berryman Green arose and said,

"Ever since the days of King Alfred freedom of speech has been the prerogative of the English-speaking races, but one of the strongest evidences of its abuse is the noble victim now lying dead in the nation's capital, surrounded by weeping thousands."

Carried away by the passion of the moment the members voted to strike out the words, "free speech," from the bill of rights. This was a foolish act, which will have to be repented of when passion cools down. As ex-President Cleveland has pointed out, "the distinction between the use and the abuse of free speech is already known to the law." And this distinction requires to be strongly emphasized at present.

The Why of Things.

We have been struck dumb in the presence of an inscrutable mystery. Tremulous lips have asked, If God be for us, why has this evil befallen us? Let us be careful how we involve God in this matter. The distinction between what God permits and what he sends must not be forgotten. But what mortal will dare to draw the line between the two? The declaration of a certain preacher that in the shooting of President McKinley "God manifested his displeasure and was teaching an impressive lesson to the American people," is monstrous. Not much better is the repeated declaration that this was a divine providence. In this way we cannot think of it. That it took place inside the divine system of things, that God will take it up into his general scheme and in a way unknown to us bring good of it to this nation and to all nations we heartily believe; but the idea that he had a direct hand in it we hotly repudiate. We call this an evil; and so it is; but it is not an absolute evil. Only moral evil is that. Physical evil may be relatively good. Good may come out of it. Good often does come out of it. Already we can see good coming out of this sad event. Some one said when Garfield died that the moral effect of his death was worth the sacrifice. Is it not so in this case? What higher use can a human life be put to than by the power of sacrifice to become a redeeming influence to a whole nation?

National Unity Realized.

The unity of the nation has been realized in the experience of a common sorrow. The bullet which pierced the president's body pierced the nation's heart. All have been baptized with a common grief; all have been bound together in a common misfortune. Religious divisions have been forgotten—the line between North and South, which was becoming dim, has vanished. Universal brotherhood has been brought a step nearer realization. Is any price too high to secure such a result?

Cool Deliberation Coming.

The wild justice of revenge is giving way to the dictates of reason. The first impulse was to tear the assassin limb from limb. The conflagration spread, and even ministers of the gentle Christ were heard to say, "Shoot down the anarchists in their tracks." Now we are recalling the words, "Vengeance is mine, I will repay saith the Lord, therefore if thine enemy hunger feed him." "Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good." A hard command this, when passion is at the boiling point. Yes, but our sober second thought tells us it is right. And no nobler object lesson did our dying president leave us than when he said regarding his assassin, "Let no one hurt him." The anarchist is our brother. His welfare we are to seek. Instead of destroying him we are to seek to cure him of his malformation.

Majesty of Law Upheld.

We cannot be too profoundly grateful that in these trying days the majesty of the law was upheld. There were talks of lynching; but lynching is itself a form of anarchy. It takes the underpinning out of society. It leaves an indelible stain upon the fair name of the country in which it is permitted. And besides, it always defeats its end. The lynching of negroes in the South does not put a check upon the crime against which it is specially directed. There is something wonderfully impressive in the infliction of punishment through the orderly processes of law. When rightly administered law moves with the certainty of fate.

The Real Breeders of Anarchy.

Attention has been turned to the real breeders of anarchy. Those who speak evil of dignities are to blame; their exaggerations and distortions leave a false impress upon the public mind. Sensational press is still more to blame. Cartoonists are perhaps most of all blameworthy. Some restrictions ought to be put upon the liberty to defame and traduce public characters. But to go to the root of the matter we must inculcate more respect and even reverence for office. The two commands, "Fear God and honor the king;" or in this case, honor the president, are to be forever conjoined.

The Stability of Government.

Through all this great calamity confidence in the nation's future has remained unshaken. There has been no panic, no upturning of affairs; no dream of revolution. Changes have taken place without friction or disturbance. There is universal satisfaction with the man who at the present juncture has come to the presidential chair. He is a man of the Cromwellian type, and can be depended upon to do his whole duty in the fear of God.

The Prevalence of the Religious Spirit.

This has perhaps been the most marked feature of this occasion. The deepest springs of feeling have been touched. The national life has been lifted up to the heights. An impulse has been given to nobler living. Lips unused to the songs of Zion have sung the hymns which the president loved. And there has been the deepest sincerity in it all. Never was the power of a great personality more strangely felt. Death put Mr. McKinley upon a pedestal where we could see him. People loved him for his heart qualities; they admired him for his moral qualities.

Not only has a high ideal of manhood been held up before the nation's eyes, but the secret of a noble life has been laid bare. The nation has been taken into the holy of holies of the death chamber. Into its ear have been whispered the dying words of faith and hope of a Christian believer. Many have been led to say, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my latter end be like his."

Still, as of old,
Man by himself is priced;
For thirty pieces Judas sold Himself, not Christ.

RELIGION IN THE HOME.

THE family rather than the individual is the social unit, and the family rather than the individual is also the unit of the kingdom of God. Churches ought to be numbered not by individuals but by families. We forget that God is "the God of all the families of the earth." We forget that the covenant originally made to Abraham, and still unrepealed, reads, "In thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed."

Viewed from within the family, in its completed form, is a trinity. Two loving hearts make a home; but the family chain is not complete until to husband and wife is added the golden link of child.

When the child comes into the home-nest, the great problem of home-religion begins. The first question that starts up is, "What shall we do with the child?" "How can we best secure his highest spiritual culture?" Generally we have an abundance of fine theories to begin with, but as Mrs. Stowe somewhere says, "One live baby will upset the best theories of child culture that have ever been formed." Must we, therefore, abandon our ideals because we fail to reach them? Nay, verily! Our ideals may be none the less true and beautiful and helpful because they have been unceremoniously upset.

Along with the question, "What shall we do with the child?" comes the question, "What will the child do with us?" Make fools of us, in many ways, more than likely. Some time ago a popular magazine discussed a new aspect of an old subject, under the title of "The Training of a Father." We are prone to think exclusively of the training of the child, but our children train us about as much as we train them—and a sad business they make of it sometimes. In every home baby is king; in some homes baby is a veritable despot, and the whole household his most abject slaves. It is not the case that there is less family government today than there used to be; there is quite as much of it as there ever was, only it has changed hands. The child is father to the man in a sense the poet never dreamed of.

The temper of the times does not incline us to take kindly to the idea of authority of any kind; but authority lies at the very foundation of all order and harmony, in the home as well as in the state. Children are wronged when they are allowed to grow up untamed, following their own unsweet will; for their happiness and welfare they require to be under wise and loving authority. Better that the band of parental government be too tight than that it be too loose. Undue rigor is safer, if not pleasanter, than undue laxity. Beware, however, of going to the extreme of attempting to break the child's will. What is a child worth whose will is broken? Better break his neck at once and be done with it, than break his will, crushing out all his individuality and making him a weak, spiritless, good-for-nothing creature. The will is to be controlled, not crushed, regulated, not broken; it is to be made flexible and pliable so that being accustomed to bend to the authority of the earthly father, it may not be slow in bending to the authority of the heavenly Father.

In the development of religion in the home, next in importance to family government is family worship. This is the most primitive form of social worship; it is something to which the Spirit of God invariably prompts every converted soul, and the duties which it involves are so obvious that anything like a positive command for their performance was evidently deemed superfluous. Without family worship there may be religion in the home, but there is no home-religion. A recognition of God by the family in its united capacity is certainly called for, and never is parenthood so exalted as when performing the duties of high priest within the charmed circle of the home.

The prime reason why the practice of family worship has fallen so largely into disuse in truly Christian homes is not because the sons are less devout than their fathers were, but it is because they have been attempting to keep up old forms which are not always suited to new conditions. In this fast age, when men seem to be born in hurry, live in a hurry and die in a hurry, the exercises of family worship ought to be made as simple and elastic as possible; that they ought also to be made as cheerful and bright as possible goes without the saying. If more cannot be done, let the members of the family, before rising from the morning meal, break together the bread of life by repeating in turn a few texts of Scripture; then let there be a few brief prayers, after the order of what we have come to call sentence prayers, or let the Lord's Prayer be repeated in concert. Let anything that has life and reality in it be adopted, rather than that the unity of religious life in the home be lost. If old forms stand in the way cast them into the limbo of dead things. Keep the altar-fire burning with whatever fuel there is at hand, and there is no fear that the spiritual life of the home will lose its warmth, or that the spiritual power of the Church will suffer decline.

After all, the most important thing in the religious life of the home is atmosphere. The atmosphere of some professedly Christian homes is pervaded by a spirit of worldliness that makes it as stifling and poisonous as choke-damp; the atmosphere of others is saturated with a spirit of peevishness and fretfulness that makes it cold and chilling as an east wind in March; the atmosphere of others is warm and genial, conducive to the production and growth of true piety. The reason why the atmosphere or spirit of the home has such a peculiar power in the moulding of character is that we are all influenced more by the secondary than by the immediate preaching of the Word. In nine cases out of ten it is somebody's practicing rather than somebody's preaching that is the means of conversion. How many have been brought to God by the indirect and unconscious influence of the consistent example of a devoted father or mother! As the natural mediators between God and the child, the parents are the main channels by which the truth and grace of God reach the child. Because of their close relationship to the child, because of the strong hold which they have upon the child's affections, because of the deep interest which they naturally feel in the child's welfare, God expects to find in them willing and efficient agents in the work of raising up a holy seed, who shall not be subjects for future conversion, but shall grow up planted in the holy nurture of the blessed Lord, to whom they already belong.

Into this work of holy nurture, to which Christian parents are called as God's coworkers, ought to be put the most and best of time, of thought and of self. It is a work which cannot be delegated to others. Each child is a problem by himself, and ought to be studied separately as to his temperament and tendencies, his aptitudes, tastes and needs. But alas, many parents allow themselves to be so much occupied with the grind of daily toil, or with the discharge of social and public duties as to fall out of acquaintanceship with their own children.

One of the crying evils of our modern social life is that by the multiplication of all sorts of societies we are imperilling the welfare of the home. The curse of club life is that it robs the home of its social interest. This, too, is the danger to which we are exposed in the present-day development of our church work. In too many instances we are guilty of robbing Peter to pay Paul by neglecting the home in order to keep up our multitudinous societies. Against the various forms of associated Christian effort we have nothing to say, they are providential movements, most of them, which are abundantly justified by their usefulness; but we respectfully ask if it is not high time for us to call a halt in this society-making business! We must not forget that none of these societies are divine institutions; the only divinely ordained societies are the home and the Church. Of these two the home is the older; and perish the society, whatever its name or standing, that in any way menaces the sacred interests of the home! It at any time a sacrifice must needs be made, let the society go that the home may live!

The home is the fountain-head of our religious life. As are our homes, so is the Church. When our homes are sanctified, the Church is sanctified. It is from homes that have been born again by the practical power of Christianity and have become transfigured into earthly types of the kingdom of heaven that the most stable and useful Christians come forth. Almost all those who today are occupying the front ranks in the Lord's army of conquest received their first consecration at the home-altar. Whenever there is a dearth of money or of men to carry on the aggressive work of the Christian Church, if the evil be only traced back far enough, it will be found to have its source in unconsecrated cradles.

The revival most needed in the present day is the revival of home religion, for this includes everything else. Once a year the Aztecs of Mexico kindle watch-fires on the mountain-heights to light the way of the fair god Quetzal back to the halls of the Montezumas. May we who watch and wait and pray for the coming of our King Emmanuel kindle the extinguished fires of our home-altars that we may light the way of his blessed feet as he cometh in triumph into his kingdom!

The world is wide
 In time and tide
 And—God is guide;
 Then do not hurry.

That man is blest
 Who does his best
 And—leaves the rest;
 Then do not worry.

TRIBUTE TO PRESIDENT McKINLEY.

The poverty of human language we never more acutely felt than when the speakers who were chosen to express the sentiment of a nation's heart tried to utter themselves. The eulogies upon President McKinley which were poured forth may sometimes have been a trifle over-colored, but they were sincere.

We gather, almost at random, a few of these more characteristic utterances:

"His was the average American life in a glorified form. He was pure, simple, genial and kind. So long as he dominated our affairs he could be dealt with by foreign powers with sincerity, and this is the secret of the great influence of this nation in the administration of foreign affairs."—President Angell.

"Even without the purple robe of office he was one who in his character was a living comment on the Biblical doctrine that man is created in the image of God. The dead president was a husband who to the last breath remained a lover and a courtier of his wife. The pole-star of his life was duty. He did not hesitate to change his opinions when fuller knowledge pointed the way to new truths. Hatred was foreign to his soul. He was a man whose heart was deeply touched with religion. As a statesman he will live in the annals of time, and together with Washington and the other two martyred presidents, Lincoln and Garfield, will be remembered as the highest type of an American gentleman."—Rabbi Emil G. Hirsch.

"It is well with McKinley now, it is well with the country now; for a crime that in other lands and times might have precipitated chaos has left us secure. The overthrow of this great citizen has no more shaken the republic than the fall of an oak. And by this sign and the orderly succession of lawful officers we all know that our country is greater than any crime and is immortal to violence. Our government is the virtue, the patriotism, the wealth, the strength of all its people."—Gen. John C. Black.

"Himself a son of toil, his sympathies were with the toiler. No one who has seen the matchless grace and perfect ease with which he greeted such can ever doubt that his heart was in his open hand. Every heart throbbled for his countrymen. That his life should be sacrificed at such a time, just when there was abundant peace, when all the Americas were rejoicing together, is one of the inscrutable mysteries of Providence. Like many others, it must be left for future revelations to explain."—Dr. C. E. Manchester.

"Two things distinguished William McKinley; justness to man and a reverent recognition of his obligation to God. President McKinley was not the creature of circumstance. He was not lifted to his high pedestal by a tidal wave of popular fancy, to be left stranded on the subsidence of that wave. He took the foremost place because he was the foremost citizen. His was the highest type of American manhood in physique, in mental training, in patriotism, in open-mindedness and in piety. He was the noblest type of Christian citizenship."—Dr. P. S. Henson.

"Sorrowing deeply at this time, we turn our faces toward the heavens from whence light comes, trusting and believing that for all time flowers will bloom and fruits mature, despite the nettles and weeds that seek to choke and destroy that which gives life and upon whose existence the happiness of man all depends."—Judge Waterman.

"The awful feature of this calamity is undisguised in the fact that it is a stroke against the enterprise of government, which is the noblest enterprise undertaken by man. It was a dagger thrust at the heart of civilization. It makes it all the more horrible and helps us to see the ghastly features of anarchy more truly when we reflect that the wound which it opened was through the now stilled heart of a man at once so loving, so loved and so lovable as the president."—Dr. F. W. Gunsaulus.

"Once more the shepherd has laid down his life for the sheep. And with it once more must come the sequel of Calvary. For no such dying is ever in vain. No such precious blood is ever spilt without some redemption being wrought through it. The grave never closes over such a man without the stone being rolled away in a glorious resurrection. No such personal force is ever thus rudely torn out of the world without some pentecostal outpouring of the Spirit of God upon the hearts of the people. We cannot see it today. We stand beneath the shadow of the cross. But we shall see it hereafter. There is an illumination of character which can only come when that character is taken away from us. It is only when the earthly portion has been destroyed that the inner ideal in its beauty and purity is disclosed."—Willard B. Thorp.

"There was a singular and unique likeness in his life to those other two men before him who met death by the bullet of assassins. All came from humble walks of life and won their way to the highest gift of the American people by their honor and integrity. In his private life Mr. McKinley has been more eloquent than elsewhere. There was but one higher place than he had reached, and he has taken it. An unpleasant side of this tragedy is the causes that led up to it. Chief among these is the undisciplined and unlicensed press, which has persistently indoctrinated in the minds of certain people a subtle and insidious poison that President McKinley was the organizer and protector of institutions that have oppressed the people. When a man is chosen to the chief magistracy of the country the position ought to exempt him from such utterances and such attacks, which really are at the bottom of this trouble."—Herbert L. Willett.

His Mother's Hopes.

It is said that the mother of President McKinley had her heart set upon seeing her son become a minister of the Gospel, for this she believed to be the highest vocation in life. His path in life led in a different direction. Through a great variety of experiences he was led to the highest place of power in all the land. But in every situation in life he was a servant, a minister; and he was a servant of the people because he was first of all a servant of Jesus Christ.

President McKinley's View of the Ministry.

Among the things said by Dr. C. E. Manchester, the pastor of President McKinley, regarding his dead parishioner was that "his faith in the Gospel of Christ was deep and abiding." Christ and him crucified was to his mind the only panacea for the world's disorders. He said "we do not look for great business men to enter the pulpit, but great preachers." There is a world of suggestion in this thought. Too often churches look for men of business capacity as ministers. The church is looked upon as a large business enterprise, and the successful minister is the one who can make things go by keeping up the financial end of things. "The supreme duty of the Christian minister," said Mr. McKinley, "is to preach the Word." And he was right.

CONFIDENCE IN THE NEW PRESIDENT.

IT is a cause for profound gratitude that in this hour of national anguish there should be such firm confidence in the new leader, into whose hands the reins of power have passed. Theodore Roosevelt is not an unknown man. He has already had a large amount of experience in public affairs and in every office he has held he has conducted himself in such a way as to command the respect and honor even of those who differed from him politically. The South, which had learned to love and trust President McKinley, has already transferred a portion of its love and confidence to his successor. The wise action of President Roosevelt in retaining the cabinet of his predecessor and intimating his intention of carrying out his policy has won for him many friends both North and South. The following are typical expressions of the feeling of the hour:

"I think Mr. Roosevelt will make an exemplary president in every sense of the word. He has a great many friends in the South, and has had them for years. Since his declaration to the effect that he purposes to enforce the plans formulated by the late President, however, his friends there have increased many fold, and the southern people generally are disposed to lend him their hearty support."—Senator Prichard of North Carolina.

"President Roosevelt possesses the executive faculty in a high degree. He has had an experience in politics and in the direction of affairs that will stand him in good stead. Both his public and private life have been above reproach. We believe that the confidence of the people in him already so general and strong will be strengthened by the manner in which he will meet the requirements and discharge the duties of his exalted office."—Atlanta Journal.

"We know of what our new president is made—a scholar, a soldier, a patriot and an outspoken follower of Jesus Christ. He deserves the loyal support of every true citizen. The youngest, if I mistake not, of any who have come to hold his high office, Theodore Roosevelt should be upheld and guarded by the fervent prayers of all Christian men and women in the land."—Bishop Chas. E. Cheney.

Causes of Anarchy.

In discussing the causes of anarchy leading English divines attribute largely to the denial of God, or to false views of God. Dr. Wilberforce, archdeacon of Westminster is on record as saying:

"Anarchy is the fruitage of atheism, which when based on thought always originates from a passionate denial of the rudimentary and imperfect conception of God advanced by shallow so-called believers. Men have been driven into hostility to the church and execrated as atheists when it is not God but man's false view of God that they are rejecting. The remedy is to be found in the ceaseless reiteration of higher and nobler conceptions of God. The true conception of God in his relation to man is the strongest incentive to purity and self-control."

Dr. John Clifford, former president of the Baptist Union, said: "The causes of anarchism are manifold. One of the chief of the philosophical causes springs from the false notion of God circulated by some of the churches. This has generated a false view of life and thus has bred despair. Despair has produced anarchism. The only way to overcome this lies in the persistent proclamation of the conception of God given by Christ as the Father and Savior of all, the faith proclaimed by President McKinley. Christianity, the mightiest factor in the civilization of the world, contains the principles that must be applied effectively to deal with the problem of anarchism, which is not primarily an American problem, but is a world problem."

The Chicago Pulpit on Anarchy.

If we find that liberty has been turned into license, let us not be afraid to impose those restraints which are needful for the protection of the lives of our rulers.—Rev. W. S. P. Bryan.

Surely when our fathers declared for freedom of speech they never dreamed that such license would be taken, giving encouragement to anarchy and rebellion.—Rev. William M. Lawrence.

Has not the time come when we must realize that there are limits to free speech? Liberty is not license.—Rev. J. K. Mason.

We cannot escape the humiliation that comes from the fact that in this land, where liberty and security of life are matters in which we feel so much pride and assurance, such a deed could be possible. The insinuation, too, that the inspiration for this foul crime, as well as its suggestion, came from the public utterances of one whose inflammable and ungoverned speeches have been tolerated in our country, is startling proof of the danger of continuing such a policy of leniency, and gives good ground for the suspicion that there may be more license allowed than is in keeping with the safety of the people or the good name of the republic.—Rev. Johnson Henderson.

We are not yet in a mood to learn the lessons that such an event thrusts upon our attention. But one or two things seem clear. Among them are the needless exposure of valuable lives through the custom of hand-shaking, the mischief of unlicensed and incendiary journalism and the need to wipe out every seed plot of anarchism in this free land.—Rev. Wm. Macfee.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND THE CHURCH.

We call attention to a symposium in the present issue on the above subject. The contributors have not been restricted to any particular aspect of this wide and fruitful subject. Hence they have approached it from different points of view. Many wise and helpful suggestions are made; yet little more has been done than to break ground upon it. The subject is as wide as it is inviting and important, and we welcome further contributions from any who may have a word in season.

Relation of Children to the Kingdom.

Children are to be recognized as belonging to Christ. "Of such is the kingdom of heaven." Irenaeus speaks of the Lord as sanctifying every age by that period corresponding to it which belonged to himself—"for he came to save all through means of himself; all, I say, who through him are born again to God; infants and children and boys and young men and old men. He therefore passed through every age; became an infant for infants, thus sanctifying infants; a child for children, thus sanctifying those of that age; becoming at the same time to them an example of purity, righteousness and submission."

The Prophecy of Youth.

Youth is prophetic. The future of the Church depends upon the kind of young people that are now under training. "What are boys good for?" was asked. "To make men of," was the reply. The affairs of the Church will soon be in the hands of those who are now in our Sunday schools and Christian Endeavor societies. It behooves us, therefore, to see that the "godly seed" who shall soon take the places of those who are now bearing the burden and heat of the day receive the nurturing that will make them valiant defenders of the faith, and efficient workers in the vineyard of the Master.

The Christian Endeavor Society.

The Christian Endeavor society has been called the half-way house to the Church. Too often it is a stopping place; a church within a church. When it is true to its mission, it is the Church's staunchest ally. The leaders of the movement have always been careful to keep in the forefront the motto of the society: "For Christ and his Church," and just in so far as that motto has been acted upon has the society been a blessing to the church with which it was related. When it has been made a substitute for the Church it has stood in the way of the progress of the kingdom.

CHICAGO NOTES.

The overshadowing events of the past few days have been the death and burial of President McKinley. The tribute paid by the people of Chicago to their lost leader was sincere and profound. There was a solemn pause in the hum of industry; the silent city was draped in mourning. Churches and theaters were filled with grief-stricken worshippers, and more than 16,000 people marched through the streets to the dirge-like music of the bands. It was a deeply impressive occasion.

One little incident reveals the spirit by which the people were possessed. The time had come for the body of the dead president to be lowered into the grave. When the clock showed that the half-hour was five minutes old, the sound of singing voices coming from the balcony of the Chicago Club intoned the first line of "Nearer, My God, to Thee." Quivering at first and thin, the chant arose. One by one of the men and women in the streets took up the chorus till the volume of song, piercing and strong by very contrast with the late silence, rose into a mighty diapason of melody that was vocal with sorrow, worship and hope. Along the marching column the bands caught the spirit of the stately hymn, and the wave of music that swelled in unison then was like the sound of a great "Amen."

A proposition has been made by citizens of Chicago to start a fund with which to erect a memorial arch at Washington to President McKinley. The scheme has met with the approval of a large portion of the people. But we raise the question whether the million dollars which it is proposed to raise for this purpose could not be more wisely expended. Better than a monumental arch would be an amply endowed philanthropic institution which would be a benefit to thousands of unfortunates. Such a memorial would be more in keeping with the spirit and wish of the man whose name we delight to honor.

The address of Superintendent Cooley to the pupils of the Chicago public schools was practical and timely. While dwelling upon the atrocity of the crime which had been committed against law and government, it showed the futility of all such attempts to overthrow the present social order. Said Superintendent Cooley:

"Except for the grief of the people of this great nation over the sad event there is no apparent change. The assassin has not disturbed the general order of things.

"Let us distinguish the difference between the kind of liberty that was sought by the miscreant who shot down our president and that liberty, liberty under law, upheld and extended by President McKinley, and which should be the ideal of every true citizen of this great republic."

A course of lectures by Professor Casper Rene Gregory is announced in connection with the opening of the Chicago Theological Seminary. These lectures will begin September 27th and will end October 6th. They will be delivered at three o'clock in the afternoon. Professor Gregory has the distinction of being the only American scholar who was ever elected to a professorship in a German university. After graduating from the University of Pennsylvania and from Princeton Theological Seminary, he received the degrees of Ph. D. and D. D. from the University of Leipzig, and was afterwards chosen to fill the chair of theology in that famous seat of learning. In the sphere of New Testament criticism he takes the highest rank. To the study of the Greek MSS. of the New Testament he has given special attention, bringing to his task great wealth of learning, great open-mindedness, and untiring industry. An attractive personality, and a vivacious style as a speaker render his lectures absorbingly interesting.

The Rev. S. B. Dexter has been forced to resign from the pastorate of the Humboldt Park Baptist church because of the favorable attitude which he has taken toward the army canteen. There was perfect good feeling on both sides, but as his church disapproved of his position on this subject he felt it necessary to withdraw. It is too much the fashion for churches to look upon their preachers as echoes rather than leaders. They are chosen to office to reflect the sentiments of the people. And this is all right so far as the fundamental things in Christian faith are concerned; but in minor matters there ought to be the utmost freedom. A free pulpit alone can command public respect.

The hasty judicial act of Judge Dunne the other day in granting a divorce in less than ten minutes solely on the ground of conjugal infelicity affords some ground for the old fling that when railroad trains approach our city the conductors call out "Chicago! twenty minutes for divorce." This case accentuates the need for some reform in our divorce laws. The United States has the unenviable notoriety of standing at the list of nations in regard to the number of divorces granted. In one year the divorces in England were 508, in Russia 1,789, in Germany 6,161, in France 6,245, while in the United States they were 23,472. This state of things will continue so long as divorces are granted for trivial causes. There can be no radical reform until we take our stand on New Testament ground.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND THE CHURCH--A SYMPOSIUM.

THE PLACE OF YOUNG PEOPLE IN THE CHURCH.

MANY notable discoveries were made in the nineteenth century. None perhaps will be of more far-reaching influence upon the Church than the discovery of the child. The rallying cry of the children's crusade nearly a decade of centuries ago was "Deus vult." And surely God wills that the young people of the twentieth century shall join a crusade to restore the living Christ to the Church, rather than guard the sepulchre of dead dogmas. The Church of today needs the young people. They are hopeful and optimistic. The Church needs their forward-looking, buoyant spirits. They are brave to plan and quick to execute. The Church needs the courage to pray for difficult duties and the energy and fire of youth to answer her prayers through unwearied service.

All departments of the Church need the young people. It is a great mistake to train our children to consider the Sunday school more important than the church. If one of the two must necessarily be given up by the young people, it should be the Sunday school and not the preaching service. Young people at the church service in large numbers would compel the preacher to avoid hair-splitting theological polemics and impel him to be simple and child-like in his positive preaching. The night service at church needs the young people. Something is wrong when Christian Endeavorers pray "Thy kingdom come" and then walk away from the preaching service which is directed especially to bringing men and women to Christ. It is a spiritual tonic to see a large number of young people at the mid-week prayer meeting. Their prayers are so direct and trustful, their singing so vigorous and voiceful. We feel that the very breezes from the spiritual world have cooled our aching brows when the young people modestly but cheerfully participate in the prayer meeting. The young people are enthusiastic concerning missions, social problems, civic righteousness and all of those larger ministries which distinguishes the church of deeds from the church of dogmas.

But if the twentieth century church needs the young people, young people also need the Church. They need the society which the Church furnishes them. The life of a great city makes social privileges very important. Young people must have society. The Church ministers to this demand of their ardent natures. The young people need the Church as a safeguard against temptation. A pastor of a city church learned that a mere girl in his congregation was contributing fifty cents to the Church every Lord's day. She was supporting her mother and younger sister on a small salary. Noticing that this girl's cloak was old and worn, the pastor told her she must not give so much to the support of the Church. "O sir," she replied, "do not deny me the privilege of giving to the Lord through the Church. It is my safeguard against temptation." It is much easier for young people to resist the assaults of the world, the flesh and the devil when they are serving God and man through his divinely appointed agency, the Church. Finally, young people need the Church to aid them in Bible study and in developing reverence.

But has the Church fulfilled its mission to the young people in its fold when it has provided a half hour, more or less, each week for Bible study? And is there not much in our modern Sunday school methods to destroy rather than develop reverence in our young people? Let the Church fulfill her mission to the young people and they will bravely, faithfully, enthusiastically support the pastor and all the ministries of the body of Christ, which is the Lamb's bride. Let the young people be "at home" in the Church and the Church will be as beautiful as a bride and both hopeful and heroic in her service under the leadership of her Lord.

HOW TO MAKE VITAL THE RELATIONSHIP OF CHILDREN TO THE CHURCH.

THIS question is one of paramount importance. Upon its successful answer depends the Christ-likeness of the Church of tomorrow. It touches also one of the problems of the day. The revelations made by child-study in these later years show that there is good reason for the failure of many methods to bring the desired result.

A vital relationship suggests one full of life, fruitful, permanent and resulting in true, earnest, Christian men and women. For this, we must first be assured of one thing: a relationship to be vital must correspond to God's laws; so, in this case, it must correspond to boy and girl nature. All our aims and plans should take this into account. We are not dealing with miniature men and women, but with boys and girls who at different ages need different treatment. It is also true that one period depends upon another, and if the right thing is not done at the right time, there is loss forever after. Let us illustrate: If reverence is not nourished in the earliest days for the house of God as the meeting-place of his people, it can never be revived with the same degree of good. If a dislike to the church is once established there is a loss of vitality affecting the individual character, and those under its immediate influence.

To cultivate reverence, on the one hand; to create a love for the church, on the other, seem therefore to be essentials. In infancy these may be awakened, or—the church may become a common, ordinary sort of place to the little child. The mother who stands with her little one outside the church walls, listening to the grand strains of the organ—as a preparation for what is to follow later—does more to awaken wonder and interest than the parent who indifferently takes the child to “sit still” in a pew, from which seat he is continually wriggling! Again, do we not deprive the boys and girls of a greater good when we allow them to run up and down the aisles, or climb over the seats?

But the suppression of natural activity while developing, perhaps, a form of reverence, will develop little more. The spirit will be lacking, and a distaste for all church connection is likely to be engendered if we stop here. Natural activity must be made use of, not suppressed. If it shows itself in unlawful ways—ways not simply forbidden, but harmful to the best interests of the child—it needs to be turned into a channel bearing wholesome fruit.

To meet this need Sunday church kindergartens (so called) have been established. A warning at this point may be of help. The “play-element” of the week-day kindergarten needs to be eliminated, here. In an attempt to use the child’s activity, the spirit of reverence peculiar to the day and place is almost lost sight of. It is possible to have a truer balance through an application of principles, rather than a use of methods, belonging to the kindergarten. The primary Sunday school, placed on a truly educational basis, will cultivate reverence and utilize activity. It will be rather a religious service for the little child than a “school” in which he studies, and thus the first vital relationship with the church will be made. the church?

How shall it be strengthened as the boy grows older? By the study of subjects that appeal to boy-life. The Bible is full of them, but the whole Bible is not for him just now. By giving him something to do—a responsibility fitting a child’s need. Children love to work if the work is of the right kind. After a consideration of their every-day doings and their natural interests, may we not make use of some of these in the various lines of service connected with the church

“Something to do” does not mean here leading in prayer nor “speaking” in prayer-meeting. The question arises whether these meet the child’s immediate need. If not, his future will not be helped by their use now. Analysis of feeling is unnatural to a child. Introspection is bad. Either formalism or sentimentalism may result if these public word expressions are urged before their time. In striving to answer the question suggested in this topic, let us earnestly and prayerfully seek to discover and put aside that which belongs to a later Christian experience. The words of Rev. Charles E. McKinley, quoted by Dr. Forbush in his study of the “boy problem,” may well be reiterated: “Every method or agency used in Christian work must give account to God not only for the souls whom it wins and saves, but also for all whom it alienates and destroys.”

PROBLEMS BEFORE THE YOUNG PEOPLE.

WHEN we consider the fact that the president of the United States—though summoned to office by the saddest event within a generation—is but forty-two years of age, we have fresh and vivid witness to the possibilities of youth. A cavalry officer who had seen much hard fighting in the sixties said to the writer that he would rather have boys of eighteen under his command than mature men, because of the dash and courage and enthusiasm of the young. The Church of our day has some problems before it to which our young people must set their faces and lend their thought—problems and conditions which will tax the best powers and employ the highest devotion, enthusiasm and courage.

The first problem that presents itself to my mind is that of the preservation of the Christian Sunday as an institution which Jesus consecrated to the highest ends of rest, of worship and of service to humanity. The young men and women of today will, in fifteen years, find themselves living among thousands of people who have never known the Sunday except as a day of feasting and pleasure-seeking. They will have as neighbors, especially in the large cities, whole families who have accepted the imported continental Sunday wherein the laws of God are quite forgot, and every man is a law unto himself. That is anarchy pure and simple. Will you combat it, or coddle it and let it grow? What are you doing, young people, by influence and by example, to preserve to the American people that institution which lies at the foundation of much that is best and most enduring in the traditions of the land you love and live in? May I suggest a thing or two? Uphold the devotional services of the day by regular attendance at the church of your choice. So far as possible, avoid taxing the servants of the public by demands upon them which are not really necessary. Mail your letters so they need not be in transit on Sunday if you can arrange otherwise. Make it your aim to put into the day the best you can command of thought, and of service and of companionship, both with men and books. Visit the sick and the afflicted. Don’t be misled by the folk who talk about being “broad,” when they mean by that doing as you please, regardless of God or man. Our glory as a Christian nation will perish with the passing of our highest uses of the Lord’s day.

The limitations of this article oblige me to speak only in passing of your attitude and influence touching the question of social drinking and of the saloon. In a word, let us urge the habit of total abstinence for ourselves as the only safe course, and the minimizing of saloon attractions by the establishment of social centers which shall offer to men what at present they can find, in general, only where intoxicants are sold. Is there enough enthusiasm and courage in the Church among her young people to inspire such a crusade?

A closing word touching the most patent need in some quarters. We talk about “drawing” preachers. Let us talk a little more about “drawing” congregations; and make your own particular church home attractive by the genuine, cordial, unstinted welcome you offer to the young men and the young women who come as strangers to your doors. This is something that every society of young people can do and do effectively if they will. The love of Christ must constrain them, else the effort will be artificial and ineffective. I fear the policy of exclusion. I hail the policy of expansion.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR SOCIETY IN FORMING CHARACTER.

THIS society is comparatively new and hence we are warranted in requiring it to prove its right to remain. If it is helping the young people to live more like Christ, it is a success and should have our earnest support; but if not, it is a piece of useless machinery to be unhesitatingly set aside. We shall note in the first place some of its favorable tendencies, and later on tendencies of another sort which are as tares among the wheat.

The Christian Endeavor has been valuable because it has furnished a place of meeting for young people of the same grade in religious experience. There is a subtle something, which for want of a better term we call sympathy, which makes it easier to achieve a certain standard of conduct when we know that others are with us. The Christian Endeavor Society has gathered together many young people who were finding the church a rather lonesome place and has helped them to find in one another that fellowship upon which Christian growth so largely depends. The Society of Christian Endeavor has led to the development of character by giving to the young people an opportunity of trying their wings and taking their first flights in public religious exercises.

Many a spiritual babe has perished for lack of the sincere help of the Word, and many because they were not trained in the habit of prayer. Our young people are greatly helped by having the obligation to read the Bible and to pray every day emphasized by the pledge. It is safe to say that very few who live up to this pledge will ever wander far from the fold of Christ. It is a recognized principle that young life must have exercise in order to reach the highest perfection. The Christian Endeavor Society therefore teaches its members to labor as well as to pray, and directs the activities of its members into helpful channels. At times very little may seem to be accomplished; but when the honest effort has been made, the labor has not been in vain. Another good feature that is to be noticed is the educational work of Endeavor societies. This work is only in its beginning, and its importance can hardly be over-emphasized.

Thus far we have been speaking of the ideal society. In some societies the pledge is a mere formality, and when this is the case deterioration of character is sure to ensue. In some cases the religious phrases are repeated in parrot-like fashion, with little soul and with little meaning. And it is not surprising that under these circumstances the young people should become insincere and artificial in their religious life. In some societies the habit prevails of reading random Scripture verses in the meetings without any conception of their meaning or appropriateness. This habit is certainly not conducive to edification. Sometimes officers are appointed who make no attempt to accomplish the work entrusted to them. They take pleasure in having their names printed on elaborate topic cards, but do not put forth their hand to do any active work. It is hurtful to the society to have to carry so much of this dead timber. All the officers and members should be held to a strict account for the fulfillment of the duty to which they have pledged themselves. They should be continually reminded of their motto, "For Christ and the Church." To serve Christ in any way is the highest honor and when the young people appreciate the dignity of the service which they are called upon to render for Christ and the Church, then and not till then will the Christian Endeavor Society fulfill its heaven-appointed mission.

THE TREATMENT NEEDED BY YOUNG PEOPLE.

Editors The Christian Century—I am at this moment in mid-ocean, and while the fog-horn is sounding forth, every minute, its note of warning, let me jot down a few thoughts that crowd forward for utterance.

1. The treatment needed by the American youth, at this moment, is increased discipline. "Freedom and discipline are essential factors in every scheme of government." Our young people have abounding freedom—and in this I rejoice; but they are not blessed by sufficient discipline. Some of the boys one meets in traveling would be shaped into strong men, if they were knocked down three times a day, for three months. The proverbial youngster who bosses his father and mother is no myth—to the ruination of all concerned.

2. The treatment needed by the American church, at this moment, is more Gospel-religion. I have just finished reading Harnack's "What Is Christianity?" What a wave of religious life would sweep over our churches, if our Catholic-tending ministers should digest this book! How he cuts the foundation from under the little ritualists, the bigoted ecclesiastics, the narrow creed-signers, and pulverizes their claims into dust! We are becoming more and more churches of ordinance, doctrines and ceremony. How Harnack makes the Gospel glow in contrast with these beggarly make-believes! Well—I'd give a good part of my fortune to have the Catholic-tasting portion of our churches read this Spirit-inspired message.

3. But what about the young people and the Church? This—sincerity on the part of the Church, in treatment of the young people! A mother may have a burning interest in missions, may enthuse over Hull House and Chicago Commons, but if she is selfish and ungentle at home, her boys and girls will go wrong. The Church ought to be honest and sincere. I still feel angry when I recall how the Church, in its explanations and commentaries and living, outraged my intellect and conscience when a boy. A stingy, quarrelsome deacon, a selfish, ambitious minister, will destroy the religious life of scores of young people. I know a man, he is a power, a pillar, he is orthodox and a great friend of missions, but I feel—whenever near him—that he will bear watching. He is not genuine. My religious life is harmed, not helped.

Methods that reach the young, I believe in. Boys' clubs, ditto. Children's sermons, ditto, and all other plans to hold the boys and girls. But sincerity that is born of fear of God and love of man, that makes young people realize that the inside is like unto the outside, a religion that does not hide itself behind creeds or ritual or fine sermons—this is what creates faith and holds the soul to God.

4. The teaching of the Church, in pulpit and Sunday school, ought to harmonize with that knowledge of life and the world gained by the young people in the high schools. The Church—in its ministers—often complains that its young people grow skeptical on going to college. The blame is with the Church, not the college. The one who withholds light, not the one who bestows light, is the destroyer of faith. The church whose young people turn skeptics when subject to light and criticism, let it move on and catch up, shaking off the moss.

BOYS AND THE CHURCH.

THE recognition of the fact that the boys of today are the men of tomorrow, coupled with the knowledge that the men of today are not found in the churches, raises the question, than which none can be more serious, What about the men of tomorrow? The fact that we are losing boys from the Sunday school and so from all connection with the Church at the age when they are most sensitive to religious impression, suggests that this indicates the most important problem which the Church faces today. The more recently apparent fact that the devotional exercises and demands of the Christian Endeavor movement do not make it attractive or successful with boys beyond a certain age causes us to ask by what means we can regain their interest and hold them for the Christian life. The greater success of the Y. M. C. A. in this regard, instructive as those wiser methods may be, cannot give entire peace to those who feel that no one center of effort can thoroughly solve the problem for each individual parish.

A number of supplementary societies have risen of late in the Church to attempt this work for boys. There is in some places an effort to extend the work of the Sunday school in the week days and to broaden the scope of the Endeavor society, by emphasizing Christian expression by deeds, for those who in the sensitive middle years of adolescent doubt and turmoil hesitate to speak of the inner storm and stress or to give testimony which shall seem unreal or dishonest.

The Alliance, of which I happen to be president, while dealing with all the problems of boy life, has given some especial attention in its literature and conventions to the boy problem in the Church. At the approaching General Conference in Boston, Oct. 29 and 30, one session will be very largely devoted to this theme. It is my personal desire to learn of wise efforts in various places in this direction and to afford the resources of the Alliance to those who seek to make such endeavors.

My own conviction is that we need to extend the class system of our Sunday schools in the form of instructive and inspiring boys' clubs under the leadership of manly teachers, into week-day sessions for handicraft, athletics, instruction in missions and philanthropy, and mutual works of mercy, thus giving expression and affording nurture to youths in their sincere but crude and somewhat boisterous desires to live a natural and characteristic Christian life.

WILLIAM BYRON FORBUSH,

President of the General Alliance of Boston, Mass. Workers with Boys.

The hope of the Church cannot be realized by letting the children run wild until some revival shall gather them up. The experience of every church makes it unnecessary to argue this proposition. But in the reaction against revival panics, there is danger that we suppress all legitimate enthusiasms, and content ourselves with negative work. One finds that he cannot gather the chickens home to roost with a drum, and so he baits them with corn and silently takes them with guile. It is the fashion now to lure the children into the church with every blandishment which is thought to be "taking," to remove or gloss every object at which they might take fright, and to meet them from one to six times during Lent for the purpose of explaining what it is they are about to do—a little more than a rehearsal. But the church is more than a roosting place, and Christian nurture is something more than the alluring of children into it, as every one has felt. But just what more? That is the question.

WM J. MUTCH.

New Haven, Conn.

Young men! specially you who are plunged into the busy life of our great commercial centers, and are tempted by everything you see, and by most that you hear, to believe that a prosperous trade and hard cash are the realities, and all else mist and dreams, fix this in your mind to begin life with—God is the reality, all else is shadow. Do not make it your ambition to get on, but to get up. Having food and raiment, let us be content. Seek your life's delight and treasure in thought, in truth, in pure affections, in moderate desires, in a spirit set on God. These are the realities of our possessions. As for all the rest it is sham and show. And while thus all without is unreal, it is also fleeting as the shadows of the flying clouds, and when God awakes it disappears as they before the moonlight that clears the heavens. All things that are, are on condition of perpetual flux and change. The cloud-rack has the likeness of bastions and towers, but they are mist, not granite, and the wind is every moment sweeping away their outlines, till the phantom fortress topples into red ruin while we gaze. The tiniest stream eats out its little valley, and rounds the pebble in its widening bed, rain washes down the soil, and frost cracks the cliffs above. So silently and yet mightily does the law of change work, that to a meditative eye the solid earth seems almost molten and fluid, and the everlasting mountains tremble to decay.

REV. DR. MACLAREN.

There should be no invidious distinction between the young and old in the Church. Life is always young, and whoever has the indwelling Spirit of God will never grow old. Let our young people welcome into their prayer meetings those who may be old in years but young in heart and hope. We are all "one in Christ Jesus." The ideal for Christian Endeavor is the same as for the Sunday school—every member of the church is to be included. Why not section the whole church into Endeavor societies? Some churches already have three. Christian Endeavor is adapted to every age and to every individual. Let us all be Endeavorers, for there is room and need for our work.

T. S. TINSLEY.

The young people are the hope of the Church. From them the army of the Lord must be recruited, from them the school of Christ must be furnished with disciples; from them must come the future statesmen and stateswomen of our country; from them must come the heroes and heroines who shall meet and master the problems of tomorrow. Of all the splendid riches and products which Providence has vouchsafed to our great Homeland, none can compare with the boys and girls. They are the diamonds which the Church must burnish for the crown of Prince Emmanuel.

H. LAWRENCE ATKINSON.

The church cannot live without young people. This question has no place for other than an optimistic viewpoint. My experience in a number of different churches in country and city is that the church is drawing her young people nearer her heart-beat than ever before. I have no patience with the view that the work of the young peoples' societies in the church is rapidly approaching an end. We are just on the threshold of the young peoples' movement. "Old men for counsel and young men for war."

A STUDY IN CHARACTER.

HOW JOHN WELLMAN COMMENCED THE TWENTIETH CENTURY.

CLARENCE A. VINCENT, D. D.

Chapter II: A Death.

HIS was the first time that John had ridden upon the cars, and everything was full of wonder. He almost held his breath at first, so swiftly ran the train. He studied the passengers and tried to decide who they were and why they were going to the city. Then he began to think what he would do when the journey was finished. He had the address of the young man who had told him of the city, and had planned at home to find him and secure, by his help, a place to board. As time wore away, hunger reminded him of the lunch his mother had given him, and unwrapping it, he was soon satisfying a ravenous appetite. Did ever anything taste so good as that corn cake? Sometimes at home he had wished for the delicacies which he had heard they had in cities. But now with deep hunger and the old home receding it tasted like angel's food.

His hunger satisfied, he thought of the package his father had left him. Opening it he found ten five-dollar bills in one paper, and in another a small copy of the Bible and his mother's writing on the fly leaf,

"A mother's present to her son,
O may he prize it high;
In teaching him the way to live,
'Twill teach him how to die."

Long he sat there with his thoughts until the buildings flying rapidly by and the call of the brakeman brought him back to his surroundings. He followed the passengers out of the car and was in the city. He wandered forth to look for his acquaintance. He could find no street by that name. He asked several whom he met to direct him. Some did not know and gruffly told him so; others misdirected him. He lost the direction of the station and wandered at random. A sense of awful loneliness stole over him. He could not keep out of his mind the picture of the home he had so recently left.

Would it not have been better to remain there? But he had chosen and he would not turn back. At last he was directed to the street, but found that the friend's family, whom he sought, had removed some months ago, where no one knew. Again he wandered on, trying to decide what step to take. The night would soon be on, and he must have some place to stay. There was nothing to do but look, and so block after block was walked in search of some sign of a lodging house. He was rewarded at last and found himself in a humble home for the night. In his room he finished the lunch of the forenoon. Tired in body, not even the uncertainty of his position could keep him from a long and restoring sleep. He arose refreshed, and having arranged with the family to remain, he hastened forth to secure some place that would insure his future.

Day after day is was the old story of search and failure. He had written home, telling of his journey, and that he would soon have a good place to work. But he would not write now. Money was nearly gone and for very pride he would not let his brothers and sisters know he was a failure. He had passed by many a notice of firms that wanted a boy for some menial work. He was not afraid to work, but he had come to the city to win a fortune, not to sweep stores or care for horses. A change, however, was coming over him. He remembered reading that one of the great New York merchants had started as an office everlasting questions!" or just slips away and doesn't next day he was looking among the manufactories and saw on the door of a small concern the notice, "Boy wanted." He entered and approached the proprietor. The man looked him over from head to foot and asked him many questions. He seemed struck with the young man's candor and earnestness. John was duly established as the errand boy of the office. The dreams of a prince of finance seemed to have been realized by contraries. There was no poetry in this position, for the work was trying and the pay barely sufficient to meet his board. But the spirit of the lad shone forth.

Months passed by. John did his work with thoughtfulness and fidelity. He kept his eyes open and learned all he could about the business. It seemed to him that in one particular there was great waste in material. He carefully weighed the waste for one week and computed the loss for a year at that rate. It amounted to $8,000. He approached the proprietor one day and spoke to him of the matter. The owner smiled at the suggestion of the office boy and replied: "It doesn't amount to anything." John was not to be rebuffed and showed him the figures. The man was interested and astonished. He thanked him and told him he would look into it. The weeks passed until John thought the owner had forgotten it. But one Saturday night, as he paid him his wages, he said: "We shall not need you as an office boy any longer." John's eyes filled with tears and a pallor stole over his face. "But," said the owner quickly, on observing the effect of his words, "if you have no objections, I will put you in charge of a new department, which will utilize the waste which you have discovered, with a salary of $100 per month; for it seems to me that an office boy that could observe so carefully will be more useful in another position."

John's letter the next day to his parents not only described what he had discovered, but was full of expressions of hope for the future. The father's and mother's eyes, as they read the letter, seemed to say that they were not surprised, only gratified, and the brothers and sisters talked for days of the riches that had come to their brother.

John threw himself with all intensity into the new tasks. Three years saw this department greatly increased in the volume of business and the profit therefrom. John had suggested that they buy the waste from other mills and this was followed. Each year his salary had been raised. When five years had passed, the proprietor called him into his private office one day and offered him a partnership and the place of manager of the whole manufactory. "The infirmities of age and the increasing volume of business compel me to have a helper. I have found you trusty and capable, and you can pay for your part out of the profits year by year," said he. John had not thought of the possibility of such a thing for years to come, but a few weeks saw him in control. He kept watch of everything. A suggestion here and a correction there gave new life to the business. In a few years he established branch houses in other cities until he employed 15,000 men.

Meanwhile, he had married a beautiful girl and a little family was growing up around him. He occasionally visited his aged parents between trains, but he had little time to give to them or to his own household. He paid for a pew in a church and usually attended, but often his mind was upon his business. His voice was never lifted in prayer in his home. Had it not been for the mother, his children would have been without any religious training. He paid his men regularly and as much as others in his line of work, but the Sermon on the Mount had no place in his relationship to his men. They were to him as the horses he hired, to be fed and clothed because they were adding to his wealth. The homes of his men might be unfit and unsanitary, but he did not even know where they lived.

Each year saw his wealth growing, but there was no purpose in its use. He gave occasionally to some public charity, but not from any high or holy motive. The commercial spirit of the age had crushed out every higher motive. He had not intended that this should be so, when he left the farm, but it had grown upon him gradually, until now it was his master. The city needed men of standing and force to win it from the rule of organized greed and unrighteousness, but he did not need its appeals. Thousands grew to millions and the passion increased. Men called him a kind man in his family and just to his men and an upright citizen, and from a commercial standard it was true. But the real things of his nature, of his home, of his men, and of the community, meant nothing to him. Like multitudes of others in this wealth-loving age, life was a question of buying and selling. Eternity had dropped out of his thought. God and humanity had ceased to exist. Sometimes, during these years, the thought of the spirit of his early home and the farewell words of his mother would call to him out of the past, but the call unheeded had been less clearly heard at each repetition. Is this to be another wasted life? Are all the prayers and teachings of the early days to be of no avail?

One day he was at work in his office. The total of the year's business and profits was in his hand. One million dollars had been added to his wealth. He was thinking how, if all his plans carried for the coming year, the profits would be double those of 1900. There was no thought in his mind of putting these profits to any helpful use. He was thinking only of larger gains. The commercial spirit of the age was incarnate in him. The moral and spiritual man was dead. A knock upon his office door disturbed his thoughts.

FLATTERY.

NE of the ancients said that he would rather be than seem to be a good man. "The more a man deserves praise, the less will he seek after it." To most men flattery is pleasant, and if only skillfully administered it is seldom refused. Honied words are agreeable to the ordinary palate, and "when a man's self-love meets with another man's flattery, it is a high praise that will not be believed." To fish for praise is a mean business. "He that loves to be flattered is worthy of the flatterer."

"Who flatters is of all mankind the lowest, Save him who courts the flattery."

Between judicious, well-merited commendation and flattery there is a wide distinction. "Honest commendation is noble, flattery is base." Honest commendation is helpful, flattery is harmful.

"No adulation—'tis the death of virtue."

Flattery strengthens imperfection; it is "the bellows that blows up sin." Those who feed their vanity upon undeserved praise are living upon empty husks, which can yield neither satisfaction nor strength.

The root of flattery is selfishness. The flatterer has always some personal end to gain, some ax to grind. "His words are softer than butter, but war is in his heart." Like the boa constrictor he licks his victim over before swallowing him. "Of all wild beasts," says Dr. Johnson, "preserve me from the flatterer."

Flattery is a gun that recoils at the breach. No man can indulge in the habit of flattering others without destroying self-respect. Every insincere word spoken lowers a man in his own eyes and saps the foundations of noble manhood. He who flatters ceases to stand erect; he has become a creeping, crawling thing, scorned by all good men and despised even by himself.

Few vices are more prevalent in social life than flattery. Newspapers live by it; art is prostituted to its service; the pulpit falls before its baleful influence, pronouncing fulsome eulogies over departed wickedness. The very gravestones flatter. "Where are the bad folk buried?" asked a little girl, "I can find only the graves of the good."

Against the insidious wiles of the flatterer all men require to be ever watchful. "When fortune comes smiling she often designs the most mischief; when she caresses a man too much it is apt to make a fool of him." How many a virtuous youth has flattery snared, first deceiving that it might afterward destroy?

"No visor doth become black villainy
So well as soft and tender flattery."

Although dressed in the livery of friendship, believe it not. A sinister and an evil motive lurks in its sweetest, smoothest words. "A man that flattereth his neighbor spreadeth a net for his feet."

"O, that men's ears should be
To counsel deaf, but not to flattery."

OUR PULPIT.

PARENT AND CHILD.

MARY TRAFFARN WHITNEY.

"Honor thy father and thy mother."—Exodus xxii:12.

HIS command should come first to the parents and afterward to the children. Fathers and mothers must lay the foundation for honor if they expect children to honor them.

The word honor, I believe, should be taken, not in a superficial way, as though it meant simply an outward, formal deference, but in its real meaning, which is reverence or respect paid to a person because of true worth.

A representative of the commonwealth is properly accorded a certain quality of honor because of the office he holds, whether or not he may be respected for himself. So also there is a certain respect and honor due to the office or position of the parent, and custom should undoubtedly demand that every child conduct himself in a respectful way to his father and mother, if for no other reason than that they are his parents. But when we come to talk about a child honoring his father and his mother in any true sense, which is to give them the genuine homage of his heart, it depends entirely upon what they are in themselves, whether he can do it or not.

Now consider what qualities always command respect, for children are not so different from grown people in this matter; they respect the same qualities in human nature.

First, then, everybody respects power and has a contempt for weakness. So, if we are to be honored by our children we must be strong, and the stronger we are the more honor we shall get, and every kind of strength counts. Just as the child learns to recognize physical force, so he very soon learns to measure intellectual and moral force.

And right here is a very important thing for us to consider. A child is of necessity weak. He is weak physically and we have at the first to carry him gently in our arms, then when he begins to creep we have to guard him from danger, and when he begins to try to walk we have to support him till little by little his limbs acquire strength. Our strength of body has to serve him in his physical weakness. Now why is it we do not realize that we must be to him morally and intellectually just what we are physically? A child's mind and moral nature are weak like his body, and until he is full grown he needs to lean up against the superior wisdom and virtue of the parent.

What mother is there who would push her baby over when he had climbed to his feet and stood smiling up to her face in the joy of having done so much for himself? But a little later that same little one is making another climb. This time it is his mind that wants to learn to walk, and he comes to her with an eager question. And what does she do? Perhaps she pushes him back with a falsehood, such "innocent" falsehoods as some mothers do tell their children; perhaps she says, "Oh, don't bother me with your answer him at all, and leaves him to fall for want of support.

The weak mind of the child just as naturally leans up against the strong mind of the parent as its weak body leans up against the strong body. His struggle with the world has just begun. He is trying with all his might to get acquainted with his environment and to understand what there is about him.

Moral Backbone.

Think, too, what it is for children as they grow older to keep finding that their parents have misrepresented things to them, and that the world and life are quite different from what they have been led to believe. They need moral bracing from the strong moral character of their parents, and here is where parents have got to say: "You must and you must not," and then be the unyielding force that compels them to obey.

Sam Jones tells about a man "with a cotton string for a back bone." Morally, children have such back bones as that, and if their parents haven't any good strong spinal columns for them to lean up against there is little hope of their doing right. We discuss the question of methods of punishment, but if parents had more backbone—more strength of character as a guide and support—there wouldn't be so much need of punishment of any kind. The weaker the parent the more punishment the child receives.

There is a weak sort of parental sentimentalism which pampers and indulges children and handles them in a lax way, and what does it lead to? It leads to lawlessness and contempt on the part of the children, and to a habit of threatening and hopeless despair on the part of the parents. That sentimentalism isn't love. Love is something stronger than that. It can say "no" as well as "yes." It can command as well as yield. The only kind of love that a child really respects and honors is that which has authority back of it, and weak people feel the need of being directed. So let us never think we can gain the love or respect of our children by indulgence and a weak management. Nothing can take the place of strength.

Another thing that people honor is wisdom. Every child begins by thinking that his parents know everything. But while that first illusion must of necessity be dispelled, yet there is no reason why we should sit still and let our children go far ahead of us while we are learning nothing. They may learn much that we cannot have an opportunity to learn, but let us be learning something all the time. If we are not we shall find them very soon looking down upon us from their superior knowledge and taking account of our ignorance—and nobody has any respect for ignorance. How many women give up their accomplishments, largely, as soon as they welcome the first baby! How many men settle down to business and drop all reading except the daily paper!

Then, again, everybody respects goodness, and by goodness I mean a combination of all the virtues; of kindness and patience, and honesty and industry, and truthfulness and all the rest. What we are speaks a great deal more effectively than what we say, and the thought of our children's regard ought to keep us from falling into follies or faults or vices. The world at large may never know what we have done, but if the home kingdom is made heavenly by our goodness our children will know it and do us honor. It pays when we have this thought in mind to cultivate all the virtues for home use.

Again, we hear so much about the duty of children to treat older people with respect that it probably will strike some as absurd to talk about parents treating their children respectfully. And yet I am quite sure that the children who are treated with the most respect will most honor those who thus treat them. The more children can be made to respect themselves the more respect they will have for others. Remember that self-respect is a very different thing from self-conceit. The former is to be encouraged in every way; the latter to be nipped in the bud. We must do our duty by them all along, that in the years to come there will be that sweet and beautiful companionship which is founded upon devoted love and unbounded respect.

Knowing How.

O how great this office of parentage is getting to seem! How we are beginning to study it and question what its duties are!

Much is said of motherhood—none too much—but not half enough is said of fatherhood. They are equal, and must rise together. The most stupendous business of life is in the hands of fathers and mothers. They are coworkers with God in the creation of the race, and upon them very largely devolves the responsibility of its training. Should they not, then, give infinitely more thought and study to the laws of human development than they do? How can they respect themselves when they take up this mighty task thoughtlessly and carelessly! All the great problems of the world must be solved within the home circle. I believe we shall yet prove that, begin where you will, everything good and everything bad can be traced back to the origin of life in a good or a bad parentage and good or bad homes. If we are to cleanse the stream of human life from all its defilement we must go back to its source.

We must learn the art of family culture as the florist learns the art of floriculture. The questions of marriage, of the rearing of children, of proper home conditions, of food and dress and exercise, and amusements, are all of the most vital concern to those who have taken up or expect to take up the duties of parents. Methods you will seek out for yourselves. Books and periodicals are at your command full of wise suggestions. Meetings for council are imperative—mothers' meetings, if it must be so, but parents' meetings are the ideal—genuine family-culture classes they should be. And this work reverently and conscientiously done will bring you into the very presence of the infinite Father, and make your life a psalm of praise.

FATHER'S CHILD.

My little girl to-night with childish glee,
Although her months had numbered not twoscore,
Escaped her nurse, and at my study door,
With tiny fingers rapping, spoke to me.
Though faint her words, I heard them tremblingly
Fall from her lips as if the darkness bore
Its weight upon her: "Father's child!" No more
I waited for, but straightway willingly
I brought the sweet intruder into light
With happy laughter. Even so some night,
When, from the nursing earth escaped and free,
My soul shall try in her first infant flight
To seek God's chamber, these two words shall be Those that will make him open his door to me.

JOSEPH SOLD INTO EGYPT.

Lesson for October 6, 1901.—Gen. 37:12-36.—Golden Text: The Patriarchs, moved with envy, sold Joseph into Egypt. Acts 7:9.

A CHICAGO TEACHER'S NOTES ON THE LESSON.

ELIAS A. LONG.

Location and Time.

Jacob, the father of Joseph, dwelt near Hebron; his sons pastured their sheep some seventy miles northward at Dothan. The date of our lesson is commonly conjectured at B. C. 1729 and 1728. Joseph was now seventeen and Jacob one hundred and eight years of age. Isaac still lived, blind and feeble, at the extreme age of 168 years.

Divine Character Building.

The story of Joseph is one of the most charming narratives in all history. Its importance is testified to by its length in the sacred annals. It occupies one-tenth of the book of Genesis. What this history has taught to all ages since Joseph is that it pays to be pure and true.

The life of Joseph contains an instructive application of the ladder emblem, reaching from earth to heaven, which appeared to his father Jacob many years before, and which indeed rises before every human being. It is the ladder leading to the higher life in God—the ladder of character building. As Joseph learned and as every Christian finds out, the ascending of this ladder is never a wholly easy task, although one that leads to glory, honor, peace and eternal life. Rom. 2:7, 10. It is a narrow, not a broad way. In it one must move and act, as did Joseph, for himself. It is moreover a slow course, step by step, looking up and lifting up. Joseph made a right start by fixing his eye on higher things. The first glimpse of him, with feet firmly set on this rising ladder, shows him seeking to reform the evil ways of his brothers. V. 2. His devotion to duty and to high ideals (Vs. 5-11) carried him to the pit and to prison, but at length he rises to a position conspicuous above his family and the world, save the Pharaoh.

Vs. 12-14. The Father's Anxiety. "Israel said." He who had been Jacob is now known by his new name. * * * "Unto Joseph," the elder of the two sons of Jacob by Rachel, his best beloved wife. He was his father's favorite, perhaps because he was an unusually good boy. Vexed by the evil conduct of his elder brothers who, as their history shows, were coarse and wicked men brought up under bad influences (Ch. 35: 2.) he takes it upon him to report them to their father (V. 2). This caused his brothers greatly to hate him. Their later envy was the result of Joseph's telling his dreams which pointed to high aspirations. * * * "I will send thee." He would send Joseph to inquire after their well-doing. No doubt the younger feared, as his father did not, the reception that would be given him by the rough shepherd brothers; he knew their ways better than did his father. * * * "Here am I." Not for an instant did Joseph shrink from ascending the ladder of duty. Possibly he thought that his long journey to reach them on a mission of love (V. 14) would win their hearts. For such a lad the trip of many miles across the plain was far from a light undertaking. It is sad to think that this was the last time the dutiful youth beheld his childhood home. * * * "Go, I pray thee." The father heart was anxious for the safety of his sons.

Vs. 15-17. The Further Search. "I seek my brethren." But Joseph did not find them at once. They had moved some distance beyond Shechem, doubtless seeking for better pasture. * * * "To Dothan." It was a long, weary trip, seventeen miles yet further north, which loomed before him.

Shall he extend his tiresome journey or shall he retrace his steps homeward? He is on the ladder of duty; he will with self-denial go forward.

Vs. 18-20. Brethren's Jealousy. "When they saw him." Moved by envy (see Golden Text), because his father had been especially drawn to his son's lovely character, the elder brothers sought his injury. We recall that envy led the Philistines to destroy much-needed wells in a dry land. In this instance, where love between the brothers should prevail for mutual strength and good, envy instead brings forth malice, deceit, lying, murderous intent and slavery. Envy is a soul poison. It is the very breath of the old serpent.

Vs. 21-22. Reuben's Intercession. "Reuben." This brother, as Jacob's first-born son, had more reason to be jealous of Joseph than the others, yet he proves his best friend. It is his privilege to be used of God for saving the life of his young brother and through him the life of multitudes later from famine. A man with strong natural inclinations toward evil, he yet possessed much true kindness of heart. Years later he pledged his life and that of his son's as sureties for Benjamin. Ch. 42:37. * * * "Said unto them." Besides his present argument against evil, we have an account of his charge, "Do not sin against the child." Ch. 42:22. Reuben, possibly because of Joseph's good influence over him, seems to stand next to Joseph (V. 22) in his hatred of evil. That he was serious is shown by his grief in V. 29, 30.

Vs. 23-24. The Desert Pit. "When Joseph was come." The design in the brothers' hearts was to slay him (V. 20). The mere intent to kill made them murderers in the sight of God. God holds any kind of hatred towards brothers to be as wicked as murder (1 John 3:15). * * * "They strip Joseph of his coat." They took this sign of his high esteem with his father. It was probably the sole garment worn by Joseph and henceforth he, like any other slave, would be carried in shameful nakedness into Egypt. Is. 20:4. * * * "Coat of many colors," perhaps formed of varied pieces of patch work. * * * "Cast him into a pit." This was on Reuben's suggestion. He thus hoped secretly to rescue him and spare his life. The pits or cisterns of that land were bottle-shaped, hence it was impossible for one imprisoned to escape. * * * "The pit was empty." Joseph's life was not to be taken by bloody murder, but evidently he must in that pit suffer that which was far worse, starvation (V. 26).

V. 25. Historical Meanness. "They sat down to eat." Perhaps the very dainties provided at home and which Joseph carried to them, while their brutality let the bearer of good will starve. From the confession of Ch. 42:21 we learn that this torment of Joseph filled his soul with "anguish," and although he pitifully entreated for release, "they would not hear." Ages after the prophet of God refers to this hard-hearted meanness: Amos 6:6. * * * "Lifted up their eyes." But God never meant that Joseph should perish in that pit. Even in this moment there draws nigh a caravan that led to his deliverance from death. While the brothers had eyes for the worldly chances of trade, they had no ears for a brother's woeful pleadings for life. * * * "Ishmaelites." In verse 28 they are called Midianites, in verse 36 Medanites. These tribes were near relatives and neighbors, who probably combined their caravans when carrying valuable commodities to far-away markets. Descendants as they were of Abraham, they likewise were relatives of Jacob's sons, but given to idolatry and slave dealing, "their hand against every man and every man's hand against them." Gen. 16:12. * * * "From Gilead...to Egypt." They were carrying spicery, balm and myrrh from Gilead, which was noted for these products (Jer. 8:22). In the wealthy markets of Egypt these were much in demand for embalming the dead, for idol worship, and for personal delight.

V. 26. A Troubled Conscience. "And Judah said." Judah, the fourth son of Jacob by Leah. He was a leader in family affairs and "prevailed above his brethren." 1 Chron. 5:2. That Judah, at least, had been touched by the anguish of Joseph's pleas for life is shown by Ch. 42:21. * * * "What profit, if we slay." Judah asks from the standpoint of self-interest. Aroused doubtless by Joseph's cries, he thinks of slavery as being much milder than slaying. But in God's sight sin is not graded as man sometimes calculates. Sin is treason, and like treason against government it is not the act, but the principle that condemns. * * * "Conceal his blood." But blood is not so easily covered. As in the case of Abel's blood, it would cry out of the ground unto God for judgment. Ch. 4:10.

V. 27. Appalled at Blood. "Let us sell." Slave trading was then common, as many inscriptions on Egyptian monuments show. The fact that within fifty years traffic in human beings was upheld by press and pulpit in our land must make us lenient in judging the people of that ancient time. This act of wickedness God overruled "to preserve life in famine." Ch. 45:4, 5. * * * "He is our brother." The mere fact that there was occasion to dissuade from taking the blood of a brother, shows how Satan held men captive to his will. They were as wicked as Cain. They denied that they were their brother's keeper. * * * "His brethren were content." At length they yield to the reasoning of influential Judah.

V. 28. The Sale of Human Flesh. "Then there passed by." That part of the train composed of Midianitish merchant men, who did purchasing. * * * "Sold for twenty pieces of silver." The bargain yielded two pieces of silver to each brother. It is thought that each was worth about 55 cents in our money. Many years later a Hebrew was valued at 30 shekels. Ex. 21:22. But this act doubtless was primarily done to destroy all chances of Joseph's dreams being realized. He was sold for a slave that he might never be a lord. He was sold into Egypt that he might never be lord over their family. They could sell him away from their own sight, but not away from God. "God was with him." Acts 7:9. Jesus was sold for 30 pieces of silver. Matt. 27:9. * * * "Brought Joseph to Egypt." What an inexpressibly hard and sad experience to this gentle youth, thus to be ruthlessly carried by coarse, unfeeling masters far from father and home. Yet this was the only road that opened to the greatness to which Joseph aspired. No progress to spiritual or material eminence is achieved apart from a hard, troublesome course. Tribulation developed, it did not alter Joseph's character. It was as a prisoner that Paul was brought to his great work in Rome. So Joseph's transfer to a contact with Egyptian civilization in time led his people through a schooling that fitted them to become a great nation.

V. 29. Reuben's Anguish. "And Reuben returned from the pit." Returned from tending the flocks to release Joseph as planned (V. 22) only to find that the brothers had taken advantage of that absence to dispose of Joseph. * * * "Behold Joseph was not." How sad a blow to the only brother who was kindly disposed towards the unfortunate lad. The rending of his clothes indicated his grief.

V. 30. The Missing Child. "Returned unto his brethren." Reuben was ignorant of the deep iniquity of selling his brother as a slave. * * * "The child is not." The allusion to Joseph as a child adds to the pathos of the story. He was perhaps small for his years. This impression on Reuben's mind continued until the restoration in Egypt. Ch. 42:13, 36. * * * "Whither shall I go?" With heart set on releasing Joseph and restoring him to his father, how could he turn back to that home with the pet of the family missing?

V. 31. Sin Begets Sin. "And killed a kid." The sin of lying now is added to that of murder in their hearts. The kid's blood was to serve in acting out the lie on their father. It is the nature of sin to enlarge upon itself. * * * "Dipped the coat in the blood." To be used to further the scheme of deception. They felt doubtless that their father, by his partiality, had given them cause for irritation. As God is no respecter of persons, so we should always avoid showing favor. This lesson is an impressive comment on the evils of favoritism in the family.

V. 32. Dreadful Life's Secret. "And sent the coat...to their father." Sent it by a messenger, as they dare not face their father's first grief for his lost child. * * * "This have we found." A falsehood direct. Crime begets crime, one sin begets another. * * * "Thy son's coat." They would cast the blame upon some wild beast. They were worse than dumb beasts of prey. Later the brothers were brought to admit their guilt. Ch. 42:21.

V. 33-34. 'It Is My Son's Coat.' This the father's eager eye would at once discern. * * * "An evil beast hath devoured." Upon Jacob there now was visited the same kind of deception he had committed against his own father. Very likely, if Jacob had not lived the life of hard dealing with Laban and others, his own sons would not so well have known deceit. Jacob's sin visited him stroke by stroke for many years. "Be sure your sin shall find you out." Num. 32:23. * * * "And Jacob rent his clothes." He was inconsolable. Even the passing of many years could not blot out his grief. Besides rending his clothes as Reuben had done, he put sackcloth on his loins. He mourned for his son many days.

So much we miss,
If love is weak, so much we gain,
If love is strong. God thinks no pain
Too sharp or lasting to ordain
To teach us this.

FIVE-MINUTE SERMON ON THE GOLDEN TEXT.

PETER AINSLIE.

OF all the mean things in this world, envy is the meanest. It is the parent of multitudes of crimes. It plots and plans in the dark and then, like Joab smiting Abner, it does its work under the pretense of friendship. Said Socrates: "Envy is the daughter of pride, the author of murder and revenge, the beginner of secret sedition, the perpetual tormentor of virtue. Envy is the filthy slime of the soul; a venom, a poison, a quicksilver, which consumeth the flesh and drieth up the marrow of the bones." Publius, one day observing the sadness of Mutius, said: "Either some great evil has happened to Mutius, or some great good to another," and who has not seen men like this envious Roman citizen? Out of envy Cain slew Abel, Saul persecutes David and Caligula slew his brother because he was more handsome than himself. Dionysius could neither sing nor argue, but the music of Philoxenus and the philosophy of Plato moved him to envy their excellencies and execute punishment upon them. What strange history this single passion has written! I take up the transactions of daily life and here and there are actions so treacherous and vile that there can be no excuse other than that character has reversed itself and love lies murdered beneath the feet of envy. It is found in every class and condition of society. There is a man who does not like to hear anybody else praised, especially if that man is in the same business or profession as he is, or some woman who dislikes to hear any other woman complimented. You may not think that much of a sin, but the Almighty has placed it right by the side of drunkenness, lying and adultery. Wherever there is anything so unclean, let the Word of God in that the heart may be cleansed. None of us need glory that we are free from envy until we are free from all sin, but every one of us should contend against it and fight the symptoms in us as we would the symptoms of smallpox or yellow fever. It has been the damnation of countless souls.

Our Father, hear us and cleanse us from all envy through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR.

CHARLES BLANCHARD.

THE GRACE OF GIVING.

Topic Oct. 6. Ref. 2 Cor. 8:7-9.

HEREFORE, as ye abound in everything, in faith, and utterance, and knowledge, and in all diligence, and in your love to us, see that ye abound in this grace also." We have in this a summing up of the Christian graces. Faith is first. Without faith it is impossible to please God or benefit mankind. There is no abounding in anything without faith. Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. Doubt may sometimes be loquacious, but is always heartless. And for the most part doubt is speechless. There is little in a negation to give wings to words or to make the lips move majestically. Faith has the prophet's face, and speaks with prophetic voice.

Therefore let us abound in faith, that we may abound in utterance and in all knowledge. But there must be knowledge before utterance? Yes! But knowledge can only increase as we give utterance to our spiritual aspirations and convictions. The reason so many make so little progress in the Christian life—so little growth in grace and knowledge, is because they do not give utterance to their faith and their hope, their love and their longing. Hope dies in the heart unless we speak. Love beats its breath out against the prison bars unless they that love the Lord speak often one to another. It is the human way; it is the divine way. Abounding in utterance is still the royal way to knowledge. The silent soul is selfish. One of the blessings of the spiritual reign of Messiah was foretold in the words—"The tongue of the dumb shall sing." "Let the redeemed of the Lord say so." It is thus the knowledge of the Lord is spread abroad. The Church is suffering from a great overplus of dumb disciples.

Abounding in Diligence.

"Diligent in business" is another expression of Paul's. His own wonderfully busy life is the best commentary on these words. We may learn from Paul what his conception of diligence was, and what he means by abounding "in all diligence." It is a marvelously inclusive phrase. Perhaps it is the one thing beyond all others in which we fail. "Diligent in business" means in the Lord's work. The work of the Church requires business tact, sense, diligence, fervency, along with the faith that removes mountains and the love that endureth all things, hopeth all things, and never faileth.

"This Grace Also."

Paul adds this last as an exhortation "to prove the sincerity of your love." It is to us as to the Corinthians. And it is needed today as then—in Chicago as in Corinth; in country hamlet as on Church avenue. It was not added as an after-thought, but is the very important thing that the apostle started out to say. Abounding in everything else, if it were possible, would still leave the soul dwarfed and impoverished without "this grace also." It is, in Paul's thought, the crowning grace of the full-rounded and developed Christian character. It is the proof of the sincerity of our love, of our devotion. There is no real devotion without this sense of duty and of genuine spiritual delight in giving—cheerfully, continuously; not of constraint, nor of commandment, but of a willing mind; taking joyfully the spoiling of our goods, as the Hebrew worthies, knowing that we have in heaven a better and an enduring substance.

Oliver Wendell Holmes mourned that it was his evil fortune to be born in a time when children were neglected and older people made much of, and to grow old in a time when the aged were neglected and children received all attention.

Every boy and girl in the land would do well to treasure the remarks of former President Cleveland, when, in paying his tribute to the memory of President McKinley, he said: "He was never ashamed to follow through life the teachings of his mother." We realize that not all boys and girls have a mother's guidance, and here and there may be found a mother whose influence is not good, but in the main the lessons taught by our mothers are worth making the foundation for a whole life's action.—Record-Herald.

BY THE REV. ALEXANDER SMELLIE, M. A.

JACOB A PRINCE WITH GOD.

"Men ought always to pray and not to faint."—Luke 18:1.

Monday—Genesis 32. 1—12.

THE angels of God met him." For me, as well as for the patriarch, God has provided the gracious ministry of the angels.

Since Jesus was born in my world, and died, and rose again, I do not make so much of the angels as the Old Testament saints did; and it is right that, beside him, they should dwindle into subordination and insignificance. Yet their solemn troops and sweet societies are sent forth to aid and succor me. The greatest of them is ready to befriend me, so weak and poor. It must be because God desires to extend the empire of love and service and sacrifice as widely as possible, and so he gives the cherubim and seraphim my imperiled and helpless life for which to care. I cannot tell how many are the stumbling blocks they may remove from my path, how many are the temptations they may strengthen me to overcome, how many are the holy resolutions they may breathe into my soul. The world of good spirits is present, not absent, not distant. It is not above the sky nor beyond the grave. It is now and here.

Tuesday—Genesis 32. 13—23.

Jacob has not come to his wits' end yet. He is planning and scheming how he is to make his escape from Esau. But there is no salvation for him or for me along that road.

I cannot shape my own course. It is right that I should exercise thought, discretion, foresight; but when everything has been done, there comes a point when I have simply to trust. Without God I cannot move forward a single step.

Much more is this true in my spiritual life. There is mystery, there is divinity, in it from its commencement to its consummation. I am unable to redeem my soul. I am unable to sanctify and perfect my nature. I am unable to win and secure my heaven. If God is not for me, everything is lost, for I am helpless and impotent.

Wednesday—Genesis 32. 24—32.

Sometimes God's ancient people called themselves Hebrews, sometimes Jews, sometimes Israelites. And the last is the sublimest title of the three. The first is the Pilgrim name, and the second is the National name, but the third is the Covenant name.

Would I be an Israelite? I must be humbled, as Jacob was. I must be driven out from all self-conceit and self-glorifying.

Then I must cling about the feet of the Lord who has conquered and abased me. I must weep and make supplication to him. I must refuse to let him go except he bless me. And on my ears and into my soul must fall his message of forgiveness, restoration, uplifting. It is a Gospel for me alone—"Fear not, I have redeemed thee," "I give thee the white stone and the new name," "I lift thee out of the dust, and now thou art a prince with me."

Thursday—Genesis 33. 1—11.

Difficulties turn out to be nothing when first I have met with God. Clouds that I feared break in blessings on my head. Enemies are transmuted into helpers, friends, brothers indeed.

So are my fears dispelled. I have a hundred haunting anxieties about the natural life, about the spiritual life, about the everlasting life, about my own and those of others. I cannot shake myself clear from them. But let me try the plan of telling God about them all, and the dreads and the misgivings will be gone.

So is my progress secured. I am on the road to the inheritance, the land of promise, the city which hath the foundations. But obstacles are continually starting up in the way, obstacles from within and from without. There are lions in the path. But let me pray, and the rough places will be made plain.

Prayer is a "breath that flits beyond this iron world, and touches him that made it."

Friday—2 Kings 19. 14—20.

Here is a good man whose first thought in trouble is to carry the distress to God. The temple and the altar are Hezekiah's natural and inevitable refuge; he never thinks of going anywhere else. I would be like him. I would flee to God before consulting with any human helper, and before sitting down to ponder the matter in my own mind.

Here is a good man who does not presume to dictate to God how he is to act. Hezekiah spreads the insulting letter of the Assyrian prince before the heavenly King; he explains his own sorrow and need; and there he stops. He does not prescribe to One so much wiser than himself. Thus, having told my Father everything, let me leave him to decide what to do. He makes no mistakes. He will choose the right path.

Saturday—Psalm 34. 1—10.

This poor man cried. Often my prayer must be a cry direct, intense, agonizing. The clouds have overspread my sky. I am walking through the floods on foot. I stand in the furnace which has been heated seven times.

There is a fine old man, Thomas Crann, in one of George MacDonald's books, who gives us a page of his spiritual history. One evening, in a lonely peat-moss, the sense of his sin came to him. He stood looking west, where the sun had gone down and left a red light behind. All night he stood, or lay, or knelt on the cold ground, calling to the Lord for grace. And in the morning his face was toward the rising sun, and he crept out of the bog and home. Three days went over him, in which he tasted nothing but a drop of milk and water. And on the fourth day, in the afternoon, he rose and went to his work, with his heart like to break for gladness. He knew that he was one of the chosen.

Sunday—Matthew 15. 21—28.

She had everything against her. There was her heathen upbringing. That she should venture to the holy Presence and the gracious Face tells me not to despair, even if against me "from my cradle do fate and my fathers fight." Christ is stronger than heredity and environment.

There were the delays and discouragements of Jesus. And this was the sorest grief of all. He, who was usually so tender, met this pleader with argument and rebuff. But still she went on praying, for, if he repelled her with one hand, she felt him uphold her with the other. So let me do. My Lord may try my trust, my perseverance, my whole-heartedness. But in the end he is sure, sure, to bless.

General Church News

Sunday School Convention.

The Sunday School Convention of the State of Wisconsin met at Waukesha Sept. 18th and 19th. There was a good attendance. A song service was participated in by the Methodist and Baptist choirs under the direction of J. B. Hayes. Rev. R. S. Ingraham of Milwaukee presided. Rev. Ingraham will preside at all the sessions, as he is vice-president of the association. The president, Rev. Willet, has removed from the state. Attorney E. W. Chaffin delivered the address of welcome and extended the delegates a hearty greeting. Rev. Ingraham responded. Marion Lawrence was then introduced as speaker of the evening, and delivered an excellent address on "Organization for Evangelization," giving a detailed history of the work of Sunday school conventions since the first one held in New York City in 1832. He spoke of the necessity of good organizations in all things. The session closed with "Pillow Texts," by Rev. E. A. Potter of Mukwonago.

"If the city council will not clean the city walls, then I say the city council should be cleaned," were the words uttered by Alfred Day, general secretary of the Michigan State association, during his address on "The Child in the Midst," at the Sunday school convention last evening. He had been speaking of objectionable theatrical pictures being posted in conspicuous places on city bill boards.

The State Sunday school convention held its final session at the Methodist church. It was opened by a short song service under the direction of Mr. Rockland of Chicago. The principal speaker of the evening was Marion Lawrence, who gave an interesting talk on "The Big Boy Problem." He urged that boys should receive more help and sympathy from their parents, as they were often neglected much more than their sisters, although they really ought to receive more attention owing to the increased temptations to which they are exposed.

Religion in Summer.

Much has been said of late in regard to the stagnation in church work by reason of the long summer vacation of pastors and people. There has never before been so small an attendance in the city churches as is reported for this past summer. More than one note of discouragement has been sounded, and some have suggested that the example of the few be followed by the many in closing the church building entirely for several weeks, for even those who do not leave town seem to think themselves excused from attendance at church. It is encouraging in the face of these experiences to note that in some directions and in some cities religious work has been pushed with great vigor and that certain forms of work have brought exceedingly good results.

It has been demonstrated very convincingly both in city and country that out-door services attract the people. Chicago, St. Louis, Kansas City, Pittsburg and Philadelphia have each had their tent meetings, which have drawn large crowds and have had their fruit in conversions and in accessions to the churches. On the West Side of Chicago over 12,000 people attended the union tent meetings under the auspices of forty-seven Christian Endeavor societies. More than 500 responded to the invitation to become Christians. Various churches in other parts of the city have either separately or jointly conducted tent services with proportionately good results.

In St. Louis the Presbyterians have had two tents the Menard street mission having from 400 to 500 people at a service, and Grace Church receiving sixteen into its membership as the current result of its tent meetings. The Congregationalists have conducted from two to five open-air services a week. In one case the announcement of such a service was received by men with a clapping of hands, and some were on hand at 7 o'clock waiting for the preaching that was to begin at 8. In another case a far larger congregation gathered weekly than was ever assembled inside the church. The Compton Avenue Presbyterian Church had its evening service on the church lawn, with an attendance of about 300. The Newell meetings at the Coliseum have been attended by from 100 to 500 every night, except Wednesday, during the summer. Pittsburg and Philadelphia have had several tents in use for many weeks, with over a thousand in attendance at a single service, and a large number of conversions. Many smaller cities and towns have like stories to tell of good work done.

In the country grove meetings have been held with great success. No tents or other shelter than the trees are used. From Wisconsin particularly we hear of these grove services being held every night in the week, with four on Sunday, and having large congregations. Though held at the busiest season of the year for the country, people have come six miles regularly on week nights. Many have been brought to Christ. On Sundays the people bring their lunch baskets and come prepared to spend the day, so the four services have each a good attendance. And the experience of Sunday brings them back to the week-night service. The churches in the neighborhood have been greatly strengthened and built up. In one region nearly every household for several miles along a main road has come into church and Sunday school relations.

Jubilee of Congregational Home Missions in Minnesota.

The jubilee service of Congregational missions in Minnesota was the central feature of the program of the forty-sixth annual meeting of the Congregational General Association of the state. This service was held on Wednesday afternoon, Sept. 18, at the First Congregational church, Minneapolis. Minnesota has been emphatically missionary ground. As early as 1832 Rev. Mr. Boutwell commenced Protestant work for the Indians, under the American Board of Foreign Missions. In '47 the American Home Missionary Society came to the state with Rev. E. B. Neil and Rev. J. C. Whitney as missionaries at Stillwater, St. Paul and St. Anthony. It will be remembered that this society was fostering both Presbyterian and Congregational churches. These two men were Presbyterians and their work followed on that line. Congregational work in the state began with the coming of Richard Hall and Charles Seccombe in 1850, and in November, 1851, the latter became the pastor of the First Congregational Church in Minnesota, situated at St. Anthony. These early beginnings of missionary work in the state may be said perhaps to have shown their first results in the serious tone and high ideals of the first legislature of Minnesota. In resolutions passed, morality and religion were regarded as of most essential elements of education. A knowledge of man's relation to the uni-

A UNIVERSAL FOOD.

Following Nature's Footsteps.

"I have a boy, two years old, weighing forty pounds and in perfect health, who has been raised on Grape-Nuts and milk.

"This is an ideal food and evidently furnishes the elements necessary for a baby as well as for adults. We have used Grape-Nuts in large quantities and greatly to our advantage."—F. W. Leavitt, Minneapolis, Minn.

One advantage about Grape-Nuts Food is that it is pre-digested in the process of manufacture; that is, the starch contained in the wheat and barley is transformed into grape-sugar in exactly the same method as this process is carried out in the human body, that is by the use of moisture and long exposure to moderate warmth, which grows the diastase in the grains and makes the remarkable change from starch to grape-sugar. Therefore, the most delicate stomach can handle Grape-Nuts and the food is quickly absorbed into the blood and tissue, certain parts of it going directly to building and nourishing the brain and nerve centers.

Made at the pure food factories of the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

verse was to be the aim of the educational work of the state.

At the end of fifty years the statistical results are 257 Congregational churches in Minnesota, eighty of which are self-sustaining. The Congregational Church membership is 18,000. Yearly these churches give $50,000 to benevolence and expend for home support about $140,000. The working capital for this large missionary enterprise has come mainly from the east and has been under the fostering care of the Congregational Home Missionary Society. The annual investment has been as high as $25,000, and last year the appropriation was nearly $12,000. Of this $12,000, the churches of the state have furnished to the mother society over $6,000. Thus a percentage of one-half has been attained, and the resolutions, which were adopted with enthusiasm, indicate a purpose of further progress in the direction of complete home support of the missionary work in the state.

For this jubilee service the Rev. Jas. W. Strong, D. D., president for twenty-three years of the Minnesota Home Missionary Society, was in the chair; the annual report of that society was given by Rev. Geo. M. Morrison of St. Paul. Rev. Richard Hall, the first Congregational missionary, and Rev. C. S. Harrison, who also came early to the pioneer work, spoke of the beginning in Minnesota. Miss C. W. Nichols told of the woman's work, Rev. S. V. S. Fisher, of the foreign department, and the society's state superintendent, Rev. George R. Merrill, D. D., spoke with enthusiasm of the outlook. Rev. Dr. L. H. Cobb, now of New York, but for seven years the state's missionary superintendent, gave the address of the afternoon. The whole meeting was enthusiastic and hopeful. What the Congregational brotherhood has done for the southern half of Minnesota in the past fifty years must and will be repeated in even larger measure for the northern half of the state in the next half century. It may be noted that this great state, containing an area greater than all New England, is but half settled, that at present the frontier missionary work is no farther north than Cass Lake, and that already to the north of this point there are 10,000 settlers and a new and vigorous population pouring in.

The services were continued after an evening collation, provided by the ladies of the church, in an anniversary service of the fifty years completed by this first church of Minnesota—the First Congregational Church of St. Anthony, now the First Congregational Church of Minneapolis—and with fitting invocation, music and short addresses the happy occasion was commemorated.

The closing appointment of this great day in the history of Minnesota Congregationalism was an address to the association by the Rev. W. Douglas Mackenzie, D. D., of the Chicago Theological Seminary, on "The Coming Kingdom of Our Christ." In masterful sentences of deep devotion Dr. Mackenzie stirred all hearts to a profounder loyalty to him, the lowly Nazarene, the man of Galilee, the great teacher who was above all the universal King of all men, all times, all circumstances, whose kingdom was of all earth and all heaven without separation.

The nation's great loss in the death of President McKinley, the fifty-year commemoration, and the general theme of the addresses—"Our Realization of the Presence of God"—combined to make this one of the most impressive and useful meetings of the association.

CHICAGO AND VICINITY

The National Purity Convention will meet in Chicago October 8-10 in the First Methodist church, corner Clark and Washington streets. Several well-known speakers and writers are on the program. Mrs. E. M. Whittemore, founder of the "Door of Hope" rescue homes, will be among these, Madame Klerck, who is engaged in a similar work in Holland also, with many others engaged in the same lines of work.

The home and the responsibilities of parents will be discussed by Dr. Mary Wood-Allen, Mrs. Emma F. Drake, Chas. A. Mitchell and others. Rev. Frank M. Carson, Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, Dr. Carolyn Geisel are among the Chicago speakers. "The Legalization of Vice in the Philippines is to be spoken of by Wm. P. Ferguson, editor of the New Voice. Municipal relation to vice will be considered by Maurice Gregory of London and others.

Ground was broken for the new Presbyterian church at Maywood on September 8. Rev. G. P. Williams, presbyterial secretary of home missions, made the principal address. A former pastor, Rev. H. R. Stark, Rev. C. S. Hoyt, D. D., of Oak Park, and Rev. W. W. Johnstone of River Forest, also made addresses. The estimated cost of the building is $10,000, including furnishings. The seating capacity will be 340. The pastor is Rev. Edward Campbell.

Rev. H. S. Jenkinson will supply the pulpit of the Presbyterian church at Pullman. The Green Stone church, as it is called, is the only church in that suburb. It is owned by the Pullman Company and rented by the Presbyterians.

The First Baptist church of West Pullman was recognized by council September 12. Rev. Dr. Wm. Lawrence preached the sermon.

Warren Avenue Congregational church has raised the funds necessary for the removal of its debt and the erection of a new Sunday school building.

Baptist.

Twenty-one missionaries sailed from Boston for foreign fields under the auspices of the American Baptist Missionary Union, September 18. Farewell services were held in the First Church of Cambridge on the Monday previous. Burmah, Assam and South India are their respective destinations.

A revival at the Bethlehem Baptist church, nine miles from Centralia, Mo., has resulted in about 100 conversions. Seventy-five have united with the church.

Rev. D. D. MacLaurin, D. D., who has just left the Woodward Avenue church, Detroit, Mich., for Rochester, N. Y., after a nine years' pastorate, has received into the church during that time more than 900 persons. More than $30,000 has been contributed by the Detroit church to various enter-

LIKE OPIUM EATERS.

Coffee Drinkers Become Slaves

"The experience, suffering and slavery of some coffee drinkers would be almost as interesting as the famous 'Confessions of an Opium Eater,'" says a Boston man, W. J. Tuson, 131 W. Newton St. "For twenty years I used coffee at the breakfast table, and, incidentally, through the day, I craved it as a whiskey drinker longs for his morning bracer. I knew perfectly well that it was slowly killing me, but I could not relinquish it.

"The effect on the nervous system was finally alarming and my general health greatly impaired. I had dyspepsia, serious heart difficulty, and insomnia. When I would lie down, I would almost suffocate. My doctor assured me it was due to the action of caffeine (which is the active principle of coffee) on the heart.

"I persisted in its use, however, and suffered along just as drunkards do. One day when I was feeling unusually depressed, a friend whom I met looked me over and said: 'Now, look here, old man, I believe I know exactly what's the matter with you. You are a coffee fiend and it's killing you. I want to tell you my experience. I drank coffee and it ruined my nerves, affected my heart, and made me a sallow, bilious old man, but through a friend who had been similarly afflicted, I found a blessed relief and want to tell you about it. Try Postum Food Coffee, a grateful, delicious beverage, full of nourishment, that will satisfy your taste for coffee and feed your nervous system back into health, rather than tear it down as coffee has been doing.'

"I took my friend's advice, and within a week from that time my digestion seemed perfect, I slept a sweet, refreshing sleep all night, and my heart quit its quivering and jumping. I have been steadily gaining in health and vitality right along."

prises of the denomination while Dr. MacLaurin has been its pastor.

At the meeting of the Springfield Association held in Jacksonville, Ills., the reports from the twenty churches constituting the association showed a substantial growth in membership and increased contributions to missionary work. The number of baptisms in sixteen out of the twenty churches was 215, an increase of fifty over the last year. The total membership of the association is now 4,158, as against 1,981 in the year 1881. The Sunday school attendance has also made corresponding advance from 1,246 to 2,950 pupils and the number of teachers has increased from 130 to 340, showing a continuous and growing interest in this department of Christian service. Among the resolutions adopted was an emphatic one in which the association "Expresses its unqualified disapproval of the efforts now being made to restore the system of army canteens."

Rev. John Brainerd Wilson, who has been pastor for nine years of the First church of Dorchester, Mass., becomes assistant pastor now of the Washington Avenue church, Brooklyn, N. Y. Mrs. Sarah Potter, who has been the church missionary for thirty years, having resigned, the need of a strong man as an assistant pastor was felt. Besides assisting in pastoral work, Mr. Wilson will have special oversight of the young people's work and will teach in the Sunday school and institute classes for Bible study.

The Burlington Baptist Association at its meeting September 5-7 appointed an educational commission, whose work shall be to hold in each church during the coming year an educational convention with the purpose to awaken interest and generate enthusiasm in the great matter of Christian education. The commission is a vigorous one, having Pastor Bovell of Walnut Street church as its head and by a series of addresses on higher education in each church, it is hoped much may be accomplished. The Sunday school topic called forth earnest discussion, evidencing a desire for larger and improved work.

The National Baptist Convention, a missionary organization under the control of colored Baptists, held its sessions in Cincinnati, with an attendance of at least 1,800.

A great revival has been in progress at Dry Ridge church, Ky.; the result was 227 conversions, with 119 baptisms.

Half a teaspoon in half a glass of water, when exhausted, depressed or weary from overwork, worry or insomnia, nourishes, strengthens and imparts new life and vigor.

Congregational.

Rev. D. D. Davis of Minneapolis, Minn., has been called to the Second Congregational church of Ottumwa, Iowa. It is understood that he will accept.

Tallmadge, Ohio, church has had a recent gift of $4,000 towards an endowment.

The First Polish Protestant church building in Detroit, Mich., was dedicated September 8. The church is a branch of the First Congregational church and was started in 1884, the first work of the kind for Poles in America. It has sixty-five enrolled members. Rev. John Lewis, who knows the Polish language, is the pastor. The first church sustains also a Polish lady missionary, who goes daily from house to house, carrying the gospel into the homes of the Polanders. This is the first of four churches being built by the Congregational Union of Detroit.

Fountain Park, St. Louis, has divided its parish into eight sections and formed a band of "church workers," a group having charge of each section.

At Osage, Iowa, Rev. B. C. Preston received twenty-two to membership at the last communion, sixteen on confession, among them several business men.

A village with one church is somewhat of a rarity, but it has existed in New Hampshire for a century and a half. And it has not gone to sleep either. During the eight years during which Rev. Rufus P. Gardner has been pastor, a parsonage has been built at a cost of $4,600, the chapel decorated, a furnace installed in the church, a piano purchased, the edifice improved and redecorated and a pipe organ purchased.

The annual statement of the American Board of Foreign Missions for the fiscal year was made public today. Receipts, applicable for current expenses, reached $697,370, and total expenditures $717,081, while the excess of expenditures over receipts was $19,710, which, added to the debt of a year ago, makes the present debt $182,341. The board is said to be in a much stronger financial condition than a year ago, notwithstanding the increased debt.

The Disciples.

Rev. J. H. O. Smith, formerly pastor of the West Side Christian church of Chicago, but lately engaged in evangelistic work in Texas, has accepted a call to the First church, Valparaiso, Ind.

The corner-stone of the new church in Springfield, Ill., has been laid, and it is hoped the edifice will be ready for use in December.

At Riverton, Iowa, a five weeks' meeting has added eighty-five to the mission.

At Crockett, Texas, a church of fifty-six members was organized lately and a house of worship dedicated. The latter cost $3,500.

Out of a membership of ninety-eight in the Christian church at Hot Springs eighty-three contribute to the support of the church and seventy-two of these made a definite pledge in advance and paid the same in full during each quarter.

esteem and warm affection. He was nearly 80 years old. The educational institutions he has established will be his best memorial.

The Sunday school commission of the diocese of New York has nearly completed a thorough register of Sunday school teachers and is ready to act as a teachers' bureau wherein teachers may register free when desiring positions, particularly as paid primary and Bible class instructors.

Rev. Sydney G. Jeffords of St. Paul's church, Peoria, Ill., recently completed the twelfth year of his rectorate. He has baptized during that time 142 adults and 433 infants, and presented for confirmation 390. The church has raised for all purposes $94,207.35.

The annual convocation of South Dakota showed a most successful condition of affairs within its boundaries. More clergymen are at work and more money has been raised than during any previous year. The Sunday schools within the jurisdiction raised for general missionary work more than $100,000.

A committee of the diocesan convention of Central New York on Sunday school work reports four schools having regular examinations on the catechism, seven having examinations on the general lesson, and fifty-two no examinations at all. About 50 per cent of the confirmation candidates of the diocese are gathered from the Sunday schools. Twenty-two of them give all their contributions to the support of their own work. There are forty-eight different text-books reported.

Methodist.

The report of the presiding elder for the district of Grand Rapids, Mich., shows that within the year there has been a gain of three percent in membership. Under the ministrations of the various churches the conversion of 700 persons is reported. Only two churches in the district carry mortgages and one of these will be lifted in December. Towards the endowment fund some $50,000 in cash has been raised and promises of $20,000 more. At the annual meeting of the church temperance society Judge Grant made a strong plea for the enforcement of law, particularly in regard to the liquor question.

Rev. Sherman P. Young of Salem, Ill., is to exchange pastorates with Rev. T. DeWitt Peake of Geneva, Wis. Park Avenue church, Minneapolis, has cleared itself of debt which has been hanging over it for years.

The Norwegian-Danish Methodist church in this country has now nearly 300 ministers and about 190 churches. It owns over $1,000,000 worth of property in churches and parsonages. The next annual convention will be held at the Maplewood Avenue church, Chicago.

Presbyterian.

At Havre, Montana, a new church has just been completed, costing $3,000. It is very convenient and attractive. Fifteen persons have recently been received into membership and nine have been baptized. Under the Rev. F. Poole encouraging progress is being made. The church has undertaken this year $100 more of self-support.

A good beginning of the winter's work was that made September 1 by the First church, Wichita. Dr. C. E. Bradt, the pastor, received twenty-six new members, half of the number being on confession of faith.

The membership at Shawnee, Oklahoma, has increased 100 per cent during the eighteen months that Rev. S. A. Fulton has been pastor. Self-support has been also attained.

The sixth annual synodical convention of colored Sunday schools was held August 29 and September 1 at Aberdeen, N. C. The eleven colored missionaries of this body were all present. Every one is a credit to his vocation, earnest, wideawake and aggressive. Eighty-four churches now connected with the Northern church have been the direct outgrowth of Sunday schools planted by the missionaries of the Board of Publication and Sabbath School Work.

The Christian League, Chinese Mission, of Philadelphia, had a mass meeting one Sunday evening in August in front of the mission house on Race street. The gospel was preached in both English and Chinese. A large crowd gathered and the balconies and windows of the Chinese dwellings on both sides of the street were filled with eager listeners. An interesting feature of the service was the reading of the Scriptures in Chinese by a young Christian Chinese boy of fifteen years, and the interest deepened as one after another of the Christian members of the mission stood up and before that great heathen crowd of their countrymen joyfully testified to their love for Christ, and urged their Chinese friends to worship the true and living God. At the close of the service, the Chinese converts joined in singing, in their native language, "Stand Up, Stand Up for Jesus," and then in response to a cordial invitation tendered to the Chinese by Mr. Poole, they flocked into the mission rooms, where devoted Christian workers were kept busy teaching these strangers from a distant land.

I went home again and commenced a regular treatment with the Blood Vitalizer, which had been highly recommended to me. Today I am as well as I was when in my best years."

The First church, Rochester, N. Y., has assumed the support of a missionary in China. The Brick church in the same city has within the past three months assumed the full support of two home missionaries and one foreign missionary. The Central church also has three missionaries, one in the home field and two in the foreign field. The Sabbath school of Westminster church is responsible for part support of a missionary in China.

Foreign Missionary Items.

Rev. Mr. Miyama, the widely known temperance lecturer of Japan, has made a tour this year of the Island of Shikoku, arriving at Matsuyama station May 17, and remaining six days. During that time he spoke sixteen times, not counting the talks to small groups of people, and his set speeches exceeded twenty hours. His visit brought much good to the city, and since his departure the work has been exceptionally active and successful. One result was the proposition to hold a week of prayer meetings, this coming from one of the older and usually indifferent Christians, and the proposition was carried out. Following this week of prayer it was decided to hold a week of preaching meetings, and as an advertisement of these, a number of the young men undertook street preaching for the first time in the history of the work here. Mr. Gulick considered it a sure sign of grace, for hitherto the pastor and Christians have said in response to any such suggestion, "that it might be all right in America and England, but was worse than useless in Japan, as it would make the people despise us." The week of preaching was signally successful, the average Sunday audiences rose from 70 to 110 and the last night to 145, while 30 or 40 stood up outside during the two long sermons. As a result of these meetings, three old Christians, leading merchants who have long done business on Sunday, have now closed their stores and decided to observe the Sabbath strictly. Some old Christians have given up their tobacco as they feel they cannot glorify God by smoking. A temperance society has also been formed of about seventy members.

From Hainan, China, comes this word: "We expect to hold communion services in the Hospital chapel on next Sunday. We examined six candidates yesterday. Of three of these I would like to speak individually. The first is a woman who brought her little daughter here to the hospital sick with the plague; the girl died at the hospital, but the mother, instead of becoming bitter because her daughter was not cured, began to inquire more about the gospel, and has developed a very lovable character. The second one is a woman who, up to a year ago, had bound feet, but she has since unbound them, and a few weeks ago took the ancestral tablet and all the idols out of her house and gave them to Mrs. McCandliss. The third woman has been until lately a maker of incense sticks, but being convinced that it was wrong, gave it up, though she had no other prospect of making a living, and when the opportunity was given her of carrying earth, she was willing to do that rather than work at her former occupation."

The Y. P. S. C. E. has become firmly established in Madura and is an important part of the work of the mission. Every station boarding school in the mission is the home of one of these societies while the society in many village congregations assists the catechist in the Christian work of the village. At present there are 86 societies with 782 active and 1,494 associate members. These societies are scattering the seed, some in street preaching, some in carrying on Hindu Sunday schools and others in revival meetings carried on at their own expense in their own church home. In Melur after the Christian Endeavor superintendent had talked to the boys about volunteer service, he heard a small boy's voice singing a Christian song along the road. When he came near he found one of the Endeavor boys all by himself singing to a crowd of men who were passing, and distributing tracts amongst them.

The Christian of London pays a deserved compliment to the Girl's School or Protestant College, which American Methodists have erected in the city of Rome. It occupies a fine building on the Via Veneto, facing the present palace of Queen Margherita. Starting five years ago with but ten pupils it now numbers 165 students under twenty professors and other teachers. "Crandon Hall," as its new building is called, was built especially for its use and is admirably adapted to its needs. It has drawn to its classes girls from the best families in Rome, a granddaughter of Garibaldi being lately one of its pupils. The institute is in the highest sense a Christian school, with daily morning prayer and Bible service and preaching each Lord's day. It is open to English-speaking students as well, and before it is a future of undoubted usefulness and prosperity.

General.

The American Friends' Board of Foreign Missions, which will have its headquarters at Richmond, Ind., has just been incorporated. The object is to push the mission work in the new territory acquired by the United States.

Deeply serious congregations have been attending the tent meetings in Richmond, Va.; fully seventy-five have been converted, nearly all of them adults. Preachers of all denominations speak most highly of the good work being done. Rev. George H. Wiley and Rev. J. E. Cooke are conducting the meetings.

The Evangelical Ministers' Association of San Diego City and county, California, in view of the alarming increase of divorces and marriages, adopted a strong resolution at its regular meeting, September 2, pledging those present not to solemnize the remarriage of any persons who have been divorced for any other cause than the Scriptural one, and then only that of the innocent party.

The New York Christian conference which met at Sea Cliff, L. I., August 31 to September 5, and was intended to bring together Christian workers in various lines of effort for comparison of methods, was not so largely attended as was hoped for, but perhaps all that could be expected for a new venture. At least 1,000 attended one or more sessions. The Bible study was conducted regularly by Professor Sanders of Yale. Among the speakers were Dr. Russell H. Conwell of Philadelphia, Dr. Moxom of Springfield, Mass.; Rev. J. H. Darlington of Brooklyn and Dr. I. L. Hurlbut.

The Disciples' Church is trying to raise $200,000 for missions this year.

The total value of church property in the United States is estimated at $316,187,000. Of this sum $45,000,000 is said to go into steeples.

The statistical committee of the Methodist Ecumenical Conference in London reported that there were 24,899,421 adherents of Methodism in the world, and $300,000,000 of Methodist property.

Help for missions never comes more spontaneously than from missions. Of this there is a recent and a touching illustration in a letter from the Indian women of Birch Coulee, one of the late Bishop Whipple's stations in Minnesota, in response to an appeal for a Sunday school library in San Juan, Porto Rico. They sent $8, no small offering for them, and with it a letter to their "Dear Friends in Porto Rico." "We are Bishop Whipple's Indians," they said, "and live at Birch Coulee, Minnesota. We have heard that you are poor like us. We work hard in our Guild every week, so that we can help others. And because Bishop Whipple was the first bishop to go to Porto Rico and wanted a Sunday school started, we think because we are poor, too, and because our Guild is named after Bishop Whipple, that we want to send some money for your books. Our dear Bishop Whipple always told us to help others who were poor, and we are sorry it is not more. We want to help our bishop in his work, and then God will help us if we love and trust Him. Your loving Indian Sisters."

A writer in a Methodist magazine, discussing the question, "Do Missions pay?" makes the following statement: "In the year 1899, according to the statistics of the Ecumenical Missionary Report, $19,000,000 was spent on foreign mission work by the Christian church. As a result of the labors of the faithful men and women supported largely by this money, the membership of the church was increased by $4,000 in the mission fields. The following year, in our own Methodist Church, in the seven central and western conferences, we raised and spent within our own borders no less than $2,269,700, and increased our membership by 2,421. From these figures we see that it cost us $937 for each member added to our numbers at home, while abroad it only cost $226 per member. Considering the difficulties of mission work, we may well say, 'Missions do pay.'"

The above is about the average showing in comparing the cost of converts at home and on the foreign field, and yet some of the fault-finders are forever crying out about the great cost and extravagance and poor returns for money expended in foreign missions.

CHRISTIAN MELODIES

BY PROF. WM. J. KIRKPATRICK

Professor Wm. J. Kirkpatrick, the author of CHRISTIAN MELODIES, is one of the leading and best known gospel song writers in the world today. His songs have been sung the world over in almost every town. Some of his songs have been translated and sung in all languages. He has the advantage of many years of experience as a musician and song writer, and has put the best productions of his life time, as well as the best songs of the principal song writers of the country, into CHRISTIAN MELODIES. This certainly insures for this book the greatest variety and the best quality of songs.

"Book of Rarest Musical Gems"

This is the universal pronouncement of all musicians who have used or examined this new and popular song book. All responses from those using the book are enthusiastic praises. "Best book of the kind I have ever seen." "The more we use it the better we like it." "Gets better all the time," etc. These are samples of expressions received. No other book on the market approaches it as an all-purpose church song book. It is mechanically perfect, neat, artistic and durable. Contains 192 pages and 227 songs.

Choicest Songs of the Century

Every song writer has a few favorite songs—or those which he regards as his best—and which make for the author his reputation. Every musician has also his own peculiar style. A book written principally by one man does not excel, as it has no variety of style and but few very good songs. In CHRISTIAN MELODIES eighty leading song writers have contributed their favorite or best songs. This insures not only a collection of the most excellent songs, but also the greatest variety of style. This is why people never grow tired of the songs in CHRISTIAN MELODIES. Besides its large number of the latest songs it contains a great many of the old songs that have become popular favorites and never die.

No expense was spared in the production of this book. The best songs were secured regardless of their cost. Many very good songs were rejected because not good enough. No other book shows such care and judgment in excluding the inferior and including only the best. No cheap devices or make shifts, such as rivets, were used in binding. It is a hand sewed book, which is the best and most expensive style of binding. If you want the most popular, best wearing and most satisfactory all-around song book get Christian Melodies, pronounced by all, "A Book of Gems."

Reflections.

I. J. Cahill.

The great Ohioan is dead. Ohio joins her sister states in mourning the loss of the great and gentle man whom she gave to be the servant of the family of states. Ohio did not insist that he should all the time be an Ohioan, but freely yielded to the country at large the pride of ownership in the man who arose in the untried experiences of the past four years and proved himself a safe and wise guide to the destinies of the nation. It was a historic administration. The ship of state had no chart of precedent by which to guide her course in the stormy days of his piloting, but grandly ploughed through strange waters to the harbor of national safety and prosperity. Principles have been established and policies marked out that commend themselves to the wisdom of the citizens and to the world. No doubt much is yet to be learned, but much has been already accomplished and that on a safe foundation regarding the great new problems of national expansion.

In his gentleness, his warm interest in human life, his care for the lowliest, in his unselfish regard for the welfare of his assassin, his wife and the management of the Exposition, in the first moments of being stricken he has shown himself to be that type of American Christian gentleman that we are proud to claim as the normal product of our civilization.

Czolgosz is not American in any true sense. He is an excrescence. He is of the kind that make the dead fly in our ointment. I wish I could say he is altogether unlike any other class in our country—but I remember the lynchings north and south and refrain.

And yet, the magnificent behavior of our fellow citizens in Buffalo, who in such exasperating circumstances yet maintained their poise and allowed the law to take its course, causes the breast to heave with pride and makes one rejoice when he remembers that he is a man and an American. Popular government is not a failure. These people were not indifferent to what had been done. Far from it. But they had regard for the sanctity of the law, for the majesty of this power of the sovereign people. In this they administered the sternest possible rebuke to the spirit of anarchism.

The deed is done. The nation mourns her noble son and looks up to God for guidance. The President is dead. Long live the President!

Consumption.

When a company is willing to send such an expensive apparatus (as illustrated) with proper medicines on trial—to be paid for if satisfactory—indicates that they have succeeded in doing what others have failed in, namely, to cure Consumption. Physicians of all schools have been unable to master this dread destroyer until made possible by the works of Pasteur and the discoveries of Koch, Boynton and other scientific researchers, who gave to the world the discovery of the Bacillus. With this foundation to build on, it was but a question of how to get a product in the Lungs and kill the Bacillus where the work of destruction was going on. While some were vainly trying to reach the Lungs by stomach drugging, Dr. Boynton, of Cincinnati, was perfecting this wonderful apparatus and his marvelous Anti-Tubercular Solutions. With this combination he has repeatedly proven that the Germs can be killed in a few minutes, also the secretions which multiply these Germs and it will heal the Cavities and Mucous linings on which they thrive.

Realizing that the profession cannot reach all sufferers from this disease, a company has been formed to place this treatment in the homes, where by the use of this simple but successful method the patient can cure himself at much less cost. You are invited to test this cure at the company's expense—all you need is to write a letter to the Boynton Medical Co., Box 767, Cincinnati, O., and they will send you full particulars, directions and free trial of the above apparatus with proper medicines.

of which Christian husbands must feel. This is a closet book, and for those who need it, it is a word in season.

Back to Bethel, by F. B. Meyer. Fleming H. Revell Co.; 127 pages; price, 30 cents.

This little volume is made up of a series of addresses delivered by Mr. Meyer during his last visit to this country. It has not the literary finish of some of his writings, but it is not behind any of them in point and pungency. Mr. Meyer is a prince among devotional writers and everything that comes from his pen is stimulating and helpful. We heartily recommend this volume as an aid to the devotional life.

Christian Nurture is the title of an interesting little quarterly edited by Wm. J. Mutch, Ph. D., and published at New Haven, Conn. Its yearly subscription price is 50 cents. The table of contents of the September number will give a fair idea of the scope of this useful journal. What is Christian Nurture? The Church and its Children; Religious Education, Ideal and Practical; a Scheme of Class Work; Home Nurture; Boyhood Meditations; Finding your Pupil; Best Books Only.

THE COMING POET.

Mr. Aleister Crowley is surely going to be the next idol of the people who have been worshiping Browning. Mr. Crowley has already secured quite a following in England, and it is therefore a question of only a short time when he will have people over here guessing. The New York Evening Post has already spoken of his "indubitable talent," and quotes the following as evidence of his "exceptional lyrical gift":

The Spirit of Tragedy.

Here, in the home of a friend,
Here, in the mist of a lie,
The pageant moves on to the desolate end
Under a sultry sky.
Noon is upon us, and Night,
Spreading her wings unto flight,
Visits the lands that lie far in the West,
Where the bright East is at peace on her breast;
Opposite quarters unite.
Soon is the nightfall of Destiny here;
Nature's must pass as her hour is gone by.
Only another than she is too near,
Gloom in the sky.
One who can never pass over shall sever
Links that were forged of Love's hand;
Love that was strong die away as a song,
Melt as a cable of sand.

We are ready to admit right here that Crowley is great. We can't understand what he is driving at, hence it will be idle to question his supremacy as an artist.—Chicago Record-Herald.

The Philosophy of History, by S. S. Heberd. Published by the author, Lacrosse, Wis.

This book of 311 pages is the result of thirty years of patient brooding. A book into which a strong thinker has put a large part of the forces of his life is not to be set aside lightly. And this book will repay careful study. The dictum upon which its argument is founded is that thinking is not merely the apprehension of the succession of phenomena in time, but is a relating of cause and effect. Every act of thinking, every precept, concept and inference involves the idea of causality. The terms, cause and effect, are used in a wide sense as indicating any kind of dependence, physical, mental or moral.

Beginning with self-consciousness, which the author defines as the recognition of our mental activities as dependent upon self, he goes on to show that in all the great civilizations of the world there can be traced an orderly sequence of ideas and events. Special prominence is given to the Reformation and to the genesis of science, art, and social morality, which followed. Two tendencies are traced in the modern world, the one to the emphasis of causality or dependence, the other to the securing of practical results. When there is too great satisfaction with superficial results there is retrogression; when the deep causes and principles of things are searched for there is progress. The thing that man needs most of all to find out is the great spiritual principle at the heart of things, which is the basis of unity. Religious unity must needs be the last in the order of development. Men rise from a lower solidarity to a higher; they learn first that they are members of an outward body, and at last they see that they are members of a spiritual body and thus possess a spiritual unity.

These are the merest hints of the scheme of thought which the writer of this book has developed with much wealth of historical illustration, and with fine philosophical insight. It is a thoughtful book, and has been written for thoughtful people.

A Clean Life, by Katharine Bushnell, with an introduction by Mrs. Josephine E. Butler. Fleming H. Revell Co.; 83 pages; price, 25 cents.

It takes a delicate touch to write helpfully on questions connected with the relation of the sexes. This touch Dr. Katharine Bushnell possesses. She lifts her subject up to a high ethical plane by showing that the law of purity is concerned with the soul as well as with the body. Her plea for the application of the principle of altruism to marital relations is one the force

When I Was a Boy.

Up in the attic where I slept
 When I was a boy—a little boy!
 In through the lattice the moonlight crept,
 Bringing a tide of dreams that swept
 Over the low red trundle-bed,
 Bathing the tangled curly head.
 While moonbeams played at hide and seek
 With dimples on each sun-browned cheek—
 When I was a boy—a little boy!

And, oh, the dreams, the dreams I dreamed
 When I was a boy—a little boy!
 For the grace that through the lattice streamed
 Over my folded eyelids seemed
 To have a gift of prophecy,
 And to bring me glimpses of times to be Where manhood's clarion seemed to call,
 Ah, that was the sweetest dream of all—
 When I was a boy—a little boy!

I'd like to sleep where I used to sleep
 When I was a boy—a little boy!
 For in at the lattice the moon would peep,
 Bringing her tide of dreams to sweep
 The crosses and griefs of the years away
 From the heart that is weary and faint today,
 And those dreams should give me back again
 The peace I have never known since then—
 When I was a boy—a little boy!
 —Eugene Field.

An Anonymous Letter.

Ella Beecher Gittings.

Mattie Mayhew was a timid little soul, but she really wanted to lead her friends and neighbors to Christ. She knew that a good example counted for much and tried to be scrupulously careful that her daily life should be above reproach. But she wanted to do more. She wanted to tell some one what Christ had done for her, to do some active, aggressive work for the master whom she served so loyally. Yet whenever she thought of approaching any one upon the subject a great dread of being obtrusive would overwhelm her and her lips would seem sealed. She confided this trial to her pastor and his answer was:

"Don't trouble about it, little woman. Just keep on praying for the people you most want to reach and if God has a message for you to deliver he will show you how to do it and give you the necessary courage. Perhaps he did not mean you to preach at all—but only to live and pray for his kingdom."

This comforted Mattie somewhat and she prayed more earnestly than ever, especially for her Uncle Jason. He was her favorite uncle—so kind-hearted, so jovial and every way lovable except—and to devoted Mattie the exception was a momentous one and gave her much secret sorrow—except that he was a pronounced skeptic. Out of regard for his wife, who was a church member, he refrained from working on Sunday and he was not very profane—at least not in her presence. He prided himself on his scrupulous honesty and was often heard to remark that he would scorn to use the business methods of most church members that he knew. Nothing seemed to give him greater pleasure than to argue against the Bible and religion with any one who would accept a challenge. Surely timid little Mattie could not approach him; he would either laugh her into silence or crush her at once with some learned argument which she did not in the least understand and of course could not undertake to answer. But for all that she prayed and longed for Uncle Jason's conversion.

One Sunday afternoon while looking over a column of "Familiar Quotations," she came across this:

"There is no unbelief;
 Whoever plants a seed beneath the sod
 And awaits to see it push away the clod,
 He trusts in God."

Mattie thought at once of Uncle Jason. She read it over and over and then her face suddenly lighted.

"I will send it to him," she said; "perhaps God will let it be a special message."

Going at once to her desk, she took out a dainty correspondence card and envelope and copied the verse in her neatest hand. Then she sealed it, unsigned, and addressed it to Uncle Jason. "I never wrote an anonymous letter before—I've always thought them disreputable—but this one can do no harm, I am sure, for I can heartily ask God's blessing upon it"—mused Mattie as she posted it early next morning.

Uncle Jason was a farmer and it was planting time when Mattie sent her message. The seed she thus planted was slow in germinating, but it became fruitful at last. The next winter, to the surprise of everybody and to the joy of his Christian friends, Uncle Jason presented himself for membership in the church to which his wife and Mattie belonged. He gave the credit of his conversion to Mattie's anonymous letter. Telling the story, he said:

"I might have seen that verse in print a dozen times and given it no heed, but coming as a personal message and just as I was sowing my seed, it stuck to me like a burr. I could not get away from it day or night. It seemed to put everything in a new light, and I saw—taught by the Spirit of God—how utterly without foundation had been my boasted unbelief. I do not know to this day whose hand penned the message, but it came straight from the heart of God." Happy Mattie!

Mother's Room.

By Ruth Cady.

"It is very pretty," said Mrs. Leslie, looking at the newly arranged dressing table that she had been called to admire, and then letting her eyes wander round the room with all its dainty blue and white finishing. "It all looks so cool and restful."

"Doesn't it?" answered Laura, well pleased. "I call it the 'Blue Room.'"

"And mine is the 'Pink Room,'" laughed merry Beth, turning to her father, who, passing through the hall, had peeped in to see what the three were about. "Laura catches at every bit of pretty blue that she can lay hands upon and bears it off to her bower, while I pounce upon all the pink. Between us we are like Mr. and Mrs. Spratt—we lick the platter clean."

"I believe you do, if the family pocketbook represents the platter," answered her father, good-naturedly. He was very proud of his bright, handsome girls. "And what might your mother's room be called?"

"Dear, me! It hasn't any name," said Laura, with a comical twist of her face, "but it might safely be called the 'left-over room,' for dear, blessed mother takes all the old things and ugly things that 'can be made to do,' and gives all the nice, fresh ones to the girls."

All four laughed, as if the arrangement so truthfully stated were the most natural one in the world. Then the mother turned away. She had some work that must be done before supper, she said. Once in her own room, however, she leaned back in her chair and rested a moment before she drew the mending basket toward her. It might have been because she was tired or because she saw it in such sharp contrast with the one she had just left, but her own room looked unusually plain, almost shabby, that afternoon. She had taken the old sitting room carpet, so faded and worn that it had taken careful turning and much study to make it even whole. The furniture was all in odd, old-fashioned pieces which, though comfortable, did not harmonize. There were no frills or dainty cushions, no little decorative arrangements of any sort. She had no time for these, and they would have seemed hopelessly out of place in the general homeliness. Yet she had been a beauty-loving girl; she cared for all bright and pretty things still.

"Only, of course, a mother cares more for her children's enjoyment than for her own," she said, as if answering some secret thought, as she slowly took up her work. Mother love easily finds excuses for denying itself.

Money had not been very abundant; there had been many little sacrifices that somebody must make, and she had taken these upon herself so quietly that nobody noticed, and had pushed the girls so constantly into life's pleasant things that even her husband had almost forgotten that she might care for them herself. Neither did she think of it. She only acknowledged to herself that the days had grown to seem rather monotonous, and that she found it hard to shake off a feeling of weariness and depression.

A spool of silk worked a revolution—an innocent little spool of silk dropped upon the stairs, on which the mother, hurrying down to look after the tea table, slipped and fell. The frightened household were at her side in a moment, and found her white and unconscious.

"Carry her to my room," said Laura's trembling voice. "There's a light there."

They laid her gently on the bed in the dainty "Blue Room," and half an hour later the pale face was smiling again, and the bluff family doctor was declaring that "it wasn't half so bad as it might have been. But a lame back and a sprained ankle must keep her quiet for three or four weeks, at least, and you young ladies will have the benefit of running the establishment yourselves."

"Oh! we will take care of the goods and chattels, if you will only mend mother up," declared Beth, with a laugh on her lip, but with tears in her eyes.

No invalid could have had more tender care; but the unwonted duties kept the young housekeepers busy, and they remarked regretfully on having to leave their patient so much to herself.

"But I don't mind," she answered, one day. "I'm not suffering now, you know. I can read and think, and it rests me just to be in this lively room and look round me."

"There! that's what we ought to have known long ago," said Laura, as she went down stairs again. "She never shall go back to that ugly, dingy room again—never!"

"But you can't make her consent to keep yours, Laura," said Beth, doubtfully. "You know she won't be happy that way."

"Then we will make hers into a new one," answered Laura, resolutely. "Something shall be done."

And so the loving little plot began. There was not much money to spare, but Beth suddenly decided that she could get along nicely without a new dress, and Laura said that since mother was sick she should not be able to take her little trip to the country, anyway. Those bits of economy gave a small fund to start with, and there were ingenuity and skilful, willing fingers to do the rest.

"It seemed as if the very vines in the hanging basket knew that they were intended for mother's room, and grew accordingly," Laura said.

The father was taken into the secret and lent his aid in carrying out the plan, and the busy days were happy ones.

"I am well enough to go back to my own room, and give up yours to you again," Mrs. Leslie had said several times, and one day the proposition was accepted.

Was there just the faintest breath of a sigh as they drew her chair to the familiar door? If there was, it was lost the next moment in an exclamation of pleasure as her eye caught sight of the unfamiliar beauty of the room before her.

"But I don't understand. What does it all mean?" she said.

"It means," began Beth, "it means"—and then she choked and left the sentence unfinished.

"It means—do you remember those rag carpets Aunty Dill used to make?" asked Laura, dropping on a hassock at her mother's feet. "Some of them had the dark rags all in one stripe and bright ones all in another, and some of them were all mixed through, what she called 'hit or miss!' Well, this means that our family weaving after this isn't going to put the darkness all in one place and the brightness all in another; it's going to be an even 'hit or miss,' mother, dear. God bless you!"—Morning Star.

The Parents and the Teacher.

The parents' ability to aid the teacher does not cease when the boys and girls have left kindergarten and climbed from one grade to another till high school life begins. Then, if ever, the mother's gentle guidance and the father's strong hand are needed to help enforce school rule and counteract the affections and frivolities that seem to come when the little daughter's frocks are lengthened and the boy leaves knickerbockers behind. Then, too, the friendship of the teacher and the parents makes itself felt.

I know a boy who was turned over from one teacher to another with the recommendation that he was hopelessly lazy, incorrigible and careless.

"He does not care whether he has his lessons or not," said a teacher, who was gladly letting him go from her room. "He won't study at home and he won't study at school."

"I shan't give him up," thought the teacher to whom his future for one year was being intrusted. "There's something in the boy's face I like. I'm going to try getting near him in his own home. I mean to show him a teacher lives for something more than to scold and drum lessons into her boys and girls."

She had a slight acquaintance with the boy's mother; so one evening, when she fancied her pupil would be at home, she called. She found him deep in a collection of stamps, and his mother scolding because she could not drive him to his lessons.

"I simply can't make him study at home," she continued. "It is always stamps or photography ahead of lessons."

"Never mind study tonight," said the teacher, brightly. "I do not blame him much, when stamps or developing pictures comes up. Philately used to be the worst fever I had myself, ten years ago, and when it comes to a dark room and negatives, I'm afraid I would lose sleep for that."

In a moment she saw she had found a new hold on her stubborn boy. He had a really fine collection of stamps, and he discovered she knew as much about them as he did. Half an hour later she was in the dark room, bending diligently over a developing pan, watching a picture come up. Next morning he had his first perfect lesson, and he recited it with a pride which was unmistakable. She discovered later that his alarm clock was set that night after she left for 5 o'clock—an event which occurred only on the Fourth of July—and the boy whom nobody could reach spent the three morning hours over the lessons he had hated, simply because his teacher had become his friend. His mother, too, was taught a lesson. The teacher had shown her a hitherto unexplored way to her boy's heart and intellect, and it was not long before he graduated from the position of the drone of his class to that of a student with a proper pride in doing the best work he could.—Isabel Gordon Curtis, in Good Housekeeping.

The "Personality" of Mrs. Roosevelt.

An interesting fact in connection with the nomination of Theodore Roosevelt for the vice presidency was the absolute lack of knowledge which the public or the newspapers had of Mrs. Roosevelt. All through his tenure of the governor's chair of New York state very little, in fact almost nothing, has been heard of the governor's wife. This state of affairs was not because either the newspapers or public so willed it. Few women of the present day have had greater opportunities to occupy space in the public prints.

It was not long after her husband's part in the Spanish war that the newspaper reporters sought out Mrs. Roosevelt. Naturally, the wife of the hero of the San Juan dash was an object of interest to the public. In droves the reporters went to see her. And they were not denied. She met them—some twenty of them. She was gracious: no woman could have been more so. But she explained to them her wishes in the matter. She disliked publicity, asked that nothing should be written about her, and did it in such a manner that every man and woman in that aggregation of reporters went back to New York without writing a word of the woman they had met. And to any one who has ever had experience with the New York reporter that was a victory fit to rank with the taking of San Juan. When the public called its hero to the gubernatorial chair the reporters again went to Mrs. Roosevelt. And again they were met. But not a word of what was said was printed. And so it came about that when last June the latest honor came to the object of her love and admiration, the public knew practically nothing of the woman to whom the hero of the Republican convention hastened as soon as he could. In fact, so little did the vast public know of her that not twenty persons in that vast convention hall recognized Mrs. Roosevelt until, as her husband rose to speak amid honor and acclaim, he turned his eyes and waved his hand toward her.

"But has she no personality?" asked a woman in a company that was discussing Mrs. Roosevelt.

"What do you mean by 'personality'?" was asked.

"Why, I mean hasn't she done anything? Isn't she a woman of force?"

There happened to be another woman in the party, and she commented: "Why should we know anything of Mrs. Roosevelt? She hasn't been nominated for anything. I can't see that our lack of knowledge of her implies a doubt of her having a personality."

And is it necessary for me to ask which of those two women commanded the respect and admiration of all the six men present in that company?

There could scarcely be anything more convincing of the personality and character of Mrs. Roosevelt than the fact that she has been able to keep in the background while her husband has succeeded from one honor to another. This sort of personality may be inconceivable to my very lusty enemy, the platform woman, but it nevertheless remains the strongest proof of the true character of Mrs. Roosevelt. Many a woman in her position would have taken advantage of her opportunities and made her husband ridiculous in the eyes of the people, and herself an object contributing to the gayety of nations. But Mrs. Roosevelt has not sought publicity by rantings or by assuming unwomanly attitudes. One of her few public utterances was one of the frankest and most fearless ever uttered by an American woman. It was when she declared that the family income would not permit them to live in Washington as the vice president of the country should live, and yet properly look after the future of the six children whose education must be provided for. If all the public utterances of our women rang as true and clear as that statement there would be fewer occasions for us to hold our breaths when a woman opens her mouth in public. It was a brave statement to make, but it was a mother's heart that spoke. There was no intention there to sacrifice the future of her children for social prestige or glory. There was no sham: no subterfuge there. It had the true ring of an American woman: a woman of strong character, possessing a decided personality and a force that many of the women with whom wisdom will die might well envy.

It is high time some of our women should learn that a woman may be respected and loved for the things she does not do, as often as she is for the things she does do. Hundreds and thousands of men and women respect Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt today because she has chosen to keep her personality in the background, and refused to stand in the glare of publicity. She has no place there, and she knows it. By her attitude she has won a warm place in the affections of American women and in the respect of American men. Yet she might shine, instead of keeping in retirement, if she so chose, as every one who knows her will at once concede. She has simply chosen to be a wife, a mother and a woman, and not a publicist. She has elected to give the benefit of her talents and gifts to her husband, her children and her friends rather than to society in its promiscuous sense. She has her work to do in the world, but she does not believe that work to be of a public nature. She is content to leave that to her husband. She remains in the home, and one need only to hear Theodore Roosevelt speak of that home to discern at once how strong upon him has been the influence which has radiated therefrom.

Mrs. Roosevelt may not find favor with the aggressive clubwoman or the assertive female publicist. But that will be to her credit. She will, however, be loved by the American woman in whose mind she will have a personality—and a personality that is a personality.—The Ladies' Home Journal.

Does This Interest You?

The Christian Century is a new undenominational religious weekly published to meet a wide and growing demand for a paper that is thoroughly evangelical and abreast of the ripest scholarship, an authority on pure literature, and a medium of communication between the different denominations. Its aim will be to give a record and an interpretation of the leading events in the religious world. It will seek at once to mirror and to mould religious thought and life. In the sweep of its vision and the breadth of its sympathies it will endeavor to be as wide as Christianity itself. In a word, it will stand for essential and universal Christianity.

Promoters and Contributors

Behind this undertaking are men of the highest financial standing. The Editorial management is in the hands of Professor W. Douglas Mackenzie, D. D., of the Chicago Theological Seminary, Rev. James M. Campbell, D. D., well known through his numerous books, and Prof. Herbert L. Willett, Ph. D., of the University of Chicago. These men are known as leaders in modern thought and scholarship. Some of the ablest scholars and writers of America and Europe will contribute to its columns. On the list are such names as Dr. Marcus Dods of Scotland, Dr. Washington Gladden, Dr. Amory H. Bradford, Dr. Josiah Strong, Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, Professor Graham Taylor, etc. Dr. Wm. Adamson, editor of The Christian News, Glasgow, Scotland, will furnish an occasional British letter, and an original story by Dr. Clarence A. Vincent, of Galesburg, Ill., will appear in the early fall numbers. During the fall and winter months a series of special numbers will be issued giving Symposiums on the practical aspects of Christian work. These will be followed by a series on the Fad Religions of the day, and these in turn by a series on such vital questions as The Second Coming of Christ. These are but suggestive hints of special features which will combine to make The Christian Century an interesting and timely religious journal.

How You May Aid the Enterprise

In order to secure a wide and speedy introduction of the paper it will be sent as a trial subscription to names not now on the list from the time the order is received till January 1, 1902, for 25 Cents. The management asks the active co-operation of all who are interested in the furtherance of such an enterprise. ## EDITORIAL

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES:

The Christian Century is published in the interests of essential Christianity. It is the organ of no party; the advocate of no ism. While welcoming the ascertained results of modern Christian scholarship, it stands for the great evangelical verities which are the foundation stones of the Christian system. It seeks to be tolerant in spirit, practical in aim, and warmly sympathetic towards all the present day problems of religious thought and life. It also aims at being at once a clearing house and medium of communication between the different denominations, so that they may by free and fraternal expression of opinion become better acquainted with one another and may be led to join forces in more aggressive work for the advancement of the Redeemer's Kingdom.

THE IDEAL OF ANARCHISM.

OUR country has not yet recovered from the universal shock produced by the assassin's bullet. It is hardly the time for calm thought, but that time is coming. Then, no doubt, some will begin to repent of rash exaggerations and shallow judgments. It is the duty of the Church of Christ to lead in the process of reviewing and defining the situation with calmness and wisdom.

The problems presented by the spread of anarchism are religious as well as political, moral as well as economical.

We may summarize the essentials of the anarchist movement as follows: First, we have a criticism of society as it exists at present; the forces of the state are controlled and used by the few for their own advantage at the cost of the vast majority of citizens. The second is a theory of human nature. If you will disuse repressive measures, or the use of force, to make men good, the natural heart of mankind will pour itself out in unselfishness and justice; the police-court and the gallows-tree repress goodness instead of evil, and stifle the generous instincts of the human spirit. Thirdly, we have a doctrine of expediency, or of the means by which society is to be led to abandon the use of force and to employ absolute freedom for the crushing of selfish ambitions and the culture of the noblest instincts. Moderate anarchists of course hold that this can be only done by a gradual process of education. and Prince Kropotkin would have it understood that this is his position. But the red anarchists have another theory. They actually think that the state can be terrorized into the abandonment of criminal legislation and its administration by killing its leaders. So far as the assassination of rulers is based on theory, so far as it is not the outcome of blind and unreasoning passion, it proceeds from this theory that society can be persuaded to give up the police-court and the gallows-tree by making the occupancy of the magistracy of a people fatal to the occupant.

On this foolish and wicked side of it, anarchism is open only to the red-hot hatred of all clear-headed and good-hearted men. There is no need to expound either the insensate folly or the unspeakable wickedness of the theory. Our readers see all that at a glance, when the honest statement of the idea is before their minds. But what of that other doctrine which, from the days of Bakunin to those of Kropotkin, has lain at the foundation of the anarchist movement, viz., that in a perfect society, towards which we must all strive, the laws of love will be obeyed from the hearts of all citizens, crime will have ceased and the use of force upon men have been abandoned? That surely is the very ideal of the Church. That surely is the picture of the kingdom of Christ, the perfected rule of God. The anarchist believes that the natural man can reach that ideal state without religion, as a mere child of earth and time. The Christian believes that the same end can be reached only as man comes under the power of Christ and lives upon earth as a citizen of heaven. The Christian and the anarchist spirits are therefore fundamentally and inevitably hostile to one another at every point except one. They both agree that the police-court and the gallows-tree are not the final features of human history. These things can have no place in the golden age of man's perfection, because all men will then find within their own hearts all the motives and incitements to goodness of life.

Having said so much, it is our distinct duty to say more. The Church has a very positive task ever resting upon it, which the present wide study of anarchist doctrine for the moment throws into clearest light—we must do justice to the first anarchist assertion; we must admit that the tendency of the past has been to throw the spoils of power into the hands of the few. The oriental despot who thinks that the kingdom exists for him and not he for the kingdom is the perfect type, and in him, we all say, the anarchist has this accusation justified. But here we must remember that the czar of Russia is in fact an oriental despot, whatever his private and personal character may be; and that his empire, Russia and Russian Poland, is the most prolific mother of the anarchist brood. Wherever governmental power falls into the hands of selfish worldlings there it is always and perhaps necessarily, at least naturally, used as an instrument of oppression and public robbery where that has occurred. The descendants of the men who beheaded King Charles I. and arose in the American Revolution against another king have no right to say that violent oppression is to be endured to the utmost and forever. There may come a time when revolt against the misuse of power by the few over the many is a solemn and a religious duty.

But the Anglo-Saxon race has always held, since the days of Magna Charta, that such an act is justified only by a public wrong which is seen and confessed by all, which is deliberately and blindly continued by the oppressor against all argument and against the appeals of the mass of the people. Red Anarchism waits for no such hour and applies no such test. In a day of peace and almost universal national prosperity, when the very quarrels of industry are caused by increasing wealth and success, the ignorant, furious heart of an individual or a secret group of individuals plans the death of the chief servant of his people.

In fact, red anarchism is an insult to every citizen of a free republic. It has no place there. In such a nation as this, the public determination is fixed to see that no class legislation, no class tyranny shall be allowed; the public determination is fixed to see that the very evils of which anarchism complains shall be abolished. And in this land there is a fixed determination to elevate men of honor and goodness, men like William McKinley, to the positions from which they can do most to make this dream of a national brotherhood real. In aiming at the life of these men, the foolish and bad heart of the red anarchist wounds the whole people and casts a slur upon their honor; he laughs at their determination to secure freedom and justice as both insincere and powerless.

But the Church can only make good its right to condemn the red anarchist, by proving its power and its will to hasten the golden age of universal justice by surer and better means. We, too, hope for the day when the instruments of public penalty will have vanished from the earth. That will come when the hearts of all men love righteousness and when laws are kept by all through a loyal and pure heart and not through fear of social punishment. But it can come only through religion and only through the religion of Christ. This assassin by his treachery, his cunning, his cruelty, disproved the anarchist doctrine that the heart of man is naturally good. He once more proved that there is needed a power from without to transform this heart of man. And that power is Christ.

Every preacher has to-day an opportunity of once preaching the need for regeneration of the individual as a fact vital for social progress. And every preacher who sees with fresh vividness the need is commissioned of God to proclaim the power of the Spirit of Christ to do that work, and so lift us nearer the age of the stainless kingdom where no crime and no passions shall be found.

EXPANSION.

President McKinley's Buffalo speech are the memorable words, "The period of exclusiveness is past." He was referring to the commercial relation of this country to other countries. "Isolation," he said, still further, "is no longer possible or desirable." These sentiments mark in the case of President McKinley an enlargement of vision. His mind had grown. He had risen above the narrowness of former years, and had come to see that commerce must not be built up upon selfishness; that it must be made a gospel of good will; that, involving as it does an exchange of benefits, it must overleap all artificial barriers of national exclusiveness so that it may accomplish its God-given end.

Worthy to be written in gold are the words of that memorable speech: "God and man have linked the nations together. No nation can longer be indifferent to any other." "Business life, whether among ourselves or with other people, is ever a sharp struggle for success. . . . But, though commercial competitors we are, commercial enemies we must not be." "We must not repose in the fancied security that we can forever sell everything and buy little or nothing. If such a thing were possible it would not be best for us, or for those with whom we deal. . . . Reciprocity is the natural outgrowth of our wonderful industrial development under the domestic policy now firmly established." In these wise words it is the statesman and not the politician that speaks.

Our country has come, rather suddenly, perhaps, to a place of pre-eminence and power. We have not had time to make new adjustments. When the order was issued to Admiral Dewey at Hong Kong, "Find the Spanish fleet and destroy it," the fateful step was taken, and for better or worse we had adopted the policy of expansion. That this nation should expand, that it should overrun its borders and become a colonizing force, was inevitable; it had all the certainty of a divine decree. Rash and unrighteous means have sometimes been used to reach the right end, but to that end we have been driven by the hand of fate. We have at length taken our place in the federation of the nations; and as well may we try to force the oak back into the acorn cup as to bring this nation back to where it was before Admiral Dewey sailed his fleet into Manila Bay. "The period of exclusiveness is past," and it is past forever.

The golden-mouthed Henry Grady said on one occasion, "Our history has been a constant and expanding miracle all the way—ever from the hour when, from the voiceless and trackless ocean, a new world arose in sight of the inspired sailor." Nor can it be questioned that it is destined to expand more and more in the coming years. Looking into the future with prophetic eyes, Mr. Gladstone, the grand old man of England, said, "America will one day become what England is today, the head steward in the great household of the world, because her service will be the best and the ablest." In these words our national mission is disclosed. Not in territorial enlargement, not in commercial supremacy, not in changing millions of dollars into billions, is our true destiny to be realized, but in becoming "the head steward of the great household of the world." For it is true among nations as among men that the one who would be the greatest must be the servant.

The question, then, to be considered at such a time as this is, "What are we giving to the nations?" We have got much from them. Yea, all that we have is what they have given us. What are we giving them in return? We are giving them our surplus agricultural products, our machinery, our manufactured goods, for which we get their gold to pour into our overflowing coffers. We are coming to look upon the world as a cluster of grapes to be squeezed into our cup; we are thinking too much of what we can get out of the world and are thinking too little of what we can put into it. We need a change of heart. We need to come to the altruistic ground which we have been called to occupy by the final message of our martyred President.

In one direction we are attaining in some measure the highest conception of expansion—namely, in the development of our religious life. At home the growth of our churches has more than kept pace with the growth of population. But our religion has not all been kept for home consumption. We have shared it with others. American missions dot the world. And wherever they are planted they speak of the service of America to humanity. To this high level our national life must rise so that the claim to greatness which we so dearly covet may be freely accorded us because our service to the world is the best and the ablest.

DEATH OF BISHOP WHIPPLE.

AMONG the clergy of the United States there has been no more picturesque figure than Bishop Henry B. Whipple. He had the distinction of being the senior bishop in the Protestant Episcopal church, having held the office of bishop of Minnesota for nearly forty-two years. He went to Minnesota when it was a distant territory and shared in the hardships and privations of the early settlers, earning for himself the title of Apostle to the Indians. One could offer less opposition to the claim of apostolic succession if it was always as evidently connected with the possession of the apostolic spirit as in the case of this good bishop. His career as a pioneer missionary had in it something suggestive of the consuming zeal of the missionaries of the earliest Christian age. Much of his time was given to the Christianization of the Indians, and such was their confidence in him that they gave him the name of "Straight Tongue." He served on several special commissions which made treaties with the Indians, and was considered an authority on Indian questions. Many opportunities came to him to occupy positions of greater opulence and official rank, but nothing could lure him away from his chosen work. Honors came to him, but they came unsought. In 1888 he preached the opening sermon at Lambeth palace at the Lambeth conference in England; and he also preached the memorial sermon at the unveiling of the Tennyson monument in the Isle of Wight in 1897. Honorary degrees were conferred upon him by the universities of Oxford and Cambridge. He was the author of several books, mostly on the Indian question or on aspects of his missionary work. Full of labors and honors, he retired to Faribault, where a residence was provided for him by the citizens, and there he passed away to his eternal rest on the 16th day of September.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

Love glorifies. When we idolize a man we idealize him.

In rooting up the tares care must be taken that we do not root up the wheat also. Anarchy must not be destroyed at the expense of the destruction of the Constitution.

When the young anarchist, Abraham Isaak, was released from the county jail he said: "It was a great experience." "Yes," added his mother, "it was one of life's lessons." There are some things which are more illuminating than the most skillfully constructed arguments.

Miss Jane Addams of the Hull House settlement says that many of the anarchists whom she meets are law-abiding and well-meaning people. They are simply the victims of a false theory, and do not understand the American situation. They need enlightenment. They need the touch of brotherly sympathy. They present to the Christian people of this land a field for missionary operation.

Dartmouth College Celebration.

DARTMOUTH College has just celebrated with great eclat the centennial of Daniel Webster's graduation. Of all the notable men which Dartmouth has graduated, Daniel Webster was admittedly the most illustrious. It was therefore right and meet that the hundredth anniversary of his graduation should be celebrated in a way to give to it something of national interest. The occasion was a general home-coming for the sons of Dartmouth. Across the face of old Dartmouth Hall appeared in letters formed of colored electric lamps the words, "Daniel Webster, 1801." The exercises included a parade in representative costumes, an athletic contest, the dedication of a handsome administration building to be known as Webster Hall. The two principal addresses were, one by Professor C. F. Richardson on "Webster's College Life," and one by Professor J. K. Lord on "The Development of the College since the Dartmouth College Case." The significance of the latter topic lies in the fact that in winning the famous Dartmouth College case Webster not only saved the charter of the college, but also established for all time the validity of testamentary contracts.

Dartmouth has not been making much noise of late, and hence has not been attracting much attention. But it has been quietly doing excellent work. Its standards have always been of the highest. A college that has upon the roll of its alumni such names as Webster, Choate, Justice Chase, Thaddeus Stevens and George Ticknor is worthy of the greatest honor. Upon the foundations so solidly laid the coming years may hope to see an enlarged institution which will do something more than preserve the traditions of the past.

The Closing of the Steel Strike.

The statement that has been made in connection with the closing of the steel workers' strike that differences have been adjusted in a way satisfactory to both sides has to be taken with a measure of allowance. The Amalgamated Association seems to have obtained no concession to its original demand that the "scale" should be signed by non-union as well as by union mills, but it is reported to have been allowed to make collective agreements for the men, and also to organize the men in the non-union mills where such an organization is desired. No one dreams that this settlement of affairs is final. The strike has been something of a drawn battle, but how enormous has been its cost! It is estimated that the loss in wages has been at least $10,000,000; and the loss to the company still greater. But the brunt of the burden has fallen upon the men, for such a wealthy organization as the steel trust could hardly feel their share of the loss. A strike is war, and war is sometimes justifiable, sometimes inevitable. But surely, the time has almost come when disputes of all kinds may be settled without the arbitrament of war.

Temperance Revival in England.

A temperance revival has begun in Great Britain. And it is sorely needed. On Sunday, Sept. 23, the movement was formally inaugurated by a great meeting in Exeter Hall, London. "The Free Church Million Pledges Temperance Crusade" is the expressive but cumbersome name which the new movement has assumed. Behind it are not only seventeen non-conformist religious bodies, which comprise the "Free church," but all classes of citizens who have at heart the welfare of their fellow-men. The leaders in this movement are the Rev. F. B. Meyer of London and Dr. J. Q. A. Henry, superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of New York. The entire country has been divided into districts and placed in charge of organizers. The free churches promise to break all records by their zeal and hard work, and finally to celebrate the acquisition of 1,000,000 total abstinence pledges. When the battle has been fairly drawn it will be found that the liquor trade with its great vested interests will offer stubborn resistance. It has been said that "without a powerful wave of emotionalism nothing can be done to remedy the evil". That is true, but something more than "a powerful wave of emotionalism" is needed. Dogged persistent work is needed. Self-sacrifice of the most heroic sort is needed. But the prize is well worth the price. And the cause is urgent; for as Joseph Chamberlain has said, "England must conquer drink, or drink will conquer England."

The Gospel of Work.

Theodore Roosevelt was once asked: "If you could speak commandingly to the young men of our day, what would you say to them?" His reply was: "I'd order them to work. I'd try to develop and work out an ideal of mine—the theory of the duty of the leisure class to the community. I have tried to do it by example, and it is what I have preached; first and foremost to be American, heart and soul, and to go in with any person, heedless of anything but that person's qualifications." These words receive added significance from the fact that the man who uttered them has been elevated to the presidential chair. Although born to wealth he scorned delights to live laborious days. He has been a strenuous worker and has set before the young men of the land a noble example of courageous endeavor.

Senator Dolliver's Speech.

In connection with the events of the past weeks there has been no more notable utterance than the speech of Senator Dolliver delivered at the Coliseum on Sunday evening, Sept. 22d. He declared that the "reds enjoy an unconscious co-operation and side-partnership with every lawless influence which is abroad in the world. Legislators who betray the commonwealth, judges who poison the fountains of justice, municipal authorities which come to terms with crime—all these are regular contributors to the campaign fund of anarchy. That howling mass, whether in Kansas or Alabama, that assembly of wild beasts, dancing in drunken carousal about the ashes of some negro malefactor, is not contributing to the security of society; it is taking away from society the only security it has. It belongs to the unenrolled reserve corps of anarchy in the United States. Neither individuals nor corporations nor mobs can take the law into their own hands without identifying themselves with this more open but hardly less odious attack upon the fortress of the social order."

All anarchy is one whatever be its outward form. And an outcry against some particular type of anarchy comes with poor grace from those who are themselves knocking away the props from beneath our social system.

A tacit rebuke is administered by Senator Dolliver to those preachers who have been preaching the un-Christlike gospel of revenge. In eloquent words he shows that actualized brotherhood is the only remedy for the world's woes.

"You have read," he says, "in the masterpiece of prose fiction, how Jean Valjean, an outcast from the faces of men and the kennels of dogs, came one night to the house of the Christian bishop, not a mere titled official of the church, but a man into whose face when he was asleep came the divine light of a pure heart. 'Monsieur Cure,' said the man, 'you do not despise me; you open your house for me; you light your candles for me, yet I have not concealed from you my name or where I came from and how miserable I am.' 'Sir,' said the bishop, 'this is not my house, it is the house of Christ. It asks no man whether he has a name, but whether he has an affliction. Besides, before you told me your name I knew it.' 'What,' answered the man, 'you knew my name?' 'Yes,' answered the bishop, 'your name is "My Brother."'"

And is not this the anarchist's name?

G. Campbell Morgan at the Moody Institute.

One of the special features at the Moody Bible Institute this fall will be a series of lectures by Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, on "The Crises of the Christ." These lectures will be delivered Tuesdays to Saturdays, from November 5th to November 23d. A second series, concluding the life of Christ, will be given in April, 1902.

Death of Dr. W. C. Gray.

The death is announced of Dr. William C. Gray, editor of the Interior, the leading Presbyterian organ of the middle west. Dr. Gray underwent a surgical operation in June last, from which he never recovered. His death removes from the Presbyterian ranks a recognized leader. In all the affairs of the Church he exercised a directing and molding influence. He was not an ordained minister, and his work was done by the pen rather than by the voice. He was a trenchant writer, sometimes caustic, sometimes witty, but always forceful. He was trained for the law and after twenty years of miscellaneous journalism he was, in 1871, called from Cincinnati, where he was at the head of a large printing house, to the editorial chair of the Interior, where his most important lifework was done. He was a hard worker, and one of his boasts was that he never missed earning his day's pay in all his life. Although a hard hitter in debate, he sought to avoid controversy when possible. He deplored the trial of Professor Swing for heresy, while opposing him on doctrinal grounds. He was one of the foremost advocates of a modification of the Presbyterian creed. By special request his funeral sermon will be preached by his intimate friend, Dr. N. D. Hillis of Brooklyn.

CHICAGO NOTES.

The Rev. Charles Scadding, rector of the Episcopal church of La Grange, one of the suburbs of Chicago, has been discussing the question "How ought I, a Christian, to keep Sunday?" He said:

Much confusion could be avoided if the distinction were always observed between Sunday or the Lord's day and the Sabbath. The Sabbath is the seventh day of the week, the Lord's day is the first day of the week. The one is the festival of creation, the other is the festival of redemption. The one belongs to the age of law which gendereth to bondage, the other belongs to the Christian age, whose key-words are liberty and grace.

"The weekly Christian holy day is and always has been Sunday, the Lord's day, the first day of the week. You may call it the Christian Sabbath if you like; the Sabbath which died and was buried and rose again in the new resurrection form of Sunday. Not only are the Jewish Sabbath and the Christian Sunday different days of the week, but the manner of keeping them is largely different."

In 1830 the government census reported for Chicago a population of just sixty people; its present population is something near two millions. Sixty years ago the entire valuation of Chicago realty was only $125,000; now a conservative estimate places it at three billion dollars. It is a city of wonders; but how much enterprise and sacrifice it costs for the Christian forces to keep pace with this rapid development of population and wealth!

The People's church, of which Dr. Hiram W. Thomas is pastor, has had a windfall in the form of a deed of $1,000,000 from G. W. Bowman, a wealthy mine owner. This money is to be used for developing the work of the People's church—presumably by the adoption of institutional features. More money is promised for this work of expansion, if it is needed. Wisely expended, the large sum already given may be made to do a vast amount of good.

The preliminary report of the chief statistician for vital statistics shows that the death rate for the country at large has decreased considerably during the last ten years. Among the big cities Chicago takes the lead in the lowness of its death rate. Philadelphia has been about stationary, St. Louis has increased a few points, Boston has dropped from 23.4 to 20.1, New York from 25.3 to 20.4, while Chicago has fallen from 19.1 to 16.2. This decrease in the death rate can hardly be attributed to our advanced sanitary condition, but must, in part at least, be accounted for by the constant accession of young and vigorous blood.

One other church at the present time is considering a change in its place of worship, possibly with a view to broadening its work. Trustees of the Central church, Dr. Frank W. Gunsaulus, pastor, which formerly had its place of worship in the old Central Music hall and now holds services in the Studebaker theater, are considering removal to a new auditorium to be built in the remodeled Tremont Hotel building. This property was recently purchased by the Northwestern University and a majority of the members of the Central church are said to favor a change.

One thing regarding which Chicago has been wont to boast is its park system. Back in the seventies this boast had reason for it, but it is a letting down of our civic pride to be told by Professor Zublin of the University of Chicago that we have lost our proud pre-eminence and that we are behind other large cities of the Union in providing breathing places and pleasure grounds for our crowded population. The park system of Chicago comprises about 2,100 acres. St. Louis, with a population about one-third as large, has 1,372 acres; New York has 7,000 acres; and Boston takes the lead with 11,000 acres. The time has come when some of the beautiful sites on the north branch and the Des Plaines river ought to be pre-empted for park purposes. This is a matter in which delay makes action peculiarly difficult.

The socialists of Chicago have opened a co-operative store in their temple, 120 Western avenue. The store will be opened for business at the close of every meeting without distinction as to whether the particular meeting is held on a week day or on Sunday. This scheme was inaugurated last Sunday at the close of the evening service. Rev. W. H. Wise sought to allay any lingering scruples that might remain regarding the sacredness of the Lord's day by saying that the only religion sacred to the masses of the world's wage-earners was the religion of good comradeship. Surely there is something more in religion than that! "Man shall not live by bread alone." He needs the comradeship of God; and co-operative stores, good as they are, will form a poor substitute for those higher agencies which minister to the spiritual nature of man.

Among ministerial records that of the Rev. Henry Wunder, pastor of St. Paul's Evangelical Lutheran church of this city, is certainly unique. For fifty consecutive years Mr. Wunder has been pastor of the same church, and for the last twenty years he has served with a single week's vacation. During his pastorate more than thirty churches of his denomination have sprung directly from St. Paul's, and it was natural and fitting that they among others, should be closed on Sunday evening so that their members might join with the congregation of St. Paul's in the celebration of Pastor Wunder's golden jubilee. It is given to few men to serve half a century in any capacity, and it is doubtful if ever before a minister occupied for so great a length of time the pulpit of the same church. In the earlier days of his pastorate Mr. Wunder served as the president of the state synod, and in that capacity he traveled widely over the central states. He has seen Chicago and all this section of the country multiply many times in population and in importance, and he and his church have kept full pace with this material progress. If long, hard service in a goodly work entitle a man to rest and leisure, surely Mr. Wunder has earned them, but he prefers to spend the remainder of his days in active work. He announced from the pulpit on Sunday that he expected to continue for many years to occupy the pulpit he has filled so long. The people of Chicago, without relation to creed, will hope for him a full realization of all his wishes.

Returned—In Memoriam Wm. McKinley.

I.

He is given back to his native soil.
The soil whence giants come!
The kind, true eyes are closed,
The lips, once eloquent, are dumb.
But though he speaks no more,
The spirit of his love for men
Is singing through a great grief-stricken land.
That friendly hand
Will never clasp another's hand again,
And myriad hands are reaching now
In loving rivalry to place
The laurels on his brow.

II.

Once more he lies on his mother's breast—
That mother of the wise and brave.
She cradled him, and now
She furnishes his grave.
She saw him rise, and she was glad;
She freely gave
The fairest gifts she had
To him she styled her best-beloved!
She heard him called and bade him go,
And as she saw his glory grow
Her heart swelled with the pride
That only loving mothers know.

III.

Back past the fair, green hills
O'er which he used to roam
The son whose proud career she watched
Has wandered home!
Ah, stricken mother, weep away,
Thy heart is sorely tried to-day,
But through the cycles yet to be
Thy pride shall grow,
And all the world shall rate
Thy glory great
And ever greater as the great years come and go,
Since he is given back and now is part of thee.

CHRISTOLOGICAL TENDENCIES OF THE TIMES.

W. J. LHAMON.

No. V. Literature.

Current literature is Christological. This is emphatically true of its best fiction and its best poetry.

Once it was said, "There is no poetry without God." It may now be said, "There is neither poetry nor fiction without Christ."

The word literature should be used only of that in letters which takes hold of the true, the beautiful and the good, and which lives far beyond the limit of the daily paper or the monthly magazine. There is a vast deal in letters that is not literature. It is merely "words, words, words." With such letters we have nothing to do in this article, though we think it might be shown that the most mediocre and evanescent portion of the immense output of the press is not adverse to the general conception of Christianity.

1. The leading and abiding stories of the last few years have been Christological. "Ben Hur" is a "Tale of the Christ." "The Prince of India" is a New Testament presentation of doctrine. "Ben Hur" and "the Prince of India" or "the Wandering Jew" may be the heroes respectively of these works, but a greater than any hero of human creation moves constantly amid the scenes, and has his unchallenged place in the plots of these works. Without Jesus neither of these books would be possible. "Bonnie Brier Bush" swept its canny course over England, Scotland, Canada, Australia and America, and the ubiquitous Scotchman has not yet ceased to laugh and cry by turns over its pages. Now what is the "Bonnie Brier Bush" other than "The Mind of the Master" in another form and by the same author? What can be more Christological than the conversion of Lachlan Campbell, and his own expression of it after the return of his daughter Flora? He had been the inquisitor of the kirk of Drumtochty. "He was a shepherd to trade, and very faithful to all his work, but his life business was theology, from Supralapsarianism in the Election to the marks of faith in a believer's heart." As a member of the session he had been unrelenting upon the young people when they were examined for their "tokens" before communion. He had driven his own daughter from home by his Calvinistic sternness. But she returned at last and fell sick, and the father found his real heart, for she was his only child. And this is the style of his family worship then: "I came down from a long tramp on the moor and intended to inquire for Flora. But I was arrested on the step by the sound of Lachlan's voice in family worship. 'This my son was dead and is alive again; he was lost and is found. And they began to be merry.'

"Lachlan's voice trembled as he read, but he went on with firmness. 'Now his elder son was in the field.'

"'You will not be reading more of that chapter, father,' interrupted Flora, with a new note of authority.

"'And why not?' said Lachlan, quite humbly.

"'Because you will be calling yourself the elder son, and many more bad names and I will be angry with you.'

"'But they are true names and it is good for me to know myself.'

"'You hef just one true name, and that is father. And now you will be singing a psalm.'

But the old psalm singer had been trying a hymn on the hills, one that had helped convert Flora when she was in London, and he surprises the daughter by singing that to one of his psalm tunes.

"You are a good girl, Flora, but you are not so clever as your father; oh, no! for I hef been trying that hime on the hill, and it will sing beautiful to a psalm tune. You will lie still and hear."

Then Lachlan lifted up his voice and sang:

"There is a fountain filled with blood,
Drawn from Immanuel's veins;
And sinners plunged beneath that flood Lose all their guilty stains."

The tendency of such writing is decidedly Christward, and the effect of it is keenly felt by the reader who finds it following this description of Lachlan by one of his canny neighbors: "Sax months syne Lachlan didna ken what father meant, and the hert was wizened in the breist o' him wi' pride an' divenity."

That simple little story, "In His Steps," has been a revelation to many writers and thinkers, not because it brought to thinking people anything new, but because a great multitude of well-meaning people seized upon it with the eagerness of souls hungering and thirsting for some simple statement of a possible every-day Christliness. And Mr. Sheldon has followed up this clue by a number of other works in the same vein. So marked is the simple Christward way of his writings that this author does not even allow us to think of him as a theologian. He is just simply a man cast in the mold of the New Testament, and seeking to help others into a similar fashion of life.

Quite recently the story of Salathiel, or the Wandering Jew, by George Croly, has been republished, and is classed by General Lew. Wallace as one of the six greatest works of fiction in the English language. Here are above five hundred pages of descriptive and historical writing interwoven with startling creations of the imagination, and every page in a stately style that never drops to the commonplace. And is this work also Christological? Thoroughly. The voice of the Christ, the rejected, the crucified, and risen Christ, sounds through it all—"Tarry thou till I come."

Many and many another work of fiction might be listed here as falling into the same category, but not to be tedious, one other only shall be named, and that the greatest of all. What is Victor Hugo's "Les Miserables" but the supreme attempt on the part of its most gifted author to realize his ideal of Christliness in human form? And the "Old Bishop" and "Jean Valjean" are the greatest characters in fiction just because they are the most Christly. "Les Miserables" rises supremely above the schools of theology and their creeds, and seeks the perfection of manhood and brotherliness after the pattern of "the Word made flesh." That these two characters fall infinitely below Christ is inevitable, but that they rise far above the average of mankind, and far also above the average character in fiction, is likewise inevitable when we remember that such a one as Victor Hugo created them with his gaze upon such a one as the Savior of men.

2. Over the great poets Jesus has thrown the spell of his person and teaching even more completely than over the great novelists. Milton sings of the fall of man and loss of Eden only till "One greater Man restore us, and regain the blissful seat." In the "Paradise Regained" he puts upon the lips of Jehovah the words in reference to Christ,

"This perfect Man, by merit called my Son."

And this recalls Tennyson's apostrophe to Christ in his introduction to "In Memoriam":

"Strong Son of God, immortal Love,
Whom we that have not seen thy face,
By faith and faith alone embrace,
Believing where we cannot prove."

In such connection it is hard to refrain from quoting those other words of the great poet which he framed while seeking to solace himself for the loss of a dear friend:

"And so the Word had breath, and wrought
With human hands the creed of creeds
In loveliness of perfect deeds,
More strong than all poetic thought;
Which he may read that binds the sheaf,
Or builds the house, or digs the grave,
And those wild eyes that watch the wave
In roarings round the coral reef."

And Robert Browning in his own style, not always obscure, places his choicest verses as laurels upon the brow of the Christ. He cannot get such a tragedy as that of "Saul" completed without an appeal to the only One that can save a soul so hazarded:

"O Saul, it shall be
A face like my face that receives thee; a Man like to me,
Thou shalt love and be loved by forever; a hand like this hand
Shall throw open the gates of new life to thee!
See the Christ stand!"

From the Christological point of view "The Death in the Desert" will amply repay close study. In it Browning seeks to represent Christ as he was believed in and thought upon and known by the aged and dying Apostle John. This poem is the expression of Browning's faith, at least we judge that it may be fairly so taken, while it is at the same time the assurance to us that the modern poet has found a kindred spirit in the ancient apostle.

And while we are speaking of Robert Browning's Christological teaching we cannot refrain from devoting a sentence to his most gifted and beautiful wife, Elizabeth Barrett Browning. One writer affirms of her, that "Miss Barrett felt, as consciously as the old Hebrew seers, the burden of the Lord; and believing that she had a divine word to speak to mankind, she had no thought of death till her task was done." The same writer says: "It is in essentially Christian truth that Mrs. Browning finds the explanation of human life and the sweet contentment which—like a kind of rest in motion—still leaves room for unquenchable longing." To her

"Civilization perfected Is fully developed Christianity."

In "The Dead Pan" she has rebuked Schiller for his reverence for the old Greek gods, has gloried in their death, and has exalted Christ to such a degree that "the fair gods" are seen doomed to die. And as to the fabled annunciation of their death:

"'Twas the hour when One in Zion
Hung for love's sake on the cross—
When his brow was chill with dying,
And his soul was faint with loss;
When his priestly blood dropped downward
And his kingly eyes looked throneward—
Then Pan was dead."

In her view there is no longer need of the Greek idols, for "Christ hath sent us down the angels

And the whole earth and the skies
Are illumed by altar candles
Lit for blessed mysteries;
And a priest's hand through creation
Waveth calm and consecration—
And Pan is dead."

Brevity constrains us simply to name and claim as Christological the following of our American poets: Mrs. Hemans, Bryant, Longfellow, Lowell, and Whittier. Of the latter one feels that he must speak in terms of almost unguarded eulogy from the Christological viewpoint. Upon his pages one can scarcely go amiss for verses that are rich in Christly sentiment, and he is unsparing in his declamation against the creeds that have obscured the Christ. He has no sympathy with those "Who melt in an acid sect

The Christian pearl of charity."

In his almost passionate poem on "The Eternal Goodness," Whittier refuses to be held by the dogmas of his Quaker brethren; he praises their "quiet aisles of prayer," their "zeal for God and love of man"; but he cries out,

"I trace your lines of argument;
Your logic linked and strong;
I weigh as one who dreads dissent
And fears a doubt as wrong.

But still my human hands are weak
To hold your iron creeds,
Against the words ye bid me speak
My heart within me pleads.

Ye see the curse which overbroods
A world of pain and loss;
I hear our Lord's beatitudes,
And prayer upon the cross."

This in itself would have been sufficiently indicative of the Quaker poet's attitude both toward the creeds and the Christ; but when he presents us with that "finest Christian ode of the nineteenth century," for such "Our Master" is reckoned by Dr. Philip Schaff, there can be no mistaking his Christology. With that ode we must all be familiar, and yet select stanzas, by reason of their beauty and appositeness insist on a place here; the whole poem is an apostrophe to Christ, and there is no sweeter, simpler mingling of confession and adoration, one dares to believe, outside the pages of the apostles:

"O Lord and Master of us all!
Whate'er our name or sign,
We own thy sway, we hear thy call,
We test our lives by thine.

Deep strike thy roots, O heavenly Vine,
Within our earthly sod;
Most human and yet most divine,
The flower of man and God!

Apart from thee all gain is loss,
All labor vainly done;
The solemn shadow of thy cross
Is better than the sun.

Our Friend, our Brother, and our Lord,
What may thy service be?
Nor name nor form nor written word,
But simply following thee."

We had thought to conclude the subject of "Literature" in this essay. Another article, however, will be required on the related subject of representative books. A closing reflection may not be amiss to the effect that the life and teaching of Jesus lend themselves to poetry and fiction as nature lends itself to art, while theology holds itself aloof from such literature with scarcely less sternness than the multiplication table and the sines and cosines of trigonometry.

CHANGING THE TEMPERA- TURE.

HERE was once a man who went to church somewhat irregularly. And when he did go he dropped into a seat very near the door. Then, as soon as the service was over, he took his hat, hurried out of the church, and scarcely ever shook hands with anybody. After a while this man began to complain of that church for its coldness. He met another man on the street one day and began telling him about it.

"Why," said he, "it is the coldest church I ever knew" (he didn't say how few churches he really knew anything about). "Nobody shakes hands with a man. There is the minister, he never shakes hands with me, nor the deacons, nor any of the leading men. They'll talk about it, but I'd like to see them do it. I believe in practicing what you preach. No, sir, I tell you it's the coldest church in this town."

And he really believed he was telling the truth. And his manner was so earnest that the other man was quite convinced, though he had never been to this church. So he went and reported this fact to a third man, with some pretty severe criticisms upon church members not living up to their professions. Of course, he told it to a fourth, and the ball went on rolling. Pretty soon quite a strong feeling was developed in various parts of the town, especially among those who did not attend church, that this church was very cold, "high-toned," "stuck-up," and "a sort o' club for the rich folks, you know."

But one day the man who started all this talk got to thinking about it. Now, the fact was he didn't often get to thinking very hard over religious matters. But this time he did. And the more he thought the more surprised he became at himself. For this was the line his thoughts took: "Here I've been telling how cold the minister and the deacons and the leading men of the church were, but how do I know it is so? Have I ever given them a chance at me? No! I've just hurried out of the church and never let the minister get within fifty feet of me, nor the deacons within thirty or forty, nor any of them very near." It is fair to say the blood tingled in his veins as he thought of all the hard things he had said, and of his own stiffness and selfishness.

Soon the deacons and the minister came along and shook hands in good, hearty, man-fashion, and were real glad to see him. And how ashamed he felt when the minister said: "I've noticed your face frequently in the audience, and wanted to shake hands with you and learn your name. But I never succeeded in reaching you, till now, before you got out of church." So, of course, he had to tell the minister his name, and where he lived, and the latter said he would call on his family very soon. But, perhaps, the best of all was to have an old lady with such a kindly face put out her hand and say: "I don't know your name, sir, but I'm real glad to see you at church today. And wasn't it a good sermon?"

That man went home with his heart in his mouth. He told his wife all about it, and fairly cried when he acknowledged how he had misjudged those good people. And he wound up by saying: "Fact is, wife, it's mighty easy work to misjudge people."

Then he went out and met some of his former friends and told them what an experience he had just had. "Why, to think," said he, "that I was such an idiot as to go around telling you that those church people were all cold and selfish, when I didn't know anything about it. Don't any of you ever tell anybody, after this, that I said such things about any of them. I was just a fool, that's what I was. But I'll tell you what I am going to do. I'm going to hire two seats in that church and be there every Sunday morning with my wife. See if I don't. And the minister's coming to call on us, and I'm going to get acquainted with him and the rest of them. For I tell you, boys, I've just learned one thing: You can't get acquainted with folks, and you can't shake hands with them, if your hand isn't there to shake."

A gentleman said to a minister: "When do you expect to see Deacon S. again?" "Never!" said the reverend gentleman, solemnly; "the deacon is in heaven."—The Presbyterian Observer.

NOTES OF EUROPEAN TRAVEL.

QUINCY L. DOWD.

WE struck out from Dover to Ostend and made a few days' stop at old Bruges. It captivated us at once by its mediaeval Flemish-Spanish air and smell. Apparently nothing has been done to disturb its life and manners since the time its river channel was silted up, and its fame for commerce and enterprise sank into the mud. But, like a water-logged tree, the ancient city is preserved in form and substance. Her people still go through the motions of trade, market days, and religious devotion much as in Margaret of Parma's time, or when Charles the Bold was in the saddle. The streets and the queer vehicles, and the look of the goers to and fro in them, all smacked of ancient breeding. We got excursions out to Heyst on the sea, and by canal boat to Sluis, a fisher village at the end of all things, a sort of earthly "limbo," not so bad as purgatory nor so good as paradise. On our way to Brussels it was easy to stop at Ghent, though only for a night—time enough to visit the high tower and the old churches there. But Brussels kept us six days, and busy days, too. It is a sort of "Little Classics" edition of Paris, very chic and lively, stylish and in for amusement and decoration.

The day on the field of Waterloo was a life-time sensation. It requires a lot of forced imagination to realize that a decisive battle was ever fought over this mildly undulating ground, now covered by waving wheat and oat fields dotted with red-roofed and whitewashed farm buildings; the shepherd and his flock attended by dogs roaming over the harvested fields and all the arts of peace flourishing on every side. The real aspect of the battlefield, however, has been spoiled by the ruthless folly of those who tried to celebrate the victory when they erected the monstrous lion mound at the center of Wellington's line of battle. Then there was the day down at the edge of the Ardennes at fine old Dinant on the Meuse. The ride back by boat to Namur was along a stretch of the river which Wordsworth estimated to outrival even the Rhine for scenic beauty. On the short route from Brussels to Antwerp stands Malines, the archiepiscopal seat of the Primate of Catholic Belgium. It was worth an hour's visit and ramble among its all but dead streets. Nobody seemed to be doing business for business' sake, nor anything else save as in a walking dream. At Antwerp everything changed to a modern quick step. The place was thronged with peasant visitors, for a Kermis or Dutch fete was in progress, attended by street processions, illuminations and endless fun. Stopping as we do usually at pensions, there is a chance to meet other travelers, almost always of the American persuasion. Thus we can swap experiences and put each other on to the right "hobby" in this or that place. Of course, there are the regulation sights you are under bonds to pay devoirs to, but it is our policy to get outside the beaten round at every chance, e. g., we took a ferry ride across the Maas, which gave a fine view of Antwerp's famous harbor and docks. Also we got a train excursion out to Hoboken, and saw en route a market garden laborer's slum, the abode of filth and beggary and mean human conditions in close contact with God's abounding country. Here it is not environment of the natural kind at least that makes the slum. It is the people themselves who are slummy. The "estaminets" (wine and beer resorts) at about every other door along the road help to explain how and why it is as it is. Unwillingly we left handsome Antwerp, for we had not half done justice to the museums and churches. La Hague was our next objective. Here we dwelt "mid palaces" and scenes of delight. Holland's little capital, like her pretty Queen Wilhelmina, is the sweetest, most fascinating bit of a city we have stopped at. For one thing we took a forenoon's drive by cab through the parks, and made visits to the palace in the woods, and also to the town royal mansion, rich in tapestries, paintings and princely gifts. But our real treat was the ride to Delft, and return by the canal steamer just as the sun was lowering himself below the Dutch rim of the platter. There's nothing quite equal in its kind to the Dutch landscape, take it all in all, windmills, canals, green meadows below sea level, long lines of trees, towns and spires dotting the far rim of the scene, and herds of black and white cattle sprinkled over the near and distant stretches of pasture. On our trip to Amsterdam last week all in one day we dropped off at Leyden, and next at Haarlem, as loyal Congregationalist pilgrims ought to do. At Amsterdam on Sunday we attended two services in the morning, one at the Dutch Nieuwe Kerke, the other at the Scotch Presbyterian church, the place of religious refuge for our Pilgrim forbears before they left in disgust for Leyden in order to be at peace amongst themselves. The Dutch are reputed to be a noisy folk, and so we found them at Amsterdam. I don't know whether it is the profane ending of nearly all of their local names, or what, but certain it is that their jabber and street clamor, especially by night, make sleep by honest tourists almost impossible. Even their mosquitoes are a peculiar noisy breed, as well as persistent biters. You might think them pro-Boers that took us for the hated English. It was a relief to get out into the country for a day's trip to the island of Marken, partly by train, partly by fishing smack. Here is where Dutch fisher costumes are seen at their wildest and loudest. Happily our company was made up of two Chicago girls, besides ourselves, and we made a lark of it, going on from Monnikendam to Edam. From Edam a Dutch boy lured us to his canal boat, with a sail and covered deck, agreeing to take us on to Volendam, by the sea, for ten cents each and return. It was a bargain and we snapped it up. What a funny voyage that was! Volendam is still unspoiled by the horde of visitors. We saw three artists busily at work painting the characteristic street life (if street it could be called), and a much-costumed lass posing, arms akimbo, for one of them. The sea front crowded with huge, clumsy fish boats was a stirring sight. The people, old salts and young women, were very friendly in their greetings. And now we are here among friends and nicely taken care of while we see Copenhagen and environs. This p. m. we are to go out to a country place near Elsinore (read your Hamlet) and spend a couple of days on that classic ground.

No words are truer than these of John Randolph: "It would have been as easy for a mole to have written Sir Isaac Newton's treatise on optics as for an uninspired man to have written the Bible."

A STUDY IN CHARACTER.

HOW JOHN WELLMAN COMMENCED THE TWENTIETH CENTURY.

CLARENCE A. VINCENT, D. D.

Chapter iii.—A Resurrection.

TELEGRAM was handed in. Wellman opened it. His face turned deathly pale. His strength seemed to have left him. He had read, "If you would see father, come at once." Like a flood the memories of his early life poured in upon him. His parents' faith, their unselfishness, the voice of their prayers, their love for him, their parting words, the mother's note on the leaf of the forgotten Bible—all came back to him. His nobler nature all at once asserted itself. The hollowness of his life haunted him. If I were to die, what memories would my children have? If they were to follow my example, what real use would they be to themselves or to others? If all men were like me, what would become of all that is noble and true in society? He stood in the presence of the heaven of the past and the hell of the present.

But he must act at once. Telephoning his wife of his going, he was driven rapidly to the station. No train would go for six hours. He was soon flying westward on a special. His neglect of his parents, the sense of the disappointment which his life must have been to them, were the companions of his journey. How slowly the car seemed to be going, yet he knew that it was making seventy miles an hour at times. If he could only reach home in time to tell the father of his love and to assure him that his hopes and prayers should yet be answered. This purpose which had been formed was not the sentiment of a moment but was, like all John Wellman decided to do, the decision of a strong will which summons all things to the carrying out of its plans. The engine slowed down at last. Soon a team was speeding away over the ten miles between him and home.

The driver had heard the village physician say that morning that David Wellman was very ill, so that John felt that his father was still alive. It was not long till he could see the farmhouse and buildings across the prairie. A few minutes brought him to the door. He entered without knocking. Around the bed on which his father lay were gathered his brothers and sisters and the physician, while his aged mother sat by the bedside holding David's hand. Taking their hands in silence and touching his lips to his mother's forehead, he approached the bedside.

"He will know you but he cannot speak," the physician had whispered.

"Father, John has come to see you," and at his words the old man turned his eyes full of love upon him, and a tear ran down the wrinkled cheek. The dying man tried in vain to speak.

"And I am your boy again. I have disappointed you and dishonored God, but I've come to tell you that God in his mercy has given you back your son, and your hope to see him a useful man shall yet be realized."

A strange light deepened in David's eyes. He summoned himself back into this world and with great effort said as if in prayer, "Now let thy servant depart in peace." David's spirit had gone to God, who gave it, but there lingered upon his face the expression which his hope and the words of John had brought. All stood in the silence of gratitude and sorrow for a time. John, as usual, was the first to act. Putting his arm around his mother he led her away to her room.

I need not write of the first days that followed. The funeral was to be held in the church which, largely through David and Sarah's prayers, and influence and gifts, had been built and dedicated five years before. It was a beautiful day, the second day of the new century. From every direction the people drove in. John Porter, who had been able to save his little farm through the advice and help of David, was there with his wife and little ones. Sam Pritchard, once a drunkard, came in neatly dressed and with his happy wife. He had remarked, with a tremor in his voice, to a neighbor out by the horseblock, "Dave Wellman, when he got the people to vote the saloon out of this here town, made a man of me." The poor of the village came to pay tribute to one whose kindness and wise help had often cheered them. The citizens of character were there, for the prince among them was dead. The members of the church were there, with memories of his prayers and helpfulness. The little church, with the Sunday school room opening in, could not hold the many whose personal sorrow brought them. The services were simple and strong like the life of him for whom they were given. The pastor read from the old Bible which had been the companion of David and his father. His words of tribute were few and tender and he commended all to God and a life of service and hope. As six young men, from the class in the Sunday school which David had taught, bore the body from the room, the congregation instinctively arose and stood in tearful silence. The pathos of their loss came home with awful force as they realized that their neighbor would never more be with them. Quietly they followed their silent friend to his resting place.

For two nights John had watched with his father's body, making the old lounge in the corner his bed. The night after the funeral he was given the room of his boyhood days. It was full of memories, and as he sat there for a time they spoke to him. But he was weary and must rest. Following the custom of his childhood he kneeled down. During these latter years he had not had time to pray. The last few days had been full of purpose but not of petition. He buried his face in the coverlet and sobbed. He tried to pray but no words would frame themselves. Would God forgive a selfish man like him? At last the prayer of childhood came out of the long ago, and into it the millionaire put all his petition for forgiveness and help.

"Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray thee, Lord, my soul to keep.
If I should die before I wake,
I pray thee, Lord, my soul to take"

Into his soul a strange peace stole like an angel from heaven. Again that night he dreamed, but not as in the days of old. It was of the same city but it was of greater achievements. Some think that heaven gives dreams as form and shadow of events to come. If what this dreamer dreamed that night shall issue in the real, what an awakening on the morrow!

(To be continued.)

The great teacher taught a lesson for preachers when, in answer to the man who twitted him for studying the same lessons year after year, he said: "I want my pupils to drink from a running stream, not from a stagnant pool."

RAYS FROM DRUMMOND'S WORKS.

IT IS easier to criticize the best thing superbly than to do the smallest thing indifferently.

The doctrine of human inability, as the church calls it, has always been objectionable to men who do not know themselves.

The want of connection between the great words of religion and everyday life has bewildered and discouraged all of us.

Many a man thinks he is looking at truth when he is only looking at the spectacles he has put on to see it with. He is looking at his own spectacles.

Try to give up the idea that religion comes to us by chance, or by mystery, or by caprice. You will find, if you think for a moment, that the people who influence you are people who believe in you. In an atmosphere of suspicion men shrivel up; but in that other atmosphere they expand and find encouragement and educative fellowship. It is a wonderful thing that here and there in this hard, uncharitable world there should still be left a few rare souls who think no evil.

All about us Christians are wearing themselves out in trying to be better. The amount of spiritual longing in the world, in the hearts of unnumbered thousands of men and women in whom we would never suspect it; among the wise and thoughtful; among the young and gay who seldom assuage and never betray their thirst—this is one of the most wonderful and touching facts in life. It is not more heat that is needed, but more light; not more force, but a wiser direction to be given to very real energies already there.

Boys, if you are going to be Christians, be Christians as boys, and not as your grandmothers. A grandmother has to be a Christian as a grandmother, and that is the right and beautiful thing for her; but if you cannot read your Bible by the hour, as your grandmother can, or delight in meetings as she can, don't think you are necessarily a bad boy. When you are your grandmother's age you will have your grandmother's kind of religion.

Conformity to type is secured by the type. Christ makes the Christian. Can the protoplasm-carbon, oxygen, hydrogen, nitrogen—conform itself to its type? Can the embryo fashion itself? Is conformity to type produced by the matter or by the life, by the protoplasm or by the type? Is organization the cause of life or the effect of it? It is the effect of it. Conformity to type, therefore, is secured by the type. Christ makes the Christian.

After you have been kind, after love has stolen forth into the world and done its beautiful work, go back into the shade again and say nothing about it. Love hides even from itself. Love waives even self-satisfaction.

The kingdom of God is not going to religious meetings and hearing strange religious experiences. The kingdom of God is doing what is right, living at peace with all men, being filled with joy in the Holy Spirit.

Great trials come at lengthened intervals, and we rise to breast them; but it is the petty friction of our everyday life with one another, the jar of business or of work, the discord of the domestic circle, the collapse of our ambition, the crossing of our will, or the taking down of our conceit which makes inward peace impossible.

We are, of course, not responsible for everything that is said in the name of Christianity, but a man does not give up medicine because there are quack doctors, and no man has a right to give up his Christianity because there are spurious and inconsistent Christians.

If we can carry away the mere lessons of toleration, and leave behind us our own censoriousness, and criticalness, and harsh judgments upon one another, and excommunicating of everybody except those who think exactly as we do, the time we shall spend here will not be the least useful parts of our lives.

No form of vice—not wordliness, not greed of gold, not drunkenness itself—does more to unchristianize society than envious temper. For embittering life, for breaking up communities, for destroying the most sacred relationships, for devastating homes, for withering up men and women, for taking the bloom of childhood—in short, for sheer gratuitous misery-producing power—this influence stands alone.

THE PLACE OF THE MIDDLE-AGED IN THE CHURCH.

This is distinctively the age of young people. They are pushing to the front in all lines of human activity and in every vocation. This electric age is the result of this energy. The old man is not in demand. All our churches want young men in their pulpits. Youth is one of the fads of this century. Being a young man myself I would utter no word of discouragement for this condition of affairs.

The young people are the life of most of our churches. Their energies contribute largely to the success of Christian work in every direction. Such service is a great means of development to them. It is a preparation for larger usefulness, suprema consecration to the work in years to come. Every church ought carefully to husband and develop the abilities of its young people. It is a most profitable and promising field of Christian usefulness. Let us ever magnify the worth of our young people.

I would like, however, as my contribution to this symposium, to lay a little emphasis upon the place of the middle-aged and old people in the work of the church. We do not hear too much in these days concerning the work of the young people in the church, but we should hear more concerning the work of those older in years. Their work ought always to be emphasized. They ought in every way to be the leaders in the work of the church. Let us not neglect them in our pastoral ministrations.

CHURCH LETTERS AGAIN.

The method of dealing with the church letter problem, as suggested by D. A. Wickizer in The Century of September 12, is good for external use, but in my judgment the church letter "sinner" needs a remedy for internal ills. It ought to be hammered into every church member that severing relations with a local congregation does not sever his relations to God. We need to realize that the Church of Christ is one, whether in Kansas or China, and that our obligations are not to be cast off as we do a garment.

If men read our papers more, thus coming into closer touch with the Church as a whole, and the great missionary enterprises, there would be fewer prodigal church members.

OUR PULPIT.

CHRIST AND THE INTELLECT.

W. DOUGLAS MACKENZIE, D. D.

Text: "We have the mind of Christ."—I. Cor. 2:16.

HERE are two extremes of opinion on this matter which I must begin by warding off, because in some confused way they especially influence those who are feeling their way towards the Christian faith.

In the first place, there is the idea that the intellect has no place in religion because in religion everything is of faith. This has been put in the extraordinary expression: "I believe because I do not understand." That would only be possible, of course, in an age when the Church has falsely claimed the possession of direct and supreme authority over man's reason; when the Church has taught men to doubt the power of reason to discover truth, and to trust its own declarations without inquiry.

But that attitude opens the way to the most blatant kind of skepticism; for, if men are taught that they simply cannot understand what they ought to believe, they will cease to believe anything. What has no meaning for reason has no claim on conscience and no appeal to the affections. This is a doctrine which, when put in that extreme way, has actually produced in the history of man the wildest kind of superstition and the rankest kind of skepticism.

The other extreme may be put in this way: "Religion depends and must depend only upon reason. My reason, my intellect, is the ultimate arbiter of what I am to believe. I must not allow my own feelings of interest, my own sense of the value of anything, to interfere with and cloud the direct labor of reason striving to discover truth. In fact, my reason must be set to work like a machine in vacuo, where I am to watch it grind out the truth for me, and say, "These are the things on which I am to found all the conduct of my life." And this is what in the history of philosophy and in the history of theology has come to be known as rationalism—mere and sheer dependence upon reason itself, the intellect of man when working alone, by itself, or supposed to be so working. Now, that gave rise at last to Agnosticism, the doctrine that reason cannot find out anything. For when men set themselves by the use of this machine to work on the supreme mysteries they found the machine very soon got clogged, somehow, and refused to work. Then they sat down and said, "That shows me the limits of human knowledge." Thus it became a philosophical doctrine to say that human knowledge has such definite limits for itself, the working of reason is confined so closely to certain conditions, that we can not find out anything outside them, whether there be a God above, or life beyond, or death beneath.

As then, the doctrine that you must trust to faith and not to reason, trust to authority that shall lead your reason to truth, led to superstition and skepticism, so the other doctrine, that you must trust to your reason alone, led to the same result exactly. The man who denied reason and the man who said reason was everything, both walked towards the one gulf of skepticism, of dark doubt and ignorance about anything beyond the things given to us by our five senses and the miserable little conclusions we can draw about the miserable little things they are, if they are all. Our intellect, we must remember, therefore, in trying to avoid these two absurd extremes, is part of a complex nature which we find ourselves possessed of from the beginning of our life. This mind, which is yourself particularly and you find as part of your nature, is from the beginning inextricably mixed up in its operations with every other part of your nature. You cannot have any part of your nature operate alone. You cannot simply feel and not think. You cannot feel and not desire or hate. You cannot feel and not decide or will something about the feeling with which you are concerned. All these parts of our nature are all always working together, bound up in one another. Even a man's conscience, although you call it the highest, only works through and in connection with all other parts of his nature. If then Christ, if this final and sublime religion that binds us to God himself in living cords of love and of trust, is real and deals with our intellects, then it binds us to God with cords of intelligence also. God has come to us in Christ, not as mere intellectual machines, nor as machines that have no intellect. God in Christ has come to us as living beings in whom the mind works along with every other part of their nature. Christ, you will remember, made his appeal not merely to the conscience, not merely to the heart, not merely to the self-interest of a man, but Christ made his appeal also to the intelligence of every man.

"What think ye of Christ?" is the central problem that is now presented to every man. "What think ye of Christ?" And Christ gives his ringing answer to our intellects as we confront all the mysteries that concern us and he says, "I am the truth." "I am that which not your will, not your conscience, not your feeling, not your desire directly deals with, but your intellect. I am the truth. I have in myself and I can give to you the solution of these great mysteries with which your reason, as a reasonable man, must always be deeply and personally concerned!" "What think ye?" is the great question that a man must hear addressed to himself, alike by the world and the Church, alike by his God and his conscience, alike by his self-interest and the loud calls of temptation around him.

Man's intellect has always been working upon these great problems—What is God? what is man? what is to come? what is the meaning of all that to-day is, of my life and my life task that rests upon it? At last there has come to us One of whom it is said that he is "made unto us wisdom." Christ, as the fountain of wisdom, as the very substance of truth, addresses himself to our intellect. Christianity will have men know what the truth is. It will not take men by the hand and lead them, blind, along dark roads to a conclusion they cannot understand or forecast. It will not assert, even in the name of the glory that is to burst upon us, that here we are to be led about with bandages upon our eyes. No, Christianity will have men to know—to know God, to know man, to know the meaning of life, the meaning of death. That is the mission of the Christian revelation. It addresses itself directly to the intellect of man and offers to him the highest wisdom, the noblest revelations of the truth. Therefore it is that in the New Testament we find in such abundance all those words: understanding, wisdom, truth, thought, judgment. All these are continually referred to and continually appealed to. The Spirit of God is the Spirit of Wisdom and of Understanding, the Spirit of Truth, the Spirit of Prudence, the Spirit of Light. He is the Spirit within all this revelation that is given and that is made to our reason.

Let me name three great blessings which Christ has conferred upon our reason through the revelation which he has made. First of all, he has done much for us by the solution of great problems that baffled man's reason. The great problems about which man is concerned and has been concerned, the fundamental ones that he always somehow dimly felt to bear upon the whole problem of his existence, Christ has brought into an altogether new relation to our intellect. Concerning God, for instance: what a strange thing is that Christian certainty concerning God which contrasts so absolutely and wonderfully with all the uncertainty of human thought, even at its best! When Plato—the man who perhaps had the highest and best thoughts of God ever found by any man before Christ came and outside the course of Old Testament revelation—when Plato propounded his idea of God he founded it upon reason, or upon private and personal feeling, or upon a speculative course of argument. Even for him as for all men a conception of God which had such foundations seemed ever uncertain. A man could not feel as if he had solid ground under his feet; perhaps the next clever dialectician would overthrow all his fine erection of proofs. What a strange new thing it is that in the Christian experience God is given as being as real and directly known as the outer world. It was Cardinal Newman who said, what many men have echoed, that he was as sure of the existence of God with all which that name implies, as he was of his own existence. No man who had never heard of Christ could have said that. Christ has given us a great certainty concerning God.

Again Christ gave to us a new conception, from which the world starts to-day and started at the beginning of the Christian history, a new conception of the unity of our race. No man, not the most majestic intellect of antiquity, was able to conceive of man as the partaker of the nature of God. It is the gift of Christ to the intellect. Every man to-day begins with the assumption of the unity of the universe. It was impossible to have that idea until you had the idea that one Lord is over all. It was from the idea of one God over all that men of science have derived their conception that the whole universe is one organized fact. So one might go on showing that the great problems which the mind of man has always been battling with had their most wonderful solution, and for the first time the possibility of their solution, given in Jesus Christ and the revelation he has made to the reason, the intellect, of man. Not that we understand these things fully, but he has helped us to understand them. Not that we have reached the final solution for the reason, but that Christ has given us such facts for our problems that we have made far greater advance than any had ever made before, or could possibly have made.

And here, in the second place, let me say that Christ has done the greatest service for the intellect of man by giving it the Christian mysteries. The great gifts of Christ have not only brought solutions but brought new problems. It is always so. Every man of science working in his laboratory will tell you that every advance of science is an advance towards new problems. A man solves this little difficulty about the nature of electricity, or some of its operations to-day, and it just drives him back upon another. A man discovers the X-ray and it opens up a whole world of new problems. Then men at once ask questions which they never would have or could have asked before that revelation was made to them. And so it is with Christ. There are men so unreasonable as to think it is a great difficulty and against the Christian faith that it gives us the mysteries of the Trinity, of the Incarnation of Christ, the mystery of the conscience of man, and on a higher level and in an intenser form than ever before, the mystery of the freedom of the will. All these great mysteries that the Christian religion affirms and gives to us as problems simply come out of the solution of other problems already presented to our minds. It is only the man who has solved the problem of God's Being as Christ gave the solution, who can have the Trinity before him, and it is only as the fundamental solution of God's relation to man was given in the Incarnation that he found the Incarnation itself opening far greater problems. A mystery is not a falsehood. It is something simply to think out. A mystery is not a thing which a man can lay aside and leave behind him. It is on in front, and he must go on to meet it. A mystery is not a dark cave, but the sun so brilliant that it blinds your eyes with its intense light. A mystery that is founded on reality ought to be the inspiration and not the enemy of the intellect. It ought to call men out to think more earnestly and to think more powerfully. That is just what Christ has done. The intellect of the world was never aroused to problems so meaningful, problems in themselves so glorious, and to consider solutions so inspiring as these that come to us in the history of the thought of the Christian ages.

And then, if Christianity has presented to us, first, great solutions, and, second, great mysteries, let me say that in the last place it has stimulated the intellect of man by its appeal to the mind of the individual. Christianity may be said to have discovered for the first time the intellect of the individual private citizen. Only philosophers and statesmen had intellects long ago. Only men concerned with great practical problems could manifest the possession of great intelligence. But Christianity has come and roused the intellectual life of man and is lifting the whole race upon a higher level, because the Gospel of Jesus Christ addresses itself to the mind of each humblest citizen of the earth, and says, "My friend, what thinkest thou?"

What do you think about God? Oh! I leave that to the philosophers. No, no! God cannot afford to do without your thought. What do you think about the future life? Oh! I leave that to mystics and dreamers. No, God must have your thought about the future life, for you are moving thither. What do you think about Jesus Christ and his coming and his dying? Oh! I leave that to the theologians and preachers. No, no, it is to you God comes in Christ and you must have your definite thought about Christ, about his dying, about his going, and his coming again. God comes to you and says, You must think, you must think, you will never reach your true manhood until you think about these great problems. Well, you say, cannot I simply trust and not think? There is no man that trusts without thinking. No man has any faith in anything or any one without thinking about it. If you ask a man if he thought before he trusted that other man with a check for a thousand dollars, he will say, Of course. You must have a definite conception of God before you can trust him. You must have the thought that he is your Father, the Creator of all the world, the thought that he holds in himself all the mysteries of your whole future. These are tremendous doctrines, but you cannot trust him until you believe and hold these in the grasp of your mind.

It is to the intellect of every man, you see, that Christ makes that appeal, and I say that that religion is going to triumph over all others and that that force is going to do the most for mankind which goes to the central, permanent and everlasting interests of the individual and rouses him, saying, You must think, you cannot afford to be an animal, lusting, passioning, and going to your grave simply feeling and desiring, and feeding and hungering. You must think if you are going to hunger for the Highest and if you are going to feed on the Everlasting. God demands that you give to him the royal worship of your mind, of your thought. Let us worship him now and evermore with the best exertion of our thought as well as our affection, of our mind's earnest effort to understand as well as our will's firm determination to obey. Amen.

BIBLE SCHOOL. JOSEPH IN PRISON.

Lesson for October 13, 1901. Gen. 39:20-40:15.
Golden Text: But the Lord Was with Joseph and Showed Him Mercy.—Gen. 39: 21.

A CHICAGO TEACHER'S NOTES ON THE LESSON.

ELIAS A. LONG.

Place and Time.

THE location of to-day's lesson was the capital of Egypt, probably Zoan, the city in which Set or Baal was worshiped. The time is usually reckoned as B. C. 1719. The Hyksos or shepherd kings who had become Egyptian now reigned. It is interesting to note that the Egyptian monuments and inscriptions set forth a background of every incident in Joseph's career in this lesson and later.

The Power of Character.

Three times here in close conjunction is it stated that "the Lord was with Joseph." The Lord was with Joseph because Joseph chose to have the Lord with him. Like Enoch, Joseph walked with God. Gen. 5:22-24. His constant fear was that he might displease God. Ch. 42:18. His cry when tempted by the courtly sinner was, "How can I do this great wickedness and sin against God?" Ch. 39:6-9. There never was a time when the Lord was not nigh unto them that called upon him in truth. Ps. 34:18; 1:45; 18:19. But while Joseph's godly walk and uprightness of character had charmed even the irreligious and led to his promotion to great responsibility in courtier Potiphar's home, yet at length it brought him to the sorest trials. On an utterly false charge made by Potiphar's wife, he was cast into a dungeon without so much as a hearing and was made to suffer severely. But in the long run, as always is the case, Joseph learned that godliness is profitable in all things. 1 Tim. 4:8. At length through faithfulness and the power of his good character he rises to greater eminence and usefulness than ever his loftiest dreams had anticipated. Ch. 37:5-11.

V. 20 False Imprisonment. "And Joseph's master." This was Potiphar, an Egyptian officer under Pharaoh to whom Joseph had been sold by the Ishmaelites, and by him employed as a slave in his household. * * * "Put him into prison." As a result of a false charge. He termed the place a dungeon. V. 20. According to Ps. 105:18, "he was cruelly treated, whose feet they hurt with fetters: his soul came into iron." * * * "He was there" for two years or more enduring the basest suspicion.

V. 21. Living by Faith. "The Lord was with Joseph." God was with him because Joseph fell in with God's purposes. "But if, when ye do well, and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable with God." 1 Peter 2:20; Is. 42:2-3. * * * "And showed him mercy." God showed his love and pity by going with Joseph into his prison life. Men may forsake us, but God will be our portion, if we so choose. "In all their affliction he was afflicted." Is. 63:9. For Joseph to have the answer of God in a good conscience (Acts 23:1); to be haunted by no feelings of remorse; to look upon things that were unseen (2 Cor. 4:18), even upon the King in his beauty; to know and to feel that he was near, this was Joseph's portion vouchsafed in mercy. As Dr. Robertson says, "The reward of well-doing is God." * * * "Gave him favor in sight of keeper." The secret of Joseph's influence was his communion with God, producing the grace and power of a godly character as manifested in manners, appearance and conduct. This is the secret of Christ's immeasurable influence.

V. 22. Advancement. "Keeper of the prison." The light of that godly life attracts this pagan officer in whose presence Joseph now is brought. True character bears a light that cannot be hid. * * * "Committed to Joseph's hands all the prisoners." Joseph's transparent character shows that he was fit to be trusted with higher duties in the prison, and to these he was advanced. Joseph must often have prayed for release, (Ch. 40:14-15) but the time for that had not yet come—he must be schooled for greater things in God's providence.

V. 23. Power of Character. "The keeper looked not to anything." Joseph had now completely gained the confidence of this man. His righteousness won men. * * * "Because the Lord was with him." Here the reason for his favor with the keeper is specified. The Lord was with him in his spirit. Ch. 41:39. The Spirit of the Lord, like his Word, is not bound. 2 Tim. 2:9. Is our influence enlarged because God is with us? * * * "The Lord made it to prosper." Joseph was blessed in being "like a tree planted by the rivers of water" bringing forth the fruit of righteousness in its season, while his "leaf," the visible holy walk, did not wither in that desert place and "whatsoever" he did it prospered. Ps. 1:3. How foolish for any one to think that by ignoring him whose favor alone can bring prosperity we can prosper.

V. 1. The King's Offenders. "After these things." How long after we do not know. Two years are mentioned in Ch. 41:1, and from this it is assumed that the interval here was considerably less, probably about one year. * * * "The butler of the king." The chief butler. V. 2. This was a high and honorable office, the same as that which Nehemiah bore many years later. Neh. 1:11. To carry out his great ends God uses some very ordinary material. * * * "And his baker." He was the chief baker (V. 2), a high official whose business it was to furnish, and have charge of, the king's table. Anciently there could be no higher trust than this, as not rarely food was made a vehicle of poisoning those in high office. * * * "Offended their lord, the king." How they offended is not stated. Knowing their capriciousness the Psalmist counseled his hearers not to put their trust in princes. Psa. 146:3.

V. 2. The King's Wrath. "And Pharaoh." Pharaoh was a general title like Cæsar. * * * "Was wroth." High places are slippery places. Nothing is more uncertain than the favor of kings. The favor of God is just the reverse of this. It is unfailling.

V. 3. Distinguished Companions. "He put them in a ward." until a time should be given for their hearing. A great distance, humanly speaking, lay between the new prisoners, high officers from Pharaoh's court, and this humble, Hebrew shepherd prisoner. * * * "Into the house of the captain." This captain was Potiphar. * * * "Into the prison . . . where Joseph was bound." The same prison referred to in preceding chapter in V. 20. Here Joseph, the young farmer-shepherd, was brought into close touch with these unfortunate officials of the court of Egypt. This was a great gain to Joseph as all his later history shows.

V. 4. Further Advancement. "Captain of the guard." Potiphar, the master of Joseph. * * * "Charged Joseph with them." Because Joseph had proved himself faithful in that which was least, as a keeper of ordinary prisoners, he now is advanced to the charge of prominent prisoners, an important link in his own history. In his close relation to these officers as days and months wore tediously away, Joseph found the opportunity of his life for gaining information of the greatest value to him. * * * "Served them." How Joseph waited on them is not stated. Being in disgrace, it is possible that these officers were attracted by the gracious, condescending attention of their young keeper. God is love and his love will shine through his true followers everywhere, even in prison. * * * "Continued a season in ward." These relations were not brief. Joseph in prison was schooled before men qualified to instruct in the details of the Egyptian government. The officers in prison were gainers in witnessing the grace of this man whom they never had been permitted to see outside. Even in prison all things were working together for good. Rom. 8:28.

V. 5. Dreams of the Night. "Each man his dream in one night." Pharaoh's birthday was but three days away. V. 13. Reasoning from past custom, the prisoners would be disturbed by the uncertainty of their fate at the hearing before Pharaoh. Their dreams caused them to be in gloom. V. 6. * * * "According to interpretation." Each dream had its own interpretation, as the sequel shows. In those early times God in many cases revealed himself in dreams. To us he has revealed himself in his Son and his Word.

V. 6-7. Conspicuous Sadness "Came in unto them." On the rounds of faithful duty he had intercourse with the prisoners. * * * "And looked . . . behold they were sad." Not ignorant of misfortune, Joseph knew how to pity them. He was tender-hearted. Ch. 44:14-15. His compassion for other sorrowing ones was a balm for his own sorrow, a lesson to us. * * * "Wherefore look so sadly." A strange question from an oriental keeper to prisoners under him. Not so in the present case, it was God who spoke through the heart of Joseph. Joseph's next step was to proclaim God. V. 8. They were in prison and in a true sense he came unto them, thus fulfilling Christ's later test of a godly life. Matt. 25:36.

V. 8. God's Witness. "They said there is no interpreter." They feared that the appearance before Pharaoh would come without their having the means of securing an interpreter of their dreams, an office of the magicians. They were unaware that before them stood God's interpreter. To-day men are possessed with worldly visions and air castles which may be ominous to their higher good. They too need God's witness to reveal to them the higher truths regarding their possible destiny. * * * "Do not interpreters belong to God?" He proclaims God. Familiar, as Joseph was, with God's dealings with his great-grandfather, Abraham, he points the prisoners to him in full assurance that he is able to supply all their needs. * * * "Tell me them, I pray you." An admission that he stood before them as God's man. Doubtless he had before this spoken to them of God. Matt. 12:34. Had Joseph made light of their dreams, he would, for aught we can see, have died in the dungeon.

V. 9-13. Dream of the Vine. "Branches . . . blossoms . . . grapes." The dream related in this verse is most beautiful and well worth close observation. * * * "Pressed them." The statement here is useful in showing that anciently wine was the pure, fresh juice of the grape without fermentation. This is the kind of wine that is favorably referred to throughout the scriptures. * * * "Three branches are three days." Only divine knowledge could have known that these branches referred to time. The butler was thus assured that Joseph obtained his wisdom from above. See V. 8.

V. 14-15. Longings in Prison. "Think on me." These words remind us of the repentant thief's prayer on the cross. Luke 23:24. Joseph's faith helped him to believe that somehow there must come deliverance from his present unfortunate condition. Doubtless he had often meditated on the strange providence that brought him into Egypt. May not now his release follow through the release of these distinguished court prisoners? * * * "Bring me out." The one longing of every prisoner. But there is a worse captivity than that within stone walls, viz., when one is held by the strongholds of sin. Christ came to give complete deliverance to such. Luke 4:18. Any one who will seek deliverance, as did Joseph, may be brought out of this greater captivity. * * * "I was stolen." He merely states the facts and that without implicating any one. * * * "Done nothing." Joseph was suffering wrongfully. Such a course of trial and persecution God's children have often been led through. Our Master did "nothing," but he was made perfect through suffering. The Bible abounds in such instances, only that we may not think it strange "concerning the fiery trial which is to try us." 1 Pet. 4:12.

FIVE MINUTES' SERMON ON THE GOLDEN TEXT.

BY PETER AINSLIE.

TO-DAY we look out from Joseph's prison cell. Nobody covets sorrow; nobody wants to be imprisoned. We call these things the misfortunes of life, but after all our talk about trouble and sorrow and imprisonments, out of these things have come the best gifts to the world. Read the list of men and women who have suffered and you will find the world's real royalty. Indeed see if there be in the world's annals a name of real worth that has crossed the world amid laughter and hurrahs, under cloudless skies and over beds of flowers. Those people have never begun to live, but misfortunes are more frequently the real fortunes. Here is some man imprisoned by poverty or social conditions or some great sorrow. The folly of this world has been driven out of him. The heart looks like a field swept by a hurricane and then plowed up by some careless plowman, but wait awhile. The sight is sad now, but that was once a field of brambles and now new seeds are sprouting and by and by an angel's hand gathers a hundredfold harvest. Does not the farmer do his field that way? Does not the miner do his mines like that? To make this beautiful and profitable, do we not have to break up and mar in order to make over? For a whole lifetime one may be imprisoned and there are thousands in such case, some on beds of sickness, some so afflicted that they can be of little or no use to themselves, some in unhappy homes, some bound down by poverty, some so smitten in heart that their only joy comes through weeping. You have seen Charlotte Corday's picture as she stands behind the prison bars and you may think that she is alone, but you do not have to invite an artist to paint. There are thousands of sad faces that are being pressed against the hard bars of imprisonment. These are the world's martyrs and they suffer most in secret—the hardest suffering in the world, but some day they shall walk proudly out of their prison house. "This mortal must put on immortality." The conflict shall only linger in memory like smoke hangs over the fields of battle, and freedom and victory shall shout together as the once imprisoned heart shall ascend the throne. Jesus suffered. He was God's son. I am only his servant. Then shall I not suffer? The prison house brings with it no sweet thought unless Jesus be the companion of the imprisoned. Paul in the dark prison in Rome and Tyndale in the damp cell of Vilvoorde are nothing to be compared to the Son of God when he was imprisoned in human flesh. Things seem strange now. We do not know, but God is good and he is faithful and plenteous in mercy. Believe him, trust him and he will do all things right.

McKinley and King Alfred.

The London Times publishes a short poem of which the theme is the coincidence of the funeral of President McKinley and the celebration of the millenary of King Alfred the Great. Following is the closing stanza:

Up with our hearts and oversea
Swift be the words of friendship sped:
You praise our hero king and we Lament with you your patriot dead.
In sorrow's name one boon we crave—
Lay England's wreath upon his grave.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR.

CHARLES BLANCHARD.

DARK DAYS AND THEIR LESSONS.

Topic Oct. 15; Ref. Ps. 107; 1-15.

IT TAKES the dark days to bring out the faith and affections of human hearts. Where everything moves along in unruffled peace and prosperity, we are careless, thoughtless, sometimes dead, indifferent. But where some individual affliction or a great national calamity comes upon us suddenly, as they always do, the soul springs to the defense of what we hold as dear as life.

Triumphs Out of Tragedies.

Triumphs of faith, of heroism, of patriotism, spring thus suddenly and surprisingly out of the tragedies of human lives. There is in this a prophecy of our nobler being, a proof of the divinity within us, and without us, which shapes our ends, rough-hew them as we may. The heroes are those who rise thus, consciously or unconsciously, to the emergency of the moment, of the event of the hour, or of the century, or of the ages, and stand in the breach of brotherhood, as the heralds of hope, the prophets of peace, the seers of success.

Notable Illustrations.

Garfield stilling the great mob in New York City, on the announcement of the death of Lincoln, is a fine instance of that surprising influence which a man of quick inspiration may have over a surging mass of amazed and maddened men. It was an illustration of his personality, of his religious faith and fervor, and of his marvelous genius for leadership, which later made him President, to the surprise of the nation and of the world. His words had the thrill of triumph in them, in the midst of the tragic events of that most tragic period of our country's history. "God still reigns and the government at Washington still lives!" And a great silence and sobering of sudden passion fell upon that maddened maze of men, threatening the swift destruction of the World newspaper building.

The recent most affecting demonstration of the people's faith and affection, during the solemn hours of waiting while President McKinley lay dying, is proof again of the fact that out of the tragedies of human hearts spring the triumphs of religious sentiment and patriotic devotion. A great crowd of people of all classes and conditions stood in the street in front of the Inter-Ocean office on Monroe street, Chicago, waiting the final bulletin. Patiently, pathetically, until long after midnight they waited, until the announcement came, when as if by inspiration some one started, "Nearer, my God, to Thee," and the solemn crowd sang it through. Then followed, most appropriately, the most beautiful national hymn in all the world, "My country, 'tis of thee," and thereafter "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," born out of the throes of the greatest Civil war of the centuries, with the heart throb of a nation in it. And so our hearts are comforted, and our national bonds strengthened, with this almost universal expression of religious and patriotic faith and fervor.

"Let the Redeemed of the Lord Say So."

It does us good, on these dark days of national calamity, with the shadow of a great tragedy upon the hearts of the people, to give expression to the loftier sentiments of patriotism, and to the better sense of brotherhood which ought to prevail among us. We who love our country should say so. It is the lesson for the hour. We should reverence our rulers while they live and are worthy. "Let the redeemed of the Lord say so"—thus souls will be strengthened, the fires of faith kindled, hope inspired, love renewed with rejoicing!

THE QUIET HOUR.

[The International Bible Reading Association Daily Readings.]

BY THE REV. ALEXANDER SMELLIE, M. A.

"Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging."—Proverbs 20:1.

Monday—Proverbs 23. 29-35

HOW sad are the sorrows of the man who is befooled by strong drink! What troubles he reaps for himself!

It brings shame. "Woe" and "complaining"—these are its bitter harvest. And if this self-abhorrence only deepened into real penitence, all would yet be well. But too often it does not. Too often it is felt for a little, and then forgotten, to be experienced afresh by-and-by.

It brings strife. "Wounds without cause" are its hateful fruitage and issue. Quarreling and contention, sometimes between very friends, how frequently it is responsible for them! It leads to bickering and blows, and brother lifts hand against brother, and variance takes the place of peace.

It brings delusion. The eyes "behold strange things." They may be things attractive, fascinating, enriching. But there is no reality in them. They are dreams, phantasmagoria, emptiness. And then the man awakens to discover that he is poor indeed.

And, in the end, it brings death. The death of health, of reputation, of usefulness, of holiness. Death here, and more hopeless and irretrievable death hereafter. Therefore, my soul, see that thou shun and abjure the wicked thing.

Tuesday—Amos 6. 1-7.

Self-indulgence is indeed an evil thing. "The afflictions of Joseph" are still well-known in this world where I live—ah, let me not live to please myself, when my sympathy and ministry and love are needed so sorely.

The needs of the body: do not I see these on every side? Starving men, "wives and mothers maist despairin'," little children ill-fed and ill-clad, with scarce one of the joys of childhood to brighten their lot—these call to me loudly and urgently. I must not refuse to help them.

The sorrows of the mind: I know some who are perplexed by their difficulty and persistence. Doubts hang over their sky. Questions about the highest and deepest things haunt them whether they will or no. If I have been led into certainty myself, I ought to be their teacher and guide.

The distresses of the soul: how many suffer from them! They weep in secret. The burden lies heavy on their backs. They fear the anger of God. They begin to understand the exceeding sinfulness of sin. Can I not point them to the Interpreter's House and the place where the Cross stands?

It will be shameful if I anoint myself with the chief ointments, and am not grieved for the affliction of Joseph.

Wednesday—Nahum 1. 1-10.

This is the doom of a city which was proud and overbearing and oppressive. It was not merely with the Nineveh of Old Testament times, it is with cities and communities to-day, that the God of righteousness takes to do.

There is much in my native land to fill me with satisfaction and joy. But there is much, too, in my country to awaken in me concern and penitence and misgiving, if I am a Christian man. The greed of gain, the overweening self-reliance, the national sins which inflict so dark a stain, the irreligiousness, the failure to ask in public affairs for the will and commandment of Christ, the forgetfulness of all God's benefits in the past and in the present: these things should make me blush, and should send me to my knees in confession and prayer.

Thursday—Proverbs 1. 10—23.

God's character is holy. God's requirements are spiritual. God's government is righteous. May I sympathize with the character, the requirements, the government. When sinners entice me, may I refuse to consent.

I hear much about the specters of the mind, which keep people from casting in their lot with Christ, the difficulties they have about doctrine, the problems of the faith they find it impossible to solve. I do not question that these mental troubles hinder some from the exercise of childlike trust. But for one whose obstacles are intellectual, there are a hundred whose obstacles are spiritual. They listen to the specious promises of evil-doers and of evil itself. They have no desire for the crucifixion of old affections. They are not prepared to take Jesus—holy, harmless, undefiled—for Lord and King. To be a Christian involves too much and cuts too deep.

Now, let me bid an irrevocable farewell to the City of Destruction, in which there is so much that is pleasant to flesh and blood. Let me set my face like a flint towards the rough and narrow pilgrim-road. Let me obey the call of Wisdom, summoning me to separate myself to God, to follow Christ whithersoever he leads, to throw my whole nature open to the dominion of the Spirit.

Friday—Luke 21. 25—36.

I would watch at every season.

Yes, mine be the eye that observes. If I am on the outlook for indications of what God wishes me to be, I shall not be left in dubiety and darkness. His providence will be filled with hints of the manner of life he would have me live. His Word will be profitable for instruction in righteousness, his Spirit will be the light within, that never leads astray.

And mine be the will that obeys. So soon as I know my Master's purposes and designs I would fall in with them. I would run the way of his commandments, once he has enlarged my heart. Such prompt and glad submission is the path to fuller understanding of him. I grow in comprehension as I fulfill his precepts.

And mine be the soul that expects. For he comes again. One day he will rend his heavens, and show himself to me. O, to spend my history in the prospect of it! Thus shall I be deterred from sin. Thus shall I be impelled to holiness. Thus shall I be kept diligent in my Father's business, and my Savior's glad and sacred service.

So I would watch and wait.

Saturday—Romans 13. 8—14.

"Not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying"—they were the words which awakened the new life in Augustine on that far-past day in Milan. As he lay weeping in the garden, he heard a boy's voice or a girl's—for he never knew which—singing from the neighboring house, Tolle, lege, "Take up and read," "Take up and read." And he lifted the New Testament beside him, and read the counsel and command of St. Paul. It was the call of God to him. It was the King's word with power. Jesus had long been knocking at this closed door; now the door was opened, and he entered in.

Have I any word of Scripture which has played an equally memorable and decisive part in my spiritual life? Is there a warning which roused me from my slumber? Is there a command which rang the imperative of heaven through my soul? Is there a great and precious promise which kindled in my midnight the daybreak and the morning? It will be well if I can point to some message of the Lord, on which he has caused me to hope—some sentence of the Bible, which has brought Christ to my gate and my heart.

Sunday—Corinthians 8.

For my brother's sake, I must be willing to part with what may be innocent and lawful for myself.

Let me remember it in the life of the family. There are young eyes, keen, observant, watching me there. There are young feet that will plant themselves where they have seen the print of my shoe. I cannot be too wary.

Let me remember it in the life of business. I shall have to forego some methods and practices, which seem to me right and legitimate, but which others cannot adopt without wounding conscience and committing sin.

Let me remember it in the life of recreation and pleasure. Perhaps I see no harm in a certain amusement, a certain indulgence, a certain self-gratification. Ah, but if others follow me, they will stumble and fall.

Let me remember it, too, in the life of religion. I may think that I can dispense with this fixed habit and that accustomed rule, and yet my spiritual health will not suffer. But my neighbor cannot, and I must not wound him.

He is dear to Christ; let him be dear to me also. Let me love him as I love myself.

PLEASANTRIES.

Willie: "Pa, what's an usher?"

Pa: "He's the man who shows people where they mustn't sit at church."

The prayer of Dr. Lyman Beecher was: "O Lord, grant that we may not despise our rulers; and grant, O Lord, that they may not act so we can't help it!"

"Your husband is not looking well to-night, Mrs. Rhymer." "He isn't, and I'm not surprised at it." "No? Has he been overworking himself?" "It isn't that so much; it is his originality. Why, that man is struck by so many original ideas that his mind must be one mass of bruises."—Woman's Home Journal.

Among some "Witty Retorts of Politicians," Chambers' Journal reproduces that capital retort of Lord Chief Justice Coleridge's to a hissing audience: "Gentlemen," said he, "you hiss; and I am not surprised at it. What can you expect, when the cold waters of reason come into contact with red-hot fanaticism but a hiss?"

General Church News

NEW FEATURES IN THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.

The hosts are gathering in our theological seminaries and Bible colleges, and another year of study is beginning. Keeping in touch with the needs of the times, many of these institutions have new plans of work going into operation and new lines of study are to be made possible for the students. A brief survey of these signs of progress will be interesting.

The Divinity School of the University of Chicago will call to its aid the services of eminent American and European theologians. At the head of the list of outside lecturers stands the name of Principal Salmond of Aberdeen, Scotland, who, in October, will give a series of lectures on "The Theology of the Nineteenth Century and Its Movement in Great Britain." The missionary activity of the Church will receive special attention. Dean Hulbert will conduct courses on the history of missions, through the ancient and mediaeval periods, and in post-reformation times to the dawn of the nineteenth century. The Rev. Dr. A. K. Parker has been elected to the professorship of Modern Missions, and will lecture on "The Missionary Movements of Recent Times," bringing the study down to date. He will also discuss modern methods and problems.

A new departure is marked by the announcement that a class of theological students for study in Palestine will be formed during the winter quarter of 1902. The expedition will be under the direction of Prof. Shailer Mathews. The class, which is limited to twenty persons, will sail about the middle of December and will return early in April. At least seven weeks will be spent in Palestine, during which time courses will be conducted by Prof. Mathews in the historical geography of Palestine and the life of Jesus. Members of the class register as students in the University of Chicago, and will be given credit for the work done.

A practical feature of the work in McCormick Seminary, in addition to the usual studies, is the instruction in the following topics of pastoral theology: The pastor's personal character, habits, manner; the pastor in the study, in the prayer meeting, in the Bible school, in the homes of the people, in revivals, in inquiry meetings, in the pulpit. The coming session is to be signalized by large additions to the library. The attendance this year will be somewhat over 100, which compares somewhat unfavorably with last year's 136, but there are forty new students, and the faculty believe the bottom of the decline in candidates for the ministry has been reached.

Chicago Theological Seminary presents an interesting example of interdenominational comity this year in having among its instructors, in addition to its regular board of fifteen, Prof. Shailer Mathews of the University of Chicago, Dr. Warren J. Moulton of Yale, and Rev. Wm. M. Lawrence, D. D., pastor of the Second Baptist Church, his department being homiletic. Prof. Caspar Rene Gregory, D. Th., LL. D., of the University of Leipzig, is delivering a course of six lectures on the following topics: "The Greek MSS. of the New Testament," "The Principles of Textual Criticism," "Theology Today in Germany," "Modern Social Movements in Germany," "The American Student in a German University," "Tischendorf and the Sinaitic Manuscript." Rev. C. N. Ransom, the representative of the seminary on the foreign field, will also lecture part of the year. In the music department, in charge of Prof. Chamberlain, there are to be two new features: A series of organ recitals, in which some of the leading organists of Chicago and other cities will take part; and a series of extension lectures in music, by Prof. Felix Borowski, of the Chicago Musical College. These will be on the analysis and interpretation of music, based upon the programs of the Thomas orchestra concerts.

The Garrett Biblical Institute is discussing an extension of the elective system. Psychology and the history of philosophy and pedagogy will be given considerable place in the curriculum. The exegetical work has been separated from the instruction in Greek and Hebrew. Heep Hall, the students' dormitory, has been entirely renovated; the interior is substantially new.

Traveling East from Chicago we find that Hartford Theological Seminary has made some radical changes. It has recognized in large measure the needs of the times. Specially is this true in regard to the demand for trained teachers for the Sunday school and for a teaching ministry. Accordingly the psychology of education, its history and differing theories will be treated. A special pedagogical course is supplied by the affiliated Bible Normal College, just removed from Springfield to Hartford, but opportunities for training in pedagogics have been incorporated in the regular seminary course. Model Bible and Sunday school classes will be conducted and the various problems of teaching as they present themselves to the pastor and others will be considered. For students going to the foreign field a wider scheme of study is provided, covering those things which a superintendent of schools has to know; also a course in evangelistic pedagogics. The special course in missions has been enlarged by means of the Charles M. Lamson Fund. Eight lectures by experts on missionary organization, business methods, history, international law and special fields are arranged. Medical instruction for simple missionary service is also provided. Home missions and city missions are included in these courses. The Carew lecturers for the coming year are Rev. David W. Forrest of Glasgow, Rev. W. Garrett Holder of London, and Talcott Williams, L. H. D., of Philadelphia. Other lecturers are Dr. Dunning of Boston on the Sunday school, Prof. Caspar Rene Gregory of Leipzig on German theology, Dr. Forbush on "The Boy Problem in the Church," Rev. E. Speer, etc.

Union Theological Seminary is also

BOXES OF GOLD.

Sent for Letters About Grape-Nuts.

Three hundred and thirty boxes of gold and greenbacks will be sent to persons writing interesting and truthful letters about the good that has been done them by the use of Grape-Nuts food.

Ten little boxes, each containing a $10 gold piece, will be sent the 10 writers of the most interesting letters.

Twenty boxes each containing a $5 gold piece to the 20 next most interesting writers, and a $1 greenback will go to each of the 300 next best. A committee of three not members of the Postum Co. will make decision between Dec. 1st and 10th, 1901.

Write plain, sensible letters, giving detailed facts of ill health caused from improper food and explain the improvement, the gain in strength, in weight, or in brain power after using Grape-Nuts food.

It is a profound fact that most ails of humanity come from improper and non-nourishing food, such as white bread, hot biscuit, starchy and uncooked cereals, etc.

A change to perfectly cooked, pre-digested food like Grape-Nuts, scientifically made and containing exactly the elements nature requires for building the delicate and wonderful cells of brain and body, will quickly change a half sick person to a well person. Food, good food, is Nature's strongest weapon of defense.

Include in the letter the true names and addresses, carefully written, of 20 persons not very well, to whom we can write regarding the food cure by Grape-Nuts.

Almost everyone interested in pure food is willing to have his or her name appear in the papers for such help as they may offer the human race. A request, however, to omit name will be respected. Try for one of the 330 prizes. Every one has an equal show. Don't write poetry, but just honest and interesting facts about the good you have obtained from the pure food Grape-Nuts. If a man or woman has found a true way to get well and keep well, it should be a pleasure to stretch a helping hand to humanity, by telling the facts.

Write your name and address plainly on letter and mail promptly to the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

providing for Bible study with reference to the needs of Sunday school teachers. A complete course in the English Bible and in pedagogy will be given, following the text book and recitation method. The plan includes extension work in Manhattan, Brooklyn and elsewhere, with as many churches as require it, either by lecture or text book method.

Yale Divinity School offers a new semi-elective system and has added several new departments: Biblical History and Archaeology, Dr. F. K. Sanders; Biblical Literature, Dr. C. F. Kent; Semitic Languages, Dr. C. C. Torrey, and Ecclesiastical History, Dr. Williston Walker. The special lecturers for the coming year are Rev. George A. Gordon, D. D., of Boston; Rev. Washington Gladden, on "The Pulpit in Its Relation to Present Day Social Problems;" Rev. D. W. Forrest, D. D., of Scotland, and Rev. Wm. V. Kelley, D. D., editor of the Methodist Quarterly Review. We note that prizes are awarded for the highest proficiency in the public reading of the Scriptures and of hymns—an accomplishment that needs cultivating by ministers.

Hamilton Theological Seminary, connected with Colgate University, finds successful its plan of combining a certain required amount of work and a very wide range of electives, thus affording opportunity for specialization in any department.

One of the new features at Auburn Theological Seminary is a course of lectures on liturgies and hymnology, by Rev. Louis F. Benson of Philadelphia. Special prominence is to be given in the future to preparation for the conduct of public worship. A course of instruction in the English Bible, covering a period of three years, will be also inaugurated. This includes methods of study, of teaching, of use in the inquiry room and elsewhere, in addition to a detailed study of the contents. A department of sacred pedagogy, with a view to advancing the interests of the Sunday school, and department of evangelistic work are contemplated. It is Dr. Stewart's opinion that a quarter of a century ago systematic theology was the point of emphasis in seminary instruction; now it is Bible study.

The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary at Louisville has introduced an annual course of lectures devoted to the interests of the Sunday school, to bear in the most practical ways possible upon the general work of the pastorate, as well as to give emphasis to scholarship. Special attention is to be given to mission work in a Society for Missionary Inquiry, the first day of each month being entirely devoted to this topic.

The College of the Bible at Drake University opens with an enlarged attendance. Dr. Clinton Lockhart has classes in Syriac and Assyrian. Prof. Stairs, a graduate of Yale, is a new acquisition to the faculty.

Hiram College gives a year's work in the Prophets and Psalms, in its Biblical department, in addition to the usual theological studies.
