In faculty equipment the most notable thing has been: 1. Complete reorganization of the Department of Music, under the leadership of Mr. Frederic Howard, of New York; 2. The Bible College has been greatly strengthened by the addition of Dr. Clinton Lockhart; 3. The Medical Department has been completely merged into the organic life of the University. The first and second years are now taught in the Science Hall on the Campus; 4. The Des Moines College of Dental Surgery has become an affiliated department. It will add eighty students to the College rolls. 5. The addition of many new teachers to the faculty of the University.

The University has made a steady and rapid growth in the twenty years of its history. It is expected the enrollment will reach 1,900 the coming year. The location in Des Moines, with its state and city libraries, its courts, hospitals, churches, societies, etc., is excellent in every respect. Send for general catalog, 200 pages, free.

Current Events.

Democratic Conventions.

All who are interested in forecasting the future of the Democratic party will find food for thought in observing the various state conventions of the party. During the past week nominating conventions were held in Virginia and Pennsylvania. The latter formulated a platform which—very wisely—adheres strictly to state issues. To have attempted to formulate a declaration of approval or disapproval of the party's national leaders and doctrines during recent years, would have introduced a wholly superfluous element of discord. It is useless to expect unanimity either for or against free silver as a present issue, and the state convention which spends time debating that question this year is going out of its way to look for trouble. There are three years yet before the national platforms of 1904 are due and the Democratic party is entitled to take that time in deciding what shall be its attitude toward the issues and leaders of the last two campaigns. It is a big question and they will need the time. The political "sooners" who are hastening to get their states on record for or against reorganization are not doing a service to their party. Pennsylvania in particular has issues enough of her own without trying to forecast the national issues of 1904, and it is gratifying to note that the convention saw its opening. Common honesty in the transaction of public business is an issue which, though not strictly local, needs very much to be localized in Pennsylvania. Neither free silver resolutions nor anti-free silver resolutions avail anything when the legislature is for sale. The Virginia Democratic convention, which also met last week, likewise confined itself for the most part to state issues. A noncommittal resolution of admiration for all the leaders of the party "from Jefferson to Bryan" was adopted without comment, though a previous declaration by a delegate against Bryan and free silver had been greeted with moderate applause.

The Strike at a Standstill.

The operations of the striking steel workers during the past week have been directed chiefly toward South Chicago and the mills of the Carnegie Company. In neither of these directions have the results been encouraging to the Amalgamated Association, though the leaders of the strike declare that, in spite of surface indications, the tendency is in their favor. The members of the association in the South Chicago mills have persisted in disobeying the strike order and as a result two lodges have had their charters revoked. The mills at Joliet, Milwaukee and Bay View, however, have joined the strikers, so that neither side has any marked advantage in the west. The Carnegie mills at Homestead and Duquesne have been the most important centers of interest. After trembling in the balance for some time between the two parties the men decided to strike, but their places were promptly filled by non-union men and no time was lost in the operation of the mills. The lower Union mills are added to the list of strikers. On the whole, the strike appears to be temporarily at a standstill. Unless it can be extended far beyond its present proportions it cannot hope to accomplish its object. The belief that they are "fighting for existence" has been industriously instilled into the men and most of them no doubt believe it. It was announced a few days ago that Mr. Morgan has a plan for allowing the employees of the steel corporation to acquire an interest in the concern by buying stock on time payments. Such a plan ought to be in operation in every large business and it would provide a method of industrial co-operation even more practical and just than the plan of profit-sharing which many companies now practice. But Mr. Morgan's suggestion would have had a truer ring of sincerity if it had been made at almost any other time than when there is a strike on hand and sixty thousand dissatisfied workmen to be conciliated.

Tammany's Troubles.

The Tammany braves have again fallen upon evil times and are beset by conditions which encourage their enemies and perplex their friends. The police investigation, in which Justice Jerome has been the leading spirit, has uncovered official rottenness at every point which it has touched. There is evidence to show that certain police captains were in the habit of giving warnings by telephone to the joints which they were about to raid. The raids satisfied the public, the warning satisfied the joint-keeper, and the joint-keeper doubtless satisfied the police. It was a good scheme while it lasted. The situation has become so serious that there is even a possibility of the indictment of Deputy Commissioner Devery, who was chief of police until the force of unfavorable public opinion became stronger even than his pull and he was forced to step down one place. Evidence is now being collected for the grand jury. The interest is increased by the imminence of the New York mayoralty campaign. Gov. Odell and Mr. Platt have both declared themselves in favor of nominating an independent Democrat at the head of the Republican ticket, in the hope of getting the decent people of both parties on one side. Tammany has a right to be troubled. It does not expect its representatives on the city pay-roll to be good, but it does expect them to be careful. Some of them are about to commit the sin of getting caught—which is the only crime of any consequence in the Tammany calendar. The return of Mr. Croker from Europe is anxiously awaited by the braves, who are confident that when "the old man" returns everything will be all right and Justice Jerome will receive the punishment which all aggressively honest men deserve.

The Protocol Signed.

The public, weary of waiting, will be relieved to learn that the representatives of the Powers in Peking have signed the protocol embodying the provisions for the punishment of the Boxers and the payment of indemnity. It would have been gratifying if this consummation could have been reached in time to make it a part of the celebration of the first anniversary of the relief of the besieged legations, but it was a few days too late for that. Although the casual observer cannot but have the impression that the representatives of the Powers have taken an unconscionably long time in arriving at the decisions embodied in this protocol, it must be borne in mind that they had really a very complicated problem to deal with. They had to determine not only the amount of the indemnity and the manner of payment, but—what was a much more serious problem—the way in which China should raise the money to make the payments. The rearrangement of the tariff schedule was an important feature in this problem. We have trouble enough when we undertake to readjust our own tariff, when we have nobody to please but ourselves, and it is little wonder that difficulties were encountered in making a schedule for China which would be satisfactory to all the interested parties. It is a matter of congratulation for American exporters that flour and cereals have been retained on the free list. The services of Mr. Rockhill, our special commissioner, which have been brought to an end by the signing of the protocol, have been exceptionally intelligent and efficient. Every demand or suggestion which our government made through him was acceded to by the other representatives, with the one exception of our plea to have China let off with a lighter indemnity. Mr. Rockhill will shortly return home. Minister Conger has returned to China, arriving in Peking the day after the signing of the protocol. It is reported that the Chinese emperor has issued an edict setting Oct. 6 as the date for the departure of the court from Singan Fu en route for Peking. No attempt will be made to settle the Manchurian question until the arrival of the new Russian minister late in the fall.

Chinese Exclusion.

The present Chinese Exclusion Act will expire by limitation in a little more than a year and it will be for the next Congress to decide whether it will be re-enacted or allowed to lapse. It is probable that the question will be discussed with a good deal of warmth before it is settled. During the last ten years the interest of the United States in the trade of the Orient has been multiplied many fold, and there is in some quarters a feeling that we cannot make any very effective bid for Chinese trade unless we cultivate more friendly relations with the Chinese who wish to come to our shores. The attitude of organized labor is, of course, unwaveringly against the admission of the Chinese, but there are others who assert that the Chinese have never shown a tendency to emigrate to this country in numbers sufficient to endanger either the American workingman or American institutions. Chinese exclusion is logically an extreme development of the principle of protection. Both embody the principle that, while competition regulated by unionism may be safe enough within the boundaries of one country and among a fairly homogeneous population, it is not safe when applied internationally and among races whose scales of living are radically different. Under the operation of the present law during the past ten years the number of Chinese in the country, as shown by the census of 1900, has decreased by 20,000.

The Return of General MacArthur. On last Sunday General MacArthur arrived in San Francisco. His term of office as military governor of the Philippines ended July 4 when the office of civil governor was established and given to Mr. Taft, while General Chaffee succeeded to the post of military commander. General MacArthur had been in command in the Philippines three years. Any judgment upon the way in which he has performed his work necessarily involves a judgment of the whole Philippine situation. It may, however, be said that his course has been eminently satisfactory to the administration. During the three years of his command, the insurgents have been reduced from a state of general and troublesome activity to almost complete quiescence. "While the conditions are not perfect," says General MacArthur, "they are gratifying. A few groups of armed insurgents are still at large, but they will soon surrender, as their power is broken and they are not being aided by the natives. These natives have come to see that surrender does not mean death and they are coming in every week with their rifles. Throughout northern Luzon the insurrection has been dead for some time and there is freedom of movement. Still, a large criminal class there commits depredations on Americans and natives, though the latter suffer the most severely. The natives are eagerly seeking the establishment of civil government, that they may root out these bands of criminals. There is every reason to believe that the whole country will soon be perfectly safe for travelers."

Wireless Telegraphy. One of the most successful experiments which has yet been made with wireless telegraphy was the sending of a message by the Marconi system from the in-coming steamship Lucania to the Nantucket lightship at a distance of 72 miles. It was in fact more than an experiment; it was a demonstration. After leaving the coast of Ireland, communication was kept up with a station on the coast for ten hours and the sending of the message to the Nantucket lightship while still 287 miles east of Sandy Hook cut off ten hours more. In this way the Lucania, which is one of the fast ships, was cut off from communication with the world only a trifle over four days. Several lines intend to equip their vessels with wireless telegraphy outfits, and their dispatches via Nantucket will become a regular feature of the daily marine news.

Colombia and the Monroe Doctrine.

In spite of official assurances that the trouble in Colombia is not more serious than has occurred several times during the past decade, it is impossible to resist the impression that something more important is at least strongly threatened. But then, something is always just about to happen in those South American republics. The actual hostilities, so far as the reports of the past week show, are no more serious than before, but with the sending of warships to the scene by the United States, France, Germany and Russia, the affair takes on an international coloring. It is, however, virtually conceded by both France and Germany that, by the treaty between the United States and New Granada in 1846, it becomes our duty and privilege to interfere before any other Power to protect foreign property and keep open the trade route across the isthmus. The Monroe Doctrine, moreover, would apply to forbid any European Power to interfere except in so far as might be necessary to protect the property of its own citizens. There is a general belief that our government will interpret its treaty obligations as binding it to side with the present government of Colombia against the concerted attacks of the Colombian rebels, Venezuela, Ecuador and Nicaragua. The participation of the latter is only conjectural. If it should be real, there will be more reason for interference by our government.

Cows and Consumption.

At the Tuberculosis Congress, held lately in London for the study of this dread disease and the methods of exterminating it, the greatest interest was aroused by Dr. Koch's report of his discovery that tuberculosis in cows is an entirely different disease from tuberculosis in the human species and can not be communicated either by inoculation or by drinking the milk of the diseased bovines. His actual experiments, to be sure, proved only that cows are immune from the contagion of human consumption, but it is argued that the converse of this proposition must also be true. The eminent physicians who composed the congress did not unanimously agree to this argument, but on the whole the tendency was toward the opinion that most of the cry of danger from the milk and flesh of consumptive cows is a false alarm. It is still worth while to keep up a strict inspection to prevent the sale of diseased meat, but it is a comfort to know that the beverage of childhood can be confidently indulged in as the cup which cheers but not inoculates.

Brevities.

A severe storm visited the gulf coast last week and did much damage in Mobile and New Orleans. It was nothing to be compared with the Galveston disaster, but the dwellers along that coast can be excused if they feel a bit nervous whenever the water begins to rise.

The gifts to American colleges and universities during June are given by a statistician as $12,817,082—and the University of Chicago is not in the list.

The new tariff schedule for the Philippines has been completed at Washington but will not be made public until it has been promulgated in Manila, about Oct. 1. It is estimated that it will produce a revenue of about $12,000,000 a year.

It is reported that the California prune crop this year will not be more than one-third of the usual yield. This will be a hard blow to the boarding-house industry, but it will manage to keep its head above water unless there is a simultaneous failure of the hash crop.

The Transit Company did a good work in St. Louis by allowing poor children to ride free to the parks during the heated term. This is a very practical sort of missionary work. The parks are too often so far removed from the crowded parts of the city that those who need them most see least of them.

Mr. Lipton's yacht, Shamrock II., which is to make the annual attempt to win the America's cup, has made its voyage across the Atlantic and arrived at New York. The experts pronounce it a very fast boat in anything but a gale and think that, whether the Constitution or the Shamrock II. wins the race, it will be a close contest.

The Democrats say that Senator Hanna is the only logical Republican candidate for the presidential nomination in 1904, and some Republican papers have suggested that Mr. Gorman's nomination by the democracy will be inevitable if he is sent back to the Senate for Maryland. How nice it would be if each party could nominate the other's candidate!

Judge Harney of the Montana Supreme Court is to be impeached for yielding to the influence of woman and money in a decision which gave $10,000,000 worth of copper mining property to F. A. Heinze and his associates. He is already convicted of conduct impossible to any decent citizen and it only remains to be seen whether Montana will consider decency upon the bench a matter of any consequence.

Unless the drought is forgotten as soon as the first rains fall, it may prove a valuable lesson on the subject of irrigation. No wonder the farmers forget about irrigation when there is plenty of rain. People would forget about fire insurance too if there were not a fire in the neighborhood every few days. But drought comes either to the whole community or to none of it and furnishes no warning except to those who suffer. We must learn to irrigate. A recent Kansas law permits the condemnation of land for this purpose. Gen. Noble, ex-Secretary of the Interior, recently stated that he intended to devote the rest of his life to the study and encouragement of irrigation.

"A Building of God."

The above phrase, as used by the apostle Paul in his comforting message concerning the future life, found in the fifth chapter of the second Corinthian letter, refers to the spiritual body which is to take the place of this earthly body when the latter, by reason of age or disease, has ceased to serve the purposes of the spirit. He says that while we groan in these earthly bodies we do not desire to be unclothed, or disembodied, but to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven. In this mixing of metaphors the apostle is intent only upon expressing the strong desire of the human heart for another house to live in when this earthly house shall be dissolved—"a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." There is an instinctive feeling of aversion in the human soul against being disembodied. Hence the Scriptures do not offer us a bodiless future existence. We shall have bodies, real bodies, though not of the same material substance of which these earthly bodies are formed. They will be adapted to the spiritual world as our present bodies are adapted to the material world in which we live. God will build them.

In another place Paul speaks of Christians as "God's building." This is the great spiritual edifice of which Christ said, "On this I will build my church." Christ is the great master builder on this enduring structure, which is composed of the spirits of men purified by faith and conformed to the image of Christ. While Christ is the builder of this house, He calls to his assistance all who have his spirit to labor with Him in fashioning human souls into living stones for this building of God.

But there is another "building of God," or "house of God," of which we wish to speak, that has relation to the life that now is, as well as that which is to come. We refer to the building or house erected for and dedicated to the worship of Almighty God. The church, in its local sense, as a body of believers called out from the world to serve God and to advance the interests of his kingdom, longs for, and requires, embodiment in a material structure to serve its uses, just as the human spirit requires a body in order that it may perform its functions as a rational personality. The homeless or houseless church is something like a disembodied spirit. It cannot accomplish its work or fulfill its divine mission in any adequate sense without a building. So important is this to its growth and its spiritual development that it cannot be left wholly to the local congregation, for in many cases the young church, in its infancy, is not able to house itself. In our evangelistic zeal many churches have been formed and have been left without a place in which to meet and worship God and carry forward their religious activities. To meet this condition of things the Board of Church Extension was organized, which by a well devised business method secures and appropriates funds for this purpose, which, in due time, return to the board with interest added and go out again on the same benevolent mission. Under its beneficent operations hundreds of homeless churches have been housed, and have been put in the way of becoming efficient and successful organizations in their respective communities. These buildings of God men must erect.

Nothing so businesslike, so economical, has ever been undertaken among us as this method of church extension. In the first place, it is not a charity, and does not cultivate the spirit of pauperism. This in itself is of immense value to churches as well as to individuals. Its help is a loan which accomplishes the purposes of a gift in its immediate results, and then returns to the board with interest to bless another church. In the second place, it calls out gifts from the community in which the church is erected, which would not otherwise be made, and thus adds immensely to the sum total of liberality in the churches and to the total value of church property. And, again, it cultivates the business habit of doing things which has proven very beneficial to many churches. Besides all this, the fund is a perpetual stimulus to scattered Disciples to meet and organize themselves for worship and work, as they have assurance that when they have done their utmost they can find a helping hand in the Board of Church Extension. It would be difficult to exaggerate the value to our cause and to Christianity in general, of the introduction of this practical business method into Christianity. It is not strange that many persons possessed of means, part of which they wish to consecrate to the use of the church perpetually in the future, should devote it to church extension, either on the annuity plan or as a "Named Loan Fund," or in any other way in which the board receives gifts for its use.

The first Lord's day in September has come to be generally known among us as "Church Extension Day." It is the time set apart for an offering from all the churches for the benefit of this fund. It is not in the power of all to donate large sums in either of the ways mentioned above, but these annual offerings furnish an opportunity to all to have a permanent investment in this feature of church work. The fund has been so wisely managed, its results have been so beneficent, that it is commending itself more and more to the favor of the churches, and there should be a corresponding increase in the liberality of these annual offerings. We have hitherto frequently given special numbers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for the benefit of the annual offering to this fund, but in our judgment and that of the corresponding secretary, the time has come when this is no longer necessary, but when a simple reminder as to the time of the offering is all that is needed. Let us hope that this confidence in the intelligence and liberality of the brotherhood will not prove to have been misplaced by the results of the September offering.

The Small College.

The question which occasionally arises whether the small college or the university is the more useful, is about as pertinent as a dispute as to the relative importance of the top and the bottom of a ladder. They are different things with different work to do and, although they are in some respects opposites, they ought never to be mutually antagonistic. In our zeal for large things it is to be hoped that we will never think that the day of the small college is past. Its place is permanent. It must continue to stand near the people as the concrete embodiment of the ideals of higher education and as the most immediate means of acquiring it. The small college with its limited resources—for that is usually the only thing that keeps it small—cannot compete with the heavily endowed universities in the training of specialists, and it is foolish for it to try. But as a means of diffusing liberal education among the rank and file of the people, who have no desire to become specialists and who cannot go far from home for their schooling, the small college must remain a permanent factor in our educational machinery.

The university, on the other hand, has a sphere of its own. The public mind has become confused in this country by the shadowy distinction which has been made between the college and the university. A good little school, with four college classes and a standard for admission about up to the middle year of a first rate high school, would acquire a commercial college or affiliate with a dental school in a neighboring city and the result would be a university granting all the degrees from A. B. to D. D. Even the greatest of the universities have contributed to the confusion by the fact that each of them usually contains within itself a college as one of its departments. The collegiate or undergraduate department of a university can of course come into competition with other colleges, though the university itself cannot do so. It would tend to a clearer understanding if the university proper—that is, the post-graduate departments in which specialists are trained—were separated from its one college that it might co-operate more cordially with all the colleges which ought to be its feeders.

Jealousy among institutions of learning is almost as revolting a spectacle as jealousy among churches. It would be impossible if there were a clear understanding of those respects in which their work is one, and hence should be harmonious, and of those respects in which it is different, and hence cannot clash.

Professor McDiarmid.

The death of Professor Hugh McDiarmid of Hiram College will be a surprise and a shock to his many friends. He was a man of marked ability and had filled a large place among the Disciples of Christ as a preacher and pastor, as the editor at one time of the Christian Standard, as president of Bethany College, where he succeeded A. McLean, and during the last few years as a professor in Hiram College. His was a busy and a useful life, and though his three score years and ten were not yet spent, he had well earned the reward into which he has now entered. His type of mind was naturally conservative and in the defense of his views of truth he developed an argumentative style of writing which was a formidable instrument. He was unceasing and unsparing in the defense and advocacy of the truth as he understood it and resisted with all his powers anything which in his judgment had a tendency to undermine the authority of the Scriptures. At our request, the article which appears on page 1068 has been prepared by Bro. F. M. Green, whose long connection with Hiram and whose recent authorship of The History of Hiram College particularly fit him for this service.

Earthiness in Literature.

—We do not use the term "earthiness" as a synonym for baseness, brutality and sensuality, but as expressive of a certain sturdy virtue. So long as it is conceded that the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof, we must believe that there is a sense in which earthiness is no vice but a source and sign of honest strength and health and sanity. It is inevitable that one should recall in this connection the Greek myth of the giant who wrestled with Hercules—or perhaps it was with Atlas—and every time he touched foot to his mother earth his strength became twice as great as it had been before. The results of such geometrical progressions are always very surprising, and it was no wonder that his antagonist found him invincible on his own ground.

Would it not be a blessing to the literary world and to every one who loveth or maketh a book, if this giant's secret of finding strength through keeping at least one foot on the earth should become a thoroughly open secret among all writers? When one reflects upon the futile efforts of the feeble fledglings who essay to emulate the eagle's flight, who pierce the clouds, dally with the lightnings and lose themselves in empty space, the practical question suggests itself—What for? What is the use of all this eloquence in the upper air, this heaven-defying rhetoric, this mist-enshrouded poesy? If literature were only an amusement, these would do very well, for it must be fun to play with solar systems like a box of dominoes, and there are writers who evidently find absorbing entertainment in hide-and-seek among the clouds. They are welcome to their sport wherever they find it, but only those deserve to be seriously considered as contributors to real literature who keep their feet upon the earth. Literature is both an expression of civilization and an instrument of civilization. It must live where men live. It may look up and lift up, but it may not cut loose from all human concerns and go up to the misty upper depths of rhetorical bombast or over-subtlety of analysis.

Spoken literature, oratory, has passed through its period of soaring and has come to be a practical and useful instrument which a thoughtful man can employ without forfeiting his self-respect. But most of the writers of fiction, which is at once the bulkiest and the most important department of contemporary literature, have yet to learn how to keep their feet on the earth without putting them in the mire. It is a striking fact that some of the most successful books of recent years have been books devoid of technical literary merit. They have been popular, not because the untutored public has a genius for admiring the wrong thing, but because the untutored public found in them a degree of earth-born strength which, even though unaccompanied by purely literary merit, was preferable to the cloud-begotten subtleties which weaker men have clothed in better style. It was altogether to the credit of the public that it bought David Harum by the hundred thousand and that it leaves the works of Mr. Henry James to the patronage of those who have reputations to sustain as lovers of literature. A recent reviewer rightly interprets the public mind in saying: "Whenever we are overwrought by Mr. James's delicacy of touch in spinning the shadows of a film, we feel around for the recuperative grasp of a horny hand, and sigh for the 'be gosh' of our fathers who, however fatally they may have split their infinitives, never split hairs."

The recuperative grasp of a horny hand is not literature, but it is a healthy touch and has helped many a man to a clearer view of the realities of life, and it brushes the cobwebs out of the mind. The choky feeling which comes when one begins to talk about the old red barn, and the willows down by the creek, and the old swimmin' hole, and the old oaken bucket, is not a feeling of literary appreciation, but it has run many a book into a tenth edition and is altogether a wholesome thrill. It is one way of keeping one's feet on the earth—not the only way, but one of the most obvious. When one can acquire command of literary technique without losing the smell of the soil and the odor of the fields, then we have literature that is both popular and good.

The Education Society.

The American Christian Education Society, which was organized at the congress at Lexington, under the sanction of a vote of the General Convention at Kansas City, ought to have prominent recognition at the Minneapolis convention. This is a new and highly important organization which will fill a place in our co-operative work where there has hitherto been a distinct and distressing gap. The Presbyterians and other denominations have educational societies co-ordinate with their missionary societies and disburse hundreds of thousands of dollars through them annually. There is no more reason for leaving our educational interests to be managed purely as private enterprises, than for going back to anti-society methods of missionary work. Large things can be accomplished only by co-operation. Hitherto we have done small things in education, and have done even these with great difficulty, because we have lacked co-operation. There is no danger that the Education Society will assume a dangerous degree of authority over our colleges. The colleges are well protected by their charters and their control is vested in their respective boards of trustees. But there are many things which the brotherhood can do through the Education Society to promote the harmony and effectiveness of our several institutions of learning.

It is not proposed, however, to establish a mere committee of advisers. A missionary society constructed on that principle and with no treasury, would be recognized as a feeble institution. It must have money, and it can be useful in educating the people to give money for education and in helping them to give it where it will do the most good. For instance: Suppose there is a prosperous brother who could give fifty thousand dollars for education and is favorably disposed toward that cause, but has no special interest in one of our schools more than another. He knows in advance that if he sends for the representative of any school he will be advised to give his money to that particular school. The representative of one school has the needs of that school before his mind and upon his heart; he cannot be expected to view the whole field dispassionately and in true perspective. Knowing this, the rich brother either does not confer with the representative of one school; or he unduly discounts his appeal as an ex parte statement; or he confers with representatives of several schools, and in the midst of their various appeals, which seem to be conflicting forces, he is unmoved by any. In any case, the rich brother probably gets puzzled and ends by giving nothing at all.

How much simpler it would be for him if he would remember that we have an Education Society. If he knows where he wants to give his money, well and good. If he has no means of choosing among the several colleges, let him give the money to the Education Society which, being composed of men who know our educational needs and who can view the whole field without prejudice or passion, will put it where it will do the most good.

Surely this is a practical and much needed organization, and one deserving general support. It is not a private enterprise, but is authorized by the General Convention. It needs money, as every enterprise does which expects to accomplish anything. The payment of five dollars a year constitutes one an annual member, and ten dollars a year for five years pays for a life membership. See the statement from the treasurer in Our Budget. The Education Society ought to make a good showing at the Minneapolis convention where it makes its formal debut.

Notes and Comments.

Santos-Dumont, the Brazilian aeronaut who has been astonishing Paris by flying around the Eiffel Tower and almost fulfilling the conditions for winning the Deutsch prize, is not without his rivals. Seven other ambitious aeronauts have their machines either ready for the trial or in process of construction with the same object in view—the winning of the hundred thousand francs and everlasting fame. With eight air-ships tilting at the Eiffel Tower and nearly a dozen arctic expeditions racing for the pole, it appears that two of the principal tasks of the twentieth century may be performed before its first year has expired, and two new realms may thereby be added to man's domain. The wireless telegraphy problem will perhaps be solved about the same time.

Are there to be no silent men of action left in the world? Such were at one time the admired of all admirers, but now, alas! every man who does something gets himself interviewed, says something foolish and has to send his aureole back to the factory for repairs before the new has worn off of it. The German papers are complaining that Count von Waldersee has been talking too much since his return from China two weeks ago. From this it appears that the faculty of superfluous and infelicitous talk is not confined to men who have done something. It is bad enough for a man to talk about the things which he has done, but for one to become garrulous on the subject of the things which he has not done is intolerable. It is suspected that the Count has his eye on the position of Chancellor, which is now occupied by a much younger and more vigorous man than himself.

One of the amusing features of current politics is the way in which Republican papers emphasize the popularity of Mr. Bryan and the Kansas City platform by way of discouraging the reorganizers. One would think that they had suddenly become free silver organs.

The transatlantic line of steamers from Chicago via the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence has been suspended owing to exorbitant rates of marine insurance on this route. Our enterprising neighbor would better try the Mississippi-and-Gulf route the next time it aspires to the unique honor of being an inland seaport.

Admiral Cervera refuses to say whether he thinks he was whipped by Sampson or Schley at Santiago. Perhaps he cherishes a secret hope that the court of inquiry will compromise by declaring in his favor. Really he does show up to very good advantage at this distance of time, even if he did lose the fight.

It is suggested that there may be no director-general for the World's Fair of 1903, the heads of departments forming a council for general supervision. In that case, will it illustrate the truth that "too many cooks spoil the broth," or that "in the multitude of councillors there is wisdom"? Our English proverbs are so convenient to apply to either side of any question.

It is said that during the last two weeks the Navy Department has received 40,000 letters containing advice about the Schley-Sampson investigation. Evidently all the people who talk too much have not yet gotten into the navy. Until the Court of Inquiry has given its decision—and as much longer as possible—the man in the street and the man in the office will do well to emulate Admiral Cervera and the cautious clam.

Government reports show that alcohol, internally administered, does not quicken the activity of the brain even temporarily. Yet many men use it as a mental stimulant and think they can not do their best work without it. All it really does is to dull the sense of duty and obscure the consciousness of one's shortcoming. There is a world of difference between being bright enough to succeed and being stupid enough not to know that you have failed. Alcohol produces only the latter condition.

A transport, containing 400 teachers of both sexes, bound for the Philippines, stopped at Honolulu long enough to allow 30 couples of the pedagogues to get married. The voyage across the Pacific is so much longer than that across the Atlantic that matrimony has to be substituted for quoits and shuffle-board as a steamer game. That section of the sea must have been exceptionally brilliant with 30 honeymoons shining at once. The ship has gone on its way and the young couples are happy—in fact they are in transports.

The Glasgow International Industrial Exhibition, which is now being held, partakes of the sober temperament of its Scotch projectors. It is short on Midway features and long on instructive exhibits of industry and commerce. It is complained that the people are not interested in it. The talk about expositions as great popular educators is all right, within limits, but the average exposition crowd wants fun. It can be reached and instructed (if not educated) through the Midway, if it is the right sort. It is at this point, the amusement concessions, that the world's fairs of the future will find either their greatest success or their direst failure.

The Interior (Presbyterian) has the following astute parable on the creed question which will serve to indicate that Dr. Gray at least and some others of his denomination are not helplessly bound like Siamese twins to the defunct body of any Westminster confession or other creed:

Thou shalt not make unto thyself any graven image nor any likeness of anything in heaven above, the earth beneath nor the waters under the earth, to bow down to and worship it. The Romanists make saints in the likeness of gods and worship them, and then make a Pope and hierarchy in the likeness of the saints and pay homage to them, and thus get two removes from God for their object of piety. We act on the same principle in regard to the Word of God. We make what we call a likeness of the Scriptures and worship it. Then we make little creedal gods in the likeness of that and worship them. And when we have persecuted the Shadrachs, Meshachs and Abednegos and the Daniels who refuse such homage, thrown them into dens of ecclesiastical lions, we get up furnaces of heresy trials and roast them, and then we go home, eat and drink and wipe our mouths and say, "Behold, we have done no evil."

Macatawa Musings.

There is something in this cooler northwest breeze which has prevailed for several days, and in the fierce growling of the gray wolves of the lake, that reminds one that the summer is rapidly passing and that autumn with her red banners will soon be here. The cooler water has brought in the perch, and all this morning a fleet of row-boats lay out upon the blue waters of Lake Michigan near the piers, and in full view of our veranda. This is a great time for amateur anglers, for everybody can catch perch. But a rising wind has filled the lake with whitecaps and driven the small boats to shelter. Not, however, until an abundant supply had been laid in for table use. While perch-fishing does not meet the demands of your genuine lover of the ancient art of angling, it is not bad sport to sit in a boat rocked gently by the swell of the waves, and see your fish coming up through the clear depths of water, on your hook, to be landed in the boat. When you add to this the economic value of the sport, its popularity is not surprising.

On a recent afternoon we had a little experience in fishing from the same boat with two distinguished theologians, who proved themselves to be as unsuccessful fishermen as they are successful preachers. We were, of course, fishing for game fish, and more than once we had desirable and promising "strikes," but they would come right in the midst of some theological discussion and would find us unprepared to make the most of them. Once the doctor from Kentucky was so surprised by the "strike" that he threw his fish clear in the rear of him. The Chicago doctor, being engaged in some fine philosophical or metaphysical distinction, would allow the fish to eat up his bait without impaling one on his hook. It was not the first illustration we have had that theology and ichthyology do not necessarily go together. When the apostles went fishing we imagine they left their theology at home. Their example should be followed in this respect as in others.

The Assembly here came to a graceful and enthusiastic close on Sunday night last. Prof. Lloyd, who had given the series of Bible lectures during the week, preached on Lord's day afternoon to a large and very appreciative audience. It was an able exposition of the text, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." In the evening the beach service was largely attended in spite of the chilly atmosphere. The writer led the meeting and called upon several for short speeches, including Chaplain Claude E. Hill, of Missouri, Bro. Grim, of Chicago, and Prof. Lloyd, who made some farewell remarks, as he was to leave on the boat that night. He spoke appreciatively of his treatment by the people of the Park, and of the many expressions of appreciation of his work by those who had been helped by his Bible studies. At the close of his remarks, the leader of the meeting said that as all the people of the Park could not take him by the hand, and tell him good-bye, he would do it for them, and clasping his hand, he told the Professor how the people loved him for his works' sake, and bade him God speed in his good work. "God be with you till we meet again," was sung, and our brother went on his way rejoicing at the evidence of good accomplished.

Thus ends Macatawa Assembly for 1901. That it has helped many to a better understanding of the Bible, and hence to a stronger faith, was made manifest by many expressions which were made to the lecturer himself and to others. Catholics as well as Protestants, non-Christian as well as Christian, heard him with profit, according to their own testimony. He might be classed as a higher critic, because he thoroughly believes in the right and duty of applying the severest scientific principles of literary and historical investigation to the Bible; but he is a reverent believer in the divine message it contains to men. He refuses, however, to be turned aside from the necessary conclusions resulting from the application of these principles, because they run across preconceived opinions and theories, venerable with age and sacred in the minds of many people. For this reason he no doubt receives something else besides blessing and good wishes from the people. From some remarks he dropped we judge he has felt the keen sting of misrepresentation and misapprehension. But what does that amount to, to one who believes in God and is conscious of rendering Him honest service?

Just as we close these lines, we are to leave Macatawa Park for a few days to preach and conduct some Bible studies at Fountain Park Assembly in northern Indiana. We will probably have something to say about this place in our next.

The OLD BOOK IN THE NEW CRUCIBLE

By J. J. HALEY.

I. The Crucible of Science.

I have no intention of discussing in detail the well worn question of science and religion. It is not my purpose to endeavor to reconcile science and the Bible. Where I do not recognize contradiction it is not likely that I shall waste time on schemes of reconciliation. Between science and religion there is no conflict, nor the semblance of it. It is indisputable as a matter of contemporaneous history that some men's interpretation of religion and other men's deductions from supposed scientific data do not readily harmonize, but between two things that occupy such widely different spheres as material science and a spiritual faith, there is and can be no real antagonism. It is conspicuously a fact, or was in the very recent past, that several of the foremost leaders in the scientific domain were outspoken opponents of the supernatural in Christianity, chiefly on account of the failure to find a place for the miraculous in their scheme of an evolutionary universe. This arose not legitimately from either science or the supernatural, but from a mental one-sidedness frequently characteristic of specialism, that forces one scientific principle out of its own field of action to intermeddle in the affairs of another. From the chronic habit of looking at one half of the world, and that the material half, spiritual perception was dulled, and the mental all-sidedness of vision and development was lacking to see all round the periphery of truth, and through the upper as well as the lower half of the circle.

We have no quarrel with men when they bring to light scientific facts, or apply scientific methods to the investigation of all kinds of questions. In all experiment, observation, and research, designed to add to the world's stock of accurate and available knowledge, we bid them God speed. It is only when they venture to label extravagant speculations, conjectural hypotheses, and reckless deductions from doubtful or half established premises, science, which other men employ as a kind of fulcrum to disturb the equilibrium of our faith, that we have a right to demur, and do emphatically demur. When we remember that the truest science is constantly in a state of flux, that it is progressive, and subject to change and modification with the process of the suns, that the science of to-day may not be the science of to-morrow, that the scientific facts of this week may be the unscientific moonshine of next week—when such facts as these are considered, they should make us extremely cautious in basing conclusions derogatory to revealed religion upon such slender and uncertain premises. A failure to regard this acknowledged instability of science, and a reckless disposition to base conclusions upon what is only conjectured to be true, has caused some very eminent men to make themselves ridiculous in trying to forge weapons out of such materials to destroy the faith of men in the word of God. We have nothing but admiration for genuine science, and men of science, but we object to having, even in the name of science, conjectures thrust at us for facts, and speculations proposed as substitutes for the realities of moral consciousness and the ascertained truths of divine revelation.

It will be interesting and suggestive and pertinent to the subject in hand to briefly trace the history of what was known as the conflict between science and the Bible. A few years ago materialistic science won conspicuity, if not distinction, in making war upon the Bible, or more properly speaking, upon Archbishop Ussher's chronology of the Bible, and the orthodox interpretation of Genesis, on two questions: The origin of life and the antiquity of man. The doctrine of evolution, as propounded by Darwin and his followers, was laid hold upon by agnostic scientists to discredit the biblical idea of creation and to annihilate the notion of a personal creator. The mystery of the world was to be explained on naturalistic grounds. The miraculous must go, and God must step down and out. Before this could be done, however, the origin of life must be accounted for without the agency of the supernatural, and the date of man's appearance on the planet must be pushed back into an antiquity so remote as to be beyond conceivable calculation, in order to give the evolutionary forces time to work their products into shape. The first business of this skeptical scientism was to explain the beginning of life on the globe without the intervention of a personal creator or the use of a launching miracle; hence the doctrine of spontaneous generation which was proclaimed all over the world as a fact of science. This new demonstration that matter under certain chemical conditions contained the power and potency to originate life was to do yeoman service for infidelity in overthrowing the biblical doctrine of a miraculous creation.

But how do matters stand now? Spontaneous generation is an exploded fiction of a bastard science. It is a demonstrated certainty by a series of protracted and careful experiments long ago made, that the idea of the spontaneous generation of life is an unproved assertion, if not a sheer delusion, an imagination of enthusiasts and not a fact of science. The only defence now is to place it in the realm of faith, without evidence, and say that the conditions prevailing a million years ago on the planet might have been so different from what they are now as to make spontaneous generation possible. Yes, and they might have been such as to make it impossible, and "might have been's" are hardly of sufficient solidity to make a foundation for science. It is now confessed that the scientific and biblical doctrine of Biogenesis, that life springs from life, is victorious all along the line. Even Huxley declared that life is not the product of organization, but that organization is the product of life.

But this compulsory change of front did not damp the ardor of skeptical scientists in their search for the origin of life without God, although it is now universally conceded in scientific circles that it is not the function of science to deal with origins. The reader will readily recall the now familiar story of Prof. Huxley and his bantling Bathybius. In 1868 Her Majesty's ship the Porcupine in her deep sea soundings brought up a quantity of sea mud, a slimy ooze from the bottom of the North Atlantic Ocean, which on being submitted to examination by the famous professor, was pronounced by him capable of producing life. This discovery was hailed with a shout of exultation all round the world, and profane philosophers did not hesitate to declare that Bathybius would turn God out of doors. Frederick Strauss over in Germany, of whom we then heard much in connection with his mythical theory of the life of Jesus, in his last book, published a short time before his death, stated that the chasm between the organic and the inorganic always seemed to him impassable until the discovery of Bathybius. By that discovery the chasm was bridged and he no longer needed to think of miracles or of God. Infidels clapped their hands and laughed and the laugh seemed to go against the Bible.

On a subsequent expedition in the interest of science, the ship Challenger was charged with special instructions to bring up some more of Bathybius for the purpose of further experimentation. The sea mud was obtained according to order and was preserved in alcohol, but on being submitted to investigation by a qualified chemist, lo and behold! it was found to be nothing in the world but sulphate of lime, or plaster of Paris! The farce was played out and men laughed, but this time it was from the other corner of the mouth. This ridiculous affair brought another change of front—Bathybius was carried to his grave without benefit of clergy to repose in wakeless oblivion—and men of science were confronted with the old necessity of conceding that life must have had a divine origin, just what the Bible had been telling them all the time. That famous declaration of Prof. Tyndal from the chair of the British Association in 1874 that he "found in matter the promise and potency of every form and quality of life" is rendered by Prof. William Crookes, one of the latest presidents of that honored scientific assembly, "I find in spirit the promise and potency of every form and quality of life." Truly the physical science that was an alien from the commonwealth of Israel and a stranger to the covenants of promise, in 1874, is by a quarter of a century's marvelous transformation not far from the kingdom of God in this year of grace, 1901!

While science was engaged in carrying forward these characteristic illustrations of its instability in respect to the origin of life, similar efforts were being made on the kindred question of the antiquity of man. Of course, if evolution without an evolver is the right solution of the mysteries of the world, not only did life originate itself, but countless myriads of years must be allowed for the development of the various forms of life. These extravagant speculations and dateless calculations regarding the practical infinity of years stretching between us and the beginning of the history of life brought their advocates into conflict with the doctrine of the Bible that man's origin upon the earth is of comparatively recent date. The old book was again in the crucible with the usual result, now apparent in the light of history. In the year 1798, Napoleon Bonaparte, with his army, entered the town of Denderah in central Egypt. There he found two interesting and apparently ancient temples. From one of them—the smaller—the roof, carved with certain figures, was carefully taken down and carried to Paris. When examined there by learned men it was found to be what is technically termed a zodiac, and, from certain marks, they inferred that it was at least seventeen thousand years old. Soon after this discovery, and under its influence, a professor in the University of Breslau wrote a book with the flaming title: "AN INVINCIBLE PROOF THAT THE WORLD IS AT LEAST TEN TIMES OLDER THAN MOSES SUPPOSED WHEN HE WROTE THE BOOK OF GENESIS." Many believers in the Bible were alarmed by the discovery, and for a time they were in much fear of mind. But some time later Champollion discovered the method of reading such inscriptions as were found on this zodiac, and when he carefully examined it, he discovered, among other things, the name of Augustus Caesar inscribed upon it, proving that it was not older than the Christian era! Thus another scientific fiasco came to end, leaving Moses, as usual, in possession of the field.

Several years ago Mr. Horner went to Egypt to investigate the rate of deposit of the delta in the Nile valley. He calculated that a very small number of inches was deposited, in the form of mud, each century. In digging down through the mud he brought up a piece of pottery from a great depth. On calculating the number of feet and reducing them to inches, he came to the conclusion that the piece of pottery was ten or twelve thousand years old. Of course that proved the existence of man with the capability of framing such pottery many thousands of years before the creation of Adam! Later still, however, a piece of burnt brick, undeniably Roman, was brought up from a lower depth, proving on the same line of argument that Egypt had been subjugated by the Romans many thousands of years before there were any Romans! Sir Chas. Lyell based his argument for the extreme antiquity of man upon the rate of deposit of the Nile delta, but the discovery of this Roman brickbat knocked the bottom out of his argument.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

In my letter of July 11, I spoke of the wonderful credulity of men. The names of Joe Smith, T. J. Shelton, John Alexander Dowie, Mary Baker G. Eddy and Charles Cullis, were mentioned as persons who have been remarkably successful in gaining the confidence of the people. I said: "Before Mrs. Eddy there was Cullis in Boston." This remark gave offense. In my letter of August 8, I published a note written by an irate brother. I promised to give, at an early date, an account of Dr. Cullis and his work.

Charles Cullis was born in Boston, March 7, 1833, and died in Boston, June 18, 1892. He was brought up in the Episcopal Church. In his boyhood he was averse to the Sunday-school and to the study of the Bible. The time came, however, when he adopted as his motto, "Have faith in God." He graduated from the University of Vermont in the twenty-fourth year of his age.

After completing his medical studies he returned to Boston and began successfully the practice of medicine. While he was making preparation for his professional career he received the rite of confirmation in the Episcopal Church. His religious life was formally correct. His young wife died; she was the idol of his heart. In the midst of his overwhelming sorrow he vowed to devote his income, above his personal expenses, to works of charity and religion. This vow he kept. But new trouble came to him. He began to be dissatisfied with his condition before God. From this unhappy experience he emerged so as to be able to say, "I will take every promise in the Bible as my own, just as if my own name, Charles Cullis, were written in it." About this time such words as the following in the Bible arrested his attention: "I am the Lord that healeth thee." "He that healeth all thy diseases." "They shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover." "The prayer of faith shall save the sick," etc. He began to pray for the restoration to health of such as were ill. Meantime he continued to practice medicine. One who became intimately associated with Dr. Cullis in his work said at the dedication of the "Cullis Consumptives' Home" in Boston:

"Some fifteen years ago I became acquainted with Dr. Cullis. I learned some of the sweetest lessons of my life at his feet. I learned salvation for the body as for the soul. My companion was examined by a doctor who stands at the head of the treatment of diseases of the eye in this city, and he pronounced her case incurable. Nine years she had been a sufferer, and for two years sat in a shaded room. Dr. Cullis prayed with her a minute and anointed her, and told her to trust in the Lord and accept his word for her healing. She was healed before the week was out, with her eyes as perfect as mine, has used them as much as I have used mine, and yet that oculist sat down deliberately and said, 'There is no help! We know about this matter just as well as we know a mathematical proposition.'"

In 1862 he began to desire to open a private hospital or home for consumptives who were excluded from the public hospitals of Boston on the ground that they were incurable. In January, 1864, he began to realize his desire in respect to this enterprise. The evening of January 19 a trifling sum of money was given to him, unsolicited, by a friend who knew of his plans for a consumptives' home. This was the beginning of a number of successful enterprises carried on, it is claimed, by faith in God and prayer to him. The following is a list of the institutions belonging to this work of faith: The Consumptives' Home, the Orphans' Home, the Spinal Home, the Deaconess' Home, the New Beacon Hill church, the Boydton Institute, the Boydton church, and the Willard Tract Repository. The Boydton Institute and the Boydton church are located at Boydton, Virginia. There is also a college for the training of Christian workers in Boston. There are branches of the Willard Tract Repository in New York, Philadelphia, London and Bombay. A number of papers are published, the best known of which is the one called "Times of Refreshing." It is claimed that the money to support these enterprises comes without solicitation and in answer to prayer. In this immediate connection a quotation from page 164 of "Dr. Cullis and His Work," by Rev. W. H. Daniels, is pertinent. Mr. Daniels says: "At length the Doctor reached the point where he felt free to open his mind to one of his wealthy friends, who at once promised a thousand dollars."

The Hon. Elijah Morse was one of Dr. Cullis's supporters. He first sought Dr. Cullis as medical adviser and afterwards as a friend and helper in many ways. He often said that he valued the doctor as "a business man of unusual sagacity." And this without doubt he was. The first contribution toward the erection of the Consumptives' Home was made by a friend who had become acquainted with the desires of Dr. Cullis. In the annual reports, which were freely distributed, much is made of the financial side of the work; the amount of money received the first year was $5,916.28. The second year the income was $6,950.55 for current expenses. Dr. Cullis was, as Mr. Morse said, "a business man of unusual sagacity." The most successful solicitation is that employed by Dr. Cullis.

Did all recover who entered the Consumptives' Home? Let us look into the annual reports. For the year closing September 27, 1866, nine are reported cured, twenty-nine as having died; the next year one was cured and twenty-nine died. The next year the annual report says that three were cured and sixty died. The following year three were cured and fifty-eight died. The sixth year six were cured and fifty-one died. In 1871 eighteen were cured, it was claimed, and fifty-nine, it was confessed, died. No. Not all who entered the Consumptives' Home regained health.

"But, as a whole, the city of Boston is a good deal given to faith. Almost any fledgling religion, to say nothing of some that are falling to pieces through age and decay, can make a few converts in Boston: hence the very strangeness of the faith of Dr. Cullis—strange only from its close and literal following of the word of God—began to call forth no small admiration."

June 29, 1874, Dr. Cullis was immersed by the Rev. Edward Edmunds of the "Christian" Church. So far as I know he continued in the fellowship of the Episcopal Church to the day of his decease. It is certain that he had the confidence, the esteem, and the benediction of Bishops Huntingdon and Brooks.

The work of Dr. Cullis in Boston was closely akin to that of George Muller in Bristol, England.

This word of apology is due the friends of Dr. Cullis and is hereby offered. The followers of the Reverend Mary Morse Baker Glover Patterson Eddy own church property valued at $12,000,000; but not one free dispensary, home or mission for the poor. Not one. The work of Dr. Cullis was, and is, benevolent. The names of Charles Cullis and Mary Morse Baker Glover Patterson Eddy ought not to appear in the same connection, and I hereby apologize to the friends and admirers of Dr. Charles Cullis.

The Tapestry Weavers.

By Anson G. Chester.

I.

Let us take to our hearts a lesson—no lesson can braver be—
From the ways of the tapestry weavers on the other side of the sea.

study it with care,
The while their fingers deftly move, their eyes are fastened there.

They tell this curious thing besides of the patient, plodding weaver:
He works on the wrong side evermore, but works for the right side ever.

It is only when the weaving stops, and the web is loosed and turned,
That he sees his real handiwork, that his marvelous skill is learned.

Ah, the sight of its delicate beauty, how it pays him for all his cost!
No rarer, daintier work than his was ever done by the frost.

Then the master bringeth him golden hire, and giveth him praise as well,
And how happy the heart of the weaver is no tongue but his own can tell.

II.

The years of man are the looms of God, let down from the place of the sun, Wherein we are weaving ever, till the mystic web is done.

Weaving blindly, but weaving surely, each for himself his fate—
We may not see how the right side looks, we can only weave and wait.

But looking above for the pattern, no weaver hath need to fear,
Only let him look clear into heaven, the Perfect Pattern is there.

If he keeps the face of the Savior forever and always in sight
His toil shall be sweeter than honey, his weaving is sure to be right.

And when the work is ended, and the web is turned and shown,
He shall hear the voice of The Master, it shall say unto him, "Well done!"

And the white-winged angels of heaven, to bear him thence, shall come down;
And God shall give him gold for his hire—not coin, but a glowing crown!

Personalia.

Some intercourse this week with Mr. and Mrs. Chapman has given me intense pleasure. These two young people are missionaries of our F. C. M. S., to which they are a true credit. They have been spending a week in England on the way to America from Constantinople, where they have spent three years, chiefly in preaching the gospel amongst the oppressed Armenian race, a large colony of that nationality being located in one quarter of old Stamboul. In consequence of Mr. and Mrs. Chapman's having taken up that work, Mr. and Mrs. Shishmanian settled at Sivas, in Asia Minor. The account given by Mr. and Mrs. Chapman of Turkey and the Turks, as well as of the mission, is full of varied interest. That the work is very difficult goes without saying. Where is missionary labor easy? By the time this letter appears these two bright young people will be in their American home. They will be able during their stay in America to interest many an audience. Dr. W. T. Moore is still on his visit with us, but hopes to sail from Liverpool for Boston by the S. S. Commonwealth, in company with Dr. Lorimer. Bro. Winders has just departed from our shores for his home at Columbia, Mo., after enjoying what he says has been a tour full of enjoyment in England, Scotland, and on the Continent. He has been preaching sermons here and there which I have heard described as magnificent. If some of us could have our way in ordering the affairs of the universe, he should not go back. I am sorry to have to say that we are about to lose the genial presence and valued work of our tried and able friend, Paul Moore, who has for several years managed the affairs of the "Christian Commonwealth" as Director. His health has been impaired of late to such an extent that another English winter might be perilous, and therefore he has wisely come to the conclusion that, at any rate for a considerable period, he must locate himself on the American side of the Atlantic. May he soon be restored! All the Moore family will now be settled again in America, after having become as much English as American. I should think they must be puzzled to know which they are. What after all is the difference? With joy I hear that our dear old friend H. S. Earl is on his way to this country. He will be welcome indeed.

College Newspapers.

Every month a delightful little illustrated academic paper reaches me, by the courtesy of Mrs. W. T. Moore and Mrs. St. Clair. It is the "Christian College Chronicle," of Columbia, Mo., edited by those two ladies. As I have the pleasure of knowing them both personally, and am aware that they are incarnations of vivacity, I am not surprised at the brightness of their journal. I have seen many school and college papers in my time. Not many of them are of much use. Some few have become very famous. For instance, "Granta," of Cambridge University, England, has actually founded the early reputation of some great men. At this moment "Young Oxford," a very aggressive socialistic organ, is stirring up young people all over England on the most progressive lines. But as a rule, such university magazines are filled with crude, hurried, superficial and egotistic efforts by undergraduates who are worried by the amateur editors to "send something in." The contributors have quite enough to do with their proper studies. I notice that Mesdames Moore and St. Clair really do the main work of their organ themselves, and that they manage to make it sparkle with a reflection of their own intellectual brightness. I have a special reason for mentioning Christian College. It is so splendid an institution that it is attracting notice in England. My friend E. H. Spring, our preacher at Gloucester, is about to send one of his daughters for training there. She is a fine specimen of English girlhood, and will both do us credit in Columbia, and will also gain inestimable advantages by a course there. It would do any American girl good to gain a course at Girton, or Newnham, the wonderful university female annexes at our Cambridge; and it is desirable that whenever it can be arranged our British maidens should do part of their graduating in American colleges. International education is the best. No other education is really complete.

A Congressional Bombshell.

We have been startled in London by a visit of the famous Professor Koch, of Berlin. While I write these lines a great Tuberculosis Congress is being held. This is naturally attended by physicians and physiologists of various nationalities. The practical object with which this gathering has been organized is to promote the prevention of consumption, and one of the most important questions occupying the attention of the assembled experts is the best means of controlling the disease in animals from which our meat and milk supplies are derived, and of combating the danger from these sources. Consumption is a scourge which has baffled science, notwithstanding the many pretended cures. All Europe is aghast at the fatal havoc achieved by this monster malady; and America is as helpless as the Old World. Already much has been done to prevent the sale or use of tuberculous food stuffs, and health authorities are urging the adoption of still more stringent measures. Now comes the famous Berlin bacteriologist, who a few years ago announced a cure for consumption by inoculation, which promised wonders for a time but proved disappointing. He says that all these precautions about food are unnecessary, because the tuberculosis in man differs from that in beasts, and there is no danger of catching it from them. This address excited no little comment at yesterday's meeting. If it be true, then many people will be relieved of a constant nightmare of apprehension. It would be good news for fathers and mothers, for they would with delight welcome the assurance that a dreaded peril was only a bogey. But I note that the papers of this morning are somewhat incredulous, although Lord Lister said yesterday that Prof. Koch is the first of living bacteriologists. This great authority, however, has already prematurely jumped at some conclusions. He is something like some of the more advanced Higher Critics. Indeed, the Higher Criticism is as fashionable in science as in theology, and it is just as uncertain in one sphere as the other. Lord Lister is the greatest of British surgeons. He is presiding at this Congress. He paid high compliments to Koch, but at the same time he pronounced the arguments not conclusive, and declared that the question must be probed more deeply before the Congress would accept this new hypothesis. Now, I am very glad to note this prudent sort of conservatism, because without the fencing of Lord Lister it is certain what would have happened forthwith. All the young lions of the medical Higher Criticism would have roared against any of the old fogies who should venture to throw cautious doubt on the fresh speculation. What Lord Lister says of science is true of theology. We have been reviled and objugated if we have at any time pleaded that certain theories and doctrines were not demonstrated but were merely brilliantly and plausibly hypothetical. When evidence is unimpeachable, let us faithfully accept it, whatever may be the consequences. Let us accept every point that is really proved by Higher Critics and thank them with all our hearts. Already there is much indeed for which to thank them.

"Standard," by a Congregationalist Deacon of many years' standing. The occasion of this protest is the Peace Meeting just held at the Memorial Hall, in London, by some hundreds of Free Church Ministers, whose object, under the leadership of Dr. Clifford and Mr. Meyer, was to formulate some terms of peace to submit to the Boers. I need hardly say that such a meeting was little calculated to be of practical value, though its inception did profound credit to its conveners. I attended both its sessions but could get no light. The ministers very excitedly squabbled over the whole subject. A program, such as it was, was agreed upon; but what can the Government do with programs thus drawn up by parsons? The unhappy war must go on to the end, and the end is not far off. Any one of us would stop the war if it were possible to finish it abruptly. All men of all opinions are anxious to get out of this crisis; but the Boers only can bring about the speedy conclusion. The South had to submit to the North. No other end of the great American war was possible. So also the Boers have to submit to the British. The British may be all in the wrong, and the Boers all in the right. But it matters not. We cannot help ourselves now. There can be only one end. If nations once wickedly get to fighting one side must as a rule whip the other before there can be peace.

So we are eagerly waiting for the end. The Boers are sure to be most generously dealt with. There is no malice against them. They are a brave people, but it does not follow that, as some people seem to think over in Holland, France and Germany, all the English are savages, cowards, and tyrants. The Deacon I speak of finds fault with many Congregationalist parsons. He protests against their political meetings and their political sermons. He says, "Why do so many of our clergy take up the violent side of politics, and, what is worse, desecrate our pulpits with violent political addresses? 'I have had to listen,' this gentleman proceeds, 'to Home Rule advocacy, total abstinence carried almost to the pitch of declaring that those who differ are damned, and now we have the virtues of the 'God-fearing Boers,' and the wickedness of the present Government and Army rammed down our throats.'" The good Deacon goes on to plead that God's house should be above party politics. No doubt he is right, within reasonable limits. Somewhat ironically he goes on to say that, during a long business life, he has constantly had to take in hand the affairs of clergymen of all denominations in order to get them out of a tangle, so that on all worldly matters they are the last to whom he should go for advice.

WILLIAM DURBAN.

a union with God must begin with the intellect, advance to the heart, and reach its consummation at last in the will. How, then, may we become one with God in intellect or in thought? Evidently, He must first make known His mind to us; He must remove the veil from the spiritual world so that it may become an environment to which we can respond. He must first reveal the light, the good, the beautiful and the divine. This He has done, and is ever doing, through nature, through His own history and experience, through inspired prophets in all ages, but especially through Jesus, who is, therefore, to us the truth and the life.

It is the function of faith to discern that truth, however embodied, to accept it in the love of it as thus revealed, and to respond to it as our highest environment. It cannot be apprehended by the animal mind for, as Paul declares, it can only be spiritually discerned. Faith then is more than belief, which differs but little from opinion and is the assent of the judgment to a proposition when proved. Faith, as properly defined, is the perception and love of spiritual truth as revealed by the Father of spirits, whether that truth is embodied for us in word, action or symbol; it is the eye of the spirit which loves and seeks the true light, unless blinded or atrophied by sensuousness of the animal nature.

It is the boast of a godless and infidel philosophy that it has discovered by unaided reason much of the truth that Christians have acquired through faith; and it offers us rationalism in the place of a religion of faith. But these philosophers have, in defiance of the law of life, only eaten of the fruit of the tree of knowledge, and learned from sad human experience some of the wisdom that Christians more safely and perfectly learn by faith. But no amount of wisdom, when thus acquired independently by the unaided reason, can unite man in thought with God; rather, it tends, through selfhood to separate him still further from God. There may be coincidence of thought, without union of minds. The atheist may think some of God's thoughts and yet deny him. But to accept God's word as truth, whether that word is heard in scripture or in nature or on the lips of Christ, and to love and cherish it as truth because He has declared it, is an act of faith and makes us one with Him in thought. We think as He thinks and because He so thinks; we thus adopt His thoughts and do not lean for wisdom on our own understanding. Thus by faith in the truth is the first point of our union with God established; and the result is wisdom. Thus too faith comes by hearing. But we must listen in order to hear. And whether the voice of God is heard in the heavens which declare His glory, or in the thousand tongues of the natural world around us, or in the footsteps of the onward ages, or in the strains of prophets, or in the grander words of Jesus, this faith will reverently listen and accept all truth as the word of God, and so we become wise in the wisdom that comes from Him.

The second point of union with God is easily established—a union with Him in heart. If we think as he thinks, we naturally come to feel as He feels. But God is love; and to be one with Him in heart is to love what He loves and to hate only what He hates. It is reciprocal also;

Faith, A Condition of Spiritual Life

By JOHN AUGUSTUS WILLIAMS.

In the study of phenomena we often look exclusively at the relation of cause and effect, without considering the important element of condition, and for that reason our philosophy is sometimes defective. Condition is a concomitant of cause, or that which accompanies a cause and renders it operative and effective. Food, for example, is a cause of animal life; but the necessary condition is that it must be properly eaten and digested. We do not at present distinguish causes into their several kinds; for the principle is true, that condition gives efficiency to any and all causes and often determines the character of their results. Whether food produces health or disease depends on conditions; and these, as in all cases, are largely subject to the will, yet the law of causation remains fixed and universal.

A condition is either arbitrary or necessary. If arbitrary, it may be dispensed with and the cause still be efficacious; but if necessary, no effect can follow in its absence. A physician may undertake to remove a malarial trouble on two conditions: that his remedy be taken as prescribed, and that the proper fee be paid for his service; the first is a necessary, and the second an arbitrary, condition.

When we say that faith is a condition of spiritual life, we affirm a universal truth applicable to all finite moral beings in every stage of their existence. We may also confidently affirm as a general proposition that in the entire scheme of redemption and of reconciliation with God the Father, there is nothing arbitrary. Whatever He may require as a condition of salvation is necessary in the very nature of things—

Faith is sometimes spoken of as though it were itself a cause, which it never is, except by metonymy. It is said to work; but it works only by or through some active power of the mind, as fear, ambition or love. Faith, as we are now considering it, works by love. As a condition, it makes love operative and practical, imparting efficiency to it in all its manifold ministrations. But a condition always implies a cause; and the question logically arises, what is the cause of which spiritual life is the effect and what we call faith, the condition?

Perhaps we may more easily answer that question by first considering the nature of the effect, spiritual life. In the terms of modern science life is responsiveness to environment; and spiritual life is then a correspondence with the spiritual world. Or perhaps more plainly, it is union with God, just as a branch lives only in organic union with the vine. But we must bear in mind that God is Spirit, and that we are created as spiritual beings in His likeness. Now a spirit, as we learn from consciousness confirmed by scripture, is endowed with three distinct attributes—thought, feeling and will. In order then to complete union of two spirits they must become one in thought, one in feeling and one in will. Thus we are in union with God only when we come to think as he thinks, to feel as he feels and to will as he wills.

But again: as every act of will is preceded by some feeling of the heart, and every such affection by some intellection—some thought or perception—it follows that it is to love Him because He first loved us. The result of this union by love is happiness—the highest happiness that earth or heaven can know.

Thus united in mind by faith and in heart by love, we next become one with Him in will. The bond of this union is the spirit of obedience engendered by love; and its result is righteousness or true holiness. But we should bear in mind here also that a mere coincidence of will is not always a union of will. The moralist may will and do many things coincident with what God commanded, but without the least reference to His will. But such selfhood does not obey, for there is no subordination of the human to the divine will. There is no true union, and of course there can result no true goodness or holiness of life.

Thus we complete our triads. The truth received by faith unites us with God in thought, and the result is wisdom; we are united in heart by love, and the end is happiness; we are one with Him in will by true obedience, and the result is goodness. Practically, we may say to the young, if you would be wise, learn by faith to think as God thinks; if you would be happy, love as He loves; if you would be good, will as He wills. Thus only may we be wise and happy and good. And this is spiritual life, which must begin with faith as a condition and truth as the cause.

Harrodsburg, Ky.

Professor Hugh McDiarmid.

By F. M. Green.

The day was Friday and the Friday was sad when I received the following brief message: "Father passed away very peacefully this morning after a restful night that had made us very hopeful." The message was signed by Belle McDiarmid Richey, one of his devoted daughters, whose vigils had been unceasing by her father's sick bed.

In the death of Hugh McDiarmid a good and great man has passed from earth's harvest field well ripened for the heavenly kingdom.

He was born near Morpeth, County of Kent, Ontario, Canada, June 10, 1837, and died in Hiram, Ohio, Aug. 15, 1901, in his 65th year. He received his early education in the town of his birth, and for five years he was a teacher in the common schools of the vicinity. His early life and character gave promise of his later years and manhood. Preparing himself for college, he entered Bethany College in 1863, and graduated with honor from that institution in 1867. He had already achieved some distinction as a preacher, and on leaving Bethany he preached for a time for the church in Barnsville, Ohio. From here he was called to the head of a collegiate institute at Winchester, Ky.

In 1875 he removed to Toronto, Canada, where he did evangelistic work for the Wellington Co-operation, and at the same time edited the Christian Sentinel, a religious magazine. In 1883 he became associate editor of The Christian Standard, then under the superb management of Isaac Errett, a prince among editors. After the death of Mr. Errett, Dec. 19, 1888, Mr. McDiarmid became editor of the Standard and held the place until his election to the presidency of Bethany College in 1892.

In 1896 he came to Hiram as professor of Church History and Homiletics, a position he occupied until his death. In 1896 Bethany College conferred upon him the degree of LL. D., an honor most worthily bestowed.

In every department of labor to which he was called he bore himself with a modesty and humility and candor that garlanded his intellectual and spiritual life. Clean, clear-cut and competent can be written of his life's character and work.

In his preaching he was clear and distinct in the statement of his theme, careful in his analysis, and fervent in its proclamation. The good word of God was for him all-sufficient for doctrine, reproof, correction and righteousness. He had few superiors in his generation as an able proclaimer of the gospel of Christ. He loved his Lord with the ardent love of a great heart, and he loved his fellow men.

Besides this he was a thinker, a student. He knew men and he knew books, especially the one book, the Bible. In his defense of the faith once for all delivered to the saints he was a foeman worthy of the steel of the most profound and logical. He had the courage of intelligent and strong convictions. What he believed he believed with all his heart, and if he had any doubts he doubted them. He had several debates on current religious questions which he conducted with the dignity of a Christian and the intelligence of a scholar.

In the editorial chair he showed a high degree of strength and incisive vigor, and commanded the universal respect of all with whom on any question he "made a difference." As professor in Hiram College he steadily grew into the affections of all who came in contact with him; and he was looking forward to a pleasant session at the opening of the new college year. His death is to me a great personal loss; but to his bereaved family it is irreparable. But he was fully ripe for the crowning honors which the Lord, "whose he was and whom he served," will give him.

To sum up, it may truthfully be said of him: As a man, his character was stainless; as a citizen, his loyalty and devotion were unquestioned; as a thinker, a student, and scholar he held no mean rank; as a friend, he could always be depended upon; as a husband and father, his love knew no limits within the circle of his home; and as a Christian, his faith in the Lord and in his word was incorrupted and incorruptible.

It is with "great lamentation" that we give him up. But as the Lord gave him to us and the Lord now wants him, we accept the divine mandate crying, "Thy will be done."

The funeral services were held in Hiram at 3 P. M., August 18, and the message to the friends who gathered to bear his tired body into the "home appointed for all the living" was spoken by A. McLean. He rests from his labors and his works shall follow him.

"The Spiritual Side of Our Plea."

By N. J. Aylsworth.

This book, from the pen of A. B. Jones, one of the clearest thinkers and most vigorous writers in our ranks, is a work of exceptional value. The theme is of the highest importance. The dynamic effect of doctrines is far greater than is commonly supposed. The gospel may be so presented as to be devoid of spiritual power, and even small deviations from almost any of the truths which relate to salvation have their effect upon the spiritual life.

This book has a double leverage. It is not only a presentation of truth, well argued, by a vigorous thinker, but has the added advantage of rescuing so influential a man as Alexander Campbell from certain misconceptions and thereby ranging his teachings more fully on the side of spirituality.

The book has eight chapters on: Authority in Matters of Religion, Without and Within, the Letter and the Spirit, the Real and the Formal, Alexander Campbell on Remission of Sins, the Word and the Spirit, Alexander Campbell on the Word and the Spirit and Righteousness and Law. In each of these the aim is to set forth some neglected or little understood feature of truth on the spiritual side. Those which will attract most attention are the chapters on Mr. Campbell's view of remission of sins, and on the relation of the word and the spirit. In each case the author gives what he regards as the correct view, and then follows with an examination of Mr. Campbell's writings.

The chapter on the bestowment and the work of the Holy Spirit is an admirable statement of a subject, the proper understanding of which has a most vital bearing on the religious life. The effort to show that the conditions of the reception of the Spirit are not arbitrary, but in conformity with the laws of mind, is highly interesting and profitable, and reveals the underlying wisdom of the gospel. The work of the Holy Spirit in the heart of the Christian comprises fourteen heads, which are set forth with clear insight into their practical bearings. This single chapter is worth the price of the book. The examination of Mr. Campbell's view in a succeeding chapter is entirely satisfactory, and shows beyond question that, despite some unguarded expressions, he viewed the Spirit as ever present and working with and in the word of truth, though his philosophy did not help him to see how this is so. If any have doubts regarding Mr. Campbell's view on this point they should read this chapter.

The storm center of the book, if such there be, will be found in the two chapters on the design of baptism, the second of which treats of Mr. Campbell's view. While there is much in these chapters that the writer can heartily indorse, there is also considerable that he cannot, both as regards the author's own position and his interpretation of Mr. Campbell's writings. But a full examination of the points of difference would carry us much beyond the appointed limits of this article. We therefore must bid the reader read and judge for himself. Whatever may be his conclusions regarding Mr. Jones's position, he will rise from the examination of those writings of Mr. Campbell to which the book refers with the conviction that Mr. Campbell held to no narrow legalism such as would deny salvation to the believing penitent who should chance to die before he could be baptized. If these chapters shall arouse the attention of our people to a careful study of Mr. Campbell's writings on this and related subjects they will do much good.

Mr. Campbell prevailingly presented baptism as a legal act. It was a change of state and a formal assurance of pardon. These claims are entirely just. Baptism is all this, but it is more. The Scriptures present it prominently as a spiritual act; and in the nature of the case it has profound and far-reaching spiritual meanings and uses. Mr. Campbell did indeed recognize baptism as a spiritual act, but he said little about it, and did not fully explore this wide field of truth. There is room for supplementary work in exploring and bringing into due prominence the moral and spiritual aspects and uses of baptism.

This book should have a wide reading. The gospel will have in the hands of any preacher a greater moving power in the light of the conceptions therein presented, and they will tend to bring Christians nearer to the divine heart. The book strikes off some barnacles from the old ship that were impeding its course.

A Work of Benevolence.

By J. N. Jessup.

The Christian Church in Little Rock, Ark., is doing a work of benevolence that has done the church good and which it can commend to others after a year's trial. In August, 1900, the pastor called a conference of the women of the church and laid before them a plan for the establishment of a woman's boarding home. It was known that many working girls and women of the city were unable to pay for room and board at respectable places. Their wages would not allow them to pay the price charged at well appointed and morally healthy houses. As a result girls were compelled to take rooms and board at places where they ought not to be. The church had many appeals from girls to help them secure board in places of good moral surroundings, and at a price they could pay. It was felt that the maintenance of a home for working women would be a proper work for the church to undertake, and a benefit to the city. The women in conference decided to undertake such a benevolence and a board of six lady managers was appointed, of which Mrs. Jennie Beauchamp was chairman. It was intended that the church people should furnish the home and that it would be self-supporting after that.

A house of nine rooms was rented, a matron secured and the home for working women opened. From the first it was a success. The house was at once filled and many applicants had to be turned away. In March, 1901, a larger house was rented. The home is full now with twenty-five boarders. The institution pays its running expenses, which is all its projectors desired it to do. It has been a boon to many girls and women and a source of satisfaction to many parents whose daughters were away from home among strangers. The Home has attracted the attention and has the sympathy of the entire city. The business men have spoken of it in the highest terms of commendation and have been liberal in their contributions whenever asked. It is safe to say that the church has done nothing for years that has brought it into such favorable notice as the establishment of this home. We hope some time to have a well equipped house of our own. Our rented house stands on Ninth and Main streets in the most prominent part of the city.

The object of the management is to furnish a comfortable home, with wholesome living and the best of moral surroundings

Dregs of The War By BURRIS A. JENKINS

IV.

For a strong man to be beset with danger and difficulty is far from a disaster. Such conditions, if his eye is clear and he sees the right, if his heart is firm and he does the right, only try the mettle and make the man. What is true of a man is true of a nation or a section of a nation. The dangers, thick sown, that surrounded Scott Cameron, were the tests that the South, as a whole, was meeting with resolution. From the ashes of desolated homes and plantations, from the ruins of fortunes and of families, was to rise something larger and nobler than that section had ever known, and it was to be called "The New South." Who knows what unseen sympathy and help from all over the Southern land came to brace the young Missourian, so nearly sinking into ruin, as he stood forth to meet his test?

The morning after the incidents at the Payne homestead, Scott rode the four miles to his empty home, and resolutely set to work, all alone, to bring some order out of desolation. The fruits were yet to be gathered,—these were the sole products of the farm that year. No grain had been sown. No stock or horses, save the one he rode, were left alive.

But Cameron was not the man to move timidly. The following spring he placed a second mortgage on the farm, and stocked it heavily with blooded cattle, of which he had learned something at the South. He ventured, also, the purchase of two or three thoroughbred Kentucky horses, and found them profitable. The older heads among the farmers wagged wisely and predicted no good from the "brashness" of the young major. His journeys to St. Louis and Chicago they considered willful, wasteful foolishness. His employment of servants, and entertainment of Eastern stock buyers they declared the height of folly.

But little by little, as the months and years rolled by, their respect for the apparently reckless speculator grew. They became proud that the neighborhood produced such cattle and horses as came from the "Cameron Farm," and could see that the stables were becoming known in all parts of the country. The rumor went that the mortgages were melting away; and the lines of desperate sadness on the major's face, though they never were smoothed entirely out, were softening into a placid hopefulness.

All this is easy in the telling, but who can imagine the lonely days and nights of the early winters in the struggle? Who at the least possible cost. Thus far it has been able to meet all expenses (save the cost of furnishing) at a little more than half what the same accommodations can be had for at other places. It is a success morally and financially. It has appealed to the working classes, both men and women, as a demonstration of the church's desire to do something practical for wage earners. The church must, in the future more than in the past, demonstrate that it is in the community to serve. It might be added that this home is the nucleus around which we hope gradually to build up a full-grown institutional church.

can tell the stern setting of the teeth, repression of remorse for the death of his benefactor, the living down of suspicion in the minds of many who knew him to have been connected with the Blue Glen affair—from which, by the way, he never took his share in the plunder—the resolute conquering of the passionate hate for all even remotely associated with his parents' death and with the triumphant cause?

To aid him in this unequal fight, he sought, whenever possible, the society of the old pioneer preacher from Kentucky; kept the aged traveler at his bachelor-home, when duty called Elder Smith in reach of him; frequented the great meetings in the groves and cross-road churches; sought the society of the staid and solid; and especially leaned heavily upon Adelaide. She was happy, beyond all compare. His visits to her home, frequent or rare, according to the season of the year, were like deep draughts of bracing wine to him. Cheery, but sympathetic, the brown eyes went before him in all his work, and one grasp of her hand, one kiss of her soft firm lips, were strength to him for many days.

Not the least of his difficulties was due to the outlaw gang. It was a dangerous thing to belong to it; it was yet more dangerous to leave it. Every disaster, every betrayal it met with, was, for some time, laid at his door. They threatened him, tried to browbeat and blackmail him; and especially as he prospered, their jealousy and anger against him seemed to grow. He bore patiently and courageously their doings, as long as man could bear, but at last they pressed him once too far.

One of the gang had been taken in a barn two miles from Scott's home, and next day three of them rode to his house and accused him of betrayal. He quietly denied, and then bore abuse until his face burned and his teeth gritted hard. They began to think him a coward. At last the ruffians rode away, and Floyd Anderson yelled back,

"Next time I come to your house, it'll be guns that must do the talking."

"You hear that, Max?" said Cameron to his hired hand, "you must be my witness."

A week later Anderson returned, blustering into the barn-lot, where Cameron and Max were at work, and, without dismounting, began pouring forth abuse.

The major waited for a pause, then pointed to the gate, and said quietly,

"Get off my premises."

"What!"

"Get off my premises. You understand."

Anderson ripped out a string of oaths like a rusty chain from a well-pump and moved for his revolvers. Instantly Scott's pistol leaped from his pocket, and its bullet crashed into the bully's brain, fairly between the eyes.

"Stay beside the body, Max, until I come back."

He rode the two miles to the county seat, and returned in an hour with a coroner. The plea of self-defense was perfectly clear, and the case never came to trial. The bounty on Anderson's head, dead or alive, was offered to Cameron, but he refused it. His reward came in the shape of immunity from all insult after that.

One night in August, the locust trees, the stile, and the horse block were flooded by the moon, and a couple stood near them saying good-night, a small neat figure of a woman, and a tall, broad, sloping-shouldered man, who jingled his bridle rein.

"So I burned the mortgage, Adelaide, to-day. There's not a dollar on the land, and it's stocked more heavily than it's ever been before. I can more than double the amount that will ever come to us from your father."

"You're a proud, foolish old boy!" she said.

"Well, perhaps I am,"—as who should say, "I don't object to your saying so." Then he added, "Seven years for my Rachel—and they have seemed, as I look at it in some ways, but a day. In other ways, they seem forever. But the next seven weeks—can't you shorten that, Rachel, dear?"

"No, Jacob. There are calico dresses to be made, and cook aprons—"

"Pshaw! Pshaw!" he interrupted. She ignored him and continued—"And a world of things a woman can't begin life without. Besides, you might have had me seven years ago, but wouldn't! Now I'm retaliating with seven weeks! You're getting off easily, sir major!"

"I wanted to prove to myself and to others that I was something like worthy of you. But to myself I haven't proved it even yet. This was more than half your fight and your winning. I couldn't have done a thing without you. God bless you, Little People with the big heart!" And for fear of crushing her, he turned, and heaved two heavy sighs, while he pounded the pommel of his saddle.

Adelaide laughed through the starting tears, and tiptoeing, tried to kiss the back of his neck. Then he took her in his arms, and like another Lochinvar, placed her before him on his horse and rode off with her for a mile into the moonlight and back again.

To-day their children, and even grandchildren, are living all about them, along the bluffs of the Missouri.

(THE END.)

A Statement of Fact.

By B. L. Smith.

The American Christian Missionary Society could organize through our home missionaries at least a hundred churches every year, if our board of church extension was able to help them to a church house, and thus secure their permanency.

The problem of evangelization of our cities is a problem of building lots and houses.

We could organize ten churches in Chicago in a month if we could house them; ten more could be put in St. Louis; four or five in Cincinnati, and there is scarcely a city of 20,000 inhabitants where there is not an opportunity for such work.

I anticipate the day when we will have $1,000,000 in our extension fund, and the income of the American Christian Missionary Society is $500,000 a year. Then if we have retained our loyalty to the New Testament Christianity and our evangelistic fervor and methods, our great cause will go forward with leaps and bounds.

Our 2,700 homeless congregations; our six new congregations organized every week, all plead for large offerings to the church extension board.

May God open the eyes of our brethren to see and know the magnificent opportunity that is ours and may the offerings for church extension be commensurate with these great opportunities.

Motives for Large Conventions.

By C. M. Chilton.

We need to cultivate a convention conscience among our people. Our national conventions stand for the missionary spirit and effort of the whole body. Every co-operating church should take an interest in all the affairs of the convention and if possible be represented by a duly appointed delegation as a matter of right and business order. A proper interest in world evangelization and a clear understanding of its methods demands that the co-operating churches attend in convention to that which is particularly their business under God. In most of the churches, even missionary churches so called, no attention is given to these things. The churches should be taught their obligations to their business meetings. We are coming to be a great people with a growing interest in missions. As a matter of right and business order we should have large conventions. If we do not it is because of sinful ignorance or neglect in the supreme work of the church.

Conventions are centers of missionary interest and enthusiasm. As such they have an educational and inspirational value. They react upon the delegates and churches. Our day affords no better method for the uplift of the masses, for the creation and cultivation of the diviner impulses in men than its great convocations where masses of men are brought for a time under the exclusive sway of that which is pure and unselfish. Who among us has not felt the tides of influence from the jubilee convention? We should make all our conventions great for the reactionary effect upon the delegates and churches and people.

Large conventions are impressive spectacles and exercise an influence upon the outside world. Who can estimate the influence of the recent ecumenical missionary conference with its eminent representatives from all lands? The great conventions of our day are speaking to the world in thunder tones the truth of the kingdom.

A large convention is a blessing to the city and state in which it assembles, bringing the joy of heavenly associations and leaving behind a tide of enthusiasm and power. We owe it to our Minneapolis churches to save them the disappointment and discouragement of a small convention.

All of our preachers and churches should carefully prepare for the coming national convention, that they may have a creditable showing upon the books, that they may be properly represented upon the floor, that it may be a great assembly, in every way representative of our brotherhood and of the greater cause to which God is calling his people.

St. Joseph, Mo.

The Young People and Our National Convention.

By Carlos C. Rowilson.

Let me mention three very important reasons why the young people should attend our national conventions whenever possible.

1. They should attend in order to meet the people and to know the forces at work in our own movement. The young who are active Endeavorers are prone to give so much attention to C. E. conventions and their special methods of work that they acquire little definite knowledge of our own great movement and of its significance to the world. Of the general enterprises of the church they usually know little. Nothing will so deepen their interest in that which we are striving to do for the world as to meet the strong men and noble women who are leading us in our conquests. The young man or young woman who attends our convention for the first time will be astonished to find how great a work the church is doing of which he has been ignorant.

2. They should attend in order to become acquainted with our missionaries, mission fields, and methods of organization for missionary work. Our national conventions are simply great missionary conferences for world-wide evangelization, in which are also exhibited the work which has been done, the open fields awaiting our occupancy, and those who have undertaken the heroic pioneer work. The first intense view of this exhibition which a young person gains at a great convention will prove a life-inspiration. In the beginning of one's religious career, nothing is of greater value to him than this personal touch with the Lord's most devoted disciples gathered together from the ends of the earth for the purpose of planning the extension of His kingdom.

3. All this acquaintance with the general work of the church is very important because the young people of to-day must be the leaders of the work of the churches of to-morrow. And according to their knowledge will be their leadership. If we are not to settle down into a state of contentment that we are one of the great religious bodies of America, our young people must acquire a more vivid conception of our mission in the world than they now possess. To be the leaders in the unification of God's people in the next generation, it will be necessary for our young people generally to gain a far deeper conviction than they now have that we are called of God for such a work.

For these reasons, and for many others, let multitudes of our young people attend our twentieth century convention at the beautiful city of the upper Mississippi.

Current Literature.

The problem of the life hereafter will continue to challenge the thought of men as long as human life remains what it is to-day—a union of body and spirit, of flesh which passes away and a mind which aspires to live forever. The Evolution of Immortality, by S. D. McConnell, D. D., D. C. L., is an attempt to solve the question from the point of view of evolution. It is really a defense of the theory of conditional immortality on the lines of evolution. As science reveals the close and intimate relation between the mind and the body, it is becoming more difficult for scientists to believe in the separate and independent existence of the immaterial part of man. Hence a more scientific basis of life hereafter must be found. This the author believes is to be found in the view that immortality—which he uses in the sense of life beyond the death of the body—is not something that inheres in human nature, but is a prize to be won, and only those persons attain immortality who acquire sufficient moral vigor to persist, or who, in other words, are fit to survive. But this existence beyond death is not in a disembodied condition, but in a body woven by man's spirit, out of the finer matter which prevades all space, and which scientists know by the name of ether. An attempt is made to show that this theory fits into the teaching of Christ and the apostles. But to do this, the phrase "in Christ" and "through Christ," must not be limited to the historic Christ, but must include the Word who has ever been the light of the world, and in whose light the pious hearted of all nations have sought to live the true life. The theory finds a most serious setback when it attempts to deal with the question of infants dying in infancy. Where is the moral and spiritual vigor in such cases that can conquer death? The undeveloped germ of heredity is all that the author has to offer us as giving any hope for the continued existence of these sweet innocents of whom Jesus said, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven." The author is too candid not to admit that this is unsatisfactory. But we submit that a theory which fails when applied to a majority of the human race is hardly one to command the confidence of thinking men very long. The book, however, is suggestive, and will prove helpful to many, no doubt, who are seeking to base their faith in a future life on scientific as well as on scriptural grounds. (MacMillan.)

A few years ago Mr. Kipling presented a set of his works to Admiral Robley D. Evans with this inscription on the fly leaf: "To the man who has lived more stories than I can ever write." The characterization was not inappropriate, for "Fighting Bob" Evans began at an early age to live stories of an exciting sort, and he is not through yet. His recent book, A Sailor's Log, is a plain tale of some of his many adventures by land and sea and is as veracious a narrative, we suppose, as a sailor can write. Before he was fourteen years old, the future admiral had made the trip from Washington, D. C., to Salt Lake City and back again. The railroad ended at Kansas City in those days and there was plenty of Indian fighting to be done all along the route beyond that point. The boy was alone save for such parties of strangers as he joined himself to from time to time. The purpose of the trip was to establish a legal residence in Utah so that the Representative from that state could secure his appointment as a cadet in the Naval Academy. The Civil War came on before he had finished his course at Annapolis and, in spite of the protests, threats and appeals of his southern relatives, he decided to stick to the flag. Even cadets were not wholly exempt from service in that stirring time and young Evans emerged from that period of his career so severely wounded that the doctors were upon the point of amputating both of his legs to save his life. A loaded revolver, which he kept under his pillow and occasionally brandished at them, was all that dissuaded them from performing the operation. He recovered and kept his legs and from that time to this has been seeing service in all parts of the world.

The book has acquired a special interest by reason of Senator Chandler's protest against its comments upon his course of action as Secretary of the Navy in 1884 under President Arthur, and the resulting censure which the Acting Secretary of the Navy gave to Admiral Evans a few days ago. On neither of these accounts will the general public think any the worse of the Admiral—at least not until it is shown that what he says about Mr. Chandler is not true. If it is true, it needed to be said whether the department likes it or not.

It may be said without prejudice to the book that it exhibits no particular style and has no special merit as a piece of literature, but it is a straightforward story of a sailor's experiences and will give the reader some intimate glimpses into the life of the United States Navy. (D. Appleton & Co.)

One must seek far to find a more keen, sympathetic and captivating exposition of Italian character than Montgomery Carmichael gives in his volume entitled In Tuscany. A residence of several years in different parts of Tuscany has given the author an intimate acquaintance with the people. But he does not generalize overmuch, though generalization might be valuable from one whose observation has been so wide, but rather deals in the concrete with typical characters with whom he has had dealings. There is plenty of description too of out-of-the-way places which have been little written up, but most readers will agree that the author has performed his best service in his admirable studies of Tuscan character.

Among all the books upon this section of Italy, this one is distinguished for paying almost no attention to Florence and scarcely more to Siena—not that there is not plenty in these cities that is worth writing about, but that there is a vast amount outside of these familiar spots to which but little attention has been paid. So it is a book of Tuscan by-ways and villages rather than of highways and cities. (E. P. Dutton & Co.)

A characteristic feature of French literature—if it can be called literature—is the feuilleton, the sensational story published in the daily paper. It is low class literature, but the public demands it. It is only very rarely, says Mr. Keenan in the Literary Era, that even the high class journals venture to print the romances or novels of the standard authors. Once the Petit Journal of Paris, which has a circulation of over a million copies daily, determined to raise the standard of its feuilletons. It had been publishing the inventions of Reichberg, and, dropping him, secured a story from Jules Verne. Within ten days the circulation fell off eighty thousand copies. Then a study was made of the matter. It was found that even the hardest-worked, poorest-paid folk of the cities and country could be depended on to take a daily paper if there were a story running in its columns. But they demanded a tale of poor heroes, sons of toil, turning out to be aristocrats, or any of the romantic situations once thought essential to a story of what was called adventure.

A convenient series of vest-pocket editions of the four gospels in separate volumes has been issued in flexible cloth binding, round corners and fair sized type, to be sold at 2 cents each. It is to be regretted that the text is the authorized, instead of the revised, version. In other respects they will be found well suited to the purpose for which they are intended. One can be carried in a vest pocket as easily as a note-book, and it will furnish good reading in the street-car, on the railroad, or while you are waiting for a man who is late.

The Story of Missouri is the title of a book in preparation by Congressman Champ Clark and Mr. Walter Williams. It is not a history, but will be a book of anecdote, reminiscence and hero-story of the great men who made this state and of the part which the state has played in peace and in war. It will be a story-book and Congressman Champ Clark's connection with it is as good as a guarantee that the stories will be good. Mr. Williams, his coadjutor, is editor of the Columbia (Mo.) Herald.

Miss Sarah Orne Jewett's new novel, "The Tory Lover," which has been running serially through the Atlantic Monthly, will be published about the middle of September. It is a story of the American revolution and picturesquely introduces John Paul Jones and his exploits on the coast of England. The Tory lover and the patriotic heroine are both admirable characters.

Ready Cooked Food.

Famous Around the Camp Fire.

People going into camp should not forget to take along a goodly supply of Grape-Nuts, the ready-cooked food. This can be eaten dry and does not require any preparation by the cook, or the food can be made into a variety of delightful dishes, such as puddings, etc.

One of the favorite methods by old timers is to drop three or four heaping teaspoonfuls of Grape Nuts into a cup of coffee. The Grape Nuts add a peculiar and delicious flavor to the coffee and give one a more piquant article of food than even the famous doughnuts and coffee of old New England.

People who cannot digest coffee should not forget that Postum Food Coffee, if properly made, furnishes a very delicious beverage, either hot or cold, closely approaching the flavor of the mild and delicious grades of Java.

Our Budget.

—Last call for Church Extension.

—September 1 is the day. Don't forget it.

—Church Extension asks only for endowment, and half a million dollars is a small amount for that purpose.

—A fair apportionment has been sent to each church for the Church Extension offering. This is not a tax or a forced levy, but only a conservative suggestion. More churches ought to exceed their apportionment than fall below it.

—The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will be sent to new subscribers three months for 25 cents. This is a trial offer. We are sure that those who read the paper three months will not easily drop it at the end of that time. Trial subscriptions will be discontinued, however, at the end of the time paid for unless otherwise ordered.

—Prospective attendants at the Illinois State Convention, Springfield, Sept. 9-12, are requested to send their names in advance to Dr. G. A. Hulett that he may reserve accommodations. A rate of one and one-third fare on the certificate plan has been secured, so do not fail to secure a certificate when buying your ticket to Springfield.

—The Minneapolis Publicity Committee, which has charge of the work of advertising our annual convention, is exhibiting a degree of enterprise which has seldom or never been paralleled in a similar cause. Not only do they see to it that our own papers are kept well supplied with literature on the subject, but the Minneapolis dailies are also pressed into service. A recent number of the Minneapolis Journal has a long article by I. J. Spencer, President of the American Christian Missionary Society, setting forth the aim and plan of our convention which meets in that city Oct. 10-17.

—The twenty-third annual convention of the Maryland, Delaware and D. C. Missionary Society will be held with the Jerusalem Church, Hartford county, Md., Sept. 24-27. J. A. Hopkins, corresponding secretary for the district, urges all churches to appoint their delegates, prepare their reports, raise the balance of their apportionments and prepare to make it a good convention. He also suggests that since the Church Extension Board has helped several churches in the district it has a right to expect a liberal offering from all the churches of the district on the first Sunday in September. Reduced rates to the convention have been secured over the B. & O. railroad to Joppa Station.

—The first conference on day schools ever held in China was held about two months ago in Shanghai under the presidency of our missionary W. P. Bentley. It was largely attended both by foreigners and by Chinese, and it is hoped that it may prove the beginning of a movement which will be influential in lifting up the standards and improving the methods of popular education in China. A system of common school education throughout the empire embodying rational methods could not fail to be of immense value in the diffusion of general intelligence among the Chinese. Two principal topics were discussed: Discipline and Methods; and Christianity in the Day Schools. It is gratifying to note that the original suggestion for this conference came from a Chinese teacher and that Chinese teachers took a prominent part in all the discussions.

—The church at Painesville, O., is reported to be about to build at a cost of $8,000.

—Brother F. E. Meigs is now on his way back to Nankin, China, after a furlough of about a year.

—A. Martin, of Muncie, Ind., will conduct the sixty-third meeting of the church at Ingham, Ill., beginning Sept. 1.

—D. A. Youtzy, of Elk Creek, Neb., who is now visiting in Pennsylvania, will be home again ready for evangelistic work Sept. 1.

—A trial subscription to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST three months 25 cents. This applies to new subscribers only. Send coin or stamps.

—John J. Wiggs, of Onarga, Ill., is ready to enter the evangelistic field as evangelist and singer. He does his own solo singing in his evangelistic services.

—The fourth missionary district of Nebraska will hold its convention at Wakefield, Sept. 27-29. The officers of the district are J. B. White, president, and W. L. Ireland, corresponding secretary.

—Carey E. Morgan is at Currin, Va., convalescing from his recent severe illness. W. L. Fisher has been supplying his pulpit and will continue until Bro. Morgan is able to resume work.

—The Fifth Missionary District of Illinois desires to secure a competent man for district evangelist for one year beginning Sept. 1. Names of available men may be sent to the district president, J. E. Lynn, Springfield, Ill.

—We regret to note the death on July 30 of Sister Elliott, of Kirksville, Mo. Bro. Elliott is widely known in Nebraska, where he was formerly treasurer of the state missionary society, and the death of his wife will be mourned by many friends.

—The Preachers' Institute at Bethany, Neb., which began Aug. 5, has been very successful, although it is the first of the kind in that state. The enrollment the first week was twenty-one and increased after that. C. A. Young and W. P. Aylesworth are the principal lecturers.

—All persons expecting to attend the thirty-eighth annual meeting of the eastern Ohio Ministerial Association, to be held at Medina Sept. 3-5, will kindly notify D. D. Fennell at once, that proper arrangements may be made for the entertainment of guests. A hearty invitation is extended to all brethren.

—In the absence of J. C. Coggins, pastor of the Tabernacle Church, Decatur, Ill., his pulpit was occupied last Sunday morning by H. W. Dill and in the evening by F. W. Burnham, pastor of the Edwards Street Church. Bro. Dill is a young minister and is open to a call to a pastorate.

—G. W. Hamilton, of Plad, Mo., wishes to secure an engagement with some church or churches either as pastor or to hold meetings at once. Owing to the drought, which has been especially severe in that region, he is compelled to change his location. He will furnish references if desired.

J. W. Gates and A. L. Oder, both graduates of the College of the Bible at Lexington, were ordained to the ministry at Eagle Lake, Texas, July 30, by J. J. Cramer. Brother Gates preaches for the churches at Eagle Lake and Weimar, and Brother Oder for the churches at Wharton and Bay City.

—The books of the Foreign Society close on the last day of September. The offerings that have been made and not forwarded should be sent on without delay. Ministers and Sunday-school superintendents ought to make diligent inquiries and ascertain whether the whole amount raised has been sent to the treasury or not. If any have failed to make offerings, they should attend to this duty without delay. There is no time to be lost. Now is the accepted time.

—The Foreign Society began the year with the hope of raising $200,000 this year for its work. Before the year closes every dollar of this sum should be in the treasury. We shall have a great convention in Minneapolis if we do our part before the year closes. By all means let this amount be raised, and at once.

—The Missouri State Convention will meet at Mexico, Mo., Sept. 16, 17. A. W. Koken-doffer, pastor of the church at Mexico, writes as follows: "In behalf of the church at Mexico a cordial invitation is extended to our brothers and sisters throughout the state to attend. Come to the first session prepared to remain until the close of the last. We confidently expect and shall provide for a large gathering. Lodging and breakfast free. Dinner and supper 25 cents each. Through the kindness of Brother and Sister Hord, of the Mexico Church, the Central Hotel with its commodious accommodation is at the service of the convention. I believe this arrangement will be satisfactory. Let there be a large attendance. Send names at once to P. W. Harding, Chairman of the Committee on Entertainment."

—It will be remembered that the American Institute of Sacred Literature has been making an appeal for the observance of one Sunday in September as Bible study day and has suggested that every minister preach at least one sermon during the month on the subject of Bible study and its relation to the life and work of the church and the individual. The Biblical World for August contains some sermon outlines on this subject which have been reprinted in an eight-page pamphlet and will be sent free to any minister asking for them and promising to preach a sermon on this topic. The outlines are six in number, by Bishop Vincent, Amory H. Bradford, George T. Purves, O. P. Gifford, Charles Cuthbert Hall and Marcus Dods. These outlines will be found helpful and suggestive even for those who do not need their assistance in outlining a sermon on Bible study. Address the American Institute of Sacred Literature, Hyde Park, Chicago, Ill.

—The latest general board organized by our brotherhood is the American Christian Education Society, with headquarters at Washington, D. C. Its objects are best stated by the constitution adopted at the congress of the Disciples of Christ held at Lexington, Ky. "The object of this society shall be the promotion of Christian education among the Disciples of Christ by aiding collegiate institutions, academies, and other schools in which the children and youth are trained under Christian teachers; by assisting needy young men and women of piety and ability in acquiring an education for the gospel ministry and the mission field; and by the employment of any kindred agencies which may be deemed desirable to further the cause of education." Life memberships are $10 a year for five years. Annual members pay $5 a year. Larger or smaller sums will be gratefully received. Contributions should be sent to Andrew Wilson, treasurer, 505 E Street, N. W., Washington, D. C. He will be pleased to furnish any further information. Write him.

THE CHRISTIAN - EVANGELIST
THREE MONTHS, 25c.

On Trial to New Subscribers.

—W. A. Fite begins work as pastor at Palmyra, Mo., Sept. 1.

—We are glad to be able to report a slight increase in the receipts for foreign missions. The week ending August 15 shows a gain of $961 as compared with the corresponding time last year. Keep it up. We must gain every week from now till the close of the year if we are to raise that $200,000.

—The debate at Lamar, Mo., between W. W. Blalock, of the Disciples of Christ, and Elder Scoles, Adventist, has come to a triumphant conclusion. J. E. DeJarnett reports that the general sentiment is that the Adventists suffered a decisive defeat. Bro. B. delivered a solar plexus blow.

—R. A. Burriss, of Port Arthur, Ont., is making a success of his project of combined colonization and evangelization in western Ontario. We have recently received two letters from him telling of the progress of the work at Rat Portage and in the Rainy River colony. They have some able preachers in that region who have come from various parts of the United States and Canada. Homeseekers who were not lucky in the drawing at Lawton and El Reno might find it worth while to investigate this section in western Ontario, if they do not mind passing under the sovereignty of King Edward.

—The sudden and to us unexpected news of Prof. McDiarmid's death at Hiram, O., on Aug. 15 has reached us. The telegram from his son, Norman McDiarmid, says his father's death resulted from a long siege of typhoid. We had not even learned of his sickness, and were all the more unprepared for the sad intelligence. Prof. Hugh McDiarmid was a Canadian by nativity, though he graduated from Bethany College, and has lived and labored for the most part in this country. He was for several years editor of The Christian Standard and while in that capacity gave proof of considerable strength as a writer. He subsequently became president of Bethany College, which position he held for a few years, putting the same conscientious care into his work which had marked him as an editor and preacher. Later he accepted a professorship in the Bible department of Hiram College, which he was holding at the time of his death. We rely upon one of his more immediate associates in the college to send us an appropriate tribute to his life and character. It only remains to us to express our sincere regret at his departure, and our sympathy with his bereaved family and the college with which he was connected. He leaves behind the priceless legacy of a pure life and a noble Christian character.

—A movement is on foot in Iowa for the organization of a co-operative work among the Bible-schools for evangelistic and educational purposes, similar to the Bible-school co-operations which have for many years been in successful operation in Missouri, Nebraska, Illinois, Indiana and Kentucky. The Congregationalists and Presbyterians in Iowa have similar organizations and it is generally believed among those who have the interest of Bible-schools at heart that more effective work can be done by having a separate organization with its own field representative than by having a mere department of the state missionary convention. W. B. Clemmer, of Des Moines, state Bible school superintendent, is pushing this plan for Bible-school co-operation and he is backed by such representative men as Slayton, Rudy, Sargent, McKnight, Orr, Scott, Wonder and Reed. The plans have all been made and the right man is in sight for the representative. What remains is for the Bible-schools to take the matter up and pledge a sufficient amount to ensure his support. The state convention will be held at Cedar Rapids in a few weeks and the matter will come up there for discussion and probably for decision. The decision will depend chiefly on the amount of pledges that have been secured. It will be well for Iowa pastors and superintendents to write to Bro. Clemmer at once promising their co-operation and pledging a definite amount, however small, in behalf of their schools. It is suggested that schools might average five dollars each.

—J. M. Rudy, pastor of the First Christian Church, Cedar Rapids, Ia., asks us to remind the Iowa brethren that the names of all who expect to attend the Iowa convention Sept. 9-12 should be sent to him at once. An entertainment directory in book form is being prepared which will contain the names of all delegates and the addresses to which they have been assigned. Naturally, only those names can be printed which have been received in advance. The book will be put into your hands as you get off the train and if you want to find your name in it, with the address at which you are to be entertained, send it at once to J. M. Rudy, Cedar Rapids, Ia.

The Promised Land.

Every day men are returning from the promised land and with very different notions as to the future of that part of our country. Some think it all right, while others think it all wrong. To a man who has been on the border for some years and has carefully observed passing events, there is nothing peculiar or strange about these conflicting ideas.

Lawton is said to be a city of 10,000, but it is generally believed that it will fall to about 3,000 in a little while, but Mr. Flinn thinks it will make a city of some 6,000. In my judgment this is not far from the real city of two or three years hence. But the people who make a city there must learn Paul's admonition to Timothy—endure hardness.

We who had a taste of frontier life from 1893 to 1897 in the Cherokee Strip and those who tasted of the bitter and sweet of old Oklahoma know something of what these good people may be called upon to endure.

Of course, much depends upon the crops of 1902-3. Should financial conditions generally remain as they are, and should crops be good in the new and adjoining counties, the suffering and even inconvenience will be reduced to the minimum.

We strippers can never forget 1894 and 1895 and a part of 1896, but we hope that our friends and neighbors may be spared both our suffering and humiliation.

For the last few days the papers have one and all had something to say about James R. Wood, the first lucky man in the Lawton district, and of course they all speak in condemnation of his selfish act. To almost every man his act looks extremely selfish. Here is a man who by the turn of the wheel of fortune suddenly becomes rich and, not satisfied therewith, tries hard and apparently succeeds in damaging a worthy young lady. Already, however, he is the loser. He must not only fight contests but public opinion.

After all, however, this man is largely a product of his environment and in my judgment the government itself is particeps criminis. From the day the government adopted the drawing the spirit of speculation began to run riot. Preachers, lawyers, doctors, hankers, merchants, traveling men, railroaders, et al, began their speculations. On almost every corner and every turn in the road you could hear them saying: "Well, I wouldn't think of going there on a run, but you see I can have a chance and if I get in the first hundred or so I'll go down and file, otherwise I'll not bother with it." These men seemed to forget the oath, but now many of them are no doubt terribly offended at Mr. Wood.

Paul quoted approvingly one of the Cretan poets as saying, the Cretans are always liars, and a modern writer has said the Italians are great liars. Too great a number of these western speculators from all the walks of life taking this ironclad homestead oath will compel men to think that the Americans are closely akin to the Cretans and Italians or that the psalmist was speaking prophetically (and not so hastily after all) when he said all men are liars.

But perhaps I might just as well say that I have never approved of this drawing, and the more I see of it the more I am satisfied that it is a serious mistake. The old race plan had its drawbacks, to be sure, but they did not equal those that will be fostered by this drawing plan. The former developed the sooner who was the menace to the authorities and the honest homeseekers. But I am perfectly satisfied the chances of the honest homeseeker have been lessened by the drawing at least three to one.

For had the race been adopted 50,000 would have easily covered the number who would have gathered on the border for the run, but in round numbers 170,000 registered, not one-third of which were real honest homeseekers, but were and are speculators pure and simple, and this spirit seems to have concentrated in Mr. Wood, who is now dubbed with the unsavory cognomen of the "human hog," but unless I am woefully in the dark he has many first cousins round about Lawton and vicinity.

The Young Man From Middlefield, by Mrs. Jessie Brown Founds, which ran as a Serial in OUR YOUNG FOLKS during the first half of the year 1900, has been issued in book form, making a handsome volume of nearly three hundred pages. It was read with absorbing interest by a multitude of young people as it appeared from week to week in the columns of this journal, and many of them, we doubt not, will be glad of an opportunity to obtain a copy in this more convenient form. It should find a place in every Sunday-school, Endeavor and Family library. Price, in fine cloth, $1.00 per copy, post-paid. Christian Publishing Company, St. Louis.

The very successful pastorate of A. L. Platte at Brazil has just closed. After much careful and prayerful study he left the pulpit of the Christian Connection or old Christian Church, and quietly accepted a call to the church at Brazil, where he did more in a very difficult field than the most hopeful could have anticipated. The church has enjoyed a great increase in membership, and has built a splendid edifice. Bro. Platte is a most capable preacher, and the humble manner of his passing from one communion to another deserves commendation. His three years' successful work at Brazil fully identifies Bro. Platte with the Disciples of Christ.

The season at Bethany Park has been unusually pleasant in many ways, and those who have had the privilege of being there have appreciated the rest afforded, and the cool nights that have prevailed from first to last. The heated term reduced the attendance, but as all expenses were covered by receipts, the Assembly is to be congratulated. The electric road from Indianapolis to Martinsville will pass through Bethany Park and will assure accommodations that will greatly increase the attendance another year. The road is now graded to a point but a few miles from the Park. The program for 1902 will be the best ever presented, as the need for a strong program is imperative. W. D. Starr, a practical assembly man, has been chosen president of the board of directors, and under his management the future of Bethany Assembly is assured. The open doors of the Christian Publishing Company's cottage at the Park attracted many visitors.

The fall series of district conventions will begin in about thirty days and all program committees should see that the programs are sent out in due time. There is no feature of Indiana work as useful as the district conventions. Here all the several state interests are presented, and the aggregate attendance is larger than that of any state meeting in the brotherhood. There were more than 400 in attendance at a single convention last spring. Our preachers and all church workers should begin at once to work up large delegations. T. J. Legg, B. L. Allen and Mrs. S. K. Jones will attend all the conventions and will be ready to do all in their power to make the programs interesting and to forward all departments of state work.

The state missionary society is asking each preacher in Indiana to raise not less than $10 for November day, for state missions. If the matter is presented as the March offering for foreign missions is, there will be money enough for all the purposes of the state board.

The report of the state Sunday school evangelist, T. J. Legg, as submitted to the state convention at Bethany Park, was one of the best in the history of the Sunday-school association. For amount of work done and immediate results it was remarkable. Here too, comes up the question of money. If all superintendents would see that schools send to Bro. Legg at Logansport, Ind., one and one-half cents each quarter for each pupil as per the average attendance for the quarter, there would be no lack of funds. Thus each school with an average attendance of 50, would remit 75c. Schools of 100 would send $1.50, etc., etc. See that your school remits the per capita offering as above.

J. Walter Wilson, singing evangelist, will lead the singing at Fountain Park Assembly, put in the month of September with T. H. Kuhn, then go to Minneapolis and drill the choir there for the general convention, after which he will assist C. R. Scoville during November.

We are pleased to welcome A. M. Hootman back to Indiana, and congratulate the church at Logansport on securing his services. His training in Chicago, in Valparaiso, afterwards in pastoral work, has fitted him for great usefulness.

J. H. MacNeill is about to close his ministry at Muncie, Ind. He served one church nearly a dozen years, and in a ministry of nearly twenty years has had but three pastorates. He is capable of holding the best pulpits of the brotherhood. The congregation that secures his services will make no mistake. His work at Muncie was more successful than was anticipated when he took charge.

The success of the Maxinkuckee Assembly seems to be assured, as the first and second years have more than met the expectations of the founders. The attendance was excellent notwithstanding the severe hot weather all over the state. Next year's program will be better than the excellent one just rendered, and the outlook is most encouraging.

Fountain Park Assembly, at Remington, under the auspices of our brethren, will open August 17, and close August 31. The program is of the highest grade.

My health is gradually improving. The oxygen treatment is greatly helpful to me. I am doing pulpit supply work. On August 4, I held services twice with the mission church in East Toledo, O., in their new chapel, located in a rapidly growing part of the city. C. W. Huffer preaches on Lord's day afternoons. There are about forty disciples here, and the outlook is fair for church growth. There have been fine churches of Christ planted in the city, which are in a healthfully growing condition, manned by C. W. Huffer, H. F. MacLane and L. A. Warren.

I enjoyed the privilege of attending the sessions of the Northwest Ohio Ministerial Association of the Disciples of Christ. Two sessions were held at the Walbridge Park, on the banks of the Maumee river, and the other in the Central Church building in the city. The attendance was good. Various ministers spoke on the topic: "How to Get all the Members of the Church to Work." Miss Shaffer, of St. Louis, presented the needs of the "Benevolent Association of the Christian Church," whose headquarters are in that city. Her address was clear and forcible and well appreciated. J. A. Lord, of Cincinnati, Ohio, delivered the afternoon and night addresses on "The Freedom of the Truth" and "Doctrines and Present Condition of the World."

In the short time that Bro. Clarence Mitchell labored at Lima, O., he swelled the membership from forty members to about three hundred, besides building a fine brick church building. But he has resigned his charge and assumes the pastorate of the Church of Christ at Wellsville, N. Y., Sept. 1. Others are now candidating for this Lima pulpit.

Here in Findlay, the church, under the leadership of Bro. A. M. Growden, pastor, is growing. All services are well attended, and at nearly every Lord's day souls are added to the church. One confessed Christ last Lord's day and was baptized.

Gratitude

Always seeks to find some expression for itself, and womanly gratitude will not keep silence. Cynical people sometimes say Why do women write these testimonials to the value of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription? The answer can be put in one word, Gratitude. When, after years of agony a woman is freed from pain, when the weak woman is made strong and the sick woman well, the natural impulse is to write a word of grateful thanks for the medicine which caused the cure.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription cures diseases peculiar to women. It establishes regularity, stops weakening drains, heals inflammation and ulceration and cures female weakness.

"Having used Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription and 'Golden Medical Discovery' during the past year," writes Mrs. Mattie Long, of Pfouts Valley, Perry Co., Pa. "I can truthfully recommend the medicines for all female weaknesses. I have used several bottles of 'Favorite Prescription' which I consider a great blessing to weak women. I was so nervous and discouraged that I hardly knew what to do. Your kind advice for home treatment helped me wonderfully. Thanks to Dr. Pierce."

Doctor Pierce's Pleasant Pellets cure biliousness, and sick headache. They should be used in connection with "Favorite Prescription," whenever the use of a laxative is indicated.

George P. Rutledge.

G. P. Rutledge, now the popular pastor of the Third Christian Church, Philadelphia, Pa., was born May 16, 1869, at Blacksburg, Va., and spent his boyhood days in that county, which has been so very productive of Christian preachers—the late C. S. Lucas, of Allegheny, Pa., having been among the number. He graduated at Milligan College, Tennessee, in 1890, having preached his first sermon three years before at the age of 17 years. His first pastorate was Williamsville, N. Y., a suburb of Buffalo, where he remained until January, 1891, when he was called to the First Church at Minerva, O. A larger field having opened for him at Norfolk, Va., he returned to the state of his nativity in March, 1892, to become a leading figure in the development of the cause of primitive Christianity in that city.

In his five years' pastorate in Norfolk the membership was doubled and a large debt on the church property was reduced by half. It was here that he preached the series of sermons on the Christian Endeavor pledge to the Tidewater C. E. Union at their request. These sermons are published and are a splendid commentary on the pledge.

It was while at Norfolk that Mr. Rutledge was married to Miss Carrie W. McCurdy, an accomplished daughter of the south. In 1897 he took up the state evangelistic work in Virginia and established the cause at Fredericksburg.

In February, 1898, he accepted a call to the Third Church, Philadelphia, and continues as its beloved pastor. This church has an enrolled membership of nearly 600 with a Bible-school of a like number. This is said to be the largest Bible-school among the Disciples of Christ in the Atlantic coast states.

They have outgrown their church home and are getting funds together for a larger and more modern place of worship. Bro. Rutledge has been in popular demand as a lecturer, and as a speaker in C. E. work. He is president of the Atlantic States Conference of Disciples of Christ, whose recent annual meeting was held at Plymouth, Pa.

It has complete references, voluminous helps, full concordance, maps, etc.

This Bible should not be confounded with any of the numerous cheap editions, gotten up to look well for a few months and offered at low prices.

The only cheap thing about this Bible is the price. It is the same Bible that has been everywhere sold for Five Dollars that we are now offering for Two Dollars. We have a limited number of copies on hand, and we can obtain no more to furnish at this price. Those we have are not old, shelf-worn stock. Recently the "combine" of American Bible publishers raised the wholesale price of Bibles twenty per cent. It is not probable that such a liberal offer as this will ever be made again.

This splendid edition of the Bible, strictly as described, sent postpaid on receipt of only Two Dollars. If you are dissatisfied with the Bible when you receive it, return it to us, and we will cheerfully refund the money.

WHAT IS YOUR LIFE?

A large interrogation, truly! It would be difficult to frame a more fundamental question than this, which has been chosen as the title of the new book by W. J. Russell. No more valuable volume for young people has ever been issued. What is Your Life? is easily worth $10,000 to any young man or woman who will faithfully follow its teaching. The general scope of the book is shown by the titles of some of the chapters: "The Value of Time," "The Body and Good Health," "Character Building," "Good Books and Good Reading," etc. The volume is not only helpful and profitable, but is also interesting and entertaining. Mr. Russell has avoided that didactic, dogmatic, prosy style so usual in works of this class. He has written in a bright, lively vein. His book will be read by young people who would refuse to read the average volume of advice to the young.

F. D. POWER: "A distinct and noteworthy contribution to our literature. It is a clear and comprehensive statement of a very important theme."

Kansas Letter.

Good rains all over the state have revived the drooping spirits of the farmers and of everybody.

Last year only 22 schools in Kansas observed Boys and Girls' Rally Day for America, yet we have 316 in the state. Let us all rally this year.

The evangelistic season is opening. L. S. Ridenour is in a meeting at Allen, and J. R. Robertson has just closed a successful meeting at Elk Falls. R. A. Shaffer sang for him. Several churches are preparing for meetings to begin immediately after our state convention.

The all absorbing topic now among our Kansas churches is our state convention which convenes September 9, at Hutchinson. Prof. Wallace C. Payne, of our own Lawrence University, will give a Bible study each morning and an evening address on the subject, "The Life in Christ." A. McLean, G. W. Muckley and John E. Pounds will also be present and deliver addresses. Our own preachers and workers will be there. A rate of one and a third fare on the certificate plan has been secured from all points in Kansas and from Kansas City and St. Joseph. We are expecting a large attendance.

We want to urge all our preachers and officers of churches, Bible-schools, C. E. societies and C. W. B. M. auxiliaries to see that all apportionments are raised for Kansas missions, and either sent to our office or brought to the convention. Statements have been sent to all calling attention to this matter.

The outlook is much better than it was a few weeks ago. Our receipts during July were encouraging. Yet, it will be necessary for everyone to do his best in order for us to meet all obligations by the time the convention meets.

Our preachers have been asked for a personal offering of $1 each for state missions. A goodly number have responded. Many more will yet respond. We should have a long list of churches on the red letter honor roll this year. Help us, brethren, all you can. It is your work. Don't let it fail.

September is the month, and the first Sunday is the day for the offering for church extension. This worthy department of our work should be remembered by all the Kansas churches this year. Had it not been for this fund many of our congregations could not have been housed. The church extension board has helped to build 62 churches in our state. Last year only 70 of our churches contributed to this work. Their offerings amounted to $1,604.36. Surely we can do better than this this year.

The Value Of Charcoal.

Few People Know How Useful it Is in Preserving Health and Saut.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better; it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines, and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking, or after eating onions or other odorous vegetables.

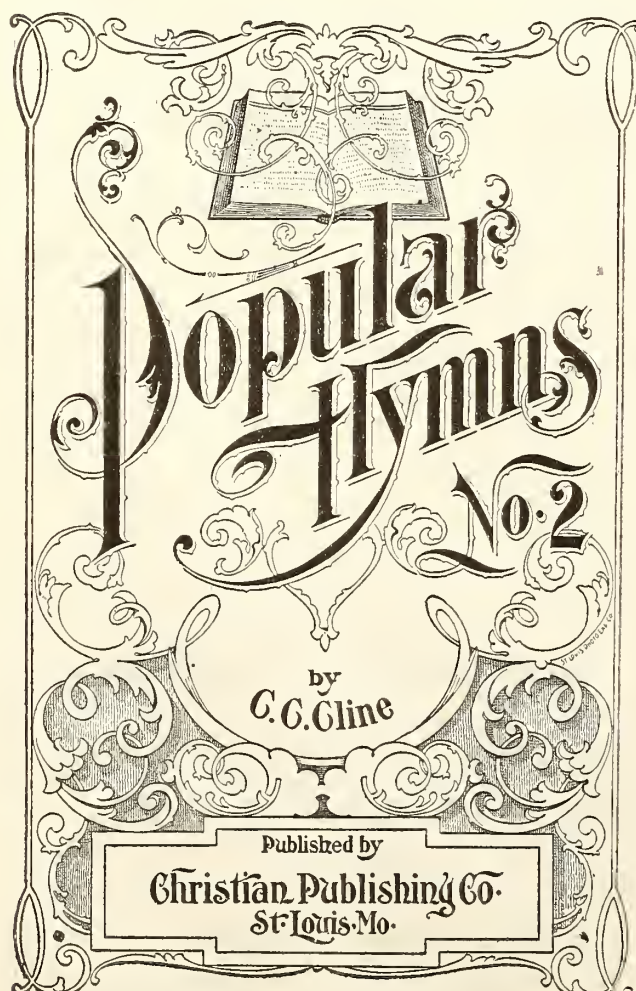

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion; it whitens the teeth; and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics, in tablet form, or rather in the form of large, pleasant-tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood; and the beauty of it is that no harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician, in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

Church Extension, September 1.

The Annuity Plan.

Our Annuity Fund continues to grow. There is now about $60,000 in this fund. This fund's claims should be pressed by our preachers, and in fact the preachers have been behind most of the annuity gifts. By the annuity plan your money can be building churches while it is earning you an income greater than you ordinarily get by loaning the money out yourself. You have no taxes to pay, no waste of time in reinvestment and at your death your money is in the fund without any contest of the will.

Before we had our annuity plan an elderly lady bequeathed all her money, $4,000, to the board of church extension. She could not afford to give it outright, for she must have the income to live on. She bought a brick store building with the $4,000. By the time she paid her attorney, her taxes, and made repairs and allowed for some vacancies it netted her a five per cent. income. When she died, about two years ago, her will was contested by some distant relatives and our board was compelled to fight the case to save our claim. When the building was sold and the expenses of our suit were paid our board got $2,250 from the $4,000. Had our annuity plan been in operation at the time the bequest was made we could have taken the $4,000, paying six per cent. to the sister referred to, and had her money building churches all the time and at her death, by the conditions of the bond, the entire $4,000 would have remained in our fund without further obligations to pay interest on the part of our board.

This article is not written for those who have read and understand our annuity plan. These words are for those who have never seen an explanation before; for those whose eyes have never chanced to fall upon an explanation. This annuity money now in the fund is saving many churches from losing their buildings by forced sale because of secular loans being foreclosed or to help churches build that we cannot aid with four per cent. money. Help to increase this fund at once, by sending from $100 to $10,000 on the "annuity plan" to the board of "church extension" at Kansas City, Mo., during September, and thus help the board to reach the "Half Million by 1905." For full information about the "annuity plan," address G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., 600 Water Works Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

The Homeless Church.

Anyone who has had to do with missionary work in the west knows that the housing of the congregation is as important as the preaching, and should be, as far as possible, planned for in advance. The baby's clothes are all ready when he makes his advent into this world, and they are as essential to his well being as good food. This is as certainly true in the matter of an infant church. So many homeless congregations have gone to the ecclesiastical graveyard in the west that it is high time for a radical change in methods. One of the first questions that comes to the mind of a mission board when there is talk of entering a new field is, how shall we sustain it? Well we know that there will be a good many of our folks who will hold back and refuse to go to work because there seems to be no certainty of permanency. These become a wall over which those who would otherwise enter in and be saved, can not go. Sometimes this condition attracts the shifting class, who naturally like to see things loose. Order and sobriety and piety are not to their liking. It looks like a movement against the established order, and they are for anything that is against everything. They hasten to join, and the infant is born but not well born. Handicapped by its very nature there is little likelihood of living. But let it be understood at the outset that with the organization a movement begins for the erection of a suitable home, and that with the assurance that church extension stands ready with 40 per cent. of the cost to complete the structure at a small rate of interest and easy payments, and you will at once cut the ground from under the feet of the kicker and he will be found kicking in the air to the injury of no one. The shiftless will hesitate, for there is likely to be some cost attached, if the building goes forward, and as a result you will get the best of our people already on the ground, and leave out the "codfish" at the top (?) and the riff-raff at the bottom. Let church extension grow till it is ready to offer help rather than be solicited so anxiously.

Sunday-School Literature.

THE matter of Sunday-school Literature is one of very great importance. For, whether it should be so or not, the fact is that the character of the instruction given in nine-tenths of the Sunday-school classes throughout the country is determined by the contents of the Lesson Helps they use. This being true, and the fact that first impressions are most lasting, how important that Pastors and Superintendents of Christian Sunday-schools see that their Schools are supplied with Christian Periodicals. If the children are taught that one church is as good as another, that certain divine commands are of little or no importance, or can be changed or set aside by man, what effect will it have on the church of the future? "Think on these things."

We understand a few of our schools are using sectarian or union (so called) supplies, in order to save a few cents each quarter. Are you one of that number? Samples of our Supplies sent free.

NEW TESTAMENT COMMENTARIES

During the past two years there has developed among the Christian people of America a great revival of interest in the study of the Bible. Never before in the history of Christianity were so many people zealously and earnestly studying the Bible, endeavoring to know more of its contents and its meaning. Everywhere there are being organized classes and clubs for Bible study. In consequence of this movement there is a brisk demand for Bible helps—books that have hitherto been sold chiefly to preachers. The people are inquiring for the best commentaries and exegetical works to aid them in their study of the Bible. We are glad to be able to announce that we are fully prepared to supply Bible students with the best books to meet their requirements. A few of these we list here:

COMMENTARY ON MATTHEW AND MARK. By J. W. MCGARVEY. A volume of 392 pages, cloth-bound. The former price ($2.00) has been reduced to $1.50.

COMMENTARY ON LUKE. By J. S. LAMAR. A splendid book by a grand man. Cloth, 333 pages. Reduced from $2.00 to $1.50.

STUDIES IN ACTS. By W. J. LHAMON. One of the finest works of recent years. Bound in cloth; 420 pages; price, $1.25.

COMMENTARY ON HEBREWS. The author, R. MILLIGAN, was one of our most gifted men. Cloth, 395 pages. The reduced price is now $1.50.

PEOPLE'S NEW TESTAMENT WITH NOTES. By B. W. JOHNSON. Two volumes. Vol. I. contains the Four Gospels and Acts; Vol. II. covers the Epistles and Revelation. A concise, but complete work, of as much practical value to the average man as a commentary in 15 volumes costing $30.00. Bound in cloth. Price, per volume, $2.00; per set, $4.00.

Please note that former prices of these works have been reduced 25 per cent. Many thousand copies were sold at the original prices, but we desire that many more thousands shall have the help and benefit of the thought and genius of these eminent Bible scholars. In the case of a class, club or association organized for Bible study, we suggest that a fund be raised to purchase this list of books, and other works, for the joint use of the members. A full description of the volumes in the above list will be found in our 100-page General Catalogue, mailed free on receipt of request. Address, Illinois Convention, Sept. 9-12.

The Illinois Missionary Convention feast is now ready. The program is one of the best that has ever been prepared for a state meeting. It includes the names of some of the ablest men in the brotherhood and many themes of timely importance. Gov. Yates will welcome the convention. Prof. Graham Taylor, of Chicago Commons, will deliver one of the evening addresses.

The evening sessions will be held at the hall of representatives in the commodious state house. Lodging and breakfast will be furnished free by the Springfield people.

Hotels have made an especially low rate for such as desire to find their own entertainment.

Send your names if you desire entertainment to Dr. G. A. Hulett, chairman assignment committee, as soon as possible. Attend to it at once.

We are planning and praying for a convention of great power and abiding influence for good.

The Minnesota Convention.

The joint convention of our state ministerial association and our state missionary society will open in Austin, Monday evening, Aug. 26. Owing to the fact that so many of our people are planning to attend the Minneapolis convention in October, this state convention is liable to be quite small. Yet it ought to be well attended.

The ministerial association is just getting in shape to do efficient service, and important business will come before it—business needing the presence of every member of the association.

Likewise, the missionary society is at a point where any halting is liable to result in great injury to its work. The convention will be short, but crowded full of good speeches and important business, as indicated by the following program:

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE

Christian Science is abroad in the land, seeking whom it may devour. It is the most stupendous fraud of the Nineteenth Century, yet so shrewd are its advocates, and so thoughtless is the average man and woman, that tens of thousands have been deceived.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE DISSECTED

is an antidote for Christian Science. It is a book by A. D. SECTOR, which tells what Christian Science is, in the plainest of language. Mrs. Eddy is shown to be a conscious fraud and a conscienceless charlatan and pretender. The book contains 62 pages, neatly printed and bound.

ARKANSAS.

Newport, Aug. 14.—Preached five sermons at Newark, Ark., last week; had five baptisms.—JAMES H. BROOKS.

ILLINOIS

Bloomington, Aug. 13.—Two more conversions at Armington last Lord's day.—W. D. DEWESE.

Exchange, Aug. 12.—Two additions at my regular appointment at the Frame in Wayne county, last Lord's day. I am closing my work in southern Illinois and go to Pratt, Kan., in answer to a call from the church at that place. I begin there Sept. 1.—LEW D. HILL.

Wapella, Aug. 12.—A husband, wife and daughter added to the church here by primary obedience.—M. F. INGRAHAM.

INDIANA.

Ladoga.—37 additions in our meeting up to and including Sunday evening, Aug. 18.

KANSAS.

Asherville, Aug. 14.—The church here, which was dedicated two weeks ago, hopes soon to employ a pastor for half time at least. Rev. J. N. Beaver, who lives near Glasco, preached for them Aug. 11, and the writer in the evening of the same day. Four young ladies made confession at the evening service. I am preaching half time for the church at Glasco. We are just completing the work of putting our church building in good repair.—C. E. F. SMITH.

Chanute, Aug. 19.—One addition by letter and one baptism here yesterday. Audiences good both morning and evening. Have kept up our regular services all through the hot weather. Our home has been blessed by the arrival of a baby boy. We hope to be able to train him for the ministry.—W. T. ADAMS.

Elk Falls, Aug. 15.—J. R. Robertson, of Moline, Kan., and A. W. Shaffer, of Elk City, have just closed a three weeks' meeting in the Christian Church of this place, resulting in the reorganization of the church and securing the addition of about 30 members, 10 or 12 by baptism and remainder by letter and statement. Also reorganized the Bible-school. These brethren do faithful personal work and showed much patience amid discouragements.—N. HILL.

Girard, Aug. 13.—Just closed the first quarter's work with the church here with following results: Added to membership by baptism, 1; reclaimed, 1; statement, 1; letter, 2; total, 11. Prayer-meeting increased from nothing to 40 in attendance; C. E. increased from no meetings to 20 in attendance; Junior C. E. organized with 20 members.—W. H. SCRIVNER.

Havensville, Aug. 17.—Have just closed a two weeks' meeting at Mt. Olive near Avoca, Kan., with six conversions and a church of 22 organized, which gives promise of a good growth. Will continue preaching for it once a month.—W. M. MAYFIELD.

Westmoreland, Aug. 14.—Just closed a two weeks' meeting at Moodyville, five miles from here and two miles from the old homestead in which I spent my youth. There were 12 accessions, nearly all my old associates; 1 from Baptists, 1 from Methodists and 10 by primary obedience. They will become members of the Westmoreland congregation. My brother, A. I. Bentley, had charge of the music. I shall enter the evangelistic field Oct. 1.—C. C. BENTLEY.

MISSOURI.

Brookfield, Aug. 12.—Have had 32 additions here to date.—R. E. L. PRUNTY.

California, Aug. 16.—I have just closed a week's meeting at Surprise Schoolhouse, eight miles southeast of this place. The immediate results were six by confession and baptism, four restored and a scattered membership of about 15 gathered up. Most of these will for the present retain their membership with the California congregation. One of the probable results is a house of worship and a congregation of Disciples in the near future. This is a German community, and the people move slowly, but when once they accept the truth they can be relied upon. I did this as purely missionary work.—C. C. HILL.

Canton, Aug. 19.—R. M. Shelton closed a meeting at Emden, Aug. 14. The church was greatly benefited. Seven additions. Bro. Shelton enters upon a protracted effort with the church at Pleasant Grove, Mo., Aug. 19. The writer will assist.—E. E. FRANCIS.

Fulton, Aug. 19.—Our 16 days' meeting at Mt. Tabor closed Sunday evening. Bro. T. W. Cottingham, of Kansas City, did the preaching. The visible results were 18 confessions, six by statement and the church greatly strengthened.—F. J. NICHOLS.

Grant City, Aug. 17.—The church at this place has recently called Bro. E. M. Flynn, of Adel, Ia., to the pulpit lately vacated by Bro. Harris. All the work in the various departments is going along smoothly. The churches are holding union services at present preparatory to a union revival to be held in September.—J. E. ROUDEBUSH.

Grogan, Aug. 11.—A few months ago we organized a Bible-school at Mount Zion Church of Christ and Bro. Dickenson has preached there each fourth Lord's day. July 28 we began a protracted meeting with H. H. Utterback of Ord, Neb. There were nine confessions. Previous to this not one young person was found in the church, but the converts are all young men and women.—J. U.

Kirkville, Aug. 14.—There were five additions to the church here last Sunday.—H. A. NORTHCUTT.

Knox City, Aug. 12.—I went to Knox City, Mo., my old home, last week and assisted Bro. Coil five days in a meeting. There were eight additions the last night I was present; four the night before. Springfield, Aug. 13.—I was at Grove, I. T., ten days and six persons were added to the church. Two of those baptized were leading men of the town. I got together 26 persons, but did not think it wise to organize them at present. We effected a Bible-school organization, which will hold its first meeting next Lord's day in a hall. I go next to Hartville, Mo.—E. E. DAVIDSON.

Victor, Aug. 16.—Our twelve days' meeting here closed this morning at the river as we baptized three more young men, one making the good confession at that time. Total results: 30 baptisms, nine reclaimed by letter, statement and reform. 39 in all were added.—D. B. McCANON, pastor and evangelist.

The future outlook is very promising and a good preacher will soon locate here. I go to Chillicothe, O., next. Pastors or evangelists can address me there.—A. R. DAVIS, singing evangelist.

Coffee Agrees with Some People, but not with All.

"Coffee has caused my son-in-law to have nausea and pain in the stomach and bowels. In my own case I am unable to drink coffee without having distress afterwards, and my son eleven years old, has had dyspepsia, caused by drinking coffee.

We all abandoned the use of coffee some months ago and have been using the Postum Food Coffee since.

Each and every one of us have been entirely cured of our troubles and we are naturally great friends of Postum. I have tried several different ways of making it, but there's no way so good as to follow the directions properly; then we have a delicious drink." Mrs. A. E. Moublo, 331 Lynn St., Malden, Mass.

Family Circle

The Telephone.

"I want to talk to Clover Bloom,"
Said Buttercup one day.
"I wish there was a telephone;
She lives so far away; heigh-ho!
I have so much to say."

Now Mr. Spider heard her speak
As he was passing by:
"I'll build for you a telephone,
At least, I'd like to try, he, he!
A builder fine am I."

So then he climbed the ladder stem,
And then he spun a thread
To Clover's home it led;

A silken wire telephone;
Now Buttercup is gay,
For she can talk to Clover Bloom
The livelong summer day, ha, ha!
I can't tell what they say.

Rural Journalism.

In the Saturday Evening Post for Aug. 10, Opie Read has the first installment of one of the best things he ever wrote. It is upon the traditions of American humor in its palmiest days, when the gentle Artemus was coughing away his life to the chorused laughter of his auditors, and Mark Twain was writing Innocents Abroad and had not yet constituted himself ecumenical censor of domestic and foreign affairs religious, political and diplomatic. The following is an extract from Mr. Read's account of journalism in Kentucky in the early days. He calls it "Footnotes to a Literary Life":

In those days the country newspaper was a solemn thing, but it was looked upon as a joke. Every need of a country editor was humorous. How funny was his need of a hat, a pair of shoes! And in his village the fact that he was out of wood, just as a blizzard struck the community, never failed of universal merriment. My first newspaper venture was a half ownership in the Scottville, Kentucky, Argus. Well, it was hardly a venture. There was nothing to lose. In the scholastic shade of a pretentious institution I had heard it vaguely rumored that an Argus meant something with a hundred eyes, and I didn't see why the paper should be called the Argus, for, counting caps, small caps, italic and a font of job type, there were not a hundred i's in the office. But Warren had "established" the paper, and no classic rock arose to split the current of his swiftly flowing mind. Years before I met him he had dropped into the newspaper habit. Sometimes he would travel until the conductor put him off the train, and then he would start an organ of "Bourbon Democracy." He did not ask for opportunity; he carried it with him. One evening at Scottville he got out of the stage-coach, the driver having told him that it was not necessary that he should go farther, and by morning he had out his prospectus. A few days later the paper appeared, declaring that, as it stood upon a firm financial rock, it had come to stay. And how flattered I was when he invited me to join him. Money was not to be considered; if it had been I should not have owned a half interest. What he wanted was enthusiasm and some one to work the hand-press. This office had been performed by a stout buck of dark complexion, but he had insisted upon being paid, hence the necessity for a partner.

We were forced to print one page at a time, as our lack of type did not permit a broader spread. And an impression was like slapping two boards together. The type was old before I arrived, and as the press had notions of its own, we were never certain as to what we were going to say. Some of the letters failing to show up made many of our statements rather romantic. Once the postmaster threatened us with the law against circulating improper literature. Of course, when you read a newspaper you are influenced by what you see and do not take into account what fails to appear. I wrote the editorials and the locals, and sometimes Warren would call out from the "case," where he was setting type: "Don't use any more cap D's. We are out."

"But here's a man named Densmore. How are we going to manage him?"

"Have to do the best we can. Take the next letter. Take E."

"But that won't spell his name."

"And it isn't our fault if it doesn't. We are simply here to do the best we can."

He was a philosopher. The owner of the building was an occasional scribbler and therefore was inclined to be easy on us. He was at the head of a sorghum molasses industry. One day he sent in a communication longer than the premium ribbon tied to the horn of a prize bull. To print it was impossible, to throw it out—madness. So Warren cut it down. Shortly after the paper appeared the man came in with collar smoking. "How is this?" said he, striving to master himself.

"How is what?" Warren innocently inquired.

"Why, this here! You haven't printed one-third of my article."

I trembled, but Warren smiled. "I thought you were wiser than that," he said. "You make sorghum molasses, don't you? All right. And you know that it takes just so many gallons of sap to make one of molasses. Isn't that true?"

"Of course it is."

"Well, then, it's somewhat that way in our business. It takes just so many words in manuscript to make one in print."

The molasses man bowed. "Gentlemen," said he, "I beg your pardon. Warren, I never meet you that I don't learn something."

How closely intimate we became with those hill people, and how much we did learn from them! Some of them set aside all laws of deadly poison. And here is a story they tell. Our best advertiser was Buck Nagle, dealer in grass-seeds, hay, meat, meal and coffins, for Buck was the village undertaker. One day a friend from the knobs called to see Buck, and finding that he was not in proceeded to make himself at home. He and Buck had often drunk together, and he knew that there was liquor somewhere about the establishment. In his search he found a black bottle and helped himself, but he shook his head, put down the bottle, and came over to our office. Of the news in his neighborhood he gave full account, and then, sitting on the floor with his back against the wall began to fustian himself.

"It strikes me," said he, "that the air's sorter heavy this mornin'."

Just then Buck, the undertaker, came panting into the room. "Jim," he cried "make your will."

"What's up?" Jim asked, looking lazily at his friend.

"Tain't so much what's up as what's down. You are a dead man, I want to tell you that. Over in my store jest now you dranked a pint of embalmin' fluid."

Jim looked at him. "Embalmin' fluid?"

"Yes, that's what you done—drinked a pint."

Jim scratched his head. "Thar was lickin' in it, wan't they?"

"Of course, but——"

"Wall, ef thar was lickin' in it I reckon it's all right."

And it was. He sat about for a time and then, getting up and dusting himself, said, "I wonder who's got a right good horse that he wants to get rid of. I feel sorter like swappin'."

Warren had been intended for the bar, but the ease and luxury of a newspaper life led his mind astray. But what a lawyer he would have made! One of our subscribers, an old negro who couldn't read, was arrested for stealing a hog. The prosecuting attorney was active, with his hands full of proof, and the negro had no defense. The court was about to appoint a lawyer to defend him when Warren offered his services. We were about to lose a subscriber—and, thus moved, Warren made a most telling speech. The jury was astonished; the judge opened his eyes—and a verdict of not guilty was rendered. The negro was delighted. "Mr. Warren," said he, "you has surtnly done me er power o' good dis day; an' ef I had knowed befo' dat I wuz so hones' I neber would'er stole dat hog."

Sentiment came and with pearly finger touched the dimple in Warren's cheek. He fell in love. He was a slender youth and a fat girl lassoed his heart. Physical antithesis was too much for him and he surrendered. He knew that he could not afford to marry, but love keeps no ledger. He began to neglect his duties. It was a part of his work to deliver the papers as an offset to my assignment of bringing water from the spring. Of course, I was compelled to do more walking than he, the spring being at the edge of the village, but

On Trial to New Subscribers.

I did not complain. Well, one week he missed a subscriber and we received an order to discontinue his paper. Warren was sad, but he philosophized. He said that love could not remember everything. The fat girl began to pour communications into the office—essays and poems. I complained, but Warren said: "Yes, I know it's bad; but I am going to marry her pretty soon and that will stop it. Say, lend me your boots, I want to call on her."

To me comes the feeling that in a fond lingering over those sun-woven and moon-edged days I am inclined to exaggerate the pleasures of living in that now haloed time. And I know that the halo is memory-wrought. It takes a long time for a halo to circle round one's country newspaper experience. It requires the passing of years to turn privation into a sweet-measured poem. Ah, how great was the advantage Warren held over me! He was in love and didn't need to eat. We had started in to board with a man whose prospects in life were fair. He had married a girl who had been crowned Queen of the May. When we took up our abode with him his house was nearly finished; it was well lathed and needed only the plastering. But it was never completed. After we became members of his family he could not put us out. That would have been a violation of Kentucky's law of hospitality. So, he had to stand it; and there came but one ray of light, a strip torn off from a rainbow of promise, when Warren fell in love. It was a great saving in onions, our main diet; and he prayed that I might be stricken, and he drove out into the country and brought girls to town to introduce me to them. His was a simple soul, and he believed that among those lassies I might find my appetite-destroying fate. One morning after a sleepless night he came to me in great distress. "Where is Warren going to take his wife after he gets her?" he inquired, and, with the deliberation of one whose statements must be well weighed, I answered: "Blamed if I know."

"But I know," said our patron household saint. "He is going to bring her here, and that will settle me. His appetite will soon return—and you know it wa'n't slow."

I agreed that it had not been of a creeping nature. "And that girl!" he added with a sigh. "Ah, I know her. I went with her one time to a basket picnic."

The fat girl sent to Warren a volume of Tennyson. For poetry he had no decided taste. His metric excursions had been mainly among the verses printed on "patent sides." And now it was amusing to see him down on the floor, tallow-candeling In Memoriam. He smoked the Idylls of the King, and in his zeal he greased The Princess.

"Did you laugh?" he inquired.

"I did not."

"Well, it sounded like it to me. You must remember that this thing can't last. Say, don't you think you could write a few editorials in rhyme? It would please her."

"We haven't caps enough," I answered.

"That's a fact," he sighed. How quick he was to grasp a situation! Love is often mercurious, not to say quarrelsome, but so clear was his mind that he was not even argumentative.

Near was drawing the time for the wedding. The weather was red with the glow of the sun, and Warren referred to the days as blushes. "Just ten more blushes before she becomes mine—hopelessly mine," he added, glancing round at our washboard hand-press and battered type. Ah, that type—how often it betrayed us! And we were thinking over this when our household saint came in. "Warren," said he, "you are still determined to get married, I suppose."

"Nothing but death can stand between us," replied Warren. The saint sighed and I understood him to mutter that he didn't want to kill any one. And then after a pathetic silence, he said: "I have always been a friend to you, Warren—and now don't you think you can take the house as it stands?"

Warren's eye flashed. "I have never cast reflections on your home by missing a meal and I don't see why you'd want to put a hardship on me."

The saint sighed and groped his way down the stairs.

"I feel sorry for that man," said Warren, "but justice is justice, and he who permits his sympathies to govern him is not wise. Better for a man to be ruled by the Carpet-baggers than by his own sympathy. But after all, we have been absolutely honest with him. We have never given him any counterfeit money, and you know yourself that during my present—illness, I have greatly let up on his table, and now as an offset to this kindness he wants me to take the house. Well, it might have been expected, for all my life I have never met anything but ingratitude."

"Saint," said Warren, "you offered me an injury the other day—by wanting me to take your house; and now, sir, to show that I am not above revenge, I offer you this office."

Chinese School Etiquette.

When a Chinaman takes his little boy to school to introduce him to his teacher, it is done as follows, according to one missionary writer. When the Chinaman arrives at the school, he is escorted to the reception-room, and both he and the teacher shake their own hands profoundly. Then the teacher asks, "What is your honorable name?"

"My mean, insignificant name is Wong."

Tea and a pipe are sent for, and the teacher says, "Please use tea." The Chinaman sits and puffs for a quarter of an hour before he says to the teacher, "What is your honorable name?"

"My mean, insignificant name is Pott."

"What is your honorable kingdom?"

"The small, petty district from which I come is the United States of America." This comes hard, but etiquette requires the teacher to say it.

"How many little stems have you sprouted?" (This means, "How old are you?")

"I have vainly spent thirty years."

"Is the honorable and great man of the household living?" He is asking after the teacher's father.

"The old man is well."

"How many precious little ones have you?"

"I have two little dogs." These are the teacher's own children.

"How many children have you in your illustrious institution?"

"I have a hundred little brothers."

Then the Chinaman comes to business.

"Venerable master," he says, "I have brought my little dog here, and worshipfully intrust him to your charge."

The little fellow, who has been standing in the corner of the room, comes forward at this, kneels before the teacher, puts his hands on the floor, and knocks his head against it. The teacher raises him up and sends him off to school, while arrangements are being made for his sleeping-room and so forth. At last the Chinese gentleman rises to take his leave, saying, "I have tormented you exceedingly to-day," to which the teacher responds, "Oh, no, I have dishonored you." As he goes toward the door, he keeps saying, "I am gone, I am gone." Etiquette requires the teacher to repeat, as long as he is in hearing, "Go slowly, go slowly."

A Foolish Custom.

One of the most absurd of all foolish customs is that of inviting a crowd of friends or strangers to walk up to the bar and "take something at my expense."

Men do not buy other things, either useful or ornamental, in this way—why should they make an exception in favor of this poisonous draught, which is the cause of most of the crimes which curse the land and fill the community with poverty, mourning and woe?

Some one has sensibly said: "Now, boys, if you want to be generous and treat each other, why not select some other place besides the liquor shop? Suppose as you go by the post office you remark, 'I say, my dear fellow, come in and take some stamps!' These stamps will cost you no more than drinks all round. Or go to the haberdasher's and say, 'Boys, come in and take a box of collars.' Walk up to a grocer's, free and generous, and say, 'What kind of coffee will you have?' Why not treat to groceries by the pound as well as liquors by the glass?"

This would be thought a strange way of showing friendship, but would it not be better than to offer to friends a maddening, poisonous, deadly draught?

Suppose a man should keep a den of rattlesnakes, and allow men to come in and be bitten at sixpence a bite? Would it be a sensible thing for a man to invite all his friends to be bitten at his expense? Is it worth our while to turn our friends into brutes, maniacs and murderers, and their homes into hells of trouble and distress, by giving them "something to drink at my expense"?—Christian Work.

Household Hints.

A few recipes learned in the school of experience may be of use to some girl who loves to appear dainty and neat always, yet cannot indulge herself in a new ribbon or lace jabot, etc. The habit once formed of being neat and caring for your own belongings is seldom broken through life, and it is a great help. You can clean your ribbons to look like new by putting a half dozen at a time in a glass fruit jar half filled with gasoline. Screw the top on tight; then leave them there over night, first shaking them up well, and in the morning the dirt will all be found at the bottom of the jar and the ribbons fresh and new. Take them out in the open air, pull each piece straight and nice, and when dry all odor will be removed. They will need no pressing.

When it is necessary to wash laces they should be sewn upon strips of white muslin, then rolled tightly around a smooth glass bottle and fastened securely. Make a cleansing suds of warm rain water and Pearline, then drop the bottle into the suds and repeat the process, patting the lace with the fingers. Rinse in several waters, then dry the lace on the bottle in the sun. Such little practices will enable a young girl to appear dainty, and will save her many a dollar.

It is an economical idea to make your own handkerchiefs. You can hemstitch them above a hem an inch wide, and then embroider a dainty little initial letter in one corner. You can have twice as many fine handkerchiefs by adopting this method, as you can easily hemstitch a dozen or more, and they will not cost you half as much as the bought ones will.

The Law About Newspapers.

Sometimes subscribers to a newspaper are angry because their paper is not stopped at the end of the time paid for. They let it run on a few years longer and then refuse to pay on the ground that they never ordered it except for the time that they paid for. That sounds plausible. If you order a dollar's worth of sugar this week, your grocer is not justified in leaving a dollar's worth of sugar at your door every week without further orders and collecting for it. But the law recognizes a difference between sugar and newspapers. The following points, clearly set forth in the Public School Journal, show what the obligations of a subscriber are, according to the courts. The courts have decided:

1. That subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary are considered as wishing to renew their subscription.

2. If subscribers order the discontinuance of the periodicals the publishers may continue to send them until the arrearage is paid.

3. If subscribers neglect or refuse to take their periodicals from the post office to which they are directed, they are responsible until they have settled their bills and ordered them discontinued.

4. If subscribers move to other places, without informing the publisher, and the papers are sent to the former address, they are responsible.

5. That refusing to take periodicals from the office or removing and leaving them uncalled-for, is prima facie evidence of fraud.

6. If subscribers pay in advance they are bound to give notice at the end of the time if they do not wish to continue taking it, otherwise the publisher is authorized to send it, and the subscriber will be responsible until an express notice with payment of all arrearage is sent to the publisher.

The latest postal laws are such that newspaper publishers can arrest one for fraud who takes a paper and refuses to pay for it. Under this law the man who allows his subscription to run along for some time unpaid and then orders the postmaster to mark it "refused" and has a postal card sent notifying the publisher, lays himself liable to arrest and fine, the same as for theft.

Advance Society Letters.

Who wants to write a short story, poem or sketch for this page? Fall to work! Don't make it longer than 300 words. If you can't help it, it might stretch to 500 words. Shorter the better. You can just write on as many sides of the paper as you want to, and use pen, pencil or chisel, we are not particular. None will be returned unless stamp is inclosed. We would just as soon have a good letter as a story, but if you wouldn't,—write the story. Poems must not be longer than 30 lines,—but make them longer, if you are willing for me to put them down. Send on your stories, etc., and the first will stand just as good a chance as the last. There are two conditions; the writers must be original, and they mustn't get mad if I have to cut out some words to shorten the story. And remember that an interesting letter stands as good a chance as a story. These stories will not appear each week, but will be alternated with a continued story. So you see we are getting ready for an interesting year,—the year in this page begins Oct. 1. Lema McKay joins the Advance Society and asks what kind of stories are wanted; anything but highwaymen and weathearts. Lema lives in Windfall, Ind. Pansy Pierson, Hiram, O., intends to send stories; she likes to write as well as to read. She is 10 and expects to get her mother and sister to join our society. Francesca B. Taylor sends a very full report of her work. Each week is reported in a separate slip; I copy one of them: Sunday, Job 17-22. Monday, Job 22-25. Tuesday, Job 25-28. Wednesday, Job 28-31. Thursday, Job 31-34. Friday, Job 34-37. Saturday, Job 37-40. History, Josephus, p. 171-176. Poetry, Lady of the Lake. Quotation, The rose is fairest when 'tis budding new, and hope is brightest when it springs from fears" (Scott).

Mary Calhoun, Henderson, Tenn.: "I will begin with good faith to keep the rules of the Advance Society. I worked hard last year; I took music, passed three grades and took the prize. While at my aunt's this summer I read Rachel, or The City Without Walls, can you tell me the author?" (No, can any one?) "I know you are an old bachelor, because you would have told if you were married. But I suppose old bachelors are like old maids,—don't want people to know it. I made up my mind long ago I was going to be an old maid, and I am not going to be ashamed of it. My papa has the Bible college here. I had you a picture of him and mamma cut it of the catalogue. I am 9. My brother John is 7, and I have a brother, James Edwin, one year old. You may count on me for the Advance Society. The only alchum I ever had moved to Indian Territory last week, and I feel very lonely." Lynne Major, Laurens, Ia.: "We are so glad to be on the Honor List. Mamma and I have kept the rules. Well, I am going to talk on some other subject. I am 11 years old. Sister Leta with Baby Dis came home to spend the summer. Papa went to Minneapolis for his health, to be gone several months. If you don't care I send you my picture, not to say I am at least bit pretty, but I want you to see my mamma's baby." (Do send the picture, if it is like you, that is all I want. If I had wanted to adorn this page a few weeks ago, would I have had my picture up in the corner with that ring around the eye? The children had asked not for a pretty picture, but for a picture of me. Not but what I am prettier than that picture, though. My kinfolks say so, too, and a few of my best friends).

Lida Crites, Ozark, Ark.: "Now will you let another little Arkansaser enter your happy circle? While spending a week with Madge Masters in the country, she got me to join the Advance Society. Now listen and I will tell you the fun Madge and I had. She lives in about two miles of a large cave, and June 18 was her grandfather's 78th birthday, so there were two large wagons brought to the front door and 20 climbed in with bright and happy faces. Soon we reached the cave, looked around over the rocks, went to a dripping spring, and had great fun drinking from cups made of wild grape leaves. We then returned to the top of the cave where we sat down to a fine dinner. After dinner we went down into the cave and what do you think we played besides mumblepeg down in Arkansas? And near the close of the day it began to rain, and we all went home. I hope you and all the dear members of our society will spend just such a happy 78th birthday. With love to all." Francesca B. Taylor, Bay City, Tex.: "Did any of you ever read It is Never Too Late to Mend? I think it is splendid. I never read a Rollo book, but have read three books by the same author. I think it would be nice to at least try the plan of writing short stories for this page. But I must really close, so bon nuit." (For fear some members may not understand the connection, I will say that bon nuit is not something you wear on your head.) Emily Riley, Excelsior Springs, Mo.: "I was a member of the Advance Society when I lived in Kearney. I begin again, to-day. I am 12. I go to Haynes's Academy and study reading, mental arithmetic, history, spelling, written arithmetic, grammar and Latin. I like grammar and Latin best. I like to read very much." Chrystabel Rogers, Ballard, Wash.: "I would like to join the Advance Society. I am 13, and adore music and books. My pets are two kittens; just now they lie asleep on the sofa. Pete is the kind of a girl I like. My favorites, Handy Andy, Lucile Maitland, of Laureston, and all of Dickens. I like the Irishmen, they are witty, there must be some in you. I'm just a little Irish." Lema Davis, Hume, Ill.: "I would like to join the Advance Society. I was 11 in April. My sister Mayme and my mamma joined a year ago, but dropped out. I like Black Beauty, Birds' Christmas Carol and The Story of Patsy, about as well as any stories. Oh, yes, I like Uncle Tom's Cabin, too. Gerald Dever is one of my classmates." Jennie Hollandsworth, Bismarck, Ill.: "How many members are there in the Advance Society?" (1,900.) "I have been trying to get three of my friends to join. One would not do it; I have nearly persuaded the other two—they are 13 and 11. It surprised me to find Nap was not related to the Morrises. I like Black Beauty, Uncle Tom's Cabin, Put Yourself in his Place and Wide, Wide World. The last I like best. For history I am reading John McMasters."

Albany, Mo.

"Are you a district messenger boy?" asked the near-sighted gentleman of an urchin moving slowly along the street. "No, sir," was the indignant reply, "it's my sore toe that makes me walk that way."

"Maggie says she's a daughter of the Revolution."

"Can she prove it?"

"Sure; her father runs a merry-go-round."

"The excuse an old man gave for attending only funerals was that funerals were as solemn as church services and they never took up a collection."

"He says that his employers always regarded him as a valuable man."

"Yes, they offered a reward for him when he left."

Value of a Church Building.*

(Church Extension Service.)

TEXT: For he loveth our nation, and himself built us our synagogue.—Luke 7:5

While a church building is not indispensable to the existence of a church, it is necessary to its continuance and prosperity. There is little assurance of stability and permanence until a church is housed in its own building. And if that building is spacious and beautiful, then the church will find that it is a most valuable auxiliary in its manifold work. We are eager to reach the multitudes with the word of life, and yet we seem to forget that a prime essential is a building which will accommodate the multitudes.

A Work of Love.

The Jews testified that the centurion was worthy of attention and help, because he loved the nation, and had himself built them a synagogue. Evidently, it was wholly his own work; a work, too, which was not done patronizingly, but lovingly. The building stood as a monument to the loving generosity of the centurion. And so the church building to-day is valuable, not only because of its utility, but because in every case it is an expression of the love and self sacrifice of the builders. Its walls are erected, not under the whip and spur of sectarian pride, but under the sweet impulse of love to God.

Still more is disclosed by a church building. It is a visible and permanent expression of the people's taste and culture. It is all the witness needed to their religious faith. It is an evidence that they have a faith, for which they are ready and willing to make substantial sacrifices. And church architecture is as much an index to the refinement of a community as painting or sculpture, or the furnishings of their homes.

A Contrast.

"See now, I dwell in a house of cedar, but the ark of God dwelleth within curtains" (2 Sam. 7:2). It is often a question, with men of means, as to how they should use their money. Many of them have a deep sense of responsibility; they consider themselves stewards of the bounty of God. But it is to be feared that far too many of them look upon their wealth as the reward of their own energy and shrewdness, and think it entirely justifiable to use what they have in a strenuous effort to heap up still more. David himself here makes a comparison between his own dwelling, and the house of the Lord. Evidently he feels that there should be no such contrast; that the "ark of God" should be lodged in a place at least as fine as that in which he himself dwelt. We know, from the record following, that his preparation for the temple that his son Solomon built was for something far finer than his own palace.

It may be possible to squander money in church building, to go into debt, beyond the ability of the church to pay, but it is also possible to be niggardly, and dwell in finer houses than we are willing to build for the worship of God. If the house of worship is a testimonial of our love and devotion, if upon it we inscribe the name of Christ and in it we preach his gospel, then is it not reasonable to make it as fine as we are able? A hemished lamb or a foreign coin could not be offered in ancient worship. Always the worshiper must bring the best. Has this rule been abrogated? And then there is an ethical principle involved in the matter of public buildings. It is a dangerous symptom when private expenditures are munificent and public expenditures mean.

An Abiding Place.

"And I will appoint a place for my people, and will plant them, that they may dwell in their own place and be moved no more" (2 Sam. 7:10). The temple stood closely related to the stability and prosperity of the Hebrew nation. One place of worship, up to which all the tribes were to go, would help to cement their national unity. The synagogues served the purpose of local assemblies, but the temple stood for the whole nation. It helped to root them in their land. In the same way, a church building unites and roots a church in a community.

Joy in God's House.

Read the third chapter of Ezra, and note with what joy the people celebrated the completion of the temple. There must always be joy in the house of the Lord. There is strength and beauty in his sanctuary. The church building justifies its existence many times over in the blessed impulses that are stirred within it in men's hearts, in the truth that is imparted, in the spiritual awakening and development to which it ministers.

Prayer.

O God, help us to honor Thee with the work of our hands. Forbid that Thy people should forsake the public assembly, or neglect the public building. Bless every church and every meeting place. Be gracious to the thousands of homeless disciples, and multiply their faith and resources. Enable us to build always to Thy glory and the salvation of men, through Christ Jesus the Lord. Amen.

Quaint, Queer and Curious Salt Lake City.

The late Col. John Cockerell in the Cosmopolitan said: "There are three unique cities in America, and one of these is SALT LAKE CITY." It is not only unique in its Temple, Tabernacle and Mormon Church institutions, but quaint in appearance, with its wide streets, immense blocks and martial rows of shade trees. It has, perhaps, more attractions to the square yard than any city in the country, and its climate, while temperate all the year round, is particularly delightful in summer. The Great Salt Lake, with its magnificent Saltair resort, where the water is "deader and denser" than that in the Dead Sea in Palestine, is an attraction in itself that people come miles to see. There are many cool mountain and lake resorts nearby, also numerous very pretty canyon trips and parks, drives, Hot and Warm Sulphur Springs. Fishing and hunting in every direction. The trip from Denver to Salt Lake City and Ogden via the RIO GRANDE WESTERN RAILWAY in connection with either the Colorado Midland or Denver & Rio Grande railroads is one of unsurpassed pleasure. Here nature is found in her sternest mood and the whole line is a succession of rugged canyon, waterfalls and picturesque valleys. No European trip can compare with it in grandeur of scenery. During the entire summer there will be low excursion rates to Salt Lake City and contiguous country. It is on the road to the Pacific Coast, if that be your destination. Send four cents postage to Geo. W. Heintz, General Passenger Agent, Rio Grande Western Railway, Salt Lake City for literature, etc.

Isaac the Peacemaker.*

Many most interesting incidents occurred between the time of the last lesson and the present one. Abraham dwelt by turns in Beersheba and Hebron, and in the latter place his wife Sarah died, at the good old age of 127. Abraham purchased a piece of ground for a burial place of Ephron, the Hittite, and there made his family sepulchre, the tomb being a cave in the middle of the field. The spot is still held sacred by the Arabs, and the Mohammedans jealously guard it from the Jews and Christians, none of whom are permitted to enter it. It is claimed that the bodies of Abraham and Sarah are still within it, and there may be some very interesting revelations when that land is wrested from the hands of the Turk.

After the death of his mother, whom he mourned with exceeding great sorrow, Isaac, who was now nearly forty years old, was only comforted with the coming of the beautiful Rebekah to be his wife. This maiden was the daughter of Bethuel, the son of Nahor, Abraham's brother, who had tarried in Haran when the patriarch started upon his journey for Canaan. The story of the sending of the aged servant of Abraham back to Mesopotamia, to seek a wife for his young master from the young maidens of his own people, is one of the classics of Scripture. Directed by the hand of God, his errand was successful, and the affection of Isaac and Rebekah for each other was never disturbed by any wandering on their part. Alone among the patriarchs, Isaac married but once, and took no concubines, and this pure and lifelong union has been ever regarded as an ideal of wedded life among the descendants of Abraham. Not that Rebekah was an ideal wife or mother, for we shall find much to criticize in her conduct, in future lessons, but she was ever true to Isaac, so far as her wifely loyalty was concerned, and he was equally loyal to her.

Abraham took another wife, after the death of Sarah, or possibly before that time, though the account follows the story of her decease. By Keturah he became the father of six sons, whose descendants, together with those of Ishmael and Esau, still people the great Arabian peninsula. He died at the ripe age of 175, and Isaac and Ishmael unite in burying him and lamenting his loss. He was buried by the side of his beloved wife Sarah. Then follows the story of the birth of Esau and Jacob, and the incident of the selling of the birthright by Esau, out of which were to arise such fatal consequences to himself and his descendants. We shall study this part of the narrative in future lessons. A famine arises in Canaan once more, similar to that which drove Abraham into the territories of the Philistines, and Isaac becomes a sojourner with the king of Gerar, whose name, Abimelech, was the common title of all the rulers of that dynasty, like Pharaoh in Egypt. He imitated the sin of his father, in telling the people that Rebekah was his sister, lest her beauty might cause him to be put to death by the king. But this ruler was a good one, also, and his rebuke must have gone to the heart of Isaac as did that of his predecessor to Abraham's conscience.

This brings us to our lesson. The picture given us of Isaac is a beautiful one, albeit very different from that of his father, Abraham, or his ambitious son, Jacob. Isaac is pre-eminently a man of peace. The vast possessions which he had inherited from his father and which increased under the constant blessing of God, did not lift up his heart unto vanity, nor make him selfish or suspicious. Though the envious Philistines had anticipated his return to the district formerly occupied by Abraham by filling up the wells which that patriarch had digged, Isaac seemed not to resent this meanness. When they bade him leave that place, because they feared his superior strength, he quietly acquiesced and sought a grazing place in an unoccupied valley. Here he found water by digging for it, but the herdmen of Gerar claimed it and he moved away. Again he digged wells, and these in turn were claimed by the Philistines, whose demand he granted and moved further away. Not until he had the third time found a place for his herds and flocks did they leave him alone. His only sign of resentment was the naming of the scenes of their enmity by titles that indicated their hostile spirit, Esek and Sitnah, "strife" and "hatred." The last place he called Rehoboth, "room," for here there seemed at last a place where he could live undisturbed.

How different from the stern spirit of Abraham, whose pursuit and defeat of the four kings show him to have been a warrior in temperament. Doubtless the Philistines would not have dared to fill up the wells he had digged, during his occupancy of the country. They could impose on Isaac to their heart's content. If we are tempted to despise what seems weakness in this patriarch, let us not forget that our Lord himself pronounces his blessing upon the meek and forbearing. He himself, when he was reviled, reviled not again. When he suffered, he threatened not, but committed himself to him that judgeth righteously. Isaac showed more of the spirit of Christ than many who are more highly esteemed of men. With all his faults, he was a good husband and father, a true friend, an unselfish and generous neighbor, and showed those humble virtues which often do more to build up society than the more striking and showy. He might claim for himself the beatitude of our Lord, "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God." In the words of Isaac Errett, "The picture of a patient, plodding man, making the earth pleasant by his gentleness and amiability; making a home, with many elements of strife in it, peaceful by his meekness and patience; prospering by honest industry; linking his soul to heaven by holy meditation, and leaving everywhere the odor of sanctity unmingled with any memory of unrighteousness or oppression, is a picture more encouraging and inspiring for the great multitude than one of bolder features. Under the dominion of faith and the fear of God, such a nature, without much inherent force, takes on fair proportions of moral vigor and excellence and teaches us the might of gentleness." It was natural that God should give to such a man a renewed assurance of the fulfillment of his promise, and that Isaac should, like his revered father before him, erect there an altar for the worship of God. So peaceful a life was a fit channel for the transmission of the promise of the Prince of peace.

*Lesson for Sept 1. Genesis 26:12-25.

Christian Endeavor

Burris A. Jenkins

TOPIC FOR SEPT. 1.

Spiritual Acquaintance.

(Job 22:21-23.)

If this subject means spiritual acquaintance with one another, there is nothing in the text about it. If it means spiritual acquaintance with God, then the text is very well chosen, except for the fact that it comes from one of Job's comforters, Eliphaz the Temanite. But the passage is a good one all the same in urging upon us the necessity for a closer walk with God.

"Acquaint thyself with him," is the advice; "and be at peace," is the result. "If thou return to the Almighty," is the condition; and "thou shalt be built up," is the fulfillment.

And who of us is there that does not need acquaintance with God? Most of us have a great many acquaintances—not friends, but acquaintances—but few of us gain the knowledge of him that we ought to have.

How often do we hear the advice given to young men: "Extend your acquaintance." Or, "this is a good thing to go into because it extends your acquaintance." And how much of our time do we spend in gaining knowledge of men and women. But how much in gaining knowledge of God?

Nor is this a mystical, impractical matter. It is necessary to strive if we would know God. Not that any of us by searching can find him out. But that all of us, by asking, may receive knowledge of him. Certain it is that, while knowledge in general causes such effort to obtain, knowledge of God, the highest of all knowledge, will not come without effort.

Now, in what ways may we become acquainted with God?

Certainly not by wrong-living. There are those we know on earth who will hold us at arm's length and refuse us their acquaintance if they know we are doing wrong. Society, which tolerates a great many things it ought not, will quickly ostracize men and women for doing certain things. Is it likely then that God, who knows all we do and think, will admit us to close knowledge of him when we do what he does not approve? Ostracism from God! Is there any thought more terrible? This would be hell.

Certainly we cannot acquaint ourselves with God if we spend our time learning the shrewd, vain tricks of the world. There are those whose whole time is given to acquainting themselves with the most effective means of hoodwinking neighbors and competitors; others with the customs and intrigues of polite (?) society; others with the underground life of dens. There are many things in this world we should not learn; they do not lead to acquaintance with God. Paul says, "I would have you wise unto that which is good, and simple (or ignorant) unto that which is evil."

So it is by learning about "all things fair and bright," all things that are true, and honest, and pure, and lovely, and of good report. These things may be learned where the ores glitter in the mines, where the daisies toss their heads in the breeze, where the waves reflect back the white light of the sun, where the faces of busy men, begrimed with smoke, shine through the dust of the engine-room. "All things are yours; and ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's."

We may acquaint ourselves with God by reading about him in his book; that book that is called the "word of God." Endeavorers who thirst after God as the heart pants for the water-brooks, and who read daily of him in the book that records his revelation of himself, will come to a close acquaintance with him. There is shown how he deals with primitive man, how he leads him through the wilderness of the childhood of the race; and there is shown also how he deals with the highest type of mind this world has ever produced, for there were certain Greeks who would see Jesus.

And finally, we may acquaint ourselves with God by communing with him, talking with him, praying to him. It is by conversation with people, walking with them, living with them day after day, that we come to know them. It is the same with God. If we would know him we must cultivate his society; we must follow him about and talk with him.

Acquaintance with God is heaven, just as banishment from his society is hell. This is life eternal, to know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent.

The Episcopal Convention at San Francisco.

The meeting of this convention at San Francisco will afford an opportunity for many to travel over the Northern Pacific-Shasta Route. The Northwestern scenery of the United States, it is admitted, is of the grandest in the country and the fact that the Yellowstone Park lies in this section is proof of this. No one should miss the opportunity to travel over this route. Cheap rates will apply in one direction via direct routes and in the opposite direction via Portland and the Northern Pacific. For any further information and particulars and copy of Wonderland, 1901, send six cents in stamps to Chas. S. Fee, G. P. & T. A., St. Paul, Minn.

THE AKRON ROUTE.

Through Passenger Service to Buffalo for Pan-American Exposition.

The opening of the Pan-American Buffalo Line—"Akron Route"—May 5th establishes a new outlet from the West and Southwest to Chautauqua Lake, Buffalo, Niagara Falls and St. Lawrence River and Canada resorts. It also opens a new tourist route via Buffalo and the Niagara frontier to New York and the East.

Schedules for the new route are out, and their arrangement indicates passengers over it are to have enjoyable trips to and from the Pan-American Exposition.

The service from St. Louis for Pan-American Exposition visitors from that gateway and the West and Southwest includes two daily trains in both directions. The Pan-American Express leaves St. Louis Union Station at 8:44 a. m., arrives Buffalo 8:15 next morning. This train has sleeping car on which passengers may go from St. Louis to Chautauqua Lake and Buffalo without change. The Buffalo Express leaves St. Louis at 8:15 p. m. with sleeping car from St. Louis to Columbus and from Columbus through to Chautauqua Lake and Buffalo, arriving at latter point at 12:50 midnight. Passengers occupying sleeping car may remain in their berths until 7:00 a. m. Returning trains leave Buffalo daily at 1:00 p. m., arrive St. Louis at noon next day; leave Buffalo 6:30 p. m., arrive St. Louis 6:40 next evening.

Information about fares to Buffalo, Niagara Falls and beyond, stop-over privileges at Buffalo and other details may be ascertained by communicating with J. M. CHESBROUGH, A. G. P. Agt., St. Louis.

the annual publication of the Northern Pacific Railway will be found a distinct advance, in some respects, upon even its immediate predecessor Wonderland 1900.

Its cover designs and eight chapter headings are by Alfred Lenz, of New York, from plastic models and are splendid examples of art.

There is within the covers of the book much historical matter, some of it new, as well as purely descriptive narrative.

The three principal chapters relate to the history of the unique Northern Pacific Trademark, the Custer Battlefield in Montana, and Yellowstone Park. Each is profusely illustrated, the Trademark chapter in colors. This trademark is of Chinese origin and is 5,000 years old. Its story is a strange one.

It is safe to say that Wonderland 1901 will be in greater demand than any preceding volume of the Wonderland family, and, as heretofore it will be sent by Chas. S. Fee, St. Paul, Minn., to any address upon receipt of the postage, six cents.

AUSTIN.

Bro. Claude Austin was born in New Paris, Ohio, March 24, 1870. Died in Anderson, Ind., Aug. 6, 1901. On May 10, 1899, he was married to Miss Pearl Turner, of Anderson, Ind., and to this union was born one child. Mother and daughter remain to mourn their loss. Bro. Austin has been a resident of this city for ten years, nine of which he has been an employee of the Arcade File Works, where he was held in high esteem. He obeyed the Lord when about 17 years of age and has been a devoted Christian ever since, always ready for any service of love and ever active in the work of the church. It has long been his desire to preach the gospel, but ill health prevented his realizing this ambition, except to a very limited degree. He has preached a few times but has now been called to higher fields of labor. Services were conducted by R. B. Givens, Anderson, Ind.

LOVERIDGE.

Emma J. Loveridge was born near Alexis, Ill., Jan. 19, 1862. Died June 10, 1901, near near N. Henderson, Ill. In 1897 she confessed her faith in Christ and was baptized by Bro. P. M. Hale, now of Rossville, Ill., who also spoke words of comfort to her friends and relatives. Although suffering intensely for months from bone cancer she bore it with Christian resignation. She was held in high esteem by all having taught in the public schools and the kindergarten, where her work will be long remembered. When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, there shall we also appear with him in glory.

Mrs. FLORA E JACKSON.

SHLUTER.

Died, on August 7, in Council Bluffs, Ia., baby boy of Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Shluter. Funeral services were conducted by W. B. Crewdson at the home. The funeral was unusually sad as it is the second death in the home in a few weeks and the last child. W. B. CREWDSON.

To Corresponding Secretaries.

The annual statistics are due on Sept. 1st, 1901. We have sent you a request for the statistics of 1901. Will you not kindly give this matter your attention at once? It is earnestly desired that our statistics may be made as near accurate as possible. Our missionary societies need these statistics that they may compare them with the populations. It will aid in both extending aid where we are weak and securing aid where we are strong. These statistics are needed to indicate to the world at large our growth. A favorable showing causes men to investigate and has brought many men to Christ or taught them the way of the Lord more perfectly. Then it is an encouragement to all. Our churches are gaining and this encouragement should be the common property of all. The undersigned will be happy indeed to hear from every state secretary at the earliest date possible, so that our statistics may be properly tabulated for the first century convention at Minneapolis.

G. A. HOFFMANN,
Statistical Secretary.

Book Notes.

We urge our friends and patrons to remember that the business of the Christian Publishing Company is by no means confined to the books which we ourselves publish, or to the works listed in our catalogues, or to those which we advertise, from time to time, in these columns. We do a general book business, and can supply, at the regular price, any book in print, no matter where or by whom published. We solicit correspondence regarding any desired volume. If you see, anywhere, an advertisement, review or notice of any book, and decide to purchase it, send your order to The Christian Publishing Company.

If our memory serves us aright it was Sydney Smith, the English author and epigrammist, who wrote the familiar verse which, after enumerating a number of important things that men could do without, closed with the line:

But civilized man cannot do without books.

He spoke truly! The term "civilized" is a relative term, of course. The tribe of erstwhile savages which has ceased to eat its meat raw, which has abandoned tents or wigwams for cabins, and which has begun to have some regard for the sacredness of human life, is commonly spoken of as "civilized." It is hardly probable, however, that the members of such a tribe count good literature as a necessity to their happiness and well-being. This is not the "civilized man" of whom the author above referred to was speaking. The truly civilized man is he who realizes that the mind is more than the body, and that, like the body, it requires exercise, training and judicious nourishment if it is to grow and keep healthy. Ours is a civilized nation—so-called, at least—but what proportion of its inhabitants are truly civilized according to this standard? The proportion, we fear, is lamentably small! How few men and women give careful thought to their mental food, and conscientiously select that which they know they need! You who read these lines: Do you do this? If not, why not?

We are in the book business, and the more books we can sell the better it is for us. We realize that this fact weakens, in the minds of some readers, whatever we may say of the value and importance of reading good literature. "Oh, yes! They have books to sell, so it's no wonder they are constantly urging people to read more books." That is about the way the thought shapes itself in the minds of certain persons, we have no doubt. If this paragraph is read by any who have had this thought, let us beg them to think a little on one point, and answer this question: If our only object were to make as much money as possible, would we publish the kind of books that we do? Is there not vastly more sale for and more profit in "popular literature" than in the solid, instructive religious works which we publish? A moment's thought on this point should be sufficient to banish any such notion as that which we quoted above. Of course, we have books to sell, and are anxious to sell them, but, beyond all that, we have a genuine concern for the welfare and the mental and spiritual growth of our brotherhood, and it is because of this concern, as well as because of our desire to benefit ourselves by an increasing book trade, that we strive to impress upon our readers the fact that good books are a necessity to the intelligent, well-informed, progressive, truly civilized man.

The Witness of Jesus, the new book containing a number of the ablest sermons of the late Alexander Procter and a sketch of his life, is almost completed. The work has been very carefully edited by J. H. Garrison, who was an intimate friend of the great preacher and thinker, and understood thoroughly his mind and thought. The themes selected for treatment in this volume were designed to present a somewhat complete view of the author's conception of Christianity. It is a matter of profound congratulation that he has left this permanent literary heritage to his brethren. Full announcement of the date of publication, price, etc., will be made at an early day.

There was a time, and that not so many years ago, when it was only the preacher who was supposed to possess commentaries and books of scriptural exegesis. It was the clergyman who studied the Bible, and from the pulpit told the people what they were to believe and what were the correct explanations of knotty or obscure passages. In every Christian family there was a Bible, which was read, more or less, but it was not studied as the Bible is studied to-day. During the past few years there has been a great revival of interest in the study of the Bible, by no means confined to the preachers. The people are securing commentaries, concordances, exegetical works, etc., and are determining for themselves the teachings of the Book. The Christian Publishing Company is well prepared to meet this new and general demand for books about the Bible. We give a list of a few of our best works:

Commentary on Matthew and Mark, by J. W. McGarvey. A volume of 392 pages, cloth-bound. The former price of $2.00 has been reduced to $1.50.

Commentary on Luke, by J. S. Lamar. A splendid work by a grand man. Cloth, 333 pages; reduced from $2.00 to $1.50.

Commentary on John, by B. W. Johnson, the well-known commentator. Cloth, 328 pages. Price reduced from $2.00 to $1.50.

Studies in Acts, by W. J. Lhamon. This is the latest and one of the very best of our Bible helps. Cloth, 420 pages $1.25.

Commentary on Romans, by Moses E. Lard. A book of 485 pages, bound in cloth. Former price, $2.50, is reduced to $2.00.

Commentary on Hebrews, by R. Milligan. The author was one of the most gifted men of our reformation. The book contains 395 pages, cloth-bound. Price reduced from $2.00 to $1.50.

People's New Testament, with Notes, by B. W. Johnson. A concise commentary on the entire New Testament, comprised in two volumes, the first volume containing the four gospels and Acts, and the second the epistles and Revelation. Price, per volume, $2.00; per set $4.00.

These are all valuable, helpful works, teaching sound doctrine, and making clear those passages which sometimes puzzle those who have not given much time and attention to Bible study. They will prove of great help and benefit to the Sunday-school teacher, the Christian Endeavorer, and to all who are interested in the study of God's word. All of these volumes are more fully described in our General Catalogue, which will be mailed free on application.

The Frequency of the Lord's Supper, by N. J. Aylsworth, is a little booklet that every Disciple of Christ should read. There is nothing in our worship, in our public or private devotions, nearly so sacred and so important as the ordinance of the Lord's Supper. Our custom of observing this ordinance on every Lord's day differs with the practice of most of our religious neighbors, and this booklet is an argument for the correctness, the scripturalness and the value, as a means of spiritual growth, of the weekly communion service. 103 pages; price, 25 cents.

In all the anti-Mormon literature extant there is nothing of greater practical value and worth than D. H. Bays' Doctrines and Dogmas of Mormonism Examined and Refuted. For more than a score of years the author was a preacher and leader among the Mormons. No man in America knows better what Mormonism is. He is now a well-known preacher and pastor among us. 460 pages; cloth; price, $1.50.

While it is no doubt true that the question of the form of Christian baptism is no longer the important, live issue that it was thirty years ago, in the sense that it is not now discussed, preached and debated to the extent that it once was, it is also true that this question must remain a live and important issue so long as a large proportion of professed followers of Christ refuse or neglect to obey his command, and substitute something else for what he commanded. There are communities, too, where this question is as prominent to-day as it ever was anywhere. There have been a great many books written and published to prove that immersion, and immersion only, is the baptism taught by the New Testament, and many of these works have been excellent. One of the latest of these, and one which has no superior as a plain, straightforward, convincing argument for immersion, and against any other of the "modes," is J. B. Briney's book, The Form of Baptism. We do not believe that it can ever be excelled. To add to the interest of the volume, it contains a reply to Mr. Briney by Rev. J. L. Tucker, an Episcopalian clergyman, and Mr. Briney's rejoinder. The book is neatly printed and bound. Price, $1.00.

THE DIVINE COMEDY.

Oft have I seen at some cathedral door
A laborer, pausing in the dust and heat,
Lay down his burden, and with reverent feet
Enter, and cross himself, and on the floor
Kneel to repeat his paternoster o'er:
Far off the noises of the world retreat;
The loud vociferations of the street
Become an indistinguishable roar.
So, as I enter here from day to day,
And leave my burden at this minster gate,
Kneeling in prayer, and not ashamed to pray,
The tumult of the time disconsolate
To inarticulate murmurs dies away.
While the eternal ages watch and wait.

Longfellow.

Current Events.

World's Fair Proclamation. On Thursday of last week President McKinley issued the formal proclamation informing all the nations of the earth that an International Exposition is to be held in St. Louis in 1903, to celebrate the acquisition of the Louisiana Territory by the United States, and inviting them to participate in it. Copies of this proclamation will be sent to all the diplomatic representatives of the United States in foreign countries and will be formally presented by them to the governments to which they are accredited. To most Americans the issuing of this proclamation, which merely recites the already published decision of Congress in regard to the Fair, will seem but an empty formality. But such formalities have much more weight in foreign countries than with us, and are absolutely necessary to give the enterprise the stamp of governmental sanction in their eyes. The legislatures of most of the states have already made appropriations for their respective state exhibits, but the general public has perhaps not yet fully grasped the fact that within two years the gates will open at St. Louis to the greatest exposition that the world has ever seen. In the historical significance of the event which it commemorates, in the material resources which it will exhibit, in the financial expenditure which it will involve, the Louisiana Purchase Exposition will be unsurpassed by any of the great fairs of recent years. If international expositions are a gigantic fad which is soon to pass away, this one will form a magnificent climax to the series. If they are to be a permanent institution, as a means of education and of industrial expansion, the World's Fair of 1903 will establish a new record for its successors to beat—if they can.

The Yacht Race. The greatest event in the calendar of pure sport is the annual international yacht race. More than forty years ago the old schooner "America" won the cup in English waters the first time it was offered. From that time until the present there has been a series of interesting but unsuccessful attempts on the part of British yachtsmen to recapture the trophy. Sir Thomas Lipton, who has already had experience in this competition, has this year brought over a new boat, "Shamrock II.," which, as the experts all agree, promises to make an interesting race for her competitor. The curious feature of the present situation is that the boat which is to defend the cup in the name of the New York Yacht Club has not yet been chosen. The boat built especially for this purpose by Mr. Thomas Lawton, of Boston, was ruled out early in the season, and the two remaining candidates for the honor are the "Columbia," which successfully defended the cup last year, and the "Constitution," newly built by Herreshof. Sixteen races between these two boats have already been held in all kinds of weather, and the victories and defeats are evenly divided. The final test will be made in a series of three races to be held on Saturday of this week and Monday and Wednesday of next. The winner of two out of the three will meet the "Shamrock II." in the race for the cup. Yachting, of the sort involved in championship races, is a sport in which none but princes and multi-millionaires can indulge. Sir Thomas Lipton estimates that his total expenditure in this attempt to lift the cup, including the building of his yacht and bringing it from England to New York, will be not far from a million dollars. It is said to take about a hundred thousand dollars to pay for building the hull of an up-to-date racer, to say nothing of its equipment.

Science and Alcohol. It is well enough to talk in a general way of the disastrous effects of indulgence in alcoholic beverages, but most persons pass these lightly by as being true only of those who indulge to great excess. And there are many in this scientific age who are more influenced by the result of scientific experiments than by any amount of impassioned appeal. The authorities in the government laboratories at Washington have been making laboratory tests of the effects of alcoholic stimulants on the muscles and nerves, using appliances of the same general character as those employed in the study of physiological psychology. For example, tests can be made to determine the time which the brain takes to receive and respond to a simple stimulus, such as the pressure of an instrument or the flashing of a light. If an electric clock is connected with a light and a key so that it will be started when the light is flashed and stopped when the key is pressed, and if the subject is instructed to press the key as soon as he sees the light, the clock will register the time—a small fraction of a second—which elapsed between the appearance of the light and the touching of the key. This will be the time occupied by the brain, nerves and muscles in making that simple reaction. The time will, of course, be different with different individuals. By applying this test to a large number of individuals who have not tasted alcohol recently, and then to the same persons immediately after they have taken a small quantity of it, it is found that in every case the effect of the alcohol, even in the smallest appreciable quantities, is to retard action of the brain and muscles and increase the time required to make the given reaction. This is but one among dozens of experiments, the general outcome of which is to prove that the human body and mind are less efficient instruments when they have received alcoholic stimulation, and that, even when the quality is so small that ordinary observation cannot detect this effect, scientific observation discovers that the effects are no less really present.

The Iowa Democratic Convention.

The Iowa Democracy, unlike Ohio and Pennsylvania, expressed its loyalty to the silver issue in the state nominating convention held last week. There was some difficulty encountered in finding a suitable candidate who was willing to head the ticket. After the withdrawal of two or three others who were considered suitable, T. J. Phillips, of Ottumwa, was nominated for governor. Mr. Phillips, after his nomination, with commendable frankness, expressed his own opinion that it would have been just as well for the convention to make no deliverance on national questions but to confine itself to state issues. Besides endorsing the Kansas City platform, the newly formulated state platform contains a plank proposing the repeal of the present liquor law—which is prohibition with some modifications—and the enactment of a high license and local option law. In spite of the weakening of the Iowa prohibition law since its original enactment, and in spite of any irregularities which there may be in its enforcement, we have reason to believe that it is still far preferable to the local option system. We have not yet heard full particulars, but apparently the Democratic party in Iowa is trying to ride into office on the (real or imaginary) wave of reaction against prohibition in the state. Even if the preponderance of public sentiment is in favor of the substitution of local option, the normal Republican majority will doubtless be enough to turn the scale against any such change if the Republican party remains favorable to the present system.

Rumors of Compromise.

A good deal of mystery is being preserved about the movements of the strike leaders and the steel operators. Persistent rumors are afloat that peace negotiations are well advanced and that a settlement is to be expected within a few days. Mr. Shaffer denies these reports and asserts that he has no official knowledge of any such negotiations. It is possible, however, that much may be veiled under the qualifying adjective "official." The area affected by the strike has not materially increased or diminished during the past two weeks. Some mills which were non-union before the strike began have been organized and have obeyed the strike order. In other cases the refusal to organize has been not less definite. This circumstance has suggested the terms of a possible compromise: that the operators sign the Amalgamated Association scale for all mills except those which, by refusing to organize, have definitely declared their unwillingness to accept the Amalgamated Association as their representative. Mr. Shaffer is said to have suggested arbitration by a committee composed of Bishop Potter, Archbishop Ireland and President Seth Lowe of Columbia College. One thing is certain: that if the strike is not made far more general than it is at present or has any immediate prospect of becoming, the strikers must either compromise or lose the whole fight. The mills, although crippled, are still turning out an immense amount of steel and at the present rate the operators can stand it a great deal longer than the strikers can.

The New German Tariff.

The generally expressed apprehension that the nations of Europe may form an industrial and commercial combination to prevent the United States from developing too far the primacy which it already holds in the world of international business, is doubtless a feverish dream. There is not likely to be a definite anti-American combination to kill or cripple our trade. But it is to be expected that the nations of Europe will individually adopt such measures as may seem likely to prove effective to protect themselves against our commercial invasion. The new German tariff schedule is a step in the direction of such a policy. Under this schedule the import duties are increased, on the average, about fifty per cent. and in many cases they are more than double the rates which have been granted by special treaty arrangement to the "most favored nations." It is noticeable that the increase of the rate on American food-stuffs is quite up to the average, and on machinery is more than that. Bicycles, for example, will be required to pay more than four times the old rate. To satisfy the agrarians, a minimum is fixed below which the rates on cereals cannot be reduced even by special treaty. If the Germans wish to adopt such measures as these to rid themselves of American competition, we have no logical ground for making complaint. It is the same policy which we have been applying with more or less success to rid our manufacturers of German (and other) competition. Any complaint which we may now offer against Germany's higher tariff on our products will be virtually a complaint against our own system by which German, French and English producers have been shut out from American markets by a high tariff wall. It may turn out that protection is not such an enjoyable game when everybody plays it.

Colombia and the United States.

The insurrection in Colombia, judging from the meagre, belated and censored accounts which find their way into the press, is becoming more formidable. The rebel leader, Gen. Uribe-Uribe, has written to a correspondent in New York that he is getting on well and needs more ammunition, but that he is "too busy to spend much time writing letters." In this respect he differs from some other commanders—Gen. Weyler, for instance, with his mounted rapid-fire type-writer,—who are too busy writing letters to have much time to do anything else. There is apparently a Conservative insurrection against the Liberal government in Venezuela, as well as a Liberal revolt against the Conservative government in Colombia. Naturally, the insurrectionists of each country affiliate with their co-partisans in the governmental army of the other country. It is in this way that the invasion of each country by the troops of the other has come about. The Venezuelan governmental troops and the Colombian insurrectionists seem to have the best of it so far and victories have been won by them on the border of Colombia. The United States consul in Venezuela, Mr. William L. Scruggs, says that the Liberals in both countries are fighting not only for the reunion of the three republics into one Greater Colombia, but also for the separation of church and state. According to this latter statement, it is as much a war between the clericals and the anti-clericals, as anything else. The foreign papers, especially the French and German, see, or profess to see, in the action of our government in promptly sending war-ships to the Isthmus to perform any police duty that might become necessary, an indication that the United States is reaching out to possess Central America, the Isthmus of Panama, and as many of the South American republics as may come within the reach of our clutches. Such a possibility may be seriously contemplated by our European neighbors, but the suggestion is not likely to arouse anything but laughter in this country. We have troubles enough now, without trying to tame any South American republics and without becoming responsible to the world for their good behavior.

France and Turkey.

A diplomatic flurry has been caused by sudden pressure on the part of France for the payment of some long-standing claims against the Turkish government. Several years ago a French corporation, operating under a Turkish franchise, made large investments in docks and quays in Constantinople, the Turkish government agreeing to buy them at a certain price whenever the company wished to sell. The use of the docks was hampered to such an extent by the agents of the government ostensibly trying to prevent the landing of possible assassins, that the company decided to sell out. But the money was not forthcoming, and the company finds itself in possession of property which, in spite of definite agreements and the personal promise of the Sultan, it can neither operate to advantage nor sell. The French Ambassador at Constantinople, M. Constans, set a date at which the claims must be settled. As the immediate result of this was nothing more substantial than smooth words, he declared diplomatic relations at an end between France and Turkey and prepared to depart with his official household. It is reported that at this point the Sultan yielded, but the money has not yet been paid over and M. Constans has left Constantinople. It is not as it was in the old days, when it was as much as an ambassador's life was worth to fail to get out of Constantinople before his government declared war or broke off diplomatic relations. The situation is still strained, in spite of any concessions which the Sultan may have made, but it is scarcely conceivable that the Turkish government will be foolish enough to allow itself to be drawn into a war. It would inevitably be a naval war and it could not have more than one act. France has one of the most powerful navies in Europe, probably second only to that of Great Britain. Turkey has about a hundred vessels, most of which are for practical purposes mere junk. Doubtless Russia, which has an interest in seeing that there is no war between France and Turkey, will assist in patching up the affair, even to the extent of lending the Sultan enough money to pay the bill. This sudden and brusque kind of diplomacy, which the French government has sanctioned and M. Constans has executed, is the only sort which has any chance of being effective with the Turk.

Brevities.

The Dutch government has refused to submit to the Powers the protest of the Boer leaders against Gen. Kitchener's latest proclamation. To have granted this request would have been very much like trying to force a recognition of them by the other governments.

C. M. Hays, President of the Southern Pacific Railway, has resigned his office. It is reported that the Harriman system, including the Southern Pacific, the Union Pacific and the Chicago and Alton will be consolidated under a single set of executive officers and that the presidency of the system will be given to S. M. Felton, who is now President of the C. & A.

With its accustomed cantankerousness the Chilean government has refused to make the necessary appropriation to pay the expenses of the Pan-American Congress which is to be held in the City of Mexico. Chili is famous for its capacity for getting on the off side of every proposition which has two sides, and it often makes another side for its own use where nobody supposed there was room for one.

A new demonstration of the friendship and alliance between France and Russia is to be given by a visit of the Czar to France this fall to witness the autumnal military maneuvers. Elaborate preparations are already being made for his reception. It is not every republic which has such an adequate supply of palaces for the entertainment of royalty. The inherited architecture of several centuries of monarchy comes handy when a republic has to house a Czar. If Nicholas came to this country the best we could do would be to put him up at the Waldorf-Astoria—and very likely he would find more practical comforts there than in the ancient Chateau of Fontainebleau.

An apparently endless newspaper war is being waged, chiefly in St. Louis, over the management of the Missouri school fund. It is alleged that the $4,000,000 in interest bearing bonds, which formerly constituted the school fund, has been diverted to other purposes, leaving only certificates of debt, the interest of which is raised only by general taxation. It is even charged that there has been crooked bookkeeping to cover up the misapplication of funds. Gov. Dockery has offered to give any interested party an opportunity to examine the books, and one of the St. Louis afternoon papers has undertaken to have the examination made. It is to be hoped that the examination will at least succeed in shutting off a discussion which has already grown to wearisome length.

The note of despair and sadness which is heard in much of our modern literature, is in striking contrast with the note of hope and triumph which sounds through the books of the Bible from Genesis to Revelation. This is one quality of biblical literature which should and does endear it to the human heart, and which makes it pre-eminently the Book of the people. Its optimism is not the weak, maudlin type which is blind to existing evils, but of that virile, aggressive, victorious sort which is contagious, because it reveals the remedy for every defect that mars the perfection and happiness of human life.

Does the book of Genesis lead us through a succession of falls by which men sink deeper into the mire of sin and ruin? This is only done to afford a background for the display of God's grace in the redemptive purpose which is gradually unfolded in the history of God's chosen people. In the succeeding books of the Bible, if sin is presented as a subtle poison corrupting all the fountains of human life, and introducing confusion and strife in the various relations of life, there is evermore accompanying this warning note of the heinous character of sin, a forgiving God in whose grace pardon and peace may be found, and from whose almightiness strength may be received to gain the victory over sin.

The prophets of the Old Testament saw and denounced in severest terms the sins and follies of their times. They had the keenest insight into the moral shortcomings of the nation, and the direful consequences of sin upon both the individual and national life. And yet they were the great optimists of the times in which they lived. Amid the gross darkness that settled down upon the world at times, their voices could be heard on the mountain tops, crying, "The morning cometh!" They looked beyond the strife and turmoil, the darkness and misery, of the age in which they lived, to a golden age yet to come in which peace and righteousness would fill the earth and the wilderness would blossom as a garden. They saw God's purpose through all the changing fortunes of their nation, and knew that good at last would come out of all the evil which for the time seemed to prevail.

When Jesus came, a new and higher note of optimism was sounded. Never prophet or seer saw so deeply into the awful nature and consequences of sin as he, nor felt so keenly the weight of the world's sorrow and iniquity. Nor did ever prophet or seer of the olden time speak such words of hope to cheer the sad hearts of a weary world. He saw the sins of humanity as no one ever before saw them, and yet he believed in men as no man ever before believed in them. He hated iniquity as no one ever hated it before, but he loved men, who were laden with iniquity, as no one had ever loved them. Down beneath the sin and unworthiness which common eyes could see, he saw the divine in man—the remnant of the divine image. His sympathetic ear heard the unspoken longings and aspirations of the human heart. He knew the unrest, the soul-weariness of men, and opening wide his loving arms he invited all the weary and heavily laden to come to him for rest. He was the friend of publicans and sinners. These outcasts of society felt somehow that here, at last, was one who understood their case, and who had some regard for their personality and believed in their salvability.

Nor did this sublime optimism wane in the least when he saw that through the narrowness, the prejudice and the bitter hatred of the Pharisees and Scribes, he was to be put to death. Even then he kept his faith in humanity. "They do not understand me," he seemed to say. "They do not know what they are doing in putting me to a cruel death; if they did, they wouldn't do it. I have failed to convince them by my life and my teaching, of my mission of mercy. But if I be lifted up and die for men on the cross, then I will draw all men unto me. They will be convinced of my love, and of my Father's love for the race, and will accept the salvation which I offer." Was ever optimism like this? Has any one else ever had such confidence in the final triumph of love over sin and all the sad consequences of sin?

The optimism of Jesus was shared by his apostles. They preached a gospel of hope and of good cheer. They placed no man beyond the reach of salvation who did not place himself there by his own act of rejection. They are the heralds of a triumphant gospel which is to conquer the whole earth. The last book in the Bible leads us to a mountain top of vision and shows us the mighty conflicts between the forces of righteousness and of sin, and the final triumph of righteousness in the earth. The book reverberates with the sounds of battle at first, until these are lost in the shouts of victory, and the songs of praise to him who sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb, who redeemed us from our sins in his own blood. The scene closes with a new heaven and "a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness," and a redeemed world rejoicing in the smile of God, who dwells with men and wipes all tears from their eyes.

Such is the optimism of the Bible. No wonder it does not relax its hold on the human heart. No wonder the Christ who fills it with this triumphant note is marching on to universal conquest. Blessed be his name, forever and forever!

Converts and Perverts.

A religious body that ceases to grow will soon cease to live. The truth is, when it loses the power of self-propagation it is already dead. There can be no truer measure of the spiritual vitality of any church than its capacity to win men from the service of sin to the service of God. This is not saying that the church that has the largest number of additions to its roll of membership possesses the greatest spiritual power. It is one thing to add persons to our churches and another thing to add them to Christ and make them members of his living body. Facts compel us to believe that many who are baptized and enter the church are not really converted to Christ. The large number of those who, after their baptism, fall back into their old lives of sin and fail to make any growth in Christian life, manifests too clearly superficial work in the process known as conversion. We do not believe that the number of those who are hypocrites—that is, who are consciously acting a false part in joining the church,—is very large. It is easier to believe that most of those converts who soon become perverts have been misled by their spiritual teachers. Perhaps these teachers have laid an undue emphasis upon external acts, to the neglect of those internal conditions which alone can give value to any outward act. Or it may be that altogether too much has been made of mere feelings and emotions, which have been made to take the place of moral enlightenment and of deep religious conviction.

But whatever may be the cause, the fact remains undisputed and indisputable, that too large a number of those who are reported as converts soon become perverts, and their latter condition is worse than the first. We seldom hear reports of the number of those who are perverted from the gospel. It is this fact that makes religious statistics of such uncertain value. While we have no means of knowing the losses we sustain every year through these perversions, it is a matter of certainty that not only our church membership but our spiritual power would be vastly increased if this leakage were stopped. What is the remedy for this evil?

Two things will readily occur to any one who turns his attention to this problem. First, there should be greater care in making sure that those who come to our baptism have the necessary spiritual preparation for this solemn and significant step. Unless there lie behind this act a realization of sin and the fixed purpose to turn away from it, a love for Christ and for the ways of righteousness, an intelligent acceptance of Christ as offering to us all that our spiritual needs require, there is no adequate preparation for that Christian life at the threshold of which baptism stands. When once the soul has come to feel the burden of guilt, and to long for peace and reconciliation with God, to submit to Christ in the ordinance of baptism becomes a joyful privilege as well as an act of solemn self-surrender. We cannot doubt that if there were more personal conversations with candidates for baptism by their spiritual teachers, in which the nature and obligation of the Christian life were explained, and the meaning of baptism as a sacred covenant with Christ, into which they were entering, impressed upon them, the number of genuine converts might be increased, while the number of perverts would be proportionately decreased. The second part of the remedy is the proper care for and training of those who come into these new relationships. Perhaps at no one point in all our system of work have we been more seriously at fault than just here. We have not yet devised or adopted any adequate system of providing spiritual care and instruction for new converts, grouped in weak congregations and unable to care for themselves. As often as plans have been suggested to remedy this defect, so often has the fear been expressed by timid brethren that the rights of these churches are in danger of being trampled upon. Have these churches an inalienable right to perish for lack of oversight and spiritual instruction? If so, there would be ground for the opposition. But if these weak, struggling churches, these shepherdless flocks, have a right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, then we are depriving them of their inalienable right by withholding from them the means whereby their life may be sustained.

Let the work of conversion, by all means, be carried on as vigorously as possible; but in doing so let us bear in mind the danger of these converts, becoming perverts through a too superficial work on the part of those who preach the gospel to them. And especially let us not any longer neglect the adoption of some wise system of supervision by which the weakest and most needy of our churches and the scattered disciples may have the necessary care and instruction. No amount of evangelistic zeal can compensate for our indifference to those who, having been turned from the service of sin to the service of Christ, are left alone to battle with the difficulties which confront them without the guiding hand and the cheering voice of a loving and faithful shepherd. When these facts have received due recognition, and these proposed remedies have had time to work out their legitimate results, our statistics will mean a great deal more than they do at present, for the number of our converts will not have to be discounted by so many perverts from Christ and the Christian life.

The American Revised Bible.*

On Monday of this week there was published for the first time a version of the Scriptures which must without doubt be characterized as the most perfect version of the whole Bible that has ever appeared in the English language.

The revision of 1881-85 was made by a joint committee of eminent English and American scholars, and the result was a version which for all practical purposes is so far superior to the "authorized" King James Version of 1611 that it is a wonder and a pity that the latter remains in so much more general use. But the revision of 1881-85 was not perfect. A wholesome conservatism restrained the translators from departing from the rendering of the old version in many cases where, although there might be said to be some doubt, the balance of probability was heavily against the old reading. For example, in Job 19: 25, 26, the Authorized Version has "I know that my Redeemer liveth and . . . yet in my flesh shall I see God," the capital R in Redeemer and the phrase "in my flesh" being used chiefly to give the verse dogmatic value as a specific Messianic prophecy and a proof-text for the resurrection of the body. The Revised Version, translating literally, reads, "from my flesh," which, though somewhat ambiguous, does not materially alter the meaning. The new American Version, giving the obvious meaning of the original in the light of its context, has "without my flesh."

The translators in making the earlier revision tried to remove enough of the archaic words to make the meaning always clear, at the same time preserving in the diction that subtle flavor and aroma of antiquity which, in this bustling age, is closely akin to the feeling of reverence. Here again the fear of making too great changes led to the error of making too few, and in not a few passages a veil of obsolete Elizabethan words obscures the meaning. For example, Jer. 9: 26, "All that have the corners of their hair polled," might as well read, "cut off" instead of "polled." The word "reins" retained in many passages in the Revised Version means practically nothing to the average Bible reader.

In considering all of these changes the American section was almost always in favor of more radical changes than the English members were willing to sanction. So it was agreed that, since it was primarily an English enterprise, the English opinion should prevail in all disputed passages and that every revised Bible published should contain an appendix giving the translation suggested by the Americans in all these disputed passages. It was further agreed that the American committee should not permit the publication of their version as a complete text during a space of fourteen years. That period has now elapsed. The American Revision Committee has kept up its organization, has thoroughly revised its revision, and now publishes the result, which is, as before stated, without doubt the best translation of the whole Bible ever made into the English language.

One of the most striking changes introduced in the new American version is the use of the name "Jehovah" in a large class of passages where all earlier versions use "God" or "Lord," e. g., Gen. 2: 4. The sacred name of the Most High, represented by the consonants JHWH, was considered by the Jews too holy for human lips to utter. For its original vowels, whatever they may have been, they substituted the vowels of the word translated "Lord"—a process simple enough in Hebrew where the vowels have no place in the alphabet, though almost inconceivable in English—and in reading the text the word for Lord would be pronounced instead of this ineffable name. There is clearly no reason why this Jewish superstition should be perpetuated by omitting from our version the name Jehovah, which is pre-eminently the personal name for God. Moreover, if there is any value in noting the use of the words Jehovah and Elohim in the Pentateuch as bearing upon the possible composite origin of those books, it is important to have the distinction preserved so that the English reader may note and consider it.

It is to be noted with satisfaction that the page headings, stating in a few words the contents of the page, have been restored, but without the doubtful exegesis which characterizes many of the headings in the Authorized Version. In the latter we find at the top of certain pages in Isaiah such headings as: "Blessings of the Gospel," "The Messiah's humiliation and suffering," "Prosperity of the church," "Enlargement of the church." In place of these, the new version wisely speaks of "the Suffering Servant of Jehovah" and "the Redemption of Glorified Zion," without volunteering any interpretation of the prophecy. The heading which the old version gives to the Song of Songs, "the mutual love of Christ and the Church," has of course been impossible ever since the allegorical method of interpretation went out of vogue; still, it has stood in all our Bibles up to 1885, and in most of them since that date, as a monument—like the vermiform appendix and the muscles of the ear—to a stage of development through which we have long since passed, a landmark in the evolution of exegesis.

Editor's Easy Chair or Macatawa Musings.

Among the numerous agencies for disseminating knowledge and advancing the kingdom of God is the summer assembly, which is an evolution out of our modern civilization. It has grown out of conditions in our American life which have developed largely within the last quarter of a century. It is written: "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." The growing realization of the value of a vacation season, and a better knowledge of how to make such season most profitable, are the causes which have produced the Chautauqua, or summer assembly. Experience has taught that it is not best for either body or soul to divorce vacation from all mental and religious stimulus. Hence the assembly idea, blending the educational, the religious and the amusement or entertainment features into a composite whole. The Fountain Park Assembly, located near Remington, in northern Indiana, grew out of these conditions. It is now holding its seventh annual session. Its founder and superintendent is Robert Parker, a banker of Remington and an active member of the Christian Church in that place, who, owning a tract of land near the town, containing a beautiful grove and other features adapting it to such a purpose, having seen the good influence of such assemblies elsewhere, decided to establish one in his own community. He undertook the work on his own responsibility, and carried it on so successfully that many others became interested in it financially. But he is still the inspiring spirit of the enterprise and commands the confidence of all who know him, both in his personal integrity and administrative ability. In physical appearance he is the "double" of President Harper, of the University of Chicago, and might easily pass for a twin brother of the distinguished scholar and university president.

The present season of Fountain Park Assembly began on Saturday, 17 August. It was the privilege of the editor of this paper to make the opening address, preach twice on the following Lord's day and give two Bible lectures on Monday. The weather had been very dry for several weeks, but no sooner had the assembly opened than the windows of heaven were also opened, and copious rains fell on Saturday, Sunday and Monday, not seriously interfering with the attendance, but greatly promoting the joy and thankfulness of the people. It also served to fill an empty lake-bed which had been prepared in anticipation of the rain, thereby adding a desirable feature to the grounds. We cannot speak in detail of the program. It must suffice to say that what we saw and heard of it, leaving out our own part, was of a very high and varied character. Bro. Parker has evidently studied to good purpose the art of catering to the public, and knows how to interest as well as instruct the people. The assembly has already acquired a reputation of furnishing the best, and it is growing in influence and usefulness. Bro. Parker is assisted by Bro. Freed, pastor of the Christian Church at Remington, who acts as manager. L. L. Carpenter, who, with his wife, was present, was assisting with his large experience at Bethany Park. The "tall sycamore of the Wabash" gives no indications of superannuating, and says there is no shelf in Indiana long enough to hold him! We were most favorably impressed with the good work that is being done at Fountain Park, and greatly enjoyed our visit there as a guest in the neat and comfortable hotel, from the veranda of which one has a splendid view of the grounds, dotted with cottages and tents, and the tabernacle in the center embowered in a beautiful grove. Some of the best talent among us and other religious bodies has appeared on this platform, and is to appear during the present season, together with some of the most popular entertainers, as lecturers and readers. We wish the Fountain Park Assembly a career of increasing prosperity and usefulness.

Speaking of assemblies reminds us that the time of our autumnal convocations is drawing nigh. Especially are our thoughts turning toward Minneapolis and our great national convention. Some time ago, when brethren met each other the question would be, "Are you going to Minneapolis?" Now the form of the question is changed and it is, "You are going to Minneapolis?" with a rising inflection. It is now considered safe to assume that every one is going to Minneapolis who is not unavoidably prevented by untoward circumstances. Those of our readers who have never seen the two great twin cities of the north and the beautiful state of Minnesota with its numerous clear lakes and its celebrated Minnehaha Falls, should avail themselves of this opportunity of extending their knowledge of the geography of our own great country. The Mississippi River is not so large at St. Anthony Falls as it is at St. Louis and farther south, but it makes up in picturesqueness in these northern regions what it lacks in magnitude. But of course the chief attraction which should draw the people to Minneapolis in October is the convention itself. To see the hosts of men and women from all parts of the Union gathered in that great Assembly Hall and hear them sing "Coronation" and other stately hymns, and to see and hear the reports of the foreign missionaries, and listen to the great speeches and attend the great communion service on Sunday, will be an abiding inspiration in one's life. One denies himself more than he can well afford when he stays away from such a spiritual feast. It will be our first Twentieth Century National Convention and should sound the keynote of progress for the century high and clear. What worthier aspiration can one have than to be a participant in such a convention and contribute, in some small measure at least, to its complete success? Whatever you plan to do or not to do during the coming autumn be sure to plan to go to Minneapolis in October to attend our first Twentieth Century National Convention.

To-day the Macatawa Bay Yacht Club is holding its annual regatta. Sailing vessels are here from Chicago and other neighboring ports, and Lake Michigan presents a lively scene as viewed from our study window. A brisk breeze is blowing, WNW, and the white sails of the competing crafts, filled with the wind, stretching from the pier to the distant horizon over the blue waves flecked with white-caps, present a scene of great animation and beauty. There are vessels of various sizes, each contesting for the prize with those of its own class. There are the same natural forces of wind and wave for all of them, but those whose builders have so constructed them as to secure the largest benefit from these forces, other things being equal, will succeed in the contest. It is so in all the conflicts of life. It is the man who knows best how to avail himself of natural laws and conditions that succeeds best in life, while the man who ignores these conditions finds that "the stars in their courses" fight against him. Here emerges the reason and necessity for education in every line of human industry and activity. That alone is true education which teaches one how to so adjust himself to his material and spiritual environment as to work with these forces of nature and of God, and not against them. But not to moralize further, there must be a strange fascination about this "life on the ocean wave," or on the waves of these great inland seas. There are hardships and dangers not a few. But how tame and insipid does life on the land appear to one who has learned to love the lake and the sea, even in their sublimest moods, and to laugh at the winds and the waves as he is "rocked in the cradle of the deep." We have never been able to pay that degree of devotion to Neptune, but we can heartily sympathize with the familiar song of our boyhood, one of whose verses ran:

"O give me a home by the sea,
Where the wild waves are crested with foam;
Where the shrill winds are caroling free,
As o'er the blue waters they come.
O earth has no treasure so rare,
No scenes that are dearer to me;
So give me, so free and so fair,
A home by the deep, heaving sea!"

At night there was an illumination such as we have never seen before at Macatawa Park. Macatawa Bay was ablaze with light. Launches, sailing vessels, small steamers, row-boats, were decorated with Chinese lanterns and moved about over the bay like phantom forms in fairy land. The hotels on each side of the channel, and all the adjacent cottages were illuminated in the same way. Sky rockets rent the air and the half-full moon joined in the festivities by shedding its milder radiance over the scene. The splendid spectacle was witnessed by thousands of applauding people, who will not soon forget the wonderful picture of Macatawa Bay transformed into a section of fairy land.

Certain religious papers have lately been criticising another because of its expressed purpose to keep sweet, shun intolerance and preserve a Christ-like spirit. If they would only stop to think they are giving it an admirable opportunity to exhibit the superiority of its spirit. A Christian paper needs to be something more than amiable, but if it falls short at other points it is rather better to point out its real errors than to criticise it as if a spirit of love in itself were a sin.

Questions and Answers.

Please tell us how long the Hebrews were in Egypt, and greatly oblige, An Earnest Enquirer, Bethany, Mo.

It is generally understood, we believe, that the 430 years mentioned by Paul (Gal. 3: 17) includes the whole period from the call of Abram, in Ur of Chaldea, to the giving of the law at Sinai. This would make the period of bondage in Egypt about half that period or 215 years.

On reading an editorial in your issue of the 13th inst. it occurred to me that there was an apparent discrepancy between the passage which you quoted from the Greek New Testament, Acts 7: 22, and Ex. 4: 10. Will you kindly reconcile or harmonize the same and thereby very much oblige,

C. J. Kimball.

The passage in Acts speaks of Moses as a man "mighty both in words and in deeds," whereas in Ex. 4: 10, he represents himself as "not eloquent," but "slow of speech and of a slow tongue." There is no reconciliation needed further than to remember that the most fluent speakers are not always those whose words are mightiest. A man "slow of speech," but of great wisdom and character, whose position is such as to give added force to his statements, will often in a few sentences make a deeper impression than the most eloquent oration delivered by one inferior in the qualities mentioned. Lincoln's short speech at Gettysburg made a vastly deeper impression on the country than the eloquent oration of Edward Everett. It is probable too, that Stephen referred to the writings of Moses rather than to his spoken words. It may also be mentioned that Moses' estimate of himself, at the beginning of his public career, would naturally be different from that of a historian looking back at his finished career and estimating its influence on the world.

This is rightly regarded as one of the obscurest and most difficult texts in the New Testament. The usual explanation is, that it refers to an ancient custom, not having divine sanction, of baptizing persons for their friends who died without baptism. In that case the argument is, if these persons are not to be raised from the dead why do you baptize for them? This is clear enough if there were sufficient proof of any such custom. Another explanation is, that persons were baptized for the dead in the sense of taking the places of those who died, filling up the broken ranks caused by martyrdom. Why do that, if the dead rise not? Still another view is that, as baptism, in the early church, represented a burial and resurrection from the dead, Paul asked the Corinthians why they baptized in respect to the resurrection of the dead, if the dead rise not. This was the view of the late Alexander Procter, and is set forth in his sermon on baptism in the forthcoming volume of sermons by him. The only difficulties in the way of this view, which otherwise meets the demands of the argument, are of a textual character. On the whole, the second view mentioned above seems the more natural, and to harmonize best with all the facts.

Character and the Kingdom

By EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES

The highest form of religion is that which exalts spiritual and ethical ideas above all others. It is here and there expressed in the Old Testament, and becomes the prevailing conception of religion in the teaching of Christ and the apostles. The prophet Micah reached the pure heart of religion, when in disgust with the ceremonies and sacrifices of Israel he said, "What does the Lord thy God require of thee but to love mercy and to do justice and to walk humbly with thy God?" Jesus expressed the essence of religion when he asserted that the two great commandments are love to God and love to man. These include all the law and the prophets. They reveal the kingdom of God as something inner and spiritual. No one finds it who looks for anything external, in space, or embodied in spectacular display before the vulgar senses, for behold, "the kingdom of God is within you." In the same way the apostle Paul grasped the deepest truth of religion when he declared the kingdom of God is righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit, and when he longed above all things else to see Christ formed anew in the heart of every man.

The great problem of the church to-day is to realize in its fullness this spiritual, ideal character in all its members. It is in reality a new ideal and it is constantly struggling to free itself from the older and lower forms of religion.

Religion has passed through two stages. The first is that of ritual, ceremony, or cult. There religion means the pouring out of libations, the offering of food to the deities in sacrifices and the dramatic representation of the deeds of the gods in elaborate ceremonies, such as the mysteries of the Greeks and the festivals of the Jews. At this stage religion consists of practices. It matters little what one thinks or believes or is in his heart. There can be no heresy in primitive religion, but there must be conformity to all the rites and practices.

The second stage is that of the religion of dogma or creed. It arises when men begin to reflect upon the meaning of their rites of worship. Belief in the creed is as essential here as conformity of practice in the first. A number of propositions concerning the nature of God, his relation to the world and to man, are formulated and laid down for acceptance by those who seek a religious life. The Mohammedan believes that there is one God and that Mohammed is his prophet. The Christian Church has been astonishingly prolific of various and minute formulations of the nature of God and human life, some one of which lies at the foundation of every denomination to-day.

But there is a third and highest form of religion toward which the human heart ever aspires and which becomes more powerful as intelligence and experience ripen in the race. This religion is based upon neither cult nor creed, but upon character. It is spiritual and ethical. It may employ rituals and statements of doctrine, but it subordinates these to spiritual ends. In fact, this is just the problem of the highest development of religion, how to maintain symbolism in worship and intellectual statements of faith in subservience to the real end of forming the highest type of moral character. The difficulty which the Christian world experiences to-day is that of rising out of its own dogmatism and mastering its creeds rather than being mastered by them. Only superficial observers look upon the breaking up of the creeds as the destruction of the church itself. Those who have been taught to identify Christianity with Calvinism may be excused perhaps for their inability to see anything promising or vital in the church. But to many leaders in all the denominations there is a confidence and eager expectation that a new day is dawning for religion through the rational and spiritual interpretation of Christianity. And the elements out of which this new movement is constructing itself are the deepest and purest elements in the teaching of the prophets, of Christ, and of the apostles. It is rapidly becoming clear that the kingdom of God is not meat and drink—not sacrifices and libations, nor even creeds and confessions, but righteousness and love and peace.

As we read the New Testament to-day we are more and more convinced that the kingdom of God is not a place, but a condition; and that it is a condition of mind and heart which cannot be purchased by deeds of the law, but can only be attained by an inner disposition and development. It was this insight which placed Jesus in such sharp contrast to the Pharisees. They restricted the kingdom to those who were legally righteous, to those who refrained from theft and adultery and murder. But Jesus proclaimed a heart righteousness. "Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven." The kingdom of God which could not be attained by the punctilious life of the Pharisees, lay within the grasp of the most miserable publican and of the little child. The kingdom of heaven belongs to the poor in spirit. That was the opening sentence of the sermon on the mount, and the whole discourse identifies the kingdom with spiritual qualities.

The condition of entrance into this kingdom—or rather of the entrance of this kingdom into man—is a receptive and teachable soul. That is the reason childhood had such a fascination for Jesus. It typified the first essential of salvation—an open, willing mind. It is the presence and development of these moral and spiritual qualities which afford the tests of discipleship. Nothing else enables us to know whether we ourselves or others are saved or belong to the true church of Christ.

The fact that any other tests of discipleship are prominent in the churches to-day is evidence of the degree to which the churches fail to realize the highest stage of Christ's spiritual religion. Any other way of trying to determine who are true Christians represents a lower conception of Christianity.

The signs are numerous to-day that the church is using the practical test of character-building more than ever in determining its preaching and its institutional life.

Preaching which devotes itself to elaborating the fine points in a legalistic Jewish scheme of salvation has a far-off and empty sound to modern ears. The arguments in behalf of the literal six days of creation, or the controversy concerning where Cain got his wife, or an elaborate discussion of the sacred numbers of the Bible, or of the beasts of the Apocalypse as typifying political or historical characters of our day—all these and many other subjects belong to a past generation to which the religion of the Bible was not so essentially ethical and spiritual as it seems to us to be. Those pulpits which persist in indoctrinating people into medieval conceptions of Christianity, have fewer people every year to indoctrinate. It seems pathetic to hear the laments of those pulpits over the degeneracy and infidelity of the times, but it is extremely fortunate for the world that they lose their following, and are forced either to change the message or give up their task.

With reference to its organizations and methods of work also, the church is supplying the searching test of spiritual utility. Perhaps it would be truer to say that the world applies it to the church. For there are some institutions which the world responds to and supports. In the long run those live and all others die.

This conception of the kingdom enables us also to judge the value of individual experience as well as that of the organizations and methods of the church. In the earlier stages of religion a man is constantly harassed by doubts of his salvation. He cannot determine whether he has sufficiently observed the laws laid down for him in the worship or ritual of the church. Perhaps he has not gone to church often enough, or paid enough money into its treasury, or possibly he has not been able to shut his mind to some doubt about the doctrines. If he is a sensible and humble man, he is apt to be tortured by the thought that he may fall short of an entrance to his reward; if he is confident and hopeful, he may become so sure of his acceptance with God that he is filled with pride and pharisaic censoriousness.

The view, however, which is growing clearer to the church is that God takes the will for the deed, where the will is normal, for there the act naturally accompanies it. The essential thing is to will to do his will, to hunger and thirst after righteousness, to open one's heart in humility and receptiveness like a little child. Then the fruit of the spirit will appear and that fruit is easily discerned. It is "love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance."

Whoever produces the fruit of the spirit in his discipleship to Christ, is acceptable to him, and is our brother. How that conviction clarifies one's vision of the kingdom of God and lifts one above the petty distinctions to which we sometimes cling in our thought of the church and of the people of God. When Jesus says, "By their fruit ye shall know them," is it reverent for me to say that you shall know his followers by their watchwords, by the length of their creed, by their outer acts and forms? No, the test of character is more certain in every case, for myself and for every other. And that standard has never been changed. The great commission of our Lord at the close of his ministry emphasizes it, for he exhorts his disciples to teach all the things they had received of him, and those things were almost exclusively concerning right service to God and man.

Pentecost was filled with the great moral and spiritual awakening to which his words gave rise. It was the beginning of a new spiritual regeneration, not the establishment of a new legalism. The missionary messages of Peter and Paul are filled with so pure and ethical a conception of God and of the church that they constantly opposed the petty tyrannies of ordinances and forms. The largeness of the kingdom which Paul preached is shown in its destruction of all the world—old differences of race and social and sex distinctions. And in the gospel of John, that disciple whom Jesus loved, there is the complete triumph of the ethical and spiritual doctrine of Christ over all the legalisms which cling to it in the other evangelists.

As the church has gone on from age to age it has ever met the recurrent tides of formalism with a clearer expression of the eternal truth that the kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness and peace and joy. It is this message for which our own times is yearning. Shall we not, as individuals, Christians, and as members of the one church of Christ, work and pray for the coming of that kingdom of truth and love?

Chicago, Ill.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

I am permitted to make the following extract from a private letter. The writer, speaking of Christian Science, says:

"The 'Cult,' as it is called, is being run down into the gutter just now and Dr. Tyler is dead set against it. Tell Dr. Tyler that I am surprised that he should write so sarcastically. His letters, in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, are acid and acrid. He needs to be converted! If one has the real, tender Christian spirit, he will be charitable toward all. There is good in Christian Science. We ought to acknowledge that and condemn only the errors."

A certain Scotchman expressed a desire to see himself as others saw him, believing that such an experience would free him from many a blunder and foolish notion!

"There is good in Christian Science." There is good in the Christian Apostolic Church. There is good in Mormonism. There is good in the Roman Catholic Church. There is good in Spiritualism. The doctrine of total depravity is not affirmed in this letter. No man is altogether bad. No institution is wholly corrupt.

Cures for the body are wrought by Christian Science. Physical health has come by visits to the sacred shrines of the Roman Catholic Church. John Alexander Dowie, of the Christian Catholic Church, has effected some wonderful cures. In answer to the prayers of the Rev. A. B. Simpson, the sick have been restored to health. Wonders have been wrought by Mormons. A woman whose arm was paralyzed was made whole by the word of Joseph Smith. Spiritualism does things that are inexplicable. Is this sufficiently charitable? There is no charity revealed in the foregoing sentences. The words here written are statements of facts. There is no more charity in them than there is in the statement of a proposition in mathematics.

Christian Science is not wholly good. Do you know of any incarnate thing that is? The Christian Church is not altogether good. The men and the women who compose the church are imperfect. The church was not perfect in New Testament times. The apostolic epistles are full of evidences of the imperfections of the churches of the first century. The church, upon the whole, is better now than it was then. If the doctrine of total depravity is not affirmed in this letter, neither is absolute moral perfection affirmed. Paul himself was not perfect in character. He said: "The good which I would I do not; but the evil which I would not, that I practice." He said also: "Not what I would, that do I practice; but what I hate, that I do." One alone was free from sin in thought, in affection, in word and deed. He alone can make the church a glorious church, "not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing." His gospel is absolutely true and good. The Christianity of the Christ is absolutely and eternally right.

There is no other kind of healing than divine healing. It is God who heals all diseases. He delivers the soul from death and the body from disease. The conditions on which he will save the soul are clearly expressed in his word. The conditions of bodily health are plainly set forth. Salvation is conditional. "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." "Work out your own salvation." "He who endures to the end the same shall be saved." "The gospel of Christ is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." Means are divinely ordained for the salvation of the soul. The blood of the Christ cleanses from all sin. But the blood of the Son of God cleanses those who believe on the Son and walk in the way of his commandments.

Is it wrong to use means for the cure of the body? Paul did not think so. He spoke of Dr. Luke as "the beloved physician." Christian Science does not speak of doctors in this way! Paul wrote to Timothy saying: "Be no longer a drinker of water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities." Jesus not only did not condemn the use of means for the restoration of physical health, but enjoined it. The good Samaritan found a man by the way beaten, bleeding, half dead. He bound up the wounds of the poor man, he poured into the wounds oil and wine. He carried him to an inn and cared for him through the night. On his departure the next day he arranged for the continued care of the unfortunate man. After Jesus told this story he said: "Go and do thou likewise." Is not here a divine warrant for the practice of medicine? It is safe to follow the teaching of the Master. It is unsafe to follow any other. Is this statement uncharitable? Then the writers of the New Testament were uncharitable. Luke represents Simon Peter as saying that there is salvation only in Christ, and Paul, in one of his undisputed epistles, pronounces a terrible anathema on the man who will preach any other gospel than the message which he proclaimed. Was Paul uncharitable?

In the study of any "fad," "cult," or modern teaching, if you have time and inclination for such exercise, the following plan is suggested: First, find out what the "fad," "cult," doctrine, affirms. Having ascertained its affirmations write down, in the second place, the things that are certainly true, then the affirmations as to the correctness of which you are in doubt, and finally, the propositions that are, from your point of view, absolutely, unqualifiedly false. Now the way is open for intelligent investigation.

Take Christian Science as an illustration. What does Christian Science affirm? What is there in Christian Science that is true and good? What are there in the affirmations of Christian Science that are doubtful? What does Christian Science affirm that is false?

I intended to say something about the doctrine of Christian Science in this letter, but have decided not to do so for the reason that I have not been able to discover what it affirms and what it denies. I thought of quoting the Rev. Mrs. Mary Baker Glover Patterson Eddy as saying that there is no such thing as sin, but when I spoke to one of her disciples on the subject he said that when "Mother" Eddy says there is no such thing as sin that is not at all what she means. What she meant to affirm, he said, was that sin will by and by be destroyed. Then I thought of saying that Christian Science denies the existence of pain. I had marked a passage written by Mrs. Eddy in which there is an explicit denial of the existence of pain, but my friend, a true Christian Scientist, said that is not what is meant. All that "Mother" Eddy means is that suffering will not endure forever. Sin will be vanquished; pain will cease. This is what "Mother" Eddy means when she affirms that evil is not, that pain does not exist. Then I determined to say that a fundamental negative tenet of this "cult" is—matter has no existence; the only real thing is spirit. When, however, I appealed to this disciple of Mrs. Eddy to know what her position is and the teaching of Christian Science is, on this point, quoting language which seemed to be transparently clear, I was told that this only means—matter is not eternal. Then I gave it up. Before, however, we extended to each other the parting hand I said in kindest tones: Why not use words belonging to the English language in their current signification? Why not? Then there was silence and thus, in sadness, we separated.

I have been defeated, but not discouraged. At least one more effort will be made to understand the fundamental postulates of Christian Science. Will some one who knows that he knows what they are write a letter to me, in United States English, and thus convey to me the desired information?

Denver, Col.

It has been well said that no man ever sank under the burden of the day. It is when to-morrow's burden is added to the burden of to-day that the weight is more than one can bear. God begs you to leave the future to him, and mind the present.

A BOX of BULBS By ORPHA B. HOBLIT.

There were ten of them, each one wrapped in tissue paper and packed carefully into a brown pasteboard box. A very neat parcel it made, tied with red cord, the stamps set on squarely and the address written plainly across the top.

"It is like him," thought Caroline Edwards, as she laid aside the note that had accompanied the package. "It is like him to remember, amid all his cares, to send me a greeting on my birthday. This is like him, too," studying the neat handwriting of the address, "just his precise, methodical way."

She took up the scissors to cut the string, then laid them down again with a little smile. "He would not cut it. Let me imitate the dear man's good qualities for once." So she patiently untied the cord and rolled it up before removing the lid. She loosened the papers, looking with delight at the smooth bulbs that lay within and softly touching them.

Her thoughts flew back through the years. She was no longer Miss Edwards, the bookkeeper at Brown & Little's, but a child again in a garden in the early April time. The grape-vines hung leafless on the trellis along the fence; the branches of the apple trees were bare; heaps of dead leaves lay in the corners and the ghosts of past flower-stalks and of encroaching weeds stood here and there in the brown earth beds, the sunshine was warm, the sky a new-washed blue, but the wind still swept over the garden with a trace of departing winter in its breath. She saw herself, a slender slip of a girl, standing beside the sheltered flower-bed, already gay with yellow daffodils and delicate crocus blossoms. She felt again the rapture with which she had bent above them, as they stood nodding on their slender green stems in the chill air, and their gay bravery thrilled her once more.

With a new light in her face she slowly replaced the bulbs in the box, murmuring under her breath: "Daffodils, that come before the swallow dares, and take the winds of March with beauty."

She went out to her work. Her heart, against which the little note lay all day long, was cheered and warmed. The weary look, habitual to her face, was replaced by one of patient courage. "The time is long," she said to herself, as she closed the great ledgers in the evening, "but it does not matter. Nothing matters since he cares."

It was early evening. On her knees in the short grass, she was filling some flower pots with earth from the flower beds. She made a pretty picture. The black lace scarf which she had tied over her head, had fallen to her shoulders and the sunset light fell softly on her red-brown hair. The evening wind had stung her cheeks to a glow and her lips were parted in a thoughtful smile, as she crumbled the brown lumps between her white fingers, delighting in the coolness and the old familiar earthy smell. A very pretty picture.

So thought the ancient captain, standing on the front gallery rolling a cigarette. As as rule, the captain disapproved of women who worked for a living—a marked disapproval in this case, for the bookkeeper not only worked, but had "opinions," having been known to talk politics and in a strain quite contrary to the captain's own views.

"Such a pity," he grumbled now, as he watched her, "that she didn't stay at home and cultivate a sweet disposition as every woman should."

The next moment he was standing beside her, bowing with true Virginia grace. "Let me help you, Miss Caroline."

She looked up surprised, hesitated a moment, then said cordially, "Thank you, Captain Rawson, I shall be very glad. It has been so long since I worked with plants that I have almost forgotten how, and I am very anxious that these shall grow well."

"Well!" thought the captain, "She isn't so different from other women after all. Likes flowers, at least, in spite of her notions."

Down on his knees, in spite of his rheumatism, he went and in the half hour spent over the work, they talked of flowers, and almost unconsciously, she found herself telling him of her old home, and of a free, wild childhood, spent among the fields and woods of an Ohio farm. Politics was forgotten and the captain was charmed.

He helped her carry the plants in, and parting with her at the door, said, "Keep them in the dark, Miss Caroline, for a time. The roots should grow and fill the pots before you bring them out to the sunlight. They bloom the better for a little waiting."

He never understood why she thanked him so radiantly, but he liked it nevertheless, and that evening at the table she found a spray of rosebuds from the captain's own bush beside her plate. Then and there was a truce declared, which soon became a treaty of peace and friendship.

"They bloom the better for a little waiting," thought the bookkeeper, as she set the earth-filled pots in a dark closet. Many a time she repeated it, as she went daily to look at the plants and to water them.

Other letters came to her now, thick envelopes, bearing foreign stamps, and the light and gladness in her face grew daily brighter. The loneliness seemed to melt from her heart, the coldness from her manner, and on the day when she set the row of plants in the window of her sitting-room, the captain, on the gallery below, heard her singing.

Days and weeks passed. Green leaves peeped forth from the earth in the flower-pots, and pushed their way higher and higher in the light of the sunny window. The plants seemed to vie with one another in their growth. They drank eagerly of the water, the sunshine, the soft southern air, and one day, the fat hyacinth at the end of the row nodded importantly at his fellows. The creamy petals of a blossom were beginning to show among his green leaves.

The time was long and the work was hard, and sometimes the old sad look crept into Caroline Edwards's face as she stood at her high desk in the office. When she came home, however, and sat by her window, hope came again and comfort, as she faithfully tended her plants.

"It is so long," she said, "but he surely cares."

It was Easter morning. One by one the flower stalks had risen and now they stood high above the leaves, a glory of white and pink and delicate yellow blossom, and in the center towered a cluster of great cool lilies, with petals of dazzling whiteness and hearts all sunshine. The whole room was full of sweetness.

"How beautiful they are!" said their owner, bending above them. "How I love them!" She broke off one of the lilies and pinned it at her throat. "They have taught me so much. Surely I should share my gifts and they shall be my offering."

A small hospital ward, a few hours later, was full of fragrance. Beside each bed stood a blooming plant and grateful eyes followed the giver as she passed here and there with sympathetic smiles and quiet words of encouragement.

In her room once more as she stood beside her vacant window, she could not help a feeling of regret. It seemed as if some familiar presence had gone from the room and she turned away with a sigh that changed to a cry of surprise and joy, for before her stood the friend of her youth—a man no longer young. The hair above his forehead was streaked with grey, but his strong, kindly face was flooded with all the ardor of young manhood and his clear eyes were full of love as, with never a word, he took her in his arms and on his faithful heart she sobbed away all the loneliness and the longing of the years.

The lily fell unheeded to the floor. "We brought her hope and comfort," it might have said. "We taught her forgiveness and patience and the joy of unselfish giving. Through us she learned to trust. It is quite enough."

New York Letter.

By S. T. Willis.

Perhaps no place in the country witnesses the old-time fervor and methods of the Methodist camp-meetings of fifty years ago like the Sing Sing camp-meeting, which has just closed its annual sessions at this place. The meetings continue ten days and increase in enthusiasm from the beginning. There is little preaching worthy of the name, but this lack is made up in shouting, singing and "testimonies." The daily program consists of ten or eleven services, including a little of almost everything—for there is variety in great abundance. "Children's Day" and "Old Folks' Day" are the two most special features of the series. "Love feasts" are interspersed at frequent intervals with many impromptu prayer-meetings and praise services on the lawns and in the tents. The climax of enthusiasm is reached in the closing meeting when the people "march around Zine"—marching over the grounds singing hymns and shouting praises. It is difficult to appreciate the extent of ignorance concerning the way of salvation taught in the gospel, until one attends such meetings as these for ten days. Seldom is the Bible referred to as authority, but "feeling," "experience," "I believe," constitutes final authority among this people. Sinners seeking salvation are told to bow at the anxious seat while the ministers pray for them, that the Lord will accept and speak pardon to them while they kneel. Not only is ignorance displayed, but things are said and done that shock the religious sensibilities of those who are used to quiet, orderly worship.

Dr. George T. Purves, of the Fifth Ave. Presbyterian Church, recently preached on "The Value of Christianity," in which he said: "Christianity is a treasure in comparison with which the pageantry and pomp of the world is as valueless as glittering tinsel by the side of a mountain of pure gold. The exceeding great value of Christianity is seen in its promise to give to every penitent sinner the assurance of immediate and complete salvation. It also secures peace of conscience and rest of mind. Further, the foundation is laid for a renewed life by the reconciliation of the soul with God. And still further it introduces us into the only true life—life which has God for its standard, eternity for its horizon, spiritual realities for the objects of its pursuit, and love for the law of its being. Christ gives us this life abundantly, and only in him does the spirit of man find the sphere in which he was meant to exist. This life manifests itself in gradual triumph over sins, the removal of faults of character, purified relations with his fellow men, and finally in victory over death. Christ has brought to us the assurance of immortality, the sweet expectation of the Father's welcome. Let Christ once be fully known and no treasure will seem so priceless, no gift to mankind worth so much."

The "Straight Edge People" of New York is a new social order, small but growing, who take the Golden Rule as the basis of their society. The object of the school is to practice communism, though they object to the application of this name. They have a small school of methods for the application of Jesus' teachings to business and society, the members of which have all interests in common—all their earnings go into a common fund, and no member makes or loses more than another. Mr. Copeland, the manager, says they hold that every dollar a man owns is a debt which he owes to society. Mr. Carnegie's and Mr. Rockefeller's wealth belongs not to them but to the community at large. Talking, thinking and writing, he says, are three forms of dissipation under the spell of which the human race has frittered away its heritage of power and neglected the opportunities which Jesus pointed out. There is no heresy but the heresy of talking, thinking and writing, however correctly and beautifully, and then neglecting to apply the law of love to human activities. If a man says he loves God and does not prove it by loving acts to his neighbors—even his poorly dressed and disagreeable neighbors—"he is a liar and the truth is not in him." This society is carrying on several kinds of work which seems to be prospering, and the number of its membership is increasing.

Prof. Felix Adler, lecturer to the New York Society of Ethical Culture, himself a Hebrew, said in a recent lecture on "The Founders of Religion," that the world is indebted to the Jews for the idea of monotheism. He asserts that God—a living God, infinite and not bound to anything—was first discovered by the Hebrews. In order to study a religion one must study the character of the people among whom it originated or was invented. The monotheistic idea is the outcome of certain characteristics of the Hebrew people. The metaphors people use to express things are very significant. The Hebrew word for irreligion was "harlotry," which shows that the dominant trait of their religion was purity. As a further proof of this is the fact that the marriage relation was used to picture devotion to religion. The second trait in the God of the Hebrews was justice, which they reached through purity; the Romans reached justice through power, balanced with equal power. Justice and mercy among the Jews blended into one. The Hebrews felt within them an impulse to holiness, purity and virtue so strongly that they concluded there must be something outside communicating this impulse to them—that outside force they called God. They say that God is, because they feel the oughtness of duty. Surely Prof. Adler must be a wonderfully superior man to find out that all the Old Testament writers were mistaken in the thought that the Lord Jehovah communicated his will to them. For they all claim that God did reveal his thought to them in no uncertain form. Why should men doubt the fact of revelation? God hath spoken unto the fathers through the prophets and unto us through his Son. Let us hear and obey him.

Fresh From Minneapolis

By I. J. SPENCER

President of the American Christian Missionary Society

I had the pleasure of sojourning in Minneapolis for five days recently, looking over the convention city and conferring with the executive committee having charge of the local arrangements for the October national gathering. The weather was ideal. Mrs. Spencer accompanied me and greatly enjoyed the beautiful city, the wide-awake church on Portland Avenue and the delightful hospitality of the brethren. I occupied Bro. Tanner's pulpit on Sunday, speaking in the morning on "Christ our Life" and at night on "Unity in Christ."

Dr. David O. Thomas, chairman of the local executive committee, and a highly esteemed elder in the church, announced that on Monday evening Bro. and Sister Spencer would be taken on a trolley ride through the twin cities by the young people, and that on Tuesday they would be entertained by the church at a picnic and excursion on lake Minnetonka. The latter excursion was attended by thirty or more active Christian workers. Daily carriage rides about the beautiful city, to the numerous lakes and attractive parks, including Minnehaha Falls, and visits to the mammoth mills, and a thorough examination of the magnificent exposition hall where the convention will be held—these items along with the dinings, conferences and religious services—filled to the brim the happy five days of our stay.

It will be interesting to know that the local committee is thoroughly consecrated to its great task and has attracted the admiration of the press, the commercial club, the railroad managers and the churches, and is securing their hearty co-operation. The largest daily newspapers in the city interviewed me and published statements of our position as a religious people. The executive committee consists of Dr. D. O. Thomas, George F. Halbeth, an indefatigable lawyer, formerly from Kentucky, and M. R. Waters, a highly reputable and successful insurance and loan agent, son of a preacher and an honor to his sire.

The Portland Avenue Church of Christ is thoroughly aroused and enlisted in preparing for the coming convention. C. J. Tanner, the beloved minister, was absent at Akron, O., but left the work in able hands during his brief vacation. Dr. Thomas was deeply concerned about an efficient supply of preachers for one hundred and fifty pulpits in Minneapolis and St. Paul on Sunday, October 13. That date was so deeply impressed on the doctor's mind that in making the announcements for August he unconsciously said "October 13."

As to the hall in which the sessions of the convention are to be held, I take pleasure in saying it is pre-eminently adapted to the use of conventions. It will seat, as now arranged, about 5,000 persons, but can be made to seat 10,000. In either case a child speaking in a low, distinct voice can be easily heard. Dr. Thomas standing on the stage spoke in a whisper and I found it easy to hear him in the most distant part of the auditorium. I then asked him to recite some Welsh poetry, which he rendered to my entire satisfaction. It may be said, therefore, that in any part of the building you can hear even a Welsh whisper uttered on the stage! The foreign society will rejoice at that, and even the Christian Woman's Board of Missions need not plan to hold its sessions in any other place.

For the purpose of putting the building into good condition for the convention, the commercial club will expend $1,200.

Street car lines run near the hall and accommodations will be ample for all who desire them.

The restaurant arrangements are to receive the careful attention of the committee. Lodging and breakfast can be had for 75c, $1.00 or $1.25 by those not wishing to pay more.

I overheard two shoe-shiners talking about a friend of theirs who had said he now indulged in fifteen-cent dinners. One said: "I used to get fifteen-cent dinners, but now I gets ten-cent meals. Dere's no bird dat sails so high dat it don't have to come down to de ground to eat."

The Minneapolis committee and the Portland Avenue church deserve great praise and success. They are spending money freely for the convention, and all look forward with the bright hope that the great convention will impress deeply their community with the simplicity, scripturalness and power of the divine plea for the unity of believers on Christ as the only and all-sufficient foundation. The committee deserves and is expecting a great convention. The railroads have made flattering concessions. The northwest will be beautiful in October. It is next to a liberal education to attend one of these great conventions.

Lexington, Ky.

An Invitation from a Minneapolis Young Lady.

By Prudence P. Faddis.

There is much preliminary work being done in preparation for the First Twentieth Century Missionary Convention. The people of the Minneapolis church begin to realize the great amount of work necessary to make the convention the success that it is bound to be. The working force is thoroughly organized and each committee is maturing plans and making provisions for carrying them out as rapidly and effectually as possible.

The Committees on Transportation and Advertising have already done a great amount of work and achieved splendid results. When final announcements are made no one but the initiated realizes the labor it has taken to accomplish a result told in so few words. Only those behind the scenes know the amount of talking, letter writing and traveling it took to secure the good rate granted by the Western and Central Passenger Associations. With rates so satisfactorily arranged, other difficult problems can now be met and brought to a like successful termination.

Many states are already well canvassed and organized for large excursions. It is recommended strongly that from all parts of our great country containing Disciples, delegates strive to come in companies. There is much enthusiasm in numbers and there is in the human heart that which responds to the influence of the many around us—we want to do what others want to do. If in every community some energetic, loving-hearted Disciple can begin now to talk convention and plan convention, the number of those who want to attend will increase hourly. The first thing necessary in order to get people to come is to get them to want to come. And many when they find how much they really want to come will begin to cast about for ways and means to accomplish that desire. If this work is wisely, carefully and prayerfully done in every congregation in the land there will be thousands in Minneapolis in October who, if left to themselves, would not have thought it possible to attend. It is surprising how many things we all do that we really want to do. But we must many times make a choice. It is "this or that," not "this and that." We can afford to do the thing or have the thing that appeals most strongly to our inner self. It may be possible to so present the attractions of the trip to Minneapolis that many will be willing to give up other things for the sake of coming. I can imagine sisters wearing the same hat two seasons rather than miss it. If only one trip can be taken in the year let this be the trip.

Brethren, see to it that you do not lose the great good and inspiration that can come to you either from your own attendance or from the attendance of others of your congregation, from neglecting to talk convention in season and out of season. Let it be the most interesting topic of conversation for the summer in every congregation in the country. Don't be afraid of getting too enthusiastic. Let all those who make it a part of their yearly program to attend not fail to come as usual this year, even if it is a little farther from home, and let those who never have enjoyed one of our National Conventions begin the new century by coming. You cannot estimate the good it will do you. Plan to come. Get ready. Then if events turn out to make it impossible for all to come who plan, no harm will be done.

The untiring energy and wonderful zeal of our Advertising Committee has done marvels in the way of distributing material to bring the city and its advantages before the people. Quantities of reading matter have already gone to all parts of the country and there is much more to go. If there is a Disciple in the world who does not know that the First Twentieth Century Missionary Convention is to be held in Minneapolis in October, and does not feel a responsive throb of desire to be there and partake of its joys and benefits, it certainly will not be the fault of the local Advertising Committee.

Come, whatever may first set your pulse throbbing in the direction of Minneapolis. If the missionary zeal be not so strong in your heart as it might be, come and have it strengthened. Even if you do at first feel only the deep yearnings for our delightful October climate, for the beautiful lakes surrounding our city, or the marvelous sights of prosperity of the northwest, come just the same. These drawings can do you no harm and the attractive program and great gatherings of noble, consecrated people cannot fail to send you away a better Christian than you came. There will be time and space for all desires of the soul to be satisfied.

The convention is certain to be a big one and a great one. The notes are all of encouragement and none of discouragement. Minneapolis, Minn.

The Old Book In The New Crucible

By J. J. HALEY.

II. The Crucible of Science.

In the meantime the old and now obsolete debate on the Mosaic cosmogony was proceeding apace. The controversy over the alleged discrepancies between Genesis and geology grew out of a misinterpretation of Genesis and an exaggeration of the facts of geology. The allegation that God's revelation in the rocks contradicted the supposed revelation of Genesis, was based upon the orthodox belief that the creation days were six ordinary days of twenty-four hours each, and that these included the original creative fiat, the bringing of the earth to its present condition, and the culmination of the whole creative process in the literal rest of the Almighty on the seventh day. At first there seemed to be a conflict, and skeptical scientists everywhere assumed that the Bible had been discredited, and theologians helped them to this conclusion by stoutly affirming that the new science, if true, would overthrow the word of God. After the smoke of the first conflict had cleared, it was seen that the extreme conclusions drawn from geological data were hardly justified by the facts, and that Genesis had been misinterpreted. Both theologians and scientists were able to meet on common ground when it was understood that the days of creation were creative epochs of indefinite length divided by seven, and that Genesis was more in the nature of a religious poem than a scientific treatise. The numerous volumes that teemed from the press to reconcile Genesis and geology, or to show that no such reconciliation was possible, had only the effect of demonstrating in the end that there was nothing to reconcile. Preachers and professors who lecture on Genesis and geology as a present day problem are threshing old straw, and again illustrating the already familiar fact that the hardest things in the world to reconcile are ignorance and knowledge.

The protracted struggle on evolution as related to these early chapters of the Bible is likely to end in the same way as the Genesis-geology episode. There are a few infidel scientists who believe that the scientific notion of evolution renders impossible of rational belief the biblical doctrine of creation, and there are irreconcilable theologues who believe that evolution is a contradiction of creation, and denounce all evolutionists as infidels out and out. But the moderate majority on both sides have long since found a modus vivendi in the conviction that evolution is not the contradictory, but the method, of creation, "God's way of doing things" as John Fiske expresses it; and it is now believed that Genesis itself contains indications that the creative fiat of the beginning was followed a long process of evolution that brought the world to its present condition. The New York Weekly Witness, two or three years ago, in taking emphatic exception to a discourse of Dr. Talmage, in which he denounces evolution as rank infidelity and all evolutionists as infidels, makes this suggestive point:

"The very form of words used in speaking of the origin of life shows that it was produced by evolution and not by direct creation. 'And God said, Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb, and fruit tree. And said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life and fowl that may fly above the earth. And God said, Let the earth bring forth the living creature after his kind, cattle and creeping things and beasts of the earth.' The Bible does not tell us by what process the earth brought forth vegetation, and the waters brought forth fish and fowl, and the earth brought forth animals. It does not tell us whether these different results of evolution were brought about quite independently of each other, or as steps in an ascending scale, one leading to the other. But it does show that the lower forms of life were just produced and the higher forms of life later, and this seems to give some support to the theory of the evolutionist that the higher forms were evolved out of the lower forms. Whether this was the case or not is a purely scientific question, which, if decided at all, must be decided by scientific research. Instead, therefore, of quarreling with the scientists because of their efforts to discover it, Christians should watch these efforts with interest, assured that every real discovery made by science will only throw fresh light on the Bible and add to the glory of the God of the Bible."

If, however, we suppose the scientific conception to be in conflict with the biblical doctrine of creation, it is quite as rational to believe that man came direct from the hand of God, according to a literal interpretation of Genesis, as to believe that he was evolved from a protoplasmic germ that escaped the wreck of primeval chaos, according to science; especially if we do not forget that evolution, though highly probable as a fact, is a scientific hypothesis and by no means a scientific demonstration at the present stage of the inquiry.

All that a rational science can postulate or demand is that a spiritual revelation, coming to us in the form of history and literature, shall leave open the field and nowhere cross the line of the natural sciences. This it does, and more than does, and it is one of the extraordinary facts about the Bible that goes far towards the proof of its inspiration. The series of books that stretch over a thousand years in composition, making up the canonical library known as the Bible, were all written in an unscientific age, by men who had only ethical and spiritual ends in view. Nature two or three thousand years ago was practically a sealed book. Men had scarcely done more than make out its title page. Science, which has taught us so much of the facts and phenomena of the world, was unknown to the men of those early times. Books which have come down to us from the period in which the Bible was composed literally bristle with errors in matters of science. In the universal and almost total ignorance of scientific questions it was impossible for the best informed men to write a chapter without committing gross blunders in regard to the facts of nature as they are now understood. Let us note an illustration or two on this point. Hesiod in his description of the earth's position between heaven and Tartarus, says:

"From the high heavens a brazen anvil cast, Nine days and nights in rapid whirls would last,
And reach the earth the tenth, whence strongly hurled
The same the passage to the infernal world."

This statement, unless poetically interpreted, would strike a modern astronomer as a piece of childish absurdity, since it is known to him that for a body to fall even from the sun would require no less than sixty-four days and a half; and from the fixed stars, instead of nine days, as asserted by the Greek author, it would require more than forty-two millions of days. Again: Herodotus gives an account of a naval expedition sent out by the government of Egypt. The expedition went along the western coast of Africa and returned after the lapse of three years. In the official report of that expedition it was stated that they had reached a point where their shadows at noon fell toward the south. This statement conflicted with the science of that time and Herodotus pronounces the whole report unworthy of confidence. These illustrations show us how much, or rather how little, was known of astronomy and physical science in the days of Hesiod and Herodotus. If we found such unscientific and immature statements in the Bible put forth as established facts, I do not say that our faith in its spiritual revelation would be at an end, but a serious difficulty would be created, and the enemies of the book would have occasion to speak reproachfully. The Bible was written in an age when a false cosmogony and a false science were everywhere received, and if its writers had not been guided by a higher power than their own unaided faculties and the limited knowledge available to them at the time, they surely would have betrayed, in many things, an ignorance of physical truth that would bring their work into disrepute, as the laws of nature were developed and understood. But there is not clearly such an instance on record. Here we have on the negative side a scientific and literary phenomenon the most extraordinary the world has witnessed. We have not only poets and kings and sacred philosophers, but shepherds, herdsmen, agriculturists, illiterate fishermen, tent-makers, rustics and plebeians, writing over a period of at least a thousand years, in times of universal ignorance of material science, without a mistake in their numberless allusions to nature, while the books of their uninspired contemporaries bristle on almost every page with such errors. If this is a fact it must be clear to the most unreflecting mind that it is a sheer impossibility for such a thing to happen without the guidance of inspiration in a degree not vouchsafed to ordinary men.

Our Missionary Activity in the Twentieth Century.

By W. J. Russell.

Missionary work was the crowning glory of the nineteenth century. In the work that was accomplished the Disciples of Christ had no small part. We are now face to face with the new century, and as a people we need a new vision and revelation, both of our opportunity and our responsibility. Among the things that should inspire us to greater activity in all of our missionary operations are the following:

The World's Need.

There are still a thousand millions of the inhabitants of the world who are thus far unreached or neglected. Whole nations have, as yet, not heard of the gospel, among which could be named Annam with a population of 30,000,000, Afghanistan with a population of 8,000,000, Thibet, Mongolia and Arabia, and the Soudan with a population of 100,000,000. Less than five per cent. of the population of India, which is about 287,000,000, are Christians, less than one per cent. of the 400,000,000 of China, and less than three per cent. of the 200,000,000 of Africa. In our own beloved land there are many to be evangelized. It is here that more than $1,000,000,000 is spent annually for strong drink; where more money is spent in thirty days for strong drink than has been paid for missions in the past fifty years; and where 150,000 die annually from the effects of intoxicating drinks. When the world's great need of the gospel is understood and felt by God's people there will be greater individual effort toward the world's conquest for Jesus, our divine Lord and Master. From a united chorus will be heard these words:

"'Tis ours to make earth's desert glad,
In its Eden greenness clad;
Ours to work as well as play,
Clearing thorny wrongs away;
Plucking up the weeds of sin,
Letting heaven's warm sunlight in;
Standing on the hills of faith,
Listening what the spirit saith;

Catching gleams of temple spires,
Listening to the angel choirs;
Like the seer on Patmos gazing
On the glory downward blazing;
Till upon earth's grateful sod Rests the city of our God."

The Command of Jesus.

His command is "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." The marching orders of the great king have no uncertain sound. The church must be aggressive. It must move upon the nations. The Lord seeks universal empire, and sends forth his army to conquer the world. Shall we heed his word? If he had said "go into all Michigan" or "all Ohio" or "all Indiana" or "all the United States," there might be some justification of our neglect or hostility to the foreign work. But his language is far broader than that. "All nations," "all the world," "the uttermost part of the earth," "every creature," show that he aimed at nothing short of world-wide evangelism. And he who to-day puts himself in opposition to the accomplishment of this great aim is guilty of disloyalty to Jesus Christ and to his great commission.

The Wealth of the Church.

There can be no apology for any lack of ample gifts to the cause of missions. The church can no longer say, like Peter, "Silver and gold have I none." Of the wealth of the world a very large proportion is in the hands of Christian people. What mighty achievements could be won for Christ if this money were consecrated to the cause of Christ. That day, when the wealth in the hands of Christian people shall become consecrated to Christ, will be the morning, so to speak, of the new creation. Is it not time for that day to dawn? Behold the mission fields, already white and golden for the harvest. Money is necessary to send forth laborers who can thrust in the blade and gather the ripe golden sheaves. Money is the great moving "power behind the throne." It is God-given—we are his stewards, and must render an account of our stewardship. And is it not reasonable that our responsibility is commensurate with the wealth, power, Christian civilization we enjoy, the age in which we live and the opportunity presented? Where much is given, much will be required. Sin is a reproach to any people, and more so if that sin should rest on selfishness and be characterized by base ingratitude. Therefore, let us give liberally of our means for the spread of the gospel of Christ. Paul says: "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." And what is the spirit of Christ? Listen: "I came not to do mine own will. The Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister." We need more of the Christ spirit, which is the spirit of self-denial. This is the very pith and marrow of the matter. Those who receive Christ into the heart will be impelled to give. Impelled, not compelled, for they are constrained by the love of Christ.

The World's Readiness for the Gospel.

The whole world is open and accessible physically, geographically, politically, to the gospel messengers. There is but one voice bearing testimony to this fact. The church, too, is becoming aroused. And if the church is able, and she knows her ability, and the world is ready to receive the gospel message, what wait we for? The situation makes the world's evangelization an imperative duty, which the membership of our churches can not disregard without infinite peril to themselves, to their congregations and to the world.

"The light is breaking through, the light,
The promised morning, gloweth,
When God his message and his might
To every people showeth;
His heralds spreading far and wide
The message of salvation,
And drawing thousands to his side
From every land and nation.

"The isles that longed his light to see
Are now in hope rejoicing;
Before him now they bend the knee,
And praises glad are voicing.
The gospel themes they love to sing—
Christ's life, his cross and glory—
And contrite hearts with prayer they bring,
To hear his gracious story.

"Like doves that to their windows fly
The world to Christ is tending;
The sovereignty of the Most High
Is everywhere extending.
From north and south, from east and west
A stream to Zion floweth,
And nations from afar are blest
With gifts which it bestoweth."

The Restoration of Primitive Christianity.

The hand of God has been in our religious movement from the beginning, solving the problem of unity on the original basis and constitution of the church. Our mission is an important one and the plea we present is the grandest one under heaven. It is adapted to the wants of a divided Christendom. There is a moving away from old standards. Old beliefs and old themes are boldly challenged. Men are claiming the right to think for themselves. The spirit of inquiry is abroad. That which harmonizes with the truest rationality is most readily accepted. And here is the strength of our plea. It captivates, it wins. The people are susceptible to the molding influences of these grand principles. It is our duty to present these principles to others. Having come into possession of the truth, shall we withhold it from others? Great is the responsibility resting upon us! May God help us in this, the greatest of all centuries, to come up to the full measure of our obligation.

We need to be in earnest if we would impress others. It is "out of the heart that the mouth speaketh," and power to impress others is given only to those who do so with a full heart, and who are consumed with a burning zeal for the salvation of souls. The "beauty of holiness" translated into the lives of men is the mightiest evangelistic force in the world. It is Christ's life once more incarnated—the gospel in deeds rather than in mere words. This is the life the world is longing for. The bitter curse of Meroz will be pronounced upon us if we do not "come up to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty." We are playing at missions, because we have not given ourselves wholly to Christ. Are we ready to be used? "Lord Jesus, take me and all that I have, and use the gift for thy honor and glory in the world's evangelization." Is that our prayer? If so, we shall meet in convention at Minneapolis in October, and be ready to plan for larger things that will call out many new forces in assisting to inaugurate a movement that will result in the immediate subjugation of the world to Christ.

Evident Signs of A Great Awakening

By ROBERT L. WILSON.

That there are evident signs of progress no one can doubt. The new century is starting with a dash that is surprising even to the most sanguine. One hundred years ago all of Europe was being deluged in blood, and it was a question if the plucky little Corsican would not head a new and universal empire. Such was not to be. The clear-headed and progressive Anglo-Saxon won the day, and if the signs of the times are to interpret manifest destiny the world powers are now within his grasp.

It was about the beginning of the seventh century that Christianity was introduced among the Teutons, who, only a century before, had invaded Great Britain and established a permanent abode. These sturdy people soon caught the aggressive spirit and made Christianity mean far more to the world than those people who introduced it among them have ever been able to make it mean.

The Progressive Spirit.

Take any good history, true to facts, and observe the elements that have been prominent in this progress. It has been an inductive rather than a deductive process. The nations that have come and gone, that have played no small part in the world's dramatic tragedy, have assumed certain scholastic statements to be true and upon these postulates have worked and wrought their creeds, founded their ethical and political systems and built their civilizations. They never even dreamed that progress is possible except by following the traditions of the fathers. Like the haughty Scribes and Pharisees in the time of Jesus, they have observed the letter and quenched the spirit, with the inevitable result of being crushed under the heel of the stronger and more progressive peoples. The inductive method has sought for the truth and has no hesitancy in casting overboard anything not for the good of the common weal.

Conscience Discovered.

With that breath of living air blown into time by the French Revolution, all christendom seemed to stir and stretch and spring to its feet for a new day of endeavor. It was that dreadful carnage that forever fixed the fact that man had discovered himself, and in himself a conscience. Democracy was at once abroad in the world and thus began an era of individual activity. Men began to see that each individual should count for one and that he had personal, political and religious rights that should be respected and protected; that no one man should tally as the representative of submerged thousands; that these thousands should not tally as a lump sum, or as so many cattle in the eyes of some lord or master bent on appropriation.

With the discovery of a personal conscience has come the discovery of a social conscience, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." No one will say that this is but little more than a long looked for ideal as it applies to our strenuous modern society. It will suffice to say that in the minds of many good people it is a possible reality and there are strivings toward that personal state that will make it such. It may be counted as a most redeeming virtue that the present ideal is so high, for the ideal one would wish must always precede the reality.

From Pentecost down, the church has taught the need of personal salvation. The church is the conservator of the gospel; but we, upon whom rests the authority to preach it to all mankind, are too conservative. We are breaking the alabaster box of precious ointment upon our own heads. There is need of social regeneration. To preach the gospel of divine Fatherhood is but one half of Christ's gospel, for he taught the gospel of human brotherhood, and this is the law of organic, normal society, and in these principles we have the gospel of the kingdom.

Old Methods Relegated.

In the business world it is often quite expensive to inaugurate new methods. But to pursue old methods means death. It is not a question of cost, but a question of life. Observe with what keenness a successful merchant notes a new method. He prides himself in being the first to adopt it. It makes competition agreeable and easy. Strange to say, a failure to adopt new and progressive methods has tended steadily to decrease the number of business enterprises and trustify them under a few heads. The milling industry serves as an example. The picturesque, old-fashioned neighborhood mill of our childhood days is now a thing of the past. According to the Millers' Directory there were in our country in 1884, about 22,940 mills. Two years later they had decreased to 16,855. The railways serve as another good illustration. Within the past five months all the important lines of railway have passed under the control of not more than five syndicates, each syndicate taking the name of some Napoleon of finance. These five syndicates now control 79,887 miles of the entire railway mileage of our country, the largest being 17,427 and the smallest, 14,158 miles. These systems are so grouped together into a "community of interests" as to make them for all practical and earning purposes under one management.

Positively, one cannot know what is to take place so much as a day in the future, for each new day brings its surprises. Steam is already falling into the rear rank and a recent writer ventures the assertion that "within fifty years the steam locomotive will be a curiosity in many sections of the country, to be found only in museums."

Electricity, that subtle wizard force, is to take the day. It is not unreasonable to suppose that the "greater lies before," and that the electrical inventions near at hand will not only equal those of Morse, Edison, Bell, Tesla and Sprague, but excel them. More power in Niagara is wasted each day than it would take to drive every machine on the American continent. The question is not to produce a current of electricity strong enough to do this, but a method of practical utility by which it may be carried to the desired place. It is method to save wastage of energy that confronts the electrician and ere these lines have passed under the cylinder of the printing press and out into the world it may be solved. Who knows?

This is precisely the problem that confronts the church. So many methods now in vogue are a waste of energy, a positive source of harm, because they are not the best. The church should be first to adopt a new and wise method, but not the last to let go of one that has passed the dead line. Are we not conscious of a new awakening? The command is as a voice out of a cloud, "Awake, arise, shine forth in the beauty of thy righteousness. Be not faithless but believing." Our duty is plain. Only remember,

"No great deed is done
By falterers who ask for certainty."

The Church and the Masses.

Not every one who has posed as a social reformer and a critic of the methods of the church in the regeneration of the race is justly entitled to distinction. They are not in position to criticise and their unwise caricatures are often a source of great harm. The last half decade has been especially prolific in the production of those who are able to locate spots on the sun of our redemption, but as yet they have offered no positive panacea for their removal. In the meantime the church is marching on, doing its best, against many and varied odds, and many of these self-appointed reformers will but see their theories crushed by the mighty onward tide of truth and righteousness.

It is widely charged that we live in a materialistic and selfish age—that never before was the greed spirit so pronounced. But never since the world began has there been so much of the gift spirit, so much of social conscience. Where shall we place the credit for this mighty uplift in the minds of men, this exalted outlook in the eyes of men? Certainly, it has not come from the critics of the church, but rather from those whose hearts have been touched by the divine finger and who have felt the power of Christ and his church in their lives.

That the masses are not being reached is a fact too conspicuous to produce comfort in the mind of any true disciple. This is not more apparent to the critic than to the church. There is a great gulf, but it is not fixed. This gulf is narrowing. The best men and women in the church are using their best energies to close this chasm, and success will surely come. It must not be forgotten that the masses are not wholly without fault. One cannot sow seed with hope of harvest where there is no soil, neither can the seed of the kingdom be sown where there is no conscious need of its presence, for poverty of spirit—deep human need—is the only soil in which the seed of Christ's kingdom will take root and grow.

All these, and more, are the evident signs of a new awakening. God speed the full noontide of that glorious and blessed day.

We are in the dawn of a new era; we are beginning to think something of the natural world which was ruined in Adam's fall. We are learning to see all around us the greatness and glory of the Creator. We can see the Almighty hand—the infinite goodness—in the humblest flower. The stone of the peach is hard, but the soft kernel swells and bursts when the time comes. An egg—what a thing is that! If an egg had never been seen in Europe and a traveler had brought one from Calcutta, how would all the world have wondered!—Luther—Table-Talk.

The Saloon.

By W. O. Moore.

What the saloon is, is seen from its fruits. There are few, if any, who would attempt to maintain, in moments of sober thought, that the saloon is of any benefit to any one or any community. On the other hand, they know that its evils are abundant and terrible to contemplate. Even those engaged in the business of selling intoxicating drinks know that what they are doing is not laudable. They know of many who have been ruined physically, socially, financially and spiritually by their trade. They know that what they are doing is a terrible curse to their subjects. To a man who is engaged in the saloon business I once made this remark: "Tomorrow evening there will be a mass temperance meeting at the M. E. church. Come and hear what will be said." He replied: "I would like to if they would not say anything to hurt my feelings." I said: "We will confine ourselves to facts. If we should hold a mass meeting to talk about the dry goods business merchants would be delighted to be present. They know that they are selling what is profitable to individuals and homes. Come and I assure you that we will confine ourselves to facts." It would hurt his feelings to hear about the sorrow and poverty that the saloon inflicts upon those who patronize it.

What must be done in order to cause the saloon to pass away?

1. There must be much done by way of education and agitation. The evils of the saloon must be kept constantly before the people. Its seductive influence must be made manifest. How does it ensnare the boys and young men? How do they become a prey to its death-giving power? These questions need earnest thought. Correct answers will be very helpful. Those engaged in this work of agitation and education are many. There ought to be many more enlisted in this work. Churches are doing much. They could do more. Sunday-schools and young people's organizations in the different churches are doing much. They could do more. The different temperance organizations so-called, the Prohibition party so-called, the Anti-Saloon League, the W. C. T. U., and other forces are doing much. When I say other forces I would include what parents should do and are doing to help their boys to avoid the evils of the saloon.

2. There must be much done to secure the enforcement of existing laws. As a result of a wise use of existing laws there are towns and counties where the saloon does not exist. As temperance sentiment increases such towns and counties will be more numerous.

Let us educate the boys and young men so that they will not become victims of the saloon's terrible destroying power. As this work goes on the saloon will go down. It will go down from a want of patronage. The masses will see what is for their good and avoid what gives pain, wretchedness and death.

Boys and young men cannot afford to drink what intoxicates. They cannot afford to form habits that will destroy their manhood and their ability to get employment. Again we say: Let us educate and agitate this matter until the boys and young men are saved from the curse of intoxicating drinks.

Christ's Preparation.

By C. H. Wetherbe.

There is a young man in Central New York who is serving a church as its pastor. I have been told by people in that place that fifteen months after this young man was converted he began to preach for that church, and that before he was converted he had led a wild and intemperate life. To many people who know these facts it is a marvel that those officers in his denomination who set him forward in the ministry should have done so rash and foolish a thing. His so-called "preparation" for the ministry, as any one can see, was exceedingly slight and very risky.

In wide contrast with this instance was the preparation of Christ for his public ministry. I have just been reading anew his course before preaching. Immediately following his baptism—indeed, in closest connection with it—he was especially anointed with the Holy Spirit. We are told that "the Spirit of God" descended from heaven "upon him." The Spirit came directly and expressly from heaven to anoint him and endow him for his public ministry. But this was not enough, yet many would suppose that such a person as Christ was, was sufficiently prepared for his work without the anointing of the Spirit, and some would say that it was not necessary that he should be baptized in water. But Christ knew what was necessary in his case. Not only did he need to be baptized in water and anointed by the Spirit, but he needed to be subjected to a series of temptations by the devil, and such temptations must come to him in a place where it was easier for the devil to successfully tempt a person than in the most of other places, and that was in a lonely spot in the wilderness, with no human companion near him.

All men are more powerfully tempted when they are wholly alone, in some solitary place, than they are while among crowds of people. In that lone place the devil did his utmost to successfully tempt Christ, but Christ bore the trial victoriously, and he was not prepared to preach until he was thus tempted.

It seems to me that no young man should enter the ministry until he has been so much tempted by the devil that he knows somewhat of the amount of temptation that he can safely endure. An untested young man is yet unfit to preach. To be turned over to the devil after one enters the ministry, without experience, is too risky.

A Novel Way.

To Keep Grape-Nuts Crisp.

A novel way of opening a package of food is shown on the Grape-Nuts package, where a line indicates that a slit should be made with a knife, and the package squeezed, which makes it gap enough to pour out what is needed for a meal, then the package automatically closes, preserving the contents from the moisture of the air.

As a rule, Grape-Nuts packages are not kept on hand very long in any family, but it is well to know how to keep the contents of the package in prime condition. Grape-Nuts Food is ready cooked, very crisp, and can be served immediately with a little good cream or milk. This feature is of great advantage to those who appreciate ease and convenience in preparing breakfast.

Our Budget.

—Church Extension Day, Sept. 1.
—Pastors, keep it before your churches.
—Churches, remind your pastors of it, lest they forget.

—Speak of it one to another, and tell of it, ye who have at heart the interests of the kingdom.

—"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these" applies to needy churches as well as to needy persons. Church Extension is a way of helping those of his churches which need help.

—If the churches were ours we might afford to let them go unhoused and so risk losing them. But they are not ours. They are the Lord's churches, churches of Christ, and he has committed into our hands the work of nourishing them. It is a trust.

Church Extension is one way—and one very effective way—of fulfilling the obligation which this church imposes upon us. It helps the needy without pauperizing. It makes every dollar that is given call out other dollars. It offers a good dividend-paying investment with gilt-edged security to those who have money to invest. See that your church takes the collection on Sept. 1 and takes some stock in this enterprise. You can't afford to miss it.

—A. W. Gehres, of Shoals, Ind., informs us that there are several good business openings in the town which the church is anxious to have filled by Disciples. There is good practice for a dentist. A milliner is wanted to buy out a stock and business which must be sold. A good furniture store, the only one in the town, is also for sale at a bargain. Shoals is the county-seat of Martin county. For further particulars, address Bro. Gehres as above.

—E. N. Newman, Secretary of the Virginia Christian Missionary Society, makes official announcement of the illness of the financial secretary, Bro. William Jackson Shelburne, who is ill with malarial fever at the home of Bro. Richard Bagby, Louisa, Va. The illness is not believed to be dangerous, and the indications are that he is improving. It is especially regretted by all that it has been rendered impossible for Bro. Shelburne to attend some of the district conventions.

—The Minneapolis Committee is preparing a gallery of photographs of "The Writers and Workers who have helped to make the Convention." This is for exhibition at the convention, not for publication. The friends of the convention are, of course, far too numerous for the committee to write a personal letter to each requesting a photograph, so it requests that all those who have written or expect to write, and all those who have worked or expect to work, in the interests of the convention, shall send a good, clean cabinet photograph (not a cut) with the signature across the front. Send to Dr. David Owen Thomas, 503 Masonic Temple, Minneapolis, Minn.

—The improvement of the secondary schools in Missouri during recent years is indicated by the increase in the number of schools which are "approved" by the State University, i. e., have their work credited without examination toward fulfilling the entrance requirements for the university. Ten years ago, there were only 23 approved schools and 17 of these were approved for only a two-year course. There are now 118 approved for a three-year or a four-year course, and the list is rapidly growing. Our educational system has been stronger at the extremities than in the center; that is, stronger in the matter of grammar schools and colleges than in high schools. Affiliation with the state universities is doing much to raise the standard of secondary education.

—It is reported that Bro. C. B. Newnan, of Detroit, who had accepted the call to the Missouri Bible College at Columbia, has recalled his acceptance.

—F. J. Stinson, who has been pastor of the church at Bethany, Mo., for three years, has been called to remain with the congregation another year.

—J. E. Lorton, pastor of the church at Cheney, Kan., called at the office of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST last Saturday on his way to Springfield to attend the Illinois state convention.

—J. G. Encell wishes to close his work in Marion, Ia., as soon as a good man can be secured as his successor, who can do the needed work for what the church is able to pay. A growing man is wanted.

—The Church of Christ at Keota, Iowa, celebrated its seventh anniversary on Saturday and Sunday, Aug. 24, 25. At the same time George C. Ritchey preached his closing sermon and ended his pastorate there.

—C. C. Cline, of Nashville, Tenn., preached a sermon recently on the steel strike, tracing the history of strikes down from the original strike of the Israelites precipitated by Pharaoh's brick trust. He recommended profit-sharing as a preventive of strikes.

—Special attention is called to the announcement, on the next page, of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST Special to the Minneapolis convention. We can give our readers two pieces of sound advice in regard to this convention: First, Go. Second, Go on our Special.

—The receipts for foreign missions continue to fall off. The loss during the week ending Aug. 22 amounted to $704.87. We are deeply distressed by this unusual condition of affairs. We are totally unable to explain it. Will not the friends who have money that has been collected for this cause, hasten it forward without further delay? There is no time to be lost. The books close Sept. 30.

—A. McLean will have charge of the department of Missions in the School of Pastoral Helpers, Cincinnati, O., which begins its second year Sept. 17. We do not say it merely because he is our secretary, but it is a fact even more generally recognized among others than among ourselves, that Bro. McLean holds a place in the very first rank of missionary experts in this country.

—The Interdenominational Council of Women for Christian and Patriotic Service has prepared petitions to be used in petitioning senators and representatives to work and vote for the proposed anti-polygamy constitutional amendment. Friends of the movement can secure these petitions, 10 sets for 25 cents, 100 sets for $1.25, by addressing the Willett Press, 142 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

—G. W. Muckley, secretary of the board of church extension, has just returned from an eight-months' tour through Washington, Oregon, California, Idaho and Montana. This is a vast mission field and there is no more potent agency for doing missionary work there than the board of church extension. You can't even raise sheep without a shelter, and how can one expect churches to thrive without houses in the great northwest—or anywhere else?

—It should be borne in mind that the foreign society has a larger force in the field than ever before. Its financial obligations, therefore, are greater than in any previous year. It follows that there should be a substantial increase in the receipts. We began the year resolved to raise $200,000 for foreign missions before the last day of September. We can do that yet if all will do their part. There is no time to be lost. What is done should be done without delay. The first year of the new century should witness a gratifying advance all along the line.

—The Divinity School of the University of Chicago enrolled 218 students during the summer quarter this year, representing 25 denominations—or, to be accurate, 24 denominations and "we as a people." The Baptists had the largest number, 84. The Disciples of Christ came next with 40.

—The evangelical revival which has been sweeping over Japan during the last few months, as a result of the twentieth century evangelistic movement, has led 5,000 persons to become either converts or serious inquirers. Christian Endeavor has been prominent among the agencies which have brought this about.

—C. C. Redgrave, whose illustrated lecture entitled "In the Footsteps of the Pioneers" has been received with universal commendation, makes a generous offer to give the lecture free for any convention—Christian Endeavor, Bible-school, district, county or state. He asks only that his expenses be paid. This is an opportunity which we can heartily recommend. The lecture has been given in many of our largest churches and has aroused unanimous enthusiasm. In no other way can one gain so much reliable information about the pioneers of our religious movement, and have it presented in such vivid and interesting form, as by hearing and seeing Bro. Redgrave's illustrated lecture. He may be addressed at Ferris, Ill.

—It is an astonishing fact—and would be a discouraging fact, if we had a right to be discouraged at anything when we are doing the Lord's work—that we have nearly three thousand homeless churches. In other words, there are nearly three times as many congregations without church buildings as there are contributing to the church extension fund. Think what fearful odds those are: Three homeless churches to be helped by every contributing church—and some of the latter are themselves poor and weak and are giving small sums at a great sacrifice. If your church is one of those which are allowing the faithful 1,172 to stagger under the load of three churches apiece, an exhibition of practical penitence and a good collection for church extension this year will be appropriate. The responsibility is yours, even if the burden so far has been theirs.

—The Christian Churches of Pike county, Ill., held their annual convention Aug. 15, 16, at Barry, Ill., where F. M. Rogers ministers. Hitherto the meetings of the convention have never occupied more than one day, but this time one day was devoted to Christian Endeavor and one to the county missionary co-operation. The stronger churches will be asked to send their preachers to at least one adjacent point to hold a protracted meeting, and it is hoped also to employ a county evangelist for several months. A fund of $130 was subscribed for this purpose, but more than twice that amount will be needed. The work will be under the direction of the following executive committee: C. B. Dabney, Milton, president, F. M. Rogers, R. T. Hicks, Miss Ida Swan, Miss Nora Conroy, Albert Schwartz, and C. E. Bolin.

Difficult Digestion

That is dyspepsia.

It makes life miserable.

Its sufferers eat not because they want to—but because they must.

They know they are irritable and fretful but they cannot be otherwise.

They complain of a bad taste in the mouth, a tenderness at the pit of the stomach, an uneasy feeling of puffy fullness, headache, heartburn and what not.

The effectual remedy, proved by permanent cures of thousands of severe cases, is —The Montana Christian Association will hold its annual meeting at Anaconda, Mont., Aug. 28-Sept. 1.

—Albyn Esson has closed his work with the church at Monmouth, Ore., and has accepted a call to the Rodney Avenue church, Portland, Ore.

—Our office was favored last week with a call from H. G. Bennett, pastor of the church at Carbondale, Ill. A new building is being erected by the Carbondale church.

—Small churches desiring a young preacher who can furnish good references, may be put in communication with such by addressing J. W. L., Box 153, Bath, Ill.

—Philip Johnson, late of Tazewell College, Va., has accepted the chair of Latin in Bethany College. He was graduated from Bethany in the class of 1895 and took his A. M. degree in 1896.

—The fourth annual convention of the Churches of Christ in Oklahoma and Indian Territory will be held at South McAlester, I. T., Sept. 18-20. A good program has been published. G. A. Hoffmann, of St. Louis, will deliver an address on the Demands of the Preacher in the Pioneer Field.

—The board of trustees of the Christian Home, Hot Springs, Ark., desires to secure the services of four good preachers who have ability for raising money. Employment will be furnished to such without change of location. Good references must be furnished. Address (with stamp) T. Nelson Kinkaid, Hot Springs, Ark.

—The reports show that only 1,172 churches contributed to the church extension fund last year. This is not one fifth of our total number of churches. The non-contributing church ought to be the exception—and the disgraceful exception at that. It ought to be made to feel so lonesome that it would come over to the contributing majority for good company if from no loftier motive.

—The Christian Church at Independence, Mo., R. Lin Cave, pastor, has let to a St. Louis firm the contract for a handsome pipe organ, to be in for use early in next January. The organ fund society is arranging to give "Ruth the Moabitess," a cantata, with a chorus of seventy-five in oriental costumes, at Fairmont Park Auditorium, Sept. 5 and 6, at 8 p. m. The help of friends will be greatly appreciated. Mr. Carl Bush has been secured as director.

—The First Christian Church of South Bend, Ind., will celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of its organization on Sept. 22. The pastor, P. J. Rice, and the congregation extend a cordial invitation to all former pastors and to all who have at any time been connected with the church in any way, to be present. Any such who cannot be present in person are asked to send a written greeting. Entertainment will be provided for all who attend.

—B. E. Utz, pastor of the church at Spokane, Wash., writes that, owing to a timely visit from G. W. Muckley, who stopped there in the course of the western tour which he has just completed, the building enterprise in that city received a new impetus which will carry it to completion. The Church Extension Board has voted a loan of $5,000 to Spokane, and the local congregation has already pledged $3,000. It is now expected that the building will be enclosed before winter weather sets in. It will be a handsome building, costing $25,000, with a seating capacity of 1,500, and occupying a prominent location. The board of church extension has also granted loans of $5,000 to Portland, Ore., $1,800 to Tacoma, Wash., and $3,000 to Seattle. It is important to have a good representation in these rapidly growing cities, and the cost of building is much greater than it is in the east.

—The Dictionary of Minneapolis, which, by arrangement with the committee, will be supplied to prospective attendants of the convention for 25 cents, contains a large amount of valuable information about that interesting city. It will help you to see it intelligently and will assist you in the little sight-seeing that you will have time for between the sessions of the convention. It is published by Horace B. —The following note has just been received from Bro. Rains who is now en route to China:

STEAMSHIP COPTIC, }
Near Honolulu, Aug. 8, 1901. }

DEAR BRO. GARRISON:—We have been on this ship since Aug. 2. Will reach Honolulu in about two hours. Will remain there 24 hours. Will have some time to see the brethren. May have a service. We left Cincinnati July 18. Made stops at Denver, Colorado Springs, Salt Lake City, Santa Cruz and San Francisco. It has been a most delightful trip. I am much improved in health, I think. This voyage is sure to do me good. We will reach Yokohama Aug. 20 or 21.

Affectionately,

F. M. RAINS.

—The Illinois Christian Missionary Convention is conducting a Bureau of Ministerial Employment, with headquarters at 505 W. Grove St., Bloomington, Ill. Its object is to assist churches in securing pastors, evangelists and singers, and to help ministers to find churches needing their services either as pastors or evangelists. Correspondence to this end is solicited by J. Fred Jones, Cor. Sec., and W. D. Deweese, Office Sec. This is a sensible and practicable plan and we hope both ministers and churches will avail themselves of it. It makes not the slightest encroachment on either congregational or ministerial liberty, but it furnishes a long needed means of communication between the church which needs a preacher and the preacher who needs a church. It will also serve as a means of preventing rascals in ministerial garb from imposing on unsuspecting churches. Preachers who spring up from nowhere, without introductions or recommendations, and wish churches to give them recognition and employment, would best be referred to such a Bureau of Ministerial Employment which can investigate and, if the party is worthy, give him a letter of recommendation.

Individuals, parties or state delegations are invited to correspond with us with a view to participating in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST special excursion to the Minneapolis convention. We would like to know, as early as possible, how many to provide for. Address Excursion Manager, care CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST, 1522 Locust St., St. Louis, Mo.

Correspondence.

Texas Letter.

The Quanah Church wants a pastor. It is a good place, and the right man can do a great work. Write J. M. Stroug.

B. B. Sanders, the veteran evangelist of Texas, has been enjoying a well deserved rest at Boulder, Col.

Vernon J. Rose enters the evangelistic field in September. His record in this sphere is good. Write him at Newton, Kan.

Joe S. Riley used to be in Texas, but he became dissatisfied and thought it wise to go to Colorado and Oklahoma. He has "come to himself" and returned to the old home and is ready for work. Write him at Valley View.

J. A. Lincoln has recently had two fine meetings at San Anders Crossing and Sandy Creek, with 43 and 87 additions. Bro. Speck, of Kerrville, aided in the last meeting.

J. W. Marshall, aided by Dr. Harrison, has held a great meeting at Sparta, with 95 additions. The music, with Sister Marshall at the organ and Prof. Fitz as chorister, was splendid.

Rev. G. C. Rankin, editor of the Texas Christian Advocate, the organ of Methodism in the state, is now on the ocean wending his way to Europe, where he will spend some time in sight-seeing, after which he will attend the Ecumenical Conference in London. Our readers will wish him a pleasant voyage and safe return.

Baylor University, Waco (Baptist), is soon to have the George G. Carroll Science Hall. It will be a large building and strictly up to date. The fixtures are to cost $15,000 and the hall $60,000, both the gift of Mr. Carroll. Where is the George G. Carroll of Add Ran University?

Every now and then somebody says something foolish and hurtful. In fact there are others besides the famous parrot, who talk too much. They get themselves and others into trouble. A late example of this, according to the newspapers, is a "General," pretty high up in rank among "ex-confederates," who went from our state northward to a great reunion and made a speech which proved the sensation of the hour. He avowed himself no "ex-confederate," but a "confedate" minus the "ex," and declared that he had no sympathy with that sickly set who thought it best for all concerned that the war ended as it did. In fact he seemed to have on his war paint and was spoiling for a fight. Such men, both north and south, ought not to make speeches. And if they had fought a little more during the war they would have less fight in them now, for it is well known that the battle-scarred veterans on both sides are willing to let the matter rest as it was settled at Appomattox on the 9th of April, 1865, almost a generation ago. In the language of one of the world's great soldiers, "Let us have peace."

Munhall, the famous evangelist, is to hold a union meeting here Oct. 16-Nov. 16. We hope to have the Central ready for good work during the time.

The New Century Cotton Mill Company is something new under the sun. It is to be located in this city, is to cost $40,000 and is to be operated exclusively by colored persons, thus giving to our Afro-American citizens the first opportunity of demonstrating their ability to manufacture the great southern staple which they have so long and so successfully cultivated. The experiment will be watched with much interest.

The Seymour camp-meeting was a grand success. J. H. O. Smith and J. B. Sweeney did the preaching and Prof. Jno. Brower led the singing. The tent with a capacity of 5,000 was none too large. There were 60 additions. Some families traveled more than 200 miles in covered wagons to attend the meeting. George Thomas, the evangelist sent out by the encampment, had a good report. O. J. Wood is the efficient president of this big affair, and Evans Jackson is secretary and treasurer, and under their management everything moved without friction. The next meeting will be at Olney, July, 1902. There is need of a dozen such meetings in Texas. Why not have them?

H. W. Laye leaves Colorado City and begins work at Sabinal on Sept. 1.

J. W. Lowber and wife, with a few others, leave for a trip of twelve days to the City of Mexico on Sept. 3.

W. D. Humphrey, of Bowie, resigns his work there to enter the Brownwood district as evangelist.

Thomas J. Nance, assisted by James S. Helm as singer, has just closed a good meeting at Valley Mills, resulting in 18 additions and the organization of a church of 31 members, with the prospect of a new house soon.

M. M. DAVIS.

Dallas, Texas.

To the Missouri C. W. B. M.

The closing weeks of our missionary year are upon us. The harvest time is here. Have the seeds planted by our secretary and organizers, through letters, personal visits and public meetings, fallen by the wayside, in stony places, or in true and loyal hearts, who will put the affairs of the Lord's household before self? The latter, we feel sure. Our motto during the year has been, "50 new auxiliaries and 1,000 new women." Doubtless we shall not reach the high mark set before us, but we shall be the stronger for the aim. It is of the utmost importance, in this closing month, that each auxiliary close up well balanced books with state and national dues collected and forwarded to respective treasurers. Of course, the older and stronger auxiliaries have already made special offerings to Bible chair endowment, negro evangelization, or some one of our new mission stations, through the C. W. B. M. day collection or the mite box fund. For any who have failed to do so, it is not yet too late to collect a thank-offering, "for all the Lord's benefits to us."

A little more zeal, a little more consecration, a little more sacrifice, upon the part of each one, will mean not only a large gain for Missouri when the yearly reports are read at Mexico, but as well a deepening and broadening of Christian character which comes through larger service.

Let us make a united effort in this last month to bring Missouri to the front. Our Lord expects us to stand by our colors, to do our duty. Our national officers are expecting us, as one of the strong states, to help largely in raising the twenty thousand dollars advance planned for this year, that "enlargement" and not "retrenchment" shall be the word for the coming year. Your state officers are awaiting results with anxious hearts. Come in large numbers to the state convention at Mexico, Sept. 16-19. Every auxiliary should send a delegate. You will feel a new interest in the work after meeting workers from different parts of the state.

It has been my misfortune to be confined to my room, unable to walk, for the past eight months, with an injured foot and spine. I am improving very rapidly now, and expect to be with you in Mexico.

Mrs. F. M. LOWE, Mo. state president.

A Lady's Lunch

Has been rudely defined by some cynic as "slops and sweets." And after all there's more truth than poetry in the definition. Ice cream and cake may satisfy the palate, but they are far from satisfying to the stomach, which requires that food be nutritious first and nice afterward. By careless eating women pave the way for stomach "trouble," and its kindred miseries.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is confidently commended as a cure for diseases of the stomach and other organs of digestion and nutrition. By curing diseases which prevent the assimilation of food it enables the body to be built up and strengthened in the only way known to nature—by food digested and assimilated.

"For twelve long months I suffered untold misery," writes Mrs. Mollie Colgate, of Randolph, Charlotte Co., Va. "No tongue could express the pain that I endured before I commenced taking Dr. Pierce's medicine. I was not able to do anything at all. Could not eat anything except bread and tea—or if I did the top of my head hurt so it seemed it would kill me; with all that I could do it would burn like fire. But now, since using your 'Golden Medical Discovery' and 'Favorite Prescription,' I can eat a little of almost anything I want, and can do a good day's work as well as anybody can. Am better than I have been for years."

Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets cure sick headache.

WHY?

Why do you, who live in the Mississippi Valley, send to New York, Boston, Philadelphia, or even to Chicago for a desired volume, when you can secure it much more quickly and just as cheap in St. Louis? This is a question that is very difficult to answer. We can supply you with any book that you wish—any respectable book, that is; French novels and blood-and-thunder-seven-buckets-of-gore-to-the-chapter romances are barred—no matter where or by whom published. Our business is by no means confined to the books we ourselves publish. Our catalogue contains only our own publications, in the main, but we can sell you any book you wish to purchase.

THE CHRISTIAN - EVANGELIST

THREE MONTHS, 25c.

On Trial to New Subscribers.

Eastern News Notes.

The Virginia brethren are beginning to realize the privileges afforded them in the Piedmont assembly at Gordonsville. The attendance this year was much larger than in any previous year. There are now about fifteen cottages on the grounds, and brethren from all sections of the state declare their intention of becoming regular attendants upon these yearly gatherings.

W. H. Book, Peter Ainslie, C. P. Williamson and E. L. Power, though popular preachers, rarely address such immense audiences as gathered at the assembly on the Lord's days, July 28 and August 4. W. J. Cocke, J. I. Shelburne, W. S. Hoyer, C. I. Woodward, H. C. Bowen and J. W. Shelburne were among the preachers present who delivered sermons and addresses. B. A. Abbott's Bible studies were highly enjoyed. The ten auxiliaries of the C. W. B. M. reported $323 raised during the past year. As the University of Virginia is in this district the sisters had special pride in the fact that the endowment fund of $25,000 for the Bible chair has been raised.

The Tidewater (Va.) Convention, which met a week later in Bowling Green, decided to continue its district meeting. An effort was made to consolidate the district evangelizing work with that of the state board, but the proposition was overwhelmingly defeated. The brethren will attempt to raise $2,000 next year, will build up the churches in the thriving towns along the seaboard and hope to report at Hampton next August the best work done in the twenty-six years of the convention's history. E. W. Thornton, of Mayfield, Ky., was the chief speaker from out of the district, and greatly delighted the delegates with his strong addresses on home missions and Sunday-school work.

The visitors at Bethany Beach are saying many encouraging things of the auspicious opening of this new ocean resort. The nine persons who confessed Christ there this year are, we trust, the first fruits of a great harvest to be reaped in the years to come. The baptism of the candidates in the ocean was a sight that will never be forgotten by those who witnessed it. The presentation of a purse of money by the visitors to Jacob Walters in recognition of his self-sacrificing labors as evangelist and pastor in that section was one of the pleasant features of the assembly.

Peter Ainslie has been doing some pioneer work in Howard county, Md. He pitched a tent near Marriottsville in a community where the plea of the Disciples had never been heard. At first a few people came from curiosity, then crowds because they were interested. He baptized twelve and has the promise of others to unite with a congregation should one be organized. By the way, Ainslie received a call recently from one of our strongest churches, offering to double the salary he now receives. He replied that if these brethren knew how busy he was they would send some one to help him and not try to induce him to leave Baltimore. Several churches of late have also been trying to tempt Abbott from Baltimore. One congregation offered to let him fix his own salary. The long pastorate is the only way in which we can hope for success in this difficult field. We advise the churches in the west to let our preachers alone.

F. D. Power reports a delightful trip to California, but thinks he still prefers the populous east to "the nascent empires of the west."

F. W. Troy, of Dunsmuir, Va., will probably become pastor of the Marshall St. Church, Richmond, Va.

Carey Morgan, of the Seventh St. Church, who was recently ill with typhoid fever, is recuperating in Giles county, Va.

W. J. Shelburne, state evangelist of Virginia, while visiting in Louisa, Va., was stricken with fever. He is now convalescent.

A Rally Day Service.

Rally Day has become one of the FIXED INSTITUTIONS in all well organized Sunday-Schools. A service of this kind is needed after the summer vacation to re-form the lines and get the forces into position for the new campaign. To make it a success a well-prepared program is very essential. To meet this want we have issued

The American Christian Missionary Society is trying to induce W. J. Wright, of this city, to take the work as eastern evangelist and general representative of the home board in the North Atlantic states. As the H St. Church is now on a solid basis Bro. Wright may enter upon this larger work.

The Maryland, Delaware and District of Columbia Missionary Society will meet Sept. 24 to 27 at Jerusalem. Harford county, Md. The brethren at Jericho and Joppa will assist in entertaining the delegates.

EDWARD B. EAGBY.

Ohio Letter.

I. J. Cahill, of Dayton, has been taking his vacation among the hills of Logan and Union counties where he spent the days of his youth.

F. A. Thomas, of Edgerton, has taken the church at Rushsylvania. I am not personally acquainted with Bro. Thomas but can vouch for the church at Rushsylvania. It is strong, aggressive and missionary. It was from this church that J. W. Kerns, the present pastor at Steubenville, came. He recently spent his vacation with the people of Rushsylvania.

At the last information there had been about 70 applicants for the pulpit at Bellefontaine. This would indicate that there is not a dearth of preachers. F. M. Rains' picture in the Intelligencer of the few going to the foreign field and the multitude clamoring for a city pulpit was surely not overdrawn. No wonder many of our churches want to keep the resignation of the pastor a secret till a successor is chosen.

T. E. Cramblett, of Pittsburg, has been back at his old home at Tappan, Harrison county for his vacation. He delighted the brethren of the old home church with an account of his recent trip abroad. Bro. Wait, a Bethany student, now preaches for the Tappan church.

Robert Moffett is acting as financial agent for Bethany College for Ohio and will make an effort to raise $50,000 and secure students. He already reports much progress.

M. E. Chatley, of the Fourth Avenue Church in Columbus, spent the last two weeks of August in western Pennsylvania amid his old associates. R. W. Abberley, of the Central Church, will return from his trip to England August 30.

All preachers in northeast Ohio will do well to remember the ministerial association at Medina next week, September 24. A good program has been prepared.

On some recent trips up and down the state in the interest of the Ohio C. E. Union, I have been accompanied by two gentlemen whose fellowship I have richly enjoyed. They were

W. E. Garrison and A. B. Jones. True, the men themselves were in Missouri at the time, nevertheless they were with me. They manifested themselves in "Alexander Campbell's Theology," and "The Spiritual Side of Our Plea." These books are worth while. They are thoughtful and thought provoking. They stimulate. I believe I shall be a better preacher after having read A. B. Jones' book. Did your cheeks burn a little as you read along about the 60th page of this book? Mine did and I said, "I'll never do it again." If you have not enjoyed them, buy them of the Christian Publishing Co., and read them carefully. It will be a good investment.

The daily press of yesterday tells of the death of Prof. Hugh McDiarmid, of Hiram, from typhoid fever. This will bring sadness to many hearts. Bro. McDiarmid was a man of sterling worth. He was a profound student. As an exegete he had few equals. He leaves a place hard to fill. The deepest sympathy of the brotherhood will be with his wife and children. There have been several cases of fever at Hiram as the result of using water from an old well at commencement time, so the papers state.

Arrangements have been made for the Disciples of the central part of Ohio to go to Minneapolis via the Big Four and Burlington routes. Will all who contemplate going drop a line to the undersigned? C. A. FREER.

Vacation Items from Bethany, W. Va.

Prof. Julian Barclay attended the summer school at Cornell.

Prof. C. Loos spent a day in the little village, passing through on his way home from Michigan, where he had been visiting his sons.

The announcement of the death of Prof. H. McDiarmid caused much sorrow among those who knew and had learned to love him and his family while they resided in Bethany.

Prof. H. N. Miller, teacher of English and elocution, has received a call from the church at Newark, O.

Prof. R. H. Wynne and wife spent a large portion of the summer in Michigan, where they had gone for Bro. Wynne's health. He looks much improved.

Bro. A. L. Chapman and wife, our missionaries to Constantinople, were seen recently on the old college corridor. They were talking of the days when they used to read Latin together.

Bethany is the coming summer resort among Disciples in the east. The only beach it can boast of is that of the old Buffalo—but what better could one desire! Besides, the West Virginia air, the finest water in the land, and a campus that is unsurpassed anywhere, are things not to be despised by people anxious for restful quiet.

Phillips Hall was taxed to its capacity all summer with visitors from Wheeling, Bellaire, Steubenville and Pittsburg. The crowd from Pittsburg consisted of Miss Eva Lemmert, assistant pastor of the East End Church, Miss Elizabeth Bay and Mrs. M. A. Rolls of the same church, Rev. A. Campbell, pastor at Rowan Avenue, and Rev. Fred Gordon, pastor in Knoxville. Mrs. Rolls acted as chaperone.

Mrs. Belle Updegraff, matron of Phillips Hall during the past two years, will move with her family to Hiram, O.

The outlook for Bethany this fall is very bright. Several men have been actively engaged for a portion of the summer working West Virginia, Virginia, Ohio and west Pennsylvania, and prospects for students are good. Financially, Bethany is in better condition than she has been for years. Monies recently received provide for a floating indebtedness; the $51,000 endowment in the charge of the Mercantile Trust Company of Pittsburg, gives financial stability. Bethany is biding her time. Shortly electric lines will intersect all the country between Wheeling and Pittsburg. How shortly, no one knows, but when such does take place it may be interesting to note that Bethany will be as near the smoky city as Hiram is to Cleveland.

Upper Ohio Valley Notes.

Herbert Tilock, formerly of Martin's Ferry, O., is now pastor of the churches at Smithfield and Hopedale.

Bro. J. W. Kerns, pastor at Steubenville, preaches each Sunday afternoon in a hall in Mingo. Mingo is one of the growing iron towns of the valley.

C. M. Oliphant leaves Wheeling the first of September to become pastor of our church in Paris, Ill.

N. D. Wells, of New Cumberland, W. Va., has had about one hundred additions in the past year. About $900 worth of repairs on the building are being made.

J. D. Hull has resigned at Fairview, W. Va.

The pulpits of Wellsburg and Wheeling, W. Va., are vacant.

Within a month the church at Bellaire has lost three of its members: Mrs. Fred Hazel, Will Mansell, a brother of Walter Mansell, pastor at Salem, O., and Mrs. Angeline Strawl, an old and faithful member.

J. B. Smith, of Moundsville, and Walter Mansell, of Salem, preached at Bellaire two Lord's days in August. The pastor, with

He has written most delightfully and entertainingly of his travels, of his experiences with odourate officials and unsophisticated peasants, of his struggles with the several European languages, of the customs of the common people, of Alpine scenery, Swiss lakes, etc.

Missouri Bible-School Notes.

John Giddens' report in the southwest district for July was good excepting the finances: his receipts on salary for the entire month were only one dollar, and this shows you, brethren, what we must carry during this year, and our only hope is in the stronger localities of the state. Mexico sends word, through J. C. Wilkins, that Rally Day, Oct. 7, is to be made the best day of the year, while Mt. Cabanne, Beulah, Central, Arlington, St. Louis, all send the same good news, and we want to hear from others. We are preparing a splendid program and will send it free to all the schools.

The Nodaway County Bible-schools, Miss Lizzie Clayton, superintendent, will observe Rally Day, and one of the leading factors is O. W. Lawrence.

Alvah Pettijohn, our Andrew county superintendent, is writing personal letters to the schools in the interest of our work, and always sees that Rosendale leads the way, so that Andrew is leading many of the counties.

At Midway, Audrain, the brethren have never had an easy time keeping up their school on account of the scattered membership, but faithful souls have always done what they could and their minister, J. H.

Crutcher, was reaping the harvest in a protracted meeting, the first confessions coming from the school and many more seemed ready to follow the Master. With their other giving these helped us in the way with their substance and prayers.

Our rally day programs are to be ready this week and if your school will join this great army, write me for what you want, ministers and superintendents.

The county superintendents can see how many schools will observe the day and urge them to send in good time for the programs so that all will be prepared in good time and without any hurry. Order now without delay.

Have you sent in the first quarterly dues as you said you would?

All delegates not using clergy permits must get certificates of railroad agents where they purchase tickets. If you travel over more than one road, get certificates from each. Do not fail to do this and if there are one hundred such certificates you can return home at one-third fare.

Lodging and breakfast will be furnished free. Dinner and supper will be served at the church at a nominal price.

This is our first convention of the century and everybody ought to go.

SHEM A STORY OF THE CAPTIVITY

BY J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

This is the latest work issued from the press of the Christian Publishing Company. The author is already known as a writer of rare power. His books, "King Saul," "In the Days of Jehu," and "The Fear and Dread of Kings" have been favorably received, and have won him an enviable reputation, which will be greatly enhanced by this new volume.

"Shem" is a story which, in plot and sustained interest, ranks with the best modern fiction. It deals with an interesting period of Biblical history—the days of King Zedekiah and the Babylonian invasion, throwing a flood of light on the relation between the Jews and Egypt on the one hand, and the Babylonian Empire on the other. The old story of human love triumphing over obstacles is told in a way to hold the reader's interest to the end.

"Shem" is a volume of 299 pages, neatly printed and bound. Price, FIFTY CTS.

A GREAT BOOK FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

The Young Man from Middlefield

By MRS. JESSIE BROWN POUNDS

THIS ENTRANCING STORY of twenty-six chapters ran as a serial in the columns of OUR YOUNG FOLKS during the first half of the year 1900, and was followed with absorbing and ever-increasing interest by the many thousands of readers of that weekly journal. It relates, in the popular author's most charming style, the trials and triumphs of a plain young man from the country, who left his father's farm and went to the great city to fill a position in the lumber yard of his uncle. In his new surroundings he came into contact with a variety of people, every way different from the plain, honest country folks with whom he had formerly associated; but in the midst of his new surroundings, with their many temptations, he maintained his Christian integrity and lived up to the motto he had adopted, to "Make Christ First in Everything."

His good influence soon began to be felt in his uncle's family, among his fellow-workmen, and most of all among the young Christian Endeavorers with whom he associated, whose society was in due time revolutionized.

EVERY YOUNG PERSON should read this charming volume, and it should at once find a place in every Christian Endeavor and Sunday-school Library.

SIZE AND PRICE.—One handsome volume of 257 pages, beautifully printed and substantially bound in cloth, price 75 cents per copy, prepaid.

Christian Publishing Co., 1522 Locust St., St. Louis, Mo.

Christian Science Dissected.

By A. D. Sector. This work, issued last summer, has already had a very large sale. It is bright, breezy, clear and convincing—just the thing to put into the hands of one who is inclining toward "Christian Science."

Sabbath or Lord's Day.

By D. R. Dungan. Is it the First Day or the Seventh Day of the week that Christians should observe as a day of rest and worship? This book answers the question conclusively.

Facts About China.

By W. Remfry Hunt. The author has lived in Central China for many years. His book is full of facts about Chinese customs, language, government, religions, commerce, geography, etc.

The Liquor Traffic.

By S. W. Crutcher. Mr. Crutcher has spent years in fighting this traffic, and in this book tells of his experiences with manufacturers and dealers of whisky in the church and out.

The Lord's Supper.

By N. J. Aylesworth. This work is a defense of and custom of observing the Lord's Supper every Sunday. It is an able, convincing argument.

Evangelistic.

ALABAMA.

Plantersville, Aug. 17.—I closed a six days' meeting yesterday at New Hope. Fourteen were added—ten by baptism, three from the Baptists, one reclaimed. I used chart sermons. Have received 20 into membership in the past ten days.—S. R. HAWKINS.

ARKANSAS.

Mineral Springs.—The Mineral Springs camp meeting. This is a popular resort for a week's meeting. The meetings seldom last more than a week. The grounds belong to the brotherhood. There is erected on them a commodious tabernacle, which will seat about a thousand people. The camp meeting has become a recognized annual gathering. The meeting of the present year was said to be one of the best attended ever held at the camp grounds. There were six confessions and two added from other churches. The preaching was done by W. O. Breeden, Bolling Walker, Bro. George, J. N. Jessup and the writer. An affecting part of the proceedings was a memorial service. Bro. George Clark, for five years the effective evangelist of the southwest missionary district, died suddenly while from home in a meeting. He and his work were very tenderly remembered. Two leading brethren and citizens, Bros. James and John Hardin, passed away during the year. The former was identified with the church at an early day; the latter but a short time, but he was a good citizen. This brought before the minds of the brethren other members of the church in this vicinity, who had been identified with its interests, but had passed to their reward earlier. The names of W. J. Meeks, Charlie Van Camp, R. H. Wilder, A. J. Osborn and John B. Cloud, were tenderly and affectionately remembered. The writer has knowledge of 161 added to the churches during the last two months in this state, though there have doubtless been more. The brethren, assisted by the state missionary co-operation, were instrumental in bringing in 53 of these. The preachers at Hot Springs, Mena, Pine Bluff, Arkadelphia, and in three missionary districts, besides the work of the writer throughout the state, are assisted by the co-operation of churches known as the Arkansas Christian Missionary Co-operation.—E. C. BROWNING.

Newport, Aug. 23.—Spent last week in Swifton. Set things somewhat in order, and will visit the brethren once a month from now on. One baptism at Newport some time ago.—JAMES H. BROOKS.

ILLINOIS.

Arcola, Aug. 20.—Five added to the church here since last report.—L. T. FAULDERS.

Bunker Hill, Aug. 19.—A meeting was begun at this place August 1 by Bro. Edward O. Sharpe, of Girard, Ill., with the assistance of Bro. and Sister Guy B. Williamson, singing evangelists. The object of the meeting is to plant the cause of Christ. Bunker Hill is a place of 1,500 inhabitants and the meeting was started with two disciples. Ten have enrolled thus far.—H. F. HENRICHs.

Cameron, Aug. 21.—J. E. Parker, evangelist, of Keithsburg, Ill., and G. E. Shearer, of Alexis, Ill., have just closed a successful tent meeting at Gilchrist, Ill. Were there four weeks; 44 additions. Will constitute a church. They are now at Aledo for a few weeks. Will begin at Coldbrook, Ill., Sept. 15. I close my work here Oct. 20, and Oct. 21 begin a meeting at Meridian.—O. D. MAPLE.

Dorchester, Aug. 26.—We had two additions yesterday at our regular services at Gillespie.—JOHN G. M. LUTTENBERGER.

Jacksonville, Aug. 26.—Five additions here yesterday—four by confession and baptism. There were two added at prayer meeting Wednesday evening. Five of these are heads of families. There have been just 400 additions to this church in my pastorate of less than four years. R. F. Thrapp, of Pittsfield, Ill., follows me here Sept. 1, while I assume the office of general secretary of our National Benevolent Association, with headquarters at 903 Aubert Ave., St. Louis.—GEO. L. SNIVELY.

Moweaqua, Aug. 20.—R. Leland Brown, state evangelist of the sixth district of Illinois, is conducting a series of meetings in the Christian church at this place. Interest and attendance are increasing. Bro. Ransom De Loss Brown, son of the evangelist, is our pastor.—W. H. LAND.

Wapella, Aug. 26.—One added to the church at Heyworth by conversion last Sunday.—M. F. INGRAHAM.

INDIANA.

Special dispatch to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

Ladoga, Aug. 25.—Meeting fifteen days old; 116 added. Over 2,000 present to-night. Bro. Brooks is a great pastor. We go to Cedar Rapids, Ia., next.—WILSON AND HUSTON, evangelists.

Decatur, Aug. 26.—Three added by letter at appointment here yesterday. Two by baptism at last appointment.—AUSTIN HUNTER, Chicago University.

Danville, Aug. 20.—Closed two weeks' meeting at Clear Creek with 11 added.—EUGENE MARTIN.

Ladoga, Aug. 20.—Wilson and Huston started a meeting here Sunday, Aug. 11, with great interest from the start. Meeting is 10 days old, with 76 additions and interest growing. Sunday there were 11 additions; last night eight. In opening the meeting last evening, the Methodist minister of this city led in prayer and then handed to the pastor of the Christian church a church letter for two of his members that wanted to unite with the Disciples.—OSCAR SIEGENTHALER.

INDIAN TERRITORY.

Purcell, Aug. 22.—Bro. W. A. Wherry has just closed a successful year's work with the church at this place. There have been about 65 additions during the year; $25 was raised for missions, besides repairs on our church building amounting to about $100. The church is well organized for future work. A number of our membership will move to the new country. Bro. Wherry was a student of the University of Oklahoma while pastor here. He will enter the University of Kansas this fall. We commend him to the brethren everywhere for his good works.—J. W. SIMPSON.

IOWA.

Guthrie Center, Aug. 19.—Two confessions at Monteith yesterday. Have recently purchased a new bell for the church at Guthrie Center.—D. L. DUNKLEBERGER.

Keota, Aug. 20.—I close my work here Aug. 25 and begin with the First Christian Church at Salem, Ore., Sept. 8. Aug. 11 I closed a tent meeting at Wellman with 47 for charter members of a new church, 21 former members elsewhere, 22 baptisms and four from the denominations.—GEO. C. RITCHEY.

Liscomb, Aug. 20.—Our work at both points prospers. Had three additions at Bethel Grove, Aug. 18, by confession and baptism, and one young man at Liscomb, Aug. 11, was baptized. This makes six baptisms since June 1, in our regular services. Have been called to remain here another year, but will close my work at Bethel Grove, Oct. 1, after which I can preach for some other church near Liscomb for half time.—J. C. HANNA.

Stuart, Aug. 26.—Our meeting, lasting a little over three weeks, will close to-morrow night. There have been 26 accessions. This makes 46 additions for our year's work which closes Sept. 1. Frank A. Wilkinson is an excellent song leader.—A. LYLE DEJARNETTE, pastor.

MASSACHUSETTS.

Springfield, Aug. 23.—Two confessions and one baptism this month.—S. M. HUNT, clerk.

MISSOURI.

Canton, Aug. 26.—Our meeting closed at Mt. Sinai near Durham, Mo., with 42 additions; 28 by baptism, 14 Methodists, 3 Baptists and 3 reclaimed. C. A. Hicks preached and C. H. Williamson led the song service. We are now in a meeting at Durham.—C. A. HICKS.

Doniphan, Aug. 18.—Our church building is now completed and with the help of a loan from the missionary board our bills are paid, but owing to the smallness of our membership, it has been quite a heavy tax upon us. The spirituality of each of the congregation, however, seems to have grown in proportion to the amount of sacrifice for the work. At present we have no pastor but we meet on the Lord's day to partake of the communion and maintain an interesting mid week prayer meeting. Our Bible-school has increased from 16 to 75. We are to have a protracted meeting, commencing Aug. 30, conducted by Bro. J. H. Lawson, of Whitewright, Texas.—J. P. CAMPBELL.

Durham, Aug. 20.—C. A. Hicks and the writer are still in the meeting at Mount Sinai, Mo. Forty-one added to the present time; 10 from the Methodists and three from the Baptists. I held service at Durham last night with four additions. A meeting will begin at Durham Friday night.—E. H. WILLIAMSON.

Forest City, Aug. 19.—At a week's meeting held at Bluff City in May, 10 were added. Eight young men were baptized. Our annual basket meeting will be held there the first Lord's day in September. A cordial invitation is extended to all the brethren in the county to be present and enjoy the meeting with us.—W. H. HARDMAN, evangelist.

Huntsville, Aug. 26.—Bro. Northcutt continues our meeting. The house is filled to overflowing every night. Seven additions to date and church thoroughly aroused to work. This is a very difficult field. Preached in Kirksville yesterday. Bro. Northcutt has a splendid church and an ideal congregation. Great preparations are being made for the large number of incoming students next week. There were two additions at Kirksville yesterday morning by letter and one by confession last night. Bro. Northcutt will be compelled to leave us this week.—LOUIS S. CUPP.

LaBelle, Aug. 20.—I have just closed a two weeks' meeting with the church at Knox City, Mo., with 40 additions; 27 by confession, 3 reclaimed and seven by letter. H. A. Northcutt preached the first five nights and had additions. He was called away and the meeting was continued by the writer with the above results. H. E. Milsap led the singing.—J. H. COIL.

Marshall, Aug. 21.—Twenty-one confessions at Liberty, Randolph county, in seven days last week.—J. M. BLALOCK.

Marshall, Aug. 24.—During the past month our church here has had a great ingathering. Fifty-nine have united with us, almost all conversions. These are the results of a union meeting held in July under the leadership of Dr. H. M. Wharton. We can heartily commend these union meetings when such an evangelist as Dr. Wharton can be secured and proper methods are pursued. Our church is greatly strengthened by it.—B. T. WHARTON.

River View, Aug. 18.—Just closed an eight days' meeting at the little Buffalo Church. Three added by primary obedience. Organized a new Bible-school and raised money to employ preacher for one-fourth time.—R. HAVENER, Bible-school evangelist, Windsor, Mo.

St. Louis, Aug. 21.—Two additions last Sunday and three expected next Sunday.—PAUL CASTLE.

Troy, Aug. 20.—I began a meeting at Highland Prairie, 15 miles from here, on Sunday and I expect to organize a vigorous church.

nd locate as pastor Bro. D. J. Gary, who recently came to us from the M. E. Church. Bro. Gary, who was publicly recognized as a minister and brother among us at our county convention, has great influence in the community. This is expected to lead to valuable results in the work.—G. F. ASSITER.
Windsor.—Just closed a short meeting at Hiloh church in Morgan county; five confessions and money raised for preacher. Two confessions at Gravois Mills last night.—R. B. HAVENER.

NEBRASKA.

Deweese, Aug. 19.—One addition at Ox Bow yesterday. Bro. Wilkinson, of Bethany, preached two splendid sermons. We are having additions at each regular service.—E. W. COUM.
Lincoln, Aug. 23.—We begin at Inavale, Lord's day for a short meeting. A. S. Finch is pastor. North Platt has had two added since we organized the first of the month. E. E. Kneedy is preaching for them.—C. C. ATWOOD AND WIFE, evangelists.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Orangeburg, Aug. 20.—Am now in a short meeting at Johnston. Bro. W. H. Brunson reports eight additions at Bethany recently. Bro. O. W. Riley, pastor at Charleston, reports three baptisms and two by letter during the month of July.—M. B. INGLE.

TEXAS.

Clarksville, Aug. 19.—Elder J. B. Sweeney, of Gainesville, Tex., is with us here in a meeting 10 days old. Sixty added from all sources. We are building a handsome church building costing $3,500. It will be the finest church house in this part of Texas. This church has been in the hands of the "non-progressive" element until now.—A. H. DARNELL, pastor.

UTAH.

Salt Lake, Aug. 20.—Two baptized last Sunday.—W. H. BAGBY.

VIRGINIA.

Martinsville, Aug. 18.—Fine meeting at Commonsville, Craig county—14 confessions. People as good as the world affords, of a high grade mentally. Churches in need of pastors and preachers may write me. I can add three good ones.—W. H. BOOK.

A Missionary Plan.

We completed the organization of the Coles county, Ill., work in our Bushton Grove meeting, Aug. 7. Our plan seems to me to be the most simple and reasonable plan of home missions yet undertaken by our churches. Look for it to accomplish great good, and perhaps change the methods in localities where the home work is not successful.
We have a definite membership of individuals, not churches, and our dues are $1 per year, payable quarterly. This money will be used to preach the gospel. At the time of our organization we had 55 members, and are ready to hold meetings as soon as arrangements can be made with some "tent" evangelist.
I believe that we can secure several hundred members in all our churches, and perhaps solve partly the problem of "too numerous collections," by sending part of this money to the home missionary societies. We named the society the Coles County Christian Union. If you are interested in the Coles county plan, write to E. E. Hartley, Mattoon, Ill.

The Fount of Tears.

All hot and grimy from the road,
Dust gray from arduous years,
I sat me down and eased my load
Beside the Fount of Tears.

The waters sparkled to my eye,
Calm, crystal-like and cool,
And breathing there a restful sigh,
I bent me to the pool.

When, lo, a voice cried, "Pilgrim, rise,
Harsh tho' the sentence be,
And on to other lands and skies,
This fount is not for thee.

"Pass on, but calm thy needless fears,
Some may not love or sin,
An angel guards the Fount of Tears,
All may not bathe therein."

Then with my burden on my back,
I turned to gaze awhile,
First at the uninviting track,
Then at the water's smile.

And so I go upon my way,
Thro'out the sultry years,
But pause no more by night, by day,
Beside the Fount of Tears.

—Paul Laurence Dunbar, in Ainslee's.

The George Junior Republic.

If a drop of ink may contain an immortal poem, as has been said, what vast potentialities may not be stored up in that tiny hamlet in Central New York,—the home of the child republic! The motto of the George Junior Republic is, "Nothing without labor." This is the basis of its laws, the essence of its philosophy. Nothing is gratuitous. Merit alone wins. If these economic principles should obtain adoption in the larger nation, what a number of drops of ink, what a multitude of pens, would be needed to tell the story of this little commonwealth to posterity! It was on a bright July morning, in 1895, that the republic was founded, near Freeville, in Tompkins county, New York, where a beautiful stretch of rolling farm land commands a fascinating view of one of the most thriving sections of the state. There the first stone was laid, and the life-study of William R. George began to assume the form of a concrete idea.

When it was started, the Junior Republic was really an attempt to diminish pauperism and crime, by instilling into neglected children those lessons of morality, responsibility and self-control that make the foundations of true manhood and womanhood. The citizens, as the members of the republic call themselves with a thrill of pride, began to arrive even faster than Mr. George had expected. They were of a sort which seemed to argue a brief and disastrous career for the little community. But Mr. George believed that, if the theories of the republic were taught in such a way that the children could learn by experience the inevitable results of laziness, disorder, and disobedience of moral laws, the graduation of good, honest-minded citizens into the greater nation would show a very large percentage of the total membership.

The largest practical measure of self-government was allowed them. Mr. George believed that this would prove an incentive for them to do right. He was not mistaken. Another favorite theory was this: Let a boy possess something, and he will acquire self-respect and honor. It is the man who has nothing, and no idea of securing anything honestly, whose mind turns to the channels of theft.

On these fundamental principles the Junior Republic was born. To-day, it cannot be classed as an "attempt" or an "experiment." It is a fact. It has sent into the world of commerce some young men whom their employers point to with pride, trust, and confidence,—young men whose lives might otherwise have been blackened beyond redemption. It has also placed a number of boys on the road to college; and Cornell, Harvard and Yale are recording some of its ex-citizens among their students. It has taken young girls from the brink of those depths where the soul and body become besmirched with degradation even before the first faint blush of youth has appeared; and these girls now hold excellent domestic positions, or are married wisely. A remarkable fact of this development is that these children have done their upbuilding work themselves. They own their government just as we own our government. They make their laws and administer them according to the guidance of their own judgment. Mr. George exercises no authority over the citizens. Although he is the founder of the republic, and its superintendent, he is nothing more than one of its citizens, with no extra privileges, grants, or conditions. No teacher, secular or religious, has been engaged from the outside.

When a boy or girl reaches the age of twelve years, he or she is eligible to citizenship. Under that age they are classed as minors, and guardians are appointed from the citizen body to take care of them. The officers of the republic are Edward F. King, president; Alice Martin, vice president; George Arthur Sawyer, secretary of state; and Samuel W. Silver, secretary of the treasury. No citizen is eligible for the presidency or vice presidency who has not reached the age of fifteen years, or for the position of secretary of state or secretary of the treasury who has not reached the age of fourteen years. As a matter of fact, all the officers are under twenty. The judge of the supreme court, who is appointed by the president, is George Offer, and the manner in which this lad rules his court is the quintessence of legal dignity, and it does not brook of the farcical. Many a case has been debated before him, by the lawyers of the republic, in excellent style, and his decisions have been based on legal knowledge and sound judgment.

When a boy is admitted to the republic, unless he is of tender years, he is thrown upon his own resources. There are no free beds, no free meals, no conditions to encourage the idler. He must go to work to earn the necessities of life. He may be gruff, ugly in temper, full of abuse, and assume an air of independence, but the bright, thriving atmosphere of the republic soon takes all of this out of him, and he applies for work. There is plenty of work, too. Houses are constantly being built, to increase the much needed accommodations of the republic, and he can become a carpenter, or secure work on the farms, or in the dairy, the laundry, the hotel, or the printing office. For this labor he is paid in money of the republic, which has a value of about twenty cents to the United States dollar. Then he can rent room and buy his food. It will be seen that the first step toward a position of self-respect in the republic is possession, and that little or no sentiment is expended on paupers. There, vagrancy and cigarette smoking are crimes, and gambling is another black felony. The bank of the republic is open at convenient hours, so that the citizens may have every opportunity to deposit and save. Its principles are the same as those of all banking institutions, and it is said that the possession of a check book and the ability to draw checks on her or her personal account has changed the life,—marked the turning-point, as it were, in the career of many a little citizen. So industrious have these little people become that their farm products, preserved jellies and the clothing made by the girl citizens have found a ready market throughout the state. The laws are observed most rigidly. The police department is a well conducted institution. Offenders against the law are arrested by the citizen police, brought before the court of the republic, defended by its citizen lawyers, and, if found guilty, sentenced to its prison, a little frame house in the center of the republic, that marks the goal of the wrongdoer. There are girl lawyers and boy lawyers, and both sexes are summoned to do jury duty.

Politics plays an important part in the affairs of the republic. There are two parties,—the Good Government party and the Citizens Independent party. The latter named organization was successful at the latest election. Political rivalry is keen, exciting, and interesting, and involves some heated disputes both in open speech and in the columns of "The Citizen," the newspaper of the republic.—Success.

Hard to Please.

Regarding the Morning Cup.

"Oh how hard it was to part with coffee, but the continued trouble with constipation and belching was such that I finally brought myself to leave it off.

Then the question was, what should we have for the morning drink? Tea was weak for us than coffee; chocolate and cocoa were soon tired of; milk was not liked very well, and hot water we could not endure.

About two years ago we struck upon Postum Food Coffee, and have never been without it since. We have seven children. Our baby now eighteen months old would not take milk, so we tried Postum and found she liked it and it agreed with her perfectly. It is to-day, and has been, one of the healthiest babies in the state. I use about two-thirds Postum and one-third milk and a teaspoonful of sugar, and put it into her bottle. If you could have seen her eyes sparkle and hear her say "good!" to-day when I gave it to her, you would believe me that she likes it.

If I was matron of an infants' home, every child would be raised on Postum. Many of my friends say, 'You are looking so well!' I reply, 'I am well; I drink Postum Food Coffee.' I have no more trouble with constipation, and know that I owe my good health to Postum Food Coffee.

I am writing this letter because I want to tell you how much good the Postum has done me, but if you knew how I shrink from publicity, you would not publish this letter at least not over my name."—Milford, O.

THE CHRISTIAN - EVANGELIST
THREE MONTHS, 25c.

On Trial to New Subscribers.

But it is always darkest before dawn.

The tide turned the next day. At noon little Bill came tearing home all out of breath, his cheeks flaming, his eyes bright as stars, and rushed pell-mell into the room, with "Towser" at his heels, barking and yelping like a mad dog.

"What on earth is the matter?" his mother cried, dropping her sewing.

When he caught his breath at last, he told her, all in a heap, how, when the school opened that morning, "Miss Eton came into the room from the A grade, asked the scholars to listen to her a moment, and then apologized for her thoughtlessness to me! To me, mama! What do you think of that? She said I was not to blame at all, that I was frightened, and that she ought to have had more sense than to have expected that a little boy like me could stand up there and do a sum on the board with every one looking at him! She said she was sorry, and that she was going to be more thoughtful next time. And then they all cheered her, and some of the fellows cried out, 'Hurrah for our little Bill!' And, mama, they hurrahed for me! Oh, won't papa be pleased! And now, mama, what can I give her? I've got to give her something. Tell me, quick!"

"You can give her anything you want to, little man; nothing is too good for her. There are those carnations on the table. Do you think they will do?"

"Oh, no! They are a day old. I must give her some fresh ones with the dew on them. The others aren't good enough for her."

"All right, my boy; here is the money. Go and get what you want."

He ate but little more dinner that day than the one before (this little chevalier), and, tearing down the road to the florist's, he bought a dozen chrysanthemums almost as tall as himself.

You should have heard the boys cheer when he took them up to the teacher's desk! And as for the teacher—it was a little out of the ordinary line of things, but she just picked little Bill up in her arms and kissed him.—Charles Frederic Goss in Sunday-School Times.

Golf and Shinny.

When we played shinny, long ago,
Our clothing did not fret us,
We wore no coats of sunset glow—
Our mothers would not let us.
Oh, we were coltish in our glee;
We loved to prance and whinny;
We asked no "niblick" and no "tee"
When we were playing shinny.

Oh, where are those companions now—
The thin boy we called "Fatty";
The boy ill clad, with grimy brow;
The boy so neat and natty;
The boy who was so very fat
His comrades called him "Skinny"?
There is no friendship here like that
We knew while playing shinny.

Perchance one day a club I'll take
And set the golf ball flying,
At least an effort I may make;
There's naught, you know, like trying.
But I shall miss those boyish friends,
So freckle-faced and grumpy;
No modern game can make amends
For those lost hours of shinny.

For Impaired Vitality

Take Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

Half a teaspoonful in half a glass of water, when exhausted, depressed or weary from overwork, worry or insomnia, nourishes, strengthens and imparts new life and vigor.

Mamma: "We must get a nurse for the baby." Papa: "Nurse, indeed! What he wants is a night-watchman."

Mrs. Goodsale—To what do you attribute your appetite for strong drink? Is it hereditary? Wragson Tatters—No, lady, it's thirst.

"What a debt we owe to medical science," he said as he put down the paper. "Good heavens!" she exclaimed, "haven't you paid that doctor's bill yet?"

"My son," said the man, "if you only work hard enough when you undertake a thing, you're bound to be at the top when you're through."

"But suppose I undertake to dig a well?"

Willie came from the shed where Uncle Rufus was picking a chicken. "Aunt Sue!" he exclaimed, "what do you think? Uncle Rufus is in the shed husking a hen—honest true."

Would you rather be wise or beautiful? asked Fate of the Coy Young Maiden.

Beautiful, replied the damsel.

Ah, you are wise already, commented Fate, as she tied up a package of cosmetics.

"Now," said the attorney, cross-examining a witness, "you must give explicit and exact answers. You said you drove a milk-cart, didn't you?"

"No, sir, I didn't."

"Don't you drive a milk-cart?"

"No, sir."

"Ah, then, what do you do, sir?"

"I drive a hoss."

Horace Greeley once sent a claim for collection to a Western lawyer, and regarding it as rather a desperate demand, told the attorney if he collected it he might reserve half the amount for his fee. In due time Mr. Greeley received the following laconic epistle: "Dear Sir:—I have succeeded in collecting my half of the claim. The balance is hopeless."

Hostess—And does your mother allow you to have two pieces of pie when you are at home, Willie? Willie (who has asked for the second piece)—No, ma'am. Hostess—Well, do you think she would like you to have two pieces here? Willie (confidently)—Oh! she wouldn't care. This isn't her pie, you know.

One day while the late William R. Travers was sojourning at Bermuda, he came down to the wharf to see the arrivals. Meeting an acquaintance, he said: "Ah Merrill, what brings you down here?" "Came just came for a little change and rest." "Sorry to discourage you," said Travers "but I'm afraid you'll go home without either." "How's that?" said Merrill. "O," said Travers, "the waiters will get all the change, and the landlord will get all the rest."

NEW TESTAMENT COMMENTARIES

During the past two years there has developed among the Christian people of America a great revival of interest in the study of the Bible. Never before in the history of Christianity were so many people zealously and earnestly studying the Bible, endeavoring to know more of its contents and its meaning. Everywhere there are being organized classes and clubs for Bible study. In consequence of this movement there is a brisk demand for Bible helps—books that have hitherto been sold chiefly to preachers. The people are inquiring for the best commentaries and exegetical works to aid them in their study of the Bible. We are glad to be able to announce that we are fully prepared to supply Bible students with the best books to meet their requirements. A few of these we list here:

COMMENTARY ON MATTHEW AND MARK. By J. W. MCGARVEY. A volume of 392 pages, cloth-bound. The former price ($2.00) has been reduced to $1.50.

COMMENTARY ON LUKE. By J. S. LAMAR. A splendid book by a grand man. Cloth, 333 pages. Reduced from $2.00 to $1.50.

COMMENTARY ON JOHN. By B. W. JOHNSON, the well-known commentator. This is a cloth-bound volume of 328 pages. Price reduced to $1.50.

STUDIES IN ACTS. By W. J. LHAMON. One of the finest works of recent years. Bound in cloth; 420 pages; price, $1.25.

COMMENTARY ON HEBREWS. The author, R. MILLIGAN, was one of our most gifted men. Cloth, 395 pages. The reduced price is now $1.50.

PEOPLE'S NEW TESTAMENT WITH NOTES. By B. W. JOHNSON. Two volumes. Vol. I. contains the Four Gospels and Acts; Vol. II. covers the Epistles and Revelation. A concise, but complete work, of as much practical value to the average man as a commentary in 15 volumes costing $30.00. Bound in cloth. Price, per volume, $2.00; per set, $4.00.

Please note that former prices of these works have been reduced 25 per cent. Many thousand copies were sold at the original prices, but we desire that many more thousands shall have the help and benefit of the thought and genius of these eminent Bible scholars. In the case of a class, club or association organized for Bible study, we suggest that a fund be raised to purchase this list of books, and other works, for the joint use of the members. A full description of the volumes in the above list will be found in our 100-page General Catalogue, mailed free on receipt of request. Address,

With the Children.

PETE.

XXII.—That Dog Collar.—Concluded.

"Children," cried Miss Dollie, standing with the tips of her bare toes upon the chair, "don't one of you move! That snake may be wiggling and crawling and coiling and looping itself along anywhere in this darkness!" Madge and Letitia screamed. Lucifer continued to howl under their bed. "Aunt Dollie," said Linda May, who sat rigid upon the edge of Miss Dollie's bed, "that wasn't a snake you felt sliding down your legs, it was a dog collar and rope." "A what?" cried Miss Dollie. "A what, Linda May?" "A dog collar and rope." "Who brought a dog collar and rope into my house?" cried the old lady, still afraid to get off her chair. "Lucifer brought them. Don't you hear him barking in the next room?" "And did you bring a dog collar to bed with you, Linda May?" "Yessum." Miss Dollie descended from her chair and lit the lamp. "Get up girls," said Miss Dollie sternly. "We must oust this dog out of my house. You have been very bad to smuggle him in here without telling me a word. As for Linda May, she is evidently infatuated with her dog and can't sleep without his dog collar and rope! Open that door, Madge. Letitia, you stand in my bedroom door and head him off if he tries to go take his fleas in there. Linda May, all I ask of you is to keep out of the way until your time comes!" They made a strange picture in their nightgowns, the old lady prodding at the dog with a broom while Letitia spread herself out across the bedroom threshold and Madge held open the hall door. At first Lucifer wouldn't budge, but allowed Miss Dollie to pommel and thump him severely, while he tried to squeeze up closer to the corner protected by the bed. But at last a vigorous punch gave him the desperate courage to dash from the room, Miss Dollie screaming and running out of his way. She had Madge and Letitia to let him out of the house, and she made Linda May throw the dog collar out of the window. When the excitement had somewhat subsided, Madge and Letitia crawled back to bed feeling mean and guilty. Miss Dollie closed her room door.

"Aunt Dollie," said Linda May, "are you going to whip me?" "Don't be asking me unnecessary questions," returned the other grimly. "Aunt Dollie, can't you put it off? I would be so ashamed with Madge and Letitia here visiting me." "I never put off for to-morrow what ought to be done to-day," said Miss Dollie, who was still panting and quivering from her recent fright and exertions. "Well, Aunt Dollie, I'll dress. I know you wouldn't want me to catch cold, and I'm afraid to stay up just this way in my nightgown." "Oh, no, Linda May, you needn't dress. I prefer you just as you are. You have been a wicked girl; you have almost frightened me to death; you have been secret and sly again; you have dared to harbor a dog in my room. No, Linda May, I do not want you to dress. It would be superfluous. If ever you needed a good whipping you do to-night, and your own conscience must tell you so. Linda May, don't you think I ought to whip you?

Answer me truthfully." "Yes, Aunt Dollie, if you are going to do just what ought to be done, and if you don't love me." "Bless the child! It's because I love you that I whip you. You'll understand that some day; and now you will understand the whipping. And, O, my steak! So that is what became of it! Your miserable cur stole it, doubtless dragged it over my carpet. And I was blaming Mrs. Mitchell's cat! Come here, Linda May." Miss Dollie must have loved Linda May pretty hard that night, for her hand was uncommonly heavy and resounding. You can't think how Linda May tingled! But what hurt her worse was knowing that Madge and Letitia, scrootched down in their bed, heard those sounds which are like unto no other sounds in the world. I feel sorry for Linda May, but I hope she will be a better girl after this. I really think she could have done better. Every time Miss Dollie remembered how that cold dog collar had slid down her knees, she put on an extra touch. At last when she was satisfied with her work she said, "Now, Linda May, stop that gulping and sniffing and come to bed, and see if you can let me have a little sleep before morning."

"I don't want to come to bed, Aunt Dollie." "Don't you? Well, I am going to blow out the lamp." Miss Dollie went to bed and presently asked, "Linda May, why don't you come to bed?" "Please don't ask me to, Aunt Dollie. I want to sit here in the dark and think." "Linda May, why don't you want to come to bed?" "Because, Aunt Dollie, I feel hard at you. I don't want to sleep with you, Aunt Dollie." "Very well," said Miss Dollie, and the conversation ended.

When morning came, Miss Dollie arose and dressed at that frightfully early hour at which she was accustomed to present herself to the sleepy world—five o'clock. She had nothing to gain by getting up so early, and if it had made her wise she wasn't wealthy anyway. The first object that caught her attention on opening her eyes was Linda May, sitting in the big rocking chair, fast asleep in her gown. It was an east room and the October sunlight shone upon the girl, showing the tears that had dried upon the cheeks. She looked so small and helpless—her little bare feet doubled up in a corner of the chair, her hair streaming over her head, her breast fluttering as if even sleep were a sorrow. Miss Dollie watched her all the time she was dressing. What a puzzle she was to the old lady! A little girl; what could Miss Dollie ever do with her? How could she ever understand her? When Miss Dollie was dressed she was about to go downstairs to "start the kitchen fire," when she hesitated, came back and, bending over the child, kissed her. Linda May opened her eyes suddenly. "Oh, Aunt Dollie!" she gasped. "What is it, Linda May?" "Oh, Aunt DOLLIE! You kissed me! I felt you!" Miss Dollie looked as if she would deny it if she could. "You know you did, Aunt Dollie! You are blushing just as re-e-e-ed! Why, Aunt Dollie! What did you do it for?" The old lady was painfully embarrassed. But she summoned her courage and said, "Linda May, I was looking at you, and you were little and—sad—and—I—just—wanted to kiss you!" Linda May jumped at her and hugged her. "Oh, Aunt Dollie! I'm

For Well People.

An Easy Way to Keep Well.

It is easy to keep well if we would only observe each day a few simple rules of health.

The all important thing is to keep the stomach right and to do this it is not necessary to diet or to follow a set rule or bill of fare. Such pampering simply makes a capricious appetite and a feeling that certain favorite articles of food must be avoided.

Prof. Wiechold gives pretty good advice on this subject, he says: "I am 68 years old and have never had a serious illness, and at the same time my life has been largely an indoor one, but I early discovered that the way to keep healthy was to keep a healthy stomach, not by eating bran crackers or dieting of any sort; on the contrary I always eat what my appetite craves, but for the past eight years I have made it a daily practice to take one or two of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets after each meal and I attribute my robust health for a man of my age to the regular daily use of Stuart's Tablets."

"My physician first advised me to use them because he said they were perfectly harmless and were not a secret patent medicine, but contained only the natural digestives, peptones and diastase, and after using them a few weeks I have never ceased to thank him for his advice."

"I honestly believe the habit of taking Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets after meals is the real health habit, because their use brings health to the sick and ailing and preserves health to the well and strong."

Men and women past fifty years of age need a safe digestive after meals to insure a perfect digestion and to ward off disease, and the safest, best known and most widely used is Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets.

They are found in every well regulated household from Maine to California and in Great Britain and Australia are rapidly pushing their way into popular favor.

All druggists sell Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, full sized packages at 50 cents and for a weak stomach a fifty cent package will often do fifty dollars worth of good.

going to be a good girl after this; maybe some time you'll kiss me again! Tell me you love me, now, Aunt Dollie. Aunt Dollie, you never did tell me so, except just when you was getting ready to whip me." Miss Dollie cleared her throat and tried to speak, and strangled; but she tore the words as if it were from her heart in a burst. "Linda May, I do love you!" And she sat down and took the child upon her lap, and they both cried. Madge and Letitia, who had dressed, looked in. When they saw the tableau, they hastened to form a part of it. So they got down about Miss Dollie on their knees and were forgiven for their part in the dog collar episode. Then Linda May with sparkling eyes said, "Look here, Madge; look here, Letitia; I want to show you something!" She turned and put her arms about Miss Dollie and kissed her. Madge and Letitia gasped, not knowing how Miss Dollie would submit to this liberty. Miss Dollie looked a little ashamed, but nothing happened, and Linda May said, "Aunt Dollie says I can do it whenever I want to!"

Trees by the River.*

TEXT: Blessed is the man that trusteth in the Lord, and whose hope the Lord is. For he shall be as a tree planted by the waters, and that spreadeth out his roots by the river.—Jer. 17:7, 8.

In a parched and desert land, water is a most significant symbol. It does not mean so much in those sections of the country that always have abundance of rain; but where the rain is withheld, and the vegetation is dried up, and even the trees wither, rivers of water are highly prized. The trees that are planted by the river are kept green and fruitful, and endure to old age. They stand as types of the people who trust God and do righteousness.

Blessedness of Trust.

The godly person is here represented as one who trusts in God "and whose hope the Lord is." Trust is confidence arising out of faith. There can be no anxiety, no fret, no fever in him who has learned to trust in God. Obedience is implied; for it is impossible to place our trust in One whom we disobey. The prophet is speaking of one class of people—those who believe in and obey the Lord Almighty. They are like trees by the river, like the flourishing palm, like the mighty cedar. Do you ever ask yourself, what profit is it that I should serve God? Are there not moments of discouragement and darkness in your religious life? These scriptures will awaken you to a new realization of the inestimable gain of godliness, and the blessed state of the children of God.

The first psalm begins with a declaration of the blessedness of believers, and then contrasts their lot with the lot of the wicked. Christians may think at times that they are deprived of pleasures which their worldly friends are free to enjoy, and that the service of the Master is irksome and disagreeable; but this is a mistake. The pleasures of sin endure for but a season; the pleasures of hope never grow old. His yoke is easy and His burden light. If your trust is in God, you will have no fear of the scorching heat. The infirmities of age will have no terror for you.

"E'en down to old age all my people shall prove.
My sovereign, eternal, unchangeable love;
And when hoary hairs shall their temples adorn,
Like lambs they shall still in my bosom be borne."

Negative Virtues.

The people of God are to exhibit the virtues that are their peculiar possession. They are to be full of sympathy and tenderness and love; they are to be fruitful in good works. They are to create an atmosphere of kindness in which they live. But the psalmist enumerates certain negative traits that characterize them. They do not walk in the counsel of the wicked; nor stand in the way of sinners; nor sit in the seat of the scornful. Such conduct as brings one into evil company and makes him a part of it, is here condemned. Christians are to separate themselves from the world.

And there is in all this a great blessedness. There are many worldly occupations or employments, the chief evil of which is that they leave no time for higher things. The righteous man, keeping himself from all such things, has time to study the word of God, and a heart to delight in it. The energies of his soul, not being consumed in worldliness and wickedness, flow forth in good works.

Fruit in Old Age.

Old age without God is hopeless and pitiful. Life is about to close. No matter how brightly the flame burned, now it is to go out in darkness. In the words of Albert Pike, the hopeless old man must say:

*Prayer-meeting topic for Sept. 4.

"I feel 'tis growing colder,
Every year;
And my heart, alas! gets older,
Every year.
I can win no new affection;
I have only recollection;
Deeper sorrow and dejection,
Every year!"

Lying upon his death-bed, such an one was asked,—"Are you a Christian?" "No." "Have you not studied the Bible, and thought of God?" "No." "Then my friend how about the future?" And the answer came, "It is dark, very dark!"

Often the closing years of a godless life are wretched. But there are shining examples of the perennial grace and sweetness which mark the children of hope. It is said that they shall still bring forth fruit in old age; they shall be fat and flourishing. The wrinkled face shines with celestial loveliness, and the trembling voice is touched with seraphic sweetness. Peace and prosperity attend the closing days of the career, and the real blessedness of the righteous becomes more than ever apparent.

Prayer.

Plant us, O God, by the river of waters. Impart unto us the blessedness of those who trust Thee. Dig deeper channels for our faith. Lift our visions to higher summits. We do not ask for lighter tasks, but for greater strength. Refresh the whole household of faith, O Lord, with Thy free Spirit, through Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Cool Spots of Michigan

Are most easily reached via the Pere Marquette Railroad. Through car service from St. Louis and way points via Chicago to Bay View, Petoskey, Charlevoix, Traverse City and Harbor Springs. All of the popular Summer Resorts of Western Michigan are reached by the Pere Marquette. For handsome booklet describing the resorts, write H. F. Moeller, G. P. A., Detroit, Mich.

The Episcopal Convention at San Francisco.

The meeting of this convention at San Francisco will afford an opportunity for many to travel over the Northern Pacific-Shasta Route. The Northwestern scenery of the United States, it is admitted, is of the grandest in the country and the fact that the Yellowstone Park lies in this section is proof of this. No one should miss the opportunity to travel over this route. Cheap rates will apply in one direction via direct routes and in the opposite direction via Portland and the Northern Pacific. For any further information and particulars and copy of Wonderland, 1901, send six cents in stamps to Chas. S. Fee, G. P. & T. A., St. Paul, Minn.

Quaint, Queer and Curious Salt Lake City.

The late Col. John Cockerell in the Cosmopolitan said: "There are three unique cities in America, and one of these is SALT LAKE CITY." It is not only unique in its Temple, Tabernacle and Mormon Church institutions, but quaint in appearance, with its wide streets, immense blocks and martial rows of shade trees. It has, perhaps, more attractions to the square yard than any city in the country, and its climate, while temperate all the year round, is particularly delightful in summer. The Great Salt Lake, with its magnificent Saltair resort, where the water is "deader and denser" than that in the Dead Sea in Palestine, is an attraction in itself that people come miles to see. There are many cool mountain and lake resorts near by, also numerous very pretty canyon trips and parks, drives, Hot and Warm Sulphur Springs. Fishing and hunting in every direction. The trip from Denver to Salt Lake City and Ogden via the RIO GRANDE WESTERN RAILWAY in connection with either the Colorado Midland or Denver & Rio Grande railroads is one of unsurpassed pleasure. Here nature is found in her sternest mood and the whole line is a succession of rugged canyon, waterfalls and picturesque valleys. No European trip can compare with it in grandeur of scenery. During the entire summer there will be low excursion rates to Salt Lake City and contiguous country. It is on the road to the Pacific Coast, if that be your destination. Send four cents postage to Geo. W. Heintz, General Passenger Agent, Rio Grande Western Railway, Salt Lake City, for literature, etc.

Wonderland 1901

the annual publication of the Northern Pacific Railway will be found a distinct advance, in some respects, upon even its immediate predecessor Wonderland 1900.

Its cover designs and eight chapter headings are by Alfred Lenz, of New York, from plastique models and are splendid examples of art.

There is within the covers of the book much historical matter, some of it new, as well as purely descriptive narrative.

The three principal chapters relate to the history of the unique Northern Pacific Trademark, the Custer Battlefield in Montana, and Yellowstone Park. Each is profusely illustrated, the Trademark chapter in colors. This trademark is of Chinese origin and is 5,000 years old. Its story is a strange one.

It is safe to say that Wonderland 1901 will be in greater demand than any preceding volume of the Wonderland family, and, as heretofore it will be sent by Chas. S. Fee, St. Paul, Minn., to any address upon receipt of the postage, six cents.

Jacob at Bethel.*

The events which led to the journey of Jacob from Beersheba to Haran, form a sad story. It is one of the strange paradoxes so common in human life that the home of Isaac and Rebekah, while free from those jealousies which disturbed the peace of other patriarchal households, was the scene of such plotting and scheming as led to grossest deceit and brazen falsehood, resulting in hatred between the brothers Esau and Jacob, and an alienation extending through a score of years. It was unfortunate that there seemed to be a fatal disagreement between Isaac and Rebekah as to the inheritance of the birthright. The father wished it to go to Esau, while the mother determined that Jacob should have it. In this the mother was undoubtedly right, and Isaac was purposing a great wrong to the younger son. At the birth of Esau and Jacob it was plainly declared by the Lord that the firstborn should serve the younger, and that through the latter should the Messianic promise be fulfilled. Whether Isaac misunderstood the divine purpose, or because of his partiality for Esau determined to thwart it, the result was the same. Both Rebekah and Jacob felt indignant that God's promise should be diverted to one whom they knew to be wholly unworthy of it.

For Esau cared little for the honor of the divine heritage. Long before, he had voluntarily yielded his claim to it for a single mess of pottage. He had "despised his birthright." The writer to the Hebrews says that he was a "profane person," one who cared naught for sacred things. Knowing how important it was that the seed of promise should be kept pure, he had married two Hittite women, heathen of the lowest degree, against the earnest wish of his parents. The only value which the birthright could have to him would be the property it might put into his hands. Jacob, on the contrary, valued its spiritual import highly, and was determined that it should not be stolen from him. His error, and that of his mother, was in taking the measures they did to thwart the purpose of Isaac, and resorting to deceit and falsehood to carry their ends. Far better had they trusted to God to fulfill his promise in his own way and time, while they went steadily forward in the pathway of right. They were destined to reap the evil fruit of their evil sowing. It is never right or safe to "do evil that good may come."

In fear of his life, which Esau had sworn to take, Jacob leaves his father's house in Beersheba to go to his mother's paternal home in Haran. He takes with him the blessing of his aged father, who sees too late that his purpose had been contrary to that of Jehovah, and who now renews to Jacob the promise he had unwittingly bestowed upon him before. His journey lay along the ridge of high land that passes through or near Jerusalem, passing by the spot where Abraham had long ago built an altar to God, and offered the sacrifice of a loving heart. Reaching this holy spot, night comes on, and Jacob, feeling such a sense of loneliness come over him as he perhaps had never experienced before, cast himself down upon the ground and engaged in earnest and anxious prayer. Referring in after years to this scene, he proposes to build an altar "unto God, who answered me in the lay of my distress." Having committed himself to the care of the God of his fathers, he fell asleep, his head lying upon his cloak, and laid on one of the stones of the place for a pillow.

Our most radiant visions come to us in our darkest Bethels. To this lonely young man, fleeing from a brother's hate, and going toward a strange land, his heart full of a bitter consciousness of his own wrongdoing and folly, the gracious God appears, to comfort and reassure. The stony hills about him seem to build themselves into a huge stairway, whose top reaches the very heavens, and on which angels are seen going to and fro between the earth and sky. While he gazed with awe upon the spectacle, the voice of Jehovah sounded from heaven, recounting the long-cherished promise given to the seed of Abraham, and assuring Jacob that it shall be fulfilled to him and his descendants. Nor shall he lack of blessing for himself, for God promises to go with him on his long and perilous journey, and bring him, in due time, back to his early home.

The impression on Jacob was most profound. When he awoke from his sleep he said, "Surely the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not." He was afraid and said, "How dreadful is this place: this is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven!" Yes, Jacob, it is well that you should learn that God dwells not alone in Beersheba, but that the universe is his habitation. None can escape his presence, nor hide from his all-seeing eye. A dreadful thought? Yes, to those who fear the Lord, because of their sins. But to the loving, trusting child, a most sweet and consoling assurance. Where can he desire to be, if not in his Father's house? And who would not live in a world that is the very gate of heaven? Has not God promised that the angels shall minister to those who are heirs of his salvation? Could we but realize it, the universe is full of the divine presence, and of unseen ministries of grace to those who put their trust in him.

The stone on which the head of Jacob had rested, during this vision, he now placed as an altar, and poured upon it some of the oil from his flask, and gave to the place the name Bethel, "the house of God," which title it ever after bore. Mohammedan, Jew and Christian have alike hallowed the place, and pilgrims yet visit it and recall with wonder and sacred awe the vision of the patriarch. For many generations the kings of Scotland were crowned upon a stone which was declared to be the very one on which Jacob rested his head, and which now rests in Westminster Abbey. But its authenticity is very doubtful.

The imperfection of Jacob's faith is shown by the language in which he renews his covenant with God. "If God will be with me, and will keep me in this way that I go, and will give me bread to eat, and raiment to put on, so that I come again to my father's house in peace, then shall the Lord be my God: and this stone, which I have set for a pillar, shall be God's house: and of all that thou shalt give me I will surely give the tenth unto thee." It looks a little like bargaining, but Jacob seems to have kept his pledge, and even this imperfect vow is honored of the Lord, and he watches and keeps and prospers his servant, even as he will do toward us, if we walk in the steps of the faith of Jacob.

TOPIC FOR SEPT. 8.

Heavenly Helpers.

(II Kings 6:15-17)

There were unseen messengers of God who posted over sea and land without rest, and told Elisha, the man of God, the very secret words uttered by the enemy, the king of Syria, in his bed chamber. Then the king sought to take and destroy the man of God. He surrounded the town where Elisha lay. Elisha's secretary arose in the morning and saw, with terror, the enemy on all sides.

"It is all over with us now!" he cried. Then Elisha prayed that the secretary might have open eyes to see, and lo, the white-robed messengers of God, the Heavenly Host, swarmed round about the enemy like snow-flakes round a few dried leaves in winter.

Many a time have the blind young men of God thought themselves alone in the midst of enemies. Many a time has it seemed that there was no one for them and a host against them. Oh, for the eyes of faith to see the multitude, whom no man can number, that stand supporting the servants of God when they are in need.

Many a young person has felt the temptations of life thick around him. He has cried out that the fight was greater than he could bear. Let him remember that young man who was tempted in the wilderness forty days, and when he had triumphed, a host of angels ministered unto him. All the while, round about him, supporting him, had been present this white-robed multitude. Temptation comes against us not as an isolated thing. Behind it are a whole lifetime of good or evil choices. Each choice of ours leans not upon its own strength, but upon the strength of a whole chain of good or ill decisions. If these choices have been good, they are like an army of heavenly helpers. If they have been ill, they are like a band of tormenting devils. Blessed is he that overcomes!

To the young Christian it seems often that the Christian is alone in the world, without support, in isolation, while the multitude of the indifferent and worldly and wicked is greater than "leaves of Vallambrosa." Like Elijah under the juniper tree he cries, "There is none left but me, and they seek my spiritual life to take it away." Elijah was morbid, and so, perhaps, is the discouraged Christian who thinks he is alone in a hostile world. Let him lift up his eyes to the hills, whence cometh his help, and he shall see those whom he thought enemies transformed into friends; he shall see the cohorts of the courageous, his fellow Christians, in a vast army; he shall see the spirits of just men made perfect out of all the distant past whose influence is still powerful in the world.

Every error is the truth abused. And even in spiritualism there is doubtless some truth. Long ago the great Channing declared that none of us knew but that the spirits of our beloved dead were with us, round about us, here and now, guarding and helping and sustaining. The ancient Hebrew notion that every child had by his side when sleeping or waking, a guardian angel to fend off disaster, is a beautiful idea, and why may it not be true? Some Endeavorer there is whose mother is gone into the Great Dimness. May she not be with him still? Some whose father or little sister or dear elder brother was loved long since and lost a while. May those dear ones not be round about him strengthening, sustaining, even when he knows it not?

And the Elder Brother of us all—how widely does his heavenly help extend? Is it measured by sea or land, mountains or rivers? Who shall separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord?

Shall tribulation, or anguish, nakedness, peril, famine, death, life, height, depth, things present or to come? Nay, we shall be more than conquerors through him that loved us.

Beautiful lesson this is! How many are the thoughts that come flocking to us about this battle and our allies. We are not alone, for though we work out our own salvation with fear and trembling, it is God which worketh in us. We are not the architects alone of our own destiny. We are not Crusoes in this work of ours. Christian versus Crusoe is a motto for our shield.

There is help for every child of God that cries out for it. Not a little fellow who kneels by his bed, night or morning, and asks God to help him to be a good boy, but is ministered to by angels. Oh, for a faith strong enough to believe this, a faith like that of the aged, worn-out minister, soldier of the cross in New York City. On his death-bed, with his last breath, after folding his hands he prayed his old childhood prayer: "Now I lay me down to sleep," and closed with the words: "Help me to be a good boy. Amen."

Draughon's Practical Business College.

This institution, located in Emilie Bldg., Cor. 9th and Olive Sts., St. Louis, is one of the leading institutions of the kind in the country. Prof. Draughon, who is author of four text books on Bookkeeping, and who was recently offered special inducements by a foreign country to open a Business College across the waters, states that he is confident that his bookkeeping students are fifty per cent. more proficient at the end of a ten weeks' course than the bookkeeping students of almost any other business college are at the end of a six months' course. The advanced Shorthand students at this college are given a course of practical office training in the college office, hence they are competent upon leaving college to hold positions. Draughon's Practical Business Colleges, located in St. Louis, Nashville, Little Rock, Montgomery, Atlanta, Shreveport, Ft. Worth and Galveston, are endorsed by practical bookkeepers and business men from Maine to California. Prof. Draughon reports that the past year has been the most prosperous year, both for attendance and success in placing his graduates in good positions, since his first college was established fifteen years ago, and that the outlook for the fall business is exceedingly good. Students who take Prof. Draughon's guarantee course are allowed to deposit money for tuition in bank until course is completed and position is secured. Prof. Draughon doubtless expends more money in securing positions for his graduates than almost any other Business College in the country takes in as tuition.

Book Notes.

We urge our friends and patrons to remember that the business of the Christian Publishing Company is by no means confined to the books which we ourselves publish, or to the works listed in our catalogues, or to those which we advertise, from time to time, in these columns. We do a general book business, and can supply, at the regular price, any book in print, no matter where or by whom published. We solicit correspondence regarding any desired volume. If you see, anywhere, an advertisement, review or notice of any book, and decide to purchase it, send your order to The Christian Publishing Company.

Many a fond parent is wont to boast that his young son or daughter is "so fond of reading," when that son or daughter would be far better off if absolutely illiterate and unable to read at all. Those parents who exercise a careful supervision over the reading of their children are all too few. In this, as in all things, there are two extremes. There are parents who interdict all books save the Bible, "Pilgrim's Progress" and "Rev. Dr. Somebody's Sermons," though such specimens of bigotry are, happily, very rare in these days. Unhappily, those who go to the other extreme and permit their children to read anything and everything they choose, are far more plentiful. There is not a town or city in the land where there are not freely displayed and offered for sale books that are as truly poisonous to the young mind and heart as is opium to the child's body. Boys and girls purchase these, take them home, and read them under the eyes of their parents, who do not take the trouble to ascertain what manner of volume it is that proves so absorbing and interesting. We are not referring to the works of Ouida and Zola and other authors who are sometimes denounced by pulpit and press. These are bad enough, in all conscience, though they at least maintain a semblance of decency. We are referring to a style of literature compared to which Strathmore and Nana and Camille are innocent, goody-goody Sunday-school stories—works too vile for description and foul enough to bring a blush to the cheek of a nymphe du pape. It is a fact, perhaps not known to all our readers, that there are printed and sold, every month, hundreds of thousands of volumes such as we refer to—volumes so vile that no denunciation could do them injustice. Do any of these find their way into your home?

Of clean, helpful, entertaining books for young people, the Christian Publishing Company has a goodly list. No parent who has a copy of our book catalogue at hand for reference need be long perplexed by the problem, What shall I give my children to read? Nor are our books for the young constructed on the plan of the once popular moral narrative—a biographical sketch of an unnaturally and impossibly pious child, who talked like the Fourth Reader and discouraged emulation and imitation by dying of consumption in the penultimate chapter. They are, instead (those of fiction), healthy, realistic stories, whose characters are possible people, acting in a possible manner. We cannot name near all of our books for the young, but here are a few from the list: Thirteen ($.65), America or Rome ($1.50), Riverside ($.50), Grandma's Patience ($.20), Queen Esther ($.75), Elijah ($.75), Wheeling Through Europe ($1.00), Facts About China ($.25), A Circuit of the Globe ($.2.00), Nehushtan ($.50), Wonders of the Sky ($.50), Mary Ardmere ($1.00), Hugh Carlin ($1.00), Prison Life in Dixie ($.50), Across the Gulf ($1.00), Rosa Emerson ($1.00). If you are seeking a birthday gift for some young friend, this list of books will help you. A detailed description of each may be found in our General Catalogue, sent free on request.

The books written by J. H. Garrison have, perhaps, a greater popularity and a wider circulation among us than any other volumes of the literature of the Disciples of Christ. A single work of his—Alone with God—has reached a sale of nearly 25,000 copies. Other works from the same pen are widely known and greatly admired. Besides his larger works, such as The Old Faith Restated, Reformation of the Nineteenth Century, The Heavenward Way, etc., etc., he has contributed to our literature a number of able pamphlets and tracts. All of his works may be found fully described in our General Catalogue.

Speaking of our catalogue, we may as well announce here and now that we shall very soon issue our 1902 General Catalogue. Our current catalogue—that for 1901—made a decided "hit." It far surpassed anything of the kind that we had ever issued before, or that has ever been issued by any of our publishing houses. The illustrations alone made it a prized portrait gallery, and we have been called upon to send out many thousands of copies to all parts of the country, and to many foreign lands. The issue for 1902 will be fully equal to its predecessor.

We sometimes publish books intended only for one certain class of readers. We may publish one book that appeals only to preachers, or one that will interest only those engaged in some special line of work. But we issue other volumes that are intended for all. This is peculiarly true of The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century. This is a work that every Disciple of Christ ought to read. It is a self-evident truth that no person can be very much interested in what he knows but little about, and that the more a person knows about anything, the more interested he will be in it. Many professed members of our congregations have a languid and feeble interest in our great cause, for the reason that they know very little about it. If they could but be induced to inform themselves concerning the birth, beginnings, early history, progress and triumphs of our movement, they would be aroused from their religious lethargy, and become of some value to the church. If you would like to do a little home missionary work, purchase a copy of The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century and lend it to a few of the sleepy members of your congregation. Make them promise to read just one chapter, and they will certainly read it all, and the reading will bring about a transfiguration. There are few better ways, if any, of investing $2.00 than this.

It is not too early to begin to plan for your reading for the coming autumn and winter. It is much more satisfactory to carefully select and secure a list of first-class volumes to be read during the season, than to wait until you want to read something, and must hurriedly snatch up the first thing your hand finds. When you have made up your list, send it to us, whether the books on the list are published by us or not. Remember, we can supply any book published, and shall be glad to fill your order for any printed thing.

THE ART OF LIVING.

THE supreme art, to which all other arts rightly understood and used minister, is the art of living. At all times and in all places the materials of art are present; but the men who can discern the possible uses of these materials, and who possess the instinct and the training to put them to these uses, are always few in number and often widely separated in time. In like manner, the mysterious force which we call life is put into every man's hand; but the men who discern its highest and finest possibilities, who get out of it the richest growth, and who put into it the noblest personal energy, are few in number. The great majority use life as the artisan uses his material; a very small minority use it in the spirit and with the power of the artist. The artisan is often sincere, diligent and fairly skilful; but he is imitative, conventional and devoid of creative power. The artist, on the other hand, is free, individual, constructive; he sees the higher possibilities of the material which he commands, and the most delicate uses of the tools which he employs; he discerns new meanings, evokes unsuspected powers, reveals fresh feelings, and gives the familiar and the commonplace a touch of immortality.

Current Events.

Senatorial Possibilities in Missouri. Congressman Champ Clark was in St. Louis a few days ago and suffered himself to be interviewed in regard to the Missouri senatorship which will be vacant if, as is stated on good authority, Senator Vest declines re-election. Mr. Clark frankly admitted that "a seat in the Senate is a nice thing to have in the family" and promised not to be foolishly coy in case the office should appear to woo him. Yet he was wise enough not to make a formal announcement of his candidacy. Such an action would be the signal for a dozen aspirants for his present seat in Congress to spring into the arena. Mr. Clark can doubtless consider that seat his as long as he wants it and he realizes the folly of swapping a sure thing for a possibility. In his own expressive phrase, "a bird in the hand is the noblest work of God." It is well enough, however, without releasing his grasp on the congressional bird, to cast a pinch of salt deftly toward the caudal plumage of the senatorial fowl. There are plenty of other candidates ready to respond to the slightest whispered call of duty and assume Senator Vest's toga. It is a capacious garment and would hang in flapping folds upon the meagre political forms of some of the aspirants. Mr. Clark has been a notable figure in the House, has earned a national reputation as an orator, is without question one of the best political "mixers" in the country, and probably has not a serious enemy in the state even among his rivals. On the whole, there will be a rather general sentiment in Missouri that the member from Pike County would make a very good-looking Senator.

A Horrible Example. The Pennsylvania Republican Convention, which performed all its functions from organization to adjournment, including the adoption of a platform and the nomination of candidates, in the phenomenal and record-breaking time of one hour and thirty minutes, is a horrible example of the extent to which corruption can go in the hands of experts who can manage for their own private ends the party organization of a great state. The Democratic convention, which we recently commented upon, wisely confined itself to state issues. The Republican convention criticised this action and made a futile attempt to divert the public mind from the state issue of honesty versus theft to the national questions of protection and expansion. It calls upon the people of Pennsylvania to forget the virtual theft of millions from the city of Philadelphia by the authority of a Republican legislature and city council, and to support the Quay-Ashbridge machine out of compliment to the federal administration and because of the general prosperity which has prevailed since 1896. It enlarges upon the glories of the Republican party, its past achievements, its present success and its hopeful future, and, passing lightly over the well-proven charges which are made against the Quay ring as a matter to be looked upon "with amusement rather than concern," it asks the people to commit the affairs of the state to a clique which has ever been a disgrace to its party. We have called this a futile attempt, but it remains to be seen how futile it will really be. It is at least foolish, but it remains for the citizens of Pennsylvania to show in the autumn election whether they love honesty more than party or whether they consider themselves under bond to line up when the party whistle blows. There is no other issue than that in Pennsylvania this year. A fusion of all the anti-Quay forces is being organized to overcome the normal Republican majority in the state.

A Perversion of Sport. The press dispatches are giving us much interesting information about the magnificent yachts which will meet Sept. 21 and one of the greatest contests ever witnessed in that greatest of all sports. The preliminary contest between the old "Columbia" and the new "Constitution" to decide which shall have the honor of defending the cup against the British challenger, is at present the point of chief interest, though that contest has almost been decided in favor of the Columbia which won the first race on Saturday and would have won the second on Monday had not a sudden failure of the wind becalmed them both. It is noted also that already all records have been broken in the way of heavy betting on the race for the cup. It is a pity that a noble sport like this cannot be kept clear of the curse of gambling. The men who are wagering their thousands on the outcome of this event are perhaps not open to argument in regard to the wickedness and the demoralizing tendencies of gambling, but they ought at least to see that it is inconsistent with the spirit of pure sport. A man who receives pay for playing baseball or football or cricket or golf is reckoned as a professional and is ruled out of the circle of amateur sportsmen. An amateur is, by the derivation of the word, one who follows a pursuit for the love of it and not for gain. If a man does not love yachting enough to follow it for its own sake, he is no true yachtsman. If he needs to wager a fortune on the outcome in order to make it interesting, then he is no true sportsman, for if he were he would find it interesting enough without the wager. The same principle applies to horse-racing. It is a beautiful thing, with interest enough in itself. But when the turf is given over to those who cannot find in the horses enough to interest them and must add the element of possible financial gain to make it worth while, then it passes out of the realm of sport and into the realm of business—and a foolish and immoral business at that. We believe in sport and regret that the spirit of gambling, which is the complete antithesis of the spirit of sportsmanship, should have pervaded so many of our best amusements. This tendency should be no less distressing to the right-minded sportsman than to the moralist. Why not leave wagers of money to matters which are in themselves dull and uninteresting, like dice, or the turtle-races which the Indians sometimes hold? Surely yachting ought not to be spoiled by the addition of any such superfluous and illegitimate feature.

Dodging Taxes. Attention has recently been called by a magazine writer to the fact that tax-dodging and the returning of false assessments is now practiced in Chicago to such an extent that the assessed valuation of the taxable property in that city according to the official records was less in 1900 than it was in 1873. At the earlier period, two years before the fire, people had less property, but the art of concealing it from the assessors was less highly developed. The revenue of the city is more than twice what it was in 1873, but after the necessary deduction has been made for the maintenance of the public schools and the library and for interest and sinking fund, it is found that the net revenue available for general city purposes is less than it was twenty-seven years ago. Viewed from this angle, Chicago's unparalleled growth in the last quarter of a century seems to have something wrong with it. Its assessed valuation is less than one-twelfth that of New York and about one-fourth that of Philadelphia or Boston. But in spite of these figures it cannot be said that the sin of tax-dodging is peculiar to Chicago. There is probably not a city in the country that does not suffer from it to some degree. It seems inconceivable that a public-spirited citizen with apparently a reasonable amount of civic pride—and sometimes more than a reasonable amount—should be willing to rob his city of what he justly owes to its support. The root of the trouble probably lies in the fact that there are few cities in which the citizens have any respect for the city government or any confidence in its integrity, however loyal they may be to the city itself. The treasury is plundered by political ringsters and the dollars that are supplied by the tax-payer are often lavishly poured out like water—but without so much as laying the dust in our streets. Under such conditions it takes a degree of civic pride much higher than the average to persuade a man to do the perfectly honest thing by a city government which never does the honest thing by him and his fellow citizens. The abuses of municipal government are many and they are all related to each other. The false-assessment evil will probably never be removed until the city treasures are controlled by men capable of administering large sums honestly and efficiently. Of course it is perjury in any case to swear to a false assessment, but men will do it with an easy conscience until a city's tax money is considered as a trust fund for careful investment rather than as a convenient source of supplies for grafters.

By Rail to Paris. The most daring project ever conceived in the sphere of railroading is a newly announced scheme to bridge Behring Sea and thus connect New York with Paris by rail. It is estimated that, by utilizing the Aleutian Islands, it would be possible to reduce the distance from the coast of Alaska to the coast of Asia to less than the width of Lake Michigan and a ferry can easily carry the trains across this gap. The line can then run down to Vladivostok and connect with the trans-Siberian railway. Some day it will doubtless be found desirable to have a railway through northern Canada and Alaska and when that time comes it will be possible, theoretically at least, to send a train to the end of the Aleutian Islands and carry it thence across the strait. At any rate, timid persons who wish to go to Europe, but are afraid of the ocean voyage, are welcome to any comfort which they may be able to derive in the contemplation of this possibility.

The Kaiser & Prince Chun. Prince Chun, the brother of the Emperor of China, who is on an expiatory mission to Germany to express regret for the death of Baron von Ketteler, has gotten as far as Basel and a hitch in the proceedings has now occurred. The Kaiser has dictated the form of the statement which Prince Chun is to make, to the effect that the Chinese government "apologizes for the murder" of the German ambassador. Prince Chun objects to this and wishes to say that his governments "regrets the death" of the ambassador. The form given by the Kaiser evidently leaves no opportunity for the Chinese to "save face," which is a matter of prime importance in their minds. More than this, the Kaiser has demanded that Prince Chun's suite kotow, or knock their heads nine times on the floor before him. As this is a ceremony reserved particularly as a sign of allegiance and homage to their sovereign, the Emperor of China, the protest seems reasonable. Forty years ago an arrangement was made by which the European ministers in China were relieved of the necessity of performing this humiliating ceremony, and the agreement has been kept. The kotow has been only for Chinese before the Emperor of China, a sort of ceremonial oath of allegiance. The Kaiser's attempt to force the envoys to pay the same homage to him that they do to their own sovereign is absurd. He has already conceded that this requirement shall not be made of Prince Chun, and the entire cavalcade is now halted at Basel pending an agreement as to the form of obeisance to be made by the Prince's suite. It is rather too much for even a Hohenzollern to try to pose as the Son of Heaven.

The Bishop and the Princes. The gathering of the Methodist Episcopal bishops in London has been the occasion for a comparison of views on the negro question. The color line has never been drawn in England, because negroes are not numerous in that country, because they have no memory of negroes as slaves, and because the Indian dignitaries and princes, whom they see nearly as often as they see negroes, are about of the same color and yet of undoubted social position. When Bishop Derrick, of the African Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States, registered at a fashionable hotel in the West End, there was an instant and indignant protest from several Americans who were stopping at the hotel. They threatened to leave the hotel if the negro was not sent away. But the proprietor of the house—a benighted and down-trodden subject of an effete monarchy, which never had a Declaration of Independence declaring as a self-evident truth that all men are created free and equal—allowed them to go. With that singular obtuseness which sometimes characterizes those who have lived all their lives under the blighting influence of class distinctions and the social domination of an aristocracy, the proprietor could not see any real line of demarcation between the Indian princes, who had been entertained at his hotel without protest a few months before, and an American Bishop of the same shade. Even the fact that His Majesty is Emperor of India as well as King of England, while the unfortunate African had no connection with the British Empire either by ancestry or present allegiance, did not seem to the proprietor a sufficient ground for discrimination in favor of the Indian princes, though some of his American guests apparently considered that either this fact or the descent of the princes through ancestral lines of maharajahs did make a substantial difference. At all events, the colored bishop stayed at the hotel and his fastidious fellow countrymen left. It may be well enough to provide separate churches, hotels and railway cars in this country where there are large numbers of negroes of all sorts and conditions, but this display of indignation over the reception of a lone bishop into a London hotel looks like a plain case of inherited prejudice.

Missionary Magazines. In both the Baptist and Congregational denominations there are movements on foot for the unification of missionary enterprises, at least to the extent of uniting their various missionary publications into one. At present the Congregationalists have six missionary societies and six missionary monthlies. Their recent general assembly approved the recommendation that the six be united and a committee was appointed to devise a scheme of joint editorial management. The six secretaries seem much less enthusiastic over the proposed change than the rank and file of the denomination, each fearing doubtless that his own society will be accorded less recognition than it receives at present. The Baptists have been considering a similar plan for unifying their missionary organs, but the idea received little encouragement at their Springfield convention. Nevertheless, it is a plan which commends itself to the judgment of the laity, not only among the Baptists and Congregationalists but among others as well. The missionary magazine which is the organ of but one society and represents only one-fourth or one-sixth of the missionary work of a denomination, cannot expect to have many subscribers and must in almost every case be sent out at a loss as so much advertising matter. On the other hand, a magazine representing all the co-operative work of a religious body can present a reasonable variety of contents and can make a strong enough appeal to the interests of its constituents to secure a considerable list of subscribers. The unification of missionary publications does not involve the consolidation of the societies or any infringement upon the independence of each. It looks to us like a wise plan and we would be glad to see it tried.

Brevities The first stake of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition of 1903 was driven on Tuesday of this week. This marks not the beginning of actual work on the building but the beginning of the survey for the buildings.

Vice-President Roosevelt has agreed to write a history of the Rough Riders. The work is to be published under the auspices of the state of New Mexico, the legislature of which has already made an appropriation for its publication.

Admiral Sampson is reported to be dangerously ill and it is doubtful whether he will be able to attend the Schley inquiry to give testimony. According to the meager reports which have leaked out in spite of the vigilance of those in attendance, the trouble is at least partly mental.

A convict in the Minnesota penitentiary has exhibited remarkable ingenuity by making counterfeit silver dollars, in spite of the difficulties imposed upon him by the restrictions of his environment, and passing them off through confederates on the outside. He already had a comfortable sum to his credit on the outside, ready to begin life anew when his term should expire, when the prison authorities got on his trail.

The editors of twelve leading French papers have just sailed from France for a tour through the United States. If we can arrange to exhibit to them a lynching, a few phases of the strike, three or four rounds of the Sampson-Schley argument and a few days of a lively political campaign, we can send them back home convinced that the Anglo-Saxon race in some quarters is not inferior to Gallie for excitability and demonstrativeness.

One of those statisticians, who takes delight in figuring out grand totals where other people see only small details, has estimated that the damage done to crops and vegetation in this country by bugs amounts to $300,000,000 a year. As the bird is the natural enemy of the bug, and the man with the gun is apparently the natural enemy of the bird, it would obviously be a good investment to compel the man with the gun to let the bird alone that he may fulfill his appointed function as the destroyer of our common enemy, the bug. In view of these figures it appears that the Audubon Society is more than a matter of sentiment. It is a dangerous matter to interfere with the equilibrium which nature has established.

The Ground of Biblical Optimism.

As stated in a former article on "The Optimism of the Bible" the optimism of the Bible writers does not spring from any failure to recognize the sinful condition of the world, or the evils which afflict humanity. On the contrary the most optimistic characters of the Bible are those who had the keenest insight into the moral obliquities of their times, and who were boldest in denouncing the sins of the people. It is clear, therefore, that their hopeful view of the final outcome does not spring from any blindness to existing conditions. It must have its source in something higher and deeper than anything that the unaided human intellect could reach.

The real source of a genuine and unflinching optimism, which yields to no discouragement, is faith in God—a faith that embraces not only the existence of an Almighty Being, Creator of the heavens and the earth, but His goodness and His loving kindness to the children of men. Once we get a clear vision of God's character as merciful and compassionate, as well as all-wise and all-powerful, we find it impossible to believe that He would have created the world as it is, and man as he is, clothed with the power of choice, unless He had foreseen that the outcome of all this earthly struggle would be such as to justify this creative act. "Known unto God are all His works from the beginning of the world," and known unto Him, also, are all the results of His works. Had He not known, from the beginning, that the making of man in his own image, and placing him in a world where he would be subject to temptation and trial, was the best thing for humanity, and would at last issue in such results as would vindicate His wisdom and goodness to the principalities and powers in heavenly places, He would not have so created the world and mankind.

Men take short views of human history, and that, too, in limited space, it may be, and pronounce humanity a failure and this world the worst possible world. But how can one hope to reach a true conclusion from such a partial induction of facts? One would require to know the totality of human history from the beginning to the end of the race on this earth, and then have the power of penetrating into that unseen world that lies beyond, until God's purposes concerning mankind are all consummated, before he would be able to form a sound conclusion based on inductive reasoning. But no man has access to all these facts, save as he accepts them by faith, and then only so far as they have been revealed. But He who came from the bosom of the Father, who was in the beginning with God and who was God, by whom all things were created, and who, in the fulness of time "became flesh and dwelt among us,"—He, Jesus of Nazareth, was an optimist, and foretold a glorious future for the race. How, then, can we believe in Christ, and not share in the joy and enthusiasm which filled His soul when He contemplated the outcome of His own suffering and death "for us men and our salvation"? "For the joy that was set before Him He endured the cross despising the shame"—the joy of glorified millions redeemed by his blood.

Jesus Christ, then, or God in humanity, is the real source of a true optimism. Just in proportion as prophets, poets, lawgivers and sages of the olden time were moved by Christ's spirit, they were optimistic. But when He Himself came, He opened a well-spring of hope and joy in the desert of human life, which has gradually sweetened all its streams. His coming in time occurred nineteen centuries ago, but it was in God's thought and plan from the beginning, before even the foundations of the earth were laid. Not His coming, alone, but His death for the sins of the world, was present in the mind of God long before it was said, "Let us make man in our own image." "He stood as a Lamb slain from before the foundation of the world." In his incarnation, life, teaching and death, by which God entered into humanity and changed the course of human history, lay the potentiality for the world's redemption. Here we find the vindication of God's wisdom and goodness in creating man the being that he is, and the basis for an optimism which no defeat or delay can change into pessimistic despair. "If God be for us, who can be against us?" exclaimed one who had caught the spirit of his Master. Not Paul alone, but all the apostles, after Christ's resurrection, shared in the same spirit, and amidst labors, persecutions, perils and privations, they ceased not to declare the gospel of hope to a despairing world, and to rejoice continually in the glorious outlook into the future for those who accepted Christ as their Savior and Lord.

The great spirits of human history, who have had power to lead their fellow men on to heroic deeds and noble achievements, have possessed this same spirit of optimism. They have uttered words of hope, not of despair. They have fallen in line with God's great purposes of grace, and have believed in humanity because they believed in God, who was in humanity working out its redemption and glorification. This note of despair that we hear cometh not of faith, but of skepticism. Let him that hath the spirit of faith hear and heed the message of God through his ancient prophet, "Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people, saith the Lord."

Confusion About Theological Terms.

The able editor of the Sunday-School Times has not yet succeeded in making his position on conversion satisfactory to his readers. Recently he asked the question in replying to one of his critics, "Where in the Bible do we find it stated or intimated that 'conversion' is essential to church membership?" This naturally enough raised a storm of protests against the idea of an unconverted church membership. The editor defends his position in the issue of the Times for Aug. 24, by making a "world-wide difference between conversion and the new birth."

In reply to one of his critics the editor says:

"Many persons confuse in their minds 're-generation,' or being 'born again' and converting, or as the Revised Version gives it, 'turning again.' Yet the difference between these two is more than world-wide. Regeneration is God's work. 'Turning,' spiritual turning, is man's work, whether it be the first time or the tenth in the sinner's Christian life. To confound these two terms is a grave mistake and has caused much spiritual harm among spiritual believers."

Commenting on another one of the letters which he quotes against his position, the editor says:

"It will be seen that this writer confuses 'conversion,' or 'turning about,' a voluntary act of the individual, with 're-generation,' or the 'new birth,' or 'a change of heart,'—an act of God, for and not of man, with which the individual has nothing to do. How common and how fearful this mistake! And how easily men seem to slip into it!"

Now all of this is very confusing. The editor seems to be in bondage to a set of theological terms. Where is the proof for any such fundamental distinction between conversion and the new birth as he makes? It does not exist. It is a part of a theological system that is supposed to be drawn from the Scriptures, but much of which has been drawn from false conceptions of the Scriptures and of human nature. The truth is, the terms referred to, together with others, refer to the same general process, the bringing of the alien sinner into union with God. No one of the New Testament writers uses all of them, which they would be likely to do if each one stood for a distinct and vital step in man's salvation. Paul uses, in the main, forensic terms as "condemnation," "justification" and "adoption." John, on the contrary, uses mainly biological terms. He speaks of being born again, of life, of sonship. He says nothing about "justification," which is Paul's great word. And yet they both deal with the same change in human life and character. They used such terms as they deemed to be best fitted to convey the spiritual truth to their readers. But the religious world has gone to work and built up distinct systems of theology based on these phrases. It is perfectly practical and is probably often advisable to express the whole truth these men taught, and omit entirely those terms about which there has been so much confusing controversy.

Is it not perfectly plain that, when the New Testament speaks of people being converted, or of their turning to the Lord, it means to include what is elsewhere designated as being "born again"? If this is not so then it is impossible to understand the Acts of the Apostles, and other New Testament records. Of course these different terms view the same process from different angles. Conversion may emphasize man's part in turning to God, and regeneration God's part; but it is an error to suppose that conversion is wholly man's work, or that regeneration is wholly God's work. In both terms man's co-operation with God is implied. The act of turning is of course man's act, but the influences which cause him to turn are from God. So in regeneration. When we come to study that word in the light of New Testament teaching we find it is a process, involving a begetting by the truth, through faith. "Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth." "He that believeth that Jesus is the Christ, is begotten of God." If we allow this begetting through the truth to complete the new birth, even their human agency is involved, for believing is man's act, as is also repentance, both of which are implied in man's new birth. If we include baptism in the process as formally bringing forth the newly begotten life into a new environment, then another human act is involved. So that it seems to us far from the truth to say that regeneration is "an act of God, for and not of man, with which the individual has nothing to do." If man has "nothing to do" towards his regeneration, then why are not all men regenerated? The only answer is Calvinism—God elects some to be saved and passes the others by—an answer thoroughly discredited in the light of our modern conception of God's character and of his methods of dealing with the race.

We should be glad to see our esteemed contemporary straightened out on this question, and the above is offered as a humble contribution to that end.

Gideons.

The "Gideons" is the name of an association of traveling salesmen who neither drink, swear nor play poker. Different occupations have their distinctive temptations and it seems that these are the ones most potent with the knights of the grip. There is a general belief, with probably a good deal of truth in it, that a traveling man cannot sell goods unless he makes a reputation for being "a good fellow." But with this idea there is joined a perverted notion of what constitutes good fellowship. In reality, the fellowship which depends upon these three vices is a spurious article, without rational basis, without the stability that wins respect and without the trustworthiness which is the indispensable condition of friendship.

It is true not only in the work of the traveling salesman, but in the work of the teacher, the preacher, the insurance agent and every other calling which brings a man into relation with men, that success comes in largest measure to the man who possesses a certain social quality which may be called good fellowship. To possess the faculty of getting upon friendly terms with your customer, or your pupil, or the sinner whom you wish to convert—that is, to establish a relation of mutual confidence and genuine esteem—is to be a long way on the road toward selling goods to that customer, imparting ideas and ideals to that pupil and making a convert of that sinner. We sometimes think of this as being a coldly commercial age, which makes light of personal relationships and attaches importance only to dollars and cents. But in reality even the harsh world of business is moved largely by personal considerations. We prefer to have dealings with our friends, or at least with those in whose integrity we have confidence. The average traveling man knows this and tries to make friends with everybody on the road. His employers know that his usefulness depends largely upon his ability as a "mixer."

But how fatuous to suppose that practices which are in themselves vicious and demoralizing can pave the way to a relationship which shall be permanently profitable and agreeable. The blandishments of cocktails and poker may make easy the way to a hilarious acquaintance with men of a certain sort, but even the faintest glow of genuine friendship or real mutual esteem is not to be found in that direction. The "Gideons" are on the right track. They do not deny that in trade, as in politics, it is the cordial and agreeable man who sells the goods and gets the votes, and they propose to be just as good fellows as they know how to be. But they have enough fundamental intelligence to see that this is better accomplished by refraining from those practices which, far from laying the foundation for friendship, destroy the confidence of all persons of sound and conservative morals. Good for the Gideons!

Notes and Comments.

The secular press does not seem to be much interested in the experiment in prohibition which Gen. Kobbe is trying in the department of Mindanao and Jolo in the Philippines. By an order which went into effect August 1 he has forbidden the retail sale of all alcoholic beverages both native and foreign and has closed all the places devoted to their sale. No trouble is reported up to date from the enforcement of this order and it may be discovered in that distant community that prohibition is practical for both soldiers and civilians.

Has the old-time mysticism, which our fathers in the faith combated so strenuously, entirely disappeared? The following was printed in a Presbyterian paper and quoted approvingly by a Baptist paper: "Martin Luther in one of his conflicts with the Devil was asked by the arch-enemy if he felt his sins forgiven. 'No,' said the great reformer, 'I don't feel that they are forgiven but I know they are, because God says so in his word.' Paul did not say, 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt feel saved,' but 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved.'" It was not ever thus. Half a century ago this would have been considered rank heresy by both Baptists and Presbyterians.

A writer tries to disprove the evolutionary theory by exalting the power of God, forgetting that sensible and reverent evolutionists are not seeking in evolution an easy substitute for creation, nor trying to make the creative process simple enough for God to accomplish, but are merely trying to find the process which he actually used. "God had power to make man full grown, physically, mentally and spiritually, and to make the world in an instant and send it hurling through space with all its mountains, rivers, trees and birds complete in a moment." Certainly. And He had power to make the fossils as fossils, giving them the appearance of organic forms, and put them into the rocks for men to find and wonder about. But did he?

The following bulletin recently issued by the Union Pacific railroad to its employes shows that railroad managers do not talk about what the men demand and will have, as some army officers do. The officers say that the men "will have liquor" and "if they cannot get it in one way they will get it in another." The railroad officials say that they shall not have it. Is it possible that there is better discipline on the railroad than in the army? The bulletin is as follows: "It is a well known fact that the habitual use of intoxicating liquors impairs the efficiency of a person addicted to such use. The duties of the employes of a railroad company, particularly those engaged in the transportation or mechanical departments, are most exacting and necessarily demand clear judgment and a sound body.

It is therefore deemed advisable to notify all employes that the habitual use of intoxicating liquors or the frequenting of saloons or places where such liquors are sold will be considered sufficient cause for dismissal from service."

The following is not the utterance of a temperance fanatic, but is an exact quotation from the advertisement of a well known brewery as it appears in the leading magazines for the current month: "Beer is an ideal breeding place for germs. Let but a few germs get into it, and they will multiply by millions." As the utterance of a firm which has beer to sell, this seems a significant concession. Of course the ad. goes on to say that for this reason it is very dangerous to drink any brand of beer except ours which, by superhuman efforts, we keep free from germs. But after all is the brewer not asking the public to take rather long chances, when he admits that beer in general is dangerous and merely gives his unsupported word that his beer is not so dangerous as the rest?

Labor Day was celebrated on Sept. 2 with parades, brass bands and a general cessation of labor. We rejoice in every victory of honest toil over avaricious capital—while recognizing that not all toil is honest and not all capital is avaricious—and are always glad to see any arrangement by which the laboring man comes into possession of a more adequate proportion of the fruits of his industry. But sometimes it seems that the labor organizations would be more efficient in doing their legitimate work if they were less anxious to get in the public eye. Still, perhaps the average laboring man is so constituted that he feels better if he can parade once a year under the banner of the union. He imagines that it exalts his dignity in the face of the world and impresses the capitalists with the power of the organization. So the carriages go by with plumes and bells and flags and, for this day at least, the walking delegates all ride.

Opinions have always been divided as to the relative desirability of sermons read from manuscript and sermons delivered without manuscript. It is interesting to note that as far back as 1674, and probably a good deal earlier, the same difference of opinion prevailed. Charles II. of England was so strenuously opposed to the reading of sermons that, in the year mentioned, he had an ordinance issued to the University of Cambridge, where this custom was most prevalent, by its Lord Rector, in the following words: "Whereas his majesty is informed that the practice of reading sermons is generally taken up by the preachers before the university, and therefore even continues before himself, his majesty hath commanded me to signify to you his pleasure that the whole practice, which took its beginning from the disorders of the times, be wholly laid aside; and that the said preachers deliver their sermons, both in Latin and English, by memory, without book, as being a way of preaching which his majesty judgeth most agreeable to the use of foreign churches, to the custom of the university before, and to the nature of that holy exercise." However, let those who propose to quote the authority of Charles II. against reading sermons take heed of the rest of his order and "deliver their sermons, both in Latin and English, by memory."

Those south-side Chicago steel workers who refuse to go out on a strike because it would violate an agreement into which they had entered, should have some sort of monument erected to their memory by their fellow-workmen. If this sort of thing should become contagious it will not be long until a "strike" among laboring men will have vastly more significance than at the present time. It is not a question whether the strike in the general organization of steel workers of which these men were a part, was justified, but it is a question whether contracts are binding between labor organizations and employers of labor. If not, no amount of logic or eloquence can give these organizations the moral standing before the American people which is necessary to the success of their cause. These Chicago men stand for the sacredness of their contracts, and in doing so they confer honor on the cause of labor and on labor unions. Their conflict with the officials of the striking organizations is more vital to the welfare of labor unions than that between the strikers and the manufacturers of steel.

Science tells us that now and then there appears in certain animals an organ which has been atrophied in most of the species, but which has persisted in these particular individuals and serves to show the line of evolution along which the species has come. The same thing occurs in men and in institutions. It not infrequently happens that men exhibit traits of the "brute inheritance," which have persisted from a more rudimentary stage of civilization. Now then a belated specimen of the genus preacher, or religious editor, manifests a disposition, and uses a method, which must have been prevalent at an earlier period in the history of civilization, but which in the process of religious evolution has happily been dropped off, or atrophied, in the vast majority of his kind. These specimens are interesting as indicating the line of development and the progress which has been made. The minister who imagines his orthodoxy is in proportion to the number of other people he can prove to be heretics, and the religious editor who still thinks that the odium theologicum is a legitimate weapon of warfare to use in furthering the interests of his journal, should be classified with the three-toed horse, the six-fingered man and other odd specimens of animated being, to be scientifically studied.

Editor's Easy Chair

Macatawa Musings.

The sky is gray and cold this morning, and the lake is sending up a melancholy wail as if it were in a murmuring mood. Last night a thunderstorm with rain and hail broke in upon the moonlit scene and disturbed the serenity of the lake, and it seems to be making its protest this morning against the innovation. All bodies of water tend to quietness, placidity and stagnation, and their inertia is only overcome by outside forces moving upon them. The moon tugs at them continually to stir them up, and the fierce winds blow over them and set them in wild commotion. But this agitation keeps them pure and healthy and prevents stagnation. They are natural conservatives, however, and resent this interference with their tendency to come to a dead calm. We have known them at times to become white with rage, as they thundered their anathemas against the winds and the tides—those progressive forces which are continually disturbing the peace and placidity of these large and otherwise lazy liquidities. It is not different with the great sea of human society. Agitation is the law of its life and progress. Men resent it, and want to be let alone to stagnate, mentally and morally. But the tides of the Spirit, and the winds which blow out of the regions of mental disquiet and spiritual unrest, keep the world moving on to higher and holier altitudes.

Human society, regarded as a sea, is not a new figure. It is one of the favorite symbols of the seer of Patmos. If you translate the word sea by humanity, in the book of Revelation, when it is used figuratively, you will not miss the author's meaning very far. Have you noticed how much water has to do with John's imagery in that wonderful book? It isn't strange when we remember that he was in a small island in the midst of the sea. Patmos was not a favorite summer resort in those days, and the "beloved disciple" had things pretty much his own way on the island. What times he had for meditation, as he would sit upon some high rock by the shore, and look out over the sea that encompassed him, now smooth as a "sea of glass mingled with fire," as the low, descending sun sent its level beams across its placid bosom, painting it crimson and gold, and now thundering in its fury and roaring with "the voice of many waters"! How naturally these scenes were woven into his splendid imagery! A lady who has read "Macatawa Musings" for several years, visiting the Park recently for the first time, climbed to the upper veranda of Edgewood-on-the-lake, and as she took in the wide expanse of lake which lay before her vision, she said, "Well, I can understand now why you have had so much to say about the lake in your 'Musings'! No doubt if any of us were privileged to visit the isle of Patmos and gaze upon the same scenes which John must have witnessed daily during his exile, we would realize, as never before, why he used much of his strange symbolism.

This rolling, restless, murmuring lake to-day is a fit symbol of our times. How much disquiet and unrest there are abroad in the world! Men have sought rest in a thousand things, and have found it not, because they have not sought it in the right way. Here is a cablegram from London containing an interview with William K. Vanderbilt which he gave to a representative of a British publication. He says, "My life was never destined to be quite happy. It was laid on lines which I could foresee almost from earliest childhood. It has left me with nothing to hope for, with nothing definite to strive for." Poor Vanderbilt! He has been handicapped by inherited wealth, instead of being allowed the joy of winning his own fortune. And yet how many foolish young men have envied Vanderbilt, and wished their lives might have been laid out on the same lines! How many foolish parents have worked hard, and are denying themselves the happiness that would come by giving their means to worthy causes in order that they may bestow it upon their children and make them miserable! "Inherited wealth," says Mr. Vanderbilt, "is as certain death to ambition as cocaine is to morality." If only Mr. Vanderbilt had been taught what money is for, and how it may be transmuted into blessedness, he might be happy yet. But he speaks of trying to "get all the fun out of life" he can, which is a very poor way to be happy. Of course, he has made some benefactions, but life's higher meaning has not yet dawned upon him. When he comes to understand that happiness is not found in being ministered unto, but in ministering to others, he will have something to hope for and something definite to labor for.

It was the privilege of the editor and his wife to visit Grand Rapids a few days ago, spending a night and part of a day there as the guests of our highly esteemed friends, L. C. Stow and wife. We were driven through one of the cleanest and most beautiful cities of a hundred thousand population which this country affords. Everywhere public spirit and public enterprise are manifest. Its nicely paved and well-kept streets and beautiful residences and large manufacturing interests show it to be the home of a thrifty, intelligent and enterprising population. On Lord's day morning the writer preached for the Lyon Street Church of which Bro. Arthur is pastor. He had taken advantage of our visit to attend a Christian Endeavor convention. We saw evidences of his good work on every hand. In our drive on Saturday evening, we passed a new church building in process of erection in a new and growing part of the city, on the south side, where there is need of additional church accommodations. There is a good prospect for a useful church here. On the north side, Bro. Tremaine is working zealously in a mission church with encouraging indications of success. Our cause is progressing in that beautiful city, and much credit is due Bro. Arthur for this forward movement. We returned to the Park Sunday afternoon in time to hear the afternoon sermon by Bro. Wilson at the auditorium and to attend and address the beach meeting in the evening.

The tide of travel is now homeward. Each outgoing boat and train lessens our population. Few of our preachers are left. The Hardins, the Haleys, (T. P. and J. J.), the Combess, the Bellamys, the Bennetts, and some of the more transient visitors have gone. A. B. Jones, erstwhile preacher and author, but now a fisherman, tarries yet, and has become a devoted disciple of good old Izaak Walton, patron saint of all who love the rod and line. J. S. Hughes, of Patmos, still abides, and Claude E. Hill will probably come over from Chicago one more visit before he and his family take their final departure. Graham Taylor preaches next Lord's day, and this, with the beach service, will probably close the religious services at the Park for the season. Soon we shall join in the homeward tide.

The Emperor's Brother

By JAMES WARE
Shanghai, China.

His Highness, Prince Chun, younger brother of the Emperor of China, arrived in Shanghai the 16th of July, en route to Germany, on a mission of apology for the murder of Baron von Ketteler, at Peking in June of last year.

This is the first time a prince of the reigning house has ever visited Shanghai, to say nothing of his unprecedented journey to Europe and the United States. It is felt that his journey marks an epoch in the history of China, for the prince is now breaking away from all the seclusion of the past and going to see for himself and for the emperor what there is to be seen and learnt in the countries of the barbarians beyond the seas. While in Shanghai, Prince Chun was visited by all the high Chinese officials, as well as all the consular, naval and military officers of the foreign powers represented in Shanghai, and others who had come to do him honor.

His Highness having also expressed his willingness to receive a deputation from the missionary body, a representative from each of the societies at work in this port called upon him, under the leadership of Rev. Timothy Richards, as follows: Messrs. Richards, Parker, Box, Symons, Hykes, McGillivray, Walsh, Bryan, Stevens, Fitch, Bondfield and the writer. The prince received us at the door of his reception room, shaking hands cordially with each. Mr. Richards then made a short speech, somewhat in the following terms:

"As representing the American and British missionaries in Shanghai, of whom there are more than eighty, we have come to wish you a prosperous voyage and a safe return. We have been most deeply interested in the Emperor since he issued his famous reform edicts of a few years ago, which, if they had been carried out, would have proved of the greatest benefit to China.

"In going to foreign countries, your Highness will see many different races of people and many different customs. Some you, to whom we will pray that He will protect Your Highness, and bring you back again in peace."

The prince seemed very pleased with these few heartfelt words and in parting, shook hands, and thanked us most cordially for our visit.

Prince Chun is 18 years of age, of a quiet and amiable disposition, very dignified, and with an honest look in his eyes which can not fail to attract one. He is intelligent and curious, and there is no doubt that during his journey to western lands he will gain information and experience that will in the future make him a great power in this land.

The President has extended an invitation to the prince to visit the United States on his way home. The invitation has been accepted and it is in the power of the people of the great republic to make his visit among them by far the most profitable part of his journey. In Europe, Prince Chun will be satiated with displays of naval and military magnificence, to the exclusion of nearly everything else. In the United States he will be free to see how a great nation can flourish without a "divine" emperor or king, and without the reign of militarism, the greatest curse of modern times. Let him see your institutions of peace; your industrial and educational institutions, particularly your public school system. This latter is one of China's greatest needs to-day. And when the present crisis is past, and the emperor is restored to power, with Prince Chun as his chief advisor, a great educational system will be established throughout his wide dominions; and moreover, the Protestant missionaries at present on the field will occupy no small part in its inception and control.

customs are good, some are bad. We trust you will be influenced by all the best you may meet with, so that upon your return you will be able to assist the emperor in carrying out his purposes, and furthering his earnest desires for the advancement of his empire. But while, on your travels, you will notice many changes in peoples and customs, you will see above you the same heavens. And the same God will be above

The Old Christians and Disciples of Christ.

By S. M. Fowler.

It is a pitiable weakness that this distinction ever obtained among a people moved by the same divine impulse, the love of Christ, with the same goal in view, the restored unity of his broken body, on such superficialities as have in the past so estranged them from each other. 'Tis 66 years since I entered the ways of higher life. For 66 years I have been a reader of the Christian Palladium and Herald of Gospel Liberty. For a part of this time the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST has made me its weekly visits. I read "Christianity Restored," by Mr. A. Campbell, in the early forties, and his debates with Owen on Infidelity, and Adolphos Skinner on the merits of Universalism.

I have always admired Mr. Campbell as a debater and scholar—a Christian and, as a whole, a theologian, but I do not think he swung out so free from the apostasy, and so fully into the clear, simple, yet sublime teaching of Christ as did B. W. Stone. He paraded some of the Babylonian garments, while Stone stood forth in the seamless vesture of Jesus. Admitting that "born of water" refers to John's baptism, he seems to attach the same importance to the flesh being "born of water," as to the Spirit being born from above. Nicodemus, with others, was expecting the kingdom of God immediately to appear and had doubtless submitted to John's baptism. Jesus gave him to understand that that, like John, was only pointing to the higher, the divine—the Holy Spirit and fire, truth and love,—that would drive out the false and consume the evil. The first was temporal and temporary, the second spiritual and eternal.

I have even felt that Mr. Campbell placed an undue emphasis upon the word, especially in regard to ordinances, and not enough upon the presence and help of God by the Spirit "who works all in all." I also have a corresponding impression that the Christians felt or fancied themselves to be entirely under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, trusting in it to teach them what they should have learned and believed in or from the Bible.

These were two extremes on the two wings of the two movements, more than the central sober thought that pervaded both alike. Had they known each other better, had they stuck more closely to the wise motto of which both alike approve, "speak where and as the Bible speaks, and be silent [or at least modest] where it is silent, and obey where it commands," they never could have fallen apart. In this I might include the Free Baptists, the Baptists, and in fact all Protestant sects.

Never, while the cry is only "Lord, Lord," without doing his commands, can unity be restored.

Mr. Sheldon's motto, "What would Jesus do?" is heart searching and good, but not the best. What did he do, and what did he command, and be it and do it at all costs, would be better, if not the best.

Your gentle reproof of the Herald of Gospel Liberty in "Notes and Comments" in a recent issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, I entirely justify. Above all things, let us be just to each other.

I am in entire accord with what you say of the Endeavor convention. The Endeavor movement is headed the right way.

Interdenominationalism is better than sectarian bigotry, but it is far from Christian unity. We must enter into a new organization on a higher plane, where sectarian denominationalism cannot breathe, never to fall back into old ruts. If we try to preserve the new wine in the old bottles it will soon become musty and worthless.

Kalamazoo, Mich.

[We are glad to give this venerable brother space to state his view concerning the defects of the two religious bodies to which he refers. As he reads the literature of both bodies, he has a better right to be heard on this subject than those who only read one side. We are sure our readers will agree with him in the position that the two movements pleading for Christian union should be one. Are we not justified in expressing the belief that had our old Christian brethren followed the example of Barton W. Stone, whom our brother so highly commends, they would have been one body? At any rate, we should not cease to study the things that make for peace and unity.—EDITOR.]

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

Do I keep track of R. B. Neal and his work? Yes; in a way and to a degree. I know that his home is in Grayson, Ky., and that he has written some excellent tracts on Mormonism. The Mormon missionaries invaded the part of Kentucky in which Mr. Neal lives and labors, and in this way he became interested in Mormonism and its doctrine. He has been a diligent student of this peculiar religious system for a number of years. Six tracts have been written by him. Their titles are as follows: "Was Joe Smith a Prophet?" "Smithianity; or, Mormonism Refuted by Mormons," "The Stick of Ephraim vs. The Bible of the Western Continent; or The Manuscript Found vs. The Book of Mormon," "Smithianity; or, Mormonism Refuted by Mormons, Part 2," "The Stick of Ephraim vs. The Bible of the Western Continent, Part 2," "Smithianity; or, Mormonism Refuted by Mormons, Booth's Bombs."

Mr. Booth was a Methodist minister who, in the beginning of Mormonism, was carried away by the delusion. He continued with the Mormons until he became convinced that Mormonism was a fraud. Mr. Booth knew Joe Smith and the other projectors of the fraud—knew them well. After he became satisfied of the fraudulent character of Smith and his associates, and of the system of which they were the authors, he wrote a series of letters of which No. 6, "Smithianity; or Mormonism Refuted by Mormons, Booth's Bombs," is a reprint. These letters make a very interesting booklet. The price is fifteen cents. It is a view of Mormonism from the inside in 1831, given by one who was on the inside and knew of what he spoke.

I believe that it will be safe to quote Neal's tracts on Mormonism. He has quite a selection of Mormon books, tracts and letters. He is careful in his quotations. They are from original sources. They are not second-hand. He is now at work, I think, on a tract, or booklet, in which he will show that the Rev. Solomon Spaulding's romance entitled, "The Manuscript Found," is the original of "The Book of Mormon." The widow of Mr. Spaulding testified to this when "The Book of Mormon" at first appeared. This point, however, has been surrendered by some who are engaged in combating Mormonism. Mr. Neal is satisfied that in this concession they are in error. "The Manuscript Found" he is convinced is the original of "The Book of Mormon."

Is it worth while to study and combat Mormonism? The following facts will assist in answering this question:

A recent issue of the Daily News of Chicago says that twenty-five "elders" are engaged in holding daily services at street corners in various parts of the city and in doing missionary work generally. Since the first of May, and this statement was made about the middle of June, they have baptized nearly three hundred people in Chicago. At the time this statement was published there were nearly two hundred candidates awaiting baptism. There are in Chicago five hundred families who belong to the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. It is said that a year ago there were less than a hundred. Mormon missionaries in Chicago have distributed 500,000 pamphlets free among the people, have visited 51,000 families and sold 9,000 copies of "The Book of Mormon." A Mormon "elder" is quoted as saying that "Chicago is one of our best fields of labor."

Their propagandic work is carried on systematically. The great cities are used as radiating centers. St. Louis, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Pittsburg, Philadelphia, New York, Brooklyn, Boston, are centers. Chattanooga is a point from which 500 Mormon missionaries go to every part of the south land. In the aggregate 2,000 proselyters are kept in the field.

There is an article in the Congregationalist (Boston) of August 24, entitled, "The Mormon Propaganda in New England." The writer, Mr. F. W. Davis, says: "A spirit of investigation led me to attend a Mormon meeting a few weeks ago." Meetings held in the houses of friends is their strongest form of work. Mr. Davis says that "one of the men whom I met told of thirty-six hours passed without food in a New Hampshire town and three days without shelter. He said he asked for both and was refused because he was a Mormon." This writer says that "as a rule their argumentation seems calculated to convince persons of four general classes: First, the illiterate; second, those who are not earnest in any belief and admire eloquent words and a confident manner; third, those who doubt and question, but who can readily be turned aside by a simple assertion clothed in terms of glittering generality and expanded into verbosity; fourth, temporarily, at least, those who admire pluck, decision, self-denial and who naturally yield to assertiveness."

"The manner of conducting the cottage meeting," says Mr. Davis, "was peculiar. The two elders were the only Latter Day Saints present. They came to dine with a newly-made acquaintance. A few other guests were invited in the evening. First, there was music contributed by two young ladies. Then the missionaries seated themselves together. Both made brief prayers and spoke at some length. Although one of them talked for a half hour most of the facts of interest were gained by subsequent questioning. This questioning the elders invited after the benediction, which closed the formalities."

New England is a hard field for the Mormons. There are about sixty communicants in the New England conference. But Mormon missionaries are not daunted by the hardness of a field. The hardness seems to possess a fascination for the "saints." The more difficult the field the better pleased are they. Think of going thirty-six hours without food and three days without shelter! What can be done to conquer such men?

Mr. Davis says that in the meeting that he attended nothing was said about polygamy until when questioned the "elders" declared their belief in it.

I have in my hand at this moment a letter written by two Mormon "elders," dated "Denver, Col., May 4, 1901." In it they give their authority for their belief in polygamy. The letter was written to a gentleman who was engaged in an investigation of the claims of Mormonism. He had asked, apparently, for a statement concerning plural marriages. The "elders" say: "So with the principle of polygamy; we did not practice it simply because certain men were commanded to and obeyed, nor because it was a principle accepted by ancient Israel, nor yet because it is, or is not, written in any book; but because it was a commandment from God through the Prophet Joseph Smith in the year 1843, and he had received authority to solemnize such marriages under the hands of Peter, James and John in the year 1829, who were the last ones holding that authority upon the earth."

This is up-to-date. What do you think of it? Is it worth while to give attention to Mormonism?

Our Own Missionary.

By Wallace Tharp.

Every missionary of the Church of Christ is our missionary. But let me whisper to you, friend, not until you give up one of the dearest and most devoted of your flock to go to the foreign field, will you know the tenderness and sweetness of our own missionary. Then, indeed, does the expression, "living link" come to mean something, and we of the Crawfordsville Christian Church came to know quite well its meaning yesterday as we prayed and sang and said farewell to Miss Maude May Plunkett, who left us to go to India "in his name." We spell "living link" this way now, l-o-v-e. And after all, love is all.

We felt that her going was our crown, and that we should do something worthy of so solemnly great an occasion. The message came from the board, "Be ready to start Monday week." We had anticipated her going, but not so soon. As the day drew near, our hearts beat faster, and more keenly felt the glory associated with such a service. I wanted the whole church, and the missions-loving people of the city to get the good that I knew was sure to come out of association with her in those parting hours, and in witnessing the departure. So, on Friday evening before the Monday she was to go, the C. W. B. M. auxiliary arranged for a farewell reception to be given in our home, to which all the Christian people of the city were invited. The reception was a beautiful success, and often during the evening I saw eyes suffused with tears as the people took Sister Maude by the hand.

On Lord's day morning the church was filled with a congregation made up of people of all the churches in the city. It had been announced that the sermon would be on "The Forces That Move a Missionary." My text was Jesus' last command: "Go ye into all the world." Upon the conclusion of the sermon I presented Sister Maude to the congregation, and she stood before that throng like one who had already reached into the wardrobe of heaven and had taken out one of the fairest robes of glory and had clothed herself with it. Before she had spoken one word the congregation was in tears. After a moment she looked into the faces of the people and with the eloquence that is born of real holiness and love said: "One of the first verses in the Bible to impress itself upon my mind was this very precious and familiar one, 'For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth on him might not perish but have everlasting life.' And the whosoever means anyone and everyone. 'Whosoever will may come.' It means me in my home and you in your home. Yes, it means our state and our whole nation. But the whosoever does not stop there. It means the people of Europe, Asia, Africa and of the islands of the seas. It seems as if God simply threw open his arms of love and bade all to come. India's people are among the ones he has bidden.

"Out of its millions of people, there are but 600,000 native Christians; and our soul burns within us to tell them the good news which brings life and light to men. May I tell you a little story that Miss Thistler told us? She was going through many of the villages of India that were hearing the words of life for the first time. In one village she had told the story of Jesus and his love in just the simplest way possible. They were interested. The patriarch of the village asked her if she would not tell it again. It was told again just as before. After another consultation the patriarch said to her, 'Don't be impatient with us, but we do want to hear it again.' She gladly told the story the third time, and they then went on their way. Soon they saw that some one was trying to overtake them. They stopped. It was a messenger from the village wanting to ask a question. He said that his people wanted to know when the things she told in the story had happened—was it just a few days ago that he died? You may imagine her shame and chagrin when she had to answer, it was hundreds and hundreds of years ago. O, friends, it is time we were in haste about our Father's business!

"A few years ago the Christians of India sent this cablegram to the Christians of America, and I want to leave it as a parting message in your hearts, even as it came as a conquering message into mine. It is short and it is this: 'Look, pray, send, come to India's awakening.'

"But whether we are working here or there it is all one. It is his work. Let us not any longer call this a farewell; but let us make it simply a joining of hands for a more intense, a more steadfast, a more consecrated, and a little broader work for our Master. I shall want and need your prayers. We can do more by our praying than we think; for while we are praying God himself is working. You may think of me in my Indian work and home as being perfectly happy; for Jesus Christ has said, 'Lo! I am with thee.'

"My prayer for you is that you may be true to the Lord Jesus Christ; that you will ever love and serve him. And, too, that you will assist and hold up the hands of him whom God has chosen to be your pastor; and he will lead you into greater visions of God's love, and into broader spheres of service."

The scene upon the conclusion of her speech was simply divinely sublime and holy. The Spirit of the great All-Father was palpably present. If it had been a Methodist meeting they would have said, "The Holy Spirit was there in great demonstration and power," and I am not here to say that they would have been far wrong. Such transfiguration scenes come but few times in the history of a congregation or in the life of a man. It was the closest to an incarnation and articulation of divine glory I have ever witnessed; and one could almost feel the pressure of the blessed Savior's hand. It was good to be there. And I dare say that not one who witnessed that scene will ever forget it. Nor will he henceforth give other than willingly to this precious, holy work of missions. Do not fail, my preacher friend, to use the occasion of the going of one from the congregation to which you minister, should one go, as your opportunity to crystallize and exhibit all the best that can be said for missions. No address, however eloquent and forceful, could equal it.

Miss Maude was announced to leave the city at one o'clock P. M. on Monday. So I asked all the people of the church, and others who might wish to do so, to meet at the church at noon of Monday, that we would spend together one more sweet season of prayer for God's blessing on our beloved sister, and for the ones she was going to help. Noon of Monday came and we were all at church with fasting and in prayer. I asked Sister Maude to a place by my side in front of the pulpit, then forming a circle by joining hands we sang, with a holy, ringing gusto, "Blest be the tie that binds." After which, with bowed heads we prayed. Then withdrawing from the church, we formed a procession and marched to the depot to the sweet strains of "I'll go Where You Want me to go, Dear Lord," sung by the whole procession. By the time we reached the depot our crowd had grown to be a throng. Old people and young people, good people and bad people, and policemen gathered there. The evident earnestness and tears forced respect and silence. The Sunday-school orchestra started up, "Send the Light, the Blessed Gospel Light," and it rang out with a richness that I have rarely heard. Then a prayer was offered. At this juncture a beautiful silk flag of our country was presented to Miss Maude and draped across her shoulder and breast. Then we sang, "My Country 'Tis of Thee."

The moment for her to go was nearly come. Every heart seemed ready to burst with emotion, and tears were in every eye. Our farewell was spoken, and as the train pulled into the depot we sang, "God be With You Till We Meet Again," and continued singing until the train bore her away on her holy mission. There was sadness, friends, but there was gladness, too, in that holy hour. It has done us untold good, and I have written this that you may join with us in its benefits. How poor my telling of it seems when I think of that holy, blessed experience!

In Memoriam.

By John S. Martin.

[To my friend J. B. B., who died Sept. 3, 1895.]

"When two shall labor in the field Shall one be called, the other left,"
My friend, thou wert the first to yield,
And I that stay am sore bereft.
Although I grieve that thou art gone,
I may not rest but still work on.

For years we've labored side by side,
Nor ever sought the world's applause;
Content each day at eventide,
To know we'd sped the Master's cause,
And that from seed our hands had sown
His kingdom here had wider grown.

I did but follow in thy lead,
The work was ever planned by thee;
To supplement thee in thy need
Seemed aye the wisest work for me.
Yet there was much that each could do,
The fields were wide and gleaners few.

Of manly men thou wert the type,
Thy counsel always just and fair;
But now, ere yet thy years are ripe,
Thou'rt called to counsel otherwhere.
And though thy spirit's with the just
Its earthly house must turn to dust.

Why not? 'Twas thine in which to bide
While here, and served thy sojourn well;
Now all of heaven opens wide—
The joys thou knowest, who can tell?
For joys there must in plenty be
And recompense for such as thee.

My friend, thou'rt wiser now than I
In that which God hath held in store—
Which all must know who live and die—
Whose secret I too shall explore.
And while I seek that blest abode,
God grant I may not miss the road.

Thy faith hath now to knowledge turned;
The mystic veil hath rolled away;
And thou canst see thy glory earned,
For thou didst work while it was day—
Thy earthly day—and though 'tis done
Thy heavenly day has just begun.

But yester-night the page did turn
Which proved, alas! to be thy last.
'Twas like the rest, I soon did learn,
No blot upon its face was cast.
Thy record closes clean and white
And fears nor gaze nor searching light.

Now as we lay thee close away
To molder in the narrow grave,
Thy spirit wakes to live God's day—
To live again with God who gave.
Thy earthly day had morn and noon—
Its tale, how brief! its end, how soon!

English Topics.

The People by the Sea.

"Saxon and Norman and Dane are we,"
as Tennyson sang, as when the dog-star blazes and summer blends beauty and purgatory together, we troop off by myriads to the shore. The truth about the English people is that they are an amphibious race.
Those old Saxon, Norman and Danish progenitors of ours were as much at home on the ocean wave as on terra firma. We are only veneered vikings, pirates polished by Pope Gregory and his old monks. Our Christian civilization is a pretty stucco plastered over the savagery engrafted by Norsemen on Druidism. Great Britain is all one grand Riviera, and Ireland—beautiful Erin—is another and even a fairer one.
Do you know, Brother Garrison, what I think of the future of my country? I believe that when its coal and iron are played out it will no longer be the workshop of Europe, as it still is, notwithstanding your prodigious American aggrandizement, but will become the world's playground. Many lands have I traversed, and countless beauty spots have I admired, but these British Isles are for sylvan sweetness and landscape loveliness absolutely incomparable.

All this enchantment is owing to the Atlantic. We are never frozen. No harbor is ever ice bound in any winter. The Gulf Stream prevents that congelation which seals up many continental ports. We are never grilled, baked, roasted or boiled.
The first American lady I ever knew said,
"I do love your English summers." Sometimes I have heard Americans abuse our English winters. This I wonder at, because the case is one of lucus a non lucendo. Here where I am staying at Southend-on-Sea for a brief fortnight, 30 miles from my London home, a little girl on the sands yesterday called out, "Oh, mamma, come and look at this little dog's tail, it has none!" So I am always astonished at the objugation of our English winter, for we have none. I discovered some time since that the reason why many Americans adopt this land as their second home is that there is no climate in which you can work so many hours a day, on so many days in the year, as the English. If America is God's country, as I believe it is, England is God's paradise. This year's summer is unusually lovely. A New York gentleman recently came to this country for the first time. He has been telling me his impressions. He landed at Glasgow in Scotland, and so traversed most of the length of England to reach London. He pronounced it the most charming land he ever looked upon, and London the most fascinating city he ever explored. His wife endorsed the verdict. But our people are fully appreciative in these days of the attractions of our Isles. Our forefathers were not. It was reserved for us to discover our own country.

The Transfiguration of London.

I do earnestly beg all Americans who have not seen London to hasten over for a survey of our metropolis. The old London—the wonderful old London—will soon vanish. Indeed, much of it is now vanishing before our eyes. And a new and still more marvelous metropolis is rising.
During the next ten years there will be added to London a greater number of costly, splendid and famous new buildings than in any similar period since the rebuilding of the city after the great fire in 1666, which followed the great plague of 1665. That was the time in the reign of Charles II. when Sir Christopher Wren built St. Paul's Cathedral, and a new London arose. But it was not a beautiful London, like the medieval city of Elizabeth and King Henry VIII. and Edward VI.
During Queen Victoria's reign London was glorified. It is now going to be transfigured.
During the coming ten years there will be completed on the banks of a noble river a new city of half a million inhabitants, containing a splendid cathedral, great government buildings, a magnificent town hall, a palace of justice, three beautiful bridges, besides libraries, baths, hospitals, hotels and business premises, all designed by the most eminent architects and engineers of the day and erected in a style worthy of any capital of the day. This fine new city, instead of being separate and self-contained, will be dispersed in sections throughout the whole of the metropolis. The Strand is to become the most beautiful thoroughfare on earth, and London will be the most glorious city the world has ever known. Surely it is interesting enough now for those who can stay really to explore it.

The Most Important General.

We have in our society many ranks of people. Many generals are on the retired list of the army, and many are fighting in the field of war. But an army general is of small importance, relatively, after all. We can always get another. But the supreme indispensability is the general servant. We have an army of these generals, and every one is much more consequential than any army general. Some servants are cooks, some are nurses, some are parlor-maids, some are housekeepers. But by far the greater part of the daily domestic work in the land is done by servant girls and women who call themselves "generals," and are so inscribed at the register offices. A problem of great magnitude is pressing to the front amongst our social questions. When I was in America I found that your society had partially solved the grand servant-girl problem, but only in painful ways. In most households the good wife and mother had become "general" herself. I and my wife stayed in Buffalo as guests of dear old friends whom we had known in England.
They spread for us astonishing banquets under the name of breakfasts. Before we left my wife was appalled at the discovery that our host's dear wife and her mother had each morning risen at 5 to prepare these banquets! I found Irish, German, French and "darkie" helps, but the only American servants, as a rule, were the wives and daughters, mothers and sisters. In Britain also the problem of the household is now becoming all absorbing. The lady help came in some time ago, but she is a humiliating failure, because she is not a lady and not a help. She is analogous to Christian Science, because it is not Christian and not scientific. The new generation of young women has passed through the new system of education and society wakes up and finds it has educated the real servant out of existence. Every young woman is now a young lady—or thinks she is! At one of our London registry offices 500 mistresses applied for servants and there was only one application from a servant.
Of the servant class yet remaining 60 per cent. are "generals," and this general is everywhere a queen, a mistress, a despot, a prize competed for, and trophy when secured. So some ladies have invented a new association. It is called "the Guild of the Household Dames." Its object is to set up training houses for qualifying young women of gentle birth to become efficient in the arts of housekeeping and domestic economy. This institution is already a success. Its motto is laborare est arare. But I believe the only solution of this problem and many other practical difficulties is with the Socialists. We shall have to come to their cardinal principle after all, which is that all citizens must take a share of life's labor, and none must indulge entirely in play, idleness and luxury. True socialism does not mean communism in the means of life, but in its industry. There can never be equality of ability, or of wealth, or of position; but there should be equality of opportunity and of responsibility.

George Eliot and Her Works.

Competent critics seem to agree that the greatest constructive literary mind of the 19th century was Marian Evans, who called herself as a writer George Eliot. Attention is being attracted afresh to her name by the issue of a new edition of her works. Some of her books should certainly be read by every book lover. Opinions differ as to which is her greatest novel. Adam Bede, The Mill on the Floss, Silas Marner, Romola and Middlemarch all have their persuasive advocates. My favorite is Silas Marner. Through this exquisite story runs a strong vein of that Mitleid—to use a beautiful German word—that peculiar sympathy in suffering, which warms every page of this writer's novels. Romola lacks this characteristic and the reader feels that in it the writer is aloof from her characters. Yet for Romola the great authoress received ten thousand pounds from the publishers.

The Intellect in Preaching

By STEPHEN J. COREY.

This is the age of common sense. Just in proportion as people become educated, their minds rebel against volubility without thought back of it. The preacher must put hard, earnest thought into his message if he would be a teacher and leader to-day. Forensic eloquence is fast declining in public favor, and in its place the people are hungering for thought. If the preacher cannot give his congregation something to think about, he will lose his grip. People have just as much feeling and emotion as ever, but it takes common sense to bring it out. There may be a sort of spasmodic stirring up, but the stirring up that lasts begins in earnest thought.

Is it not true that much of the "back-sliding" results from Christianity's entering the life through the emotions simply, instead of through intellectual conviction? Emotion may tumble people into the church, but intellectual conviction is what keeps them from tumbling out when the great crisis of temptation comes to them. The fact that the mind has grasped the verities of the faith is about the only anchor that thousands of good people have when the storm rages. If this is true, ought not the intellectual element in preaching to be emphasized much more than it is with many? It is very common, even to-day, to hear the intellect spoken of as though it was a sort of an intruder in the spiritual realm. There is an idea quite current that a preacher's spiritual life uniformly decreases in the same ratio that his scholarly habits increase. "Brethren, these things ought not so to be." God wants the intellect at its best. Truth is committed to us, and we are responsible for the proclaiming of it in the most intelligent way, and the more the intellect, with all of its keenness, is brought into the message, the more intelligent will the message be.

But some one says: "My dear brother, we must have simplicity. But from what does simplicity arise? Not from ignorance, I am sure. Does not our missionary board demand the keenest of intellects to make the gospel simple to the poor, ignorant souls in India? Too many preachers underrate the intelligence of their audiences. If the people are not given thought, they will be listless and go away unfed. It is simply startling to see the way in which Paul hurled great truths at the minds of his hearers, and expected them to understand him. And far below the congregations of to-day in intelligence were the converts of Rome.

An intellectualism in religion which is divorced from experience is what has brought contempt upon the intellectual element in preaching. But the man whose scholarly life is redolent with fresh experience and conviction, will always be a power for righteousness. Oh, the joy of the discovery of some truth for the first time in one's experience, when it comes from hard study! With what intensity and authority it is given to the people!

Thank God for the men who have heralded the gospel faithfully, and who have not had the advantages of modern education—faithful men and true. But even these, who taught and led the people, used their intellects mightily. Untrained, they trained themselves. They may have had but one book, but how they studied that! There are exceptions, when a message freighted with the Spirit of God hunts a man, but as a rule God honors the man who hunts the message.

The preacher who does not study cannot grow. How many preachers have been a disappointment to themselves and their friends because their first year's work was the best they ever did. The life may have been filled with pastoral duties, but the consecrated training of the mind was neglected, and slow death was the result. The energies of the intellect, enlarged views, and a growing insight into spiritual truths, are absolutely necessary to keep alive the faith of the preacher as well as that of the people. They are "the appointed fuel to the sacred fire." The brethren come to the Lord's house worn and hungry; they look to the preacher for food; they need more than milk for babes; they must have meat or they faint.

"My lord," a clergyman once boasted to a bishop, "when I go up into my pulpit, I never know the subject of my sermon." "No," the bishop answered, "and I hear that your congregation does not know when you come down." We may not boast thus, but is it not true that many times the message is so vague that it is not fixed in the minds of the hearers?

Let us bear in mind the transcendent consequences of our calling! What a pathetic spectacle to the Master, when he hears from one of his preachers a careless gurgling of syllables instead of a message that cost travail of mind and soul! Can we allow the details of the ministry to crowd out the best preparation for the greatest thing—the proclamation of the Gospel? Is not the Church of Christ hungering for more teaching? Is the continual blare of popular topical preaching edifying? Do we not need more real expository preaching? I do not mean that sort of preaching of the "Bible reading" sort, which is often but an excuse, and easy running comment on a familiar passage of Scripture. But the intelligent preaching of the great themes by exposition of Bible passages. It is the hardest sort of preaching to do well, but is it not the best way to teach? Spurgeon once said, "We cannot expect to deliver much of the teachings of Holy Scripture by picking out verse by verse, and holding these up at random. The process resembles too closely that of showing a house by exhibiting separate bricks." Is not careful exposition the natural way of enforcing divine truth? This sort of preaching will incite people to the study of the Bible, a thing which most modern preaching does not seem to do. It will build up a congregation in divine truth. It will emphasize the intellect in religion.

We need conversion of the head as well as conversion of the heart. The master of words, careless of thought, and unconvinced of great responsibility, is too familiar a figure in the pulpit of to-day. "He that winneth souls is wise."

The Convention by Proxy.

By C. A. Freer.

All things are pointing in the direction all roads run these days—toward Minneapolis. The first twentieth century convention will be one of great power and influence. It will be good to be there. But it is a fact that comparatively very few will be there. Not one per cent. of our brotherhood will actually be there. What ought to be done? Every church in Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, Kansas and the middle west ought to send one delegate. Let this delegate be armed with a sharp pencil and plenty of paper and bring as much as possible of the convention to the church. Give your delegate one Sunday morning and let him tell what he saw and heard. Thus a hundred or two disciples can get the convention at second-hand and it will be a good investment for the church. The faithful pastor might be this delegate. It would be a fitting recognition of his work with the church. If the pastor can't go, send the president of the C. E. society or one of the good, faithful women. Such a trip is worth far more than the money it costs to any person. It may be a little inconvenient to pick up the cash but it will pay to make a strenuous effort. It would be more profitable to thus put your cash into your head and heart than upon your back. Your clothes you wear at home will do for Minneapolis. People do not go there to advertise the dry goods store of their home town.

Then, too, this will be an investment in missions. The northwest is missionary territory. If we astonish the natives by pouring in several thousands into Minneapolis the papers will advertise it all over the country and it will pave the way for more efficient mission work in Minnesota and the Dakotas. Each church ought to count it as a missionary offering to send a delegate. I know of one church that is yet a mission, but it has so much pride that it says to its pastor, you must go to the state and national conventions. We don't want to be counted a drone, but we want to get all we can indirectly from them and we want our preacher too up with the procession. Do you have such a pride for your church? Then send your pastor to Minneapolis. Or if you have no pastor, send some one else. Do this now, and tell him at once, that he may make his plans so that he can go. It will pay.

The Conditions of Successful Evangelization.

By D. G. Porter.

Evangelization is the weak point in modern Christianity. This is bad, for it is also the vital point. Different religious bodies have different methods of pursuing this work, all doubtless more or less unscriptural, and for that reason failing of proper success, and failing generally more and more. A year ago, I think, the Methodists, hitherto among the most successful in evangelistic effort, reported loss rather than gain. Since then remarkable successes are reported for them, due probably to unusually strenuous efforts. But the Methodists have a sifting process and their converts sometimes, it is said, fall from grace even after the sifting; so that Methodists no more than others are ever quite sure of the number of their permanent accessions, and on the whole their methods seem to be growing less and less effective.

Alexander Campbell, I think, was the first man in this country to call attention critically to the methods of evangelization common in his time. His criticisms were not fruitless even in his day; and have since acquired increasing force among the religious bodies considered most evangelical, as they are constantly emphasized by the apparently decreasing efficiency of the methods usually practiced, as well as by reason and scripture.

But it is easier generally to find that you are in the wrong path and have gone astray, than it is to find the right path and get into it again when once you have strayed from it, and especially is this the case when the wanderer has been far and wide, and when most of the landmarks have long been lost sight of. To Alexander Campbell must undoubtedly be given the credit for an honest attempt to seek out and follow the lost landmarks as illumined by the beacon lights of scripture. But it was not to be expected that he could rediscover and establish them all so as to get completely out of the woods and lead his followers out. He taught them, however, to use the compass of scripture and gave them some excellent examples of its use.

But dropping now my metaphors, which in fact, seem to be getting a little mixed, I may say that Mr. Campbell did an excellent work, but did not carry it to entire completion; and I do not think that he ever understood the use and significance of baptism in its relation to evangelization as fully as we may now understand it. It is said that, probably under the influence of philosophical speculation, he made or hinted at a distinction between real and formal remission, and suggested that baptism might stand only for the latter. I do not know that the distinction thus indicated has ever been very clearly defined, and there are several meanings and uses of the word "formal."

In a political or other gathering for the purpose of nominations it is common to take what is called an informal ballot to ascertain the sense of the meeting, but it is only in the formal ballot that the real nomination is made. The first is tentative merely; the second alone is real and actual. Another sense of the word makes it refer to a confirmation and completion of what has already been determined and entered upon, as in reducing a contract to written form and affixing signatures to it. Another use of the word applies it to the certification or registry of what has already been completed, and still another use applies it to what we speak of as a mere matter of form, or as simply a red tape affair of little or no consequence anyway. This last is the view which certain classes of pedobaptists have been quite willing to take as regards baptism, and even some of the professed followers of Mr. Campbell are said to have held that you must in any case have a genuine, old-fashioned Methodist or Baptist experience in the first place, and when you have reached the highest state of mind, or rather of feeling, so that you would be entitled to forgiveness anyway, then baptism will be for the remission of sins, but not before, and the "design" of baptism considered as an arbitrary act is to certify to a "believing penitent" the remission which has perhaps or rather probably already taken place. At any rate the word "formal" without further definition seems to be out of place in this connection, and I decidedly prefer the more modern, and as I think, the more scriptural, but less speculative, view of the ordinance.

According to this more modern but maturer view, baptism does not mean anything at all to the subject except as he means something by it. For example, the baptism of John was a "baptism of repentance for the remission of sins;" but it did not mean remission of sins to the subject except as it was on his part a baptism of repentance, that is, a solemn, conscious, definite pledge of his honest, serious purpose to turn from all sin. So, if when one is baptized in the name of "Jesus Christ," or the "Lord Jesus," he understands that he thereby pledges allegiance to Jesus as Lord and Christ consciously and seriously, as before God, then the assurance of forgiveness goes naturally and properly as well as scripturally with such pledge of obedience and allegiance. Of course, repentance, or the purpose to turn from sin, is of necessity included in the pledge of obedience and allegiance, and the word "formal" might have a proper application in this case, since baptism is the divinely appointed act or form under which the pledge of allegiance is to be rendered, and compliance with it is both actual and formal and hence acceptable and effectual.

I may remark in passing that I regard as a mistake the almost universal use of the words of our Lord in Matt. 28:19 as a baptismal formula. The apostles, who knew the meaning of these words if anybody could, did not so understand them, and never used or alluded to them in that sense. They always baptized, and commanded to baptize, in the name of "Jesus Christ" or the "Lord Jesus." The words in the passage above cited are to be understood, I think, as indicating the authority under which the administrator is to act,—a common use of the expression "in the name" and important in this connection. As a formula they seem obscure, defective and inappropriate, and their use in this sense has done much to obscure the clear and simple significance as well as the use of baptism as originally practiced. At any rate if we follow the example of the apostles in word as well as in act, we certainly shall not go far wrong, and doing so the use and significance of baptism become so clear and simple that we shall no longer need to puzzle over its design.

First Twentieth Century Convention.

How Do Our Conventions Benefit Preachers?

There is no doubt that our conventions furnish a practical education for our preachers. There they find the best pulpit models and the experience to preside over large assemblies successfully. Besides the advantages they supply for extraordinary occasions they are of especial value to them in their everyday work.

1. They help the preacher in his thinking. It is his privilege there to hear some of the ablest addresses that our own ranks can produce. These necessarily enlarge his horizon, stimulate mental activity and lead into newer fields. Diamond cuts diamond.

2. They increase his zeal for missions. The world with its ever-pressing needs is placed before him. Here he is made peculiarly susceptible to these appeals of providence. Fire kindles fire.

3. They help to broaden his own personality. In his own limited station he may see the littleness of others until he himself may become belittled. By the law of contact the contractions of others may contract himself. A week's fellowship with a national assembly must broaden him and deepen his spiritual life.

4. They also contribute much to his present enjoyment. It is no small joy to touch those who come from sea to sea inspired by a common impulse and purpose. It may be safely said that nothing in the same space of time will prove as beneficial, especially to our younger preachers, as to attend each session of the First Twentieth Century Convention at Minneapolis.

Conventions as Local Missionary Work.

Nothing succeeds like success. Nothing fails like failure. A great convention at Minneapolis means a great impetus to the work of the Disciples in Minnesota and the vast undeveloped region of the northwest. To fail at Minneapolis will mean permanent injury to our cause in this important field.

A great convention will command the respect of the inhabitants of this region, and win their support to our cause.

Minnesota is the doorway into the great northwest. The door is wide open. Let us enter. If we can have such a convention as was held at Cincinnati two years ago it will advance the home mission interests in this region at least ten years. The brethren of Minnesota and the regions round about, most of whom never had an opportunity of attending any of our great gatherings, will be filled with enthusiasm and hope as never before. They will be glad they are Disciples, glad they are identified with a growing cause. With a new zeal and a deeper spirituality they will go everywhere preaching and teaching, and leading the people into the glorious liberty of apostolic Christianity.

Would you be a missionary? Then go to Minneapolis in October.

The Music.

Realizing that the music for the convention, while it will not be elaborate, must nevertheless be carefully prepared and looked after, this committee has laid plans, which will culminate in entire success.

The music will be under the direction of J. Walter Wilson, of Indianapolis, one of the best known singing evangelists in our brotherhood. It is his desire and our aim, to have a chorus of from 300 to 400 voices for the evening services.

As it is manifestly impossible to raise that number in our Minneapolis church, we shall test the practical side of C. E. fellowship by appealing to the Endeavor Societies of the Minneapolis Union to give us voices, and we do not entertain any doubt about the generosity of the response.

The President of the Minneapolis Musicians' Association is a friend of our church and we are expecting to get a cornet or trombone for each part of the chorus which will strengthen it very materially.

We shall probably have solos from some of the best talent in Minneapolis, although we shall be able to tell about that after we find out how much time we are to be allowed for special music.

We count not a little on the co-operation of our people from out of town. We expect a very material addition to our chorus from the people who come to the convention. To that end, we appeal to those who can and will help us in the chorus, to send their names, addresses and part they sing to the undersigned, chairman of the committee.

If there are those who intend to join the chorus, who desire a program containing the music to be used, they may secure it by sending name, address, part they sing, and ten cents postage, to the chairman. A chorus badge will accompany the program.

Is Goodness Unattractive?

By GEORGE H. COMBS.

In a former article on "The Beauty of Holiness" the endeavor was made to point out the charm and fascination of moral beauty. Yet while theoretically giving widest acceptance to the proposition that holiness is beautiful, the world is wont to look for fascination elsewhere and finds the real magnet not in virtue but in vice. In book and sermon, song and prayer, emphasis is laid insistently upon the attractiveness of the bad. Why should this be so? Why do we find vice of greater interest than virtue? Why do we fondle weeds?

For one thing, we fail to keep in mind that deep law pointed out first by Plato, that the souls great in virtue are by the same endowment great in capacity for vice. He who can make the greatest success can also make the greatest failure. He who can soar highest can fall lowest. He who can most enjoy can most suffer. It took a tall angel to become a devil. Great crimes attract us because of the greatness of the actors. A firefly dies and the world does not pause. The sun goes out and we gaze with awe upon the splendid ruin. It is not the ruin, though, that attracts us, but the greatness of the thing ruined. There is no interest in a great sin, but interest boundless in the great sinner.

We are wont to compare commonplace virtue with picturesque vice. Your neighbor owes you ten dollars and pays it, borrows your umbrella and returns it—commonplace virtue that is of no especial interest. Jesse James and his confederates rob an express train and we are interested in any scrap of their history. Put Jesse James by the side of your commonplace neighbor and you say that the bandit is the more interesting, that vice is more attractive than virtue. Nay. Not so fast. By the side of commonplace virtue put commonplace vice; by the side of the man who owed you ten dollars and paid it put the man who owed you ten dollars and did not pay it, by the side of the man who borrowed your umbrella and returned it, the man who borrowed your umbrella and did not return it, and then say which is the more interesting. Alongside picturesque vice put picturesque virtue. But you say still, I find vice fascinating. Think closely. Is it vice in the criminal, or is it not rather other qualities that attract you? Mephistopheles, Iago, the Devil in Byron's Cain—these do not attract us because of their great villainy, but because of splendid qualities with which they are endowed.

I am sure, too, that we often confound our interest in the penitent sinner with sin itself. David, you say, is a far more interesting character through his great sin than had he lived faultlessly through all the years. But is it King David the sinner of whom you are thinking, he who forgot kingly dignity, brotherly honor and all the dear graces of the soul when he sent Uriah, the husband, to his death and did foully by his wife—is it this David in his foulness and lusts so coarse of whom you think? Or is it not rather King David the penitent crying ever with tears in his speech, "Cleanse, oh cleanse me from my sins"? We love the Magdalene. True, but it is not the sinning, but the penitent, Magdalene. We are not drawn to her in her sins but in her pitiful sorrow, in her sincere contrition, in the hour when she shudders as she thinks of her awful past, trembles in the presence of her sinless Lord, moistens his feet with penitent tears and wipes them with her beautiful hair. Then we pity and love her.

Take one of the most wonderful present-day creations, Kate, in "The Manxman." She, the sinning woman, interests us, but the interest is not in her sin; commonplace then she is and coarse. Rather are we drawn to her when she hides her head in shame, when the cries of her deserted baby are as the requiem of a lost soul, a soul stabbed to death by the white face of her outraged husband; when groping in the pit of the lowest hell she meets with angels of penitence, in her lonely wanderings as an outcast; when in that dramatic hour all the world's punishment for sin and all its stored-up wrath rest upon her, and meekly bowing beneath the load, she murmurs not—then we love her. Not Kate the sinner, but Kate the penitent. Penitence, not sin, attracts us.

Finally, I think we often fail to recognize that holiness is beautiful because we too much circumscribe the term. If holiness consisted simply in psalm-singing, church-going and the ceremonials of religion—that and nothing more; if that only is religious which lies within this circle, I do not wonder that it is unattractive; but if holiness means more than this, if religion claims the whole world of man's activities as its parish, if the honest man is the holy man, if the debt-paying man is the holy man, if the peace-making man is the holy man, if the helping man is the holy man, if to do one's work in this world honestly as if the gods saw, if to help on as best one can the world, is to live holily, then holiness is beautiful and fair. Let us ever regard it so.

Holiness is beautiful, and this is the only beauty that endures. Beauty of flower, beauty of tangled vine, beauty of flowing waters, beauty of sea and starry sky—this will pass away, but the beauty of goodness abides, and when this world shall have passed away, when the angels shall have laid away every coffinless star in its grave of blue, this beauty shall yet endure.

The Principle of Missions.

By F. M. Green.

The sublimest order ever given on earth is, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to the whole creation;" "Go ye therefore and make disciples of all the nations."

The church is not only called "the body of Christ," the body of which Christ is the soul, but it is said that "the body is Christ's," and that the church is "the fulness of him that filleth, all in all." The church "is the expanded Christ, and the purpose of missions is the purpose of the universe, to multiply Christ, to reincarnate the Son of God, to enthrone Christ in the hearts of men, to make all men the temples for his personal indwelling, that he may be the first-born among many brethren, and fill the world with himself." There is but one authority for missions and that is Christ. There is but one purpose of missions and that is Christ; "for of him, and through him, and unto him are all things."

For convenience, missions are divided into two kinds: First, home missions; second, foreign missions, the difference being not in nature or urgency, for they have the same center—the heart of Christ, "the only difference is in the radius."

Home missions are stationary within certain political limits. Within these limits the conditions are more favorable for the "perfecting of the saints unto the work of ministry, unto the building up of the body of Christ." Jerusalem was needed first, and then "the uttermost parts of the earth." Jerusalem was fundamental to Ephesus, Antioch, Smyrna, Philadelphia, Sardis, Colosse, Rome, Europe, Britain, America and the world. Without Jerusalem and its home work the world would have been a homeless, Christless orphan; with it myriads may inherit the glory, the fathers, the promises, the citizenship of that kingdom which, beginning at Jerusalem, is to cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.

A base for supplies is of fundamental importance to an army on a campaign. A marching army cannot depend on foraging for its necessities, much less can the army of Jesus Christ forage on the people, for its principle of warfare is "not yours but you." The support of those who go "everywhere preaching the Word" must be furnished by those who, unable to enter the marching columns, are able to till the soil, make merchandise, enlist recruits and drill them for service.

The home mission is fundamentally important because out of it must come the results—duplicates in doctrine, energy, organization and character; for as the home mission is so will the foreign mission be. As the army is at home so will it be abroad in loyalty, obedience and faithfulness. "Back of every great movement is a great idea," and every great movement must have a place from which to start; and there is no better place to start from than from home where the character is formed, the heart established, the mind enlightened and the moral sinews tested for the great world contest.

The home church, whether the word church is used to mean a single congregation of believers in Christ or a number of them as in a large city, or all in a state or nation, has two main reasons for its existence: first, to make and build up believers in Christ in faith, hope, love and unity on the facts and promises of the gospel in accordance with the "obedience of faith"; and second, to make Jesus known to the world, or evangelize. The first is in obedience to the command to "grow in grace and in the knowledge of the Lord and Savior Jesus Christ," which gives skill in the use of the word of God either to soothe or to smite. The second is in obedience to the great commandment, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to the whole creation—make disciples of all the nations," behind which is all the authority, divine and human, of the character, the work, the love and the life of Christ.

And finally the home mission is of fundamental importance because in campaigns under God's commandment as well as under the commandments of men, emergencies arise, difficulties appear, and dangers develop, both in doctrine and methods, which cannot be settled by the marching columns, and it is good to have some Jerusalem where, as in the case of the brethren at Antioch, an appeal may be taken and an authoritative judgment recorded. And the far-away missionary is untroubled and happy in the knowledge that behind him are not only prayers and good wishes, but an established and permanent base of abundant supplies for his every necessity.

Baptism for the Dead.

By A. E. McQuoid.

In the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of Aug. 29, I see an exegesis of 1 Cor. 15:29. I am no theologian but it seems to me as though there ought not to exist any mystery regarding this passage. In order to a proper understanding of the passage we must first of all ascertain the object Paul had in view in this part of the epistle.

Paul says, "Moreover brethren I declare unto you the gospel," etc. . . . and in the third verse says, "for I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures; and that he was buried and that he rose again the third day according to the Scriptures."

Now to sum up Paul's idea of what the gospel was I should say it was the death, burial and resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. Before going farther let me give you what I think was uppermost in the apostle's mind when he penned this epistle.

I think the 12th verse reveals the object that caused the apostle to write this chapter. Paul was not writing to unbelievers to convince them of the resurrection but to believers who said there was no resurrection of the dead, that being true, Paul would conclude that Christ did not rise from the dead, and draws a legitimate conclusion that their preaching was vain and that they were yet in their sins. I believe Paul taught that a penitent sinner was "dead to sin" and therefore a fit subject for burial (baptism) and that he arose to walk in "newness of life."

I believe these brethren once believed just as Paul did, and "obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine, being then made free from sin." I can imagine the apostle's deep anxiety for these brethren when he learned that they now questioned the resurrection of Christ from the dead.

I can see a just cause for the apostle's alarm regarding these brethren, from the fact that the gospel and the entire plan of salvation hinges upon the fact of the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. Jesus Christ was dead and as these brethren had been baptized into Jesus Christ in obedience to the commission, they were therefore according to their present claims and ideas "baptized for the dead" "if so be that the dead rise not."

I think these brethren were baptizing their converts just as Paul baptized those who were converted under his preaching. The difference between Paul and these brethren was that Paul baptized for a living Christ while they were baptizing for a dead Christ.

More Boxes of Gold,

And Many Greenbacks.

To secure additional information directly from the people, it is proposed to send little boxes of gold and greenbacks to persons who write the most interesting, detailed and truthful descriptions of their experience on the following topics:

1. How have you been affected by coffee drinking and by changing from coffee to Postum?
2. Do you know any one who has been driven away from Postum because it came to the table weak and characterless at the first trial?
3. Did you set such a person right regarding the easy way to make Postum clear, black and with a crisp, rich taste?
4. Have you ever found a better way to make it than to use four heaping teaspoonsful to the pint of water, let stand on stove until real boiling begins, then note the clock and allow it to continue easy boiling full 15 minutes from that time stirring down occasionally? (A piece of butter about the size of a navy bean, placed in the pot will prevent boiling over.)
5. Give names and account of those you know to have been cured or helped in health by the dismissal of coffee and the daily use of Postum Food Coffee in its place.
6. Write names and addresses of 20 friends whom you believe would be benefited by leaving off coffee. (Your name will not be divulged to them.)

Address your letter to the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich., writing your own name and address clearly.

Be honest and truthful, don't write poetry or fanciful letters, just plain, truthful statements.

Decision will be made between October 30th and November 10th, 1901, by three judges, not members of the Postum Cereal Co., and a neat little box containing a $10 gold piece sent to each of the five best writers, a box containing a $5 gold piece to each of the 20 next best writers, a $2 greenback to each of the 100 next best, and $1 greenback to each of the 200 next best writers, making cash prizes distributed to 325 persons.

Almost every one interested in pure food and drink is willing to have their name and letter appear in the papers, for such help as it may offer to the human race. However, a request to omit name will be respected.

Every friend of Postum is urged to write and each letter will be held in high esteem by the company, as an evidence of such friendship, while the little boxes of gold and envelopes of money will reach many modest writers whose plain and sensible letters contain the facts desired, although the sender may have but small faith in winning at the time of writing.

Talk this subject over with your friends and see how many among you can win prizes. It is a good, honest competition and in the best kind of a cause.

Our Budget.

—The church at Williamsville, N. Y., has secured the services of Brother Frank Hyatt Smith as supply for an indefinite period.

—C. E. Millard, who has a new outfit for giving illustrated songs, including moving pictures, is open to engagements from Sept. 15 to Nov. 1.

—Sunday, Oct. 7, is the day for the Bible-school rally in all Missouri Bible-schools. Get ready. The corresponding secretary will send programs.

—L. S. Archer, pastor at Brinkley, Ark., wishes to correspond with a singing evangelist who, for the voluntary offerings, will assist him in a meeting beginning Sept. 15.

—J. V. Uplike, who is now in a meeting at Cauton, O., requests us to call the attention of his correspondents to the fact that this is his address for the present.

—The receipts for foreign missions during the week ending Aug. 29 amounted to $538.54. This was a loss as compared with the corresponding week last year of $503.34.

—W. F. Folks, pastor of the church at Plymouth, Ind., burst a blood vessel in his throat while preaching August 18, and has been compelled to close his work there.

—For the benefit of those who prefer to stop at a hotel while attending the Illinois convention at Springfield, a special rate of 75c for lodging and breakfast, or $1.50 a day, has been secured at the St. Nicholas.

—W. A. Baldwin is chairman of the committee on transportation for Nebraska delegates to the Minneapolis convention. The rate will be one fare for the round trip, or $12.50 from Lincoln.

—Thomas G. Picton, pastor of the congregation of Disciples in Everett, Mass., for the past two years, has gone to Colusa, Cal. On his way to the coast he spent two weeks in Denver, preaching to the Central and South Broadway churches.

—Thomas J. Shuey's sermon on "The Protest of Christianity Against Materialism," preached at the Central Illinois Assembly at Mechanicsburg, was pronounced a masterly discourse. The attendance on that day was the largest of the season for the assembly.

—A. W. Kokendoffer, of Mexico, Mo., writes: "Mexico is preparing for six hundred delegates and visitors to the Missouri State Convention, Sept. 16-19. The ladies will begin serving dinner and supper at Central Hotel on Monday. Send names to P. W. Harding. The music of the convention, led by W. E. M. Hackleman, will be a special feature."

—Mrs. Flora Schenck, of Basin, Wyo., calls attention to the need of a preacher at that place and to the opening for home-seekers in that region. We have many scattered members in Wyoming but no organization. It is believed that a self-supporting church could be built up at Basin. Mrs. Schenck would be glad to correspond with any one interested.

—W. H. Hanna, who recently went to the Philippine islands under the auspices of the foreign society, writes that he arrived in Manila Aug. 3. He again requests all those who know of persons who have gone to the Philippines, either as soldiers or as civilians, and who may be interested in the formation of a church in Manila, to send the names to him.

—G. L. Snively, who has been pastor of the congregation at Jacksonville, Ill., and who has recently accepted the position of general secretary of the National Benevolent Association of the Christian Church, closed his pastorate the last Sunday in August. On Sept. 1 he preached at the Central, St. Louis, in the absence of the pastor, James McAllister.

—J. E. Lynn, of Springfield, Ill., requests all those who expect to go to the Minneapolis convention from central Illinois, and who wish to go by way of Springfield and Chicago, to send their names to him. A personally conducted party will leave Springfield at 11:22 A. M., Thursday, Oct. 10, over the C. & A., connecting at Chicago with the C. M. & St. P. One fare for the round trip.

—M. Pittman, who has been pastor at New Orleans, La., for two years, partly supported by the Home Missionary Society, closes his work there Sept. 30 and wishes to correspond with a church, either in the south or in Missouri, Kansas or Iowa, that is needing a pastor. His address is 4017 Perrier St., New Orleans, La. Reference is made to one of the elders, J. F. Adams, Covington, La.

—On Monday of this week we were favored with an unexpected visit from Bro. Charles Reign Scoville and his singer, DeLoss Smith. Brother Scoville is spending a few weeks prior to the opening of the evangelistic season in lecturing on his recent tour through the Orient. He is pronounced by all who have heard him to be a striking success on the lecture platform, and his stereopticon outfit, including moving pictures of oriental scenes, is more than usually complete.

—W. S. Priest, pastor of the First Christian Church, Atchison, Kan., takes a just pride in the number of men who are found in his congregations. On a recent Sunday evening a count was made without any previous announcement, and it was found that, in an audience of nearly four hundred there were only twenty-two more women and girls than men and boys. What is still more surprising, the attendance at prayer-meeting, which has been large even during this hot summer, is evenly divided between men and women.

—Rev. M. George Daniel, a native missionary and evangelist of Kurdistan, is now in St. Louis preaching as opportunity offers and lecturing on the people and customs of his native country. He is an archdeacon of the Thomas Christian Church, an ancient faith which is believed to have been founded by St. Thomas and which uses the Syriac version of the Scriptures known as the Targums. He has been through the thick of the Armenian massacres and, although very different from the Armenians both in race and religion, has been several times wounded on these occasions.

—A few days ago the secular papers contained a sensational announcement that Bro. J. G. M. Luttenberger had publicly declared his faith in Dowieism and was on the point of going over bodily to their camp. The report is, of course, wholly false and was doubtless the creation of some reporter who had space to fill and had difficulty in finding a story that day. Bro. Luttenberger may have said something to the effect that the state of the mind has much to do with the state of the body, or that imagination and belief often make people sick or well—all of which is, of course, true. But the brethren may rest assured that he had no intention of giving aid or comfort to the Chicago Elijah.

—Judging from the reports in the Denver papers, B. B. Tyler has gotten into a controversy with another minister of that city because he ventured to sound a warning against the demagoguery which is often manifested by the leaders of labor organizations and by others who, for their own profit, pose as the friends of the laboring man. This bogus interest in the welfare of the sons of toil is the easiest role that a demagogue can play, and the most pernicious because everyone who rebukes it is characterized by superficial minds as an enemy of labor and an ally of the trusts. Those who know Bro. Tyler are not afraid that he will lay himself open to any reasonable suspicion of being hostile to the interests of the laboring man.

—On Sept. 4, Miss Josepha Franklin, Miss Maude Plunkett and O. J. Grainger sailed from New York for India. Miss Plunkett is a graduate of the State University of Indiana. She is the daughter of one of our preachers in that state. O. J. Grainger is a graduate of Hiram College and has been the pastor of the church at Deerfield, Ohio, for more than a year. Miss Franklin has spent seven years in India. On the 12th Miss Nellie Daugherty, a graduate of Eureka College, will sail from San Francisco for Nankin. The force in the field is increasing all the time. The financial obligations of the society are considerably greater than ever before. On this account those who are interested in world-wide evangelism should give on a larger scale than ever before.

—The books of the foreign society closed on the last day of September. F. M. Rains, the secretary, is now in Japan. He is studying the field and the work, and is seeking to regain perfect health. In his absence the friends of missions should rally about the society as never before. Nothing will do him so much good as the knowledge that the receipts are increasing from week to week. That will do more to restore him than any ocean breezes or new and strange scenery or the best medical treatment. Before the year closes the receipts of the society should aggregate not less than $200,000. The Lord has increased our membership. He has committed vast wealth to our hands. He wishes us to show our gratitude by giving to aid this cause according as he has prospered us.

—The St. Louis Exposition will open for its eighteenth season, Sept. 9. In addition to the usual displays representing industrial products and processes, there will be several special features. The Philadelphia Commercial Museum, an institution which is of especial interest to St. Louisans, because it has been suggested that a similar museum be installed permanently in the exposition building, will have an important exhibit illustrating the general subject of foreign commerce. The art collection will comprise a loan collection of most of the fine pictures owned in this city, many of which have never before been shown to the public. There will be an interesting display of plans and schemes suggested for the Louisiana Purchase Exposition of 1903. The music will be furnished by Seymour's band.

—We are in receipt of an article from Brother D. M. Sprague, of Lowell, O., in which the writer endeavors to prove that Jesus was crucified on Thursday and rose on Saturday. This is in confutation of an answer recently given to a querist in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, in which it was stated that the usual view that he was buried on Friday and rose on Sunday is approved by most scholars. The chief point of Brother Sprague's argument is that since the phrases "while it was yet dark" and "at the end of the Sabbath as it began to dawn toward the first day of the week" show that the resurrection occurred before sunrise Sunday morning, therefore it must have occurred on Saturday. We cannot give space for the article in full, for the subject has been discussed many times

What are Humors?

They are vitiated or morbid fluids coursing the veins and affecting the tissues. They are commonly due to defective digestion but sometimes inherited.

How do they manifest themselves?

In many forms of cutaneous eruptions: salt rheum or eczema, pimples and boils and in weakness, languor and general debility.

How are they expelled? By

which builds up the system that has suffered from them.

It is the best of all medicines for humors.

and there is nothing new to be said about it. Any one who is interested can find exhaustive discussions in all of the commentaries and larger Bible dictionaries.

—We regret that space does not permit us to print the many pages of personal assurances and predictions of a great convention which the enterprising Minneapolis Committee has collected from many of our leading men and sent to us for publication. They read like this: "All signs point to a great convention." "I predict a great convention." "We shall and will have a great convention." Let the patient reader imagine about four yards of such predictions with the names of all of our prominent preachers signed thereto and he will have the situation before his mind as well as if we had used several pages of the paper in printing the whole list. As in the case of the missionary collections, so with our conventions, it is safe to assume that all our live men are interested and it is as unnecessary to print the entire list as it would be to print the names of those who think there was hot weather last month or who anticipate frost before Christmas. If there is any one who thinks there will not be frost before Christmas or who holds the equally curious opinion that the Minneapolis Convention will not be worth attending, let him send on his name and we will give it the publicity which such a unique aberration of judgment richly deserves

—It takes an immense amount of detailed organization as well as of general enthusiasm to make a great convention, and the people of Minneapolis are not slow in either respect. The Minneapolis transportation committee urges the desirability of the appointment of transportation committees and managers in each state to secure large delegations to the convention. Already much has been done in this direction. Texas has a committee with Dr. T. F. Driskill as chairman, which will try to break the state's Jubilee record for convention attendance. In Ohio, S. H. Bartlett, of Cleveland, C. W. Huffer, of Toledo, C. A. Freer, of Columbus, and B. L. Smith, of Cincinnati, are looking after the delegations from their respective sections. A. B. Griffith, of Ionia, Mich., was appointed by the Michigan state convention to organize the delegation from that state and his ambition is to have a larger delegation than any other state in proportion to membership. The Washington state convention appointed H. K. Pendleton as its transportation manager and Oregon has a committee consisting of J. B. Lister, J. F. Ghormley and E. C. Sanderson. We have not yet heard what action was taken at the recent California conventions, but a united effort will doubtless be made. B. S. Denny is working up the attendance in Iowa and J. M. Lucas is looking after the Christian Endeavorers in that state. Claude E. Hill, superintendent of C. E. for Missouri, assisted by W. H. McClain, will take an imposing delegation of Missouri Endeavorers by way of Kansas City and the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST SPECIAL (in charge of the Excursion Manager, care of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST) will take every one in eastern Missouri and western Illinois and many from further north and further south who can connect with this route. Will F. Shaw, of Illinois; F. M. Tinder, of Kentucky; B. L. Allen, of Indiana; and H. H. Harmon, of Nebraska, will look after their respective states. S. T. Willis will bring a delegation from New York.

D. N. Wetzel.

We take great pleasure this week in introducing to our readers, especially those of Illinois, David N. Wetzel, as a field representative of the Christian Publishing Co. He was born in Paris, Ill., June 19, 1870. At the age of fourteen he united with the Christian Church of Paris, under the ministry of Bro. Flowers. He was graduated from the schools of Paris in 1890, at which time he decided to enter the ministry. Through the earnest solicitation of H. M. Brooks, then minister of the Paris congregation, and the kindly helpfulness of his home church, he entered Eureka College the following fall. He was graduated from this institution in 1894 and immediately took charge of the church at Rutland, Ill. He labored successfully for this congregation for two years, then resigned his position so that he might be free to take advanced work in Eureka College. Here he completed the Bible course and a post-graduate course and received the degree of B. S. L. and M. A.

While in Eureka at this time he was married to Annie Janvier Jones, a graduate of the college and for years a teacher in the department of elocution and oratory. She is the granddaughter of J. T. Jones and Ben Major, founders of Eureka College.

Mr. Wetzel has held pastorates at Rutland, Ill., Farmer City, Ill., and Richland Center, Wis., and every church that has lost him has been sorry to see him go. He was at one time offered the position of state evangelist of Wisconsin, but thought it would be unjust to his church at Richland Center to leave it at that time. The membership of the Richland Center church increased forty-five per cent. in the first year of his ministry. He has resigned his position to represent the Christian Publishing Co., in Illinois. Many have expressed to him their surprise in the change he has made, but he believes that in no way is he taking up a less important work. He says: "I sincerely believe that a number of good, strong religious papers in the homes of our church members is of more importance than an assistant minister." We bespeak for him, and are certain he will receive in his native state, a hearty welcome from all of our churches.

Missouri Mission Notes.

Our convention meets in Mexico, Sept. 16-19. Please do not be misled by the mistake on the title page of the printed program, but remember it is Sept. 16-19.

Have you sent in your name to the entertainment committee? If not you owe it to them to do so immediately and tell them you are coming. Address P. W. Harding, Mexico, Mo. They are making every possible arrangement for the entertainment of their guests, they are preparing for a very large convention, and the Mexico church will be very much disappointed if that large crowd fails to materialize. The programs have been sent all over the state; letters have been written to the elders of the churches, asking them to see that their preachers come to the convention. Special invitations have been sent to all the preachers in the state.

RAILROAD RATES.

Your secretary has been working on the matter of railroad rates for over two months. The Western Passenger Association turned down our application for a one-fare rate and granted the rate of one and one-third fare on the certificate plan. I have not yet accepted; but am still working for the one-fare rate and still have strong hopes of securing it. We have seen the Wabash, Alton, Missouri Pacific, M. K. & T., Frisco, and this includes the Memphis and the Burlington, and all have practically agreed to the one fare round trip rate. The Wabash, Alton, M. K. & T., Frisco and Missouri Pacific sure, the Burlington almost certain. We are in correspondence with the Rock Island and Santa Fe and have no doubt at all but they will fall in line. Go to your railroad agent a day or two before you want to start and ask him what his instructions are, if they are not as above get him to ask headquarters for further instructions. If he has no instructions and gets none, and you have to pay anything more than one fare, take his receipt for the money you pay, and do this every time you buy going to Mexico. Remember the selling dates are Sept. 16, 17, 18, good to return including Sept. 20. Tell this to your friends, let everybody know.

Churches that have not yet given to the support of this work this year, should remember that their time to do so is now. We need your earnest co-operation. With your help we can succeed, without it we must fail. Success or failure then rests with the brotherhood of the state. T. A. ABBOTT.

Things as They are in Oklahoma.

The outgoing Frisco train at 10:10 this a. m. carried an aged brother from the Sucker state who came yesterday or the day before. This man is bending under the weight of seventy (70) years, the larger part of which has been spent preaching the gospel; yet this brother has not a dollar. The ticket to his destination (temporarily) was bought by money which I solicited on the streets or paid out of my own pocket. I have reason to believe that this brother is all right.

In June Bro. Hardwick and myself helped a brother out of Blackwell to the tune of ten dollars. While at El Reno, during the registration, I think there must have been forty or fifty of our preachers there, but two of whom, in so far as I know got claims. Perhaps most of these wanted work. Besides this it is a well known fact that we have a number of good men only partially employed, or on very meager allowances. The best salary in the territory is $1,500; the second $1,200, and these are big exceptions. No other minister gets more than $800, and from that down just as low as you can think. One aged man, a fine preacher who has put in all his time for the past four or five years, has not received over two hundred dollars per annum. Still to my knowledge there are a number of good men looking this way.

Now what has brought us to this state of affairs? It seems to me there is something wrong somewhere. The old brother first mentioned was led to believe that he could follow Horace Greeley's advice at this late date. That was good advice at that time, but the west of 1901 is not the west of 1861. In my judgment the west, especially Oklahoma, is considerably overdone, and of this not the least is advertizing. True we have raised good crops for five years, got good prices and are, financially speaking, in the swim, and three or four of our preachers who got claims are not the losers by coming to Oklahoma.

If any brother preacher desires to come to Oklahoma he has my hearty permission, but he might just as well know that unless he greatly exceeds the average he must be content with from about $500 to $700, and then it means hard work.

I write not these things for the sake of those who have assisted them, but that the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST may know the truth of the matter.

Healthy Schoolma'am.

Found Out How to Feed Herself.

Many school teachers, at the end of their year's work, feel thoroughly exhausted and worn out, physically and mentally. The demand upon the nerves and brain of a teacher is unusual and unless they are well fed and fed upon properly selected food, it is natural that they should run down.

A little woman teacher at Gobleville, Mich., who has been teaching regularly for a number of years, has always found herself thoroughly exhausted at the end of the session, until within the last year she has made use of Grape-Nuts Food with the result that she closed the year as a robust, healthy, strong, vigorous woman, having gained in weight from 90 pounds to 126; her nerves strong, face bright and cheery, and really a wonder to all her friends, who constantly comment on her color and strength. She knows exactly to what the change is attributed, for in the years past, living on ordinary food, she has almost broken down before the school year closed, whereas since using Grape Nuts, this change has been brought about; evidence prima facie of the value of Grape Nuts Food for rebuilding the brain and nerve centers.

The name of the teacher can be given by the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

Indiana Items.

The churches of Rush county will hold their annual meeting at Rushville, on Tuesday, September 10. James Small, of Bedford, will deliver two addresses, and a most profitable time is anticipated.

The first church in eastern Indiana to take a stand for the original gospel was the Little Flatrock congregation in Rush county. Part of the members lived near what is now Orange, Fayette county, and a church was organized there in 1827, and a few weeks later, the other Little Flatrock members took a firm position for the primitive gospel.

About the same time the Ben Davis Creek Church was constituted on the New Testament basis, and the preacher that had been most influential in the work of restoration in all that region, labored industriously to maintain the faith as it was delivered, once for all, to the saints. These and all other Rush county churches have been faithful to the pure gospel to this day.

John P. Thompson, the brilliant young Baptist minister, had journeyed to Kentucky to confer with "Raccoon" John Smith, that one or the other might be turned from darkness. John P. Thompson learned much from the Kentucky evangelist, and returning to Rush county frankly informed his brethren that he would labor to restore the Christianity of the apostolic age. His Baptist brethren almost unanimously sustained his efforts. To this day the influence of that faithful minister of God's word is felt in all that country, although he has long since entered into rest.

Churches soon sprang up at Rushville, Milroy, Plum Creek, Arlington, Hannagan, Center, Manilla, Homer, Big Flatrock, Fairview, Rawleigh, and last perhaps, at Carthage, where there is also a live congregation of colored disciples. These churches, almost without exception, are as strong this first year of the new century as ever at any time in their history. They maintain a ministry that is not excelled by that of any religious body in the county, and they number an aggregate membership larger than any denomination of the county.

Prof. S. W. Percy, of Macanaw, Mich., has just held a meeting at Fairview (Groves P. O.), where seven were added to the congregation. Some of these were of advanced years, and the church is rejoicing that they were turned to the Lord, even so late in life. But the Fairview church is successful in gathering their young people into the church also.

The writer is now in a meeting at Plum Creek (Gings P. O.), where there have been 15 accessions in about a week. He preached here a part of his time for four years, ending in 1890, and is near the close of the third year of his second term of service. It was organized in December, 1833, with a good membership, soon reaching 61 in number. In 1854 there were but 39 on the church roll. The congregation now has a membership of 295. As there are accessions at every daily service we cannot tell how long our present meeting will continue.

Every preacher in Indiana is asked by the state board to secure at least ten dollars from his field of labor for state missionary work by the first Lord's day in November. There is a crying need of more money to carry on evangelistic work in this state. There is no better way to do evangelistic work than through the medium of the state board. For every dollar sent them they will raise three dollars on the field of work. There are many fine openings in the state where quick results can be had from small investments. Our Indiana preachers owe it to themselves to do as much for state work as for any other department of missionary efforts.

The autumn conventions are at hand and there should be a loyal attendance on the part of our preachers and workers. These meetings are the best conventions now held in the state, and more work is planned and

Good Health

Is doubtless the highest human good. It is especially so to women, to whom it means the preservation of beauty, happiness in the home, and the enjoyment of social duties. There can be no good health for any woman who suffers from womanly diseases. Her complexion fails. Her flesh loses its firmness. Her eyes are dull. She has no home happiness, no social enjoyment.

Doctor Pierce's Favorite Prescription cures the diseases which destroy the health. It establishes regularity, dries disagreeable drains, heals inflammation and ulceration, and cures female weakness. It gives good health to women, which means tranquil nerves, a good appetite and sound sleep.

"I was a great sufferer two years ago with female trouble and I wrote to you for advice," says Mrs. Mattie Hays, of Tribulation, McDonald Co., Missouri. "You outlined a course of treatment for me. I followed your directions, and now feel like a different person. I never expected to hear from you when I wrote to you. In three days after I commenced taking your medicines I began to feel better. I took twenty dollars' worth of the 'Favorite Prescription' and 'Golden Medical Discovery.' I bought it five dollars' worth at a time, and also four vials of Dr. Pierce's Pellets. I would not take one thousand dollars for the good the medicine has done me. I can't praise it enough. I wish all who suffer with such troubles would give Dr. Pierce's medicines a fair trial. I can work all day—doing anything, walk where I please, and feel good. Many thanks to you for your kind advice."

Dr. Pierce's Medical Adviser, in paper covers, is sent free on receipt of 21 one-cent stamps to pay expense of mailing only. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

executed through them than in any other co-operative lines. In this way conventions are within the reach of all and state workers reach every part of the state. The following is a list of Indiana district conventions: Elkhart, Sept. 16-18; Francesville, Sept. 18-20; Boswell, Sept. 23-25; Mary, Sept. 25-27; Decatur, Sept. 30-Oct. 2; Fountain City, Oct. 2-4; Indianapolis (Morris St.) Oct. 21-23; Danville, Oct. 23-25; Greenwood, Oct. 28-30; Madison, Oct. 30-Nov. 1; Columbus, Tabernacle, Nov. 4-6; Bloomfield, Nov. 6-8; Old Union R. Southern California.

Following closely upon the adjournment of the Northern California Convention, which I had the pleasure of attending at Santa Cruz, July 20 to Aug. 4, came the opening of the convention of the churches of southern California, which was held at Long Beach, Aug. 8 to 18. This was in every respect the greatest convention in the history of our southern California conventions. It is the policy of this convention to aid the weak churches in support of pastors rather than spend all their funds in distinctively evangelistic work. Two years' experience has demonstrated the wisdom of this course.

Reports from all the churches were enthusiastic. Help will be rendered to about twelve churches this next year. It is hoped also that we shall be able to put a field secretary to work in this section if a suitable man can be found. He must take part of his compensation in our glorious climate.

The two conventions joined in asking F. D. Power to visit our assemblies in the capacity of a "chief speaker." To say that we were delighted with his services is to faintly express the truth. He did us great good. His sermons were models in condensation and thorough preparation. His two lectures on "Blockheads" and "A Twenty-six Years' Pastorate in the Capital City," were most highly appreciated. His beautiful spirit and wise counsel will ever be remembered.

George W. Muckley, the indefatigable church extension secretary, has been in great evidence on the Pacific coast since Jan. 1, 1901. He has been visiting our coast churches from Mexico to British Columbia. His trip has been highly appreciated by our Christian workers in this great empire. The church extension board has shown most commendable wisdom and enterprise in keeping him so long in this important field. Our churches have been generous contributors to this important fund, and many of our weaker churches could not have erected suitable buildings but for its assistance in the time of need.

California Notes.

California state meeting has come and gone leaving an impress that will reach to the end of time. The attendance was larger than usual and the interest was deep and full from start to finish. "Garfield Christian Park" is a typical place for a state gathering. The strong buoyant breath of the Pacific makes the body tingle with its vivacious spirit.

A large class was present to attend Dean Van Kirk's Bible lectures a week before the time of the state convention; as the people began to assemble for the state convention the class more than doubled. The old Book seemed to be a newly developed mine, deeply rich in its great treasure house. The convention opened with the C. W. B. M. program well filled by our state workers and Sister Kelly of the general society. A day was devoted to Sunday-school work, State President Jopson presiding. One day for Christian Endeavor work, Pres. McMillan, of Sacramento. Garfield Park day was an interesting one under the management of Bro. Freeman. Then we had an anti saloon day, one of the best of all the days. Bro. Webb, the ubiquitous temperance state lecturer, was commander-in-chief.

The convention proper was one of the best in years. Good work was done during the last year and enlargement planned for the coming year. Bro. Dargitz, of Lakeport, is added to the evangelizing force. Not the least among all these days was the ministerial convention, with a series of well prepared papers filled with thought and the Spirit, so much so that during one of the sessions of the ministerial convention it was turned into a consecration service.

Bro. Smithers and wife and Bros. Dowling and McReynolds, all of the southland, Bros. Powers, Muckley and Rains and their wives were present and were an inspiration.

Greetings were exchanged with the Baptist convention which was in session four miles away, and a committee was appointed to confer with one which the Baptists will appoint in a few weeks at their general association to arrange for co-operation in our state work. Most of our programs were so arranged that the afternoons were left for recreation along the beach in the waves or the sand, gathering moss, fishing, or gazing thoughtfully into the powers of the great deep. It was a time and place to lay by in store power for the year.

Sister W. H. Hopson's presence was a pleasure to all of us, and the meeting was a delight to her, but we all felt the absence of Bro. R. L. McHatton, who from the first year of his advent into California, near twenty years ago, has never failed to be present.

J. DURHAM.

Minnesota Letter.

Our state convention has just closed at Austin. The attendance was small but the business was large. We have made slow progress during the past year so far as figures show, but to those who are sufficiently acquainted with the whole field there appear some most excellent results which cannot be indicated in figures. The officers elected were: A. D. Harmon, president; C. J. Tanner, vice-president; L. E. Scott, recording secretary; H. D. Williams, treasurer; J. W. Anderson, auditor; J. K. Shellenberger, corresponding secretary and evangelist; John Treloar, superintendent of Christian Endeavor; J. E. Hood, superintendent of Bible-schools. J. K. Shellenberger is to give his time largely to the field holding meetings, and Simpson Ely has been employed to do the same kind of work.

Our membership in the state still remains under three thousand. We hope by another year to carry it far beyond that mark. With two good evangelists in the field and the national conventions at Minneapolis to arouse our churches to the hope of greater things, we believe our day of growth has come.

The new preachers present were, Leslie Wolfe, of Amboy, J. E. Hood, of Canby, John Treloar, of Austin, C. R. Sine, of Duluth, Wm. Baier, of Winona, L. E. Scott, of St. Paul, and E. A. Orr, of Redwood Falls. Bro. Baier gave us a most interesting account of his "Search for Truth," which recently brought him among us. Bro. Orr read us a profound paper on "The Preacher as the Advance Agent of the Kingdom." Bros. Tanner and Harmon delivered the night addresses.

The C. W. B. M. elected as new officers the following: Mrs. A. D. Harmon, president, Mrs. J. C. Tanner, first vice-president; Mrs. W. H. Crandall, second vice-president; Mrs. J. C. Ingersol, recording secretary; Mrs. B. H. Morgan, treasurer; Miss Emma Firestone, state organizer; Mrs. M. H. Towner, Junior superintendent.

The next convention will be held at Mankato the third week in June, 1902.

A Larger Outlook for Our National Benevolent Association.

Through generous provisions made by a few Christian gentlemen, a general secretary has been added to the working forces of our National Benevolent Association. It is hoped that he, in conjunction with those who have already been so effective in this enterprise, will greatly increase the power and usefulness of this arm of our service.

National headquarters have been opened in our own building, 903 Aubert Ave., St. Louis. All remittances of money and communications for the Orphan's Cry may be sent to Mrs. J. K. Hansbrough at that address; also applications for admittance to the Orphans' Home, or for adoption of children, to Mrs. O. C. Shedd. The president, Mrs. H. M. Meier, may be addressed at the same number on matters relating to the Benevolent Association. Application for admittance to the Old People's Home will be mailed directly to Miss Kate Paradise, Jacksonville, Ill. Communications relating to the annual Easter and also special offerings, the appointment of local vice-presidents and state representatives, convention addresses, and kindred topics, will be sent to the undersigned.

The general secretary will also go to any part of the land, free of charges, to execute

Is It An Epidemic?

Vital Statistics Show an Alarming Increase in an Already Prevailing Disease—Are any Exempt?

At no time in the history of disease has there been such an alarming increase in the number of cases of any particular malady as in that of kidney and bladder troubles now preying upon the people of this country.

To-day we see a relative, a friend or an acquaintance apparently well, and in a few days we may be grieved to learn of their serious illness or sudden death, caused by that fatal type of kidney trouble—Bright's disease.

Kidney trouble often becomes advanced into acute stages before the afflicted is aware of its presence; that is why we read of so many sudden deaths of prominent business and professional men, physicians and others. They have neglected to stop the leak in time.

While scientists are puzzling their brains to find out the cause, each individual can, by a little precaution, avoid the chances of contracting dreaded and dangerous kidney trouble, or eradicate it completely from their system if already afflicted. Many precious lives might have been, and many more can yet be saved, by paying attention to the kidneys.

It is the mission of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to benefit its readers at every opportunity and therefore we advise all who have any symptoms of kidney or bladder trouble to write to-day to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., for a free sample bottle of Swamp Root, the celebrated specific which is having such a great demand and remarkable success in the cure of the most distressing kidney and bladder troubles. With the sample bottle of Swamp-Root will also be sent free a pamphlet and treatise of valuable information.

annuity bonds or to write wills where bequests are made to us. Congregations in all the states are earnestly asked to enter into fellowship with us in this popular, fundamental and testimony-bearing work of the Lord.

It is hoped that soon, in various parts of the land, other orphanages and homes than those now in St. Louis, and Jacksonville, Ill., may be in active operation, and for the sake of economy, equitableness, and effective newspaper representation, will all be under the auspices of our National Benevolent Association.

We rejoice that the tide of philanthropy is rising in our churches. We are sure there is no place where dollars can be sown with greater assurance of being transformed into spiritual harvests than in the fields of our National Benevolence. The writer has given up a devoted church of 1,250 members to assist in the superintendence of this necessary feature of Christian ministry and testimony, and asks for the co-operation of all ministers and other brothers and sisters in Christ Jesus.

Deafness Cannot be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

The Nebraska Convention.

N. C. M. S.

The annual convention of the N. C. M. S. for 1901, met in Bethany, Neb., Aug. 19-24, and was from beginning to end full of business. The program was carried out exactly as printed, with one or two exceptions. The last meeting was held on Friday night, with almost a full tent. The deep interest in the matters of business was shown in the sessions of the N. C. M. S. and the N. C. M. A., both of which ran all through the noon hour. B. S. Denny, of Iowa, gave a stirring and conclusive address on state missions, which lent its influence greatly to the warm interest displayed. The annual report of the board of the N. C. M. S. showed total receipts, $2,168.56. Balance on hand, $560.84. Total added under the direct aid of the society, 310. Pastors and evangelists employed, 17. Places assisted, 25. Days' service, 2,015. Sermons, 833. In addition to this evangelists working under the partial direction of the board without pay from the board reported 186 additions.

Some of our younger men were heard on the program for the first time, and acquitted themselves creditably. The people of Bethany showed their zeal in getting the grounds ready. Their request that the convention return again another year was granted. The total attendance of delegates and visitors was 360, a little below that of last year.

The following were elected as the governing board for next year: President, Z. O. Doward; vice president, S. T. Martin; recording secretary, L. A. Hussong; treasurer, T. E. Wilson; B. S. Supt., E. E. Boyd; C. E. Supt., H. J. Kennedy; corresponding secretary, W. A. Baldwin; president of C. W. B. M., Mrs. J. S. McCleery; chancellor of Cotner University, Wm. P. Aylsworth; R. A. Schell, president of Ministerial Association. These with district secretaries constitute the board. W. A. Baldwin, as corresponding secretary, will work as heretofore. A Bible-school evangelist was called to work under the B. S. fund, A. L. Ogden being retained in this work. A state evangelist was chosen in the person of Samuel Gregg, of Harvard, to give his whole time to the work under the direction of the board. Several important fields were granted assistance for pastoral supply. A meeting at Inavale was inaugurated. Bro. Gregg begins work September 16. Bro. Ogden begins his work at Ord.

W. A. BALDWIN.

C. W. B. M.

The C. W. B. M. session was held Wednesday afternoon and evening, August 21. Mrs. J. S. McCleery, state president, emphasized in her address the need of continued, consecrated, personal work, loyalty, faithfulness and spiritual growth and the importance of state development. Miss Olive Griffith, state secretary and organizer, showed on her printed reports 74 auxiliaries. Eleven have disbanded during the year, but 15 have been organized and reorganized; 1,472 total membership; 402 Tidings taken and $466.72 contributed for state work. Mrs. L. M. Wiles, superintendent young people's work, reported 53 societies in the state, 33 reporting to state superintendent and 20 contributing to national work.

Mrs. Alice M. Wickizer, of Beatrice, made a stirring address on the "Training of the Children," followed by Miss Mattie Burgess on "The Religions of India." C. A. Young gave the evening address.

The state banner was awarded to district No. 3 (the Omaha district), for making greatest percentage of gain in numbers. Auburn won the new Waggoner map for making greatest percentage of gain. They now report 108 members. Nora. Ulysses, Douglas and Pawnee City are on the honor roll for reporting quarterly and sending ten and five cents per member quarterly for state and national work.

Districts 1, 2, 5 and 7 and also the Fair-bury auxiliary are each supporting an India orphan. Nebraska has 10 districts; 9 and 10 are large in area but small in numbers. The officers for the coming year are: President, Mrs. J. S. McCleery; vice president, Mrs. Calla Scott Willard; secretary and organizer, Miss Olive Griffith, treasurer, Mrs. Nellie M. Hanna; recording secretary, Mrs. Osterholt, and superintendent junior work, Mrs. L. M. Wiles.

MINNIE GRIMSTEAD HIMES.

Pueblo, Col.

Perils of the Street Fair.

We must have our amusements and recreations. This is right. God ordained that man should play as well as work, that we should have our periods of relaxation as well as of labor. The friction of the cares and toils of life can best be relieved by the lubrication of recreation.

The sage of Bethany sought recreation from mental toil in his early morning rides on horseback among the beautiful hills that skirt the historic Buffalo. President Milligan's favorite recreation was cheerful exercise for half an hour each afternoon "riding the saw-buck," as he expressed it. Gladstone hied him to the woods with his ax; Spurgeon to his bowling alley; and Lyman Beecher, 'tis said, to his violin and capered to his music until his wife protested lest he wear out his home-knit stockings. And Bro. Garrison, like a true follower of Peter and Andrew, recreates by "going a-fishing."

To deny ourselves these periods of relaxation would be hazardous; and to try to restrict others, especially our young men and women, would be the height of folly. Every reader will agree that whatever tends to improve both mind and body is right, and that whatever endangers the health and influences the evil passions is wrong. For example: to drink pure water satisfies thirst and promotes health; to drink alcoholic beverages inflames an abnormal appetite and promotes disease. As water is to the body so is true recreation to the whole system—body, mind and soul. As wine and whisky are to the body, so are evil amusements to the person who knowingly and willingly seeks their enjoyments.

There are some very pleasant features about these so-called street fairs, rendering them attractive and even fascinating to many, such as the exquisite floral decorations, prepared by our own dear wives and daughters; the beautiful flower parade. Then there is the pleasure of meeting familiar faces and renewing acquaintances of former days, for "everybody and his family" will be there. And above and beyond all, the business man says: "It will add such an impetus to every branch of business in the place and advertise the town."

This may all be true, and more; yet every rose has its thorn and every bright picture has its dark lines. There are some "free attractions" connected with these fairs that, when viewed from a moral, not to say Christian standpoint, more than offset the pleasures and benefits they afford. These "free attractions" are often immodest and licentious performances. They attract the youth from far and near. The civil officers are powerless to prevent these performances, for are they not the chief attraction, the magnet that draws the crowd? Dispense with the free attractions and the crowd will leave at the close of the first day, said an officer whose duty called him behind the curtains. "Within that tent lies Sodom."

As parents we are responsible to God for the moral education of our children. It is our duty to provide innocent and healthful recreations. It is also our duty to withhold our support from and to denounce sinful and soul destroying performances.

Some attend for the very purposes that make it dangerous to a Christian. Many come who are on the scent for sensualities. Shall I, as a follower of Christ, cross the line sharp and clear that he has drawn dividing between the pleasures of the world and those of his followers by helping to provide these gilded and godless attractions? If I do so knowingly I become a votary of sinful pleasure. And more than this, I assist by my presence and contributions to induct the youth into a school of morals that is truly lamentable, speaking as a physician, both from a moral and a sanitary standpoint.

Then let none of us advocate or encourage performances that endanger the moral health and influence the evil passions of the youth of our land. Indifference, even, on our part may result in the moral ruin of thousands. Attendance upon the average street fair is not an innocent recreation. Instead of helping to advance and elevate it corrupts and destroys souls.

There is a door connected with them that opens downward, and not upward towards the Christian's home in heaven.

The Value Of Charcoal.

Few People Know How Useful it Is in Preserving Health and Saut.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better; it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines, and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking, or after eating onions or other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion; it whitens the teeth; and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics, in tablet form, or rather in the form of large, pleasant-tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood; and the beauty of it is that no harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician, in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

What It Is.

What concerns you chiefly is what a medicine does, but intelligent men and women of to day feel that they should know what sort of drugs they are taking. This you are plainly told on every package of Yucatan Chill Tonic. It is neither a bitter nor a sweet tonic. It is an honest medicine and made right. No shaking of the bottle required. You get more curative properties in a dose of Yucatan than in six doses of the so-called tasteless tonics. All tasteless tonics are unreliable as the dose is uncertain and consequently more or less dangerous, and sweet Tonics or Medicines do not agree with the stomach.

What It Does.

Yucatan Chill Tonic not only cures all Malarial Diseases—Chills, Fever, Ague—but also prevents them if taken before the season for these diseases begins. One bottle has cured in many cases when six to eight bottles of “tasteless” tonics have been used without effect. No other tonic or medicine ever made will so quickly and completely drive out all of the effects of malaria after an attack as will Yucatan Chill Tonic. As a general tonic for every member of the family at all seasons of the year it has no equal.

Sold by dealers generally. Price 50 cents a bottle.

See that the Trade-Mark as above is on every package and every bottle.
Take no substitute.

Evangelistic.

Special dispatch to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

Ladoga, Ind., Sept. 1.—Wilson and Huston meeting closed with 183 added; 28 to-night. Glorious things ahead.—W. T. BROOKS.

ILLINOIS.

Barry, Sept. 2.—Had our annual roll call yesterday. Large attendance and good reports. Expenses for the year paid and $252.-80 raised for missions, a gain of $191.53 over last year. One added to the church at prayer-meeting Thursday night and four yesterday.—F. M. ROGERS.

Bunker Hill, Sept. 2.—The battle of Bunker Hill has been a severe one. Bro. Edward O. Sharpe, of Girard, and Bro. and Sister Guy B. Williamson, of St. Louis, deserve much credit for the earnest efforts they have put forth and the sacrifices they have made during their month's evangelistic enterprise at this place. The field was rough and unbroken. The ministers and congregations of the sectarian churches combined against us. The meetings were begun Aug. 1, and on Sept. 1 a Church of Christ was organized with 41 members, 24 of these being confessions. A Sunday-school has also been organized and negotiations are under way for securing preaching twice a month.—H. F. HENRICHES

Dorchester, Aug. 26.—We had two additions to our regular services yesterday at Gillespie, Ill.—JOHN G. M. LUTTENBERGER.

Jacksonville Sept. 2.—The pastorate of our new minister starts off grandly. There were three additions, two by letter and one confession. Two are heads of families. Bro. Thrapp's initiatory sermon was listened to by an audience that taxed the seating capacity of our commodious building.—WALLACE BROCKMAN.

Niantic, Sept. 2.—We have had seven additions to the church here recently—4 by baptism and 3 by statement. Yesterday was our roll call and rally day; also took offering for church extension.—J. R. PARKER.

Normal.—Four additions recently.—E. B. BARNES.

Pittsfield.—R. F. Thrapp closed a most successful pastorate here last Sunday. He has labored earnestly for over three years, during which time there have been 175 additions. He leaves the church in a flourishing condition. The Jacksonville, Ill., church, with which he begins work Sept. 1, can consider itself fortunate in securing him.—FRED A. HICKS.

INDIANA.

Bloomington, Aug. 26.—Two baptized at Mt. Gibson yesterday and one to-day.—WALTER L. ROSS.

Falmouth.—Our meeting at Fairview (Groves) Ind., closed Aug. 23. Twelve added; 11 by primary obedience. Mrs. Percy conducted the music, much to the delight of all who love to worship in song. Large audiences.—S. W. PEARCY.

Jeffersonville, Aug. 27.—On the second Sunday in August I started a meeting at Fairview, Scott county. It continued for twelve days. There were 13 confessions and two additions by relation. The brethren feel much encouraged.—F. E. ANDREWS.

Madison, Aug. 29.—Two confessions Sunday evening, two more yesterday evening at prayer-meeting—making 42 since January at the regular services. Our work is very encouraging at present. Our C. E. society has received about 15 new members recently. Our society received the gold medal offered as the state prize to the society sending the largest delegation the greatest number of miles.—J. MURRAY TAYLOR.

INDIAN TERRITORY.

Chickasha, Aug. 26.—We closed an eight days' meeting at Brady, I. T., on the 23d, with 26 additions in all; eight baptisms, one from the Baptists and 16 by statement and reclamation. We came home Saturday and had two good services here at Chickasha yesterday, with one confession and one by statement. Our new circular pews are now being placed in the church.—JOHN A. STEVENS.

IOWA.

Anita, Aug. 28.—Three additions last Lord's Day, two by confession and one from the Baptists. During the three days' reunion held here last week, our people with their dining hall cleared about $200. This will more than pay all of our little debts. The work moves here in spite of many difficulties.—D. B. TITUS, pastor.

Des Moines, Aug. 27.—Seven additions during the past week; 305 in ten months.—E. W. BRICKERT, pastor East Side Church of Christ.

Eagle Grove, Aug. 26.—Our meeting here goes nicely. Storms, carnival, etc., have hurt us some. However our audiences have been good. Gave first general invitation last night; 13 responded.—J. S. BEEM.

Guthrie Center, Aug. 26.—One baptism here yesterday.—D. L. DUNKLEBERGER.

OHIO.

Canton, Aug. 26.—We are just commencing a meeting here. The church has built a temporary tabernacle which will seat 3,000 and the meeting will continue not less than eight weeks, with J. V. Updike as evangelist.—J. D. JOHNSON.

Findlay, Aug. 26.—Four added last month. Yesterday I received one who had already been baptized. Full houses and fine interest. Lecture room full at prayer-meetings.—A. M. GROWDEN.

OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Chandler, Sept. 2.—The fourth district Christian Endeavor convention begins here in the Christian church to-day. I took up my work again yesterday after an outing of three weeks. KANSAS.

Cimarron, Aug. 27.—Bro. E. M. Carr closed a very successful meeting here last evening. Twenty-six baptisms, and 10 added by letter and statement.—JOHN BULL.

MISSOURI.

Albany, Aug. 28.—J. W. Ellis, president of Central Christian College, assisted me in an annual basket meeting at Sheridan, Mo., second Lord's day in August, where I preach half time. President Ellis delivered three excellent discourses, and there were two additions by statement. Last Lord's day there was one baptism at my last regular appointment at Sheridan.—M. S. JAMESON.

Blythedale, Aug. 27.—My short visit to West Plains was exceedingly pleasant. Our meeting here starts off nicely. The audiences have outgrown our house. Twelve additions so far and a fine interest. Last Lord's day we had a basket meeting, three sermons and baptizing. Brethren Stanley, Mitchell and Sears are visiting the meeting. My daughter, Mrs. C. A. Scott, is conducting the music.—MORGAN MORGANS.

Canton, Aug. 29.—Just closed a two weeks' meeting at Moore's Chapel in Macon Co., Mo., in which we had six additions. The end of our third year is nearing a close, during which time we have added 65 to the church, 46 by confession and baptism.—CHAS. L. HARBORD.

Canton, Aug. 29.—Three added at Hunnewell, Mo., the fourth Lord's day, one by statement, one by confession and one from the Methodists. Interest renewed and prospects for more effective work. Baptized a lady 65 years old at the above named place, two months ago.—RUPERT FORD.

Canton, Aug. 31.—Thursday night I closed a 12-days' meeting at my regular appointment at Mt. Pleasant church in Knox county, with four added, two from Baptists, one letter and one statement. I have had two baptisms, not

A FEW FACTS

About the New Catarrh Cure.

The new Catarrh Cure is a new departure in so-called catarrh cures because it actually cures, and is not simply a temporary relief.

The new Catarrh Cure is not a salve, ointment, powder nor liquid, but a pleasant tasting tablet containing the best specifics for catarrh in a concentrated, convenient form.

The old style of catarrh salves and ointments are greasy, dirty and inconvenient at the best; the new preparation being in tablet form is always clean and convenient.

The new Catarrh Cure is superior to catarrh powders because it is a notorious fact that many catarrh powders contain cocaine.

The new Catarrh Cure is called Stuart's Catarrh Tablets, a wholesome combination of blood root, beechwood tar, guaiacal and other antiseptics, and cures by its action upon the blood and mucous membrane, the only rational treatment for catarrhal trouble.

You do not have to draw upon your imagination to discover whether you are getting benefit from Stuart's Catarrh Tablets; improvements and relief are apparent from the first tablet taken.

All druggists sell and recommend them. They cost but 50 cents for full sized packages, and any catarrh sufferer who has wasted time and money on sprays, salves and powders, will appreciate to the full the merits of Stuart's Catarrh Tablets.

A little booklet on cause and cure of catarrh sent free by addressing F. A. Stuart Co., Marshall, Mich.

yet reported, that occurred at regular appointments before the meeting at that church.—D. B. McCANON.

Carrollton, Aug. 30.—In June we held a three weeks' meeting at Hale which resulted in 29 additions and the re-organization of the church. This is now one of the best churches in the county. In July we held a short meeting at Rockford with six additions. Just closed a 16 days' meeting at Mt. Carmel with 14 added. This is a new organization, composed of the very best people in Carroll Co. It has a bright future before it. The cause in this county is prospering as it has not done in years.—R. H. LOVE, county evangelist.

Galena, Aug. 29.—Just closed a two weeks' meeting at Railey Creek schoolhouse, baptized six, four from Baptists, two reclaimed. Nineteen gave their names for an organization, with more to come.—O. W. JONES.

Kirksville, Sept. 2.—We have just closed a splendid two weeks' meeting in Huntsville, Mo. Bro. Cupp, the pastor there, filled my pulpit one Sunday in Kirksville. My people were very much pleased with him and his preaching.—H. A. NORTHCUTT.

Marionville, Aug. 28.—Our meeting here is 10 days old with eight added, five by confession.—JOSEPH GAYLOR.

Nixa, Sept. 2.—Nixa Christian church has been having a most successful meeting for the past two weeks. Still continuing. Forty-one baptized yesterday; four united by letter. Last night there were 11 more confessions; six united by letter. Bro. Yokley is doing the preaching.—FRANK WEST, pastor.

Paris, Aug. 31.—Closed a 12 days' meeting at Granville, Mo., carried on by home forces, last night. Result, 11 added by baptism.—C. H. STRAWN, pastor-evangelist.

St. Louis, Sept. 2.—Four additions by letter at West End Church yesterday.—PAUL CASTLE.

TEXAS.

Amarillo, Aug. 31.—Just closed a 17 days' meeting at Ardmore, I. T.; 43 additions, 39 baptisms. Bro. John Brower, of Chicago, led the song service. My first year here closes to-morrow. We have had 70 additions here and 95 elsewhere.—VOLNEY JOHNSON.

Tanglewood, Aug. 25.—Our people have never been represented here before. Methodists, Presbyterians and Baptists have preachers and some have houses of worship. All seemed ready to argue. Never was a meeting better attended. The arbor built by the brethren was well filled every night with from 200 to 500 people; 26 obeyed the gospel.

God's grace be with you, fearless elf!
The city streets are strange and wild,
And yet, quite by your dauntless self,
You tread the mazes, little child!
The sea's blue dream is in your eyes,
Your brown cheek shows health's ruddy rose,

And where the deepest crimson lies
A baby dimple comes and goes.

I watch you as you dive and dart
Over the roadway's crowded space,
Hanging on car, and dodging cart—
A gamin, with a cherub's face.
A gamin with a cherub's soul!
'Twas such a little time ago
You slipped the angel's sweet control
Earth's fitful, wearing life to know.

What is there in the years for you?
The place of Master, or of slave?
Good to attain, or ill to rue?
Perchance, a tiny wayside grave.
Oh, small, strong soul! Yet life seems gay
Where your feet pass, and greed and pelf
Pause, as I pause, to smile and say,
"God's grace be with you, fearless elf!"

Queen Elizabeth's Gloves and Rings.

By Fred Myron Colby.

There probably never lived a vainer woman than Queen Elizabeth of England, the "Good Queen Bess," as some writers are fond of calling her. Kings and Queens are, after all, much like other men and women. Whatever the demands might be upon her time, she was as greatly concerned about her personal appearance as if she had not another interest in the world. She craved admiration like a school-girl, and had a dislike to see any one look better than herself, or dress in a way to attract attention from her own display. One day, as Miss Strickland relates, Lady Mary Howard, one of her maids of honor, appeared in a magnificent velvet dress with a rich border decorated with gold and pearls. Lady Mary was a young and beautiful woman and her fine robes made her very gorgeous. Her appearance greatly displeased the queen, who gave her such a rebuke that the poor girl laid up her rich vestments and never ventured to wear them again during Elizabeth's life.

These little vanities of the "virgin queen" are as much matters of history as the great transactions of her reign. At any rate, it is safe to say that they were quite as important to her. Her mind was continually occupied about her jewels and dresses, her hair and her hands, and she never forgot, even on the most solemn occasions, that she was a woman. She had a hundred pretty tricks for showing off her charms, and sometimes was really ridiculous in her attempts to do so. On one occasion, while giving audience in state to the ambassadors from the Netherlands, she pulled off and put on her gloves more than a hundred times to display her hands, her splendid rings, and the gloves themselves, which were an elegant and costly pair.

Her love for finery grew with her years, and in old age she even increased the number of her decorations, and dressed in a far more elaborate style than in the meridian of her life, foolishly thinking, no doubt, that people would be diverted by these externals from noticing the decay of her personal attractions. Hentzmer, a German traveler who visited England in 1598, when Elizabeth was sixty-six years old, has left a description of the queen's appearance at that time which is alike curious and interesting: "In person she is very majestic; her face oblong, fair, but wrinkled; her eyes small, jet black and pleasant; a nose a little hooked; her lips narrow, and her teeth black (a defect the English seem subject to from their excessive use of sugar). She had in her ears two pearls, with very rich drops; she wore false hair, and that red; upon her head she had a small crown, reported to be made of some of the gold of the celebrated Lunebourg table. Her bosom was uncovered, as all the English ladies have it till they marry, and she had on a necklace of very fine jewels. Her hands were small, her fingers long, and her stature neither tall nor low; her air was stately, her manner of speech mild and obliging. That day she was dressed in white silk, bordered with pearls of the size of beans, and over it a mantle of black silk, shot with silver threads; her train was very long, the end of it borne by a marchioness. Instead of a chain, she had a collar of gold and jewels."

Elizabeth was the first English queen who wore gloves. As articles of a woman's dress they were not used previous to her reign, though gauntlets for men, and long mittens carried tucked in the belt, had been worn a long time. For many years gloves were scarce and expensive. Queen Mary Stuart brought from France six pairs of Guernsey worsted, while she had at the same time silk stockings interwoven with gold and silver thread, and thirty-six pairs of velvet shoes laced with gold, showing that the outfit of her hands did not correspond with that for the feet.

The gloves worn by Elizabeth and her ladies were very elegant and sumptuous articles. They were lined with white velvet, fastened with gold buttons, wrought with gold, and edged with fringe. These embroidered and trimmed gloves were fashionable a long time, until Queen Anne's reign, I believe. The University of Cambridge at one time presented the queen with a highly ornamented pair of gloves, costing sixty shillings—about forty dollars of our money. An ancient chronicler informs us that her majesty, "beholding the beauty of said gloves, as in great admiration, and in token of her thankful acceptance of the same, held up one of her hands, and smelling into them, put them half way upon her fingers."

Perfumed gloves became fashionable towards the middle of her reign. It is said that Edward de Vere, Earl of Oxford, was the first to introduce them into England. This nobleman returning from Italy, presented his sovereign a pair of scented gloves, ornamented with roses in colored silks, which pleased her so much that she had her picture taken with them on.

Elizabeth was a devoted patronizer of her glove maker. She put on a pair when her toilet was made in the morning, and she wore them till she disrobed at night. They were of all kinds and prices. One pair was of fine white kid, reaching to the elbows, where they were slashed and fringed with gold. They were buttoned with jewels, the backs were embroidered with gold bullion and trimmed with gold gimp, and in the palm of each were five little air holes the size and shape of melon seeds.

Some of these gloves have been preserved, and though very shapely they are quite large, in fact, large enough for a man. This is easily accounted for by the fact that, though her hands were small, her fingers were always covered with rings, several of them of large size. This royal coquette had all the fondness of an Oriental woman for jewels, and many of her rings were of great value. Two or three of them possess a historical interest. There was her coronation ring which she wore constantly from the time it was put on at her inauguration, never taking it off once for nearly forty-five years. At the end of that time it had become so embedded in the flesh, and caused so much pain, that she was obliged to have it filed apart, a circumstance that caused her a great deal of concern, as she regarded it as an evil portent. She did indeed die soon afterwards; but if a ring had anything to do with her death, which is not probable, it is far more likely to have been another of her jewels.

When Mary Stuart, the unfortunate Queen of Scots, was in prison she sent a valuable diamond ring to the jealous kinswoman who signed her death warrant. This ring Elizabeth wore to the day of her death. As she approached her own end the sight of the sad memento must have recalled bitter memories. She was not capable of remorse, but it must have made her think.

There was another ring which did undoubtedly cause the vain old woman a great deal of grief and misery, and possibly may have hastened her death. This was the famous sardonyx ring with the cameo head of the queen, which she gave to her favorite, the Earl of Essex. We all know the story of the handsome young nobleman, who, gifted with marvelous grace of mind and person, fell at last a victim to the intrigues of his enemies, his own indiscretion, and, shall we say it, the jealous petulance of his sovereign. He was her relative, a sort of second cousin, and I think she loved him in her way, capricious always; one day haughty and distant, the next, when he was ill, condescending enough to go in person to see him and give him broth with her own hands.

At last he committed the political offense that sent him a prisoner to the Tower, where he was condemned to die. The death warrant was brought for Elizabeth to sign. She did sign it. Then at the thought of that handsome face being marred by the bloody axe, she countermanded it. Finally, she signed it again, angry and impatient because the earl failed to send the ring which she had given him in youth, promising him that if ever the time should come when she would turn against him she would forgive him, even at the last moment, if she received the ring back from him. The ring did not come, and the gay noble, scarcely thirty-four years of age, the knightliest and handsomest of all her cavaliers, was led to his doom. She thought he had not sent the ring, but he had. Life was sweet to him, as it is to every man who has wife, honor, happiness, and he had dropped the precious ring from his prison window to a boy whom he bade bear it to Lady Scrope, his cousin. The lad made a mistake and carried it instead to that lady's sister, the Countess of Nottingham, whose husband was poor Essex's deadly foe. She gave it to the cruel earl, who retained it, so that while the miserable queen was pacing the floor, looking till the last moment for the token that was to earn her forgiveness, it lay in the private secretary of his wicked rival. Later she learned the story, from the lips of the dying countess, but it was too late; the bright young head had fallen, and from that moment she never knew an hour of happiness.

The death-bed confession of the Countess of Nottingham gave a rude shock to the fast ebbing sands of the sorrow-stricken queen. She was now nearly seventy. She had survived her old friends, and ministers; she was without resources in herself; she knew that she was surrounded with venal, interested men who only waited till the last gasp had left her frail, careworn, wrinkled body, to crowd round her successor. She felt this with all the bitterness of a vain, jealous, impotent woman, but she made no sign. It is a sad, dreary story. The picture of the forlorn old woman lying on her palace floor with her fingers in her mouth to stifle her groans, seeking no support from religion, no consolation from affection, friendless, hopeless, comfortless, and thus gradually wasting into death, is such a lesson on the nothingness of power and the miscalculations of selfishness that history affords not one more terrible and impressive. There was a ring associated with the death of Elizabeth, long afterwards known in court traditions as the "blue ring." It was a sapphire, and had been confided to Lady Scrope by King James of Scotland, to be forwarded as a token to announce the decease of the queen. All the time the miserable queen lay dying this venal spy of the Stuart bent over her, watching with lynx-like eyes every breath and motion and word of England's proud sovereign. When she was altogether dead Lady Scrope ran to a window and gave intelligence of the fact by silently dropping the blue ring to her brother, Sir Robert Carey, who was lurking beneath, and who galloped with all speed, taking a fresh horse at every stopping place on the route, to bear the token to James at Edinburgh.

Carey reached Holyrood the following night just after the king had retired. He arose, however, when the messenger gave him the ring, dressed himself and started for London to claim the crown, which a few days afterwards was put upon his head. Thus ends the story of Queen Elizabeth and her rings.—The Interior.

A Beautiful Shine.

One day not long ago I had my boots polished while I waited in a barber's shop. The boy who polished the boots was almost as black as his own shining shoe polish. He was about thirteen years of age, and while his garments were old and faded and patched, he was clean.

"Polish yo' boots, sah?" he asked, when I sat down and took up a paper.

I looked down at my dusty boots, and as I knew that they would be covered with dust again in ten minutes after I had left the shop, I was a little undecided as to whether I would have them polished or not. I concluded that I would do so when the bright-eyed boy said:

"I'll do a good job, sah; I'll shine 'em up jess fine."

"Now let us see if you do," I said laughingly as I sat down in his chair.

He went to work with a will. Such rubbing and brushing and polishing as he did! The first boot had, it seemed to me, reached the very highest degree of perfection and the boy was still at work on it when I said:

"There, I think that will do."

The boy stopped rubbing for a minute, twisted his head to one side, viewed the shoe critically and said:

"I kin mek' hit shine more'n that."

Then he breathed on the shoe, moistened the ball of his thumb and rubbed the toe, and fell to work with renewed vigor. When he had finally completed his task both shoes were polished to the highest degree of perfection, and the boy eyed them with all the pride and sense of triumph of an artist who had succeeded in painting a wonderful picture. He seemed quite indifferent to the ten cents I paid him for his work, and his eyes were still on my shining shoes as he slipped the money into his pocket.

I could not help noting his right and just

COLDS

The quickest relief for a cold is by Scott's emulsion of cod-liver oil.

You will find the edge taken off in a night; and, in three or four days, you'll be wondering whether that cold amounted to anything anyhow.

That's relief. If you tackle it quick, the relief is quick; if you wait, the relief won't come—you know how colds hang on.

We'll send you a little to try, if you like.

MEN OF YESTERDAY

By T. W. GRAFTON. This is a companion volume to the "Life of Alexander Campbell," by the same author. The "men of yesterday," to whom the book is devoted, are the pioneers of the "Reformation of the Nineteenth Century"—the co-laborers and successors of the Campbells. The men whom the author has chosen as subjects for his sketches are Walter Scott, Barton W. Stone, John Smith, Isaac Errett, B. W. Johnson and O. A. Burgess. The volume contains 291 pages, handsomely bound in cloth. The price is $1.00.

pride in his perfected work, and I said, encouragingly and approvingly:

"You certainly do good work, my boy."

"Yes, sah," he replied. "I loves to make 'em shine right up to de handle."

Now this poor black boy had in him a strong element of success in life combined with a high ideal. His ambition to make the shoes of his patrons "shine right up to de handle" was as worthy an ambition as that of the artist who spends his life in the endeavor to paint a great picture. The boy's highest reward was not the money I had paid him, it was the beautiful perfection of his work.

I felt interested in the boy who could take such pride in his humble occupation, and I said to him:

"I suppose that some day you will be having a bootblacking establishment of your own."

"Yes, sah," he said, "I is aimin' at dat very thing, sah; an' when I gits hit, hit'll be a place whar all de gemmen kin git de bes' shine in de city. Dat's what I is wurkin' fo', sah."

It was, after all, a high ambition because it was an eager striving for perfection in one's work. It was a higher ambition than that of the boy who longs to acquire great wealth for wealth's sake alone. I do not think that I shall ever forget that little black boy and his swelling pride in doing the very best work it was possible for him to do. He will rise to the full height of his calling and that is all that God expects any of us to do.—Exchange.

To strengthen me on the way.

Softer it seemed than the softest down
On the breast of the gentlest dove;
But its timid press and its faint caress
Were strong in the strength of love!

It seemed to say in a strange, sweet way,
"I love you and understand,"
And calmed my fears as my hot heart-tears

A Shrewd Peacemaker.

Dr. Nott, as president of Union College, exhibited an extraordinary degree of ingenuity in managing the young men of that institution. A good illustration of his tact, says the Christian Endeavor World, was given in one case where he prevented a fight between the boys of the college and the boys of the town. The story is told by W. J. Stillman as he had it from Dr. Nott himself.

The doctor had early notice of the imminent row, and fetching a circuit behind the "town," encouraged the boys on that side with assurances of his impartiality and even his satisfaction with a little punishment of the students, if they were aggressive.

"But," he said, "don't begin the fight and put yourselves in the wrong. If my boys come over, thrash them well, but let them strike the first blow."

Having put them in the strongest defensive attitude, believing that they had the doctor with them, he went around to the students and applied the same inducements to the defensive, leaving them under the persuasion that he entirely approved their fighting, and then he went home and left them to their conclusions. As time passed and neither took the offensive, they all cooled off and went home.—C. E. World.

Stories of Beecher.

Henry Ward Beecher is second only to Mr. Lincoln in the number of anecdotes which are attached to his name. His son-in-law, Rev. Samuel Scoville, writing in the Sunday School Times of Mr. Beecher's family life, tells some which can doubtless be accepted as authentic.

It was not humor, he says, but downright inability to remember names, that brought about the following incident. He wished to announce from the pulpit, one Sunday morning, that I would preach for him in the evening. He began, "My son-in-law, the Rev."—and then he looked hopelessly down at me, as I sat in the pew before him, and said, "I can't remember his name,—we call him Sam,—will preach for me this evening."

The strong support which Mr. Beecher gave to the Union in the days of the Civil War, is well known. When Fort Sumter was fired upon, and the President called for seventy-five thousand volunteers, Mr. Beecher was in Ohio lecturing. His oldest son, not yet twenty years old, was crazy to enlist. The boy's mother very properly insisted that he should take no such step until the father's return.

The son watched for him, and shouted before he was in the door, "Father, may I enlist?" "I'll disinherit you if you don't," answered the father, and the matter was settled.

A bookseller in Cleveland advertised for a porter. A big muscular Irishman walked into the shop and glanced around. Finally his eye rested on a big sign over a table filled with books: "Dickens's works all this week for $4." The Irishman read it thoughtfully, and then edged toward the front door. The floor-walker asked pleasantly if there was something he wanted; and the applicant remarked, with a backward glance toward the sign: "Oi come in t' git th' job, but Oi'll not care f'r it. Dickens kin worruk all the week f'r $4 if he wants to. Oi'll not. Ye'd better kape him." And the visitor strode vigorously out.

Clarence, aged five, had been severely chastised by his parents for disobedience, and the next day without saying a word to any one he called at the office of the family legal adviser, who happened to be a particular friend of the little fellow's. "Well, Clarence," said the man of the law, after shaking hands, "what can I do for you?" "Please, Mr. Brown," replied Clarence gravely, "I want to get a divorce from our family."

A prominent scientist was telling the story of Pandora's box to his little son. He was telling it with all possible dramatic effect. "And she slowly lifted that lid and peered within, and what do you think came out?" "Germs!" cried his little son promptly.

A bright American youngster's description of the dachshund: "One of those dogs that is a dog and a half long and only half a dog high."

"Mamma, am I descended from a monkey?"

"I don't know," she answered; "I never met any of your father's people."

PETE.

XXIII.—Pete Talks.

One afternoon some one knocked on Mrs. Morris's front door. Madge was at Linda May's and Jennie was asleep, because she had been sitting up with Pete. So Mrs. Morris went to the door. It was a man, standing on the porch, and his clothes were ragged and soiled. "Is this Mrs. Morris?" he said. "I guess it is, from the fambly likeness to Miss Prudence. Mr. Edgar Brown sent me here, so you needn't be skeered of me, if I am a tramp. I'm Nap, as written you a letter long ago, claimin' to be half-brother to your husband, and a-demanding a hundred dollar. Now that's what I am. Now we'll come to why I'm here. Mr. Brown he says that Miss Prudence can't be got to try to so much as whisper, beings as she haas had such a turrible throat with her diphtheria; says (Mr. Brown does) that doctor says she could talk 'swells not, if she would only think it; says (Mr. Brown does) that you air gittin' powerful oneasy lest she have lost her voice, clur. Now I have been telling Mr. Brown how Miss Prudence and I got along famous in our barnloft conversations, and he thinks I could git her to talkin', and after that, all would be easy. I think I kin, myself. Mr. Brown, he would of come with me, if his ankle wasn't still in a chronic condition." "I hardly think," said Mrs. Morris, "if she won't speak for her own mother, that she will speak for the man who brought so much sorrow and anxiety upon us." "Oh, that's all right," said Nap; "I got found out so I didn't git your hundred dollar, but I don't bear no malice a-prepense, as the lawyers says. You take me to Miss Prudence and I'll git her to talkin'. But 'course I knows you've got a grudge agin me, and that lends a dignity to any man,—or woman for that matter. And if you'd rather enjoy your dignity and have Miss Prudence a-staying mute and dumb, choose ye, as the Scriptures says. I just come to offer my services, but not to force um on nobody. Whatever is left of Nap from his doings to his rags, is inderpent. They ain't no farmer can lay it over me in feelin' free and easy. But I tell you plain that I loves Miss Prudence, and I'd delight to do her a good turn. She's took a notion talkin' will about ruin her throat, and I can cure her of that notion." Well, it ended in Nap's being taken up to the bedroom. As soon as Pete saw him, she smiled and knocked on the head of her bed three times.

"Just so," said Nap, taking a chair beside her. "You air askin' to be told the rest of that story about 'Thump, thump, thump.' I done forgit whur I left off, so I'll run over the perliminaries without pausin' to try to make you thrill. Little Elvira lived with her payrents in a haunted house whur ever' night they heerd 'Thump, thump, thump,' a-booming down the hall-stairs, but never no cause visible. So one night Elvira decides to hide in the hall, and wait there in the darkness, and see. Does hide and wait. About twelve o'clock, she hears a rustle near her (she was behind the hat-rack) and then suddenly they was a light and there stood a tall white Nameless without a head on her neck; and that Nameless was holding her head in her hand; a big round head with long hair streaming; and the teeth was what made the light in the hall; they just bared and grinned and shone for dear life. The Nameless held up her snowy white robe so she could walk handy, and steps to the foot of the stairs and heaves her head to the top. It rolls down, 'Thump, thump, thump,' the big ivry teeth clashin' together and makin' sparks. For a long time the Nameless stood there, taking a melancholy pleasure in her game of bowls, and Elvira's pa never come to see, cause when he had, previous, the Nameless would clap her head under her robe, and then the teeth couldn't make no light, so it was dark. See?" said Nap suddenly.

"Yes; go on," said Pete.

"At last the Nameless give her head a wild toss, and when it thumped down, it bounced to that degree that it went wild of her arms, and rolled along straight for poor little Elvira, and took her fair and square in the stomach. Poor Elvira screamed and pushed it away."

"Ugh!" said Pete. "No wonder! Gone Nap!"

"Well, then the Nameless knowed they was a spectator under the hatrack. She dived and caught up her head by the hair with one hand, and Elvira by the arm with her other hand. Then she clapped her head on her neck, to carry it more convenient, like I carries mine, and picked up Elvira in her arms,—she having fainted,—and the Nameless taken her down into the cellar, her teeth throwing a white light afore them. When Elvira come to herself, she lay bound hand in foot by the side of a dark and swollen river; a coffin lay beside her, a black one. And on the other side was the Nameless, rolling out dough as if to make biscuits. 'Mortal Girl,' says the Nameless, 'I'm going to give you your choice. Do you want to be nailed down in that coffin and sunk to the bottom of the river, alive?' Elvira says, 'No, please mom, please,' she says, very pitiful. 'Good. Then listen, Mortal Girl. Ever' night it is my destiny to roll my head up and down the stairs of that haunted house. I hates it,' she says. 'Often they's other things I'd prefer to be doin',' she says. 'At no time is it satisfactory. But my destiny says I must so do, until I can find a mortal girl that will eat my head. I got no use for it, nohow,' says the Nameless, pulling it off her neck as she spoke, and layin' it on the biscuit-board. 'So I'll make it in a pie with good rich paste made of fresh butter-milk, and I'll bake it brown and tastable. You shall have a pearl-handled fork,' she says, 'knives not bein' used with cobblers.' But poor Elvira says, 'Please, mom, if you'll excuse me, I really couldn't—' The Nameless in a perfect fury at this disrespect to her head, clapped Elvira in the coffin, nailed her down, tied a tun-weight to it, and hefted it into the river. Well, Miss Prudence, I can't stay long with you this time—"

"But what became of poor little Elvira?" demanded Pete. "I'm afraid I'll tire you, Miss Prudence." "Oh, Nap! You couldn't leave me in this situation. Was she drowned?" "Not her, Miss Prudence." "Gone, Nap, and finish it. A person wouldn't think, Nap, to look on your out-sides, that you'd know how to please little girls, would they! Hurry up!" "Well, the tun-weight slipped off the coffin, cause the water made the rope slip'ry, and the coffin floated down current, and away and away, sames ittid been a boat. Next day Elvira's pawn ma were taking a steamboat ride. 'What's that there a-floatin'?' says Mr. Elvira. 'Heave to,' says he; 'star-board, five knots,' says he, being nautycal (that don't mean wicked, Miss Prudence). So they got the coffin on deck, opened it, and when they'd took out the excelsior, there was little Elvira safe and sound and hungry for breakfast. The End. Now I must be goin'. Much obliged to you for talkin' so much. You see it don't hurt your throat after all!" Pete gasped in astonishment, then said, "Why! I have been talking! Why, I declare! Listen at me, mamma! And it don't hurt a bit. Hurrah! After this I'll just talk and talk and never stop!"

Quaint, Queer and Quirious Salt Lake City.

The late Col. John Cockerell in the Cosmopolitan said: "There are three unique cities in America, and one of these is SALT LAKE CITY." It is not only unique in its Temple, Tabernacle and Mormon Church institutions, but quaint in appearance, with its wide streets, immense blocks and martial rows of shade trees. It has, perhaps, more attractions to the square yard than any city in the country, and its climate, while temperate all the year round, is particularly delightful in summer. The Great Salt Lake, with its magnificent Saltair resort, where the water is "deader and denser" than that in the Dead Sea in Palestine, is an attraction in itself that people come miles to see. There are many cool mountain and lake resorts near by, also numerous very pretty canyon trips and parks, drives, Hot and Warm Sulphur Springs. Fishing and hunting in every direction. The trip from Denver to Salt Lake City and Ogden via the RIO GRANDE WESTERN RAILWAY in connection with either the Colorado Midland or Denver & Rio Grande railroads is one of unsurpassed pleasure. Here nature is found in her sternest mood and the whole line is a succession of rugged canyon, waterfalls and picturesque valleys. No European trip can compare with it in grandeur of scenery. During the entire summer there will be low excursion rates to Salt Lake City and contiguous country. It is on the road to the Pacific Coast, if that be your destination. Our Great Deliverer.*

TEXT: He shall deliver thee in six troubles; Yea, in seven there shall no evil touch thee.—Job 5:19.

The world is familiar with the face of sorrow. Trouble, destitution, loss, anguish, are well known to the children of men. The ancient philosophers, who had learned these things, who saw that the world is melting in the crucible, but did not see that this means purity and blessedness, became hopeless. The Christian rejoices in grief and trial and loss, for he knows that out of them all the Lord will deliver him. Was there ever a darker night than that of the burial of Jesus Christ? But was there ever a dawn so lovely, so radiant with tremulous joy, as the morning of the resurrection?

Comprehensive.

It is a great deliverance that is ours, at the hands of a great Deliverer. Seven is the perfect number. "He shall deliver thee in six troubles; yea, in seven there shall no evil touch thee." There is a common disposition to count one's self as exceptional in some particular. The gospel may heal others, but "I am peculiar." That may be true; but we have a deliverance that is just fitted to our peculiarities. The sources of trouble are innumerable; and yet from them all there is blessed deliverance. Do not make a pet of any trouble; of ill health, or hard work, or poverty, or bad temper. God can deliver you from all that you will consent to abandon.

Neither famine, nor war, nor the scourge of the tongue can hurt him whom God defends. We are in far more peril, and are more often hurt by what our own tongues utter, than by what other tongues say about us. "At destruction and death thou shalt laugh." The wild beasts will not harm you, and the stones of the field will make with you a league of defense. Surely, "He is able to save unto the uttermost them that come unto God by Him." Every necessary provision is made for your peace and safety.

Definite.

"He led them also by a straight way,
That they might go to a city of habitation."
—Ps. 107:7.

This is a definite deliverance for definite woes. The Hebrews were wanderers on the face of the earth. They were strangers and bond-slaves in Egypt; they were Bedouins in Arabia; but God delivered them from slavery, and led them out of their pilgrimage into a land, with metes and bounds; into cities with walls and gates. There was nothing inadequate, imperfect, or incomplete about this deliverance; and as long as they obeyed God, they were happy and safe.

Do you think, oh child of God, that only your sorrow is definite? that only your trouble is concrete? As definite will also be your deliverance. For sickness you shall have health; for doubt, faith; for imprisonment, freedom; for sorrow, joy; for trouble, peace. Has it not been so in your past experience. The lessons we have learned of the grace of God should enable us to trust Him. The earth never yet grew dark under the shadow of night but that it brightened shortly under the light of a new day. And your newest griefs and disasters are old to Him who will deliver you, and "cause his face to shine upon you"

Final and Complete.

A great deliverance presupposes a great Deliverer. There is also a presupposition of absolute and final deliverance. It means nothing, to be delivered from many troubles, if one great trouble engulfs us after all. And so the Christian looks forward with confidence to the endless future. He may not know what it contains of surprise or wonder, but he knows that whatever unfolds deliverance will come. And so the divine Deliverer has been prepared for His task. He delivers us from sin—its guilt and power; from sorrow; from weariness; from doubt; from pain. And finally, from the fear of death, and from death itself. There may be those who shrink from the very thought of death; but there are others who look forward with eagerness to its coming, as to release from captivity. And this freedom from the fear of death is possible to all those who surrender themselves fully to the Deliverer.

We are weak, but He is strong. Let your weakness lean hard. The finite yearns for the infinite. The Spirit of God brooded over early chaos, until the world was erected in beauty and harmony. Likewise He broods over the race, floating in seas of trouble, yearning to lift them into peace. "Grandeur than mountains, sublimer than storms, sweeter than blossoms and tender fruits," is God, our Deliverer.

Prayer.

Forbid, O God, that any of Thy creatures should be lost, for want of faith. Help us to behold our Salvation. Reveal Christ to us. Wherever hearts ache and tears flow, wherever troubles smite and fears annoy, send there this great deliverance. And fill the tired world, O Lord, with the peace of Thy presence, the fulness of Thy joy, through the gospel of the Son of God. Amen.

Jacob a Prince With God.*

From the vision at Bethel Jacob turned his face toward the land of his fathers with more of hope than he had felt since he left his home in Beersheba. The story of his meeting with Rachel, and their mutual love, is one of exceeding beauty. But Jacob has met one of like cunning with himself in his Uncle Laban, and the twenty or more years of his sojourn in Mesopotamia are marked by many hardships imposed upon him by the artful father of Rachel. Deceived into the marrying of Leah, Jacob thus becomes a polygamist, with the usual result of mutual jealousies and recriminations in the divided household. Trying at first to deal honorably with Laban, he soon finds that his integrity is not appreciated, and so returns to somewhat of his former habit of over-reaching, though not resorting to absolute falsehood or theft. But he is so much more honest than Laban that the Lord blesses him, and multiplies his flocks and herds exceedingly. This awakes the jealousy of Laban and his sons, and Jacob, seeing that they are coming to hate him, determines to return to the home of his father Isaac in Canaan.

Believing that Laban would oppose his going by force, Jacob stole away as quietly as possible, and had been gone three days before Laban learned of his departure. It required seven days for the latter to overtake him, and he was warned on the way not to do any violence to his son-in-law. After mutual rebukes and explanations, a covenant is entered into between them, to be friends in future, and a heap of stones is made a witness between them, in the fashion of that time, and Laban utters the beautiful benediction which is so familiar to all Christian Endeavorers, "The Lord watch between me and thee, while we are absent one from another." They then take their separate journeys, never to meet again. But Jacob is comforted by meeting a company of God's angels, who repeat to him the assurance of the divine protection.

The heart of Jacob was full of fear, despite the assurance of God that he would be with him. "Conscience doth make cowards of us all," and he could not forget how he had deceived his brother Esau, and the anger which Esau had felt toward him. He therefore sends messengers down into the territories of Esau, to notify his brother of his coming and to ask for a kindly reception. The messengers return to tell him that Esau is coming to meet him with four hundred men. Jacob is alarmed and betakes himself to earnest prayer, confessing his unworthiness and acknowledging the grace of God to him. "I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies, and of all the truth which thou hast shewed to thy servant; for with my staff I passed over this Jordan, and now I am become two companies." Pleading for God's protection, he takes the most prudent measures for placating his brother. Dividing his possessions into several portions, he sends them one after the other, in care of his servants, having first sent a generous gift, in advance, to Esau. When all had passed over the brook Jabbok, while it was yet night, and Jacob was left alone upon the bank, a marvelous experience came to him, which is told in our lesson.

To be left alone with God is a dreadful thing for him who is not yet in harmony with the divine purpose. Jacob had learned many things during his sojourn in Haran, but he was not ready to sink his will in that of God. As he is about to meet his wronged brother Esau, will he resort again to deception and fraud, or will he commit his way to the Lord, and act the manly and trustful part? Jehovah will give him opportunity to decide, and hence this strange scene beside the brook. It matters not whether the wrestling here described were physical or spiritual, though we are of the opinion that the angel of God appeared in physical form, so that Jacob at first thought him to be a man. It is plain that the supreme struggle through which Jacob passed, at least after he recognized the superhuman character of his antagonist, was a spiritual one. When the angel touched his thigh, and disabled him from further wrestling, he did not cease his struggle, but rather became more earnest than before. He now understood that God was dealing with him for some high end, and he determined to secure whatever of blessing there might be for him in the divine will. When, therefore, the angel said, "Let me go, for the day breaketh," Jacob nobly responded, "I will not let thee go, except thou bless me." No longer seeking to overcome by his strength, he clung to the heavenly messenger and sought by his very helplessness to win favor and strength. And what the arrogant effort of boasted strength could not do, conscious weakness achieved, through faith and prayer. "He had power over the angel, and prevailed; he wept and made supplication unto him," says the prophet Hosea.

It is ever thus. "God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble." He who seeks to measure strength with God shall surely be defeated, but he who clingeth with absolute dependence to the hand of infinite love shall find his strength made perfect in weakness. "What is thy name?" asked the angel. With what self-humiliation must Jacob have answered, remembering that his name signified "supplanter," and that he had been worthy of that base appellation. Thus does He "set our secret sins in the light of his countenance." But he graciously gives Jacob a new name, "Israel," meaning "A prince with God." He has prevailed with God, not by cunning or strength, but by faith and submission, and he shall have power with men by the same means. Henceforth Jacob deals with men in righteousness. His after life is moulded by this wonderful struggle, and through all the sufferings and trials which his long life is to endure, he will ever show himself a princely man, trusting God and doing good to men.

"What is thy name?" asks Jacob of the angel. But he is not told. Perhaps the messenger of God fears that if his name is revealed, Jacob may honor him with the worship which is due to God alone. He is left to the knowledge only that one of God's chosen angels, who ever wait to minister to the children of his grace, had visited him with a benediction which should accompany him throughout life, and prove to him a solace when days of sore trial overtook him, and the sky seemed without one ray of heaven's light to illumine his pathway. Then should he know that God was his refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble.

the annual publication of the Northern Pacific Railway will be found a distinct advance, in some respects, upon even its immediate predecessor Wonderland 1900.

Its cover designs and eight chapter headings are by Alfred Lenz, of New York, from plastic models and are splendid examples of art.

There is within the covers of the book much historical matter, some of it new, as well as purely descriptive narrative.

The three principal chapters relate to the history of the unique Northern Pacific Trademark, the Custer Battlefield in Montana, and Yellowstone Park. Each is profusely illustrated, the Trademark chapter in colors. This trademark is of Chinese origin and is 5,000 years old. Its story is a strange one.

It is safe to say that Wonderland 1901 will be in greater demand than any preceding volume of the Wonderland family, and, as heretofore it will be sent by Chas. S. Fee, St. Paul, Minn., to any address upon receipt of the postage, six cents.

TOPIC FOR SEPTEMBER 15.

True Honor.

(John 5:41-44.)

The last infirmity of noble minds is said to be the love of honor, fame, the regard of men. There are some to whom love of money is as nothing; some who do not care for ease, luxury, pleasure; some who are willing to undergo all sorts of hardships and fatigue and effort for no one of these rewards but for honor, fame, place.

Jesus was tempted in this way on the mountain and on the pinnacle of the temple. "Rule over all kingdoms," said Satan on the mountain-top. "Be the chief priestly functionary, grasp the highest ecclesiastical power," said he on the tower of the temple. But even this last infirmity of noble minds Jesus brushed aside. It had no weight with him. He worked not for the honor that fades.

Those who have obtained the honor of this world have testified, many of them, to the emptiness of it all. It signifies so little. Napoleon got all there was of kingly power and died the most miserable and outcast of men. Louis the fourteenth, the magnificent, was rejected before he reached his death-bed, and many were glad when he was dead. "The king is dead. Long live the king," is the unfeeling cry of the multitude. Woolsey attained the height of ecclesiastical power, and said in bitterness at last:

"Had I but served my God with half the zeal I served my king,
He would not, in my age, have left me naked to mine enemies!"

So many a man has tasted the sweets of earthly honor and has pronounced it, with the sage of Israel, a "vanity of vanities." After all there is no end worth serving except the good of humanity and the friendship of God and of oneself.

The good of humanity, and not always the good will, is to be sought. Any quack may win the good will of thousands. Jesus was right when he implied that the blustering demagogue who comes flattering men, and pulling wool over their eyes, may win plaudits. The smooth, the oily, the complacent may often gain eminence. But the one who honestly seeks to serve men may be kicked and cursed and cuffed. On the other hand he will make a few fearless friends, as Jesus did, who are willing to meet death for him, and he will in the end win the lasting honor of mankind.

The friendship of God is to be sought rather than the friendship of men. Abraham was called the friend of God, and that was better than to be the friend of Chaldeans, Philistines or what-not. To be at peace with God, to feel that he honors our effort to do and to be good, to be able to lay all our actions before him for his approval, and to do nothing for the sake of winning popular honor that would offend him, that is the truest, though often the obscurest, path to glory.

Next to the friendship of God there is no other honor greater than the friendship of one self. To do always the things that please God is greatest; to do always the things that please our own consciences is next greatest. There is no joy like the joy of a head that rests upon the smooth pillow of conscious, well-meant effort. There is no peace like the peace of a heart not at war with itself. There are few of us who do not look back upon courses we regret. Blessed are those who are friends with themselves, happy friends, honest friends, faithful friends.

There is undoubtedly a happiness in the feeling that our neighbors honor us, and it is a happiness that we have the perfect right to seek, so long as we do not, in seeking it, break with the highest ideas of right and truth. And, indeed, the world about us, though very short-sighted and likely to misunderstand and to throw mud upon us when we are doing our best will, in the long run, honor devotion to right—that is, devotion to mankind, to God and to our truest selves.

"Such a Noise!"

The mother says to herself sometimes. "I can hardly endure it." Then a chill creeps over her as she thinks of the awful silence which falls upon the home when children are taken away, and she is glad her children are hardy of body and lusty of lungs.

When a child does not enjoy noisy sports and games there is something wrong, and that something will often be found to be a lack of nutrition adequate to the needs of youth and growth. The stomach is "weak," digestion is imperfect, and so the nourishment of the body is inadequate.

In such cases Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery works wonders. It changes puny, fretful children into healthy, happy girls and boys. The process by which this change is accomplished is strictly along the lines marked by Nature. All growth and strength come from food when it has been digested, converted into nutrition and assimilated. "Golden Medical Discovery" cures diseases of the stomach and other organs of digestion and nutrition, and so enables the body to obtain without loss or waste the benefit of the nutrition provided in food. The "Discovery" contains no alcohol and is entirely free from opium, cocaine and all other narcotics.

A Wonderful Thing.

"I have been thinking of writing to you for some time," writes Mrs. W. D. Benson, of Maxton, Robeson Co., N. C., "to let you know what a wonderful thing Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery did for my little boy. He was taken with indigestion when he was a year and a half old and he was under the doctor's treatment for five long years. We spent all we made for doctor's bills, and it did no good. He could eat only a little milk and cracker, and some times even this would make him sick. He could not sit up all day, and I gave up all hope of his ever getting any better. Three years ago I found one of your books, and on looking it over one day I noticed Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery recommended for indigestion. We bought some and gave it to our boy. He had been treated at Hoods by a good doctor and at Bennettsville, S. C., and at Currie and Lumberton and Maxton, and was only relieved for a short time. We gave him two bottles of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery and it cured him. He is well as can be and can eat anything that he wants and it does not hurt him. He has not been sick a day since and it has been three years since he took your medicine."

A Thankful Mother.

"I have felt it my duty for a long time," writes Mrs. Mollie Jones, of Gap, Comanche Co., Texas, "to tell you of the wonderful cure effected by your 'Golden Medical Discovery' and 'Pleasant Pellets' in the case of our little boy, now nearly seven years old. When he was two months old he was taken with La Grippe, and it settled on his lungs and in his throat. His tonsils enlarged, and when he was two years old we had the doctor operate on them. Then we had the doctor take his tonsils out and he made bad work of it. If he went in the wind he would be sick, and we tried everything we could hear of and consulted every physician we saw, but they did not know what to do. When he was nearly six years old (in October, 1898) he was worse than ever, and I could not rest for being so uneasy about him. He was our fourth boy (the other three were dead), and it seemed to me that if he died I just could not bear it. I would go to sleep crying and begging God to spare him. Well, I could see he was getting so much worse; he was just as poor as he could be, and his kidneys had been troublesome all his life. I had read a book about Dr. Pierce's medicine. It seemed to me that this was the very medicine we wanted, and I told my husband that if he would buy some of Dr. Pierce's medicine I felt almost sure it would help our boy. He sent and got some and we commenced with the 'Golden Medical Discovery' on Friday night, and with the 'Pellets' the next morning. We gave him your medicine three times a day and by Sunday he was able to play, and in one month from the time he commenced taking it he had gained six pounds and his cough was all gone. He has not coughed any since, and he don't take cold any more than the rest of us. He goes about like the rest of the children and plays in the cold and hot weather."

BEER.

Susan Shallenberger was born near Connellsville, Pa., in 1814, was married at her father's, Jacob Shallenberger's home, near London Mills, Ill., in 1848, and lived on a farm near Fairview, Ill., 53 years. Her husband survives at the age of 94 years. Susan Shallenberger was baptized by Dr. James Estep at Mount Pleasant, Pa., in 1829, and received into the Baptist church. About that time the Campbells began evangelizing in that county, and were welcome visitors in her grandfather's family where she was raised. Her uncles, Benjamin and David Shallenberger had joined the reformation and associated themselves, with others from the denominations around them, herself among the number, forming themselves into a congregation called Christians, which met about four miles north of Mount Pleasant, later on meeting in Connellsville. Upon removing to Illinois, she resided with her brother-in-law, Thomas Wadsworth, and sister, now Mrs. Eliza Smith, of Kansas City, Mo. These three, with five other disciples in Peoria about 1840, organized the Christian church in Peoria, Mrs. Smith being the only surviving charter member. Susan Beer was a subscriber of the "Record," "Record and Evangelist," now CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, from its origin, with the exception of three years when she subscribed for the "American Christian Review," afterwards renewing her subscription to the "Record-Evangelist." Shortly before her total paralysis she called for the "Evangelist" but she could not see to read. She said, "I can no longer see to read, I will soon be at rest." Her life was a continual benediction. She was a woman of rare attainment in all that gives to Christian life a power for good among all who came into acquaintance with her life. The pastor of the Galesburg Christian church, C. H. White, conducted the funeral service Sunday, the 6th of July, at the Lutheran church near her home. E. W. S.

LYCAN.

Dr Leander Lycan was born in Edgar County, Ill., Oct. 15, 1838, died Aug. 9, 1901. In early life he studied medicine and at the outbreak of the war he entered the service as surgeon. After the war he followed farming in Iowa and Colorado as long as his health permitted. He was for many years an invalid from stomach trouble. He was an earnest, faithful Christian and always contributed liberally to the church. The funeral was conducted from his home near Paris, Ill., and was largely attended. The vacancy in his home can never be filled. D. L. N.

McCULLEY.

Sister Lizzie E. McCulley was born in Lewis county, Mo., May 13, 1871, departed from life Aug. 8, 1901. She was the daughter of Bro. John Shanks, one of our able preachers, and belonged to one of the best families in the county. She became a Christian at the age of 12 and lived a noble life in the service of her Master. She was educated in Christian University and there met Bro. W. D. McCulley. They were married December, 1891, and to them were born three children, the oldest of whom died November, 1896. Two little girls, one four years, the other sixteen months old, with their father remain to mourn the loss of their mother and wife. Her remains were brought from Wellsville, Mo., to her old home in Lewis county. The writer conducted the funeral at her old home church, Sugar Creek. Sister McCulley also leaves a father and mother and several brothers and sisters and also a host of friends to mourn her untimely death. J. D. GREER.

SUTHERLAND.

Sister Francis Crosmond was born at Portland, N. Y., Jan. 22, 1827, emigrated to Ohio in 1845 and married Alex. B. Sutherland May 28, 1846. In 1851 she and her husband came to Clark county, Mo., where they made their home and prospered till the death of Mr. Sutherland fourteen years ago. Since that time she has made her home with her daughter, Mrs. Ferguson at Kahoka, Mo. She died Aug. 1, 1901. She was the mother of five children, three of whom survive her: Dr. W. B. Sutherland, of Loveland, Col., Mrs. Lucy Harrison, of Trenton, Mo., and Mrs. Dill Ferguson, of Kahoka, Mo. Sister Sutherland became a Christian under the preaching of Bro. H. A. Northcutt about twelve years ago and has lived a consistent Christian life since that time. Her funeral was conducted by the writer at her late home, attended by a host of devoted friends who mourned their loss. We extend our sympathy to the sorrowing friends. J. D. GREER

Missouri Endeavorers.

We wish to call attention of Missouri Endeavorers to two very important conventions, in both of which we are sure they are deeply interested. They are our Missouri Christian Convention at Mexico, Sept. 16, and our national convention at Minneapolis in October. We should strive to make it convenient to attend each of these conventions. Our Missouri convention promises to be one of our best and Endeavorers need to be there to enjoy the good things in store and to assist by their presence this great work in our own state. We are both needed and wanted. The last day of the convention two hours have been set apart for a Christian Endeavor service. Good speakers will discuss lively Endeavorer topics. Be sure you are there all through the meeting.

As to our national conventions, the committee at Minneapolis is working heroically to secure a large attendance. Our brethren of that city will be sadly disappointed if we do not go up in large numbers. They are depending on Endeavorers to come. The good program, low railroad rates, and splendid natural attractions of Minneapolis, all should conspire to draw a large attendance. Think of Lake Minnetonka, Lake Harriet, Minnehaha Falls, Stillwater, St. Paul, White Bear Lake, all within easy reach of the city. The fellowship of the trip will be delightful. It is probable that two special trains will go out of Missouri, one from St. Louis and one from Kansas City. We would be glad if all Endeavorers who intend to go via Kansas City would send us their names. Definite announcement of train schedule, etc., will be made later. Get ready to go to Mexico. Then go home and prepare for Minneapolis and the first twentieth century convention.

The Christian-Evangelist Special.

Minneapolis is expecting a large convention and is working intelligently, systematically and zealously toward that end. They are asking the brotherhood to come to their city and impress the great northwest with the importance of the current reformation.

They are exerting themselves to the utmost and are deserving of all the assistance we can render them. Minneapolis is at a great distance from many of our readers, and knowing that more of them are likely to go if they have assurance of a good road, comfortable accommodations and congenial companionship, the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has arranged for its third special excursion to a national convention. We have selected the best route, arranged for the best accommodations and will make the best time between St. Louis and Minneapolis. Our train will leave this city on Wednesday, Oct. 9, at 2:05 P. M., and reach the convention city the next morning at 8:05; only eighteen hours on the way. Every one who can come by way of St. Louis and those who can join us at points en route are invited to join us. We will have an enjoyable time in going to as well as after arriving at the convention. If it is probable that you will go with us please let us know. We desire to have ample accommodation for all and will have if we are properly informed.

Our special runs over the Burlington Route; get out your maps and see what a fine trip it will be. Write to us for details. We will have something to say each week on the subject in these columns.

College Churches.

The pastors of college churches herein unite in an important call to the preachers and elders of the churches from which the young people will go to college this autumn. It means very much to the college pastor to have the young people bring their church letters with them and place them in the local congregation at the first service after entering school. It anchors the young to a course of spiritual training while they are growing physically and intellectually. If students do not place their membership with the church they feel no personal obligation to take part in any of its activities, or win souls for Christ. The minister is embarrassed, also, in assigning them work which will upbuild them spiritually and make them efficient laborers in the Lord's vineyard, before they unite with his congregation. A few will form associations which lead from Christ unless identified with the church at the beginning of the term. In order, therefore, that an all-round man or woman, developed physically, intellectually and spiritually, shall be returned, when these young people quit the college, this urgent call is made. The Lord wants the life to count for the most. The college churches do not wish to rob the smaller churches of their membership, but no church is helped by retaining letters—it is the absence of members that weakens it, or their presence that strengthens. The placing, therefore, of a letter by the student, while in school, in the college church, commits him to a moral and spiritual life, and so helps the cause of Christ. These same students are urged, on leaving college, to as promptly carry their letter to the churches in the communities where they are to reside.

“Thou, too, sail on, O Ship of State!
Sail on, O UNION, strong and great!
Humanity with all its fears,
With all the hopes of future years
Is hanging breathless on thy fate!
We know what Master laid thy keel,
What Workman wrought thy ribs of steel,
Who made each mast, and sail, and rope.
What anvils rang and hammers beat,
In what a forge and what a heat
Were shaped the anchors of thy hope!
Fear not each sudden sound and shock—
'Tis of the wave and not the rock;
'Tis but the flapping of the sail,
And not a rent made by the gale!
In spite of rock and tempest's roar
In spite of false lights on the shore,
Sail on, nor fear to breast the sea!

Our hearts, our hopes, are all with thee;
Our hearts, our hopes, our prayers, our tears,
Our faith triumphant o'er our fears,
Are all with thee—are all with thee!

Current Events.

Attempted Assassination of President McKinley.

Since Friday of last week there has been but one topic of general interest—the attempt upon the life of President McKinley. The story of the treacherous assault as he was holding a public reception in the Temple of Music at the Buffalo Exposition, was known all over the country within an hour after the deed was done. Yet it seemed so improbable, so incredible that such a thing should happen at this time, that men withheld full credence until confirmatory details made it impossible to doubt the truth of the report. Of the two shots fired, only one inflicted a serious wound. Perforating both walls of the stomach, it lost itself in the region near the spine and has so far eluded the probes of the surgeons. Such a wound is of the most dangerous character, but so far the President's condition has been more favorable than could have been expected. The latest bulletins announce an absence of complications which indicates the probability of recovery. The prayer of all loyal hearts is that it may be so.

As might have been expected, the assassin turns out to be an anarchist who has been wrought upon by the writings of Emma Goldman and others of her class. According to his own confession these anarchistic writings have led him to the conscientious conviction that the government ought to be destroyed, and, judging that the murder of the President would accomplish this end, he conceived it to be his duty to fire the shot and take the consequences. The comments of the press upon the event are significant for their unanimity upon two points: first, in paying the highest tributes to the character and statesmanship of Mr. McKinley; and second, in calling for such strict dealing with avowed anarchists hereafter that such tragedies may henceforth be averted. It is seldom that representative papers of all sections and all political parties unite so cordially in expressing admiration for one man and in urging one measure and it has seemed profitable, by way of exhibiting this unanimity, to quote a few of the many notable editorial utterances of some representative papers.

Inasmuch as President McKinley has been unique among Republican presidents for the hold which he has obtained upon the affections and the confidence of the South, as shown on his tour a few months ago,—it is appropriate to quote first the words of the Memphis (Tenn.) Commercial Appeal, a paper which has the largest circulation in the South and is opposed to most of the policies of the administration:

President McKinley has won the personal regard of the entire American people. Savage vituperation has spared him. His political ideals have been challenged and his policies have been criticised, but the man has emerged from it all with no spot or taint upon his personality. We of the South, in a large measure, have differed with him on the questions of the day, but he had personal as well as political friends in this section, and four Southern states cast their electoral vote for him in 1896, thus breaking the Solid South. That the man who was elected President by the largest plurality in the history of the government, should fall before the cowardly assassin's bullet, is a cause for shame upon us as a nation. Mr. McKinley has in the presidential chair risen to the height of positive and constructive statesmanship. At a time of stress and storm his brain has been cool and his head clear. He has been prudent, conservative and patriotic. He has evinced a broad and statesmanlike regard for the general welfare. He has met every test bravely and wisely. That he has made mistakes is certain; for all men are fallible. But even those who are farthest apart from him politically could not deny his sincerity and his solicitude for the welfare of the whole country. He has grown steadily in the presidential office, and he will go down in history with our greatest executives. . . . If he should live, he will be endeared to the American people as few presidents have been; and if he should die, he will be enshrined in the affectionate memory of his sorrowing countrymen.

The Nashville (Tenn.) American, another influential Southern paper, echoes this tribute and especially the statement, which is entirely true, that Mr. McKinley has exhibited even greater powers than his friends knew him to possess and has grown with the requirements of his office:

President McKinley was selected as the object of this mad, unreasoning attack because he is the recognized head of the government, and not because of any objection to him as a man. A more gracious and winsome personality never occupied the high office of chief executive of this great nation. An upright man of the highest moral character, a modest Christian gentleman and a true American patriot, he commands the esteem of all the people, regardless of section or party. There is less of partisan feeling and sectional spirit in him than in any occupant of the White House since the war. No man has ever made a more earnest, honest effort to be President of the whole people. No President has ever had a sweeter, more even temper, or a greater power to win and to hold friends. He has shown himself a much abler man than even the leaders of his party gave him credit for being. Since his advent to the presidency he has constantly grown and broadened.

The following are the utterances of two independent papers of high reputation, the first of which, by becoming one of the chief organs of the Massachusetts anti-expansionists, has often come into violent conflict with the administration.

The Springfield Republican says:

Something more than an individual has been attacked. The person of William McKinley, beloved as a man, was clothed with the surpassing dignity of the presidency of the United States. . . . Above our parties in politics and the associations that we form in business or in social life, there is a meeting place where we all gather, the table land that not only masses us in a common sadness and sympathy at such a time as this, but where we unite in the one dominant, irresistible purpose to preserve our national heritage against all assault. It is within the power of anarchism to wound the members of this body, but its life is that of immortal democracy. In this sober conception, how impotent, foolish and wicked is this blow at the head of the nation!

The Washington Post says:

None of our Chief Magistrates has ever possessed so generally and so cordially the personal affection of his fellow-citizens. None has so thoroughly leveled party barriers and erased partisan prejudices in all things relating to his immediate individuality. He has created an atmosphere of love and confidence; he has touched the sympathies of every thinking man. He has taught us all to feel that he understands us, shares our sorrows and our joys, and would help us or be glad with us if he could. Almost every English-speaking citizen of this republic has a sense of nearness to Mr. McKinley—a sense of possession in him a faithful and a kindly friend.

The Richmond (Va.) Dispatch, which certainly cannot be charged with prejudice in favor of the President, says:

We sincerely trust he will recover—a wish in which we know all Virginia and all the South will join. Widely separated from Mr. McKinley in politics though we are, all of us have a personal liking for him. We regard him as a well-disposed man and one sincerely desirous of making all the people of this land harmonious and happy.

The Omaha World-Herald, an independent, anti-administration paper, expresses its admiration for the personal character of the President in the following terms:

It is a fine tribute to the character of American citizenship when it is said that all over this broad land, in every city, in every town, in every hamlet in this union of states, when the news of the attempt to assassinate President McKinley was announced there was no Republican whose grief was greater or regret more sincere than that felt and expressed by every intelligent man in every other political party that deserves the consideration of honest men.

During the last two presidential campaigns, the American people congratulated themselves upon the fact that both candidates for the high office of president were commended by their personal characteristics to the respect of the people. Whatever criticism may have been passed on the proposed policies of either of these candidates, intelligent and reasonable men conceded to both that for which their immediate neighbors gave them credit, the honor of being clean, upright and honorable men. Whatever criticism may have been passed concerning Mr. McKinley's policies, no serious word has ever been uttered affecting his personal integrity or the honor and the uprightness of his individual character. It may not be out of place to say that the policies of his administration, which many of us believe to be wrong, were successfully established largely because of the popular confidence in Mr. McKinley's personality.

The lack of any sane motive for the assassin's deed and the apparent security of the President at the very time of the attack has been commented upon by many papers. The Pittsburg Dispatch says:

There never was a President, probably there never was a ruler in the history of the world, who in human judgment could have been classed as more absolutely safe from attack from assassins than President McKinley seemed to be the moment before the murderous shots were fired. He had carried his administration through trying and difficult issues. The heat engendered by those discussions had long passed away, and the President was held in affectionate esteem by his political opponents almost as highly as by his supporters. He had seen his country progress to the heights of prosperity under his administration. He had disavowed any ambition of future re-election. He was surrounded by applauding thousands at a festival of peace, industry and American unity. No President was ever so environed with all the sentiments of harmony, good feeling, peace and security.

Similar sentiments are thus expressed by the Detroit Free Press:

Mr. McKinley was without a personal enemy in all the world, so far as anybody can testify. Men differed from him in political faith, and opposed his policies vigorously; but in all his life he never intentionally made an enemy. His administration has produced an era of good feeling despite the bitterness of his first campaign. The country had achieved a more generous and more widely distributed prosperity than it or any other country had ever known. In all the world there was not a single man who could honestly say: I would be better off for the death of William McKinley.

Calling attention to the lack of conceivable motive for this attempted assassination, as compared with the turbulent times in which Lincoln and Garfield met their fate, the New York Herald says:

A nation with the resources, power and prowess to defend its President against a world in battle array, stands helpless and woe-stricken by the momentary act of an insignificant miscreant. The personal kindness and exemplary life of President McKinley have won the affection and esteem of all regardless of political differences. . . . What inspired the cowardly assassin? One can possibly conceive of hatred and desire of vainglory leading to the murder of President Lincoln in a period of intense excitement, or of disappointed partisanship inciting the half-demented slayer of President Garfield; but for such an unprovoked onslaught as this, imagination fails to suggest a motive unless we accept the assassin's statement that he is an anarchist and was possibly inspired by that infernal organization or even directly chosen to perpetrate it. The time has come to settle with these reptiles.

Sir Robert Hart No more authoritative on China.

statement of the situation in China has appeared than the article by Sir Robert Hart in the Great Round World. As Director of the Chinese Customs for twenty-five years, he perhaps knows more about China and the Chinese than any other foreigner. It is his opinion that it would have been better if the missionaries had left the righting of wrongs and the adjustment of administrative matters to the constituted authorities. But considering the fact that for the time there were no constituted authorities, he is inclined to judge very leniently any mistakes which they may have made. As for Mr. Ament and the famous charges against him, he says: "I am sure that personal gain, personal profit and personal considerations never weighed with him in the slightest." As to the safety of missionaries and their families in the interior, he says that conditions are still very unsettled and it would be better to avoid risks and not to act with undue haste. Much depends upon the personal attitude of the viceroys. In Shantung, for example, everything is quiet because the governor of the province is favorably disposed; but if by any chance he should be supplanted by a man of different type, the lives of the missionaries who had returned might be in danger.

Jamaica and the United States. The Kingston (Jamaica) Daily Telegraph contains an interesting discussion of present industrial conditions in that island and of the part which the United States must play in any revival of prosperity there. According to this statement, the present conditions in Jamaica are far from satisfactory. The distance to England is too great to admit of frequent direct steamers, and the tariff barrier between the Jamaica and the United States is a serious bar to the development of her commerce in her greatest natural market. Bananas and sugar are the two products by the exportation of which prosperity must come to Jamaica if it comes at all, and the latter is by far the more important. "In order to bring back prosperity to our shores," says the Daily Telegraph, "it is essential in the first place to take steps to revive the sugar industry on a large scale, and in the second place to secure a thoroughgoing reciprocity treaty between Jamaica and the United States. The newspaper scribes who occasionally advise the people of Jamaica to secure markets which will make them independent of the United States are not only guilty of talking arrant nonsense, but are recommending a course which would be bound to end in disaster. Jamaica could not be saved from absolute bankruptcy for a single year if her products were excluded from the American market." The climatic and agricultural conditions of Jamaica are not essentially different from those of Porto Rico and Cuba and, within the next few years we will have an instructive object-lesson seeing the relative desirability, from the standpoint of material prosperity, of annexation to the United States, independence and dependence upon a foreign power.

The Strike.

A chance, and apparently the last chance, to end the steel strike on terms other than absolute surrender for one party or the other, has been lost. Through the praiseworthy efforts of a committee of the board of conciliation of the National Civic Federation, a conference was secured between Mr. Schwab and representatives of the strikers. Neither of the leaders manifested any considerable interest in the negotiations and neither was disposed at first to make any proposition of compromise. Finally Mr. Schwab proposed that a settlement be arranged on the basis of the status quo; that is, that the Amalgamated Association be recognized as the representative of all the workmen who have up to date obeyed its strike order, that the union scale be signed for all such and that the steel corporation deal individually with all who, by refusing to strike, have virtually repudiated the Amalgamated Association. Mr. Shaffer, who was not at the conference, was called up by telephone and refused to consent to these terms. This means that the Association, in so far as Mr. Shaffer voices its sentiments, wishes to act as the representative of men who will not obey its call. On such an issue it becomes still less probable that the strikers can either win or deserve victory.

Anarchy and Treason.

One universal sentiment is stirred in all hearts by the murderous attack of the anarchist upon our President. If, by good fortune, it shall fall short of actual assassination, it will be for no lack of murderous purpose, but only that the accuracy of the villain's aim did not equal the malignity of his design. There are no parties in this country at the present hour. The President of the whole country lies at the point of death, and there is no thought but of horror at the assassin's deed, and affectionate admiration and concern for the wounded man. The event need change no man's opinion of the wisdom or unwisdom of any national policy, but while party lines have for the time dropped below the horizon of our thoughts, it may help us all to see that the President has been an able and honorable statesman, a Christian gentleman without fear and without reproach, and in the largest sense a great man. If general popularity could have saved him from the hand of the assassin, he would have been safe; but so long as there remains one murderous fanatic at large with the means of procuring a weapon, so long will there be no guarantee of safety for those, however beloved, whose high office makes them a mark for the lawless and whose virtues are a reproach to the base.

But, setting aside for the present all considerations of personal admiration for the President and concern for his recovery, the foremost question is, What shall be done with the assassin, and what steps shall be taken to prevent the recurrence of this too frequent tragedy? A crazed fanatic may be willing to exchange his own life for that of a ruler or a president, but the country cannot afford to allow him the option.

It is well that the attempt of the crowd to lynch the culprit on the spot was frustrated. The taking of a murderer's life is a function committed solely to the state and it cannot be assumed by a chance assembly, no matter under what stress of righteous wrath, without repeating the crime. And yet, when one considers that, in the event of the victim's recovery, the charge against the assassin will be only "assault with intent to kill," involving merely a penitentiary sentence, it is evident that our legal provision for such cases is wholly inadequate. To class such a case with that of a drink-crazed man who shoots his neighbor in a quarrel, is an obvious absurdity. The attack was made not on a man but on the federal government.

Anarchy is treason. It takes a potential murderer and makes of him a traitor as well as a murderer. The murderous plot may fail, but the treason stands self-confessed. The Polish anarchist who attempted the life of the President has declared in writing that he considered the United States government entirely wrong and thought the killing of the President would be the best way of destroying it. An attack on a federal officer, motivated not by personal enmity, but by an avowed purpose of destroying thereby the whole system of government of which he is a part, is in reality an armed rebellion against the government. Whether or not it is murder in the first degree, depends on the success of the attempt; but in any case it is insurrection, and therefore treason. The constitution defines treason as "levying war against the United States or adhering to their enemies, giving them aid or comfort." The assassin comes within the spirit of this definition. He is engaging in guerilla warfare against this government while owing to it the allegiance of citizenship. His formal declaration of war was made after the deed, but the deed itself is unmistakable. It is an overt act of rebellion against the United States and should receive the punishment of treason—death.

The fact that the assassin appeared without the panoply of war, without uniform or insignia, makes his offense not less but greater. The soldier who is found within the enemy's line without the uniform which distinguishes him as a foe, is treated as a spy, and his penalty is death. In defining treason, the constitution does not limit the term to the concrete fact of levying war against the United States, but extends it to cover also "adhering to their enemies, giving them aid or comfort." This is exactly what Emma Goldman and the various anarchistic juntas in different parts of the country are actively doing. Without their encouragement, such crimes would never occur. This too is treason.

The faintest suggestion that anarchistic utterances, such as those of Emma Goldman and others whose speeches and writings are incitements to crime, should themselves be punished as overt criminal acts, is at once met by the cry that free speech is a constitutional right in this free country. To be sure the first article of the Bill of Rights forbids Congress to abridge freedom of speech and of the press. What then? Is there no possible limit to what one may publicly say and print and circulate? Try it by printing lottery advertisements or announcements of any fraudulent scheme, and sending them through the mails. The federal government will interfere at once without waiting for any victim to be duped so as to furnish an "overt act" of fraud. Let one attempt to print facsimiles of United States bank notes and he will quickly discover that freedom of the press is restricted at this important point. Of course no one would be actually defrauded until the counterfeit notes had been put into circulation, but the officers do not wait for that. They stop the press and confiscate the materials, without waiting for the counterfeit notes to be presented for payment. But anarchistic literature is printed under the claim of the freedom of the press, and it is supposed that we are constitutionally bound to take no note of it, until—Flash! and almost before the doctors reach the prostrate form, the whole world knows that another President has fallen before an anarchist assassin. At last the counterfeit note has been presented for payment, and the hand of the law is upon the traitor just as it is too late.

No civilized community permits or can permit complete freedom of speech and of the press. If one uses indecent language in public, he is liable to arrest and punishment. The editor of a Chicago daily paper recently served a two years' sentence in the penitentiary for publishing vile matter in his paper. The First Amendment did not save him. Common sense dictates that freedom can be granted only within the limits of decency and good order. The utterances of that school of anarchists who applaud the assassination of a ruler are beyond the pale. The least that the government can safely do is to establish such a degree of surveillance that it can locate those persons who loudly proclaim their preference for a regime of no-government, and to transport them to any one of several barren islands where that social order exists in its pristine chaos.

This does not involve the prohibition of free criticism of the government and the administration. The right of the people "peaceably to assemble and petition for redress of grievances" would remain untouched. No constitutional prerogative would be abridged. But the country would be saved from the dangerous and anomalous situation—which, however, it shares at present with most of the European countries—of giving the protection of its laws and courts to a class of people who are engaged in an active propaganda tending to corrupt the loyalty of individuals, to make traitors out of citizens, and, if possible, to overthrow the government and destroy the whole fabric of civilization.

Two years ago there was in Europe an international assembly of police authorities which dealt chiefly with the question, Shall the propagation of anarchistic doctrine be treated as a crime? Europe is full of known anarchists who openly profess hostility to the governments under which they live. The question is, Can such a profession be considered not merely the statement of a private opinion, but an actual menace to good order and punishable as a crime? Let us have another such conference; let us answer YES to the question; and let us back it up by international co-operation.

Heroism in the Educational Field.

There is no more heroic chapter in the history of the reformation of the 19th century than the record of the struggles of our colleges. We are apt to associate religious heroism exclusively with work in the foreign field or in the slum regions of our great cities. But for patient endurance under discouraging surroundings, for the faith which hopes against hope, for the heroism that stands against overwhelming odds, facing poverty, drudgery and discouragement, and wresting victory at last out of the very jaws of defeat, the teachers in our colleges are not excelled by the heroes in any other field of labor. The history of one of these institutions is very largely the history of every other one. They were all begun by earnest, consecrated men, who felt the imperative need of such schools, but who had but little money to give for their support. The only resources they had to carry them through the period of uncertainty and discouragement were the faith, the energy, the conscientious devotion to duty, the willingness to sacrifice for the good of the cause, which the men connected with them possessed.

We have just finished reading the history of Hiram College, from the founding of the Eclectic Institute to the celebration of its Jubilee.* It is an interesting story of a heroic struggle in which many men of wide reputation and a high order of ability have borne conspicuous parts. A great deal of history clusters about Hiram, some of it touching the history of the nation. The biographical sketches, which form an important feature of the book, show how many men and women of noble characters and richly endowed natures have contributed to the making of Hiram what it is to-day. As one reads the history of the labors of such men as A. S. Hayden, J. M. Atwater, B. A. Hinsdale and those associated with them in those earlier years, and notes how patiently they toiled and waited, he is made to realize how much the Hiram of to-day is indebted to the meagerly rewarded labors of these heroic men of the past.

Hiram's greatest advance has been made under the administration of President E. V. Zollars. One feels the beating of a warm heart, a strong faith and a high purpose in all his reports. He has the power to inspire confidence in the success of his plans, and his plans are large, but not utopian. The Jubilee celebration, with its quarter of a million endowment, forms a fitting climax of the heroic struggles of a half century. But Hiram has not reached its goal. It is still pressing forward, if by any means it may attain the high ideal which the great men who have labored for it have had in view from the beginning.

The history of Hiram ought to give fresh inspiration to every institution among us, and beget a deeper interest in and sympathy for our colleges. Two things in the history of Hiram have impressed us as contributing to its success. Strong and true men have left upon the school the impress of high ideals. Garfield and Hinsdale, not to mention other worthy men who served the college as President, were not ordinary men. The impress of their intellect and high character will never be effaced from Hiram. And then the institution seems to have been blessed with a board of trustees made up of wise men, who have steered the college safely through many periods of gloom and darkness. The moral is, that we can never have great colleges without great men, both in the faculty and board of trustees. A college is great just in proportion as it is inspired in its motives, measures and methods by great men—great in their grasp of high ideals, and great in their character.

Most of our colleges have now passed their Jubilee. Some, younger, have made more rapid progress and so have gained time. All of them that may now be said to be firmly established are old enough to have a proper ideal of what a college should be, and should seek to bring themselves into line with the best ideals. The recent movement toward college endowment, and the organization of a national education society, mark a new awakening to our educational needs. There can be no surer index of our real progress than the character of our institutions of learning. We do not now need more colleges, but we do need to endow and equip the schools already established. If we do not do this we must suffer the inevitable consequence: intellectual impoverishment, dearth of men possessing the requisite elements of wise leadership, and lack of that prestige and power which are ever associated with profound scholarship and consecrated culture.

Christ and the Church.

These two words stand for two great entities—a divine personality and a divine institution. It was a true spiritual instinct or judgment that led to the adoption of this fine motto of Christian Endeavor: Pro Christo et ecclesia—"For Christ and the Church." It is of the first importance, however, that the true relation of Christ and His ecclesia be recognized. There are two fundamentally different conceptions prevailing in Christendom to-day as to the attitude which these sustain to each other and to humanity. One view is that men come to Christ by coming into the church. The other is that men come into the church by coming to Christ. The former is the sacerdotal view held by the Roman Catholic Church and other bodies which lay stress upon the priestly hierarchy. According to this view the grace which regenerates passes through the ecclesiastical channel, in the form of bishops and priests, who administer ordinances and receive into the church. According to this theory where there is no bishop there is no church, and where there is no church there is no salvation.

The other view held by most Protestant bodies is that men are saved by virtue of coming into contact with Christ through faith, and that it is only as they are saved by Christ that they can be members of his true church. The church, according to this view, has an important function to perform, but that function is not saving men by administering the ordinances, but by preaching the gospel and living the gospel, to bring men to the personal Christ to be saved and afterwards to receive them for religious nurture and training. This view, which seems to us to be the correct one, regards all agencies, such as preaching the gospel, singing, and the various forms of religious work, as valuable in so far as they bring men to Christ, or what is the same thing, bring Christ to men, so that the sinner may come in personal contact with the Savior.

It is hardly possible that these two different conceptions can get on together without conflict. If the hierarchy theory prevails, then the great idea will be to get all the people into the church, and the best way to do that is to get them in while they are infants and bring them under the regenerative influences of the ordinances, that they may receive apostolic grace and so eventually be brought to Christ. Infant membership holds a large place in this theory of salvation which places the church before Christ. On the other hand those who hold the opposite view will seek to bring men under the regenerative influence of Christ by all the means at their command in order that they may be brought into newness of life and so become members of his body, which is the church of the living God. This body, according to this theory, is made up of living members. This seems to be in harmony with the view and practice of the early church. "And the Lord added to them day by day those that were being saved" (Acts 2:47). It does not follow that those in the church are perfect, for the object of the church is to promote spiritual growth and perfection among the members as well as to extend the kingdom of God over an ever-widening domain. But it does follow that they should be converted, and have implanted in them the germs of spiritual life.

If this be the true conception of the relation of Christ and the church, then the real object of all religious work should be to bring men into right relations with God in Christ, in order that they may form such a society as the church is intended to be. It is only as men are dominated by the Spirit of Christ that they can form a successful church that can live and work together in harmony. A failure to recognize this relation of Christ and His church has been a source of great confusion and corruption in the church. It has introduced an unregenerate element in the church. It has produced a union of church and state and subordinated the spiritual to political power. It has led to a perversion of the ordinances in their form and meaning, and has resulted in exalting ecclesiasticism and in obscuring Christ and the way of access to Him.

A written creed is very necessary, says an esteemed but misguided contemporary, as a definite statement of the things that are most surely believed among us. The trouble is that in a few generations it comes to be a binding statement of the things that are most surely not believed at all. As a statement of faith, a creed is not so bad; but as a statement of the things which our distant ancestors thought we ought to believe, it is unendurable.

Do some of the brethren think that the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has gone over to the camp of the Baptists by what we have said and allowed others to say about actual and formal remission of sins? Read this: "Discontinue my CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, as I no longer want it, for I am a Baptist through and through." There was a time in the history of our movement when to displease a Baptist was the surest proof of loyalty to "our plea." Happily it has become possible for broad-minded Baptists to take a friendly interest in the doings of Christians that are not of their fold, and vice versa, and there are many Baptists who think it worth while to read a journal of Christian civilization, regardless of its view of the design of baptism. But tried by the old-time test on an old-time Baptist, we are still sound.

Editor's Easy Chair

Macatawa Musings.

How the world appears depends a good deal on the medium through which one sees it and the particular part of it one happens to be looking at. I am now looking at it through the window of a Pullman Sleeper on an express train, whirling through the great state of Illinois. It looks a little dry, but there is nothing in the great fields of shocked wheat and of growing or shocked corn to suggest a famine. The farmers will not have as much corn to sell as heretofore, but what they do sell will bring better prices. Besides, the late rains have helped the fruit crop. A brother writing from southwest Missouri says the great fruit crop will fully compensate for any shortage in the corn crop. Even the late corn is doing better than was anticipated. So on the whole we are not so bad off as we imagined ourselves to be a few weeks ago. The country as a whole has much more reason for thankfulness than for complaint. If we were as ready to count our blessings as we are to number our misfortunes, there would be more songs of gratitude and less murmurings in the world.

During my flying visit to St. Louis there were two events of interest. The first of these, in chronological order, was the quarterly meeting of the Central Board of the Christian churches of St. Louis. There was a good attendance, all of the twelve churches, I believe, being represented by members of their official boards. Several committees appointed at the previous meeting made reports showing faithful work. The report of the committee on city missions, formerly our city mission board, but now a committee of this central board, made a specially encouraging report as to money collected, new pastors located, and general interest in city missions. W. H. McClain, chairman of this committee, is making his splendid administrative ability tell in the work of this important committee. All the churches reported good interest and continued success through the summer months. The Second Church, under the zealous labors of W. Daviess Pittman, is steadily extinguishing its debt, the Fifth is planning for a new location and a new building under the energetic labors of Bro. Quisenberry, and Ellendale, with Bro. Coggins in the lead as pastor, has paid off its debt. A great deal of business was discharged; the utmost harmony prevailed, the interest was unflagging, and the whole atmosphere of the meeting was electric with hopefulness, and with premonitions of coming victories. Every church is now provided with a pastor, and every one is in line for a forward movement. Bro. Bartholomew is crowning his long and useful ministerial career by his wise supervision of our city mission work.

The other event referred to was the marriage of E. B. Redd, pastor of the Christian Church at Platte City, Mo., and Miss Martha C. Williamson, matron of the Christian Orphans' Home, St. Louis. This occurred at the Home on Aubert Ave., on Friday evening, the 6th inst. It was a most interesting and unique wedding. There were about four score orphan children who participated in the ceremonies of the occasion. They marched in orderly procession into the chapel of the Home, eight or ten of them preceding the bride elect and bearing bouquets, and the remainder following. A song of greeting and congratulation was then sung by them. After the words solemnizing the marriage had been spoken by the writer, a farewell song was sung very sweetly by the children, whose tearful faces showed how deeply they felt the meaning of the occasion, and how great was their love for their matron. During this song the children carrying the flowers one by one advanced to the bride and deposited the bouquets at her feet, gazing meanwhile into her attractive face. The scene was both beautiful and affecting, bringing tears to the eyes of many. In the last song, at a certain part, the bride joined in, in notes as clear and sweet as the chimes of evening bells. Then the children marched away to the music of the piano, and the large company of friends present extended their congratulations. The secretary of the State Board of Missions, of which Bro. Redd is a member, sent a telegram of congratulations, as did also Mrs. H. M. Meier from Harbor Point, Mich. It was indeed a unique wedding, and not only those present but hundreds of friends throughout the country join us in extending congratulations and good wishes. The orphans have lost an ideal matron, but Bro. Redd has gained an ideal wife.

How difficult it is to write or think of anything just now but the awful tragedy whose shadow lies like a pall on the hearts of the American people! That a man so amiable and benevolent in his character, so pure in his domestic life, so uncorrupt in his public life, so wholly devoted to the public welfare, should fall a victim of an assassin's bullet is an awful commentary on the depths of depravity to which a human being can sink. It reveals, too, as a flash of lightning in the darkness reveals an unseen precipice, the peril to public men and to social order, growing out of our giving room and shelter in this country to those enemies of mankind known as anarchists. God save the President! God pity and comfort the sorrowing wife and the stricken nation!

Questions and Answers.

I enclose an article from A. B. Jones in the Christian Standard of January 6, containing certain alleged statements of Mr. Campbell concerning actual and formal remission of sins. What I wish to know is, (1) Did Mr. Campbell write these statements while he was yet a sectarian? (2) Did he not teach baptism for remission of sins after he came out from the sects? (3) Does the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST teach direct or indirect operation of the Holy Spirit? Orsan Washum.

Manila, Philippines, 22nd U. S. Inf., Co. F.

1. Mr. Campbell evidently wrote the sentences quoted from him by Brother Jones, and some of the statements were made in his later life when he was in the maturity of his powers and enjoying the fullest measure of gospel light.

2. He did. The quotations given by Brother Jones do not disprove this fact, but corroborate it. Mr. Jones himself believes in baptism for remission of sins, but discriminates between the actual and the formal, as he claims Brother Campbell did.

3. The editors of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST believe that the Holy Spirit enlightens and convicts of sin through the truth of the gospel, and dwells in the heart of the obedient believer. They, however, do not limit the Holy Spirit to any one method of operation. By all possible methods He seeks to influence the mind and heart of men to become obedient to the truth and turn away from the paths of sin and death.

Is it right for professed Christians to play games such as croquet, caroms and checkers for pastime? Would Jesus do it?

Bloomington, Neb.

Everett Ingram.

It seems to us quite within the limits of possibility for one to maintain a Christian character while indulging occasionally in these innocent games, provided, of course, he plays fairly and seeks no undue advantage of his fellows. As to whether Jesus would indulge in such games if he were here it is not so easy to answer. Perhaps not. The probability is that were he here he would feel his time to be so limited and the work to be done so great that he could hardly afford the time for innocent amusements. The scribes and Pharisees would attack him now as they did when he was here before, and would so hound his path that he would probably have little time or disposition for recreation. We do not believe, however, he would condemn any of his disciples who, as a relief from the burdens and cares of life, should occasionally indulge in such innocent games. Every person must be his own judge in such matters, remembering only that he has to give an account to God for the manner in which he uses the time and opportunities afforded him here.

If the prophesy in Isaiah 7:14, "Behold a virgin shall conceive and bear a son and shall call his name Immanuel," had its immediate fulfillment in the days of Isaiah, as Thomas Paine in his "Age of Reason" argues, why does Matthew in his Gospel (1:22, 23) refer to the virgin birth of Jesus as the fulfillment of that prophesy?

G. H. Erby.

Lincoln, Neb.

The answer to this question involves a principle that applies to a great many other passages in the New Testament which refer to the fulfillment of statements found in the Old Testament. The inspired writers of the New Testament sometimes saw, in the fact or incident to which they referred, a striking exemplification of the truth or principle underlying the Old Testament utterance or incident, and spoke of it as a fulfillment of the former prophecy. Whatever may have been the nature of the "sign" referred to by Isaiah, in the passage quoted, Matthew finds a much more remarkable fulfillment of the statement in the birth of Jesus. There are many passages of Scripture, in the New Testament, which can only be understood in this way. If it be true that Matthew was writing to the Jews especially, he would be anxious to notice every correspondence between Old Testament and New Testament history. He would see in the events of the New dispensation the enlargement or fulfillment of prophecy in the Old. This fact may modify the form of argument from prophecy, but it in no way discredits the validity of either the Old Testament or New Testament history.

1. Is it good order for the elders to call the deacons to meet with them and consult on any question, and should their action be respected by the church?

2. If any one is aggrieved at the action of the board how should the matter be settled?

A Learner.

1. It is entirely proper for the elders to call the deacons or other wise men of the church to consult with them concerning any matter of interest relating to the welfare of the church, and their action should always, of course, be respected by the church, whether it be approved or not. It is not impossible for the officers of the board to take ill-advised action, and if a congregation in its assembled wisdom should so decide it may, in a respectful manner, ask the officers to reconsider.

2. If any individual member feels himself aggrieved by the action of the board he should ask for a hearing before it and should be granted such hearing, and pains should be taken to see that no member has just cause for complaint of injustice in any action of the board.

My Impressions of England

By C. H. WINDERS

One often does not realize how little he knows till he attempts to tell it, and then sometimes not half so well as those who listen to or read after him. My stay in England was too short to learn much of the real life of that people; but I am not asked to write my judgment or opinion, but only my impressions, and I cannot deny that some things impressed me.

These impressions were both favorable and unfavorable. We can learn many things from the English people, and they in turn can learn many things from their American cousins; and the future of each nation depends in no small degree upon its willingness to be taught by the other.

This is true in religious as well as political matters. Nothing impressed me more favorably than the Englishman's sense of reverence. The exclusiveness and sacredness of his home, his conduct in the house of God, his knowledge of and regard for the word of God, his respect for the Lord's day, the absence of the vulgar and profane in conversation are some of the ways in which this spirit of reverence finds expression. To me their regard for the house of God was very beautiful and impressive, as was also their service. They enter quietly and reverently and pass at once to their pews. After spending a moment in silent prayer, they either remain very quiet until the service is begun or spend the time reading the hymn-book or the Bible. The very stillness creates a spirit of devotion.

Like Jacob, you are made to feel that Jehovah is in this place, and this is none other but the house of God. There is no visiting or handshaking before, and very little after the services. No chattering or laughing among the young people, no discussion of fashion or social function by the ladies, no conversation about the weather or business or politics among the men. The people have come to worship, not to gossip; to pray, not parade; to commune with God, not to converse with each other.

I never heard such congregational singing in all my life. I saw congregations numbering from three to six hundred with almost every one in the house singing. They were not urged to sing, not even requested to sing, but the way they sang would be an inspiration to any preacher. The class of music used is the very best; none of the jingle-jingle music so common with us.

There is certainly more Bible reading in England than in America. The Bible and the hymn-book are placed side by side in the pew, and both are used by the worshiper. It was a delight to see both old and young turn readily to the lesson announced for the morning and follow the preacher in the reading. Many of them, too, would turn to the text when announced and the preacher (I speak now from experience) is made to feel that he must somewhere in his sermon say something about that text. With the English people the sermon takes second place. With most Americans it is first. Throughout all the services attended there were a quietness and order and a spirit of reverence observed that was very impressive and helpful.

The way Sunday is observed deserves notice. It is indeed a day of worship and rest. The business houses are all closed. The streets are deserted. Only in two or three of the largest cities are the streetcars in operation. Even the saloon-keeper seems to have some regard for Sunday, perhaps because he is compelled to. I observed in Manchester, where the saloons are allowed to open from 1 to 2 P. M., (this may be the law elsewhere) that some fifteen minutes before time for opening, both men and women are lined up, waiting for the hour to strike, showing they had not been in at the back door that morning.

The English laboring man or business man is not required to use Sunday for recreation at the parks and pleasure resorts, at ball games and boat races, for he is given holidays for this purpose. The hours of labor are shorter. Saturday afternoon is given to nearly all classes, and the entire summer season is interspersed with holidays. All this makes it less difficult to have Sunday observed as it should be.

I was not known to many as a preacher, but only as an American citizen. This was all the better, for people were themselves, which is not always the case in the presence of preachers. I saw them in their every day attire; saw the best and the worst, in the slums and on the avenues. I think I can say I never heard an oath or an indecent word from an Englishman's lips. I wish I could say as much of the Americans I met on the other side.

In discussing the habits of the two peoples with an intelligent Englishman, I remarked: "Your people are such habitual drinkers." "Yes," he said, "and I deplore it, but I heard more profanity in New York city in a single week than I have heard in England all my life." I was prepared to believe it. I have decided since returning to America to preach occasionally on the third commandment and kindred texts.

The English people are most courteous and obliging. One could not ask for a more polite and accommodating lot of trainmen, street car men, hotel men and policemen than he finds in England. I know the custom of tipping, a custom greatly to be deplored, may account for some of their politeness, but not for the most of it. I had a great deal of use for these men, especially the policemen—not in the way some of you may think—and had they been cross and abrupt, as many of our men filling the same positions are, they could have made my visit very unpleasant, whereas they contributed no little to the pleasure of it.

There are other things which impressed me favorably, but I would better stop here, lest some of my readers conclude I have made a mistake in returning to America and make the same suggestion which a gentleman made to a company of Americans in Paris who were always disparaging France and praising their own country. The Parisian grew tired at last and reminded the company that there was one good thing in Paris that any American with sufficient money could secure, and when asked what it was, replied, "A ticket to New York." Now if there is any danger of my being given a ticket to England, with the understanding that I am to remain there, I will do my best to modify any statement I have made. I never met an American, while on the other side, who was not made a more enthusiastic American by his trip abroad.

But some of the impressions received were not so favorable. England is too conservative. The English people do things as their fathers did them. They are satisfied with the old ways and do not like to be told that they are not the best. I think if they could be once gotten into the right path, they would remain there through their indisposition to change. The fact is, to an American, they seem set against everything that calls for any considerable expenditure of energy, and they have probably discovered that all progress means that. This spirit of conservatism is consigning England to the rear, when she should be well in the front. It is seriously retarding their political, commercial, educational and religious life.

But conservatism is not their worst fault. I have already alluded to their habit of drinking. It is appalling to what extent this evil has fastened itself upon the people. Men, women and children seem to think no more of going into a saloon than into a grocery store. To drink is the rule, to abstain from drink the exception, so much so that I was regarded by my English friends as an unnatural specimen and was sometimes asked if there were any more like me in America. I was glad to answer that in this respect there were a good many, and that the number was steadily growing.

A week was spent in Switzerland in a company of thirty-five or forty, of whom only four were Americans. So far as I could learn, of the whole company only these four Americans (three of these men) and two English women drank nothing.

Another week in Paris where most of the company were Americans, convinced me that, bad as the Americans are in this respect, they are far in advance of the English. What makes the condition in England more alarming is the statement you meet everywhere, which I never heard contradicted, that drinking is on the increase among the women, particularly the society element.

If any one believes that the solution of the drink problem in this country is the removal of the social ban under which it is placed, he needs only to visit England to see his mistake. I am more than ever convinced that the problem must largely be solved by the pulpit and press; that as they create a public sentiment against this evil, it will gradually disappear. Of the more than fifteen sermons I heard, in which the social evil was condemned, the war discussed and various other questions received attention, not one solitary word was uttered against the greatest of all sins of which England is guilty; and that, too, when there was being considered by parliament a bill regulating the sale of beer and wine to children.

The bill, I understand, was amended until nothing remained, and that nothing was finally shelved.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

The following appeared in a recent issue of the Chicago Daily Tribune: "Pastor Sco's Labor Trust. Denver Clergyman Denounces the Steel Strikers in Vigorous Language. Talks of Demagogues. Denver, Colo., Aug. 5.—'Damn the demagogues' was an expression used by the Rev. B. B. Tyler in the Christian Church in discussing the steel strike to-night. The workers were denounced by the clergyman and he declared the 'labor trust' as bad as any other trust."

The person who sent this message is, I believe, a member of "The Ananias and Sapphira Society" in good and regular standing. He also occupies a high place in "The International Association of Amalgamated Liars." That I said in a public discourse, "Damn the demagogues" is about the only true thing in the sensational message. I did say that, and say it now.

The message says, you observe, that the night of August fifth I delivered a discourse in the Christian Church in which I denounced the laboring man. There is not a word of truth in this statement—not a word. As a matter of fact Monday evening, August fifth, was spent in the Boulevard Congregational Church, not in the Christian Church, in Denver, where I gave an exposition of the Sunday-school lesson for August eleventh—"God's Promise to Abraham."

Sunday evening, August fourth, I delivered an address in the South Broadway Christian Church on "The Present Industrial War from the Christian Point of View." To that discourse the corresponding secretary of "The Ananias and Sapphira Society" probably referred in his "special" to the Tribune.

In the discourse sympathy was expressed for the working man. His right to organize was affirmed. That he had a right to strike was granted. The opinion was expressed that out of the present struggle good would issue. The working man will come to a clearer understanding of his rights, duties, powers, limitations. After the smoke of this battle shall have cleared away the man who owns the tools and the man who handles the tools, that is to say, the capitalist and the working man, will understand each other better. Their relations will be better established. The present strike is ill advised and is doomed. It must fail. This opinion was expressed in the sermon. News from the battlefields indicate that this prediction will be fulfilled. There is, it was said, no good reason for the strike. It is not for better pay, fewer hours, better surroundings. It is simply to compel the United States Steel Company to recognize, and treat with, the officials of the Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel workers. In this connection I thought of the conscienceless scoundrels who take advantage of the honest, industrious, frugal, temperate working man for their own profit, and exclaimed, "Damn the demagogues!"

Their condemnation is sure. They are condemned of God and of all good men. How soon a demagogue runs his course and disappears! But no sooner does one demagogue sink into oblivion than another appears on the stage, and, for a time, controls his dupes and, in labor troubles, holds the attention of the public. Their appearance makes me alternately weary, sick, disgusted, angry. They vex my soul. This unpremeditated oburgatory expression was at once seized upon by a few half confessed demagogues in Denver. They howled as if they were hit and hurt.

Demagogues are to be found in almost every department of life. They are among capitalists, preachers, doctors, and some think that they are among politicians even! They look out for themselves. They are, sincerely, for No. 1. This is about the only sincerity they possess. Little do they care for the "dear" people. In spite of them, however, the world moves on. The condition of the working man steadily improves. He never was in as good a condition, in every respect, as he is at the present time. And the future has in store for him something much better still. The horizon is radiant. The millennium is coming. The meek shall dominate the earth. The kingdom of this world will become the kingdom of the Christ. To him every knee shall bow. His sceptre all men shall kiss. Do you doubt this? Do you think that I am too optimistic? See what has been gained in the last hundred years.

In 1793 the Schuylkill and Susquehanna Canal Company advertised for workmen, offering $5.00 a month for the winter months and $6.00 for summer, with board and lodging. The next year there was a debate in the House of Representatives which brought out the fact that soldiers got but $3.00 a month. A Vermont member, discussing the proposal to increase the wages of the soldier to $4.00, said that in his state men were hired for $18 a year, or $4.00 a month, with board and clothing. Mr. Wadsworth, of Pennsylvania, said: "In the states north of Pennsylvania the wages of the common laborer are not, upon the whole, superior to those of the common soldier." In 1797 a Rhode Island farmer hired a good farm hand at $3.00 a month; and $5.00 a month was paid to those who got employment for the eight busy months of the farmer's year.

A strong boy could be had, at that time in Connecticut, at $1.00 a month through those months, and he earned it by working from daybreak until eight or nine o'clock at night. He could buy a coarse cotton shirt with the earnings of three such months. The farmer could pay no better, for the price they got for produce was wretched. Butter sold at eight cents a pound, and when it rose suddenly to ten cents, several farmers' wives and daughters went out of their minds with excitement. Women picked the wool off the bushes and briars, where the sheep had left it, and spun and knit it into mittens to earn $1.00 a year by this toilsome business. They hired out as help at twenty-five cents a month and their board.

By a day's hard work at the spinning wheel a woman and girl together could earn twelve cents. As late as 1821 the best farm hands could be had for twenty-five cents a day, or twice as much in mowing time. Matthew Carey, in his letters on the Charities of Philadelphia (1829), gives a painful picture of the working classes at that time. Every avenue to employment was choked with applicants. Men left the cities to find work on the canals at from sixty to seventy-five cents a day, and to encounter the malaria, which laid them low in numbers. The highest wages paid to women was twenty-five cents a day, and even the women who made clothes for the arsenal were paid by the government at no higher rates. When the ladies of the city begged for an improvement of this rate the secretary hesitated, lest it should disarrange the relations of capital and labor throughout the city. Poor people died of cold and want every winter in the city, and the fact seems to have made an impression only on benevolently-disposed persons like Mr. Carey.

A Great Day Coming.

By F. M. Cummings.

We are fully persuaded that the outlook for the religion of Jesus was never so hopeful as at the present time. Prior to his coming there had been a great quickening of human thought. It was one of those divinely arranged periods when things in heaven and on earth are shaken and men are thoroughly aroused. Old beliefs and theories were passing; old organizations were beginning to decay; and at the same time new and vigorous life was springing into active existence. A somewhat similar awakening began with the crusades in the Middle Ages and led on to the Protestant Reformation.

But never has there been, within the historic period, such a quickening of thought as has taken place in the last hundred and fifty years. Again we have the passing of outgrown beliefs and theories and the decay of institutions built on them. Again we have a life so vigorous, active and fruitful that its equal has never been known. Churches may lose in numbers and spirituality and the power of the clergy wane, but in the whole mass of society the ideas of Jesus are taking deeper root every day.

The introduction of Christianity was characterized by an intense human interest. There was a passionate love for humanity—for humanity redeemed now and forever from all that is evil, and this passionate philanthropy was based on an equally passionate love for the All Father.

There are indications of the strongest kind that we are on the eve of such another outbreak of religious fervor. Men are seeking social and industrial enlargement and economic equity as never before. It means the arousing of an intense human interest.

A human interest without the divine element may lead men no farther than a French revolution, but the hearts of men are turning to religion. Faith, not in churches and dogmas, but in divine love, justice and truth, is reasserting itself, and when the human interest and divine interest are once more combined there will be such an awakening as will cause the powers of earth to be shaken.

It will not be a handful of disciples in an obscure province and without means that shall constitute the forces of Jesus in the new time, but a vast host in many lands with all the thousandfold advantages of modern civilization at their command. A hundred Pentecosts may be rolled into one and a nation be born in a day.

This is a glorious time to live and labor for the Lord.

The Problem on the Mount

By L. H. STINE

The birth of a new idea is attended with tragic events. Erroneous views, that long have been identified with men's belief, are not brought into discredit, nor are base practices reprobated, without the violent motion and tumult of revolution.

The idea that prevailed among the inhabitants where Abraham dwelt, and among many surrounding tribes and neighboring nations was none less than the repulsive one that the best way to offer up a life in devotion to God is to slay it. It is a crude idea, but the one which the race doubtless started with. There is no doubt but that Abraham's faith embodied that idea.

Such a governing conception was adverse to every idea of God in regard to the relations of man. It was contrary to those fundamental ideas on which society rests, and which found, in the process of time, a statutory expression in the article of the Decalogue that denies the right to kill. That the life of man should be offered up as a sacrifice to God, but should not be taken, was the affirmation of an epochal truth and signaled the opening of a new era in the ethical history of the world.

When God would establish a new idea in the mind of the world, he would deposit it in the brain of an intellectual or spiritual leader. Abraham was favorably disposed toward new ideas, and he had that order of genius that could grasp them. He closed not the door of his reason against a strange thought. God could use Abraham.

In the land of Haran, when his restless mind was reaching out toward the unknown in search of new glimpses of truth, he discovered that he was destined to become the founder of a new race, over whose fortunes God would spread the wing of his providence. Assured that he should have land, as well as sons to till the soil and to tend his flocks, unmindful of the perils of his journey, and relying on the strength of a promise higher than any natural expectation, he abandoned his native land, and set forth on an errand of colonization, not knowing whither he went. Planting a colony in a strange land, according to a purpose connected with God, was the first idea that engrossed his mind, and for the development of which he surrendered his life. That was the giant stride, in the starlight age of the reason of man, toward Sinai and Zion, toward the law and the gospel.

Twenty-four years later, when ideals of glowing promise were trembling in the balance, Abraham was called upon to entertain another new idea. "I am God, the all-sufficient. Walk before me and be thou perfect." He extended the hospitality of his generous mind to the new, strange truth that God is trustworthy, and that man is capable of being like him. It was this liberality and unrestrictedness in receiving and entertaining new ideas that made him available for the incarnation of the cardinal truth that God sought to convey to his mind by the tragedy on the mountain, and also for the transmission of his conceptions to his posterity. A man like Abraham may be proven with profit to himself and the world. To give proper direction to his mind was to secure a numberless race against gross error. It was like cleansing the stream by purifying its fountain-head, this freeing the mind of Abraham from great error.

God directed Abraham to make an offering of his only son, even Isaac, the child of promise. No command could have been more painful for him to obey. It was the crisis of his faith. It staggered not, though the promise seemed to be under the doom of annulment.

Abraham construed the commandment in the most literal way possible, and proceeded without delay to carry God's order into execution, according to the prevailing ideas of sacrifice. His conformity to the ceremonies in vogue about him was not unreasonable; for one's faith is molded, largely, by one's education and environment.

To show that God's idea of sacrifice repudiated the intention of destroying Isaac's life, and purposed a spiritual offering up of the young man, when the patriarch raised his hand to obey the command of God in the most materialistic and revolting manner, the angel of the Lord intervened. The voice of mercy checked the rash purpose of Abraham to perform his cruel deed. Stay the hand! Thy hand was not made to shed innocent blood. The thinking brain, the feeling heart, the ready hand, belong to God. The voice that is still, the cheek that is cold, the eye closed in endless night, the silent dust, the fallen leaf, are vain to answer life's great end. Let Isaac live. Life is wonderful and dear and pleasant to him. He has thoughts and feelings and deeds in which to live. God has set landmarks before him. He has an aim and a mission, and his life contains a thousand springs. Spare it. Set Isaac apart, an instrument for the hand of God. Dedicate him, do not destroy him; sacrifice him, do not slay him; consecrate him, do not kill him; give him to God, do not murder him.

God did not instruct Abraham to kill Isaac. Murderous intentions have no place among the thoughts of God. Shedding innocent blood is a capital crime among civilized men, and involves the penalty of death. What is a crime in a man would be a crime in God. One may safely affirm that whatever is morally wrong in the acts of men, would be equally wrong in the acts of God. Is God obligated to a code of ethics different from the code he obligates a man to? No one can honor God for doing a deed which a moral man would reprobate in his neighbor. God is not guilty of sins which he condemns in men. Hence the command to offer up Isaac could not have aimed at the death of Isaac.

God was not trifling with Abraham. To direct him to kill Isaac, with the mental reservation to prevent his death, would have been an act of childish cruelty. Trials severe enough were in store for him in the natural course of an earnest life, without the addition of invented suffering. Does God mean what he says? The cruel world would call such a mental reservation as this by the name of trickery and deception. It belittles God's mind, and places a reduced estimate on his moral worth.

God taught Abraham the truth that he needed for his personal advantage, that the world needed, and that became deeply and durably impressed on the life of Israel. The posterity of Abraham, along the royal line, at least, never practiced human sacrifice to conciliate the mind of God; but on the contrary his descendants emphasized the loftiest sentiments of spiritual obedience. Their literature is rich in such expressions as these: To obey is better than sacrifice and to hearken than the fat of rams. The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit. Their fine conception of the gift of life to God pressed right onward through Hebraistic and Mosaic ages and found complete expression in the idea and life of Jesus. "I sanctify myself," said the Master. "Present your bodies a living sacrifice," said Paul. The disciples of Corinth first gave themselves, as the prime condition of giving the things they possessed.

The gift of Isaac to God raised the mind of Abraham to a new plane of thought. It gave a new meaning to life—its use, abuse and obligation. Old things passed away from the patriarch's life, all things became new. Human sacrifice, as practiced by brutal tribes, was a noxious weed. God eradicated it from the thought of Abraham and, in its stead, planted an incorruptible seed whose destined harvest was the Kingdom of the Son of Man.

The difficult problem for solution on the Mount was to separate in sacrificial offering the true from the false, the barbarous from the humane, the ennobling from the debasing, the attractive from the shocking, and the merciful from the cruel; to confirm in the mind of Abraham the conviction that all should be given to God; and to explode the base idea that the best way of offering up a life in devotion to God is to slay it. The explosion was successful. He found a new angle of vision—a new conception of God, as well as of man. Abraham saw the light.

New York Letter.

By S. T. Willis.

An interesting discussion is going on between certain of the state and city school authorities of New York over the question of allowing teachers to wear distinctive religious garb in the class room. Certain semi-sectarian schools and kindergartens are likely to be turned over to the city school board; but those now in charge of these schools have requested that one condition shall be that the teachers now employed be retained, and that they be allowed to wear before their classes the garments peculiar to the Roman Catholic orders to which they belong. But Superintendent Skinner, of the state board, objects on the ground that such would constitute sectarian instruction in the most effective form. He points out the fact that visual methods of instruction are of the most direct and lasting effect upon the minds of children. The president of the New York City school board, however, does not see any reason for objection, but this doubtless is accounted for by the fact that he is a Roman Catholic.

If instead our public schools in their higher grades were to teach the Bible, or portions of it, as literature and history they would vastly advance the standard of education. But such a movement would be strenuously opposed by the very advocates of the religious garb question under discussion. Biblical literature and not sectarianism is the need of our public schools.

One of the great dailies of the metropolis is publishing a series of articles on the question, "How shall Capital and Labor be Reconciled?" by such men as Ernest H. Crosby, Carroll D. Wright, Charles Francis Adams, Dr. John P. Peters, Edmond Wetmore, Bolton Hall, President Hadley, Prof. John B. Clark, Bishop Potter, and others. Bishop Potter's paper is especially significant in view of his position and the fact that he is spoken of as one of the possible arbitrators of the issues between the steel company and the Amalgamated Association of Labor. The bishop points out the fact that true manhood is more precious than all the millions involved in this gigantic struggle; that the newer industrial literature of the last decade is shot through and through with a golden thread of hope which points to the settlement of all such agitation in justice and righteousness.

He also says the ideal republic of which many men are dreaming in literature and life is not the condition in which all liberty of action is taken away, and where human society is reduced to a dead level, where there will be no struggle, or competition, or effort. But it is that diviner republic in which men of largest gifts have learned that the noblest and sweetest use of them is not for selfish ends, but for the helping of the weaker, lowlier, less endowed brother or sister who may need to have a narrow and sordid life touched with the hand of brotherly help and illumined by the light of brotherly love.

The true attitude is that of mutual sympathy and co-operation. Neither capital nor labor can be on top, healthfully, fruitfully or permanently. They must walk hand-in-hand. Brute force cannot really settle anything. But reason, justice, mutual sympathy and brotherly love can and will in the end settle all such questions.

Not long ago Dr. George Alexander, of the University Place Presbyterian Church, preached a sermon on "The Gambler's Creed." He said that this vice is prevalent among women of the highest class of society who are committing a graver crime by encouraging the practice than professional gamblers and the keepers of dives. The element of chance enters so largely into the happenings of life that it is hard to draw the line between legitimate business and gambling. The element of chance also enters very largely into almost all games and sports. Idleness, both at the top and at the bottom of society, fosters a demoniacal spirit of gambling. This we see from the king to the pauper. Often women of fashionable society in New York are heard to boast of the jewelry they have bought with money won by gambling. Matronly leaders of society welcome guests to their home to send them forth at the end of the evening penniless. Scarcely a defalcation occurs without its story of an outwardly honest man starting on the road to ruin and shame from some gambling party. Drunkenness is only a bodily sin, and under it there may be a kindly, even a generous, heart; God's grace may flow in the heart of the publican and the harlot, but the finished gambler has no heart. He would gamble on his mother's coffin. His history is covetousness, greed, selfishness, malice, hatred, despair, suicide.

An important and interesting meeting known as "The New York Conference of Christian Workers," is in session at Sea Cliff, Long Island. A series of interesting Bible studies will be given by experts in Old Testament prophecies. Dr. A. T. Pierson and other authorities in missions will conduct the missionary features of the conference. The practical results of such conferences tell in the enlarged and inspired work of those attending them. Preachers and Christian workers really lose no time by attending such meetings. They afford renewed interest and zeal because they bring us in touch with new methods and means, and because we learn of the success of others engaged in similar work. Every preacher should attend his own state missionary convention, and all should go to the annual national conventions. Each church should pay its pastor's expenses to the national convention and furnish a supply for the pulpit in his absence. If the minister is the man he ought to be, he will repay the church many times over in renewed zeal, enthusiasm and devotion. The church owes it to itself and to its pastor alike. Churches, send your ministers to the conventions.

The Incarnation of Truth

By BRUCE BROWN.

Power to be utilized must have an instrument as a means of operation. Steam has ever been just as powerful as it is today, but until it was incarnated in an engine it was of no service to man. Lightning frightened savage peoples with its frightful force and lurid glare, but it was of no use to the world until it was caught and incarnated in the dynamo. Finding a machine through which it could operate, as our life manifests itself through the body, man commanded the lightning to come down and light his houses and streets, to carry him to his work and warm him on his way, to become his slave by serving him in a hundred ways; and his command was at once obeyed. Without a medium for its incarnation electricity would ever have spent its force in the air.

By the same law of operation truth must find an organization for its incarnation before it can be of any service to mankind. It has been said that "truth is mighty and will prevail," that, "truth crushed to the earth will rise again"; but this is only possible when truth has found a home in the hearts of men. Truth can only prevail and rise again when crushed to the earth as it operates through our lives and intelligence. We speak of the discovery of new truth but we can only discover new truth as we discover new stars and planets. When these heavenly bodies are first seen they are hoary with age, and truth may seem strange and new at its first recognition, but it is as old as the stars. The only reason that such truth has not been blessing the world is because no mind has been prepared for its incarnation.

It was true from the days of Adam that all men are created free and equal and have the right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, but tyranny governed the world until minds, like flowers that open to receive the sunshine and dew, were glorified and vitalized by its impregnation. All truth, except the bare statement of subsequent events, was the same in the beginning of creation, changeless and eternal, as it is to-day. But this great truth set forth in the Declaration of Independence was but partially comprehended or incarnated when that document was written and for that reason was only partially operative. It remained for men in after years to become aware of its fullest manifestation in striking the word "white" from the constitution of the United States. Truth has power only in proportion to its incarnation.

Truth is the same yesterday, to-day and forever. But a small portion of a few fragments of truth has been grasped by humanity. For that reason we are wholly unable to locate its boundaries. Definition is limitation and truth to us is limitless. Incarnation of truth gives power. Omniscience and omnipotence are correlative terms. Men have served the world in proportion as truth has found its expression in their lives.

Christ said: "I am the Truth." He was the world's greatest revealer of truth. He was the first to teach six of the seven fundamental principles of civilization. But Christ was not the truth because he was a great teacher, but because he was its personification. All that he taught was true before he came into this world and would still have been true had he never been born. Not a single scriptural statement is true because it is in the Bible, but it is in the Bible because it is true. Truth was potent in Christ by being incarnated in his life and by its simplicity in his teaching made conditionable of being bred into the lives of others.

We are to be the truth as Christ is the truth. We can generate no new, saving truth but we can render ourselves the best mediums for its power that this world has known since the days of the Apostles. The reason this world is unevangelized is not lack of power, for Christ is able to save to the uttermost, he is abundantly able to save; but because men have been imperfect conductors for this power. Christ saves men only through incarnate truth. John V. Farwell, a merchant prince of Chicago, sat one morning at the breakfast table with a young man. The merchant said, "The world has yet to see the power of truth in a man fully consecrated to God." As the young man left the room he said, "Men will see in me complete consecration." His name was Dwight L. Moody. He became a perfect conductor for the truth that he had comprehended and in this was the secret of his power.

"We have the truth," say the Disciples. But the more important question is, Does the truth have us? If so this world will be ours for Christ's sake. Truth can only take possession of us as sin and self are crucified.

The Campbell Cemetery

By GEORGE B. EVANS.

We seek not the living among the dead, but it might prove instructive and likewise inspiring now and then to seek the dead among the living. There are sermons in sepulchers. Out of the somber silence of that spirit-sleep there may perchance steal soft whispers, subdued speech. The dead shall evermore live in the quickened resurrection of memory. The mantle of their godly example shall fall upon our shoulders as gently as the morning mist, and we shall wear the toga of departed spirits.

It was Decoration day, and I wandered out of drowsy, dreamy Bethany beyond to the Campbell home. Once there, I soon found my way to the graveyard. All was still except the faint stirring of the leaves in the May zephyrs. Here on a gentle slope overlooking his home beneath, rests the pioneer of the restoration movement. Once more the grass has grown green over his mound and spring smiles sweetly on his tomb.

The cemetery in which our saint rests is a quaint, old-fashioned country burial ground. It is surrounded by a stone wall several feet high and about two hundred feet square, and is entered by a stone stile. There are a score or more of tombs within. Here, beneath overhanging larch and cedar, sleep the relatives and close friends of the bishop. Such men as Richardson, Pendleton, Woolery and Tribble, rest beside him. It is the Westminster Abbey of the Disciples.

But the tomb that attracts most of our attention is that of Alexander Campbell. In a prominent place it lifts its white head to the lower branches of the nearest fir. The monument is of white marble. Going to the east side we see first of all an open Bible with these words from 1 Jno. 5:12 engraved upon it, "He that hath the Son hath life." Under this we read:

IN MEMORIAM.
ALEXANDER CAMPBELL,
Defender of the Faith
Once Delivered to the Saints.
FOUNDER OF BETHANY COLLEGE,
Who being dead, yet speaketh
By his numerous
Writings and holy example.
Born in the County of Antrim, Ireland.
Sept. 12, 1788.
Died at Bethany, Va.,
March 4, 1866.

Going to the north side we find the names of his two wives; the first, Margaret Campbell, died on Oct. 22, 1827, in the 37th year of her age; the second, Selina H. Campbell, born in Litchfield, England, on Nov. 12, 1802, died at Bethany, W. Va., on June 28, 1897. This last intelligence is so recent that the marble is still white with the newness of the carving. At the monument's base bloom bleeding hearts, typical of the grief that came to friends when this man of God was taken from Israel.

Just beyond the grave of Alexander is that of his father. A very common stone, turning gray with age, marks his grave. On it I read:

"In memory of Elder Thomas Campbell, father of Alexander Campbell and Archibald W. Campbell. Born in County of Down, Ireland, Feb. 1, 1763, and died at the residence of his son, Alexander, in Virginia, Jan. 4, 1854, aged 91 years, minus a few days. In Christian learning and piety he had few equals; as a Christian minister, husband and father, as few superiors. Strong in faith and hope he triumphed over death, and reposed in Jesus without a sorrow or a fear. Happy the dead who die in the Lord, for they rest from their labors and their works do follow them."

To the Disciple this cemetery should be sacred. Surely Westminster Abbey shelters no nobler prince, no better scholar, no more illustrious saint. Luther's tomb should be no more revered. It would take a Gray to pen a worthy elegy on such a graveyard. Says Aaron Prince Aten in a recent poem on Alexander Campbell in this paper:

"Grand man of God, though dead thou speakest yet,
And still beyond the years thy work shall last,
And waves of influence from thy mighty life
Shall break in blessing on eternal shores."

At Sea.

Oh, we go down to sea in ships,
But Hope remains behind,
And Love, with laughter on his lips,
And Peace, of passive mind,
While out across the deeps of night,
With lifted sails of prayer,
We voyage off in quest of light
Nor find it anywhere.

O thou who wroughtest earth and sea,
Yet keepest from our eyes
The shores of an eternity
In calms of paradise,
Blow back upon our foolish quest
With all the driving rain
Of blinding tears and wild unrest,
And waft us home again.

The Great Commission.

By S. T. Shortess.

In the great commission there are two commandments and a promise. The commandments are first, go disciple all nations, and second, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you. Then those who keep both the commands in the commission are promised the abiding presence of Christ. We cannot succeed in carrying out the first part of the commission unless we also carry out the second part of it because in discipling the nations we have to depend largely upon the influence of the church and its influence will not be what it should be without proper teaching and the abiding presence of Christ. There is a great deal of talk about carrying out the first part of the commission but not so much actual carrying it out as there should be. The second part is fully as important as the first and yet there is very little said about it and no adequate attempt is made to carry it out. There is certainly no general effort to carry out this working rule of teaching to its legitimate results. The rule is definite, plain and simple. It requires teaching obedience to Christ in all things. He says, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you, and yet many of the things required by this rule are not taught at all. We must find out what Christ wants people to do in the various relations of life, and then we know just what we must teach them to observe.

By applying this rule we know that we must teach domestic duties because the commandments show what Christ wants husbands and wives and parents and children to observe. The teaching of Christ and the apostles is full of this, while there is very little of it in the teaching of this age and for want of it our laws set aside the divine law of marriage and many of our people enter into criminal alliances without knowing it through divorce and remarriage (Mark 10:11, 12 and Matt. 19:9).

Again the rule requires us to teach political duties because the Bible plainly shows what Christ wants subjects and rulers to do. Christ in Matt. 22, and Paul in Rom. 13, teach the duty of paying tribute or taxes. Paul in Titus 2 tells Titus to put them in mind to submit to the government and to obey the magistrates. We are under the same obligation to teach this that Titus was. In 1 Peter 2:14, we are told that rulers are for the punishment of evil doers and for the praise of them that do well. Paul teaches the same in Rom. 13 and says that rulers are ordained of God for this very purpose. We learn from these that rulers are to be just, to protect the innocent and punish the guilty. Ex. 18:21, Deut. 16:19, 20, Isa. 5:22, 23 and Hab. 2:12-15, and many other passages in the Old Testament teach the same. Our voters are both subjects and rulers and Christ's commandment requires us to teach them to observe their duties in these relations. For lack of Bible teaching some of our laws reverse the Scripture rule and protect the criminal and make the innocent suffer.

Christ's law of teaching and the commandments will also require us to teach social and economic duties as well as our personal duty to self and our duties to the divine Father and to Christ and his church, because there are commandments to govern us in all these relations. In fact all our duties in all the relations of life are required to be taught to the disciples in the church. In the divine plan of teaching there is no room for fine-spun theories and speculative theology and vain conceits.

Paul said to Timothy, Take heed to thyself and to the teaching, for in so doing thou shalt both save thyself and them that hear thee. We certainly ought to give more earnest heed to the command in our commission to teach obedience to "all things whatsoever Christ has commanded us."

Are You Going to Minneapolis?

By J. M. Lucas, C. E. Supt. for Iowa.

I wish to emphasize three important phases in connection with the great convention to be held at Minneapolis, Oct. 10-16. First, the city and church where the convention is to be held this year. Second, the program and attendance. Third, the result of such a wonderful meeting.

From the pleasant acquaintance I have formed with the church and city of Minneapolis I am satisfied, beyond any reasonable doubt, that no mistake has been made in choosing the city of Minneapolis as the place of holding our first twentieth century missionary conventions of the year 1901.

It was my pleasure to attend the successful international Christian Endeavor convention held in the city of Minneapolis in 1891. At that time I formed a splendid opinion of both the city and the members of our noble band of Disciples, who were struggling at that time, and have since made a valiant and successful fight in maintaining the "Plea of the Disciples" in this growing city of the great northwest. No city has ever excelled the city of Minneapolis in entertaining the annual meeting of the United Society of Christian Endeavor. The city is noted for its great hospitality, enterprising spirit, education, public buildings, large and commodious churches and wonderful manufacturing interests. Beautiful location, surrounded by lakes and pleasant resorts, aside from its moral and religious worth, makes it the more enticing as a pleasant place to hold a great meeting.

It was my good fortune to visit the church, Sunday-school and the Christian Endeavor Society of our church in Minneapolis, one Lord's day last March, and I found all wide-awake, enthusiastic, and planning great things for the October convention. No church where our missionary conventions have been entertained in the past has ever had a better organization, and has been in closer touch with all of the other churches of the city, and has been more successful in interesting the different organizations and representatives of the railroads, than has the Minneapolis church. They have planned prayerfully, wisely and systematically and organized each detail in a businesslike way. In doing so they have merited the respect, and secured the united co-operation and support of the best element of their city. Our brethren have gone at this matter in such a persistent and forcible manner that all good citizens of Minneapolis seem to be impressed with the belief that we are going to have a great convention in October.

Minneapolis is a beautiful city, and a lovely one to visit at the season of the year when the convention is to be held. Our people have a commodious house of worship, and for once we are going to a city where the church building is entirely free from debt. The Exposition Hall is a splendid auditorium, and never looked so well as when filled by the Christian Church.

The program is going to be one of the best ever prepared for our conventions. The outline as published is a sure guarantee of this fact. Our best preachers, our educated men, our consecrated men and women, will be heard. Our practical workers will be given an opportunity to tell us their experience. We will hear of the splendid progress that is being made by all of our missionary interests, and the great work that is being accomplished by our educational institutions. In fact, we will have a chance to hear every vital and important item that pertains to the work of the great movement of the Disciples of Christ in every quarter of the globe.

One thing needful to make this a great meeting in consecration, enthusiasm and interest is a large attendance from the entire brotherhood. This is now the all important question to the numerous committees of the local organization at Minneapolis. With quite a degree of anxiety this question now confronts them, and the great problem to be solved is, How can we secure a large attendance? The church organization, and the citizens of Minneapolis are planning to entertain several thousand delegates, and we should not disappoint them.

Each congregation, Sunday-school, Christian Endeavor and C. W. B. M. should be represented by one or more delegates. Every pastor should attend and bring home a splendid report to be given to his congregation in the form of a sermon. All of our Sunday-schools should send their superintendents. Each Endeavor society ought to organize a campaign that will result in sending one or more delegates. Let individuals decide at once that they will arrange to attend. To our young people, allow us to suggest that they postpone, as far as possible, their summer outing and vacation, that they may go to the Minneapolis convention. You will be well repaid for your time, effort and the money expended.

We really favor the plan of each church, Sunday-school and Christian Endeavor raising the money and sending the pastor, the superintendent and the president of the C. E. society, or the leaders of each department of the church work, and then holding them strictly personally responsible for attending all the sessions pertaining to their particular work as represented on the program of the convention, thus placing them under obligations to make a full and interesting report to those sending them to the convention.

Let us suppose it might be possible to have one representative from each congregation, Sunday-school, C. E. society and C. W. B. M. represented at the Minneapolis convention, what a great attendance we would have, and then go home and give a concise and interesting report of the doings of such a great convention as we are anticipating at Minneapolis this October. What do you surmise the result would be? If it were possible for this to come to pass you could get an interesting and profitable answer from our state and national secretaries and treasurers of our different missionary societies that would not only surprise you, but them as well.

In Iowa we are planning to get a representative from each church, Sunday-school, C. E. society, C. W. B. M., the pastor going too to look after the delegation. We are expecting Drake University to be well represented. A large number of individuals from over the state are planning also to attend. Now this matter of arranging to attend our national missionary conventions is something that needs forethought and planning ahead. Almost every one of moderate means could attend if they would only think so and arrange to do so. The average amount to take one from Iowa to Minneapolis counting all expenses will not exceed $20.

If we can have all of our interests well represented at Minneapolis and good and carefully prepared reports taken home to churches, only the heavenly Father will ever know the splendid results of such an organized effort. We do know that not only the churches will be benefited, but the missionary interests and the spirit of church enterprise will be greatly augmented, and a larger development of spirituality among our people will be discernible.

The brethren of Minneapolis are very anxious for a large attendance of our people at the October convention for the reason that we are little known in that city and the great northwest, and they deem this a great opportunity for making a wonderful impression on the citizens of this territory.

Baptism for the Dead.

By Clyde Sharp.

In the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of Sept. 5, is an article on this subject, containing an argument to prove that the expression "the dead" refers to Jesus Christ. Such a conclusion is clearly erroneous because the word in the original which is translated "dead" is in the plural number, hence cannot mean Jesus Christ.

It is easier to tell what the passage does not mean than what it does, but the whole question depends upon the signification of the Greek preposition translated for, and the persons indicated by the phrase "the dead." In the first case "the dead" evidently refers to particular persons, in the second case to the dead in general, because the definite article is used in the first and not in the second. And while "the dead" might mean dead in general, yet with the two forms used in immediate connection, the one with the article would be the more definite, the one without, the more general. In the third case, the word rendered "the dead" is a plural pronoun referring back to the first "the dead."

The explanation sometimes made that it means as the dead, i. e., dead to sin, is erroneous, for if that was the idea, the word rendered for, would not appear, and the word or words, for dead, would be in the nominative instead of the genitive case.

The primary meaning of the word translated for, is over, or above. But the conclusion drawn from this meaning, that the Corinthians were in the habit of administering baptism to candidates over the graves of the dead, would at once be rejected by immersionists as an absurd explanation.

Derived from the primary meaning is a secondary meaning, for, for the sake of, in defense of or in behalf of, including all shades of meaning that may originate from standing over or above, to defend, protect, help or aid. From this meaning, the idea is drawn that the custom existed of baptizing living persons for their dead friends. But Paul would surely have rebuked so gross a perversion of the gospel.

There is a third meaning, more general: that is, concerning, in respect to or on account of. And as the other meanings are not applicable, this must be the one that is intended. So they were baptized in respect to or on account of the dead.

Who were "the dead" indicated? As we have already noted that they were not the persons baptized, using the term with a spiritual signification, nor the dead in general, because the expression is too definite, they must have been those who, by the manner of their death, impressed some with the necessity of obeying the gospel. Death from natural causes whether of Christians or Pagans would not so impress unbelievers, but the death of martyrdom does have such an influence, and leads men to believe. Hence "the dead" must have been the martyred dead, whose example of faithfulness led others to believe in Christ, and obey him in baptism.

WORK IN JAMAICA

By C. E. RANDALL.

"It never rains but it pours" is an old saw of which we are often reminded in life in the tropics. For a number of months we have been suffering more or less from scarcity of rain in this island; and this year the "May seasons" seemed to have forgotten their appointed time. But now, in the middle of June, the clouds, which appear to have been delayed in taking up extra freight, have come up heavily laden. For three days they have been discharging an unusually heavy load. About ten inches of water has fallen. At such a time outdoor employment is generally suspended, and arrears of indoor work is likely to receive attention. Among other things I remember the occasional letter for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

It was on Feb. 5, 1876, that W. H. Williams, the first missionary to Jamaica under the C. W. B. M., landed in Kingston. So the churches connected with the mission have been celebrating the silver anniversary and have been raising a fund to give some expression to their thankfulness. In most of the churches it appears that the prevailing poverty has prevented large results being realized. But the effort must have done good; and, so far as it has gone, has shown a right spirit. In Kingston we had a fine meeting at which were present two of the oldest members, who have been faithful adherents to the cause since the time of its commencement by J. O. Beardslee, of the old American Missionary Society, in 1858. The Kingston Church has risen to the occasion in a most gratifying way. With a membership of about one hundred and thirty, of whom fifty are unable to give, being sick, very poor and absent from the city, they have raised $250 as a silver anniversary fund. This enables them to complete the payment of about $750 which they have given in aid of the erection of a mission chapel in an outlying district. They have also been able to clear off some other pressing liabilities. A few, who by an effort could do so, set a good example of liberality; but, for the most part, the members made sacrifices and gave out of their poverty. The results in all the churches are not yet known, but I hope they may prove encouraging.

We shall soon be getting in the annual reports from all the churches. I cannot forecast what these will be. I believe, however, that considerable additions to the membership have been made during the year. Our great trouble is that the defections are so numerous. Consequently our numbers do not show the advance that they should. One chief reason for this is that we profess to keep our church rolls purged of unworthy persons. Those who go back into sin are separated; and those who fail in the discharge of their church duties are erased from the roll. This keeps down our numbers in a way that sometimes appears very disheartening, and probably prevents our friends from feeling the satisfaction which would be derived from apparently large growth. But it is more healthy. Perhaps it would be better if some of the home churches adopted a similar practice. Nevertheless, the facts call for serious inquiry. It ought not to be that so many professing to come under the power of the gospel should fall away. Sometimes the validity of our practices needs to be judged by the results; and where these are unsatisfactory it may be inferred that the practice needs amendment.

In a country such as this and among such a people as we have to do with persons often come forward to profess religion because of the inducements which exist for them to do so. They have nothing to lose or suffer as the consequence. It is rather thought a respectable thing to do so. To join a church gives them a claim to be considered Christians. To be baptized is thought by many to be the proper thing to do; and they will say or do anything to secure the privilege. And then does it not secure a passage, by and by, to the heavenly city? There are many who, with these ideas, will come in the most orthodox way to apply for baptism, and when they have got "baptized done," especially if they are married, they are satisfied that they have done the things which they ought to have done, and soon lapse into a careless and worldly life. To meet this state of things wisely and effectively demands careful consideration, and, it may be, a careful re-adjustment of our methods to meet the conditions, which I am sure the New Testament allows.

Many of the churches on the island held special evangelistic services—both in the open air and in their buildings—at the commencement of the year. In some cases large congregations assembled, and a considerable number of people came forward professing conversion; and some of the churches appeared to be quickened. I do not gather, however, that much permanent impression has been made. Congregations have not increased, and spiritual coldness and negligence are confessedly prevalent. A ministerial association in the island is making an effort to get the Revs. Webb Peploc and F. B. Meyers to visit the island early next year, as missionaries, in the hope of realizing a revival of religion in connection with their labors. I feel sure it might be a means of doing much good in connection with us if some good brother were sent out to visit us to do some evangelistic work; and as we are so near to the states the expense need not be great. Probably the United Fruit Company would give one a free passage.

Retaining Friends.

By C. H. Wetherbe.

It is very easy for some young people to make friends, but they do not pursue such a course as to retain the most of the friends that they once secured. There are others who gain friends slowly, and these they retain for a long time.

It seems to me that the art of retaining good, clean and substantial friends is worth more to any young person than is the mere getting of friends. I do not undervalue the faculty of so winning people as to have them become one's friends, but I do emphasize the worth of keeping the good friends which one has, by various means, obtained. And how shall one retain his worthy friends?

The question is involved in some difficulties. I am aware that some people are so constituted by nature and cultivation that it is comparatively easy for them to retain the friends that they have secured. There is a peculiar charm in their simplicity of speech, in their frankness of manner, in their expression of a kind spirit, and in their obliging ways, so that their friends are lastingly drawn to them.

There are others who are unfortunate in respect to their natural characteristics. They are very uneven in temperament. Some days they are bright, cheerful, communicative and manifestly obliging; these days are followed by clouded countenances, a moody spirit, a cold manner, and a seeming unwillingness to accommodate anybody. Such are quite likely to lose the friends that they have made, and perhaps made with much effort. To such I say, by all means determine to be pleasant before your friends, even though you may feel unpleasant. This is not hypocritical; it is simply the work of keeping in subjection those bad tendencies which need conquering. If you have a pain in one of your arms, honesty and frankness do not require you to use that arm to assault a friend in the face. So, I say, keep your bad feelings under stiff restraint while you are with your friends. Your friends will think all the more of you if they know that you are trying hard to master yourself and are aiming to become much better than you now are. Thousands of young people have retained the best of friends just because the latter have seen the former striving with all of their might to improve themselves.

Then, too, if you would retain worthy friends, be perfectly honest with them in speech, in promise, and in a purpose to be true to them as long as you live.

Current Literature.

September Magazines.

The North American Review opens with an hitherto unpublished essay on Shakespeare by Victor Hugo—an eloquent and epigrammatic essay, written in 1864 at the time of the three hundredth anniversary of Shakespeare's birth. It was not included in the volume of critical essays on the great dramatist which Victor Hugo published in that year. The Chinese Consul-General to the United States, Ho Yow, a brother of Minister Wu, writes an intelligent article on "Chinese Exclusion, a Benefit or a Harm?" exhibiting not only a strong English style but also clear views of political economy. His arguments ought to be well considered before the provisions of the present Chinese exclusion act are renewed. In reply to the recent denunciatory article by Prince Kropotkin, an article on Russia and Popular Education is written by M. Pobiedonostseff, Procurator of the Holy Synod of Russia, who, as official head of the Russian Church under the Czar, is able to speak authoritatively of the situation in Russia. He concedes more than one would expect a high Russian official to concede, but bases his chief defense upon the improvements which he says have been made in popular education and in the internal administrative system during the last few years. Dr. J. M. Buckley has another article on Christian Science.

The Atlantic Monthly for September contains as usual a distinguished list of contributors. Thomas Nelson Page has an article on the Southern People during the Reconstruction, which is one of the Reconstruction series by different authors which has been in progress since the beginning of the year. John Muir, the familiar friend of mountains and glaciers and all sorts of wild things, writes an article on the redwood trees, their beauties and uses. A redwood cut down is worth a great many dollars for shingles, but in the opinion of Mr. Muir a redwood alive and standing is worth a great deal more to agriculture, as a retainer of moisture for one thing. Charles A. Conant in "The Future of Political Parties" expresses the belief that the time is ripe for a change and that there must be a new division on the new issues. A posthumous essay by W. J. Stillman, the publication of whose autobiography has recently aroused much interest, gives a statement of his theory of beauty. There are other articles on university extension, Japanese horticulture and the Pan-American Exposition.

The story of a stupendous piece of bridge-building recently accomplished in Burma by American engineers is told in the World's Work and illustrated with more than thirty photographs. The structure is the largest viaduct in the world and the narrative of its construction would be a fit subject for a modern Iliad. It is characteristic of present day magazine enterprise, which goes to headquarters for its contributions, that the article is written by the engineer who was in charge of the work, Mr. J. C. Turk. An article on Civil Government in Porto Rico is written by W. H. Hunt, who was Secretary of Porto Rico a few weeks ago when the article was written and is now Governor. The largest ship in the world, the new Celtic of the White Star Line, is pictured and described. Apropos of the recent discussions of the chances for unknown, author some who signs himself An Unknown Author tells of his woes with publishers and concludes that the young writer without a pull has very little chance of getting his productions accepted for publication.

Prof. McMaster has his fourth paper on Daniel Webster in this month's Century, making in all a trustworthy and readable monograph on the life and work of this great statesman. The pictures of the Pan-American Exposition by Castaigne are doubtless the best that have appeared and probably the best that will appear. It is a worthy subject for the foremost living illustrator in black and white, and that is unquestionably the position which Castaigne occupies. The opening article is an attractive description of the mid-air dining clubs of New York, exhibiting a pleasant and practical use to which the top floors of sky-scraping office buildings can be put. It makes one appreciate the fact that the introduction of the elevator was in a way almost as great an event as the introduction of the railroad, since the former annihilated distance perpendicularly while the latter destroyed it on the horizontal. The serial publication of Irving Batcheller's "D'ri and I," which has already appeared in book form, is completed in this number.

The Critic contains a brilliant essay by Gerald Stanley Lee on "Literary Drill in College," the first paragraph of which, although its connection with the title is not immediate, is worthy of quotation. "Four men stood before God at the end of The First Week, watching Him whirl His little globe. The first man said to Him, 'Tell me how you did it.' The second man said 'Let me have it.' The third man said, 'What is it for?' The fourth man said nothing, and fell down and worshiped. Having worshiped he rose to his feet and made a world himself.

"These four men have been known in history as the Scientist, the Man of Affairs, the Philosopher, and the Artist. They stand for the four necessary points of view in reading books."

The tendency of the New York magazines to publish articles about New York, and especially articles based on the tacit assumption that New York and Christendom are practically synonymous terms, is further exemplified in Scribner's, the opening article of which, entitled "The Poor in Summer," is a description of the New York poor and their sufferings and amusements in hot weather. In the same issue appears the first of three articles by General Francis V. Greene on "The United States Army." There is also another Amateur Cracksmen story besides some other good fiction and a charming narrative of life in the woods with photographs of bears, beavers and other denizens of the forest in their native haunts.

There is no magazine that contains as much that boys want to know or as much that is good for them to know as The American Boy. In addition to having enough, and not too much, fiction, it has articles on all sorts of interesting subjects which are especially attractive to the boy mind. The September number, for example, has the following: Notable Naval Cadets; How to Learn Drawing; A Boys' Building at the St. Louis Exposition of 1903; Boys as Money-makers; The Boy's Library: Turning Points in a Boy's Life, and a great many other things of similar character. It is good, wholesome and interesting.

Few persons in this country realize the importance of the evangelistic revival which has been going on in Japan during the past few months. It is a movement which seems destined to have large results in the Christianizing of that country. It is described under the title "The Great Awakening of Japan" in the Missionary Review of the World.

The leading feature of Ainslee's Magazine this month is an article on Chicago, which its author characterizes as the most national city. The opening paragraph is significant: "Chicago's feet are in the mud, but her head is among the stars. Physically dirty, she aspires to be beautiful; commercially greedy, she spends half of her tax income for education; tainted to the core with civic dishonesty, her ambition is fixed upon ideal municipal government."

The Cosmopolitan this month is largely given over to the Pan-American Exposition. Among the contributors to this remarkable series of articles, which becomes almost a summarized history of the world's progress during the last decade, are Robert Grant, Albert Shaw, John Brisben Walker, Julian Hawthorne, Director-General Buchanan, Prof. Pupin, Nicholas Murray Butler and Mr. Dooley.

The Review of Reviews for this month is devoted largely to the Sampson-Schley controversy, the steel strike and Dr. Koch's theory about consumption. There is also an illustrated article on automobile making in America, which shows that the industry has developed already to a degree which will be a surprise to most readers.

Muscular Pastor.

Muscles Built up by Common Sense Habit.

"For years I have not been able to drink coffee, as it made me very nervous and gave me a headache. No one loved coffee more than I and it was a severe trial to abandon its use. Nearly three years ago I saw Postum Cereal Coffee advertised and concluded to try it.

I have been so well pleased with it and its healthful effects that I have used it ever since. I carry packages with me when I visit other places.

When I began to drink Postum, my muscles were flabby, as my habits are sedentary, but for the past two years my muscles have been hard and I never felt stronger in my life than I do now at sixty years of age, and I attribute my strength of muscle to constant use of Postum. I drink it three times a day. I feel so enthusiastic about Postum that I cannot recommend it too highly wherever I go. Wishing you great success, yours truly," Rev. A. P. Moore, 474 Rhode Island St., Buffalo, N. Y.

The reason Postum builds up the human body to a prime condition of health, is that when coffee is left off, the drug effects of the poison disappear and the elements in Postum unite with albumen of the food to make gray matter and refill the delicate nerve centers all over the body and in the brain. This sets up a perfect condition of nerve health, and the result is that the entire body feels the effect of it.

Our Budget.

—Iowa convention this week.
—Illinois convention this week.
—Missouri convention next week.
—Only four weeks until the Minneapolis convention.

—A preacher's visit to a convention is like the visit of a storage battery to the charging station.

—J. J. Morgan was chosen at the Santa Cruz Convention as corresponding and financial secretary for the state work in California.

—Do not fail to send your name to P. W. Harding, Mexico, Mo., if you expect to attend the Missouri State Convention, Sept. 16-19.

—Miss Essie N. Gould of Lawrence, Kan., a graduate of the School of Pastoral Helpers, has entered upon her work as assistant to Brother Hughes at the new church at North Tonawanda, N. Y.

—J. M. Rudy, pastor of the church at Cedar Rapids, expects 500 regular delegates to the convention which meets at Cedar Rapids this week. The Wilson-Huston meeting at that place has been drawing immense crowds.

—H. A. Easton, singing evangelist, has been taking a course of study in voice in Chicago. He will continue in evangelistic work and desires to make dates for the winter. Permanent address, 617 W. 64th Street, Chicago, Ill.

—The first marriage among the students of the School of Pastoral Helpers will take place in the Central Christian Church, Cincinnati, Sept. 24, when Miss Bessie Whitney, a former student, will be married to Mr. Carl Gilbert, of Washington, D. C.

—The Christian Church at Sac City, Ia., desires to correspond with a successful and experienced singer and worker in revival meetings to co-operate with the pastor in a meeting in October or November. Address D. F. Snider, Sac City, Ia., stating references, experience, equipment and salary expected.

—The session of the University of Missouri opens Sept. 10, and in spite of the recent droutht the enrollment is expected to be more than 1,600. The people of Missouri are awakening to the fact that they have in their State University one of the best institutions in the country.

—The annual meeting of the churches of Christ in Bureau County, Ill., will be held with the church at Walnut, Friday, P. M., and Saturday, A. M., Sep. 20, 21. W. F. Shaw, of Charleston, Ill., state president of Christian Endeavor, will deliver the evening address. A good programme has been arranged and a cordial welcome is assured. J. G. Waggoner, president of the county organization, urges a large attendance.

—R. M. Giddings reports from Paris, Tenn., that he has recently baptized Eld. H. O. Moore, of McEwen, Tenn., who has been a preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church for twenty years and a presiding elder. He is forty-two years old and, Brother Giddings says, he is well educated, a good speaker, a careful thinker and altogether a strong man. He desires work among us either as pastor or evangelist. He has a small family and will work for a moderate salary.

—Albert Buxton, of Norfolk, Va., requests all who have been connected with the Northwestern Christian College and who expect to attend the Minneapolis convention to communicate with him that a suburban trip may be arranged to the campus with a banquet.

—J. T. Boone, of Jacksonville, Fla., writes from Nashville, Tenn., announcing the death of Mrs. Church Anderson, a member of the First Church at Jacksonville, who died in Nashville, Thursday, Sept. 7. She had come to place her daughter in school at the latter place and was ill only a few days.

—C. H. Plattenburg has entered upon the fourth year of his second term as pastor of the church at Uniontown, Pa., having served the congregation in all six years, with a steady increase of membership, interest and salary. The organization at Uniontown is less than twelve years old and is an encouraging illustration of what can be done by the Disciples of Christ in the east. A new pipe organ has recently been placed in the church.

—The annual convention of the Christian churches of Kansas is being held this week with the church at Hutchinson. The programme, which we received too late to admit of publication when it would have done the most good, is a very excellent one. Wallace C. Payne, who recently took charge of the Bible Chair at Lawrence, gives an address on Bible Chair work and some Bible studies. John E. Pounds, of Cleveland, and A. McLean are among the speakers from outside the state. Baxter Waters gives an address on our literature.

—W. S. Houchins, after an absence of sixteen years in Australia and New Zealand, has returned to his native land. His work in Australia has been very successful. He brings the good wishes and confidence of the brethren there, and carries also their greetings to the Disciples of Christ in America, which he will formally present at an appropriate time. He has filled some of our best pulpits in the southern hemisphere and now desires work in this country. Mark Collis says that any church needing a wide-awake, earnest preacher will do well to write to Brother Houchins, whose present address is Bergin, Ky.

—The Minneapolis Convention committee has issued a large edition of a bulletin of information, a copy of which will be sent to each of our pastors. It is suggested that every pastor preach a convention sermon some time during September, and keep his congregation informed as to the progress of convention preparations by reading from his pulpit extracts from the bulletins and from the matter relative to the convention which is now appearing in our religious papers. By so doing, the congregations can be aroused and their interest in the convention maintained. We urge upon all preachers and others who receive postal inquiries from the committee in regard to preparations being made in their community to give prompt attention and full answers to same.

—We publish elsewhere, under the title "The Situation," a statement of the present condition of the Ministerial Relief Fund by its corresponding secretary, and urge the brethren not to allow anything—not even the approaching national convention and our common anxiety to reach the marks that have been set for the missionary collections—to over-shadow this matter. The work of the Board of Ministerial Relief, in making provision for our needy veterans, touches our family honor very closely. It is at once a matter of charity and obligation and privilege. Write to A. L. Orcutt, Indianapolis, Ind., about it; and while you are writing, just enclose that bill—a one or a five or a ten—which you have in your pocket now and had been intending to spend for some more or less unnecessary personal indulgence.

Eczema

How it reddens the skin, itches, oozes, dries and scales!

Some people call it tetter, milk crust or salt rheum.

The suffering from it is sometimes intense; local applications are resorted to—they mitigate, but cannot cure.

It proceeds from humors inherited or acquired and persists until these have been removed.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

positively removes them, has radically and permanently cured the worst cases, and is without an equal for all cutaneous eruptions.

HOOD'S PILLS are the best cathartic. Price 25 cents

—The Twenty-sixth Annual Convention of the Disciples of Christ in Virginia will be held at the Seventh Street Church, Richmond, Oct. 29-Nov. 1. Virginia hospitality of the original brand will be dispensed to all comers. The corresponding secretary urges all churches in the state to appoint delegates who will attend to the business of the convention, and not those who wish to make a pleasure trip to the city. This is important for any convention. Delegates should be appointed at once and furnished with proper credentials before they come to the convention, and the corresponding secretary, E. N. Newman, Box 161, Richmond, Va., should be notified in advance of the appointment of delegates. A large attendance is desired, and it is hoped that delegates will come prepared to make liberal offerings and large plans for the work.

—A. W. Kokendoffer writes concerning the Missouri convention: "All railroad lines centering in Mexico have made an open one fare for the round trip rate to the convention here Sept. 16 to 19. Let all delegates and visitors send names at once to P. W. Harding, Mexico, Mo. As chairman of the entertainment committee he will have assignments made and the card of assignment will be delivered each party at the church and not by mail. Do not expect reply to your communication, but you will be provided for here. Report to the committee at the church immediately upon your arrival. For the benefit of any who may prefer hotels, the Ringo House makes a $1.50 rate; the Windsor $1.25 and the Planters $1.00 per day. Remember, however, the people of Mexico furnish lodging and breakfast free and the ladies serve dinner and supper at 25 cents each. Meals will be served on Monday. Let there be a large gathering of the hosts."

—The missionary societies are approaching the critical point in their year's work. The fiscal year will close September 30, and all money which is intended to be credited on this year's receipts must be received by the corresponding secretary, F. M. Rains, Box 884, Cincinnati, O., on or before that date. The report for August shows a gain in regular receipts of $771.50 and a loss in annuities of $1,250 as compared with the same month last year, making a net loss of $478.50 for the month. Although the number of contributing churches, Sunday-schools and individuals for the month has decreased, there has been a gain in the amounts received from these sources, showing that the average contributions are higher. This is an encouraging feature even in the face of a net loss. But after all it is even more important to enlist a larger number of persons and churches in active participation in this work than it is to raise any fixed number of dollars. It is of primary importance that a larger number of the churches contribute, even if their contributions are small, and we cannot too strongly urge upon those who have delayed until now to send their contributions at once to the corresponding secretary.

THE CHRISTIAN - EVANGELIST
THREE MONTHS, 25c.

On Trial to New Subscribers.

—W. M. Taylor and wife, of Atlanta, Ga., sailed last week from New York for San Juan, Porto Rico, where they will succeed Bro. Erwin in missionary work —Frank H. Marshall writes: "Add-Ran University is booming. Building crowded the first day. We expect an increase of at least one hundred students over last year's enrollment."

—The church at Cameron, Texas, desires to employ a good, active pastor for the coming year at a salary of $800 or $1,000. Address W. A. Thomas, Cameron, Tex.

—It is reported that excellent progress is being made by the Church Street Christian Church of Jacksonville, Fla., since the fire. The audiences are good and the Sunday-school and Junior Endeavor are larger than they have ever been.

—E. F. Daugherty has resigned his churches at Lizton and New Brunswick, Ind., to enter the senior class of Yale Divinity School. E. E. Moorman has resigned his pastorate at Waveland for the same purpose. Mr. Daugherty is a graduate of Franklin College in '98 and Mr. Moorman of Butler in '99. Both have studied in Butler Bible College and took their M. A. degrees at Butler in 1900.

—The third year's report of the Christian Church at Hot Springs shows a net gain of 17 members during the past year and a present membership of 98. The remarkable feature of the work is that of the 98 members, 83 contributed to the support of the church and 72 of these made a definite pledge in advance and paid the same up in full during each quarter. There are few churches among us, we fear, that could show a roll of honor containing the names of 70 per cent. of their members who pledge and contribute regularly to the support of the church.

—The corner stone of the newly organized Second Christian Church of Springfield, Ill., was laid on Monday, Sept. 2. The address on that occasion was delivered by J. E. Lynn, pastor of the mother church of which the new congregation is a colony, and other ministers of the city participated in the exercises. The process by which this new congregation has come into existence, from the original recognition of the need of a congregation in a certain part of the city to the voluntary removal of a group of members to form a nucleus of the new congregation, has been a perfect model of the way in which the church ought to spread in the cities. There has been no split and no secession of dissatisfied members, and there can be no ungenerous rivalry between the two congregations through any striving of either to win away the members of the other. The church in Springfield, like the church in Jerusalem, is truly united as one church, though for convenience and efficiency of work it meets in two places.

—Concerning the new pastor at Fort Collins, Col., at which place he recently made a visit, H. O. Breeden, of Des Moines, writes as follows:

"Late in June the Church of Christ in Fort Collins located a new pastor in the person of W. J. Lockhart, a member of the class of 1901, Drake University. Almost immediately this church, which had passed through varying fortunes, began to awake to a new life. The audiences began to tax the capacity of the building. Every department of church work seemed to feel the hand of a master, and all sails began to fill and draw. The brilliant young pastor stepped quickly to a first place in the religious life of the town. The writer recently enjoyed the rare privilege of a visit to this prosperous church. He was entertained by his old friend and co-laborer, Dr. B. O. Aylesworth, for many years president of Drake University, and now president of the State Agricultural College of Colorado. One who moves much among the people of Colorado has no difficulty in believing all that is said of his popularity. He is a tower of strength to our cause in the state. On the third Lord's day in August President Aylesworth, Leonard G. Thompson, the corresponding secretary of the state convention, and the writer took part in a beautiful ordination and installation service in the Fort Collins church, wherein Brother Lockhart was set apart to the ministry and duly inducted into his high office as minister of the Church of Christ at Fort Collins. The exercises were very simple but very inspiring. After a splendid song service, augmented by a fine orchestra, the writer preached a sermon on 'A Vision of the Christ.' The charge to the church was delivered by Bro. Thompson, the charge to the pastor by Dr. Aylesworth, after which the ordination prayer was offered by the writer. Judge Mills a representative jurist of Colorado and an elder of that church, then made a tender and beautiful speech of recognition and acceptance on behalf of the congregation. All in all it was a most impressive and delightful service, presaging great things for the Fort Collins church, under its masterful leadership. W. J. Lockhart is one of the best equipped preachers, one of the finest thinkers and most forceful speakers Drake University has ever sent out to serve the Master and unless all signs fail he will make a conspicuous success of the work at Fort Collins."

The Christian-Evangelist Special.

The special arrangements which the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has made with the Burlington Route whereby those who desire to attend the Minneapolis convention may go in thoroughly congenial company, were endorsed by the Central Board of the Christian Church, of St. Louis, at the regular quarterly session of that body on Thursday of last week.

The Central Board is composed of the pastors and officers of all the congregations in St. Louis and the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST special thus becomes the official route from St. Louis to Minneapolis. One member from each congregation was appointed to assist in promoting interest and increasing attendance at the convention. The privileges of our special arrangements will not be confined to the brethren of St. Louis exclusively, however. We will welcome all, individuals, parties, or state delegations, who can arrange to join us at St. Louis or points en route.

We desire to know, approximately at least, how many to provide accommodations for. The Burlington Route stands ready to supply the necessary equipment whether that be one coach or an entire train. We are assured that it will be more than the first and would be pleased to make the latter a necessity.

The cost of transportation will be one fare for the round trip; this amounts to Sixteen Dollars from St. Louis and return. Those living away from St. Louis will buy their tickets at their nearest railway station through to Minneapolis and return, being careful to see that they are routed via St. Louis and the Burlington Route. A double berth in a standard sleeping car will cost $3 one way. Equally comfortable accommodations can be furnished in a Tourist Sleeping Car for one-half that amount, if enough reserve berths to justify the engaging of such a car. These Tourist Sleeping Cars afford as good service as the standard cars, but are not as elaborately and ornately finished. They are used in the celebrated California Excursions of the Burlington Route. By looking at the map it will be seen that the Burlington has two routes to Minneapolis. Our excursion goes via the west side route, through Clarksville, Louisiana, Hannibal, Quincy, Keokuk, Ft. Madison, Burlington, Cedar Rapids, Vinton, Cedar Falls, etc. We leave St. Louis on Wednesday, Oct. 9, at 2:05 P. M., Clarksville 4:14, Louisiana 4:35, Hannibal 5:15, Quincy 6:00, Keokuk 7:40, Ft. Madison 8:25, Burlington 9:00, Cedar Rapids 12:03 A. M., and arrive at Minneapolis at 8:05 A. M. on Thursday, Oct. 10. A very enjoyable trip is assured. Address communications to,

Those who have purchased and read The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century are most enthusiastic in their praise of the book. It should be borne in mind that this book is not merely a reprint of the articles that ran through the Christian-Evangelist during 1899. The several authors have completely revised, rewritten and amplified their contributions, adding a great deal of entirely new matter. We urge all our readers to send at once for this volume. It will give them a clearer and better understanding of the origin, growth and triumph of our cause than they can otherwise gain. Price, postpaid, $2.00. Christian Publishing Co

Texas Letter.

Considering the educational advantages of our great conventions, it is worth while for every church to see that its pastor attends them. Many preachers are not able to go, their meagre salaries, often only partially paid, will not permit it. But their churches are abundantly able to send them, and they ought to do it. It will make their preacher a stronger and better man, and thus they will be richly repaid.

Dr. T. F. Driskill, of Corsicana, is working hard to get a large delegation for Minneapolis, and he deserves and expects success.

Detroit has recently built a handsome house costing $3,500, and the fruitage of this sacrifice and enterprise is seen in a great meeting now in progress conducted by J. B. Sweeny and A. H. Darnell.

J. W. Lowber, one of our most successful pastors, has this to say about summer vacations for Texas preachers: "I do not believe a man can very well succeed in Texas cities who does not stand by his work during the hot months."

Sanders and Douthit have had a splendid meeting at Fate, with 40 additions, and almost money enough for a new house. These men seldom fail. The work was done in two weeks.

Ellsworth Faris, our young missionary to Africa, will enter the University of Chicago soon to spend a portion of his furlough in special work.

H. E. Luck, of Chicago, becomes pastor of the University church at Add-Ran, and will also teach in the school. Texas is happy to have him home again.

We people in the south are facing one of the most difficult and dangerous problems of the world. The negro has so changed in a single generation that he is no longer the staunch protector of our mothers, wives and daughters, that he was in the days of slavery, but is now, all over our land with increasing frequency, becoming their deadliest foe. Good men, white and black, are studying the problem, and of course their views vary. Here is what Bishop Turner of the African Methodist Church has to say on it:

"I am as much convinced as ever that African emigration would be best for the negro and best for the white man. There is an irresistible conflict between white and black that nothing but separation can put an end to. Our children are generated and nurtured under a malignant and misanthropic excitement that will wreck this country and make our civilization a hiss and a byword. And if it is a fact that the negro will not let white women alone, then white men owe it to their manhood and honor to get rid of him; and if they will open up a highway to Africa millions of the black race will go. Rather than shed so much blood, and possibly some innocent blood, you had better enact laws to brand these fools and scoundrels and crop their ears and banish them to Africa. If the country will turn over all these criminals that they are burning, hanging and shooting to merely brand their cheeks and carry them to Africa I will give the world another Rome and establish a country like Australia, which was founded and built up by English cutthroats and penal convicts."

C. McPherson, for years on the editorial staff of the Christian Courier, retires from the tripod. He says he did not do work enough on the paper to justify the title of editor.

D. A. Leak leaves Texas and the pulpit and enters the school room at Logansport, La.

The new house lately dedicated at Crockett costing $3,500 was "christened" with a meeting by Bros. Rial, Graves and Hamilton, and a church of 56 members was organized. W. H. Perry paid more than half the cost.

J. W. Marshall and T. E. Fitz have closed a meeting at Sumner's Mill with 45 additions.

R. C. Horn and Eugene Holmes have just held a meeting at Forest Grove with 26 additions.

S. K. Hallam is inaugurating his work at Denton with a meeting, Prof. W. T. Hamner leading the singing. Nineteen additions so far.

J. M. Campbell is pushing the work at El Paso. Audiences large with many additions and much talk of a new house.

J. B. Sweeny, of Gainesville, has closed his vacation of six weeks. He spent it evangelizing and had 205 additions.

G. H. Morrison is much interested in a new house for De Leon, and the indications are that it will be built.

An Historical Society.

It is proposed to call a meeting at the Minneapolis convention of all those interested in the organization of an historical society for the Disciples of Christ. The desirability and place for such a society will appear from the following considerations:

1. The people known as the Disciples of Christ are old enough to have a history.

2. They have accomplished enough to deserve a place in the history of American Christianity, and to merit a larger recognition in that history.

3. The fundamental principles of any religious movement are best understood in the light of their history.

4. It is time that some steps were being taken in preparation for the writing of such a history.

The service such a society can render will appear from the following considerations:

1. It could attempt the collection of the historical records and memorials of the Disciples. Many such records of priceless value, have already been lost, or are on the point of disappearing, with the passing away of the pioneers of the movement and the scattering of their libraries.

2. It could attempt the securing in writing of the memories of living men who were participants in many of the important events. These men are growing fewer every day and unless encouraged soon to commit the facts to writing will neglect it until too late.

3. It could collect from year to year the annual reports of national and state meetings, congresses, colleges, and file away the weekly or monthly issue of papers, to be put at the disposal of persons making inquiry into any field of our work or history.

4. It could preserve all these records in a library centrally located, which shall serve as a reference library for the future historian.

5. It should be composed of members conveniently distributed in different sections of the country, who would serve as the collectors and investigators for their respective sections.

6. It would stimulate interest in the history among all the churches, and promote its study among young men studying for the ministry.

7. It could prepare for a historical congress of the Disciples to be held on the one hundredth anniversary of the writing of the "Declaration and Address" in 1909.

All persons interested in such a society will please communicate with the undersigned, so that a call can be issued for a meeting at the national convention.

WHY?

Why do you, who live in the Mississippi Valley, send to New York, Boston, Philadelphia, or even to Chicago for a desired volume, when you can secure it much more quickly and just as cheap in St. Louis? This is a question that is very difficult to answer. We can supply you with any book that you wish—any respectable book, that is; French novels and blood-and-thunder-seven-buckets-of-gore-to-the-chapter romances are barred—no matter where or by whom published. Our business is by no means confined to the books we ourselves publish. Our catalogue contains only our own publications, in the main, but we can sell you any book you wish to purchase.

There will be another car. But the man can't wait. He chases the car and swings on, panting and hot, but satisfied. He keeps this gait up all day. He works that way, he lunches that way. He continues this until his stomach "breaks down" and nature compels him to "go slow."

Business men who have impaired their digestion by hasty eating will find in Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery a cure for dyspepsia and other diseases of the stomach and organs of digestion and nutrition. It does not give mere temporary relief, but it effects a radical cure. It strengthens the stomach, nourishes the nerves and purifies the blood.

"For six long years I suffered with my liver, kidneys, and with indigestion, which baffled the best doctors in our country," writes E. L. Ransell, Esq., of Woolsey, Prince William Co., Va. "I suffered with my stomach and back for a long time, and after taking a 'cart-load' of medicine from three doctors, I grew so bad I could hardly do a day's work. Would have death-like pains in the side, and blind spells, and thought life was hardly worth living. I began taking Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery and 'Pleasant Pellets,' as advised. Before I had taken half of the second bottle I began to feel relieved. I got six bottles and used them, and am happy to say I owe my life to Dr. Pierce and his medicines."

Missouri State Bible-School Notes.

The Lincoln county meeting was not only remarkable in its giving to Lincoln county missions, but likewise in its support of state Bible-school work, not less than ten of the schools agreeing to keep rally day and make an offering to this work. Every one of W. H. Hobbs' churches will observe the day and meet their apportionments, as has been true in the past, while Troy, as the county seat, under G. F. Assiter and Mrs. Birdie Shelton will lead the way.

The school work at Louisiana is growing right along and Knox P. Taylor is to give them a two weeks' institute and meeting in October, during which the rally will be held. F. A. Mayhall should be proud of his work there.

Sixty-five schools are going to keep the rally day, and we want to hear from at least 35 more and want you to be free to order what you want.

With our notices for the second quarter will go sample programs of our rally day, Oct. 7, and we want you to bring it before your cabinet and join us in making it one of the happiest days in the history of your school.

Two Mile, Montgomery, were ready for work when the time came, so that, dry and unfavorable as it seemed, the day was a happy one in the service of Christ. Think of their sending eight miles for two barrels of drinking water and paying for it, too, and you will see some of their difficulties. But my happiness was complete when the brethren and friends kindly gave me one-third more than was asked of them. The general improvement of the school under Bro. Hill has been remarkable and deserves all the praise that was given it that day.

Paynesville has for years followed the true course, all the offerings of the school going to missions and benevolence, while the membership of the church supports the school, and this accounts for their giving us $30 a year, making our work a specialty as M. D. Dudley, J. O. Walton and the school do. Is there another school in Missouri so doing? Is it not the proper way to do?

The Pike county meeting at Bowling Green was fine, the reports from the schools most encouraging, the leadership of S. W. Marr inspiring, the entertainment by the church exceptional. Every school in Pike but one gave to our work last year, while I had the same glad assurance for this, but Frankford and Mrs. W. S. Worsham head the list, paying their part in full, and all are loud in compliments of W. P. Dorsey and his work among them and for them.

To one and all, we aim to send sufficient rally programs for each one participating and some extras for the superintendent, but if you sometimes wish more write us and they will be sent. Again, while we would like all schools to observe the same day, you may find it better to keep another day in the month, that your minister may be with you, and if so, report to us when the rally is held and make us full report of same.

What the One Fare Rate Means.

Now that the Central Passenger Association has granted our First Twentieth Century Missionary Convention the one fare round trip rate, following the example of the Western Passenger Association, it behooves our membership to proceed at once to make the best use of these concessions. Nearly a million of our membership are within this territory. The railroads of these associations extend over the region from Duluth to Buffalo, thence south through Pittsburg, and Cincinnati south to the Gulf including Tennessee, Alabama and Mississippi, thence to Galveston, thence north to Kansas City and along the Missouri river to Omaha, Sioux City, etc., to Minneapolis. The adjoining territory is more or less affected by the rates so granted, and action by these two great associations influences and sometimes forces the lines east and west of same to act likewise.

The Minneapolis committee will present the action of the Western and Central Associations to the Eastern Trunk Lines, to the Trans-Missouri Association, and to the Transcontinental lines, asking of them also the one fare rate, so that in time every road in the United States can be quoted as granting the one fare rate.

In the concrete this one fare rate means about as follows: Round trip to Minneapolis and back, from:

Atlanta, Ga.	$32.80
Chattanooga, Tenn.	28.70
Cincinnati, O.	19.50
Cleveland, O.	21.50
Columbus, O.	19.85
Chicago, Ill.	11.50
Des Moines, Ia.	8.00
Detroit, Mich.	19.25
Dallas, Tex.	28.05
Indianapolis, Ind.	16.50
Kansas City, Mo.	13.55
Louisville, Ky.	19.50
Nashville, Tenn.	24.20
Pittsburg, Pa.	22.00
Omaha, Neb.	10.65
Peoria, Ill.	11.75
Springfield, Ill.	13.05

As the foregoing is taken from Minneapolis tariff sheets, the same may vary a dollar or more from the rate quoted.

Tickets will be good coming to Minneapolis on Oct. 8, 9, 11 and 13 in central territory, to be so regulated as to reach the western territory not later than Oct. 14, and from western territory Oct. 9, 10, 12 and 14, and from Trans-Missouri territory Oct. 8, 9 and 10. Tickets will be good leaving Minneapolis not earlier than Oct. 10, nor later than Oct. 19, but may be extended to Oct. 31, by depositing with joint agent.

A 25 cent charge will be made for validating tickets and a 50 cent fee for depositing to secure extensions.

Tickets are for continuous passage going and coming.

Where the round trip is less than $4.50 local excursion tickets will be used (and need not be deposited or validated).

As it will be good policy to have every ticket or station agent familiar with these rates, and the nature and scope of our convention, we wish every reader of this article to make inquiry of his local ticket agent for further information on all matters, and use the occasion to tell him everything you know about your first Twentieth Century Missionary Convention. If so interested and informed, local station agents throughout the United States will help in adding a large increase to our attendance. Therefore, my beloved brethren, interest your local railroad ticket agents, and it will not be a waste of time to talk to conductors, brakemen and switchmen.

The application for the one fare of the Central Passenger Association was made to the June meeting, and refused by its granting the one fare "plus $2.00" rate instead. Some of the general passenger agents explain their action by stating that the action of the Western Association in granting the one fare rate was so unusual as to be considered a mistake.

The rehearing of our application for the one fare rate was taken up by the Central Association at its July meeting, and was wonderfully strengthened by the personal work with general passenger agents on the part of a number of our brethren, including Bros. Benj. L. Smith and John L. Shuff, of Cincinnati, Howard Cale, of Indianapolis, W. H. McClain, of St. Louis, C. W. Huffer and L. A. Warren, of Toledo, S. H. Bartlett and Harris R. Cooley, of Cleveland and Dr. C. Evans, of Pittsburg. Others probably assisted, but from them we have no report.

There are few, if any, general passenger agents of the Western and Central Passenger Associations that have not been informed by letter and also by word of mouth of our First Twentieth Century Missionary Convention, and it will be amusing if these high salaried gentlemen reverse the custom heretofore prevailing and awake our churches to the realization that the twentieth century is here and the first great convention of our Christian churches in the century is to be in Minneapolis.

Our transportation committee and railroad advisers say that they will confess their incapacity for transportation problems, if these autocrats of the railroad traffic do not put their traveling and district agents at work to secure the largest possible attendance for our convention.

Our transportation committee is making these suggestions to transportation committees or leaders:

1. At the earliest moment thoroughly plan your work.
2. Formulate early, and ever have ready, all the various and wonderful reasons why delegates should go to the First Twentieth Century Missionary Convention.
3. Canvass each church, Christian Endeavor society and Sunday-school in every possible way. Invent ways.
4. Give your secular press and religious journals brief notices or bulletins of our convention, its attractions, etc., and tell what your committee is doing.
5. Discreetly and continuously cultivate the acquaintance of all railroad agents, and convert them to an abiding faith in our convention. Keep them all posted all summer long. Immerse them in missions.
6. Select not until August, and if possible not until September, the railroad route for any special excursion or train. This takes nerve on the part of the committee, but produces the best results.

Give this matter your immediate attention, think deeply of the questions as an entirety, and act worthy of the cause of Christ and in keeping with the faith so often shown by our missionary leaders. Make our transportation committee your confidant.

Write to us for help, and we will give you our best co-operation.

Lost, Strayed or Stolen.

By a conservative estimate, there are in the city of St. Louis as many members of the Christian Church unidentified with any congregation as there are with their names on our church books. Most of these have moved in from other places and have neglected to bring letters. Some have been entirely lost to the church, some have strayed into other folds, and some have been stolen away by the worldly enticements of a great city.

All churches having members removing to St. Louis are requested to send information concerning them, names, addresses, capabilities in church, etc., to the undersigned. This request is made by all the congregations of the city co-operating through the Central Board of the Christian Church.

When the information requested is received, the pastor of the nearest congregation will be promptly notified and the new arrival will be looked after. If you love your departing brethren and are interested in taking our great cities for Christ, do not read this lightly and then neglect our request.

Nebraska Ministerial Institute.

This is a day of specialization and we, as preachers, cannot afford to ignore the expectations of our time. The gospel minister must be a man of broad culture, without which he will be unable to reach a large portion of those who hear him, but he must also be a master of his specialty—man and God's message of salvation to him. Man and Christ must always be the special study of the preacher of the gospel.

It has been the effort for some time upon the part of some of our progressive Nebraska preachers to organize a summer institute where our ministers and other Christian workers might assemble for two or three weeks to make an earnest study of the word and the art of reaching humanity with it, under the leadership of able teachers.

Bro. R. A. Schell, of Hebron, as the president of our association, did most excellent work in procuring the services of our brother, C. A. Young and also President W. P. Aylsworth, of Cotner University. Every forenoon was devoted, from 8 to 12 o'clock, to lectures by these brethren, Bro. Young lecturing upon the Life of Christ and Prophecy, and Bro. Aylsworth upon Homiletics and Pastoral Theology. The afternoon was given over to study and bearing some one upon some special topic of interest. During the last day of the institute reports were made by individuals who had read books assigned by Bro. Young. The verdict of the 25 who attended and studied during the two weeks was in favor of another similar gathering next year. Bro. Young won a royal place in our hearts through his strong and spiritual teaching, while Bro. Aylsworth, whom we have loved for years, became even more endeared to us through his sympathetic and able instruction in the arts of preaching and pastoral service. Christ was held before us constantly by both teachers. Work is already begun upon our institute for next year.

Nodaway Valley Convention.

The eleventh annual convention of the Christian churches of Nodaway Valley district was held in Tarkio, Mo., Aug. 27-29. There were about one hundred delegates enrolled. The convention opened with a sermon by C. M. Chilton, of St. Joseph, and closed with one by O. W. Lawrence, of Maryville. President J. W. Ellis, of Albany, gave two Bible studies during the convention.

The address of welcome was made by the pastor, H. B. Elmore, and the response by J. P. Davis, of Burlington Junction. Addresses were also made by T. A. Abbott, G. L. Peters, of Mound City, C. C. Smith, of Cincinnati, and Miss Mattie Burgess, of St. Joseph. An excellent session of the C. W. B. M. was presided over by Mrs. J. W. Ray, of Maryville. Two admirable declamations were given by Miss Edith Boyer, of Grand Rapids, Mich. All the addresses of the convention were of a high order. T. W. Cottingham was again employed as district evangelist, this being his sixth engagement by the district. The next convention will be held in Stanberry. A good sprinkling of business men was in attendance, such as I. R. Williams, of Savannah, A. F. Still, of Burlington Junction, and A. C. Frisbie, of Stanberry. The brethren of Tarkio treated us royally. The church there is doing good work under F. B. Elmore.

It was pleasant to meet with the veteran W. T. Maupin, of Oregon, and the hopeful faces of many of the younger brethren, such as Charles Beale H. E. Blanchard, H. W. Harris and Jesse Gresham, of Fairfax. Prof. Butler, the blind singer of Mound City, was present, and rendered efficient service, as did also Mrs. H. W. Hurst, of Tarkio, with her singing. Upon the whole this was unanimously decided to be one of the very best district conventions.

Ohio Letter.

Bellefontaine was so well pleased with E. S. Muckley that they have kept in the family and have called his brother-in-law, W. T. Groom, from Wabash, Ind., who began his work Sept. 1. His first pastorate was in Ohio, at Carthage. The church is to be congratulated.

The churches of Licking county held their yearly meeting this year at Outville with the York street church. John E. Pounds, of Cleveland, and J. A. Lord, of Cincinnati, were the speakers. There was a good attendance and excellent sermons. Two ladies confessed Christ—one 67 years old.

Bro. and Sister Bates, of Newark, have been called to part with one of their precious little ones. The little boy was only eight months old. Their many friends will sympathize deeply with them in their bereavement, but the comfort in Christ is sufficient. When this is read Bro. Bates will have taken up his work with the Warren church. H. Newton Miller, recently of the chair of English in Bethany College, will take the work at Newark at once.

Charles W. Huffer, of the Central Church, in Toledo, and Charles A. Freer, of the Franklin avenue church in Columbus, will exchange in a twelve days' meeting, designed for rallying and reviving purposes this fall. The Columbus meeting will be held Oct. 28-Nov. 8, and the Toledo meeting Nov. 18-29.

The annual convention of the first district will be held next week, Sept. 17-18 at the Grove church, near Gambier. The program is a good one and ought to draw a good attendance.

Wiley Brown, of Indianapolis, has been spending his vacation in Ohio, preaching at Violet chapel in Fairfield county and also on Sunday at the Franklin Avenue church in Columbus. His sermons are highly commended.

Missouri Mission Notes.

There are some messages that leave a sweetness in the mouth, a joy in the heart, and a pleasure in the remembrance, that is past telling. Such an one is this:

"CANTON, Mo., Sept. 2, 1901.

DEAR BROTHER ABBOTT:—Took our state mission offering here yesterday and raised $50. Will try to make it $60 and bring it to the convention.

Yours fraternally,

DAVIS ERRETT."

I saw Bro. Errett ten days ago at the Ralls County meeting, and he promised me to present state missions on the following Lord's day to his people. This is the result. There are ever so many preachers throughout the state, who, in the last month, have given me their promise that they would do the same thing. If they do we will be able to make such a report at Mexico as will make everybody enthusiastically glad.

The work in the field has been splendidly done by the faithful men employed. It only remains now for the financial part to be brought to the front for us to make a great report. This is the last time I can reach you at all before the convention. We hope inside of the next ten days to receive $1,000. We need it; we must have it; the Lord's business demands it; his work calls for it. Surely it will come.

The prospects are good for the best convention we have had in recent years in Missouri. The railroads have granted us a rate of one fare for the round trip. You buy your ticket right into Mexico. Be sure to go to your agent three or four days before you want to start and ask him about his instructions. Tell him his railroad has authorized a rate of one fare, and if he says he has not received these instructions, ask him to inquire at headquarters for them. It has been a hard struggle to secure this rate, now let us make the best use of it. If the agent has no instructions and will not sell you a ticket to Mexico, buy to the nearest point on a direct road to Mexico, taking his receipt, and if the agent at the junction point will not sell you a round trip ticket for one fare, pay him full fare and take his receipt, and so on till you get to Mexico. Take a receipt every time you pay money unless you get the round trip for one fare. Be sure that you do this.

T. A. ABBOTT.

The Situation.

Until the last month of the missionary year, individuals and churches have continued to push back the contribution to Ministerial Relief for other interests. Does this mean that it has been pushed from the year's consideration? July 1, when we made the present quarter's payment, we had to borrow. In twenty-five days another quarter's payment will be due, and unless somebody's heart opens to this cause, we will not be able to make that payment in full.

There are fifty-two persons and their dependents looking to this board for help. When you remember, brethren, that none of these receive more than $25 per quarter, and that some of them have no other source of income, and then think that the winter is coming on, and that they will need food, clothing and fuel, it does seem to me that your hearts would be opened to meet these demands. When you are preparing to have your homes comfortable for the coming winter, do not forget the fathers and mothers who are dependent upon you. These are a part of the family to be provided for. A conscience void of offense before God is an essential to the soul's comfort.

Can Christian people who are blessed with an abundance, be really happy while they know those to whom they owe so much are suffering for life's necessities? I do not so think of my brethren. I want to commend many individuals and churches who have taken both interest and delight in this work. Some have been liberal contributors.

Brethren in Christ, do not compel us, your servants in this ministry, to reduce the meager assistance we are now giving these worthy old saints, but wake up your Christian liberality, and let us have sufficient for the demands made upon us. Others whom we have never helped are asking for aid, but we have had no promise for them. We ought to hear from a thousand individuals and churches before Sept. 30, at which time the books will be closed for the first year of the twentieth century. Will your name be written therein, and your good deed recorded above? The Lord calls, who will answer? Remit to Howard Cale, 120 E. Market St., Indianapolis, Ind.

No Hay Fever in Northern Michigan.

Why stay at home and sneeze, and be generally miserable when you can get relief in a few hours by going to Petoskey, Bay View, Charlevoix, Traverse City or Harbor Springs, the great Michigan resorts?

The expense is not much to get there, and hotel rates are reasonable. September is a delightful month up north, and the train service of the Pere Marquette Route with through sleeping cars from Michigan Central Station, Chicago, at 7:30 P. M., every day but Sunday, affords quick transit from the land of heat and sneezes to the refreshing breezes from Lake Michigan, free from dust and microbes.

There is also a through sleeper from St. Louis at 12:30 P. M., via the Illinois Central R. R.

Ask your home ticket agent about the rates and a Pere Marquette Resort folder, or send to H. F. Moeller, General Passenger Agent at Detroit, Mich., for one.

Bedford, Sept. 7.—I was called here last Sunday to continue the pastorate indefinitely. The work is hard but refreshing and pleasant. I have accepted. There is enough of evangelistic work in the city and county to keep a man busy all the time. We had a splendid addition by confession last Sunday. Bro. R. W. The sowers and reapers, we believe, will rejoice in January together.—JAMES SMALL.

Eighty-five were enlisted in the Master's service, 40 by baptism, 20 from the world and sectarianism, and 25 from the old disbanded congregation. Fulton, Sept. 9.—Bro. A. W. Kokendoffer, of Mexico, held us a short meeting at Richland. At our regular meeting Sunday one young lady made the confession.—FRANK J. NICHOLS.

Macon, Sept. 9.—Our missionary rally closed last night. This is the first for the church at Macon. In fact but little has been done here in missions. Our offering was $135, more than we expected under the circumstances. We have recently added another room to our church, altered our pulpit and moved baptismal pool, so that our house is much more convenient. Recently a Junior society was organized, and during the rally a C. W. B. M. auxiliary. Two additions the first Lord's day. Everything is being made ready for our meeting in October. Bro. J. V. Coombs preaches the word and Chas. Marvin sings it.—W. S. LOCKHART.

Alfred Munyon is in a tent meeting at Bucklin, two weeks old, with 18 additions; good interest and attention.—JESSE ROBERTS.

Ridgeway, Sept. 9.—Our meeting at Blythedale closed with a fine interest up to the last. Twenty-three additions. One man baptized who is 68 years of age. Bro. W. H. Hook, of Bethany, ministers to this church. I am assisting Bro. Sears in a meeting here, which starts off nicely.—MORGAN MORGANS.

Carmel congregation was organized last February with 31 members. We have no regular preaching but meet twice a month in the Presbyterian church to break bread, and have a Bible school that meets every Lord's day. The

The meeting continued for two weeks and fifteen souls were added to the church by confession. The house was filled with hearers at every service and much Christian enthusiasm and zeal were manifested by the people. Bro. Kemper's excellent sermons were appreciated by all who heard them.—Y. M. MINOKUCHI, Lexington, Ky.

Deafness Cannot be Cured
by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

The Spiritual Side of Our Plea

By A. B. JONES

This new volume is a notable contribution to a better understanding of the spiritual significance and value of our Reformatory Movement. It accentuates a side of our plea which has been too much neglected by many. It deals, in a profound manner, characteristic of its author, with such questions as "The Letter and the Spirit," "The Real and the Formal," "Alexander Campbell on Remission of Sins," "The Word and the Spirit," and "Righteousness and Law." The views herein expressed are the result of long and mature deliberation by one of the clearest thinkers and writers in our ranks.

The Reformation of The XIXth Century

A Series of Historical Sketches, dealing with the Rise and Progress of the Religious Movement inaugurated by Thomas and Alexander Campbell, from its Origin to the close of the Nineteenth Century.

Edited by J. H. Garrison

This great work, which has been eagerly awaited for some time, is now ready for delivery. It is truly a notable work—a splendid addition to the literature of the Disciples of Christ. It is the only complete and modern history of the current reformation, and therefore should at once find a place in the home of every earnest and zealous Disciple.

This history is divided into eight periods, as follows:

Introductory Period	- - - - -	Chas. Louis Loos.
Period of Organization	- - - - -	B. B. Tyler.
The Turbulent Period	- - - - -	W. T. Moore.
The Transition Period	- - - - -	T. W. Grafton.
Period of Revival of Home Missions	- - - - -	Benj. L. Smith
Period of Foreign Missions	- - - - -	A. McLean.
Period of Woman's Work	- - - - -	Lois A. White
Lessons from Our Past	- - - - -	J. H. Garrison.

Chas. Louis Loos was personally and intimately acquainted with the fathers of the reformation, and associated with them in their work. His statement of the origin of our movement, and of its early connection with the Baptists, is the most satisfactory which has yet been made. B. B. Tyler has for many years been an untiring student of the history of our movement. W. T. Moore was an active and prominent participant in the events of the period beginning with 1861. His sketch of Alexander Campbell is a masterpiece, and is alone worth the price of the book. T. W. Grafton, in his "Life of Alexander Campbell," and "Men of Yesterday" has shown his ability as an able historian. Benj. L. Smith, A. McLean and Miss White have been most conspicuously identified with the enterprises of which they write. The closing section, by J. H. Garrison, is the address delivered by him at the Jubilee Convention in Cincinnati, October, 1899.

"The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century" is a handsome volume of 514 pages, bound in cloth. It is an addition to that list of books which, whatever other books he may have, every earnest Disciple of Christ should possess. This history is not only a volume full of facts and information, but a story of absorbing interest.

"And I the black!" three sparrows said—
Three sparrows of the town.

"Tu-whit! Tu-whoo!" an old owl cried,
From the belfry in the town;
"Glad-hearted lassies need not mind
If the locks be gold, black, brown.

"Tu-whit! Tu-whoo! so fast, so fast,
The sands of life run down,
And soon, so soon, three white-haired dames
Will totter through the town.

"Gone then for aye, the raven locks,
The golden hair, the brown,
And she will fairest be whose face
Has never worn a frown!"

Ants.

Harvey Sutherland writes in Ainslee's Magazine about Ants, and gives much curious information in his own unique style. Like the rest of us, he says, "Ants have a sweet tooth. Now, honey is produced by very many plants in their blossoms, but not for ants. Flowers advertise quite extensively, but only for flying customers. They hang out bright colors and bunch themselves together so that any bee or butterfly that is not totally blind may find them. In the case of the rhododendron they even go so far as to announce, 'This way to the bar.' For the evening trade they dress in white and are strongly perfumed. Bees and butterflies and such like crawl in, all bedaubed with pollen from other flowers of the same kind, and thus the plants are cross-fertilized, but ants and crawling things climb up and suck honey from a clover and then go to the next plant, which may not be a clover at all, and so the flower has wasted its honey and its pollen all for nothing. That is, it would if it let the ants do as they wanted. But it doesn't. When an ant comes around all the honey-bearing flowers shake their heads and say, 'Nothing for you—not today. No, no; go on away. Get out now, or I'll set the dog on you.' Some defend their blossoms with regular chevaux de frise of bristles and stickers; some make stems gummy and hairy; some, like the snapdragon, shut up so tight that an ant cannot get in and make the flower stalk so dingle-dangling and so slippery that the ant falls off. Some open early and close early, knowing that bees rise betimes while ants are notorious slug-a-beds. But that there is a determined purpose to boycott the ants is evident from the fact that amphibious plants when they grow in the water where emmets cannot get to them omit the defenses they throw up when they grow on the land.

On the other hand, some plants, recognizing the fact that ants are great for destroying worms and caterpillars, set out a kind of cheap lunch for them on the under side of the leaves. The acacia even goes so far as to grow hollow thorns as company houses for the ants, as well as furnishing them sweet syrup. But I think the smartest trick of all is played by the melampyrum pratense. It knew that the soil on an ant hill was more than usually fertile and well stirred up, so it sat with its head in its hands for a long time and thought out this plan of action: 'Ants like honey. I'll squeeze out a little for them. They think the world and all of their young ones. I'll make my seeds look like their cocoons, and more than that, I'll make them smell like their cocoons. They'll carry 'em under ground, and when spring comes they'll sprout.' It worked like a charm, and you will find the melampyrum pratense growing on ant hills where no other plant is allowed. It looks like a low-down trick to play, but where there is so much competition it doesn't do to be too particular.

"There is a lot that is human about these little ants. They like to play and cut up; they make believe to fight, and when they wrestle in fun they roll all around like school-boys. They wash and brush each other and stretch out under the process as much as to say, 'My! that feels good!' When they sleep they often lie on their sides, and sometimes squat down on their abdomen and the last pair of legs, for all the world like a man taking a nap. When they wake up they gape and stretch themselves, and all but say, 'Ho hum!' They always wash themselves and comb their hair as soon as they get up, and that without having to be told like some little persons I know, but will not name here.

"They are like us in keeping pets about the house. Andre counted 584 species of insects, nearly all of them beetles, that are habitually to be found in ants' nests. They must be there with their consent, for an interloper is instantly killed. Some of them are milch-cattle, like the aphides, such as caterpillars that give syrup and the little blind beetle claviger, which secretes honey from a tuft at the base of its wings. If one of these clavigers is put into the nest of strange ants they fall upon it and slaughter it at once. Some kinds of wood lice are kept as scavengers, and the silverfish or bristletail and the larva of the elater beetle are handy to have around to do the heavy digging under the supervision of the workers. Many of these domesticated animals are unable to feed themselves. Lespes saw some ants eating sugar. A Lomechusa of their nest came up and nuzzled them till they fed it. Afterward it climbed up on the lump of sugar, but did not seem to know how to get the good of it for itself. But also there are pets about which are as useless as a pug-dog, if another such a thing in the universe can be imagined. The little Stenamma Westwoodii pranks about in the hills of Formica rufa and F. pratensis. It runs along with them, jumps on their backs and takes a ride, and, if for any reason the nest is removed, they go along.

"Then there is another little ant in these nests that is by no means a pet. It digs its galleries in the partitions so small that the big ants cannot get in to kill them. Every once in a while a Salenopsis fugax darts out, snatches up a baby and runs with it into its den, where it eats it up. It is as if we had cannibal dwarfs lurking in the walls and now and then carrying off one of the children to be devoured at horrid banquets behind the plastering.

"But if we begin calling hard names we might as well keep it up and admit first at last that all ants are cannibals and feed not only on other kinds of ants, but even upon their own species, when they are not of the same household. They capture and carry off the eggs, larvae and pupae of other nests, and what they do not have for dinner to-day they fatten for to-morrow. It is supposed that in this way they got into the habit of keeping slaves. The young captive ants came out of their cocoons, and, being naturally industrious, they bustled about and gave the babies their nimmy-nimmy when they cried for it, swept the floor and carried in the coal till the approving workers of the captors began to talk to each other like this: 'That fusca is a handy little thing about the house. Seems a kind of a pity to kill her when we got so much fresh meat on hand, and right in the busy season when help is hard to get. She's so good to the children, too. Let's keep her a while. What do you say?' And then when it was decided to put off butchering day they went to fusca and said, 'Fusca, we've concluded not to kill you for a spell yet. You can stay around and do up the work, but mind, if there are any complaints about you, or the children are neglected, or you give any of your back talk—Well, there'll be fresh meat for supper, do you understand?'

"And fusca dropped a curtsy and made answer: 'Yaiss, missy. T'ank yo', missy. Ah'll do de bes' Ah kin.' (It is almost needless to say that F. fusca is a black ant.)

"F. sanguineas can do their own work, and often do not keep slaves at all, but they are little thought of in ant circles. The real nobility and gentry are Polyergus rufescens and Polyergus lucidus. Work? They work? No, indeed! You don't see them demeaning themselves building and minding the children, collecting food or even feeding themselves, if you please. When the nest is changed they do not set foot to the ground: they are carried by slaves. They have always been accustomed to having help about the house. But they can fight. Their mandibles are fit only to crush other ants' heads. Huber put thirty of them in a box with honey and a lot of their larvae and pupae. What followed reminds one of the stories of the South in the Reconstruction period. They walked around, picked up the children in an awkward way as if they knew something ought to be done, they couldn't just remember what, and laid them down again. There was honey over there that ought to be served. You, Pomp! Where is that black rascal at? But there was no Pompey, and they fell to pining for the days befo' the waw. They made them no dwelling. Half of them died of starvation. Then Huber put in a single black ant. Dinah, I think her name was, or Aunt Debby, I won't be sure which; and she began to do about. She built a house and attended to the children, helped the young ants out of their cocoons and fed and groomed the old ones till they were once more able to go about discoursing on the 'eentellaictual eenfe'-io'ity of the niggro, sah'!

"Ants have cemeteries, and it is characteristic of them that the slaves are not buried with their masters, but in another place, over by the back fence among the ragweeds and burdocks."

The Runaway.

A little white cloud was sailing high;
A little white cloud in the wide blue sky.

She hurried along, nor dared to stay;
This little white cloud was running away.

The sun went down and the stars came out;
The little cloud saw them all about.

And they frightened her so, the shining train,
She cried herself into a shower of rain.

—Harriet Brewer Sterling.

The Boy who had no Chance.

"You feel proud, don't you, Dick?"

"I feel glad," said Dick, simply.

Of course he feels glad. And proud, too, if he felt like owning it, but it's the right kind of pride. Here is one that feels proud, and is quite ready to say it.

A plainly dressed, sweet-faced woman was holding Dick's hand in a close grasp. The kindly faces surrounding her showed by their sympathy that they warmly acknowledged her right to be proud, for most of them knew through what struggles her son had reached this day when he had stood as valedictorian in the graduating class of the High School.

Herbert Barnes, the first speaker, stood a little to one side, gazing on what was going on about him with half indifferent amusement.

"It is a great thing for Dick," he remarked to a companion. "At least he thinks so. He has a fancy that a high-school diploma is the open sesame to all the big things in the world."

"It's a good deal of help up, isn't it? I mean, the education that it stands for."

"Oh, I suppose so—to boys who need that sort of a thing. Now, I don't, you know. I can get along without it."

"I dare say you can," said the other, who knew that Herbert had been quietly dropped out of the school about six months before for poor scholarship.

"Yes, I'm in for business now, and Latin and 'ologies don't count much there. I have a good chance ahead of me, you know. My uncle is going to give me a clerkship in his big business. It's a fine thing to have a pull. I can soon work up and get to the top."

"Yes, you're a lucky fellow," said the other, regarding him rather enviously.

"Now, I don't see any chance for Dick," went on Herbert. "He's as poor as a church mouse, and hasn't an influential friend in the world, so far as I've heard. No, not a bit of a chance."

"Not a bit of a chance" it sometimes seemed to Dick as he sought employment in the place where he lived. Plenty of good friends he had, but the demand for intelligent employment was limited, and he had a great desire to remain near his widowed mother.

So it came about that within a few weeks after the proud commencement day Herbert stopped in surprise to speak to a boy who was bravely wrestling with some heavy packing cases at the alley entrance to his uncle's store.

"You here, Dick?" he said.

"Looks like me, doesn't it?" said Dick, pausing to take a long breath.

"You don't mean you're doing this kind of work?"

"That's just what I am. A fellow that can't get what he wants must take what he can get."

"But—isn't it pretty tough?"

"Rather, at first. But I'm going to give my muscles a training now."

"A porter, after all his fine study, and the fuss made over his graduation," remarked Herbert to the young man near the desk at which he worked a little and idled a good deal. "Poor chap," half contemptuously, "I'm afraid he's going to find, as I said before, that it takes something besides a high-school diploma to boost a fellow up."

Dick brought the same earnest, conscientious effort to his subordinate position that he had always given to his studies. At first he ached cruelly under the unaccustomed physical strain, but before long the rebellious muscles obeyed the demand on them, furnishing a good bodily foundation on which to build such mental effort as might in future be demanded.

And the demand came in good time to the boy who had "no chance" except that built upon faithful effort.

"I am told there was a light in the basement all night," said Mr. Seymour on coming to his place of business one cold morning. "Who knows anything about it?"

He was referred to Dick Woodbury.

"A load of that tropical fruit came from the station just as I was leaving," explained Dick. "I told the drayman everything was locked up for the night, and we couldn't receive it; but he said they couldn't put it anywhere it wouldn't freeze. So I got into the basement and made a fire."

"And you stayed here all night?"

"Yes, it needed an even temperature."

Mr. Seymour had his own opinion of an employe who, in the seeking of his employer's interests, did more than he was hired to do. It was not long after this that Herbert was surprised at seeing Dick at one of the desks in the same office with himself.

There he remained for a long time. Longer than would suit the maker of sensational stories of the rapid advancement of poor boys. In real life the crowding for place is too pressing for rapid promotion. But in the years in which Dick worked hard for what might be thought moderate pay he was steadily building up a character for integrity and reliability which in time found the place of trust which awaits the trustworthy.

Herbert still remains at his desk, relying on his well-off father to supply him with what he can not earn, and the boy who had "no chance"—except the chance always belonging with energy, perseverance and godly living—now in charge of an important branch of the business, writes out the checks for his monthly pay.—Sydney Dayre in Herald and Presbyterian.

Two gentlemen walking together came by a stately new building. "What a magnificent structure!" said one.

"Yes," replied the other; "but I cannot bear to look at it often as I pass it."

"That is strange; why not?"

"Because it reminds me that the owner built it out of the blood, the aches, and the groans of his fellow men—out of the grief of crying children, the woe of wailing women."

"Heavens! What is he? Saloon-keeper? Money Shark?"

"Oh no. He's a dentist."

What Becomes of the Ox.

But one-third of the weight of an ox is of such material that it can be eaten, yet not one bit of it is thrown away. What is done with the two-thirds was explained in a recent periodical, from which the facts are taken. The blood of the animal is used in refining sugar and sizing paper, or it is manufactured into door-knobs and buttons. The hide goes to the tanner; horns and hoofs are transformed into combs and buttons. The thigh bones, worth $80 per ton, are cut into handles for clothes-brushes. The foreleg bones sell for $30 a ton for collar buttons, parasol handles, and jewelry; the water in which the bones are boiled is reduced to glue; the dust from sawing the bones is food for cattle and poultry; the smallest bones are made into boneblack.

Each foot yields a quarter of a pint of neat's-foot oil; the tail goes to the "soup," while the brush or hair at the end of the tail is sold to the mattress-maker. The choicer parts of the fat make the basis of butterine; the intestines are used for sausage casings, or are bought by gold beaters. The undigested food in the stomach, which formerly cost the packers of Chicago $30,000 a year to remove and destroy, is now made into paper. All scraps unfit for any other use find welcome in the glue pot, or are employed by the farmers as fertilizers.—Young America.

Knowledge of Food.

Proper Selection of Great Importance in Summer.

The feeding of infants is a very serious proposition, as all mothers know. Food must be used that will easily digest, or the undigested parts will be thrown into the intestines and cause sickness.

It is important to know that a food can be obtained that is always safe; that is Grape-nuts.

A mother writes: "My baby took the first premium at a baby show on the 8th inst., and is in every way a prize baby. I have fed him on Grape-Nuts since he was five months old. I also use your Postum Food Coffee for myself." Mrs. L. F. Fishback, Alvin, Tex.

Grape-Nuts food is not made solely for a baby food by any means, but is manufactured for all human beings who have trifling, or serious difficulties in the stomach and bowels.

One especial point of value is that the food is predigested in the process of manufacture, not by any drugs or chemicals whatsoever, but simply by the action of heat, moisture and time, which permits the diastase to grow and change the starch into grape-sugar. This presents food to the system ready for immediate assimilation.

Its especial value as a food, beyond the fact that it is easily digested, is that it supplies the needed elements to quickly rebuild the cells in the brain and nerve centers throughout the body.

Ploughing and Reaping.

The ploughing of the Lord is deep,
On ocean or on land;
His furrows cross the mountain steep,
They cross the sea-washed sand.

Wise men and prophets know not how,
But work their Master's will;
The kings and nations drag the plough,
His purpose to fulfill.

They work his will because they must,
On hillside or on plain;
The clods are broken into dust,
And ready for the grain.

Then comes the planting of the Lord,
His kingdom cometh now;
The ocean's deepest depths are stirrrd,
And all their secrets show.

Where prophets trod His desert broad,
Where monarchs dragged the plough,
Behold the seedtime of his word:
The sower comes to sow.

Secret of a Long Life.

You sometimes see a woman whose old age is as exquisite as was the perfect bloom of her youth. You wonder how this has come about. You wonder how it is her life has been a long and happy one. Here are some of the reasons:

She knew how to forget disagreeable things.

She kept her nerves well in hand, and inflicted them on no one.

She mastered the art of saying pleasant things.

She did not expect too much from her friends.

She made whatever work came to her congenial.

She retained her illusions, and did not believe all the world wicked and unkind.

She relieved the miserable, and sympathized with the sorrowful.

She never forgot that kind words and a smile cost nothing, but are priceless treasures to the discouraged.

She did unto others as she would be done by, and now that old age has come to her, and there is a halo of white hair about her head, she is loved and considered. This is the secret of a long life, and a happy one. —Exchange.

"Like an American Child."

In many American homes lack of manners is fast becoming something akin to lack of morals, says a writer in the Congregationalist. The grandmother and guest are frequently forced into a secondary position in conversation, the tea-table talk being monopolized by children's chatter and clamor. Deference to age is conspicuous by its absence. The child is encouraged to think of himself first and others last, for fear that his "spontaneity" be checked. Among well-bred Europeans the American child is usually considered a nuisance, to be held up as a warning. Mrs. Alice Freeman Palmer tells a good story of her experience in a German railway train, when a tiny Karl, who had committed some little rudeness, was reproved in a shocked tone by his mother. "My son," said she, "what shall I do with you? You behave just like an American child." Evidently nothing more crushing could have been said. The traveler who has once lived with foreign children and observed their sweet courtesies and absence of pert-ness, and has seen how happy children are in considering others, may well desire that our active, vigorous American children may add a new grace to the other charms which make them the light and joy of our homes.

A Joke on the Preacher.

Not a few clergymen would be glad to be the victims of such a practical joke as was recently played upon the Rev. Mr. Hageman, the story of which appears in the Oxford (Mich.) Leader. At the annual meeting of the Congregational church, the question of hiring a preacher comes up for discussion.

At the last meeting of this society, when the subject was brought up, a good deacon arose, and said, "All those in favor of retaining Elder Hageman for another year—at the same salary—will please rise."

Not a person rose, and the minister, who was present, felt as uncomfortable as possible, and heartily wished himself anywhere else. Then the good deacon who had put the question arose again, and said, with a twinkle of the eye: "I see no one favors that motion, so I will put it again in this way: All those in favor of keeping the Rev. Mr. Hageman at an increase of salary will please rise."

Every one got upon his feet. Then it dawned upon Mr. Hageman that he had been the victim of a joke, and a smile lighted his eyes and the color returned to his cheeks. Some of his best friends had planned the surprise, and the little scheme had worked to perfection.

"Well, I never thought that Jonesy would die a natural death," said Snaggs, when he had been told of the passing away of a man he had known.

"I didn't say he died a natural death," said Dinwiddie

"You told me he died in bed."

"But it was a folding bed."

Wholesome Advice

For People Whose Stomachs are Weak and Digestion Poor.

Dr. Harlandson, whose opinion in diseases is worthy of attention, says when a man or woman comes to me complaining of indigestion, loss of appetite, sour stomach, belching, sour watery rising, headaches, sleeplessness, lack of ambition and a general run down nervous condition, I advise them to take after each meal one or two of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, allowing the tablet to dissolve in the mouth, and thus mingle with the food eaten. The result is that the food is speedily digested before it has time to sour and ferment. These tablets will digest the food anyway whether the stomach wants to or not, because they contain harmless digestive principles, vegetable essences, pepsin and Golden Seal, which supply just what the weak stomach lacks.

I have advised the tablets with great success, both in curing indigestion and to build up the tissues, increasing flesh in thin nervous patients, whose real trouble was dyspepsia, and as soon as the stomach was put to rights they did not know what sickness was.

A fifty cent package of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets can be bought at any drug store, and as they are not a secret patent medicine, they can be used as often as desired with full assurance that they contain nothing harmful in the slightest degree; on the contrary, anyone whose stomach is at all deranged, will find great benefit from the use of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. They will cure any form of stomach weakness or disease except cancer of the stomach.

With the Children.

J. Breckenridge Ellis.

In regard to Pete, I have an announcement to make that may please a good many people; the last instalment of the story appears next week! So those who are tired of the serial ought to rejoice next Thursday for they will see THE END at the end of the column,—unless the type setters make it THE AND, or commit other mistakes like they sometimes do. I don't know if they will set up what I am writing now; I expect it'll make 'em mad; I just dare 'em to set it up! Here are some letters: Katharine Keith, Bethany, W. Va.: "I have just finished reading the Av. S. letters and they have inspired me to write one,—not that I expect to see it in print, it will be too long." (How surprised Katharine will be when she sees this!) "Put me down as a member; it will help a little toward reaching the 2,000 mark. Bethany is a very small town and there are only two girls near my size. I am 14, but everyone takes me to be 2 or 3 years older. I don't want you to think that I am a native of this state." (I should think not. Poor old W. Va! It is in California that girls are 2 or 3 years ahead of their age.) "I was born in San Francisco." (You see that? You see what a prophet I am?) "My last home was Santa Cruz. When I was 11 we moved to Lexington, Ky., where we lived several years. No place is so nice to me as California." (There is one misfortune about being a native of California. You always prefer that state, but you are born so restless you can't stay in it. Now it is different with me. I am a Missourian and I wouldn't move to Kansas if there was a brass band over there in every cornfield.) "I go to Bethany College and like it very much. My father is professor of Biblical literature, Doctrine and Philosophy. When are we to begin to write for our page?" (Right now; don't let the grass grow under your pens.) "I am glad we won't have to drop out your stories; the girls in them talk just like they do in real life; they leave the 'g's' out of their 'ing.' I agree with Mary Calhoun that you are an old bachelor; and I am glad you are. I am going to be one,—or rather,—an old maid. I have two cousins in Washington and I will try to get them to join the Av. S." Nellie Assiter, Troy, Mo.: "I want to join the Av. S. I am 16. I took music and shorthand last year and graduated from the public school. This summer I have read Queechy, Jessica's First Prayer, etc. I am like Mary Calhoun, I have made up my mind to be an old maid. I have two brothers, one of whom I think I can persuade to join the Av. S." (I thought she was going to say,—to become an old maid.) "My youngest brother and I are members of the Christian Church; my father is pastor. I should like to correspond with members about my own age." (Matrimony is below par in this club, it appears.) Bertha Beesley, Moselle, Mo.: "Instead of history, will you allow the biography of noted authors as given in a world-wide encyclopedia?" (Certainly; biography is counted just the same.) Cecil and Georgiell Anthony, Altamont, Mo.: "My sister and I have decided to become members; we hope you will get your 2,000 members before long. Our papa said he was acquainted with you, and I think we would like to be, for you seem so jolly. We are 16 and 14; one takes lessons on a mandolin, the other on a violin; both go to school." (I play on the violin, myself; we ought to get together and give the members a concert. Never could pick a mandolin, though, or a chicken.) "Pete reminds us of an old friend we left in Illinois. Favorite books; Black Beauty, With Gen. Thomas's Staff (Did you ever read it?), Oakleigh, Beautiful Joe, Stepping Heavenward, The Gallcon. We are both members of the church. How often do we report to you?" (Once every 12 weeks. Never read the book you mention, but have heard it commended.)

THE GROUND MOLE, by Erma Ady, Flat Rock, Mich.: How many have particularly noticed the Ground Mole, except to exclaim, "Ugh! the horrid creature!" or something similar? We have not much cause to admire the mole, less, perhaps, because it is such a nuisance to the farmer, burrowing tunnels in the land, destroying everything in its path, and also by there not being many uses it can be put to. The only use I know of is to skin them and make purses, also fur which is soft and very fine. Like other animals, the mole is suited to its mode of life. It has a long snout, which assists the feet in digging its home. Its front feet, or digging feet, lie sidewise and throw the dirt both at the same time. They are padded with a small flesh cushion, which protects them while digging. Before the mole is skinned the eyes are barely perceptible, only you can see where they are. After it is skinned you can see the eyes very plainly. The smallness of the eyes is on purpose so the fur can cover them and keep out the dirt when it is at work. (I like this essay because it is written in Erma's own language, and I only hope it will appear on this page to good advantage, and not be printed mule. We should all be thankful we are not moles, that it may not be said of us our only use is to be skinned. I should hate for any one to say that of me; yet I am sorry to say I have seen some human beings who manifestly stood in need of a skinning.)

Julia Cox, Cox, Mo: "We have had a protracted meeting at our church, and I was one of the 13 who was baptized. Two of my sisters and three of my brothers went to Washington in the spring. It seems lonesome at home without them." (How many were left?) "We have a large vineyard and the grapes are getting ripe; I wish you were here to eat some with me. I will begin to think of something to write a story about, as the others are going to write, but I would rather read your . . ." Orrell Fidler, Terre Haute, Ind.: "I am sorry, but I cannot have my name on the Honor List this time, as I forgot to read my Bible one day. I was away visiting. I kept all the other rules. I like Lola Cox's plan if she would do the writing. I was afraid 'Pete' would end when we found out who Nap was, and am glad it didn't. I will be a sophomore in the high school this year." (Orrell sends a very full report of his work. Henry S. Bagley, Mabelvale, Ark., asks: "Is there some way to read up one day, if you miss one day?" No, it is the regularity of good reading that makes good reading most beneficial; otherwise Orrell would certainly be placed upon the Honor List.) Mrs. Ida Cobb, Riley, Kan.: "My little girl became

THE AKRON ROUTE.

Through Passenger Service to Buffalo for Pan-American Exposition.

The opening of the Pan-American Buffalo Line—"Akron Route"—May 5th establishes a new outlet from the West and Southwest to Chautauqua Lake, Buffalo, Niagara Falls and St. Lawrence River and Canada resorts. It also opens a new tourist route via Buffalo and the Niagara frontier to New York and the East.

Schedules for the new route are out, and their arrangement indicates passengers over it are to have enjoyable trips to and from the Pan-American Exposition.

The service from St. Louis for Pan-American Exposition visitors from that gateway and the West and Southwest includes two daily trains in both directions. The Pan-American Express leaves St. Louis Union Station at 8:44 a. m., arrives Buffalo 8:15 next morning. This train has sleeping car on which passengers may go from St. Louis to Chautauqua Lake and Buffalo without change. The Buffalo Express leaves St. Louis at 8:15 p. m. with sleeping car from St. Louis to Columbus and from Columbus through to Chautauqua Lake and Buffalo, arriving at latter point at 12:50 midnight. Passengers occupying sleeping car may remain in their berths until 7:00 a. m. Returning trains leave Buffalo daily at 1:00 p. m., arrive St. Louis at noon next day; leave Buffalo 6:30 p. m., arrive St. Louis 6:40 next evening.

Information about fares to Buffalo, Niagara Falls and beyond, stop-over privileges at Buffalo and other details may be ascertained by communicating with J. M. Chesbro, A. G. P. Agt., St. Louis.

TEXT: He that reapeth receiveth wages and gathereth fruit unto life eternal; that he that soweth and he that reapeth may rejoice together. For herein is the saying true, one soweth, and another reapeth. I sent you to reap that whereon ye have not labored: others have labored, and ye are entered into their labor.—John 4:36-38.

Working alone, one can accomplish but little. When two work together, their power is more than doubled. It is not good for man to be alone. He must invoke the co-operation of nature before he can be fed, or clothed, or housed. And he must have the co-operation of his fellow man before he can organize a government or form any industrial enterprise. Buying and selling are forms of co-operation. This principle is just as necessary and just as effective in Christian work as in the manifold work of the world; but Christians are sometimes slow to recognize it, and slower still to adopt it.

Its Necessity.

That this principle is necessary in the work of the church at once appears when we consider the nature of the church. It is made up of members who have widely different gifts. The church has in it the young and immature, as well as the aged and experienced. It has members who are wise to lay plans, and others who are capable and energetic in executing them; members who are deeply spiritual, and members whose specialty it is to attend to temporalities. Hence, if all this variety of talent is to be employed, co-operation is positively necessary. But it appears equally as necessary, when we consider the work of the church. Here again we find unexampled variety. There are business affairs to be managed, and spiritual interests to be conserved. And in each of these there is a great variety of detail. Teaching and preaching are needed. Sons and daughters of consolation will find ample room for the employment of their talents.

Each succeeding generation must be evangelized. The world must hear the gospel. This is the great task laid upon the church, and it will never be done without the closest and most constant co-operation. Our missionary societies are simply methods of co-operation, the wisest and best that have yet been devised. An army illustrates this principle. There is subordination of one to another; division of labor; ordered and harmonious movement. Give the church in every community this spirit of unity and co-operation, let the churches of a given section or country be possessed by it, and seek contact and co-operation with God, and there is nothing they may not achieve.

Praying and Working.

It is sad to find here and there a latent skepticism concerning prayer. After the rich experiences of men and churches, the testimony of the Scriptures, and the example of Christ and the early Christians, it is passing strange that this grace should be disparaged or neglected. Looking upon the scattered peoples, Christ said, "The harvest truly is plenteous, but the laborers are few" (Matt. 9:37). What then? There is refuge in prayer. "Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest that he send forth laborers into his harvest."

Much reading and study will make a brilliant preacher, but only much prayer will make a powerful preacher. It is not, perhaps, the public prayers we need, whether long or short, so much as the private prayer, which only God hears, and of which no one else knows. We should pray for ourselves, for our brethren, for our ministers and teachers, for our missionaries; for our unconverted friends. When rebuilding the broken wall, the Hebrews held the trowel in one hand and the sword in the other. By our gifts, our prayers, and our toils, we can co-operate with one another, and with the blessed Master, in the extension of His kingdom.

Rejoice Together.

Women had a larger part in the apostolic church than they have to-day in many churches of Christ (Phil. 4:3). Both sexes and all ages should be engaged together under the leadership of Jesus Christ. Wherever this is done there will be abundant harvests, and the reaper and the sower will rejoice together. He who reaps is brought much closer to the final result than he who sows; but can the reaper dispense with the sower? Is he entitled to any more honor? We must sow in faith; sow, many times, with tears; but the harvest is sure, and in it there are songs of joy. As the sower and the reaper have co-operated in bringing to pass a splendid harvest, let them still co-operate in celebrating the completion of their labors. There is room in the grand anthem of the glorified saints for all voices.

"Wherefore comfort yourselves together, and edify one another even as also ye do" (1 Thess. 5:11).

"So others shall Take patience, labor, to their heart and hand, From thy hand, and thy heart, and thy brave cheer, And God's grace fructify through thee to all."

Prayer.

Wilt Thou remove, O God, whatever estranges, whatever divides. Give to Thy people everywhere the spirit of unity and co-operation. Help us to realize as never before our dependence upon one another, and above all, upon Thee. Strengthen the heart of the sower and the hand of the reaper, and give golden harvests, for Christ's sake. Amen.

Quaint, Queer and Quirious¹

Salt Lake City.

The late Col. John Cockerell in the Cosmopolitan said: "There are three unique cities in America, and one of these is SALT LAKE CITY." It is not only unique in its Temple, Tabernacle and Mormon Church institutions, but quaint in appearance, with its wide streets, immense blocks and martial rows of shade trees. It has, perhaps, more attractions to the square yard than any city in the country, and its climate, while temperate all the year round, is particularly delightful in summer. The Great Salt Lake, with its magnificent Saltair resort, where the water is "deader and denser" than that in the Dead Sea in Palestine, is an attraction in itself that people come miles to see. There are many cool mountain and lake resorts near by, also numerous very pretty canyon trips and parks, drives, Hot and Warm Sulphur Springs. Fishing and hunting in every direction. The trip from Denver to Salt Lake City and Ogden via the RIO GRANDE WESTERN RAILWAY in connection with either the Colorado Midland or Denver & Rio Grande railroads is one of unsurpassed pleasure. Here nature is found in her sternest mood and the whole line is a succession of rugged canyon, waterfalls and picturesque valleys. No European trip can compare with it in grandeur of scenery. During the entire summer there will be low excursion rates to Salt Lake City and contiguous country. It is on the road to the Pacific Coast, if that be your destination. Send four cents postage to Geo. W. Heintz, General Passenger Agent, Rio Grande Western Railway, Salt Lake City, for literature, etc.

Woes of Intemperance.*

We turn aside from the course of the history we have been studying during the present quarter, to consider one of the many warnings found in the word of God against the sin of intemperance. No person who sees the very least of the evils arising out of this vice will begrudge the time given for the study of this striking passage of Scripture. And it is to be hoped that Sunday-school teachers will make the utmost effort to so impress the lessons upon the minds of their pupils as to forever prejudice them against this hellish vice, and the traffic which encourages it. It is probable that Solomon is the author of this portion of the book of Proverbs, and in his court, which became, in its later days, quite dissolute, he saw abundant evidences of the evil which he here denounces. And every word which he wrote, nearly three thousand years ago, is doubly true now, for the liquors of to-day are even more deadly than they were then, as men have learned to distil and to mix all kinds of poisons with their drinks.

"Who hath woe? who hath sorrow? who hath contentions? who hath babbling? who hath wounds without cause? who hath redness of eyes?" The answer is easy and any child could give it. The drunkard, of course. His manhood gone, his strength wasted, his substance spent, his home wrecked, his family ruined, his hopes blasted, what is there for him longer in life? He is wretched, quarrelsome, foolish, depraved. His bleared eyes, senseless garrulity, filthiness and rudeness, make him the abhorrence of all who come in contact with him. The neat man becomes a sloven; the honest man a thief; the truthful man a liar; the kind man a fiend; the industrious man a loafer; the chaste man a libertine; the Christian man a child of the devil. The drinker advertises his shame. It leaves its marks upon his very countenance. "Nose-paint" is but another name for whiskey. The drinker sins against himself in degrading his manhood below the level of the brute. He sins against his family in robbing them of the love and care he owes them. He sins against society in using his liberty for self-abasement rather than for the public good. He sins against God in trampling into the mire the nature which was made to rise into the very heavens of noble and true thought and life. And what shall be said of those who make and sell the stuff which thus ruins their fellow men, knowing as they do the necessary results of their business? "Woe unto him that putteth the bottle to his neighbor's lips, and maketh him drunken also!" Thus saith God, and the fires of hell will make these enemies of society realize, as they blindly refuse to see in this life, the awful evil to which they have devoted themselves.

"Look not upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth its color in the cup, when it goeth down smoothly; at the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder." Oh, the arch deceiver! How it hideth its fangs till the victim is safely within its reach. Never yet did a youth take the first drink with the deliberate purpose of becoming a sot. He always intends to stop before he has reached that point. But too late he finds his moral strength gone, and in despair sinks down into the gutter of shame and debauchery. "Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging; and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise." Then the world must be full of fools. As I write these words, in the city where I live there are hundreds of young men and women, boys and girls, as well as those of maturer years, going into beer and wine gardens, from which some of them will come forth far baser than they entered. The chaste will become impure, the noble-minded reckless of truth or honor. Thousands take their first step toward a life of vice and crime in these places. The house of shame is recruited from these resorts, while thieves and murderers find here the inspiration for their desperate deeds. There is no safe path but that of total abstinence. He who never drinks the first glass cannot possibly become a drunkard, while he who tampers with the evil gives a mortgage on his future which he may find it difficult, or even impossible, to discharge.

The results of intemperance are suggested most graphically. "Thine eyes shall behold strange women," says our authorized version. And does not wine inflame the animal passions as nothing else? The saloon is the prime promoter of sensual lust. Let the traffic in drink be stopped, and a very large share of the sensuality that now destroys our homes, depraves our humanity and pollutes our cities would cease. The Revised Version renders this verse, "Thine eyes shall behold strange things," and the victim of delirium tremens would readily confirm this testimony. The helplessness of the poor victim of drink is portrayed in striking language. He is like one that lieth down in the midst of the sea, only to be quickly swallowed up by its waters, or as one who lieth down upon the top of a mast, to be hurled into the deep, with the first lurch of the vessel. The staggering feet, the hands hanging helplessly at the side, or waved in crazy effort at expression of the confused thought of the bewildered brain, show how the whole man has lost his poise, and is at the mercy of every wind and wave of passion. "O God, that men should put an enemy in their mouths to steal away their brains!"

The drunkard is subject to injury without the power to protect himself, or even the knowledge of its source. "They have stricken me, and I was not hurt; they have beaten me and I felt it not; when shall I awake? I will seek it yet again." Thus does the victim of drink find himself bruised and wounded, after his debauch, and yet unable to place the blame for his injuries. Nor does he care, if he can repeat the stupefying draught, and sink again into the base slumber from which he has been aroused. Surely, when we see how intemperance degrades man, makes him utterly unfit for the duties and responsibilities of life, throws upon society the burden of caring for him and for those whom he ought to support, men will not always tolerate the traffic which they now legalize and encourage. How long, O Lord, how long? When will the church of God awake and set her face as a flint against this infamous business, and Christian men drive it out from under the shelter of the laws? Then only may we hope to see its victims delivered, and its hellish work interrupted and finally destroyed. God hasten the day.

TOPIC FOR SEPTEMBER 22.

The Saloon Power Doomed.

(Ps. 37:1-10.)

This psalm is an exhortation to confidence in a righteous God. It bids us hope in the final outcome of the strife between good and ill. It urges us not to give way to that spirit which characterized Elijah under the juniper tree, and which characterizes many a prophet and reformer to-day. "Fret not thyself." Don't be uneasy about the welfare of the universe. Don't feel for a single moment that the whole world rests upon your shoulders, and that you are individually responsible for it. Such is the message of this psalm.

"Why so hot, little man!" This is Emerson's phrasing of the same thought. Why rush about perspiring and despairing? God will care for his world. He is still in his heaven. It may seem to us, at times, as if he were dethroned, but this is a mistake. It may look to us as though the forces of evil were getting the upper hand, but they are not.

Not all in a moment will the earth be cleansed of its evils. Not in a day shall we see the complete triumph of righteousness. Gradual is the progress of truth and goodness in the world. Any man who comes crying: "My plan will cleanse the stables of this world. My panacea will bring in the triumph of truth and righteousness," may be distrusted. He is not a safe leader. There are no panaceas for social ills. There is no sure and rapid victory for righteousness. All reforms that are good and lasting are slow. It is usually a positive evil to shake things up too fast. Carrie Nation's method has been tried before.

But the saloon power in our cities and states is none the less doomed. We shall have clean municipal, state, national government as sure as there is a reigning God, and as sure as our nation has aspirations after righteousness. In order, however, that this may be accomplished, we are to go to work quietly, calmly, judiciously, to study the problems of government, to inform ourselves as a people how we can arm ourselves with the best modern gunnery of righteousness, and then to fight steadily, not by fits and starts, and bravely to a victory. The reign of Tammany Hall and the brewers in New York City is doomed as sure as that to-morrow's dawn will come. Our free-born spirit scorns to be bound by bosses who are bound by brewers. We cannot saw through the fetters in a night, but in many nights we shall.

What then ought we to do towards this end? We ought not to rest quiet under the rule of wrong. We ought to struggle, unceasingly to struggle, but not to fret. So what can we do?

1. We ought to study municipal problems. We are woefully ignorant about the proper government of our cities. We ought to learn how the older civilizations, English, German, have freed themselves from the rule of corruption.

2. We ought, to a man, to mingle in the political life of our cities and communities. No man can shirk this responsibility any more than he can shirk the care of his children and family.

3. We ought to accept every inch of encroachment we can make on the territory of the enemy. An army in besieging a city draws line after line of entrenchments, step by step, nearer and nearer. We cannot win by a single assault. We must keep on pushing the siege inch by inch.

4. And we must lift our voices and never keep them still. It is public opinion that rules in America. We can only shape public opinion by a constant agitation. At the heart of this constant agitation, however, there must be the peace of confidence in God. Kentucky University.

ANDERSON.

Franc's Homer Anderson died at Blairstown, Mo., Aug. 26. 45 years of age. For 22 years he had been a Disciple of Christ. He was a deacon of the church and superintendent of the Sunday-school when his fatal illness came. A wife, three daughters and two sons are left behind. A good man, strong in faith, true to his church, his family and his fellow men, passed from earth well fitted to meet his Savior. S. W. CRUTCHER.

MALOTT.

We have lost a good man in the death of Dr. Hiram Malott, who died on Aug. 29, 1901, at the age of 77 years. He was a native of Lawrence county, Ind., and was a charter member of the congregation here. He loved the church, his God and his Bible. Full of years, full of honors, full of pain, passing through many trials, trusted and loved for two generations, respected by his fellow-citizens of every class, he has fallen asleep in the sure and certain hope of the resurrection of the dead. There is sadness in the church and community but not lamentation. A good man sleeps well after life's fitful fever, but mingled with our tears are songs of victory.

McMILLEN.

Mrs. Mary A. McMillen, nee Warner, was born in the state of New York, Dec. 30, 1868, and died at her home in Pickering, Mo., July 23, 1901, aged 32 years, 6 months and 23 days. She was married March 3, 1886, to C. G. McMillen, and became the mother of four children, one son and three daughters, all of whom survive her. She was an earnest Christian and a model wife and mother. Seldom was her place vacant in church, Endeavor Society or prayer-meeting, the last time she was away from home being to attend the latter service. She was a most efficient secretary of the Ladies' Aid Society. As a member of the C. W. B. M. she was faithful. She is sadly missed in home, church and society, but our loss is her eternal gain. The funeral services were conducted by the writer.

TEAFORD.

William Teaford died at his home in Georgetown, Ind., Aug. 22, 1901. He was a policeman in Bedford and was a splendid officer whom every one loved and respected. Two years ago he had a sound conversion. He was convicted and converted and found pardon through our Lord Jesus Christ. He was created anew in Christ Jesus. Everybody could see this. His aspiration was to grow. He could say, "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God." He thirsted for righteousness.

Travel.

A word or two on the subject of travel is not amiss. The facilities for the transportation of passengers at the present time have certainly been brought to perfection. It isn't like in the old days when it was almost a torture to go from one place to another. Now you get aboard a train and live just like you do at home. The entire equipment is built with a view to your comfort.

For instance: When you go East the B. & O S-W. offers you Three Daily Solid Vestibuled Trains from St. Louis, leaving at 8:20 a. m., 8:05 p. m. and 2:15 a. m.—made up of the finest Pullman sleepers—a dining car service which cannot be excelled (you don't have to pay for what you can't eat, but just for what you order)—first class high back coaches—in fact the trains are palaces on wheels. The track, roadbed and equipment are entirely new.

It's the best line to Cincinnati and Louisville. Only $21 to New York with stop-overs. (Saves you money and gives you the best service.)

Information in regard to trains, etc., can be secured from any representative. It will be a pleasure for them to answer your questions and help you in every way.

The favor of the public is final proof of merit—and we're after it.

Popular Hymns No. 2

THE ruling purpose of the author has been to give to the public a worthy successor of Popular Hymns. He has not sought to duplicate it, but to make a book as well adapted to the new methods of Church, Sunday-school and C. E. work as the first was to the conditions twenty years ago when Popular Hymns was launched upon its long and useful career. Popular Hymns No. 2 is better than its predecessor, not because it contains better music, but because the music is better adapted to the present wants of all the working forces of the army of the Lord.

EVANGELISTS will find the Gospel Proclamation in Song a department of the book eminently suited to every phase of a successfully conducted revival.

CHORISTERS will find the average choir supplied with a rich selection of beautiful and impressive solos with choruses, duets, quartettes, invocations and doxologies specially selected for the distinctive part a choir is expected to take in the service.

PASTORS who are responsible for the kind of pasture upon which the sheep and lambs are fed, will NOT find a sentiment out of harmony with New Testament Christianity. He will find it a companion vade mecum for his pocket Testament, containing gems for public worship, for the prayer-meeting, for funeral occasions, for Baptismal, Thanksgiving and Convention services. He will find that an expensive hymnal will not be needed unless it be to keep in the style.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVORERS will find in Popular Hymns No 2 all that they can wish, because it is full from back to back with soul-stirring sentiment set to soul-inspiring music, the only kind C. E's care to sing. The Solos, Duets, and Quartettes may be impressively used to enrich every session of the Society.

S. S. SUPERINTENDENTS who believe the Sunday-school should be the nursery of the church, the church at work saving the young, will find Popular Hymns No. 2 richly supplied with music within the voice compass and heart reach of the children, giving them a desire to remain and participate in the song service of the church. Like its predecessor,

NEW TESTAMENT COMMENTARIES

During the past two years there has developed among the Christian people of America a great revival of interest in the study of the Bible. Never before in the history of Christianity were so many people zealously and earnestly studying the Bible, endeavoring to know more of its contents and its meaning. Everywhere there are being organized classes and clubs for Bible study. In consequence of this movement there is a brisk demand for Bible helps—books that have hitherto been sold chiefly to preachers. The people are inquiring for the best commentaries and exegetical works to aid them in their study of the Bible. We are glad to be able to announce that we are fully prepared to supply Bible students with the best books to meet their requirements. A few of these we list here:

COMMENTARY ON MATTHEW AND MARK. By J. W. MCGARVEY. A volume of 392 pages, cloth-bound. The former price ($2.00) has been reduced to $1.50.

COMMENTARY ON LUKE. By J. S. LAMAR. A splendid book by a grand man. Cloth, 333 pages. Reduced from $2.00 to $1.50.

COMMENTARY ON JOHN. By B. W. JOHNSON, the well-known commentator. This is a cloth-bound volume of 328 pages. Price reduced to $1.50.

STUDIES IN ACTS. By W. J. LHAMON. One of the finest works of recent years. Bound in cloth; 420 pages; price, $1.25.

COMMENTARY ON ROMANS. By MOSES E. LARD. A book of 485 pages, bound in cloth. Price, recently reduced, is now $2.00.

COMMENTARY ON HEBREWS. The author, R. MILLIGAN, was one of our most gifted men. Cloth, 395 pages. The reduced price is now $1.50.

PEOPLE'S NEW TESTAMENT WITH NOTES. By B. W. JOHNSON. Two volumes. Vol. I, contains the Four Gospels and Acts; Vol. II, covers the Epistles and Revelation. A concise, but complete work, of as much practical value to the average man as a commentary in 15 volumes costing $30.00. Bound in cloth. Price, per volume, $2.00; per set, $4.00.

Please note that former prices of these works have been reduced 25 per cent. Many thousand copies were sold at the original prices, but we desire that many more thousands shall have the help and benefit of the thought and genius of these eminent Bible scholars. In the case of a class, club or association organized for Bible study, we suggest that a fund be raised to purchase this list of books, and other works, for the joint use of the members. A full description of the volumes in the above list will be found in our 100-page General Catalogue, mailed free on receipt of request. Address,

Book Notes.

We urge our friends and patrons to remember that the business of the Christian Publishing Company is by no means confined to the books which we ourselves publish, or to the works listed in our catalogues, or to those which we advertise, from time to time, in these columns. We do a general book business, and can supply, at the regular price, any book in print, no matter where or by whom published. We solicit correspondence regarding any desired volume. If you see, anywhere, an advertisement, review or notice of any book, and decide to purchase it, send your order to The Christian Publishing Company.

It matters not what other books or how many other books you possess, you should have The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century. No matter how busy you are, or how little time you have for reading, you should find the time to read, and read carefully, this splendid volume. No matter how limited your financial resources, or how small the sum you can monthly or annually set aside for the purchase of new books, you should—unless actually destitute and supported by charity—buy this new and valuable history of the current reformation. It is a volume that is in a class all by itself. You cannot say: "I do not need to get The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century, because I already have ———." This book is the only complete, adequate, authentic, reliable history of the inauguration, progress and growth of the Disciples of Christ that has ever been published. The reading of it will quicken your religious zeal and give you a new love for our great cause. It is the most important addition to our literature made in a decade. If you have not already secured and read this volume, do so at once by all means. The price, prepaid, is $2 00.

We frequently receive letters from Sunday-school teachers and officers asking us to recommend books suitable for gifts and rewards to their pupils. We are always glad to lend any assistance in our power, and we invite all teachers to freely command our services in this regard. Our catalogue contains quite a number of books especially adapted for children and young people. For young children—those from six to fourteen years of age—we have never seen anything superior to Laura Gerould Craig's Saturday Talk Series of Childhood. This is a set of six books, being biographical sketches, in story form, of the great personages of ancient and modern times. The titles of the several volumes are as follows: Little Presidents, Little Kings, Little Queens, Little Orators, Little Generals and Little Statesmen. All are profusely illustrated, are richly bound in cloth and sell for $.40 per volume, or $2.00 per set.

The Heavenward Way, by J. H. Garrison, is a book especially addressed to young Christians—those who are young in the Christian life, whether old or young in years. It contains valuable suggestions concerning means of spiritual growth. Any follower of Christ, young or old, who is not fully satisfied with the progress he is making in the Christian life, will be helped and strengthened by the reading of this book. It is one of the famous and popular "Trinity of Devotional Works,"

There are, no doubt, a few persons who can get their money's worth out of a $50 commentary on the New Testament, published in twenty-five volumes. These persons, however, are very few in number compared to the great majority who require a concise, condensed commentary, published in one or two volumes and selling at a price within the reach of the average exchequer. Such a work is The People's New Testament with Notes, by B. W. Johnson. This work, though published in very recent years, has already had a larger sale and circulation than is enjoyed by a great majority of similar works. The reason for its popularity is that while the notes and comments are sufficiently comprehensive to make clear all obscure passages and texts, it contains no superfluous words. It avoids the error of redundancy. The purchaser pays but $4 for the set of two handsome volumes, and has a commentary that willfully meet all his needs. This work of the late B. W. Johnson has been enthusiastically endorsed by prominent men in our own ranks and in other religious bodies. The two volumes may be purchased singly for $2 each, or the set will be sent, prepaid, on receipt of $4.

The railroads which have been run into the arid portions of our fair land have borne their part well in developing these sections and in bringing them to a condition which in many instances ranks them with those regions more favored by reason of abundant down-pour of rain.

This is true to a marked degree of the Oregon Short Line Railroad. Its tracks are almost, if not entirely, within the confines of territory embraced in what is now or was arid country. Its mileage is distributed as follows: In Nevada, 650.7 miles; in Utah, 613.6, and in Montana, 292.7. These lines of railway have been a most potent factor in the development of these states, known chiefly for mineral wealth.

resources. Since 1862 Montana alone has yielded not less than $900,000,000 in gold, silver, copper and lead, Idaho about $400,000,000 and Utah over $200,000,000; a total of about $1,500,000,000.

But the miner is not the only son of toil who has reaped his reward in this territory, farming, stock raising and fruit growing have been exceedingly profitable. Irrigation has made it possible. If the proposed appropriation of one hundred million dollars for irrigating purposes carries in the next congress, a new era will be at hand for these their sister states of the arid region.

Idaho which until recently was the most unpromising of the three, doubled her population in ten years after being admitted to the union in 1890. A decade ago she seemed to be without resources, but irrigation has made a portion of her vast arid plains verdant. A substrata of lava is said to underlie the soil and to exercise a renewing effect upon it. Idaho is soon to rank high among the western states. With a superb climate and a progressive people transformation will go on unhindered.

"What has been done" is no longer the guide for the westerner. He passes over the trail made by a predecessor without note or comment and proceeds on beyond into untrodden fields and canons and over passes hitherto unscaled.

EXPOSITIONS are the timekeepers of progress. . . .

The period of exclusiveness is past. The expansion of our trade and commerce is the pressing problem. Commercial wars are unprofitable. A policy of good will and friendly trade relations will prevent reprisals. Reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times; measures of retaliation are not. . . .

Gentlemen, let us ever remember that our interest is in concord, not conflict, and that our real eminence rests in the victories of peace, not those of war. We hope that all who are represented here may be moved to higher and nobler effort for their own and the world's good and that out of this city may come, not only greater commerce and trade for us all, but, more essential than these, relations of mutual respect, confidence and friendship which will deepen and endure.

Our earnest prayer is that God will graciously vouchsafe prosperity, happiness and peace to all our neighbors and like blessings to all the peoples and powers of earth.

From President McKinley's last speech, delivered at Buffalo the day before the assassination.

Current Events.

The Death of the President. A terrific shock and a night of awful suspense; six days of hope, increasing almost to confidence; a day of sudden despair and grief; and then the end—that was the history of the tragedy which began with the assassin's shots in the Temple of Music at Buffalo at 4:15 p. m., Friday, Sept. 6, and culminated in the death of President McKinley at the Milburn residence at 2:15 a. m. Saturday, Sept. 14. The national grief and disappointment at this dire event seemed the greater by contrast with the cheerful expectation of his recovery, which was generally entertained and which was warranted by the bulletins of the physicians. After the first shock of the wound had passed and the necessary operations had been successfully performed, there seemed to be a steady improvement in the President's condition, and doctors, while not officially pronouncing him convalescent, clearly entertained a most hopeful view of the case. The change for the worse was sudden and unmistakable. From the hour when the President began to sink, late Thursday night, there was no doubt as to the outcome. What was believed at that time to be heart failure, but has since been shown to be gangrene along the course of the second bullet, reduced the patient in a few hours from a state of apparent convalescence to the point of death. The members of the Cabinet and the most intimate friends, several of whom, believing that the danger was past, had left Buffalo, were summoned to return. And so, surrounded by his official family, by all of whom he was not less loved as a friend than honored as a leader, he passed away, with the words: "It is God's way. His will, not ours, be done." Mrs. McKinley, brave and strong in spite of her weakness and the greatness of her loss, bore up nobly, perhaps stunned by the blow and unable to realize its full significance. At the first announcement of the murderous attack, the feeling and thought of the people were divided between concern for the President's recovery and indignation against the anarchist who had done the deed. But in the presence of death, even the assassin is forgotten, and the whole nation, looking back through tear-dimmed eyes with love and sorrow, and looking forward in faith and hope, which even grief cannot destroy, is seeking consolation in those dying words: "His will, not ours, be done."

Funeral Services.

Whatever services may be held in honor of our great dead, with pomp and circumstance befitting

Buffalo City Hall, where it lay in state until Monday morning, viewed by many thousands. Monday the remains were conveyed to Washington, where they lay in state in the Capitol on Tuesday after religious services had been held over them on the morning of that day. The final interment will take place at Canton, Ohio, on Thursday. On that day, by executive proclamation, the people of the whole nation are requested to cease from their accustomed occupations and join in memorial services in honor of the dead President. It had been planned that a special day of national thanksgiving be kept a few weeks hence to celebrate his recovery. But this day of national mourning will take the place of that day of rejoicing. It will doubtless be universally observed. If the ancient custom of observing solemn days with fasting and prayer had not fallen into a disuse which is not wholly to our credit, that form of observance might appropriately be applied in the present instance. At least it is to be hoped that it will be kept as a day of prayer.

The New Admin-istration. With his natural optimism reinforced by the favorable reports of the physicians, Mr. Roosevelt felt justified in leaving Buffalo three or four days after the attack upon the President and went for a few days of rest and recreation in the Adirondack Mountains. Preparations were already on foot for the celebration of the President's recovery.

At the first indication of the probably fatal result of the wound, a message was dispatched recalling the Vice-President to Buffalo, but already he was far from the railroad and the telegraph. Guides dispatched from the mountain club house at which he made his headquarters scoured the region for a whole day, and he was found at sunset on the summit of Mount Marcy. A tramp of ten miles and a rapid drive of thirty-five miles by night over mountain roads brought him to the station, where a special train was waiting to convey him to Buffalo. Before he could reach the bedside of the dying President the end had come. The following day, in the presence of the Cabinet and a few his high office, none can be more impressive than the simple service held last Sunday morning at the residence of Mr. Milburn, where the President's last days were spent. The audience consisted only of those closely bound to Mr. McKinley by ties of friendship, blood or official intimacy, and they gathered about the open casket to pay homage, not to his office, but to himself. A scripture reading, a prayer, and his two favorite hymns, "Lead, kindly Light," and "Nearer, my God, to Thee." That was the entire service. Then the modest cortege, with no marks of official rank except the pall-bearers chosen from the army and navy and a small escort of infantry and blue-jackets, conveyed the body to the friends and high officials, Mr. Roosevelt took the oath of office and became President of the United States. The ceremony was of the simplest possible sort, and was performed at the residence of Mr. A. D. Wilcox, where the Vice-President had been entertained during his stay in Buffalo. It is generally conceded that the change of president will not be accompanied by any notable change in the administration. Personally Mr. Roosevelt is a very different type of man from Mr. McKinley, but their views of public policy were entirely harmonious. The speeches in the recent presidential campaign are sufficient evidence of that. President Roosevelt's first utterance was an assurance that the policies which had been pursued by the administration would be supported and furthered by him. The members of the Cabinet have been requested to retain their places for the present, but within a few weeks some changes will doubtless be made. Such changes will not indicate any change of policy, but will be made merely in view of the fact that the members of the Cabinet are the President's personal advisors and hence must be chosen by him personally. It has been announced that no extra session of Congress will be called before the regular session in December. It is gratifying to note that the unsettling effect of these momentous events upon the markets has been even less than might have been anticipated. Any important governmental change is likely to be followed, however unreasonably, by a general shrinkage of stock values and a feeling of uncertainty in the money market. The fact that such symptoms have been unusually slight in the present case, is an evidence that in the commercial centers there is confidence in Mr. Roosevelt's ability to maintain the present prosperity, in so far as it is dependent upon the national administration.

President Roosevelt. Setting aside all considerations of personal grief at the death of the President, there can be no reasonable doubt but that the fatal result of his wound and the untimely accession of the Vice-President to the presidential chair is a cause of keen regret and disappointment to Mr. Roosevelt. He is honorably ambitious, to be sure, and it would be beyond belief that a man who had risen to his office should not be ambitious to take the one step more to the highest place. Unquestionably he wanted to be president. But he would have preferred to occupy that office only after being elected to it by vote of the people. Mr. Roosevelt is not accustomed to having things fall into his lap, and a hard campaign ending in his election at the head of the ticket would have been more to his taste. Although he has almost a full term of office before him, it is scarcely to be expected that he will be satisfied until he has been made president by election. He becomes, therefore, more than ever a large factor in the campaign of 1904. The rise of Mr. Roosevelt during the past few years has been rapid. He was born in 1858 and was graduated from Harvard in 1880. He has written a shelf full of books—history, travel, sport and addresses—but until four years ago his reputation was based upon the efficiency of his work as Police Commissioner of New York City, in which capacity he became at once conspicuous for the application of his famous principle that the only thing to do with the law is to enforce it; if it is good it ought to be enforced, and if it is bad that is the quickest way to get it repealed. This was new doctrine in New York. In 1897 he resigned this position to become Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and it was largely due to his influence that the navy was so well prepared at the outbreak of the war with Spain. Admiral Dewey has testified that his selection to take command of the squadron in the Far East was due to Mr. Roosevelt. When war was declared he resigned his position in the Navy department, raised his famous regiment of Rough Riders, declined the appointment as colonel and became lieutenant-colonel, with former Surgeon, now Brigadier-General, Wood as colonel. At the close of the war he was elected Governor of New York and in November, 1900, was elected Vice-President of the United States after a campaign in which he was the most important speaker and the most picturesque figure. From Police Commissioner to President in four years is rapid progress even in this country, but his growth has kept pace with his advancement. At forty-three he is five years younger than any preceding president on entering office, but in spite of his youth he is a man of experience and discretion. If he lacks some of the political experience which is acquired by years of congressional service, perhaps his administration will not be the worse for it. The dignity of his office will perhaps go a certain way toward abating an impetuosity which sometimes amounts to impatience, but it will leave a vigor and directness that will be effective in getting things done.

The Strike Settled.

It is reported that an agreement has been virtually reached by the strike leaders and the representatives of the steel companies, by which the strike is to be called off. The terms of the agreement make no substantial concessions to the Amalgamated Association and do not differ materially from the terms which were offered by Mr. Schwab ten days ago, viz: that the companies would recognize the Association and treat with it as the representative of the workmen in all those mills in which the strike order has been obeyed. This is a sensible proposition which might have been made and accepted long ago. It is virtually an application of the principle of international law that "a blockade to be respected must be effective." So a strike to be respected must be effective, and the organization which called the strike can expect to be respected only in those places in which the strike is effective. It is clearly unreasonable for the Amalgamated Association to demand that the companies recognize it as the representative of the workmen in any mill where the workmen themselves do not recognize it enough to obey its order. Thus ends a foolish and unnecessary strike without a single commendable feature, except the fact that it was, on the whole, conducted in a peaceable manner with but little bloodshed and less intimidation than usual. The strikers have lost wages by being idle; the companies have lost the legitimate profits which their business should have been earning during this time; and nobody has gained anything—except experience.

Schley Inquiry Owing to the death of the Postponed. President, the official investigation of Admiral Schley's conduct at the battle of Santiago has been postponed. The first session of the court of inquiry was held at the Washington navy yard under the presidency of Admiral Dewey. The first step taken was the filing of Admiral Schley's objection to Admiral Howison as a member of the court, on the ground that he had already publicly expressed his opinion in regard to the matters which are to be investigated. The latter's disavowal was not sufficiently explicit and the objection was sustained by the other members of the court after a brief consideration. Thus one more name is added to the already long list of naval officers who have talked too much. Whatever may be the fact in regard to Admiral Howison's qualifications or disqualifications for sitting as a judge in this case, the decision of the court in declaring his seat vacant is considered by Admiral Schley's friends as the winning of a preliminary skirmish, and it gives assurance to all that the court means to be perfectly impartial. As soon as this decision was made, the court of necessity adjourned until the Secretary of the Navy should fill the vacancy on the bench. It should be borne in mind, as was stated at this first session, that the purpose of the court of inquiry is not to settle the Sampson-Schley dispute, though that may be one result. The inquiry relates solely to the conduct of Admiral Schley. Admiral Sampson is not being investigated and the court is not asked to pronounce upon the relative value of the services of the two commanders.

The G. A. R. Convention.

The Grand Army of the Republic has been holding its annual convention in Cleveland, O., during the past week. The features of the convention were the parade, which is said to have been the finest in the history of the organization, and the expressions in regard to the pension system. The Commander-in-Chief, Leo Rassieur, devoted a considerable part of his address to this topic, severely arraigning the present system and the administration of the pension bureau. The opinion was expressed that at present too much authority is placed in the hands of the pension commissioner and that applicants whose claims were not allowed by the pension bureau ought to have recourse to the courts. He recommended the appointment of a committee to prepare charges against the pension commissioner to be presented to the President with a request for an investigation, but this radical course was not generally endorsed. The report of the Adjutant-General showed that the total membership of the G. A. R. June 30, 1901, was 269,507—a large number when it is considered that the war of which they are veterans began more than forty years ago.

All reports agree that heavy fighting is going on in Colombia and that the three neighboring republics have sent reinforcements to the insurgents. Armies of from 3,000 to 6,000 are in the field and battles are reported with 200 killed on one side. But it is impossible to tell who is getting the best of it. The reports from each side claim victory. It reminds one of South Africa.

"His Will, Not Ours."

Whereas it has pleased Almighty God, in His infinite wisdom and tenderness, not to answer the prayers of us His people according to the desire of our hearts, sparing to us yet a little longer the life of our beloved President, but to lay upon us a burden of sorrow from which not one of us is free, it is fitting that we, as His faithful children, put our trust in Him who is the Comforter of the bereaved, the Protector of the defenseless and the Ruler of nations, and bow before His will. Looking up to Him in confidence and love, and in the blindness of grief groping for a firmer grasp by the hand of faith upon His eternal purposes, may we remember the dead with reverence and affection; may we think with sympathy upon those personally bereaved; and may our faith in righteousness and justice and in the God-given destiny of our free institutions abide unchangeable under every shock.

As we honor our fallen President—killed not for his own sake, but because he stood as the foremost representative of our government, exercising the authority which we had committed to him—let us take renewed devotion to the principles of law and order, of free and just government, which are the corner stone of our nation. May peace be within our walls and prosperity within our palaces. May righteousness and brotherly love reign supreme. May our government, fortified by its own purity and by the lofty ideals of all its citizens, be safe alike from the dagger of the alien anarchist and from the insidious attack of evil men who would poison its life-blood with bribery and corruption while loudly professing allegiance to it.

God grant His peace to all who mourn, and grant to us all to see, through tear-dimmed eyes and above clouds of sorrow, the star of our nation's destiny shining without eclipse in His own heaven, even over the tombs of our martyred presidents.

Some National Sins.

It is a good time now, when the nation's heart is bowed in sorrow, over the untimely death of its chief executive, to think of our national shortcomings and to repent of our civic or political sins. This is the deepest meaning and highest use of either individual or national afflictions.

It is gratifying that party lines disappear in a time of profound national sorrow. This is the better side of our human nature asserting itself. The encomiums on the personal character of President McKinley,—his gentleness, courtesy, purity of life, domestic affection, his thorough honesty and exalted patriotism, his high qualities of leadership, are all mentioned and emphasized just as much now in the Democratic press as in the Republican. There is no reason why this should not be done at all times by the press and platforms of all parties. Mr. McKinley is no better nor worse now than he was during the late presidential campaign, when he was the object of bitter attacks and ridiculous cartoons. How often he was represented as a crowned king swaying his imperial scepter over the ruins of his country's liberty and free institutions! Mr. Cleveland too, was so cartooned by the opposition press. With most people this does no more harm than to lessen proper respect for the head of a nation; but who knows what half-crazed crank or foreign anarchist, taking all this for sober truth, may feel it to be his "duty" to "remove" such a despot from public life?

(Herein is a national sin of which Americans, more than any other people we know, are guilty—lack of proper respect for high officials in the state and nation. It may be that sometimes men may secure high official position who, personally, are not entitled to great respect, but the position they hold entitles them to our respect nevertheless, and we wrong ourselves and dishonor our form of government when we fail to show it.) This does not mean, of course, that the political acts and policies of public men are not subject to criticism. It means that this should be done, when necessary, without resort to such personal villification and reckless abuse as are calculated to breed disrespect for those in authority and for law and order. There is probably a closer connection between the partisan warfare we are in the habit of making on our public men, and the painful disrespect for law which is often deplored, in this country, than we have been accustomed to think. If we mistake not there is great room for repentance and improvement in this respect on the part of the people of this country.

But not only do we abuse our public men for the sin of belonging to a different political party than that with which we train, but we fail to give them credit often for the good they do. This applies all the way from your ward representative to the President of the United States. How few of us know anything of their burdens, perplexities, and the practical difficulties with which they have to contend! When they do something praiseworthy, we take that as a matter of course, and when they fail to do as well as we think they ought to, then we make complaint, but often without proper knowledge of the obstacles in the way. Strangers visiting this country from England and attending our public worship, have remarked on how seldom they have heard prayers offered for the President of the United States, governors of states and all who occupy responsible positions in the government. This is only a symptom, but a grave symptom, of a defect in our national character. We do not closely associate these governmental positions with religion, as parts of a divine order having in view the welfare of society. Separation of church and state in this country has come to mean, with many, the separation of civil authority and the political life of the nation from religious and moral obligations. That politics is a form of ethics, and that the civil powers are ordained of God for the moral welfare of a nation, are truths which need far more emphasis than they receive from either pulpit, forum or press. It is a good time to emphasize such truths.

Does not the late tragedy teach us afresh that we have allowed the liberty of free speech in this country to degenerate into a gross crime against civilization? If anarchists have adopted a program of violence which includes the assassination of civil rulers, what right have they to the protection of any government? This dastardly assassin claims to have gotten his inspiration to murder from Emma Goldman. Then Emma Goldman is particeps criminis, and should be treated accordingly. Let Congress say that no more anarchists shall be landed in this country, and the various state legislatures see to it that no state shall offer shelter or protection for the miserable miscreants whose hands are against government, law and social order. Large as this country is, there is not room in it for professed and avowed anarchists and president-killers. We have sinned by granting liberty to blatant opponents of society to propagate their murderous doctrines. It is a good time to repent and to enact laws that will save us from such tragedies in the future.

There ought to be a general toning up of our civic life, a revival of law-enforcement, of devotion to public duty and to civic righteousness. While we mourn the national loss we have sustained in the death of the President let us also pray that our nation may be saved from those sins which undermine its life, weaken its authority, and prevent it from filling its sublime mission in the world.

A Problem of Consistency.

There has arisen in the minds of many brethren a serious question as to the consistency of our practice in requiring immersion as an invariable condition of membership in our churches, with the emphasis we have always given to freedom of thought in matters not essential to Christian character as an important feature of our plea for Christian union. It is not merely a question of consistency between our past and present, for that is not a matter of vital importance, except as our past teaching on this point may be assumed as indisputably true. That assumed, then the question of practicing in harmony with that teaching becomes a matter of grave importance. Two questions then emerge: (1) Is our position as stated above, namely, that in all matters not vital to Christian character, there must be liberty of thought, of speech and of practice, if we are to have Christian unity, a true position? (2) Is the practice of requiring immersion as a condition of membership consistent with that principle?

There is no doubt that many are troubled on this point. While only a few have reached the conclusion that our practice is wrong and should be modified, many more have a feeling that something is wrong, and that our practice in this respect is not as capable of clear vindication in the light of scripture teaching as other parts of our teaching and practice. They do not propose to make any change in their practice but they are in a condition to welcome any light on the subject that will give them greater assurance that such practice is scripturally impregnable, and that in holding to it they are not creating an unnecessary obstacle to Christian union. This state of things does not call for denunciation, or for raising the cry of "unsoundness." Those who are troubled with this question and those who have reached a different conclusion from most of us, must be assumed to be honest seekers after truth, and as anxious as we are to carry out Christ's will. What is needed is a careful re-investigation, by open minded men among us, of the grounds on which our practice is based, with the supreme desire to know what is the mind of Christ on this subject.

It is not our purpose now to enter into such a discussion, but we may indicate the direction which the discussion should take in order to meet the issue. There is no question in the minds of the class referred to, as to what the baptism of the New Testament is. That the original word means immersion, and that the symbolism in connection with the institution implies this action, they do not question. Any argument directed to showing the meaning of Christ's command, and the practice of the apostles and early church, would miss the point at issue. The necessity of obeying Christ in all his requirements up to the full measure of our knowledge of his will, is also freely conceded by these brethren, and does not need to be proved. That there has been an apostasy from the simple faith and practice taught and enjoined in the New Testament, in which the gospel has been overlaid with the traditions, philosophies and commandments of men, and the ordinances have lost, very largely, their original form and meaning, and that the reformation we are urging looks to the restoration of the faith, the ordinances and the life of the Christianity taught by Christ and his apostles, and, as a result, the restoration of the unity of the early church, thus completing, or carrying forward toward completion, the work of previous reformations, is quite well understood by them, and, if we mistake not, this program of reform is heartily accepted by them.

What, then, is the precise issue which these brethren raise? It is whether we are justified by the New Testament, or by our own historic position on the subject of Christian union, in insisting on a right understanding of the meaning of the word baptism, and a compliance with the form which that meaning requires as a condition of church membership. Would it not be more in consonance with the spirit of Christ's teaching, and would it not accomplish more successfully the primary aim which our movement contemplates, to receive into the membership of our churches all who are willing to accept Christ as Savior and Lord, and whom we have reason to believe are anxious to obey Christ in all things, regardless of their present views about baptism, trusting to time, patient teaching and the influence of association to set them right? Suppose they never do see it to be their duty to be immersed; they have at least obeyed Christ according to their best knowledge of his will and will be accepted of him, and should therefore be accepted of us.

Such is our understanding of the attitude of these brethren who think a modification of our practice is desirable, and necessary to bring it into harmony with our plea for Christian unity. As a preliminary observation let us say that should we become convinced that this change was required by loyalty to Christ, it would be in perfect harmony with the spirit of our movement, and with all our past professions, to make it at once. We have always professed a willingness to make our practice conform to our better understanding of God's word. Moreover, this would not be the first change we have made, though it would be the most far-reaching in its consequences. It is just here where we think the advocates of this change have failed. They have probably not fully considered all that is involved in the proposed change. We are not opposed to change, where changes are needed, and we believe our practice can be improved in many respects. We are not convinced, however, that loyalty to Christ, or consistency with our plea, requires us to change our practice in the respect mentioned. There are, as it seems to us, insuperable objections in the way of such a course. We shall point out some of these in our next week's issue. Meantime, if we have failed to give a fair statement of the position of those who have raised this question, we shall be glad to be set right, that we may run, not as uncertainly, nor fight as one that beateth the air.

Solving the Problems.

Speaking of infallibility, as we were a few weeks ago, the following statement of the case by the late Maltbie D. Babcock appears in the Sunday-School Times under the head "Do We Want Infallibility?" "The man who mourns because infallibility cannot be had in a church, or a guide, or a set of standards, does not know when he is well off. How could God develop our minds, our power of moral judgment, if there were no 'spirit to be tried,' no necessity for discrimination, no discipline of search and challenge and choice? To give the right answer of the problem to a boy is to put him on the side of infallibility as far as that answer is concerned, but it is to do him an ineffable wrong touching his real education. The blessing of life's schooling is not in knowing the right answer in advance, but in developing power through struggle."

There is a world of truth in the above statement. Christian life is a process of education, and education consists not in getting answers to a set of questions, but in developing the power of solving problems which God has given us. The lazy school-boy can find the answer to his problems in mathematics by turning to the key at the end of the book, but the answer will do him little good without the knowledge and the training involved in working it out. And the school-boy who prefers to work it out rather than turn to the key cannot be accused of arrogantly trusting in his own "unaided intellect" for he knows that he is dependent upon the teacher for his knowledge of the process by which he has to work out the problem. So God has given man many problems to work out, and he is the wise man who does not ask for a key to save him the trouble, and who does not think he knows so much that he does not need a teacher, but who goes to the great Teacher to learn the process by which all our problems are to be correctly solved.

Notes and Comments.

We present elsewhere a picture and description of the new building to be erected by the First Christian Church, Jacksonville, Fla. The heroism with which the brethren there have risen to meet the difficulties of the situation, is a more eloquent appeal than any that we could make for them. Hitherto the press has nobly refrained from using that time-worn allusion to the fabled Phoenix rising from the ashes with new life, and we do not wish to be the first to call back the figure from its well earned retirement. But the language will have to develop some new expression to take its place or we will not be responsible for the consequences. Such situations as that at Jacksonville call forth our warmest admiration and ought to evoke substantial aid as well.

We do not use much of our valuable space in printing our good opinion of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST or even its readers' good opinion of it. But this may be of interest in Missouri. Hon. John A. Lee, Lieutenant-Governor of Missouri, writes to the editors of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST: "I get more and better ideas and elevating impressions from your paper than from any other publication I read, and I read a great many."

Senator Wellington, of Maryland, said of the assassination of the President: "McKinley and I are enemies. I have nothing good to say about him, and under the circumstances do not care to say anything bad. I am indifferent to the whole matter." A man may reject Mr. McKinley's political doctrines and say so; many good men do. He may even be so warped by partisanship as to consider the late President a weak or a bad man; a few, not many, good men think so. But when a United States senator expresses himself as indifferent to an anarchist's attack upon any officer of the government, we do not hesitate to say that he has shown himself unworthy of occupying a seat in the Senate or any other position which calls for honest manhood and loyal citizenship.

Bishop Henry B. Whipple, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, died on Monday, Sept. 16, at his home at Faribault, Minn. He was senior bishop of his church in this country and had been bishop of Minnesota for nearly forty-two years. The story of his career, from the time of his consecration as bishop of this then distant territory, would be a history of the rise and development of the state which constituted his diocese. In the early years of his service, the Indians were his most numerous parishioners, and in his loving labors among them, gradually winning their confidence and becoming their trusted counselor and a mediator between their tribes and the government, he occupied a position not unlike that held by John Eliot among the Indians about Roxbury nearly three centuries ago, and by Jonathan Edwards among the Stockbridge Indians a century later. In each case a man who would have stood pre-eminent among his fellows in the centers of population, undertook a work which threatened to engulf him in obscurity and made of it an everlasting monument to his greatness.

From the days of Job, or perhaps earlier, down to the present hour, the problem of evil has been a matter of grave consideration by great minds. Some of the explanations that have been offered dishonor God and some dishonor man, but it has remained for Christian Science to conceive an explanation which achieves the complete stultification of the human mind. A prominent Christian Scientist says of Mrs. Eddy's doctrine that it "gives to its students a definite, clear, certain understanding of God as Spirit Mind and his creation as spiritual or ideal. Measuring the troubles of earth with this teaching, we determine that evil is no part of God nor his ideal creation. Hence it is without God and without hope in the world." In other words, what you cannot explain, deny. True "the troubles of earth" are real enough to be "measured," but as they are not explicable according to the Spirit Mind hypothesis, the simplest thing is to deny them. So they are "without God and without hope in the world." This is even more superficial and less comforting than the efforts of Job's friends to solve the same problem. They at least did not torment him by the assurance that his boils, being inconsistent with the spiritual or ideal creation, were "without God and without hope in the world."

One of our evangelists in reporting a meeting in the present number of this paper says that the town is not "stirred as never before" and that his converts are not all prominent men and heads of families, but "just common, ordinary people." This is a scandal. Any evangelist of experience ought to know that what is expected of him is to report "The greatest meeting in the history of the church"—if not of the city—and he ought to see to it that his reports leave no uncertainty as to the intellectual, moral and possibly financial superiority of his converts over all those who fail to respond. We trust the evangelist will heed this warning and in the future not have anything but the greatest meeting on record. We don't want to have to speak about it again.

We Americans pride ourselves upon our large sense of humor, but one of the penalties which we have to pay in compensation for this blessing is the prevalence of the idiot who thinks he has a sense of humor but who has in reality only a nauseating compound of cruelty, recklessness and intellectual vacuity. His other name is the Practical Joker. A particularly aggravated case occurred recently at Coney Island where a dog which had been trained from puppyhood to distinguish cries of distress from the gay shouts of bathers, and to carry life-preservers to drowning men, was made the victim of a joke. The man who was endowed with this exquisite sense of humor, swam far out and gave the cry of distress to fool the dog. The dog responded instantly and came to save him. This part of the trick was very successful. Great joke on the dog! But the joker planned a still greater triumph—a perfect chef d'œuvre of humor. So when the dog attempted to save him, he pushed it under again and again until the animal was almost exhausted. The owner arrived on the scene in time to save the dog, which from that day has refused to enter the water. A judicial system which finds in such a joke no ground for a criminal action, is imperfect. The Japanese water-torture would be the most appropriate form of joke with which to reward this joker.

Editor's Easy Chair
or Macatawa Musings.

Dark, lowering clouds, a thin mist, a high west wind, and a wild, rolling and roaring sea—these are the features of the scene that opens out of my west window, as I sit within, where the blaze of an open fire casts its radiant cheer. There is a note of melancholy in the music of the waves to day, which seems to chime in with the general loneliness and quiet of the place. Closed are the hotels, silent are their halls and corridors, where erstwhile were heard the notes of music and the sound of dancing; gone are the gay throngs of summer visitors, and deserted are the winding walks and woodland ways, "with here and there a traveler." It is the fate of all summer resorts. Fair Macatawa, in spite of all her charms, must suffer the common lot. Though she sits in quiet, melancholy mood to-day, she is not disconsolate. She is only sad as a love-sick maiden is sad when parting with her faithful lover. I seem to hear her singing softly to herself:

Roses will bloom again,
Sweet love will come again,
It will be summer time,
By and by.

And when the June roses are blooming, once more her lovers will be coming back, her lakes will blossom with canvas, her hotels will be thronged with visitors, her cottages will swarm with human life, the fisherman will go forth to try his luck and tell, on his return, how "the biggest one got away," and Macatawa life will go on "just as of old." But meanwhile Macatawa has a vacation and may rest in peace.

Now that night, unrelieved by moon or star, has settled down upon the Park, it is easier to tell what cottages are tenanted, and who are yet tarrying. The light gleams out of a cottage, here and there, on hill-top and lake shore, and these scattered lights, sending out their friendly rays, seem to shake hands through the darkness. The mails are reduced to one per day, instead of four, as during the summer, and the few people that abide meet at the post office in the evening to get their mail and to exchange greetings and fish stories. A four-pound bass was caught to-day, and it weighed four pounds. Among those who remain are some hay-fever patients—a class of people with whom I have come into closer fellowship within the last few years. Coming from St. Louis a few days ago, there were but two people on the sleeper coming north, and we were both suffering from hay fever. The pollen of the Illinois flowers and weeds seemed to be unusually exasperating, on account of the dry weather perhaps, and we made the welkin ring with our alternate fits of sneezing as we journeyed across the state. It was not through any discourtesy to the "Prairie State," which, though "not to be sneezed at," is a good one to sneeze in, when the conditions are right. Most of the victims of this strange malady go further north than this, and remain until the frost comes at home. Then they can return with impunity until August comes round again. August and September are the two months in which hay fever victims must flee the wrath to come or suffer the consequences.

One of the events of the closing season was the launching of a new vessel here last week. It was a sailing vessel, constructed from keel to mast here in Macatawa, and on the lower veranda of Edgewood-on-the-lake, and by a Junior member of the Edgewood household. It is about fifteen feet in length by nearly five feet beam, and is canvas covered. It carries seventy-two square feet of sail, triangular shaped. The construction of this boat deeply interested all the boys of the neighborhood. They looked forward anxiously to the day of launching. The opinion was freely expressed among them that the craft would float when put in the water, and skim over the lake like a duck. They spoke familiarly of the "keel," "bow," "stern," "cockpit," "deck," "rudder," "tiller," "locker," "mast," "boom," "sheets," "halyards," etc., as if they were old salts. The day and hour of launching found them all present, with a number of larger people. The weather was bright, and a brisk north breeze was blowing. Col. Hallack came around with his steam launch, the "Red Wing," to pick up the crew in case of accident. The vessel was carried down to the Lake Michigan shore, little Judith broke a bottle of lake water on her bow, or attempted to do so, throwing the bottle after the vessel, saying, "I christen thee 'White Duck.'" An experienced sailor had been secured for the "trial trip," and no sooner had she touched the water than the sail was hoisted, and as she moved out over the lake in the teeth of the wind, the "Red Wing" welcomed her with a salute, the boys cheered from the shore, and the jolly tar pronounced her a true sailing vessel, though made by an amateur. Thus the "White Duck" was added to the sailing craft of these waters.

This is our last night at Macatawa Park for the season. The clouds and the rain and the high wind of the past few days have passed. To-night the stars look down from a clear, moonless sky, and "silence, like a gentle spirit," is brooding over the lake and forest, save as the low wash of the waves on the beach comes as a sweet lullaby to our ears. It is a fit mood in which to tell the place good-bye, but it is such a night and has been such a day as woos one to tarry longer. But it cannot be. Our good rowboat that has carried us safely in storm and calm over these lakes has been put into winter quarters, as has also the "White Duck." The fishing rods have been placed in their racks in the cottage, and to-morrow morning the shutters will go on Edgewood-on-the-lake. So ends the brief season—how brief! A few books read, a few letters and other communications written (a box containing 500 envelopes was exhausted some time ago), a few bright Sundays with their religious services, a few greetings with old friends, a few excursions on the lakes, and behold! the summer is ended, the autumn winds are blowing, there are voices calling us away, and we go hence. How like human life! As I am penning these thoughts to-night the President of the United States is probably passing into the deepening shadows which we call death. It is sad, beyond words to express, that such a man, filling such a position, should be taken away from the wife and country he loved and served by such a wretch! Thus our stay here ends in a gloom which envelopes the whole country.

Macatawa, Mich., Sept. 13, 1901.
P. S.—The morning has come, and with it confirmation of our worst fears. Our good, faithful President has joined the company of noble martyrs. He died on the heights of Fame, and his name will be registered among the immortals of history. Loving husband, upright citizen, able statesman, worthy Christian, spotless official, a sorrowing nation weeps at his grave. Like his Master, he wore the mock robe of imperialism here, but yonder he shall wear a crown of life. But "God reigns, and the Government at Washington still lives."

The Life and Teachings of Tolstoy

By PETER AINSLIE.

One of the most remarkable men of this century is Count Leo Tolstoy. However much piety and scholarship may differ from his scriptural interpretations and conclusions, his strenuous thought has caught the attention of the world, and the beauty of his latter life has thrown about his character such a charm and fascination that it challenges the admiration of even his enemies, and this is greatly augmented in the remembrance of the political tyranny and religious slavery amid which he lives.

Born of noble ancestry, whose activities had been in the field of liberal thought and benevolent acts, Leo Tolstoy first saw the light of day on August 28, 1828, in the Russian province of Tula. While a mere boy he evinced skeptical notions, which may have been due both to his choice of reading and his companions, some of whom had expressed their disbelief in God. At fifteen years of age, he entered the University of Kasan, which he left after three years without graduating, and five years later he joined the army. In the interim, he attained considerable popularity and was regarded as one of the most brilliant young men among the Russian nobility.

During his military service he began writing and the appearance of his "War Sketches" attracted wide attention. After the Crimean war, in which he served with distinction and was numbered with the defenders of Sebastopol, he retired from the army and made several tours through Europe and finally settled on his country estate near Moscow. This was in 1861 and the year after the appearance of his "War and Peace," an historical romance in several volumes, dealing with the Napoleonic invasion of 1812 and the events that followed the retreat from Moscow. It produced a profound sensation throughout Europe. He was then only thirty-three years old and had wealth, position and fame.

The spirit of that time was marked by a general insincerity and religion was only a nominal thing. These conditions necessarily produced a corrupt social life and Tolstoy was always an actor in society's role. While in the army his gambling frequently got him into trouble and on one occasion his losses were so heavy at a game of cards that he was forced to give order for the sale of his old home place where he was born, which brought 5,000 rubles. It was never redeemed and it is now unoccupied, its pillars crumbling and its walls generally defaced, gradually going to wreck, like the life then of its dissipating owner.

Laurence Sterne's writings had greatly influenced Tolstoy and gave him the first impulse to write, his first production being a philosophical treatise at the age of fifteen. Socrates, Epictetus, Pascal, Victor Hugo, Goethe, Dickens and Rousseau were his favorites in the world of literature, but the latter influenced him more than any other author and on one occasion he said: "I deified Rousseau to such a degree that at one time I wished to have his portrait inserted in a locket and wear it on my breast instead of a holy picture."

At the age of thirty-four, he married the Countess Sophia Andreevna and he at once set to work to relieve the suffering condition of the peasantry. He continued to write and found special delight in works of fiction, upon which literary critics have declared his fame will largely rest. In these volumes, he pitilessly portrays the vices and follies of the wealthy, aristocratic class and is warm in his praises of simplicity and unpretending virtue. His mingling with the peasant life has brought him in closer touch with nature and higher morals. It was no difficult task to weave the characters of the plain people into his novels and put upon them touches of beautiful simplicity as seen by his dissatisfied and craving soul.

The nearer he came in touch with peasant life and saw its simple worship and sincerity, the more evident became the sensuality of the Russian court and the deeper were the agonies of his soul over his own condition. At times he thought of suicide and abandoned hunting for fear that, in the agonies of his own heart, he might take his life, and all firearms were removed from his house.

More than fifteen years had passed since his home had been graced by the Countess Sophia and several children increased the sunshine of his happy home. His wealth and fame were increasing, but, like the sad-hearted English poet-peer,

"Though gay companions over the bowl
Dispel awhile the sense of ill;
Though pleasure fill the maddening soul,
The heart, the heart is lonely still."

One day while the peasants on his estate were harvesting, Tolstoy went out in the field and in conversation with the men, he asked why it was that some of the farmers were so kind and fair to their serfs and others so cruel and unjust to them.

"Because," said one of the peasants, "men are not all alike. One lives for his body and the other for his soul, for God."

"And what do you mean by living for his soul, for God?" he asked.

"It is quite simple," said the peasant, "it is living by the rule of God, of the truth."

Tolstoy made no answer, but turned away with those words ringing in his ears. The night of a lifetime began to break and light had burst upon his mind in the simple idea, "living by the rule of God, of the truth." The rude peasant unknowingly had laid the key of heavenly knowledge and happy life in the hands of the Russian prince, and no pardoned convict ever grasped so quickly his pardon as did Tolstoy this single truth on the harvest field beyond Moscow. Sixty-five years before, those hills beheld the decline of Napoleon's star, but now in the calm of a summer day, they marked the rising of the star of hope in the sad heart of one who was being tossed like a ship without rudder or compass upon a stormy sea. Though his heart was corrupt and feeding upon the baser things of life, it was struggling to rise out of its prison house like a caged bird beating its wings against the iron bars and dropping melancholy notes into its songs.

Shortly after his conversation in the harvest field, an Eastern apologue fell into his hands and he was greatly agitated. The apologue was this: A traveler in a desert is attacked by a wild beast and to save himself he gets into a dry well; but at the bottom of the well, he sees a huge serpent with jaws wide open to devour him. He is afraid to get out for fear of the wild beast and he is afraid to descend for fear of the serpent. Seeing a branch growing out of the wall, he catches hold of it. His arms grow tired, but still he holds on; and then he sees two mice, one white and one black, gnawing through the branch inch by inch. He knows that it must soon give way and he must perish; yet, seeing a few drops of honey on the leaves, he stretches out and takes them, though he finds them no longer sweet. The interpretation of this apologue is not difficult. The desert is the world; the wild beast is human passion; the serpent is death; the branch is the life to which we cling; the black and white mice, which gnaw through the branch, are the nights and days; the honey on the leaves are the few poor, transient pleasures, at which men vainly clutch, as they hang over the abyss.

To Tolstoy this was a mirror, for in it he saw his own life, its vanity, its passion, its influence for evil, its possibility for good. He saw death and the grave, which he dreaded. He was plunged into the deepest agony of soul. Up to this time, he had been a nihilist, "not a revolutionary socialist, but a man who believed in nothing," as he expresses it. With deep resolve, he decided to search for truth and find it at any cost. With a boldness unparalleled in modern times, he swept aside the ecclesiastical dogmas and began a careful study of the Scriptures. The wealth of human intellect filled his library shelves, but the Book of books was his study, and after six years, frequently ten hours a day, he had completed the most daring translation of the four gospels ever undertaken. Not even liberal commentators like Renan and Strauss would ever have thought of such renderings, but with his great intellect all ablaze, Tolstoy sought for truth like a madman. He frequently compared his translations and conclusions with the best scholarship of ancient and modern times and as frequently rejected their decisions for a simpler interpretation, even if it opposed every conviction of his own heart and all Christian opinion. The sermon on the Mount, as found in Matthew, formed the basis of his study and to understand this sublime doctrine of Jesus, so as to practice it in its simplicity, was the passion of his heart.

The orthodox Greek Church is the state Church of Russia. It is so filled with forms and sacraments that scarcely the faintest outlines of the Christ could be seen. In the bosom of this church he had been reared. This was the only Christianity he saw and this was anti-Christian, but feeling the impossibility of living without religion, he turned from his nihilism to this semi-pagan church, hoping to find peace and comfort; but it was like exchanging one prison cell for another, with air more foul and the darkness more dense. He submitted to the ecclesiastical shackles only because he wanted to be better, but the observance of pithless forms that went out in fasts and counting beads in prayers did not meet the hunger of his heart. He had nothing to do because the church did it all. She baptized him, anointed him, gave him the eucharist, confessed for him and promised after he lost consciousness to administer extreme unction and save him. The sacraments, which were administered by another, were essential and there was no necessity to abstain from anything. The church was working miracles with splinters from the cross and pieces of Mary's dress, and either publicly sanctioned the grossest wickedness in political, social and religious life, or remained quiet before it.

With no assurance of help from the Greek Church, this heart-sore man turned his back upon its ecclesiasticism and fearlessly started fighting his way out of the dark, with the dimly burning lamp of reason, which he regarded as the only means of revelation, and in order to live according to the doctrine of Jesus, he declared that "a man must first of all free himself from religious deception," and "accept the universal verdict of reason," which he claims "is the same for all men and all times." This is what he says: "Whether a Jew affirm that God walked in a flame of fire, or a Hindoo that Buddha ascended in the rays of the sun, or whether it be affirmed that Mohammed flew into heaven, or that Christ walked on the water and so forth, the reason of all men, always and everywhere, gives the same answer, 'It is not true.' But to the question, 'Is it right to act toward others as you would have them act toward you? Is it good to love men, to pardon their offences and to be merciful?' the reason of all men, at all times, answers, 'Yes; it is right, it is good.'" Reason, he declares, is that light to which Jesus referred when he said, "Take heed that the light, which is in thee, be not darkness," and he marshals a host of sages and philosophers, who have argued for the guide of reason. The Greek Church still claiming to work miracles with old bones, etc., drove him to reject miracles.

Working from this basis, Tolstoy excludes the supernatural almost entirely. The fall of man, the atonement of Jesus, even his resurrection and the general idea of immortality, are assailed with all of the boldness and brilliancy of Porphyry, although his argument is apparently presented with the reverence of a churchman. He argues that Jesus saves us only by showing us how to live; that the thirteen passages of Scripture in the four gospels, that are commonly understood to refer to the resurrection of Jesus, refer to the re-establishment of truth, which came a few days after the crucifixion; and that the equivalent Greek word for "resurrection" is not found in the gospels, except in the two references, one to John the Baptist, where Herod expressed fears that he had risen from the dead, and the other in the parable of Lazarus, in the expression "though one arose from the dead." With this, Tolstoy denies the individual resurrection at the last day, declaring with an elaborate argument that the idea of the individual resurrection is not even Jewish, but belongs to savage races and is based upon the resemblance between death and sleep, but that those who live in God, conforming to God's will, shall never see death, but will be united to God, and he admits no other idea of the resurrection. Looking into the future life, he rejects the voluptuous bliss of Mohammed as too coarse and the Greek and Roman Catholic idea of heaven and hell as entirely incompatible with the idea of a God of love. He rejects the conception of Nirvana and the transmigration of the soul, as likewise transgressing the demands of reason, although less coarse than the Mohammed and Catholic ideas.

In the closing lines of his book entitled "The Christian Teaching" he says: "One thing alone is certain and indubitable, that which Christ said when he was dying: 'Into thy hands I commend my spirit'—that is to say, at death, I return whence I came. And if I believe that from which I have emanated to be reason and love (and these two realities I know) then I shall joyously return to him, knowing that it will be well with me. Not only have I no regret, but I rejoice at the thought of the passage which awaits me."

These are the gravest errors in the theology announced by Tolstoy, and certainly they are very grave, but considering the social and religious degradation that surrounded him, it is no more wonder that in his search for the true God, he should reject these things that were preached by a lifeless and semi-pagan church, that ignored almost the entire ethical teachings of Jesus, than that Voltaire should reject all Christianity because he knew only the most corrupt Christianity that boastfully set itself forth as true Christianity. Voltaire turned into infidelity and erected a church at his own expense and carved on its corner stone: "This church is erected to God by Voltaire." It was the insurrection of reason, rebelling against hypocrisy that covered itself under sacred forms and sacraments, but amid it all Tolstoy kept his face turned toward God, desperately looking into the clouds that surrounded him, hoping to see the eternal light or feel its warmth upon cheeks already wet with tears. The desire to know the will of God as revealed in Jesus burned in his heart like a furnace, and the Sermon on the Mount became to him the pearl of greatest price.

[TO BE CONCLUDED.]

JUDAS

By JOSEPH HATCHITT,
Superintendent of Schools, Lockhart, Texas.

Nowhere else may human character, either as it approaches the divine or as it draws near to the infernal, be so profitably studied as in the Bible. The Bible was written in the interest of righteousness. Sin is never made attractive. Virtue is never presented in a contemptible or ridiculous light. Iniquity is always hideous. There are pictures of sin, but in all of them the trail of the serpent is plainly visible. The balances are never so manipulated as to make the pleasures of sin seem to outweigh its wages. Neither monsters nor angels masquerade in the forms of men. No character is represented as being so bad but we see it might have been worse. None so good but that they desire to be better.

Total depravity is not a necessary qualification for citizenship in Satan's kingdom, nor is sinless perfection required of or attained by the soldier of the cross. During that awful night preceding the crucifixion, when the emissaries of the Sanhedrim were scouring the country for those whom they might suborn, Judas drew a line which he refused to cross. He swallowed treachery, but strained at perjury. He could not be induced to appear as a witness against the Master. Most wicked men draw a line which they purpose not to cross. This line often recedes as it is approached. Man often draws a line separating the sins he is inclined to from those he has no mind to. All such lines are crooked—crooked enough to take in perdition. The only line between righteousness and iniquity was drawn by Jesus of Nazareth.

Judas was possessed of the devil of avarice. Some devils go in droves, but avarice needs no assistance. When the unclean spirit of drunkenness is cast out of a man, it walketh in dry places, seeking rest and finding none. This demon even now finds no rest in "dry" localities. But woe to the house that is empty, swept and garnished. Brethren, you cannot do a better temperance work than to furnish employment to those assailed by this demon. This demon takes charge of most derelicts on the ocean of life and with seven other devils steers straight to perdition.

The Beelzebub of avarice seems often to cast out other devils. It takes money to dig a drunkard's grave. Avarice has kept many a man from filling one. Avarice drives away many vices and has the semblance of many virtues. Judas would not have been chosen as the treasurer of the apostolic college had he not shown fitness for the office. He was not a prodigal nor a spendthrift. He was a man of business ability, prudent, wise, discreet, careful, painstaking and attentive. He went into the city to buy bread and always returned with the full value of all that he expended. Philip asked the question with regard to the feeding of the multitude, but the suggestion, perhaps, came first from Judas. He looked with wonder upon the Master's miracle, and doubtless his basket was the first of the twelve to be filled, and with the choicest of the fragments.

Better men than Judas troubled the Master with ambitious strife and jealous bickering. By the sin of ambition angels fell. The human heart in the clutch of avarice is too small to throb with ambition. Judas cared not who sat upon the right hand nor who upon the left. He had but one standard of value and desired nothing that he could not measure by it. The alabaster box of ointment had for him no value except the money for which it might have been sold.

Judas could find and mis-state a "paramount issue" with all the readiness of an astute politician. The poor are always with us, and every four years their welfare is an object of Judas-like solicitude. With the quickness of a business man, Judas estimated the value of the box of ointment. Had he been entrusted with the affair, he doubtless would have sold it for its appraised value. Had he been required to render it for taxation he would have been quick to adopt the discreet business methods in vogue to-day.

We are told that capital is timid. Assessors of taxes often find it so. A valuation made to a prospective purchaser often shrinks with great timidity when made to the assessor. Thus is taxation rendered equal and uniform. It is felt hardly by the poor and hardly felt by the rich. A similar shrinkage of values gave to Ananias his world-wide reputation. Judas regarded tax paying as an unnecessary evil. When the Master would pay, he appealed to Peter the fisherman, not to Judas the treasurer.

Judas was a trader between the camp of righteousness and that of iniquity. He went at night when good men sleep, when lost men wander and when wanderers are lost; when weak men are caught in snares set for the unwary; when foolish men enter into places whose ways are ways of death and whose steps take hold on hell; at night when wicked men plot and take counsel together and lie in wait to shed innocent blood. It was fitting that this infamous bargain should be consummated at night.

Do the city hall and the den of vice ever hold communion under cover of darkness? Does Judas carry messages from the court house to the slums? If these things are done in the green tree of a Texas town what is done in the driftwood of our cities? Have you not felt humiliated when our political leaders have told us that our ticket would be saved in certain doubtful states by the slums of the cities? Why should that vote be cast solid for our party except as the result of a corrupt bargain? The political navigator who sets his sails to catch the pestilent breezes that blow from the slums of our cities or who would float his boat upon their streams of sewage, is not a safe captain for the ship of state. "Great is Tammany and Croker is its prophet," was an unprofitable piece of rhetoric.

Judas hung himself; he has hung many a jury since. Trial by jury and the right of suffrage have been regarded as the safeguards of American institutions. And yet it is a fact known to all, but perhaps not easily proved, that Judas invades both the jury-box and the ballot-box and makes both a subject of barter. "We will beat them if they don't buy us." Enough money renders a man immune, not from crime but from conviction. The Sanhedrim's campaign fund was used to pay for both treachery and perjury. The corruption funds of our great political parties, the use of money for the corruption of juries, let us hope, may not result in the crucifixion of American institutions.

In a great slaughtering establishment in one of our western cities an ox has been kept for years which has been trained to walk from the pens to the shambles, leading his dumb companions to death. This ox, hoary with age, is by the employes of the slaughtering establishment called by the appropriate name of Judas. In a southern city a slaughter bouse of a different character was for years conducted, the finished product of which had always a boundless market, for hell and destruction are never full. Two men at whose bidding the young men had crowded the way to death as to a festival vouched (for a consideration) for the honesty of this iniquitous institution. As they at stated periods entered the shambles, thousands followed their leaders and feared no danger.

When eternity shall unveil the dire results of time's iniquities, the Louisiana State Lottery will be seen to have been one of the most hideous of the monsters begotten by avarice. The dumb ox earned a right to his master's crib by the same methods that these leaders earned wealth and ease; by the same methods that Judas earned his thirty pieces of silver. The same question was asked at New Orleans and a like answer returned as at Jerusalem: "What will ye give me and I will betray him unto you. And they covenanted with him for thirty pieces of silver." The steering committees of such institutions often reason with themselves as did Judas: no unwilling person will become a victim. Judas knew his Master's power. "If I do not betray him, some one else will." Judas had the positive assurance of the Master on that point.

But the comparison is not good in all particulars, Judas was stricken with remorse and came to loathe the price of his infamy. But Aceldamas are not bought with the blood-money of his imitators.

Heredity and environment have much to do with the formation of human character. Judas was of avaricious heredity. Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap. Sometimes the wind is sown by one generation, cultivated by the second and a storm of destruction harvested by the third. Wine in the first generation, whisky in the second, are often followed by delirium tremens in the third. The great ancestor of Judas was avaricious. Jacob reaped the whirlwind before his death. Jacob's avarice made his brother a pauper. The avarice of his sons made their brother a slave. Jacob killed a kid and made his father believe that its hair was that of Esau. Jacob's sons killed a kid and made their father believe that its blood was that of Joseph. Jacob crouched like a coward in the presence of his injured brother. His sons trembled like slaves in the presence of Joseph. It is not strange that Judas should descend from such ancestry.

But this was also the ancestry of the man Christ Jesus. And in his lineage we do not find the best and purest of Jacob's line. Joseph the pure, Moses the great law-giver, Caleb and Joshua the faithful, none of these were his ancestors. In reading his genealogy we are reminded of the brutal Judah, of the loathsome Tamar, of David's great crime and of Solomon's debauchery. And even the lovely Ruth—set like a gem between the ermine of the judges and the purple of the kings—Ruth was descended from Moab, him of unspeakable parentage.

So heredity and environment are not the only factors of human character. Let us learn a lesson from the artesian well. A stream cannot rise higher than its fountain, but it may rise to the level of its source. The fountain of human life is not in this valley in which we live. It is in the hill country—high up in the everlasting mountains of God's eternal purposes. The channels through which human life has flowed have been tilted and tortuous, warped and bent by iniquity. The stream of life in its meanderings has often been near to infernal fires and may have the sulphurous smell of the nether world upon it. But when the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ reaches that stream, it bursts asunder the bands which environment and heredity have placed upon it, and that life, that soul, like the bubbling, gushing water, has behind it and beneath it and around it and within it a divine force, by means of which it may rise to the level of its source—to the very throne of God in heaven. For which blessed hope, for which glorious possibility, praise the Lord, oh my soul, and let all that is within me bless his holy name!

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

A correspondent of The Sunday-School Times, in the paper dated Aug. 24, 1901, says:

"It is an uncontroverted fact that some persons join the church who are not, and don't profess to want to be, Christians."

This is a startling statement. But is it true? I confess that I am inclined to believe the statement to be correct. That there are men and women in our churches, not a few, who are not in any legitimate sense of the word Christians I do not for a moment doubt. It is not so evident to my mind that they "don't profess to want to be Christians." This portion of the proposition seems to me to be a little too strong. Those to whom I refer do not, by word or by deed, suggest that they have any vital connection with the Christ. No one would ever suspect, from their lives, that they believe on the Son of God, or that they love him. The evidences of faith and affection alike are absent. They are church members, in good and regular standing, but not Christians. They have joined the church but have not joined Jesus.

Much is said about uniting with the church. Men are asked to join the church. "So many were added to the church." "How many additions were there?" A common question, this, Why not use the language of the New Testament? There is not so much as an intimation in the New Testament that men were invited to become members of the church. The Christ was held up in the preaching of that early time, and those who heard the good news were told to believe in and obey him. And as a matter of fact multitudes gave themselves to him. They became his disciples. They placed themselves under him to be taught, guided, helped, saved. As a result of their self-surrender to the Christ they gathered themselves together in groups for work and worship. These companies were called congregations, or churches. Christianity, in our day, rather than Christianity, is good form. Let us return in preaching and in practice to the custom of the apostolic age, in this matter.

Practical Calvinism abounds; theoretical Calvinism is out of date. The Calvinism of John Calvin is dead; but there are practical Calvinists in all our churches. "Once in grace always in grace," seems to be their motto. It is not, however, so much the final perseverance of the saints as it is the permanent value of baptism—having been immersed and having united with the church they are safe, absolutely safe, now and evermore, for time and eternity, "Baptism doth also now save us," is a favorite text. Do you know such persons? If you do not you are to be congratulated.

What is baptism, anyway? Is baptism immersion and immersion baptism? Is this all there is of it? Are the words baptism and immersion equivalents? By no means! There is much more in baptism than an immersion in water. Many a man has been immersed in water who has not been baptized with Christian baptism. The Greek church, for instance, immerses infants. Are immersed infants baptized with the baptism ordained by the Christ and practiced by his apostles? The immersion of an infant is not Christian baptism because there is no spiritual preparation. A man immersed without a personal, spiritual experience is not baptized. In the baptism ordained by the Lord Jesus a spiritual preparation is essential, "He that BELIEVETH and is baptized," is the way Jesus put it "REPENT and be baptized," is the way Simon Peter put it in his great Jerusalem discourse. The words BELIEF and REPENTANCE express a spiritual experience. Without this, whatever the act, there is no Christian baptism. I fear that there are persons immersed in water every day in the year who know absolutely nothing, as a matter of personal experience, of faith, nothing of repentance. Such are received into the fellowship of our churches and remain members in good and regular standing. Are they Christians? They united with the church as persons join the Masons, or Odd Fellows, or Woodmen of the World, or the Elks; and there is about as much religion in the one case as in the other.

Just now there is a special interest, apparently, in some minds, as to the reception of the pious unimmersed into the full fellowship of our churches. An unidentified member of the Smith family has disturbed some good men by assertions which seem to me to smack of the reckless. He says that many of our prominent preachers, great men they are too, receive the pious unimmersed into the fellowship of their churches. I know of nothing of the kind. His statement reveals a custom of which I am ignorant. But suppose the language of this unknown representative of the multitudinous Smith family represents a fact—what of it? Are we not receiving unbaptized people all the time who are not noted for their piety? Read again what is said above as to the nature of baptism. The reception of the pious unimmersed does not trouble me half as much as the reception of the unbelieving, impenitent, unbaptized.

Two girls now, in Denver, are ready to be immersed and join the Christian Church whose mother is a Methodist, and whose father was immersed years ago by a Christian preacher in Illinois, but who is not, in any manner, identified with any church. Why do the girls desire to unite with the Christian Church? Why? They prefer the Christian Church to the Methodist because there are no rules in the former against dancing, card playing, and theatre going! This is their own way of putting it. Will they be immersed and received into the church? Not by the writer of this letter.

Personally, I have no trouble with the pious unimmersed. They hear me preach every Sunday in the year. They do not, so far as I can see, even think of asking me to recognize their affusion as baptism. The copy of the New Testament from which I read in my preaching, and I read from it a great deal, does not encourage them to ask to be received into the church, of which I am, for the time, pastor, on their sprinkling. I am at work among such people all the time. I baptize them, too. Baptized one less than a week ago. I work in union meetings. Have three such meetings a week. Last night I was in the Asbury Methodist Church, Thursday evening I will be, the Lord willing, in the Third Congregational Church, and Saturday afternoon I will be in the Young Men's Christian Association Auditorium. Three weeks last summer I had seven such meetings a week. I say none other things than I find in the word and I say all that I find in the Book as I come to it. Do they, the people, know my position on baptism and kindred topics? Indeed they do! Do they not become offended? Not a bit. On the contrary they seem to be pleased. At any rate I cannot go to all the places nor do all the work of this kind, to which I am invited.

This is no time for hairsplitting. Preach the word. Omit speculations. Preach the word. Proclaim the gospel of the Son of God in plain United States English. Fit this gospel to the needs of the people now. Herald the message of salvation, as you read this message in the New Testament, with its specific conditions. Let all preachers give to the people an example of obedience to the Christ by doing what he commands to be done. "Preach the gospel." Be faithful, as Paul was faithful. He said that he shunned not to declare the whole counsel of God. This is what the people want and such a course will please the head of the body, even Jesus Christ our Lord.

Denver, Col.

A MODERN MENACE

By STEPHEN J. COREY.

If the Lord's day is to be saved, the church has got to save it. Unless it is guarded by Christian people, it is going to be lost and we will have upon us the disgrace of Europe—the continental Sunday. How can we expect Sunday laws to be enacted and enforced when Christian people ruthlessly break the spirit of the day? We might as well expect the saloon to be abolished while people are indifferent to its curse.

The Sunday newspaper, in our cities, is a very serious danger to religious life, and is becoming more and more so every year. It is absolutely alarming to see the number of Christian homes into which the Sunday journal is finding its way to-day. I saw a cartoon a little while ago. The title was: "What a woman sees of her husband on Sunday." All you could see was a big newspaper, with a man's hands gripping on either side and his feet protruding from beneath. There was a man behind it, but there might as well not have been for all the family or the church got out of him. Is not this coming to be too familiar a scene in many Christian homes in our cities?

Did you ever consider the contents of the ordinary Sunday newspaper? "Oh, they have religious reading in them!" some admirer says. Yes, one square inch of religious notes to a square yard of scandal and crime! Some one took the pains to look over seven leading New York Sunday papers a while ago, and this is what he found:

Murders and assaults.....	12 columns
Adulteries (first rate Sunday reading).....	7 "
Thefts, etc.....	24 "
Sporting news (splendid Sunday reading).....	81 "
Theatrical notes (must have that)	44 "
Gossip and fashion (meat for the soul)	77 "
Sensational topics (people don't like sensational preaching, but they can stand that).....	42 "
Fiction	99 "
Foreign news.....	47 "
Miscellaneous news.....	92 "
Editorials.....	39 "
Art and literature.....	24 "
Unclean personals.....	8 "
Religious	3 1/4 "

Nine hundred and eleven and a quarter columns, and only three and a quarter of them religious. Gabriel himself could not hold an audience whose heads were full of such stuff as that!

Men and women are already weary with six days of toil, six days of reading of politics and business and crime. Then bring the Sunday paper into the sanctuary of the home and fill the mind with these things—stuff the brain with this worse than trash, when it is starving for something uplifting and helpful—friends, it approaches spiritual suicide!

Daily papers in reality mirror the dark side of life. It is the doings of police and politicians, of pugilists and thugs that make good head lines. The reporter's scent is trained for carrion. The church that is quarreling gets more attention than the thousands that are doing good. The one preacher that is false gets more attention than all that are true. The man that deserts his wife makes a more racy column than the one who is true. We need to have the bright side once a week. We need a religious paper to read on the Lord's day to keep us from thinking that all men are false and the world is going to the dogs.

How many of the Christian readers of the Sunday papers would think of sitting down for half an hour before church to gossip on some immoral scandal? How much more right have you to sit down and gossip with a newspaper, on a subject that, spoken about, brings the blush of shame to the cheek? If a man gets up on Lord's day morning and reads two hours of scandal and ruin, of blood and business, and then comes to church, the preacher has got the double task of first preaching all of that stuff out of him and then preaching something better in. And that is not all. If he would be sure of his man, he must lock him up so that he does not go back to his paper again.

Do you think such reading on the day that should be kept for the soul is good? Reading that leaves out the stars, the sunshine, the flowers, the noble deeds, the higher life—in fact almost everything but filth, blood and business? Do you think it is conducive to rest of mind, home purity, love and the cultivation of good morals and a religious life? If it is, then good is bad and bad is good. What shall we do with the man who says he can't afford a religious weekly, and yet buys the Sunday newspaper? He needs "laboring" with, does he not?

III. The Crucible of Science.

Not only is it true that the Bible up to this date has not been convicted of a single blunder in relation to science; but what is equally wonderful, when the conclusions of modern scientists have come into collision with any portion of the Scriptures, the Bible, after prolonged investigation, has invariably turned out to be right so far as it has been possible to settle the question in dispute. I have already given instances in corroboration of this assertion, and looking now for a moment at another branch of science, other illustrations to the same effect may be given. When the waters of the Noachian deluge had subsided, God declared, according to the book of Genesis, that he would never again destroy the world by water. The rainbow was chosen as a visible token and symbol of this pledge of the Almighty. In the same line of promise Jehovah said to Job in one of his sublimest aspirations: "Who shut up the sea with doors when it broke forth, as if it had issued out of the womb? When I made the cloud the garment thereof, and thick darkness a swaddling band for it, and established my decree upon it and set bars and doors, and said: Hitherto shalt thou come, but no farther, and here shall the pride of thy waves be stayed."

In this language, written in a pre-scientific age, we have the germ of all that physical science has revealed concerning the phenomena of the tides. It is well known that the stability of the sea involves the organization of the entire solar system. But some years ago astronomers taught that the moon has been slowly approaching the earth from the earliest ages of the world. From this motion the tides due to her influence are now higher than they were in the days of Homer. If this motion were to continue, the time would certainly come when the tides, rising above every obstacle, would whelm the earth, and the decree of the Bible, "Hitherto shalt thou come, and no farther, and here shall the pride of thy waves be stayed," and the promise that God would no more destroy the world by water, would be false, and infidelity, the synonym of universal death, would triumph. But astronomical science better understood, has discovered the fact that this decrease of the moon's distance, due to planetary disturbance of the figure of the earth's orbit, had its limits fixed quite as positively as those by which God has declared he would restrain the ocean. It is now asserted by astronomers that the time is coming when the decrease of distance will be changed into an increase and the moon will slowly leave the earth by the same degrees by which it had for thousands of years made its approach, and with it the decrease of the tides, and God's decree, "Hitherto shalt thou come, and no farther, and here shall the pride of thy waves be stayed," is found to be true, and unbelieving science again defeated. Thus the Bible and the latest science concur in their testimony that the world will not again be destroyed by water.

There is another important point of agreement. Both science and the Bible teach that the present order of nature will not continue forever. There is perfect harmony between them in the solemn affirmation that life on the globe had a beginning and will have an end. As to the actual manner in which the present creation will terminate, all that science can say must be assigned to the realm of speculation. Some of these speculations of scientists harmonize with the prophecy of the Apostle Peter concerning the destiny of the earth to a remarkable extent, and others do not. In respect to the origin and destiny of the planetary and stellar worlds, Dr. Winchell, Prof. Proctor and other scientists teach that they have had their beginning in igneous fluidity and will end in a state of frigidity. "We are told that Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus and Neptune are molten fiery masses, and hence uninhabitable, while our moon and others of the smaller members of the solar system are in a frozen condition, and that life on them is impossible. This, of course, teaches that the world had a beginning and will have an end, and thus far harmonizes with the Word of God. But in regard to the manner in which the end will occur, there is some discrepancy between these scientists and the Bible. These speculations, however, amount to nothing, as there is no substantial proof that they will ever be verified. What, then, are the facts of science that confirm the biblical prophecy concerning the manner in which the present earth will come to an end?

1. Science teaches the possibility of the destruction of the earth by fire. Chemistry teaches us that water will burn. Your firemen will tell you the same thing. Geology informs us that we live upon a cooled crust and that the central parts of the earth are liquid fire. Nature in earth and atmosphere is full of combustible gases ready to explode and burn in the great conflagration. The forcible question has been asked: "Let now one of those forces for the upheaval of continents which geologists have at their disposal when they need them, break up the bed of the Pacific ocean, and let down the ocean of water on the ocean of fire, and how long would it be before the old chaos would be upon us?" Or if we take the dynamic theory of heat, Tyndall tells us that simply to stop the earth in its orbit would generate heat enough to dissipate the whole of it into vapor. Whether this be true or not, we know that the earth is a magazine of imponderable agents and mighty elements with decomposing and rending force beyond the power of thought to estimate. Faraday says that in a single drop of water there is latent electricity enough for an ordinary flash of lightning. After all this, we shall have no difficulty in seeing that science joins with the Bible in labeling the earth, "reserved unto fire."

A writer in the British Review, in speaking of the elements of destruction in earth and heaven, forcibly observes: "What this change is to be, we dare not even to conjecture, but we see in the heavens themselves some traces of destructive elements and some indications of their power. The fragments of broken planets, the descent of meteoric stones upon our globe, the wheeling comets welding their loose materials at the solar furnace, the volcanic eruptions of our own satellite, the appearance of new stars and the disappearance of others, are all foreshadows of that impending convulsion to which the system of the world is doomed. Thus placed on a planet which is to be burnt up, and under heavens which are to pass away, thus treading, as it were, on the cemeteries, and dwelling in the mausoleums of former worlds, let us learn the lesson of humility and wisdom, if we have not already been taught it in the school of revelation."

2. Not only does science teach the possibility of the destruction of the world by fire, but it teaches also that if the earth is destroyed by fire it will be done in precisely the way the Word of God describes. The inspired teacher (Peter) informs us that "the heavens [or the atmosphere] will pass away with a great noise and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein will be burned up." This is scientific language, and comes near to anticipating some of the most important discoveries of modern chemistry. The atmosphere surrounding the earth is represented as passing away with a prodigious noise, a colossal explosion, an effect which the chemist would predict as the inevitable result of the union of its oxygen with the hydrogen and other gases liberated by the intense heat. The apostle added to the simple statement that "the earth would be burned up," the declaration that its elements would be melted. Now modern chemistry actually reveals the fact that in case of a conflagration such as Peter contemplates the combustible matter of the globe would be destroyed or "burned up" and that the larger portion of the solid matter of the earth which has already been oxidized, or burned, would not be affected in this way, but would simply be melted by the heat. Herein is a marvelous anticipation of science. If the apostle had said without qualification that the world would be burned up, the skeptical chemist would infer that Peter had made a mistake through ignorance of chemistry. But the chemist is disarmed, he can not draw such an inference, for Peter's language clearly implies that only the combustible matter of the globe will be consumed, while the elements or the primordial principles of things will be melted, so that the final result will be an entire liquid fiery mass, as at the beginning, according to science. Here are three remarkable concurrences with modern scientific results: (1) The tremendous explosion in the air from a union of the gases liberated by the heat of the burning world. (2) The destruction of the combustible matter of the globe. (3) The melting or reduction to a liquid state of the oxidized elements that compose the earth. These utterances of inspiration that touch the domain of science not only avoid contradiction, but are in harmony with its latest conclusions. Many eminent men in the realm of physics believe that Genesis is as marvelous an anticipation of physical science, as to the world's beginning, as the language of Peter in regard to its ending. Thus the Word stands comparison with the best of our material knowledge, and is beyond the shadow of a doubt supreme in the moral and spiritual realm.

We have seen that science acknowledges the imperfection of its conclusions by constantly changing its premises, while the histories of the Bible are being steadily confirmed by modern research, and the spiritual truth which it teaches remains the same yesterday, to-day and forever. Its fundamental doctrines of sin and righteousness, of life and immortality, are as unchangeable as the nature of God, because they are the revelation of that nature. There is not a spiritual truth, nor an idea of moral conduct now in the world, that was not in it thousands of years ago. The inspired volume is the garnered treasure house of all the moral and spiritual truth in the world and it changes not because, like its author, the substance of its spiritual revelation is already perfect. Why do truths of the intellect that pertain to the common affairs of life change with the changing generations while truths of the conscience and the heart remain the same in all ages and under all circumstances? It is one of nature's rules that the highest develops last. We have first the inorganic or the dead world; then the organic or the living world. In this latter we have first the vegetable, then the animal, then the intellectual, then the moral, and last and highest we have the spiritual. According to the ordinary course of things, and especially if the doctrine of evolution be true, moral and spiritual truth ought to have been the last to reach the stationary condition which perfection implies. But instead of this it reached its highest and most perfect form thousands of years before that which is next below it. Intellectual truth is still in its childhood—immature and uncertain—while moral truth, which, in the natural order of things, comes after it, has reached its maturity ages since. How is this to be explained? There is but one possible explanation. If man had been left to discover for himself, and by his unaided powers, those moral principles that form his character and regulate his conduct, as he has been left to make intellectual progress on his own account, the natural and usual order would have been followed, and science would be ahead of morals in the certainty and maturity of its doctrines. The reverse of this is true because, and only because, God has spoken to man on the questions of character and conduct. The Bible contains a revelation from God in reference to these matters, and hence they reached a fixedness, a permanence, and a perfection in the early ages of human history not otherwise possible. God has put himself on record in respect to human character and human salvation, because these are matters of transcendent moment, leaving us for our own good to work out intellectual problems for ourselves. This is the reason, no doubt, why spiritual truth has taken precedence in its development towards perfection, while in all matters of purely scientific intellectual inquiry man has been left to work out his own salvation by slow degrees. It is hardly possible to give any other explanation, and this explanation proves that the Bible contains a revelation from God. There is only one sense in which the eternal Word is progressive and improvable, and that is in our understanding and application of its principles. We may apprehend it more clearly, and practice it more faithfully, but we can not improve the truth itself. Science and human wisdom may change, but the Word of the Lord endures forever.

Lights Gone Out.

By Anson G. Chester.

High on a bold and overhanging cliff
That mocks the sea and frowns upon the sands—
A ghostly presence in a lonely place—
The crumbling light-house stands.

No hand swings back the battered oaken door,
No footfall sounds upon the winding stair,
But for the swallows, not a sign of life
Invests it anywhere.

And, as the darkness falls, its lamp no more
Vies with the stars to cheer the gloomy main,
And guide the eager vessel as she hastes
Back to the port again.

So from a life that once was wondrous bright—
Like the Italian heavens, unceasing fair—
The light that blessed it has forever fled
And all is darkness there.

The rayless beacon may be trimmed again
And burn as brightly as it burned before;
But who shall ever to the dark, dark life
The olden flame restore!

English Topics.

With extreme pleasure I have just been reading two articles in the number of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to hand. One of these is the characteristic letter of apologetic vindication on the part of my honored brother of Denver, B. B. Tyler. What a lovely little sample of good-humored irony is that answer to the friends who have demanded that B. B. T. should sit in sackcloth and ashes, because he had coupled the name of Cullis with some names entirely representative of empirical charlatany! (I did not like to say quackery, because I do not want to take the same abject position myself. I have not a scrap of sackcloth on hand, and the dustman called yesterday for the other commodity. Otherwise I might have saved myself the use of the classical subterfuge. But how easily some of the people both in England and America are gulled. Bar-num was right. The majority do love to be humbugged.) Now I have done with my little parenthesis. Well done, Bro. Tyler! You apologized handsomely; but I do not envy your challengers. They do not score, though they meant well enough. The other article I have read with profound pleasure is by my dear old friend J. J. Haley. It is on "The Old Book in the New Crucible." I am glad he is to pursue the topic. He is a real master in Israel. I all the more gladly allude to his article, because I have been examining and reviewing some new books on the Bible. About these I have a few words herewith to say.

The Everlasting Book.

Some of the English papers are publishing telegrams about the new American Revised Version. Many of us are waiting to see it. But it happens that recently some fresh biblical editions, and some works on the Bible itself, apart from commentaries, have been issued. One extraordinary quality of the Bible is its perennial productiveness of literature all about itself. The British Museum Library contains thousands upon thousands of works simply on the Bible as a topic in every language that has any literature at all. I repeat that I do not refer to commentaries or expositions. The list is ever growing. Many of the works are by enemies of the Book. They cannot let it alone. Of course not! For it never leaves them alone. The Bible gives no peace to the wicked. The heavenly manifesto makes no compromise with the foes of inspiration. I have before me three books issued this very week. One is "The Five Books of Moses, being Volume the First of the Bible in Modern English. By Fenton Ferrar." This gentleman not long ago sent forth the New Testament in the same style. That was an astonishing book, as is this fresh production. Mr. Fenton professes, mark you, to translate direct from the Hebrew. This is how he starts off: "By periods God created that which produced the Solar Systems; then that which produced the earth." This is certainly a very free rendering of the Hebrew. Mr. Fenton commences Genesis 3, thus: "Now the serpent was more impudent than any of the wild animals which the ever-living God had made." We may pass this over as quaint. It seems to me a little "impudent" on Mr. Fenton's part to give us Genesis in this guise. But we presently come to something more serious and startling. I have met with something like it before, but not actually in a version of the Bible. Genesis 8:4 reads: "The ark then rested on the Mountain of the Peaks." Mr. F. treats us here to a foot-note: "I translate the compound Hebrew word Ararat, as by leaving it in the Hebrew as the current versions do, it misleads the reader to fancy Ararat in Armenia is meant, but the real resting-place of the Ark, as the sacred record clearly proves, was upon the peaks of the Himalaya Mountains in the Hindoo Khoosh, in the region of Kashgar, or Northern Afghanistan."

J. B. Rotherham's New Bible.

One of the biblical specialists of the age is J. B. Rotherham, whose translation of the New Testament is as well known in America as in England. After several years of assiduous toil our dear old friend has succeeded in finishing his long promised "Emphatic Bible." He issued the New Testament portion three years ago. Now he is sending forth the Old Testament in instalments, the first number having just appeared. This, however, is specially important, because it contains an elaborate introduction, in four chapters, as well as several chapters of Genesis. Rotherham is a man of one book, that being God's Book. He is truly "mighty in the Scriptures." He is a member of the community commonly called, except by themselves, "The Old Brethren." In that community he is a shining light, because of his massive biblical scholarship. Outside of that realm he does not pretend to culture; but in his chosen field he is scarcely equaled. The four chapters of the introduction to this version are entitled "The Special Features of This Translation"; "Concerning Emphasis"; "The Original Texts" and "The Incommunicable Name." Each of these is a fine little monograph. Mr. Rotherham does not take reckless liberties with the Hebrew, in the style dear to Fenton Ferrar, and he seems to know nothing about the ark swimming all the way to the Himalayas. He leaves it on the Armenian Ararat. About this new version I shall write when further numbers are issued.

"The Evolution of the English Bible"

Is the attractive title of the best book of the kind ever written, so far as I know. It is a beautiful half-guinea book, published by John Murray, Albemarle Street, London. I am shy of recommending my kind American readers to procure an English work, lest my encomium might lead to disappointment; but here is a real thesaurus for the student in the department of bibliographical history. The question, "How We Got Our Bible," has been often treated. It is sometimes answered with reference to the original Hebrew and Greek; but to the general reader and also the special student the question, "How we got our English Bible," is just as interesting. Henry Hoare, the author, has done his work in a way for which every reader will thank him. In a series of lucid and delightful chapters he lets in the light on "Mediæval England and the Bible"; on "The Bible and Scholasticism"; on "Wycliffe and the Bibles of the 14th Century"; on "William Tyndale and his Work"; on "The Coverdale, Matthew and Great Bibles"; on "The Geneva, Bishops' and Douai Bibles"; and on the "Authorized and Revised Versions." The treatise is a romance of realism. It tells with fresh pathos the story of suffering endured by some of the great translators. The Bible as we have had it evolved for us in the English language is a monument of heroism too little remembered.

An Antecedent Higher Criticism.

I now am led, by Mr. Henry Hoare's excellent book, to speak of a subject which should be of benefit to any of us who tend to cherish an over-conservative mind. I am perhaps quite sufficiently conservative myself in religious matters, though a radical in politics. But if we tilt too impetuously at the higher criticism and at certain kindred scientific theories (for the religious and scientific advanced thought of the age cannot be separated) we are in danger of skipping and jumping in a foolish somersault. Two hundred and fifty years ago the spirit of Puritanism came into collision with the spirit of science and criticism. At the Reformation there had been a moral and political insurrection against the church of the middle ages. In a sense the Protestant had but changed one external authority for another. In place of the mediæval church he had the Scriptures. In place of an infallible institution he had an infallible document. In the place of a tradition he had a printed book. The Puritan iconoclast had himself become a bibliolater. But the scheme of compulsory godliness for which Oliver Cromwell's independents were responsible broke down in practice. Puritanism became a mere caricature of itself, and it was laughed out of court by Butler's "Hudibras." The world that surrounded those who accepted the theology of the reformers passed more and more under the sway of the intellectual influences set in motion by Descartes, Bacon and Spinoza. For, what the renaissance was to literature and art, and what the Reformation was to religion, that the abandonment of tradition for experience was to the growth of science and to the development of knowledge. The great rebellion had its true counterpart in philosophy, and the revolt of the individual citizens against the divine right of kings found its analogue in the revolt of the individual reason against the divine right of authority. At the Reformation there was a moral and political insurrection against the church of the middle ages. The 18th century saw an insurrection against the authority of the book that was put in its place, and of which, in the first days of a printed text, the earliest editions were held in almost superstitious veneration. Deism was a reaction against the narrowness and bigotry of the creed with which the early reformers rested satisfied. Then came that phenomenon, which was the early precursor of the modern higher criticism. Consternation was created in all orthodox circles by the appearance of Bryan Walton's Polyglot, with its disquieting "various readings," which the great Puritan divine of his day, Dr. John Owen, made the subject of his attack. In the year 1707 the alarm was doubled by the publication of a new folio edition of the Greek Testament, by Dr. John Mill. Mill had been at work on this edition for 30 years, and the number of various readings which it exhibited mounted up to a total of not fewer than 30,000. The Deists rose at the bait. The Freethinkers were in ecstasies. But Richard Bentley, the greatest English scholar of the time, soon made it clear that the problem involved in textual criticism was not really a theological one at all, but simply a literary one. I have often wished that those who are scared about the doing of modern critics could realize that religion is in no peril from research, but can only be fortified by its results.

LOVE'S LOGIC By N. J. AYLSWORTH.

When certain officers were sent to arrest Jesus they returned without doing so and said, "Never man spake like this man." Was it the majesty of his presence that awed them? Perhaps. But there are some strange things about his written words. They seem very simple, but they find us. Jesus is not always logical, and it is interesting to see how commentators try to gloss over the supposed defect. But there are times when a therefore would be a stupidity. Jesus does not always reach his conclusion because he does not try, but he never misses his man. When he is illogical, look out for masterful work.

There are two statements of our duty to our neighbor. One is that we shall love him as ourself; the other that we shall do to him as we would have him do to us. Which is the better statement? The former, you say, is the more spiritual, because it is expressed in terms of the heart, while the other speaks only of outward conduct. Here you are mistaken. Let us see.

You read the command to love your neighbor as yourself and feel it to be your duty, but you continue to feel toward him just as you did before. Discovering this, you say, "I will do it." But you cannot. No amount of willing can accomplish it. For all the rewards of heaven you cannot do it. To escape the tortures of the damned you cannot. As well might you try to write Hamlet by willing to do so. Love does not come at the bidding of the will. Try to obey this command and you will find, with Paul, that what you would do that you do not, and what you would not that you do. This spiritual command does but leave you helpless and condemned.

Now, what of Christ's less spiritual wording? You have a neighbor toward whom your conduct has been hard and unlovely. He is in trouble; but you have said, "Every man for himself." You hear the command to do unto him as you would that he should do to you in like circumstances. You immediately begin to picture to yourself his circumstances and then imagine yourself in his place.—Stop! You are already loving him. Put yourself in his place, is the master secret of all loving. Do that thoroughly and then hate him if you can. Says Lecky in his History of European Morals, "In order to pity suffering we must realize it, and the intensity of our compassion is usually and chiefly proportional to the vividness of our realization. . . . Most cruelty springs from callousness, which is simply dullness of imagination."

Sympathy means suffering with another, and we cannot do this without in imagination placing ourselves in his place. The following story (perhaps apocryphal) is told of Daniel Webster's boyhood. A certain woodchuck was doing much damage to one of his father's farm crops and a trap was set to catch it. When it was caught Daniel's father and his brother, Ezekiel, were in favor of killing it, but Daniel remonstrated, and his father bade him state his reasons. He accordingly proceeded to draw a vivid picture of the situation from the woodchuck's standpoint, urging that, without intent to do harm, it had simply exercised its God-given right to get a living, and in the only way known to it; that it had a family of little ones that would be made orphans and left to starve if the mother were killed. At this point Daniel's father brushed a tear from his eye and cried, "Zeke, let that woodchuck go." Daniel had caused them to put themselves in its place, and now killing it was out of the question.

When, in the early fifties, a black woman, with bloodhounds on her track, crossed the Ohio river on floating cakes of ice, with her babe in her arms, the fathers and mothers of the north put themselves in her place and shuddered. That act gave us Uncle Tom's Cabin, which said in vivid picturings, "The slave is your brother; put yourself in his place." The storm that rocked our nation from shore to shore was the Golden Rule on fire. Put yourself in his place lit the torch of war with Spain in 1898.

This is the law and condition of all loving. There is a love of complacency and a love inspired by loving deeds of others bestowed upon us, that come to us spontaneously, without effort of ours, but all that love that is matter of duty and that is not quickened in us by others, can come only by this great law of loving. Not a tear of pity falls, not a throb of sympathy is felt, but by putting yourself in the other's place. Without it you must be even brutal; with it, unless you are a monster, you cannot help loving.

They who would do cruel deeds must take care of the imagination. The followers of The Old Man of the Mountain could do the bloody deeds he demanded of them only by taking hashish to blunt their feelings, else, putting themselves in the victim's place, they were unnerved. (From this comes the word assassin.) The young surgeon who puts himself in the patient's place, faints. And this brings us to another fact.

The Golden Rule is not simply a light showing the willing their way to love, but a fire-brand setting on fire of sympathy selfish men who do not want to love. When the imagination gets you into another's place the heart responds, whether you want it to do so or not. To the selfish man the Golden Rule is an incendiary flinging brands into his cellar, and before he is aware he is in flames and his selfishness is burning out. Many a man has been caught in this way who did not mean to do right. Napoleon fired cannon balls on the ice to drown the fleeing Russians, but when he saw them struggling in the water his heart was touched and he sent his soldiers to rescue them.

The Golden Rule by its striking statement sets the imagination at work and then goes behind all thought and will and sets the heart at loving. It does not simply command us to love and then leave us powerless, but actually puts us in the way of doing it. It is a world's charmer. What magic is this that turns a law of condemnation into a power of regeneration! No wonder Christ's words find us when they put us on such courses as this and make us lovers before we know it!

The impression is everywhere abroad that men cannot love except by accident, and that as for loving the unlovely and the enemy, the best that can be done is to do the deeds that love requires—that love itself in such cases is unnatural and impossible. After nineteen centuries of Christianity, the church—not simply the world—is telling you that men cannot obey the master rule of all its teaching! And yet ministers are ever preaching this impossible thing. No wonder they are not taken seriously. Teach men how to love, and you shall do them more good than by a whole lifetime of unpractical preaching. Then show them how in your own life, and you have already wrought in them the miracle. It is as easy to love as to do anything else, but it cannot be done by aimless striving. The agriculturist observes the laws of plant growth and gets his crop. The heart has its laws through which its fruitage must come. You lay your hand on the lightning and talk across the seas. Just as surely you can have love—not its counterfeit, but rich, pure, sweet love,—in that heart of yours tomorrow, to-day, an hour hence, if you will. Command the heart according to its laws and it will obey you.

Why forever preach that men should love, and never tell them how?

Current Literature.

Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, of Chicago, is a writer of deep insight and graceful style. His "Bits of Wayside Gospel" promptly met the appreciative reception which its merits warranted. In a new volume entitled A Search for an Infidel he has given us a second series of similar "Bits"—a group of essays and sketches, healthy and inspiring in tone, optimistic and sunshiny in their view of man and the world, and beautiful in their diction. The essays here printed are disconnected and have been produced at intervals through a series of years. The author says that "they belong to a class of which a busy minister's life generally yields but one a year." It might be remarked that he is an uncommon minister whose labors can yield, besides their substantial fruit, such an annual blossom as one of these "Bits of Wayside Gospel." (Macmillan. $1.50.)

The Mormon Monster, or the Story of Mormonism, by Dr. Edgar E. Folk, is a comprehensive and authentic statement of the past history, present propaganda and fundamental principles of Mormonism. The author believes that Mormonism is a monster, false in its principles and dangerous in its practice, but his discussion lacks the rabidness which sometimes characterizes books of this type, and it is the more useful on that account. Any one who wishes to know all about Mormonism that it is necessary for anybody to know should read this volume, together with D. H. Bays's "Doctrines and Dogmas of Mormonism." (Revell. $2.)

Le Roman D'une Pussie Chat is not a French novel of saffron tint, as one might suppose from a casual glance at its title, but a pleasing conglomeration of nonsense in a style which combines features of Jules Verne, H. Rider Haggard and Alice in Wonderland. It is, in fact, a narrative of certain events in Catland, a region the geographical limits of which cannot be defined with scientific accuracy, but which seems to be a real enough place after reading Dr. Roger's ingenious narrative. At least it is as real as the Land behind the Looking-glass. (American Publishing Company. Detroit, Mich. $1.50.)

Every series of revival meetings is the occasion for profound experiences in the human heart—the very material out of which all great stories are constructed. The True Story of Revival is an authentic account of the preparation, progress and results of a union revival held at Shenandoah, Ia., by Evangelists Williams and Alexander. It is a more exhaustive account than is often written of such proceedings and is so well written that it cannot fail to interest any one who is at all concerned with evangelistic work. (Revell. $.75.)

The sermon by Rev. George T. Dowling, D. D., of Los Angeles, on Romanizing Tendencies in the Episcopal Church has been published in a pamphlet. We called attention several weeks ago in a paragraph to this sermon and the stir which it had created. Dr. Dowling is the most prominent Episcopal minister on the coast and his utterance is deeply significant. The circulation of the pamphlet has already during these few weeks reached 9,000.

We call attention again to the Dictionary of Minneapolis which contains in convenient shape a large amount of information which will be of service to prospective visitors to that city at the time of our General Convention. It contains maps, street index, pictures and all sorts of miscellaneous information alphabetically arranged. (H. B. Hudson, Minneapolis. $.25.)

Andrew Murray, whose devotional writings are always of a sane and helpful sort, has a series of meditations for a month entitled Thy Will be Done, consisting of a series of brief discourses on chosen texts exhibiting the blessedness of a life in conformity with the will of God. (Fleming H. Revell. 75 cents.)

More Boxes of Gold, And Many Greenbacks.

To secure additional information directly from the people, it is proposed to send little boxes of gold and greenbacks to persons who write the most interesting, detailed and truthful descriptions of their experience on the following topics.

1. How have you been affected by coffee drinking and by changing from coffee to Postum?

2. Do you know any one who has been driven away from Postum because it came to the table weak and characterless at the first trial?

3. Did you set such a person right regarding the easy way to make Postum clear, black, and with a crisp, rich taste?

4. Have you ever found a better way to make it than to use four heaping teaspoonsful to the pint of water, let stand on stove until real boiling begins, then note the clock and allow it to continue easy boiling full 15 minutes from that time stirring down occasionally? (A piece of butter about the size of a navy bean, placed in the pot will prevent boiling over.)

5. Give names and account of those you know to have been cured or helped in health by the dismissal of coffee and the daily use of Postum Food Coffee in its place.

6. Write names and addresses of 20 friends whom you believe would be benefited by leaving off coffee. (Your name will not be divulged to them.)

Address your letter to the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich., writing your own name and address clearly.

Be honest and truthful, don't write poetry or fanciful letters, just plain, truthful statements.

Decision will be made between October 30th and November 10th, 1901, by three judges, not members of the Postum Cereal Co., and a neat little box containing a $10 gold piece sent to each of the five best writers, a box containing a $5 gold piece to each of the 20 next best writers, a $2 greenback to each of the 100 next best, and a $1 greenback to each of the 200 next best writers, making cash prizes distributed to 325 persons.

Almost every one interested in pure food and drink is willing to have their name and letter appear in the papers, for such help as it may offer to the human race. However, a request to omit name will be respected.

Every friend of Postum is urged to write and each letter will be held in high esteem by the company, as an evidence of such friendship while the little boxes of gold and envelopes of money will reach many modest writers whose plain and sensible letters contain the facts desired, although the sender may have but small faith in winning at the time of writing.

Talk this subject over with your friends and see how many among you can win prizes. It is a good, honest competition and in the best kind of a cause. Cut this statement out for it will not appear again.

Our Budget.

—Autumn is here.
 —It is the time for hard work.
 —The convention season is upon us.
 —Our evangelistic season lasts twelve months in the year, but the time of special activity is at hand.
 —A few cool days are a more potent tonic than all the "spring medicine" that was ever sold at a dollar a bottle. They whet one's appetite for work.
 —If the brisk weather is not a sufficient appetizer, try attending your state convention and the Minneapolis Convention, and you will come back a perfect glutton for church work. You will not be able to get enough of it.
 —Ben F. Hill spent six weeks in a canvass for William Woods College for Girls and reports that it will have the largest patronage in the history of the institution. It is growing as it deserves under J. B. Jones's direction.
 —District No. 4 of Nebraska will hold its convention at Wakefield, Sept. 27-29. District No. 7 will hold its convention at De-weese Sept. 24-26. L. A. Hussong, corresponding secretary pro. tem., anticipates an attendance of 100 delegates and preachers at the latter.

—C. E. Smith closed a two years' pastorate at Unionport, O., Sept. 8. This congregation now has the best attended church and Bible-school in town and is in a flourishing condition. A pastor is needed. Applicants must be favorably known to the state board and to its secretary, S. H. Bartlett.

—Nebraska churches wishing the services of Brother Gregg to hold meetings for them should address W. A. Baldwin, and those desiring the services of Brother Ogden should address E. E. Boyd, of Nelson, Neb. These state evangelists are there to be used and churches needing them should not hesitate to call.

—Burris A. Jenkins will be inaugurated as President of Kentucky University on Thursday, Sept. 26. The inaugural sermon will be preached in the morning by E. L. Powell, of Louisville, and addresses will be delivered in the afternoon by James H. Hazelrigg, of Frankfort, President Charles F. Thwing, of Western Reserve University, and President Jenkins.

—W. A. Baldwin, of Ulysses, Neb., has worked up the Nebraska delegation to the Minneapolis convention. The Illinois Central has been chosen as the official route and special cars or a special train will be provided according to the number that go. The rate is one fare for the round trip. The Colorado delegation is expected to occupy part of the special car which will go from Lincoln. Write to W. A. Baldwin for particulars.

—William Weatherford, of the Church of Christ, and D. B. Turney, of the Methodist Protestant Church, will hold a six days' debate at Latona, four miles south of Wheeler, Ill., beginning Monday, September 30, at 10 A. M. T. H. Wilson, pastor of the Church of Christ at that place, writes that preparations have been made to take care of all visitors and that preachers and members of both churches are cordially invited to attend.

—The Christian Commonwealth, of London, England, which was founded by W. T. Moore twenty years ago, was edited by him for many years and by his son, Mr. Paul Moore, during the last few, has recently passed under the management of Mr. Albert Dawson, who has purchased a controlling interest in the company. Mr. Dawson is an English journalist of varied experience with both the religious and secular press.

—The new church at Louisville, Neb., is about completed and great praise is due to E. J. Emmons for his faithful work in that field. The date of dedication has not yet been announced.

—The church at Longview, Ill., B. N. Anderson pastor, has completed its new house of worship which was dedicated Sept. 8, by L. L. Carpenter. The new building is said to be the best church in the town.

—S. F. Rogers will close an eight year pastorate at Illiopolis, Ill., Dec. 8. His successor will be chosen and installed before he leaves, so that there will be no interregnum. He has not yet made arrangements for future work.

—O. J. Grainger, formerly pastor of the church at Fremont, Neb., sailed for India Sept. 4. The Nebraska brethren are already good friends of our missionary work but this should give them a still deeper interest.

—We note that the Standard (Baptist) of Chicago has added to its editorial staff Rev. R. N. Van Doren, now pastor of the Baptist church at Port Huron, Mich. The Standard is already one of the ablest religious papers in the country and is a credit to the denomination which it represents. We shall expect still better things now that the present efficient staff, consisting of Mr. J. R. Dickerson and Mr. John R. Slater, has received such re-enforcement.

—The Bethany C. E. Reading Circle will begin the next session of its regular work October 1. Like most other educational institutions, it works through the fall, winter and spring and enjoys a vacation in the summer. The fall quarter, October, November and December, will be devoted to the study of our pioneers and their plea. This is a study which can profitably be pursued by both old and young, and we can heartily recommend the Bethany Reading Course as furnishing intelligent guidance and daily stimulus for such systematic study. For particulars address J. Z. Tyler, 798 Republic Street, Cleveland, O.

—The board of church extension reports that during the first twelve days of September it received $992.07 from 111 churches. This is a gain of two in the number of contributing churches and a gain of $378.75 in receipts over the corresponding period of last year. The amount received from individuals, however, is nearly $500 less than during the same period last year so that there is a net decrease of $220.33 for the first twelve days of September. It should be borne in mind that September is the month for special offerings to church extension and that the aim is to raise the church extension fund to $300,000 by the close of the present fiscal year, September 30. It will require some splendid gains to accomplish this. Send money to G. W. Muckley, Corresponding Secretary, 600 Water Works Bldg., Kansas City, Missouri.

—The first copy of "The Witness of Jesus," the volume of sermons by Alexander Procter, has just been laid upon our desk. In outward appearance it is attractive to the eye and we feel sure that the contents, covering 404 pages, including the memorial address by T. P. Haley and nineteen sermons by Brother Procter, will commend themselves to our readers as one of the most valuable books we have ever issued from the press of the Christian Publishing Company. In it the great preacher and thinker will continue his work in the world and extend his influence to generations yet unborn. The following are the topics of the sermons: The Witness of Jesus; The Creation—Old and New; The Coming One; The Transfiguration of Man; Foreknowledge and Predestination; Salvation and Retribution; The Three Worlds of Revelation; The Law of Retribution; Following Jesus; Knowledge of God—Its Source and Limitation; The New Birth—Heavenly Things; Authority in Religion; The Coming of the Perfect; The Unseen Things; The Law of Glorification; The Creed of the Church; The Baptismal Formula—Its Significance; Christian Baptism—Its Meaning; Ground of Faith in a Future Life; Biographical Sketch; A Memorial Address.

—T. J. Harris, of Lockhart, Tex., was ordained to the ministry Sept. 1, by J. J. Cramer, of that city. Mr. Harris was for some years a preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church, but of recent years has devoted himself to secular pursuits. Finding himself out of harmony with the M. E. Church, he joined the Christian Church at Lockhart about ten months ago and since that time has been studying and preparing himself for the ministry. He is now ready for active work and may be addressed at Lockhart, Tex., by any church needing a pastor. Brother Cramer speaks in high praise of his character and ability.

—T. E. Cramblet, pastor of the East End Christian Church, Pittsburg, Pa., has accepted the presidency of Bethany College. Since the resignation of Mr. Kersey some months ago a diligent search has been made for exactly the right man to fill this important position and the college authorities believe that they have found him. The presidency of Bethany can never be less than a place of great honor and dignity. It is also at the present year a position of high responsibility. The college has escaped from the impending insolvency which threatened to swallow it up and is now enjoying its share of the general prosperity. With remarkably little stir President Kersey raised $50,000 of endowment which has been paid and invested in a reliable trust company. Within the last thirty days a wealthy brother in Ohio, who wishes his name withheld for the present, has given his note for $25,000 on the second $50,000. Other subscriptions have been made which leave the amount to be raised on the second $50,000 only $22,000. It is a practical certainty that before the close of the present college year Bethany College will have a carefully invested endowment of $100,000. This news will make glad the hearts of all the faithful for it means that Bethany, under the leadership of its new president, will have the financial means of working out the educational problem which confronts it.

—Brother Cramblet, the new president of Bethany, has been a success wherever he has labored hitherto and it is but fair to suppose that he will be a success in his new field. He was born in Harrison county, O., in 1862. By the practice of thrift and economy he secured a college education at the Ohio State University and Mt. Union College, being graduated from the latter in 1885. After two years of study at the College of the Bible at Lexington, he was graduated from that institution in 1887. Since that time he has held pastorates at Mentor, O., Salem, O., Omaha, Neb., and Pittsburg. He has been with the East End Church at Pittsburg now for five years, during which time a handsome new building has been erected and all indebtedness provided for. His work at Bethany will begin with the present college year.

Rheumatism

What is the use of telling the rheumatic that he feels as if his joints were being dislocated?

He knows that his sufferings are very much like the tortures of the rack.

What he wants to know is what will permanently cure his disease.

That, according to thousands of grateful testimonials, is

Hood's Sarsaparilla

It corrects the acidity of the blood on which the disease depends, strengthens the stomach, liver and kidneys, and builds up the whole system. Try Hood's.

—The A. C. M. S. received $500 on the annuity plan last week, with a promise of a second cheque for the same amount from the same parties soon.

—Prof. J. Breckenridge Ellis writes: "Central Christian College (Albany, Mo.) opens better than it has for five years. All departments flourishing. New laboratory. Faculty much encouraged. Music department very full." J. D. McClure has been obliged on account of ill health to resign permanently all official connection with the college.

—The books of the American Christian Missionary Society close on Sept. 30. The total gain of the year to date is $28,904.90. It is certain that the report presented at Minneapolis will be the best ever given for our home mission work. The work has been greatly enlarged during the year and we plead with our friends, both churches and individuals, to send in their offering that the year may be closed free from all indebtedness. All pledges for this work for the current year should be paid before Sept. 30. Remit to Benjamin L. Smith, Cor. Sec., Y. M. C. A. Bld'g, Cincinnati, O.

—The Chicago Christian Missionary Society desires to borrow $1,100 for the Humbolt Park Christian Church, the balance due on their lot worth $1,500, besides the new building now in course of construction. First mortgage note bearing six per cent. interest with a guarantee of the City Missionary Society will be given as security. Title is guaranteed by Chicago Title and Trust Company; perfectly safe. Interest will be paid regularly. A five years' loan is preferable. The above amount will be due soon and we prefer to place it with brethren than money lenders here. Address W. B. Taylor, Supt. of Missions, 506-358 Dearbon St., Chicago.

—The following hint to writers given in the National Baptist is as appropriate for Disciples as for Baptists. Our correspondents when writing for publication will confer a great favor upon the editors if they will remember the admonition and take it as it is meant.

In writing for the paper, please always leave out all the letters possible. The editor has nothing to do, and it does him good to spend his time writing out the words in full for the printer. Please to write thus: "Rev. Brown has been called to Zion ch. The ch has many good brn & srs; th no is large; th congr is fair; th salary is a hundred $ pr mo and a donn ea yr. His sermn addrd to th yng was xclt. The pastr and his fam hve gne to th mts fr a fw wks."

Pasty Food.

Too Commonly Used.

The use of pasty cereals is not advisable. A physician says, "Pasty cereals are very indigestible and a bad thing for the stomach, causing a depressed feeling and quite a train of disorders, particularly of the intestines and nerves.

Cereals, such as wheat and oats, can be cooked long enough and well enough to fit them for human use but the ordinary way of cooking leaves them in a pasty condition."

A gentleman from Evansville, Ind., whose name can be secured upon application to the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich., says: "My physician prohibited the use of oats and wheat for I was in a bad condition physically, with pronounced dyspepsia. He said the heavy paste was indigestible but that Grape-Nuts, being a thoroughly cooked food and cooked in such a manner as to change the starch into grape-sugar, could be easily digested. I have become very fond indeed of Grape-Nuts and all the uncomfortable feelings have disappeared. I have gained nearly twelve pounds in weight and none of the distressed, full feeling after my meals that I had formerly. Grape-Nuts Food has done the work."

W. J. Wright, pastor of the H Street Church, Washington, has accepted the call of the American Christian Missionary Society to become its evangelist and general representative in the territory between the Hudson and Potomac rivers and will begin his labors Dec. 1.

If Bro. Wright's work in Washington is indicative of his success in the larger field his employment means much for the success of our cause in the east. Sept. 4, 1896, he began preaching in a tent in the southwestern section of Washington. The great storm of Sept. 29, blew his tent into shreds and put a stop to the meeting, but did not dislodge the good seed which had been sown in the hearts of the people. Oct. 4, an organization was effected with 22 members and the meetings were held in Mechanics' Hall. In four months the growth was such they were obliged to seek larger quarters. As nothing better was available they went to the third story of a blacksmith shop. Someone characterized their meeting place as "a cold-storage in winter and a Turkish bath in summer."

But the people came and obeyed the gospel. At the close of the first year the little flock numbered 120, and the second year 124 others were added. During the five years of the church's history 600 persons have obeyed the gospel in their various meeting-places. Some of these did not unite with the congregation. In the shifting population of Washington others were lost and a few have died. The church now has 300 active members. By the help of our church extension fund a desirable lot was purchased and a factory which stood on the property was converted into a chapel. This answers very well for their present needs.

The local papers have devoted considerable space to the celebration of F. D. Power's twenty-sixth anniversary as pastor of the Vermont Avenue Church. The Washington Post says:

"The present Vermont Avenue Christian Church was erected as a memorial to the lamented James A. Garfield, who, as a member of Congress, and during his brief incumbency of the executive office, was a faithful and devout member of the congregation, and frequently occupied the pulpit of the little structure which the memorial building replaced. The pastor of the congregation is the Rev. Frederick D. Power. He was Garfield's pastor and friend, and it was in this dual capacity that he stood in the Capitol and voiced the sorrow of the nation in an oration over the body of the martyred President.

"Dr. Power was a young man when he came to this city twenty-six years ago; the church was a young church and the two were equally ob-scure. There was much prejudice and indifference to contend against, and though the pastor and people labored hard, the growth of the church in strength and usefulness was slow indeed. Then one day it awoke to find that fame had come to it. Garfield had been elevated to the Presidency, and the modest little wooden building on Vermont avenue was the President's church. People came and crowded its seats and aisles and were turned, disappointed, away by the thousands. They marveled that the President of the United States should choose so humble a church home, and one day a stranger from abroad, who had been unable to get into the 'court church,' as he termed it, was heard to complain of the outrage of compelling the ruler of so great a nation to worship in so miserable a 'shanty.' To day the congregation is one of the largest in the city and no church in the denomination is more widely known. The fame of Dr. Power is nationwide."

During these twenty-six years Bro. Power has been a constant advocate of the doctrine of expansion and colonization. Mainly through his efforts the Ninth Street, H Street and Whitney Avenue churches were planted, and the membership in the city has grown until now our numerical strength is nearly two thousand.

Class 11 of the Ninth Street Sunday-school took great pleasure in entertaining Misses Josepha Franklin and Maud Plunkett upon the occasion of their recent visit, showing them the sights and giving them a reception at the residence of Mrs. Copeland. Miss Franklin is the instructor of an orphan boy adopted by this class and named "John Pickett" after their teacher. Miss Franklin met with a painful but not serious accident just before leaving home which prevented her speaking at our church. Miss Plunkett, however, took her place, and made a deep impression upon our young people. Class 11 raised $72 last Children's Day, but say they will double this next June.

Since I organized the congregation in Hampton, Va., thirteen years ago I have felt a deep interest in the cause in this thriving seaboard town. I rejoice with them over the dedication of their splendid new church Sept. 8. C. P. Williamson delivered the sermon on this occasion. The building was constructed at a cost of $7,000, upon which a debt of only $800 remains. Chief credit is due to the energy of their pastor, A. J. Renforth.

Anarchy and Revenge.

The attempt to kill President McKinley has thrown our country into a fever of excitement which is quite trying on those who are naturally considerate and cool, and those who are passionate and vicious have poured out to the public press a shocking amount of venom. Many men whose official position and environment should have suggested moderation have counseled mob law and anarchy. They charge Emma Goldman as vehemently as they have words to express their thought, and in the next breath advise doing with wretched Czolgosz exactly what they say Emma Goldman proposes to do to men in high official position. They say she is an anarchist and I frankly grant this. If murdering my friend is anarchy why is it not anarchy to murder my enemy?

Senators Platt, Callum, and Burton are quoted as proposing mob violence. When United States senators openly advocate anarchy (lawlessness) in one specific case, why not expect men of Czolgosz's environment to propose an entire overthrow of law? I would say to these hot headed senators to note carefully the public expressions of Mr. and Mrs. McKinley, and as they have not found time nor place to thrust this wretched man into eternity, it would seem proper for these worthy senators to retract.

Worse still are some of the utterances of so-called Christian ministers. Dr. H. R. Naylor, the President's minister, said: "I have ever been loyal to the law. . . . The affair at 4 o'clock Friday has almost converted me into an advocate of lynch law."

T. De Witt Talmage said: "I wish that policeman in Buffalo who secured the pistol of the scoundrel who shot our adored President had taken the butt of the weapon and dashed the man's brains out on the spot."

I have been a member of the Christian Church for many years, but when I find men's minds so warped that preachers propose mob law, I feel that I am in dangerous company to go to church. As a commercial traveler I hear at different points sermons by preachers which are little else than stage performances. Wretched Czolgosz is the handiwork of God, and if he is evil it is partly because we uphold evil things and surround him with evil environments. We should not seek to destroy God's work, but to find out his laws and obey them, and we should ask ourselves, Am I my brother's keeper? And if we decide in the affirmative we must all feel our responsibility for this crime and seek to remove the cause.

C. LIPSCOMB.

How many mothers realize that when the baby's advent is expected they need strength for two instead of one. Women, weak, nervous, "just able to drag around," find themselves confronted with coming maternity. They have not strength enough for themselves, how can they have strength to give a child? We don't look for the birth of strong ideas from a weak mind. Why should we expect the birth of strong children from weak mothers?

The way to ensure health and strength to mother and child is to use Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription as a preparative for motherhood. It brings the mother's strength up to the requirements of nature, so that she has strength to give her child. It nourishes the nerves and so quiets them. It encourages a natural appetite and induces refreshing sleep.

"Favorite Prescription" makes weak women strong and sick women well.

There is no alcohol in "Favorite Prescription" and it is free from opium, cocaine and all other narcotics.

"I wish to let you know the great benefit my wife derived through taking your 'Favorite Prescription,'" writes Mr. Robert Harden, of Brandon, Manitoba, Box 235. "It was when her baby came. We had heard so much of your medicine that my wife decided to try it (I may say my wife's age was thirty-three and this was her first child). She commenced to take 'Favorite Prescription' five months before her child was born. We have a fine healthy girl, and we believe that this was mainly owing to the 'Favorite Prescription,' taken faithfully according to directions. We shall certainly recommend it wherever we can."

Dr. Pierce's Common Sense Medical Adviser, paper covers, is sent free on receipt of 21 one-cent stamps to pay expense of mailing only. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

Wisconsin Notes.

Our state work seems to be in a prosperous condition.

I lately visited the Manitowoc brethren where we started up the work in the cause this summer. The newly organized Bible school is growing in interest and influence.

Began a tent meeting here (Rib Lake) Aug. 28. Have had a break of one Lord's day. Have thus far baptized two. We think we will organize here next Lord's day.

From Ladysmith, where we lately organized a church, comes the cheering word that a real estate firm has donated a fine lot in a fine location.

We should like to call the attention of brethren of Indiana, Illinois, Iowa and elsewhere who want to purchase cheap lands to the opportunities in northern Wisconsin. It is much more pleasant than the storm-swept plains of the northwest. Why not get a dozen brethren with families to come up here and build a town and church? I am not a real estate agent and have no lands for sale, but I believe there are great possibilities up here. Along the line of the Wisconsin Central Railway are cheap desirable lands. Write Bro. F. L. Adams of this place. If any brother wishes me to direct him to a desirable location, if he will inclose stamp and direct to Oelwein, Ia., I will do so.

Remember our state convention at Waupun, Sept. 19-22. Let us have a good representation from all over the state.

Illinois C. W. B. M.

The annual convention of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions of Illinois was held in Springfield, Sept. 10. The large attendance of delegates at the informal reception the previous evening gave assurance of a good convention. A good, full program had been arranged and those appointed to duty met their obligations.

The president's address was full of information and suggestions, encouraging her constituency to greater achievement. She emphasized the importance of extending the organization of auxiliaries, showed the need of more field workers to do this, and among the hindrances to be met mentioned secular organizations. Clubs, lodges, etc., are sapping the time and strength of our sisters. They should be enlisted in this superior work.

The secretary's report showed an increase in members, auxiliaries and offerings to the state treasury over that of last year, but a decrease in amount sent to the national treasury. To meet this deficit an effort had been begun to secure one hundred life memberships before Sept. 30. Some had been secured, a number were taken at the convention, but more are needed. Let all who can aid in this way report promptly to Annie M. Hale, Athens. Only 19 of the 148 auxiliaries won a place on the roll of honor.

The young people's work held its own during the year but failed to advance because able women could not be found who were willing to make the sacrifice necessary to superintend mission bands and Junior Endeavor societies.

The president recommended the adoption of some special work and it was unanimously decided to employ an evangelist to labor in Chicago. Nearly half of the amount necessary for one year's salary was pledged at the convention. This is not to be paid until the full amount is pledged. Everyone knows this is an important field and the demand urgent. Individuals and auxiliaries who can give to this fund should report at once by pledge to Annie M. Hale, Athens. This is not to interfere in any way with the regular offerings to the state and national treasuries. When paid it must be sent to Helen E. Moses, Indianapolis, Ind., for this special fund.

Interesting conferences were held upon our auxiliary work and our advance, the first led by Mrs. Sue T. Oder, of Decatur, the second by Mrs. Mary Pickens-Buckner, of Macomb. They included papers on programs, prayer, how to pay current expenses, our auxiliary member, duties of auxiliaries to children's work, individual responsibility, and our advance in America, in the regions beyond, in the young people's work and victory at last. Auxiliaries would do well to borrow these papers and use them in their programs.

The evening address was by C. C. Smith to a large audience in Representative Hall on The New Work of the C. W. B. M., that is, Negro Education and Evangelization. Graphically he told where it is, what it is, what is being done and how it is done. He dwelt specially upon the Southern Christian Institute and emphasized the fact that the boys and girls are becoming skilled workmen in the manual training department while getting their literary education. He asked the audience for $35 to furnish an Illinois room in the new girls' dormitory, and received in response a collection of $50.15.

The board of state officers was re-elected. The convention throughout was harmonious and pervaded with a spirit of consecration to a fuller service and higher attainments.

Stockholders' Meeting.

Notice is hereby given that the annual meeting of the Stockholders of the Christian Publishing Co., will be held at the company's office, 1522 Locust St., St. Louis, Mo., on Tuesday, Oct. 1st, 1901, at 10 o'clock A. M., for the election of Directors, and for the transaction of such other business as may legally come before said meeting. J. H. GARRISON, Pres., W. D. CREE, Sec.

The New Jacksonville (Fla.) Church.

The above is a picture of the First Christian Church, Jacksonville, Fla., as it will appear when rebuilt. The basement will contain gymnasium, bath-rooms and other Y. M. C. A. features, as there is nothing of the kind in Jacksonville. On the first floor will be the auditorium 50x50, with gallery; adjoining the auditorium, separated by a rolling partition, is the Sunday-school room 38x46, with two class rooms and two free reading rooms. Over the Sunday-school room will be pastor's study, ladies' parlors and society rooms. The building will contain every modern convenience, and will be a credit to the architects, Messrs. Walter & Lagare, of Columbia, S. C., and Jacksonville, Fla.

A white stone from Miami, Fla., is being used, and the white walls rising above the ground are very beautiful. This church has secured this stone so that it will cost about the same as a pressed brick front. The location of the building is one of the very best in the city. We feel that this church is building wisely, and our brethren abroad will not regret putting their money in this work.

One thing our brethren should bear in mind, and that is, while the church at Jacksonville is erecting a good building, still it is only in accordance with their surroundings, and such a building as they of necessity must have in that city. They are simply erecting a neat, substantial building.

We trust all of our brethren will remember our cause in Jacksonville and give liberal assistance. The brethren there are doing all they can, and all they ask is that enough help be given that they be not left too deeply in debt. Send them all you can. If you can give $100 send it along, and if you can only give $1 send that along, for every dollar counts and is appreciated. Surely there are not many readers of this paper who cannot spare to our Jacksonville church a little money.

Notes from Southeast Ohio.

V. G. Hostetter has practically decided to remain with the church at Zanesville. He was married in July to Miss Groh, of Munger, O., and this, doubtless, will help him continue his good work. He is president of the ministers' association of the city.

There are two churches on the Muskingum river, Beverly and Coal Run, about 20 miles north of Marietta that ought to have regular preaching. They are four miles apart and can pay a fair salary.

Herbert L. Tillock, who preaches at Hopedale and Smithfield, is professor of Christian Evidences in Hopedale College.

The meeting of the sixteenth district at Quaker City, Aug. 26-28, was a success. The delegates at this convention were so numerous that hotel accommodations had to be provided for a great many. And all this, too, notwithstanding the fact that the anti-missionary churches of the district "organized" and had a convention about ten miles away. Chester Sprague, of Quaker City, is president of the district.

From all appearances, Ohio is having new life infused into her state mission work by Secretary S. H. Bartlett. He illustrates his lecture on Ohio missions with a stereopticon.

R. F. Strickler, Bethany, 1901, has been employed for half time at Quaker City.

J. H. Bristor has resigned after having done a year's good work at Bethesda. Flushing and Bethesda want to co-operate and get a pastor.

J. L. Parsons is proving a most excellent man in the right place. He is taking missionary offerings right along from three churches which are in Monroe County, the blackest anti-missionary county in the whole state.

The Upper Ohio Valley Ministers' Association, made up of pastors of Christian churches in the valley from East Liverpool to Parkersburg, met at Wheeling the second Monday in September. The next meeting will be held at Brilliant, Oct. 14. Prof. Streater, formerly of Bethany College, now acting pastor for the church at West Liberty, W. Va., will read the paper. C. M. Watson, of Bellaire, was made president of the association for the coming year.

Bethany College opens for the 61st session, Monday, Sept. 23. Reports indicate better prospects than any for years.

Omaha Letter.

The Omaha pastors do not report often in our papers but they are at work and their churches are making real progress in many directions.

The great union tent campaign under direction of Merton Smith as evangelist, and his corps of house to house visitors, has accomplished a work beyond the expectations of nearly every one. These meetings began about July 1. The first two locations were in the north side of the city. In spite of the extreme heat in July and a part of August, large audiences, far beyond the seating capacity of the tent, turned out, and several hundred persons confessed Christ. Many others were reclaimed. The visitors found and aroused to duty many former church members, inducing them to bring their long unused letters to the churches. The north side Christian Church has received about 30 members as a result of this work. Some others have done almost as well. The tent is now pitched in the fashionable Hamscomb Park section. Though not as largely attended as in the other locations, the attendance is good and the results encouraging. The next and last location will probably be in the down town section. The First Church expects to receive much help spiritually from these meetings and a number of new members from these last locations.

The north side church is arranging to pay off its church extension loan, and is launching a number of forward movements which promise much for the cause in that section. B. B. Tyler, of Denver, is to help them in a meeting immediately after the Minneapolis conventions.

After five faithful, fruitful years in South Omaha, Bro. Howard Cramhlet gives up the work to become a pastor in Hampton, Ia., beginning next Lord's day, Sept. 15. The church tendered him and his good wife a farewell reception last Monday evening. It was good to be there, and to hear the warm words of love and appreciation spoken of them by the members of his congregation, and by his fellow ministers in the city. All declared that the church was in the best condition in its history, and could hope for no better fortune than that a successor of like spirit and earnestness might be found. Nebraska, and Omaha especially, has lost two noble workers in the departure of Bro. and Sister Cramhlet. We congratulate Hampton, Ia., and wish for them a most happy and prosperous ministry there.

The First Church has maintained its work well through the summer. We had four added in June, seven in July, two in August (the month of my vacation), and have baptized two this month and know of others almost ready to obey the gospel. We are planning for a good meeting with one of our leading evangelists this winter.

Omaha confidently expects to have a delegation of at least 25 to the Minneapolis conventions. Let the people rally to this great gathering.

SUMNER T. MARTIN.

Omaha, Neb., Sept. 11, 1901.

The Rural Pastor and the Convention.

In Kansas and in other states there is a great host of faithful young preachers who will not be able to attend the First Twentieth Century Convention unless the church or churches for which they labor assist in bearing the expenses to and from the convention. Within five hundred and a thousand miles of Minneapolis many a young man is laboring for a salary of from $300 to $600—even many married persons for the latter sum—and, of course, it will be impossible for many such to attend the convention, simply because they cannot spare the money. Would it not be an act of thoughtful, Christian kindness for the brethren to help their pastors go to Minneapolis? Some of these young men have never attended one of our national conventions. They know nothing of the joy, the fellowship, the educating influence of one of these great gatherings. If they could go to Minneapolis, with what enthusiasm, what renewed consecration, what loyalty to the home congregation, what vision would they go back to their work! An offering of twenty five to fifty cents from a few—the price of a day's cigars—would enable many, many of these young brethren to attend the convention. I had the pleasure of suggesting this to our state convention at Hutchinson, last week, and one good farmer brother said, "Here's a dollar to send our preacher." May this good example be followed until all of our preachers, who could not attend without some help, be enabled to go.

Sunday-School Literature.

THE matter of Sunday-school Literature is one of very great importance. For, whether it should be so or not, the fact is that the character of the instruction given in nine-tenths of the Sunday-school classes throughout the country is determined by the contents of the Lesson Helps they use. This being true, and the fact that first impressions are most lasting, how important that Pastors and Superintendents of Christian Sunday-schools see that their Schools are supplied with Christian Periodicals. If the children are taught that one church is as good as another, that certain divine commands are of little or no importance, or can be changed or set aside by man, what effect will it have on the church of the future? "Think on these things."

We understand a FEW of our schools are using sectarian or union (so called) supplies, in order to save a few cents each quarter. Are you one of that number? Samples of our Supplies sent free.

GEORGIA.

Macon.—This is an old conservative town. I took charge of the Christian Church here seven months ago and have had 40 additions. Within the last month we have purchased a tent with a seating capacity of 900 and secured the services of Bro. L. P. Speegel, one of the finest gospel singers in the brotherhood. The meeting in the tent has been running a week and we have had twelve additions and the entire community is stirred up. On Sunday night there were 2,000 people in attendance. Hundreds were compelled to go back home because we could not accommodate them. Rev. Charles I. Stengle, a Baptist preacher from Clinton, South Carolina, preached, and as he concluded his splendid sermon on "The Power of an Idea," he said: "A great idea has within itself the power to revolutionize a man or a nation, and the great idea of Christian unity on the basis of eternal and divine truth has revolutionized me and I now declare myself a Christian, and I desire to be recognized as such and to stand identified with this movement." Bro. Stengle is a young man of splendid pulpit ability, an orator, a scholar and eminently successful in church work. He is desirous of taking work among us and if any church desires his services communicate with me at Macon, Ga., or write to him at Clinton, S. C. The meeting in the tent in Macon will continue for a month at least. I have been identified with the movement only three years, having been a Methodist preacher for nine years. In the three years of my ministry among the disciples I have witnessed the marvelous power of the simple plea for Christian union. I have seen 410 come in and stand upon this platform, and of these 410 four were preachers—two Methodist preachers and two Baptist.—S. R. MAXWELL.

IDAHO.

Grangeville, Sept. 10.—We began a tent meeting here Aug. 4, closed last Sunday night. A church was organized which now numbers 45 members. There were 18 confessions; three from the Baptists, three reclaimed; $550 was raised, a lot purchased and a neat and commodious building is in process of construction which will be finished and dedicated Oct. 6. We expect Bro. W. F. Cowden, of Tacoma, to be with us on that day. Our next meeting will be with the church at Moscow. This is the second church we have organized in northern Idaho since March, and both provided with neat church buildings.—L. F. STEPHENS AND WIFE, evangelists.

ILLINOIS.

Grant Park, Sept. 10.—We have been spending a month with my wife's people here, and my own at Mokence. My wife's mother went to her long home last week. I preached three sermons at Sherburnville, Ill., in the little old church built many years ago by Elder Coffinberry. I preached also at Castleton, Ill. The Baptists have been up there, but our people could easily organize and build there if some one would take up the work. I found the people at Sherburnville anxious for preaching. I baptized a mother and her daughter and several others were inquiring. I called a meeting of the few Disciples at Mokence, Sept. 6, and found about 20 who were Disciples or interested in our plea. I visited Hopkins Park, Ill. The M. E. people had held a meeting there, the preacher proved to be a scoundrel and the work was abandoned. I found five or six anxious for the gospel. A splendid field for work. We return to-morrow to the work in Iowa.—G. A. HESS.

Laomi, Sept. 10.—Since the successful meeting at Bunker Hill, Ill., we have been in a meeting here with W. J. Battenfield, pastor, and are hopeful of great results. We go next to Princeton, Mo.—GUY B. WILLIAMSON AND WIFE.

Windsor, Sept. 12.—We closed a two weeks' meeting at Sexson, in Ash Grove, last night. Fourteen baptized and one from Baptists. Interest good and house overflowing to the last.—A. H. HARRELL.

INDIANA.

Franklin, Sept. 12.—Six made the good confession on my last regular visit with the Bethel Christian Church.—WILLIS M. CUNNINGHAM.

Indianapolis, Sept. 16.—Since Aug. 10 have had short meetings at each of my three charges at Mount Clair, New Brunswick and Lizton with two, five and six additions respectively. Enter Yale Sept. 26.—E. F. DAUGHERTY.

Shoals, Sept. 18.—Our meeting is 12 days old and we have 24 accessions. C. H. De Voe is doing the preaching; George Porter is leading the music.—A. W. GEHRES.

IOWA

Des Moines, Sept. 14.—Just closed a meeting with Apple Grove church near Mitchellville, Ia., 13 added; 10 by confession, 3 by statement.—H. F. BURNS.

Guthrie Center, Sept. 9.—Four additions here last week.—D. L. DUNKLEBERGER.

Iowa Falls, Sept. 9.—Our meeting is two weeks old with four confessions thus far. We have very attentive audiences, and are hopeful for the last half of the meeting. H. E. Van Horn, of Des Moines, is doing the preaching.—F. D. FILLMORE.

Kasson, Sep. 9.—In a tent meeting of four weeks, conducted by Evangelist O. E. Hamilton, in August at Barney, Ia., there were 66 additions to the Church of Christ, there being a good company from the Methodists, three from the Presbyterians and a large number by baptism. Over $1,000 was raised for a church and plans were made for a C. E. Society; this is a new field and the outlook is very encouraging. Bro. Hamilton has pitched his tent with us at Kasson. He is a student of Drake University and has a wonderful power for one of his age.—H. H. KILGORE.

New Sharon, Sept. 13.—We have made a net gain of 24 members this year. Have gone beyond our past record in missions and benevolences. We are now rebuilding and will dedicate the finest house of worship in the town about Jan. 1, 1902. I have been invited to remain with the church another year.—H. JAS. CROCKETT.

Riverton, Sept. 11.—Closed a good meeting here about two weeks ago. A church was organized and last week a Bible-school was organized.—H. W. CIES.

Carrollton, Sept. 13.—Three additions yesterday, two by confession and one by letter.—E. H. KELLAR.

Columbia, Sept. 10.—On Sept. 8, I closed a meeting at Deer Park Christian Church, Boone county, Mo. After preaching for 12 days, the Presbyterian and Baptist ministers alternated with me and we continued 11 days as a union meeting. The method of the union service was very simple. We agreed to hold up Christ to the people and ask them to come and confess him. After each sermon an invitation song was announced and the invitation extended in the usual way. Those who came forward made the confession just as they always do in our meetings. Everything worked harmoniously and the best of feeling prevailed among all the people. We had seven confessions, four of whom united with the Christian Church, two with the Methodist Church and one with the Baptist Church. I begin a meeting at Boydsville, Sept. 11, with home forces.—J. G. CREASON.

Hopkins.—Closed a two weeks' engagement at Grand Pass, Saline Co., Sept. 4 and came here for a meeting beginning Sept. 8. Pastor Furgeson has just gone to Bedford, Iowa, where he takes up the work.—BEN F. HILL.

Kansas City, Sept. 10.—I went to Dewitt, Mo., Sept. 7, preached to good houses Sunday. Had four additions. Held a short service in the country at 4 P. M. Two confessed and one restored. Three will be baptized next Lord's day, when we will begin our meeting if we can get a preacher.—GEO. A. E. TROUTMAN.

Kansas City, Sept. 9.—On Sept. 6 I closed a 10 days' meeting at Woodland Church near Moseby, Mo.; 18 confessions and baptisms and five by statement. This church is taking on new life. I began with them May 1 and on the first Sunday in May took two confessions and two took membership by statement. They have spent about $100 on the house.—W. A. NICKELL.

Kenoma, Sept. 12.—Our pastor, W. N. Porter, closed an 18 days' meeting for the congregation at Kenoma with four confessions and baptisms and one reclaimed; others almost persuaded. Bro. Porter will hold us another meeting in the near future, in which we expect to reap a rich harvest from the seed already sown.

Kirkville, Sept. 12.—We had six additions here last Sunday.—H. A. NORTHCUTT.

New Franklin, Sept. 9.—Bro. A. N. Lindsey closed an interesting meeting with the church here to-day, with 18 additions; 12 baptisms, two by letter and four from the denominations. He was assisted part of the time by Bro. E. M. Richmond, of Fayette. Bro. Lindsey began preaching for the New Franklin Church in May, 1900, since which time there have been 96 additions to this congregation comprising a number of the leading citizens.—J. M. SETTLE.

Pattonsburg, Sept. 9.—Since last report we have had additions as follows: Four at Jamesport, one by confession and baptism and three by statement; one at Sumner, Mo., by confession and baptism. I commence a meeting at Pleasant Grove, Caldwell county, next Lord's day, assisted by H. F. Campbell.—ROBT. ADAMS.

Savannah, Sept. 15.—One addition by statement and one confession. Have had two weddings and seven funerals recently. In the last few months we have spent $2,000 repairing, improving and beautifying our church property. I expect to begin a meeting at Fillmore, Mo., Sept. 23.—A. R. HUNT.

NEW TESTAMENT COMMENTARIES

During the past two years there has developed among the Christian people of America a great revival of interest in the study of the Bible. Never before in the history of Christianity were so many people zealously and earnestly studying the Bible, endeavoring to know more of its contents and its meaning. Everywhere there are being organized classes and clubs for Bible study. In consequence of this movement there is a brisk demand for Bible helps—books that have hitherto been sold chiefly to preachers. The people are inquiring for the best commentaries and exegetical works to aid them in their study of the Bible. We are glad to be able to announce that we are fully prepared to supply Bible students with the best books to meet their requirements. A few of these we list here:

COMMENTARY ON MATTHEW AND MARK. By J. W. MCGARVEY. A volume of 392 pages, cloth-bound. The former price ($2.00) has been reduced to $1.50.

COMMENTARY ON LUKE. By J. S. LAMAR. A splendid book by a great man. Cloth, 333 pages. Reduced from $2.00 to $1.50.

COMMENTARY ON JOHN. By B. W. JOHNSON, the well-known commentator. This is a cloth-bound volume of 328 pages. Price reduced to $1.50.

STUDIES IN ACTS. By W. J. LHAMON. One of the finest works of recent years. Bound in cloth; 420 pages; price, $1.25.

COMMENTARY ON ROMANS. By MOSES E. LARD. A book of 485 pages, bound in cloth. Price, recently reduced, is now $2.00.

COMMENTARY ON HEBREWS. The author, R. MILLIGAN, was one of our most gifted men. Cloth, 395 pages. The reduced price is now $1.50.

PEOPLE'S NEW TESTAMENT WITH NOTES. By B. W. JOHNSON. Two volumes. Vol. I. contains the Four Gospels and Acts; Vol. II. covers the Epistles and Revelation. A concise, but complete work, of as much practical value to the average man as a commentary in 15 volumes costing $30.00. Bound in cloth. Price, per volume, $2.00; per set, $4.00.

Please note that former prices of these works have been reduced 25 per cent. Many thousand copies were sold at the original prices, but we desire that many more thousands shall have the help and benefit of the thought and genius of these eminent Bible scholars. In the case of a class, club or association organized for Bible study, we suggest that a fund be raised to purchase this list of books, and other works, for the joint use of the members. A full description of the volumes in the above list will be found in our 100-page General Catalogue, mailed free on receipt of request. Address, by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

WHY?

Why do you, who live in the Mississippi Valley, send to New York, Boston, Philadelphia, or even to Chicago for a desired volume, when you can secure it much more quickly and just as cheap in St. Louis? This is a question that is very difficult to answer. We can supply you with any book that you wish—a respectable book, that is; French novels and blood-and-thunder-seven-buckets-of-gore-to-the-chapter romances are barred—no matter where or by whom published. Our business is by no means confined to the books we ourselves publish. Our catalogue contains only our own publications, in the main, but we can sell you any book you wish to purchase.

Riches of the Righteous.

By W. H. Bagby.

For all things belong to the children of God,
Whether Cephas, Apollos or Paul;
Nor present nor future doth hold any good
But belongeth to God's people all.

The beggar that lies at the gate of the rich,
Neglected by all till he dies,
Who is buried at last at public expense,
May be heir to the wealth of the skies.

The question is not are we wealthy or great,
For neither the one nor the other
Will serve to admit us within the fair gate.
This only:—Is Jesus my Brother?

On Grumblers.

In heaven there are no grumblers, and that makes heaven. In hell there is nothing else, and that makes hell. In this world things are greatly mixed, thorns and flowers, thanksgivings and complainings, with a large proportion of the latter. The Englishman is said to be the champion grumbler of the world, especially when he comes to America; then he writes his grumblings out and prints them in a book and sends them over to us and we grumble back to him. I remember some time ago to have heard of an Englishman traveling in this country in company with an American friend. He could not find anything to his liking. "The water was beastly, don't you know," the roads untravelable, the food indigestible, the waiters uncivil, the landlords exorbitant, the manners of the people were crude and rude.

It was just at the time when we were having extraordinary sunsets, when long after the sun went down there lingered in the western sky a glow of almost preternatural beauty, so that some people feared it was the foretokening of the end of the world. The American pointed his English friend one evening to that sky. "Now look at that, old boy. You talk of the orient, of sunset skies in classic lands, but where in the world did you ever see so fine a sky as that?" The Englishman looked at it a moment and said: "Well, don't you think it is just a little overdone?" The Lord himself could not please him when he came to paint a sunset.

But this is not peculiar to an Englishman. It is characteristic of universal humanity. The first man that ever appeared on earth began to grumble because there was just one tree in all the world that he could not eat of, and that grumbling cost him paradise, and every child of Adam is just like his father. The first thing a baby does when he opens his eyes on this new world is to strike out with both hands and feet and howl his protest against his environment. Nobody likes his business, I care not what it is. It may be he is a dry goods merchant. He tells you there was a time when a man could make a fortune selling dry goods, but now the competition is so close that nobody can make money out of it. But he keeps a good house and fine horses and goes to Chautauqua every summer. Yet he is losing money all the time. What a lot he must have had to start with.

If there is any place on earth where the voice of the grumbler ought not to be heard it is in the sanctuary of the home, but that is where it is heard most loudly.

When a man is at his place of business he has to be a gentleman, but when he goes to his own home he has not got to be anything in particular, and so he lets out the pent-up fury of the day. He comes in like a howling cyclone. "What's the reason dinner isn't ready? What's the matter with that beefsteak? It isn't fit for a dog. I'll go to a hashhouse." Poor little woman. She has been waiting all day for him to come home. She has had her troubles, and has been wishing for sympathy. This is the kind she gets. The tears are swelling in her eyes, she has a great lump in her throat that she can't swallow, and she wishes she were dead and you too, especially you.

Somebody says we need wide-awake men. There is more need for fast-asleep men. This world is going mad for the want of sleep. Every now and then I get too cross for anybody to live with, and I know what is the matter. What I need is sleep, and then I wake up and I am as beautiful as a May morning. Cultivate a good conscience—a conscience void of offense toward God and man. And cultivate the habit of being thankful for small favors, think how many things you have to be thankful for, and think how many things you would not like to have. In itself that was not a bad prayer of the Pharisee, "I thank thee that I am not as other men are," if he had not been so stuck on himself. When I see a man who is crippled or blind I extend to him my brotherly sympathy, and thank God that I can walk and see.

Then get in the habit of looking for sweetness and light. They get what they look for. Here is a bee in the neighborhood of Chicago. There are a great many things to smell of in Chicago; stockyards, our unspeakable rivers (though St. Louis is doing most of the smelling now), a lot of decayed aldermen, though there are not so many of them as there were. A bee has no nose for things like these, but a mile away is a rose with honey in its heart, and he makes a beeline for the rose, covers himself with honey and returns to his hive. He got what he went for. Here is a buzzard. There are thousands of flower gardens in and about Chicago, but a buzzard has no nose for flowers; but a mile away is a dead rat, and so he goes for that. Now if you want to smell a rose, you just want to find a rose; and if you want to smell a rat, you can commonly find that, but excuse me. Look for sweetness and light and you will find it every day and everywhere. Paul and Silas found it in the dungeon at midnight.

The New Monster.

The automobile has come into great, and not altogether pleasant, prominence in Europe as a means of cross country touring. "Scorching" on a bicycle was bad enough, but scorching with a steam-engine on a public highway is more serious. The following picture of the new monster on French roads comes from the Fribourg (Switzerland) Gazette:

We hear it before it comes upon us. We hear it from afar. It has the bray of a donkey with the bronchitis, but a furious, ferocious, apocalyptic donkey! You hear it behind the hill, before the river is crossed. Then towards the clump of walnut trees over there, at the turn of the road, there suddenly rises a cloud of dust, or smoke, or steam. It is now near Father Jamin's farm, grinding and menacing. The road shakes and the stones fly in pieces; here it comes towards the poplars—huge blank steely gleams here and there, shuddering and leaping, a perfect whirlwind. If you have had the time to take shelter in the hedge you will not be crushed, but you are covered with a moist greasy dust, and in your nostrils is the strong odor of benzine.

The motor car has passed.

Somewhat discomposed, you come out of your hole, you shake off the dust, and try to put on a cheerful expression. . . . Then, as you rest on the moss, near the clear stream, perhaps with half-closed eyes you perceive a picturesque procession; the old yellow family coach, the postilion in his purple waistcoat, the plumed horses; the carriage of your grandmother's time, and the noble ladies within, their huge hats bedecked with ribbons; then a brilliant cavalcade of blue-coated riders in attendance on a graceful damsel in a riding habit; or, again, the smart turnout of today, with groom and coachman so punctiliously correct in their livery. One day, if you live to be a grandfather, you will tell your grandchildren stories about horses, which will seem like fairy tales to them.

Let Something Good be Said.

When over the fair fame of friend or foe
The shadow of disgrace shall fall; instead
Of words of blame, or proof of thus and so,
Let something good be said.

Forget not that no fellow being yet
May fall so low but love may lift his head;
Even the cheek of shame with tears is wet,
If something good be said.

No generous heart may vainly turn aside
In ways of sympathy; no soul so dead
But may awaken strong and glorified,
If something good be said.

And so I charge ye by the thorny crown,
And by the cross on which the Savior
bled,
And by your own soul's hope of fair renown,
Let something good be said.

—James Whitcomb Riley.

The Value of a College Training.

The once popular notion that a college education was a hindrance to a young man who intended to devote his life to anything except one of the "learned professions" has fallen into disfavor. The college boy of to-day is not the theoretical, impractical dreamer that he has been pictured, but a level-headed young fellow who has as much common sense as the non-college boy and a few other things besides. The following from the World's Work describes one instance in which college training was a good preparation for business:

The following selections from a college student's letters possess a certain significance, though, patently, they give testimony regarding but a single isolated case. The student who wrote the two letters is a junior in one of the leading engineering schools of the country, engaged for the summer in an engineering office in the West. Both letters were written recently to a friend in New York City—the second following the first after an interval of a week. They are self-explanatory.

FIRST LETTER: "I have worked just one week now with so many practical difficulties to confront that I believe I am wide awake for the first time in three years. Chopping trees, pulling down fences, driving stakes in a sloppy and miserable marsh, I have little time to think, but evenings when I review the day's work, I wonder if there isn't a glimmer of sense in the opinions of these Schwabs and Colers who deny the value of a college education. From what I have seen, I do not believe that a man who goes into civil engineering as a profession, after four years at a scientific school, is any better off than the man who goes into it as a trade, without any college education at all. Most of the men in our office are not college men, but fellows who have worked up from rodmen after a year or two at high school. For a college man to pass them would be extremely difficult. They have picked up in the office enough mathematics to serve them, and in the time when a college man would be studying German and French, advanced mathematics, electricity, boilers, mechanical drawing, and all the odds and ends of a scientific course, these men have confined themselves to just the things they need, and have, therefore, become specialists, able to do their work with the greatest smoothness. If a boy wants to become a civil engineer, I am beginning to think, he had better go into it as a trade as soon as he graduates from high school. Of course, I feel personally that what I have got from college is without price, but simply in this matter of civil engineering, I doubt whether a college man has a better chance to succeed than an ambitious fellow who goes into it as a trade without ever seeing a college."

SECOND LETTER: "Please burn my last letter. I should have known better than to generalize after a single week's experience. Three days after I wrote, the design for the new bridge at N—— was sent in, and the chief sent out to P—— for a man to go to work on the job—one of these high-school graduates I wrote about, who has been six years in the office, and who certainly is a good fellow and a capable man. The chief talked with him for some time, and then he sent for me and gave me a regular college quiz on cuts and fills, curves, strength of material, mathematical formulae, and other details of bridge construction until my head swam. When he had finished he said: 'Report to the engineer on the new bridge at N——.'

"That afternoon the man who had come in from P—— came over to me—I was packing up my kit—and said in the most discouraged tone, 'You see what it is to have a college education.'

"I looked up at him—he is four years older than I, and big, strong, and tanned with his years of outdoor work—and I said, 'What's the matter?'

"'Here I am,' said he, 'I've been in the office for six years, doing all kinds of work, and they won't trust me on that bridge. The chief knows you are familiar with mathematics and have studied the theory of bridges, and without questioning your experience he puts you on the job, and sends me back to that beastly marsh.'

"It was hard luck. I lent him my books, and told him that by spending the next two years studying nights he would learn all the theory he needed, and would know more than anybody else in the office. He's going to do it, too. But I think I'll take back what I said last week about college education: it not only gives a man a life that he could not have without it—even, I think, with millions—but it seems also to have a certain amount of very practical value."

He was hungry and in funds. "Waiter, here's a dollar. Now suggest a good dinner for me." Waiter (in a serious whisper): "Go to some other restaurant, sir."

Enter Pearline Exit Grind

An Agreeable Guest.

The longest visit we read of in modern days was one which Dr. Isaac Watts made at Lord Abney's in the Isle of Wight. He went to spend a fortnight, but they made him so happy that he remained a beloved and honored guest for forty years.

Few of us would care to make so long a visit as that, but it might be worth the while for us all to try and learn the secret of making ourselves agreeable and welcome guests. To have a "nice time" when one is visiting is delightful, but to leave behind us a pleasant impression is worth a great deal more.

An agreeable guest is a title which any one may be proud to deserve. A great many people with the best intentions and the kindest hearts never receive it, simply because they have never considered the subject and really do not know how to make their stay in another person's home a pleasure instead of an inconvenience. If you are one of these thoughtless ones, you may be sure that, although your friends are glad to see you happy and may enjoy your visit on that account, your departure will be followed with a sigh of relief, as the family settle down to their usual occupations, thinking, if not saying, that they are glad the visit is over.

A great many different qualities and habits go to make up the character of one whom people are always glad to see, and these last must be proved while we are young, if we expect to wear them gracefully. A young person whose presence in the house is an inconvenience and a weariness at fifteen, is seldom a welcome visitor in after-life.

A lady who is charming as a guest and as a hostess once said to me: "I never take a nap in the afternoon when I am at home, but I do when I am visiting, because I know what a relief it has sometimes been to me to have company lie down for a little while after dinner."

Try, without being too familiar, to make yourself so much like one of the family that no one shall feel you to be in the way; and, at the same time, be observant of those small courtesies and kindnesses which, all together, make up what the world agrees to call good manners.

Six Things Behind.

"Rufus," said his mother, "did you mail the letter I gave you last evening?"

"Oh, mother—I forgot it. I meant to, but just then I had to go and get some new shoe strings, so it went out of my mind."

"Didn't I speak of those strings yesterday morning?"

"Yes, but just then father had called me to ask if I had weeded the pansy bed the night before."

"And had you?"

"No, mother, I was just then writing the letter you said must go to grandma"—

"I thought you were to write that on Saturday."

"I meant to, but I had to do some examples that I didn't do on Friday, so I hadn't time."

"Rufus," called his brother, "didn't you nail the broken slat on the rabbit pen yesterday?"

"Oh," Rufus sprang up in dismay, "I was just going to, but I hadn't watered the house plants, and I went to do that, and then"—

"The rabbits are all out."

Rufus hastened to join in the hunt for the pets. In the course of his search he came upon two tennis racquets which he had "meant to" bring in the night before, and they were in bad condition.

"There now! It will cost ever so much to get these strung up. Why didn't I take them in, anyway? I remember I hadn't locked the stable door when father called me, and then I hurried to do it before he asked me again."

Later in the day Rufus, with a penitent face, brought to his mother the letter which should have been mailed. During the rabbit hunt it had slipped out of his pocket, one of his brothers had found it in the damp clover, and it was now a sorry looking missive.

"Rufus," she said, as he sat on the porch step near her, "I do not see how you can endure it to live such a burdened life."

"How burdened, mother?"

"You are always hurrying from one thing to another"—

"Why, yes, you see, when I'm told to do one thing I generally have to wait till I do something I've been told to do before. Then by the time I do it likely I've forgotten the other thing, so when somebody tells me to do something else, there's something ahead of it. It seems just so all the time."

"Exactly," said his mother, with a smile at his way of putting it. "You live all the time under a burden of undone duties."

"Well, it does seem," said Rufus reflectively, "as though I was always about six things behind."

"That is a poor way to get along."

"I guess it is," agreed Rufus, with energy.

"Then why don't you try a better way? It is a bad, bad habit. A habit clings to us, and grows stronger. Every time we yield to it it is one more brick added to the character we are building. A brick is a small thing, and they are laid one by one, but as a wall of habit rises day by day how fearfully strong it is, if the habit is a bad one. If you carry your habit into manhood—dragging along your burden of delayed or undone duties—what a wretched pattern of a man you will be."

"I shouldn't like to be that," said Rufus, soberly.

"I hope you will not."

"But it does seem as though I never could get caught up."

"Brace yourself to it, my boy. Ask for the help we all need, even in what we consider our smaller duties, and then be on the alert to do every duty in its proper time. Promptness and reliability are among the best foundation stones on which a boy can build character."—Sydney Dayre, in Herald and Presbyterian.

A Chicago man, who had just visited the new oil fields near Beaumont, Texas, was telling his family all about it the night of his return. For half an hour he spoke glibly of gushers, derricks, tanks, go-devils, shooters, pumpers, nitroglycerine, and drills. Then he asked how things were going in Chicago.

"But what is a gusher?" inquired his wife.

"What makes the oil spout up in the air so high?" demanded his oldest boy.

"How did it get into the ground?" came from the daughter.

"What's it made of?" piped the youngest boy.

Just then the head of the house remembered he had to go over and see a neighbor, and said, in a tone of deep regret, that "father" would have to answer their questions. So the interrogators closed in on the genial, white-bearded old gentleman, who said he would be delighted to tell them something about petroleum, although it was forty years since he studied geology, and perhaps he was a little rusty. He might have added that it was just two days since he had pored over an excellent article on the Texas oil field, by a prominent geologist, but he didn't.

"Petroleum," said grandpa, as he stroked his beard and puckered his brow, "is grease from plants, animals, and fishes that lived ages ago. Countless millions of these creatures were left lying in the mud by floods or sudden changes in the earth's surface, and sank into it. The mud around them hardened, in many places so quickly that the air was shut out before the bodies decayed, then turned to rock, and they were preserved for centuries—canned for future use, you might say. Very slowly the oil in the fossils seeped out through the rock, and where this took place on a large scale between two oil-tight, unbroken layers of stone, the oil could not leak away, and in the course of ages large pools of it collected there. When the well borer drills down into this pool he 'strikes oil.'"

"Now, part of this oil is in the form of gas, which is greatly compressed because of its imprisonment. Of course, it forces out the oil through the drill-hole until this compression is relieved, and then the remaining oil has to be pumped up. While a well spouts the oil to the surface it is a 'gusher,' and when it stops doing so, it becomes a 'pumper.'"

"The rock in which petroleum is found, though it may be hundreds of feet underground, was once at the surface. It was buried by layers of rock which formed on top of it. Pennsylvania oil comes from the very old rock of the Devonian Age, and so we know it was formed millions of years before Wyoming oil, which occurs in rock of the much more recent Tertiary period. The stratum that Texas oil comes from has not yet been determined."

A FEW FACTS

About the New Catarrh Cure.

The new Catarrh Cure is a new departure in so-called catarrh cures because it actually cures, and is not simply a temporary relief.

The new Catarrh Cure is not a salve, ointment, powder nor liquid, but a pleasant tasting tablet containing the best specifics for catarrh in a concentrated, convenient form.

The old style of catarrh salves and ointments are greasy, dirty and inconvenient at the best; the new preparation being in tablet form is always clean and convenient.

The new Catarrh Cure is superior to catarrh powders because it is a notorious fact that many catarrh powders contain cocaine.

The new Catarrh Cure is called Stuart's Catarrh Tablets, a wholesome combination of blood root, beechwood tar, guaiacal and other antiseptics, and cures by its action upon the blood and mucous membrane, the only rational treatment for catarrhal trouble.

You do not have to draw upon your imagination to discover whether you are getting benefit from Stuart's Catarrh Tablets; improvements and relief are apparent from the first tablet taken.

All druggists sell and recommend them. They cost but 50 cents for full sized packages, and any catarrh sufferer who has wasted time and money on sprays, salves and powders, will appreciate to the full the merits of Stuart's Catarrh Tablets.

A little booklet on cause and cure of catarrh sent free by addressing F. A. Stuart Co., Marshall, Mich.

"What made the Texans think there was oil underground? Well, in oil regions, a little petroleum and gas ooze out from the earth, and oily films are seen on the surface of some of the streams. The oil which the Seneca Indians sold for medicine in your great-grandfather's time was collected from such sources in New York. I would like to tell you a lot more about it, but it is time to go to bed."

"Isn't grandpa great?" said the youngest boy.—The Little Chronicle.

"Dinny! Thot ould hin is atin' sthray tacks." "Maybe she is goin' to lay a carpet."

She—It's funny that you should be so tall. Your brother, the artist, is short, isn't he?

He (absently)—Yes, usually.

"Yes, my dear," said the sarcastic hubby, "you may have made the cake all alone, as you say, but who helped you to lift it out of the oven?"

"I just dropped in to see if you wanted any of your wise saws sharpened," said the funny man.

"No, we use our own files for that," replied the editor.

"So you have captured the moonshiners?" said the chief to his lieutenant. "Good enough! How did you happen to be so successful?" "Well, sir, we went on a still hunt," replied the lieutenant.

Mrs. Howler—"Asbury, that was a most excellent sermon you preached on 'vanity' this morning." Rev. Howler—"Well, I think, my dear, that I can flatter myself that there are very few men in this universe who could have done better."

PETE.

XXIV. A Carriage-Picnic.

So Pete got well, after she began to talk; and Edgar Brown's ankle recovered its customary articulation. He kept a horse and surrey in Mrs. Morris's barn. He took the girls driving. One evening he said, as he started the horse for town (it was Saturday afternoon,—you see they all went to school now, except Mr. Brown), "What do you say to a little picnic? A carriage-picnic? It's this way: we drive out toward the mineral springs, and stop under some big shady tree by the roadside, and eat a lunch in our surrey." "I will be glad," said Linda May. "I always wanted to go to a picnic, but aunt Dollie always stood in the way." "And I'm glad they's a lunch" said Pete. "Yes," said Edgar, "we'll get some sardines and crackers, and gingersnaps, and lady-fingers, and Bologna sausage, and cheese." He was quite enthusiastic with the idea. "I don't like sardines," said Madge promptly. "No," said Letitia, musingly, "thout vinegar or slice of lemon." "I can't BEAR chee-e and crackers," remarked Linda May. "Neither can I; ain't it funny!" cried Pete. "Then perhaps we'd better omit the lunch," said Edgar dejectedly. "Oh, no!" came a chorus of four voices. "What shall we have, then?" he asked. "I've named over about all we can get from the store; except watermelons." "Don't le's get watermelons," said Letitia; "the rinds always look so, after you have got through." "We want candy," said Linda May. "Yes, candy!" came the chorus. So they got candy-figs, candy-orange-slices, cocoanut, chocolate, marshmallow, butterscotch, niggerheels, taffy, kisses, peppermint, wintergreen. The lot came to fifteen cents, with a stick of licorice thrown in. Then they left town and drove toward the springs. "Oh, there's Lucifer following us!" exclaimed Linda May. "It is so comfortable to have a dog following your carriage, isn't it!" They entered a country road, and met a cow. Lucifer stopped as if turned to stone. The cow lowered her horns and glared at the dog. "He is a fearful coward," said Edgar; "but every character has some defect." The cow moored and Lucifer yelped with terror. He was afraid to try to pass, so Edgar stopped and waited for him. "I have his collar," said Linda May. "I'm keeping it as a souvenir of one night. Oh, Mr. Brown! a few days after Lucifer tried to stay all night with us, aunt Dollie and I began to smell something perfectly DREADFUL in the parlor. It was worsern mice in a bureau drawer! We hunted an' hunted. So one day I went in the parlor, and there was a long line of black ants, marchin'. I followed um, and behine the big picture of me, that sets in the corner, was our beefsteak that disappeared that night! You see, Lucifer had hid it there till he would be hungry. Oh, how it smelt!" "Pee-you!" cried Pete, "I should think so!" "Um-mhh!" chorused Letitia and Madge. At that moment the cow made a dive at Lucifer. The dog, yelping in agony, dashed around her, and got under the surrey. Edgar drove on with the dog keeping under the vehicle. But when they had turned a corner and the cow was hidden, Lucifer came out, and turned in the direction of the cow, and began to bark at her, and to run as if he wanted to overtake her. But he always came back before he reached the corner. That made the pleasure-party laugh. Lucifer's bark was so fierce and bold that it made his tail shake with convulsions.

When they stopped under the shade of a great big walnut tree, Pete said, "Mr. Brown, I'll tell you a secret if you'll tell me one." He said he would; so she said, "You remember, long ago, how anxious you was to be friends of us? And I told you Madge was so hard to get acquainted with; and you must do things before she'd notice you? Well, that was just a joke." "I have suspected so since," he said with a smile. "And now I'll tell you something; it wasn't Nap who hid the candy in your boxes: I did it!" "Oh, oh!" cried the girls. "Yes, that first night, I saw Pete put out her box, and I didn't know about the tramp; so I put in the candy, without knowing there was a note there. Then I filled Linda May's box; and Letitia's; and it was fun to hear you all laying it to Nap." "Poor Nap!" said Pete, "I wonder what has become of him? I haven't seen him since he told me the Thump, thump, thump story." "He told me," said Edgar, "that he is going to try and settle down, and if he ever gets respectable, he's coming back to see us all." "Oh, did he! Hurrah! I like Nap. But I'm afraid," added Pete doubtfully, "that he won't be near as nice, if he gets respectable; whaddy you think?"

When the carriage-picnic was over, Edgar walked to his hotel thinking, "I can't tell which one I like best. There's Pete—bless her heart!—and Madge—bless her!—and Linda May—little sunbeam!—and Letitia,—Dear me! how can I decide?" Then he remembered his walk through the storm with Mrs. Morris's oldest daughter, and added, "Or Jennie?" Suddenly he blushed. He went up to his room, opened an old scrap-book and took out a pressed flower; a red rose. He walked with it to the window. It had been given him by his sweetheart of the years gone by. He remembered how he used to kiss the faded petals. An almost imperceptible perfume came from the rose which she gave him one starlight night when the orchestra from Kansas City was playing "Il Trovatore." Dear me! He leaned out the window and slowly tearing the rose to fragments, let the petals drift out upon the October breeze. He watched them float to the street, then murmured softly, "Or Jennie?"

In the meantime our four young friends were perched upon Mrs. Morris's back fence; first, Linda May and Madge; and next to Madge, Letitia; and then Pete. "Madge," said Linda May, suddenly, "look at my legs!" She started to hold one up, to make the examination easy, when she slipped, and almost turned a summersault off the fence. "Well!" cried Madge, laughing; "a little more and I think the whole town will be looking at them!" "Oh, Madge!" said Pete reproachfully, "when Linda May slipped, why didn't you pushur an' maker skin the cat." "I wish I had of," said Madge. "I would of," said Pete. "I bet you wouldn't of," retorted Linda May, laughing. "I bet I would of!" cried Letitia. "You couldn't of!" said Linda May, "you ain't strong enough." "I know I could of, too," retorted Letitia; "couldn't I of, Pete?" "Course you could of!" said

The Inquiring Greeks.*

TEXT: Now there were certain Greeks among those that went up to worship at the feast: these therefore came to Philip, which was of Bethsaida of Galilee, and asked him saying, Sir, we would see Jesus.—John 12:20,21.

Plainly these men were outsiders. There were Jewish Greeks, but these were Gentiles. In this lies the peculiar joy which breaks forth from the lips of the Savior. There may not have been many of them, but they came saying what all the world is beginning to say, "We would see Jesus." The light was spreading. Jesus saw the immense and thrilling significance of this inquiry. After this handful of Gentiles, whole provinces, nations, races were coming; these were the fore-runners.

An Earnest Desire.

Men are restless, when they do not know what ails them. They seek satisfaction in business and find it not; in pleasure, but pleasure palls; in travel, and travel becomes a weariness of the flesh. They learn at last that there is no enduring happiness apart from God; that theirs is a soul-hunger. However frivolous the means men employ to quench the fever, the fever is there; the desire burns. Comparatively few are content without an altar and a ritual. From the weird incantations of the jungle to the oratorio in the cathedral, we read the history of the soul's efforts to find peace.

Happy these Greeks, for they seem to know what they want. They approach Jesus through His friends and disciples. Do men ever come to you with the same desire, the same request? And if not, why not? Perhaps your life does not reveal Christ to them. What a blessed transformation, when the whole church will so reflect Christ that men will come eagerly desirous of seeing Him!

The Incarnate Word.

"What think ye of Christ?" Upon the answer to this question depends your life. John tells us that "the Word became flesh, and dwelt among us, full of grace and truth" (John 1:14). Christ incarnates the Word. In Him dwells the fulness of the Godhead bodily, and we are complete in Him. John teaches that "Jesus Christ is the real incarnation of an eternally divine Person, who has ever been the medium through Whom God has exercised His activity in relation to the finite universe." As the perfect manifestation of God's nature and will, He is called the Word. So when these men asked to see Jesus, they were asking to see the ever-living One.

The simple fact of Christ is enough to silence cavil. No such fact as He has ever been manifested before or since. Go back to those four simple stories of His life and ministry, and then tell why they have such power over you. Not in herself, but in her Lord, the church will evermore find power. The prayer of many a disciple should be, "I would see Jesus."

Transforming Power.

The world of men do not need transportation, but transformation. The old thought of religion, that it affords a safe and happy exit from this world, and that this is its chief function, is dying out. It manifests its adaptation to this world by its transforming power. The method of this transformation is indicated when Paul says, "We all, with unveiled face, reflecting as a mirror the glory of the Lord, are transformed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as from the Lord, the Spirit" (2 Cor. 3:18). Reflect Christ, and you become like Him. Uncover your heart before Him, abide in His presence, and let your conduct be a reflection of Him, and see how rapidly this change will be brought about.

*Prayer-meeting topic for Sept. 25.

The energy is not in our reflecting, but in Him. The idea in the question, "What would Jesus do?" deserves our careful consideration, for unless we ask it, we cannot reflect Him in our daily life. Reflection is more than imitation; it brings about identification. When Christ said, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father," what did He mean? Did He not say, "I am doing as the Father does. Watch me. If the Father were here, would He do anything different from what I am doing? The Father is here, for I am doing His will. We have common cause, we are one, one in spirit, in purpose, in method." So at least every Christian should dare to say. He that sees me, sees not me, but Christ. And yet we shall have to permit this transforming process to go on much farther before we can claim identity with Him. This, finally, is our aim. "We shall be like Him, for we shall see Him even as He is" (1 John 3:2).

Prayer.

Help us, O God, to see Jesus as we have never seen Him before, in all the plenitude of His power. May we be transfixed by the vision, and transformed by the energy, until we shall echo Him. Stir the tired hearts of men with a great yearning for this excellence, until the continents afar and the islands of the sea shall exclaim, "We would see Jesus!" Amen.

Travel.

A word or two on the subject of travel is not amiss. The facilities for the transportation of passengers at the present time have certainly been brought to perfection. It isn't like in the old days when it was almost a torture to go from one place to another. Now you get aboard a train and live just like you do at home. The entire equipment is built with a view to your comfort.

For instance: When you go East the B. & O. S-W. offers you Three Daily Solid Vestibuled Trains from St. Louis, leaving at 8:20 a. m., 8:05 p. m. and 2:15 a. m.—made up of the finest Pullman sleepers—a dining car service which cannot be excelled (you don't have to pay for what you can't eat, but just for what you order)—first class high back coaches—in fact the trains are palaces on wheels. The track, roadbed and equipment are entirely new.

It's the best line to Cincinnati and Louisville. Only $21 to New York with stop-overs. (Saves you money and gives you the best service.)

Information in regard to trains, etc., can be secured from any representative. It will be a pleasure for them to answer your questions and help you in every way.

The favor of the public is final proof of merit—and we're after it.

Quaint, Queer and Quirious Salt Lake City.

The late Col. John Cockerell in the Cosmopolitan said: "There are three unique cities in America, and one of these is SALT LAKE CITY." It is not only unique in its Temple, Tabernacle and Mormon Church institutions, but quaint in appearance, with its wide streets, immense blocks and martial rows of shade trees. It has, perhaps, more attractions to the square yard than any city in the country, and its climate, while temperate all the year round, is particularly delightful in summer. The Great Salt Lake, with its magnificent Saltair resort, where the water is "deader and denser" than that in the Dead Sea in Palestine, is an attraction in itself that people come miles to see. There are many cool mountain and lake resorts near by, also numerous very pretty canyon trips and parks, drives, Hot and Warm Sulphur Springs. Fishing and hunting in every direction. The trip from Denver to Salt Lake City and Ogden via the RIO GRANDE WESTERN RAILWAY in connection with either the Colorado Midland or Denver & Rio Grande railroads is one of unsurpassed pleasure. Here nature is found in her sternest mood and the whole line is a succession of rugged canyon, waterfalls and picturesque valleys. No European trip can compare with it in grandeur of scenery. During the entire summer there will be low excursion rates to Salt Lake City and contiguous country. It is on the road to the Pacific Coast, if that be your destination. Send four cents postage to Geo. W. Heintz, General Passenger Agent, Rio Grande Western Railway, Salt Lake City, for literature, etc.

The Value Of Charcoal.

Few People Know How Useful It Is In Preserving Health and Ease.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better; it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines, and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking, or after eating onions or other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion; it whitens the teeth; and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics, in tablet form, or rather in the form of large, pleasant-tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood; and the beauty of it is that no harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician, in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

Third Quarterly Review.*

The lessons of the past quarter extend over a period of more than twenty centuries, and occupy the larger part of the book called Genesis. It has to do with the origins of the history, both of the human race and of its redemption. The creation story gives us the beginning of the present order and the entrance into the new world of man, who is the end and object of all the visible creation. The narrative of the fall introduces us to the awful reality of sin, against which, for six thousand years, the human race has been struggling, and the conquest of which seems yet far in the distance. The separation of Abraham and his descendants from all other nations and tribes, to be a chosen people unto God, marks the beginning of the race's return to God, culminating in the ministry of the greatest Son of Abraham, Jesus Christ, to whom all the notable characters and striking types of the Old Testament bear witness. To have studied carefully and intelligently these lessons is to possess a goodly fund of knowledge concerning the purpose of God for the children of men. Without reviewing in order the lessons we have gone over, we prefer suggesting a few thoughts which seem to us worthy of emphasis, as derived from this interesting portion of Scripture.

1. God, who is the author of all, is likewise the ruler of all. His presence and power are made manifest on every page of this history. He did not create the world and place man therein, and then leave them to "run themselves." The flood taught a wicked race that God could not be mocked with impunity. Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are made to recognize the divine presence and purpose continually, and their whole experience seems as if intended for a lesson to the human race on the place of God in life and history. According to this portion of Scripture, this is God's world and he does not propose to abdicate in favor of either man or Satan. Nor will he abandon his children to their evil passions, though they try him exceedingly. By this method and that, with untiring effort, he seeks to draw them unto himself, that he may accomplish his purpose of grace in their behalf.

2. Man, made in the divine image, is a creature of higher order than those about him. With the body of an animal, he possesses the spirit of a god and displays faculties which lift him far above any merely earthly origin or destiny. Nowhere is it suggested that he is akin to the beast, either in origin or nature, but he is ever set in a category by himself. Matter must move in the orbit appointed for it, from which it can never deviate, except at the direct bidding of the power that brought it into being. The animal creation follows its instincts, meeting with neither praise nor blame, because it acts without any relation to moral motives. But man is reckoned as having free will and being subject to motives such as cannot be apprehended by the lower orders of life. He is censured or commended, as he regards or disregards these ends of his well being. There is no warrant for the doctrine of fatalism in these ancient records of human society. Man may do right or wrong, as he yields to the demands of his physical nature, or heeds the persuasions of his spiritual. Each individual man is a microcosm, a little world, in whose soul is exhibited all the strife through which the race is advancing toward holiness and consequent blessedness.

3. For man is advancing. This lesson is surely taught by the story we have been studying. No man ought to be a pessimist who thoughtfully considers the facts conveyed in these early chapters of the Bible. If, as some scientists tell us, man was evolved from the brute, then surely even these early records display a marvelous progress made by him, up to the time he emerges from his primitive obscurity to appear upon the pages of history. And such progress has continued until the present time. To those of us who are old fashioned enough to believe that God created man by direct act, without using the media of the long procession of animal forms, his advance is no less certain. For the first man, though a man, was immature. He was innocent but not virtuous. For innocence is merely the absence of sin. Virtue is the conquest of sin. The new born babe is innocent. The suffering yet triumphant saint is virtuous. Man grows in the knowledge of God, of himself, of the world about him, and of the true end of life and knowledge. The ideals of the world are rising. Practices which were tolerated among the patriarchs would now land one in the prison. Man is nobler, woman more respected, childhood more tenderly shielded, and little by little sin and misery are being banished from human society. The progress is slow, so that we can not measure it by days, or even years. Centuries are perhaps the smallest division of time by which we can reckon; but he with whom one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day, will perfect the work he has begun, and bring humanity to its high and holy estate stroyed. God is still the Father of our spirits. Wherever is found a righteous Noah amid a multitude of scoffers, there will be an open window of heaven, through which blessing and deliverance shall descend. Wherever there is an Abraham listening for the voice of God, to him will the divine call come, leading him out into the new land of faith and hope and making of him a blessing to the world, and the father of many believing children. Wherever a lonely and despairing Jacob, overwhelmed with the sense of his sins, and casting away his self-righteousness, lays his burden upon the Lord, with prayers and tears, there will be the vision and God's comforting angels to teach him that he is yet abiding in the Father's house and under his protection. And wherever such an one, who has been seeking his own welfare by means of human wisdom and man's device, comes at last to loathe the deceit and injustice of his former life, and to covet the sincerity and peace of the divine Spirit, his struggles will bring to him that full submission which calls forth the help of strength to his weakness, and makes him henceforth no more a "supplanter," but a "prince with God." Such a crowning of life's struggle waits for every one of God's wayward children.

TOPIC FOR SEPTEMBER 29.

Missions—Growth of the Kingdom.

(Ps. 72.)

The principle of growth, development, is one that has received great emphasis in our age. No other truth has been so diligently dinned into our ears. We have grasped it, devoured it, digested it, assimilated it.

But our age is not the only one that has realized how the great things of the world advance by slow steps. Jesus taught it repeatedly by such parables as that of the mustard seed. And still further back the Old Testament gives us the illustrations of the little stone cut out of the mountains without hands, and of the handful of corn in the mountains that grew till it shook like Lebanon.

We have all come to believe, therefore, that the only true progress in the world is slow, that rapid changes are to be distrusted, and that, if we wish to be sure of our advances they must be made with infinite patience.

In this matter of missions, is it not evident that slow and gradual progress is best? Those countries which have been most quickly evangelized have not been necessarily the greatest credit to Christianity. On the other hand, those that have been most slowly won, are not the least stable and sure.

The King of Berin was converted, and on the same day he converted all his subjects by threatening to chop their heads off if they did not become Christians. One can well imagine how permanent were such converts and how edifying their general conduct.

On the other hand, the first missionary in India labored seven long years without a convert; but when a convert was once made he was sure to stay. Some of the slowest peoples of the earth to change their faiths are the surest to abide, when once they have changed.

So, when it seems to us that the news spreads slowly, so slowly; and when we cry aloud, "Lord, how long!"; at that very time, it may be, the steadiest and most enduring progress is being made. "Fear not, little flock, for it is God's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."

It must have seemed a very poor and discouraging prospect to Paul, as he entered the cities of the ancient world. It must have seemed to him as if there was little hope of doing anything great and rapid in those cities. It must have appeared a dark prospect when he first came into touch with Caesar's household and the Pretorian Guard. And yet, how rapid was the growth of Christianity in the Roman world! As we look back at it, how it seems to have swept all before it!

Time seems very long to us when we are in the midst of it. It seems much shorter to us as we look back upon it, or as we look far into the future across it. So, though the progress may seem to us slow while we are in it, yet viewed in the whole, it may be very short.

There is but one thing for us to do, and that is to stir ourselves and make the progress as great as possible. God moves in a mysterious way. He is in the world and its movements. This thought ought to fill us with enthusiasm—enthusiasm, that is the real meaning of the term "God in us!"

"God with us," cried the ancients as they went into battle. "Jove with us," was their cry. "God in us, enthusiasm," is our cry today, as we go forward to our conquest of the world for Christ.

F. D. POWER: "A distinct and noteworthy contribution to our literature. It is a clear and comprehensive statement of a very important theme."

BROWN.

Wray Brown was born in Washington, Pa., and died at his home in Hannibal, Mo., Aug. 31, 1901, aged 67 years. He was one of the deacons and financial secretary of the church. He was a great sufferer but was patient and uncomplaining. The interests of the church were upon his heart and he conversed about these and his family to the end. His faithful companion preceded him five years ago. He leaves three brothers and a devoted daughter. Bro. Brown lived his religion and placed Christ above all other considerations. He was not quick in the forming of intimate friendships, but when once a kindred spirit touched his life he was unflinching in faithfulness. There are multitudes who regret the loss of his presence from the church fellowship and the activities of the city. The writer hastened home from his vacation to conduct the funeral service which was largely attended.

LEVI MARSHALL.

DOAK.

On Sept. 10, the writer was called to Gretna, Neb., to conduct the funeral service for Sister Clara M. Doak, who died at Gretna after a long illness with that dread disease consumption. May God comfort the grief-stricken husband.

W. B. CREWDSON.

Council Bluffs, Ia.

NASH.

Died at her home near Prescott, Ia., Sept. 6, Sister Bertha Nash, aged 18 years. Sister Nash was a noble Christian girl and many friends mourn her death. The funeral services were conducted by the writer in the presence of an unusually large audience. Our prayer is that God may comfort the bereaved parents and family.

W. B. CREWDSON.

NAVE.

Mrs. Martha Jane Nave (nee McCafferty) was born in Fayette county, Mo., August 30, 1830; died in St. Joseph, at her daughter's, Mrs. Murphy, August 14, 1901, aged 70 years, 11 months and 14 days. When 16 years of age she confessed Christ and was baptized by Elder Duke Young. She was married to G. W. Nave March 14, 1852. To them were born nine children, seven are now living. All were present at her funeral save one, who is in Idaho. Our sister desired to be dressed in white when placed in the coffin; that it should be white within and without; that her husband should sit beside her coffin when borne to the grave by her sons and sons-in-law, all of which was complied with. A more loving wife never knew, nor a more faithful mother. Father and mother, sons and daughters—they all loved one another. Our sister lived and died a devoted Christian. How the loved ones will miss that dear Christian wife and mother. She is now at rest after great suffering—meet her in heaven.

W. C. ROGERS.

REED.

Aaron B. Reed was born in Ohio Oct. 2, 1831, and died in Norton county, Kan., Sept. 3, 1901. He moved with his parents to Louisa county, Iowa, in 1837. He was married Jan. 1, 1864, to Miss Elizabeth Calhoun. To them were born eight children, five of whom survive him. Two children died in early infancy and Clinton Reed died at Norcat, Kan., in October, 1897. His living children are John W. Reed, of Salem, Wis.; George P. Reed, of Coopers-town, N. D.; Mrs. Florence Rowley, Mrs. Ida Dobbie, and C. E. Reed, of Norton, Kan. His wife died Sept. 23, 1872, and in June, 1881, he moved with his family to Norton county Kan., and settled on a farm one mile east of Norton, where he has since resided. He had been a patient sufferer for years, his final sickness being a complication of rheumatism and dropsy. Although his sufferings were very great he bore all with cheerfulness and an unflinching faith in Him who doeth all things well. Bro. Reed became a member of the Christian Church in early manhood; for a number of years before coming to Kansas he served as elder in the church at Union Mills, Iowa, where he will be remembered as a faithful follower of his Master. Funeral services were conducted in the Christian Church, Sept 9, by J. R. Bell pastor, assisted by J. R. Thompson.

WOOD.

Mrs. C. W. Wood, of Boles, Mo., was born in St. Charles county Mo., June 21, 1839, died Aug. 28, 1901. Her maiden name was Martha E. Murdock. She married C. W. Wood, Feb. 5, 1859. Five children were born to this union. She united with the Christian Church in 1866, under the preaching of Bro. D. M. Granfield and she proved to be one of the most consecrated members of the Pleasant Hill church to the time of her death. A husband and three children are left to mourn her departure. The funeral was conducted by the writer from the new Christian church at Villa Ridge, Mo., being the first funeral from that church, which she was the prime mover in having built.

Book Notes.

We urge our friends and patrons to remember that the business of the Christian Publishing Company is by no means confined to the books which we ourselves publish, or to the works listed in our catalogues, or to those which we advertise, from time to time, in these columns. We do a general book business, and can supply, at the regular price, any book in print, no matter where or by whom published. We solicit correspondence regarding any desired volume. If you see, anywhere, an advertisement, review or notice of any book, and decide to purchase it, send your order to The Christian Publishing Company.

Few books have received higher praise and more enthusiastic endorsement than M. M. Davis's delightful volume, Queen Esther. Indeed, so gifted and lovable a man as the author could hardly produce a book that would not charm its readers. The story of Queen Esther is one of the most dramatic and thrilling narratives in the Bible. Mr. Davis has taken this narrative, as given in the Bible, and has retold it in such a masterly way that it seems as real and as fascinating as the history of Joan of Arc. The lessons from the life of the beautiful Queen of King Xerxes are skillfully shown, and the book is one that may be read with profit, as well as interest, by old and young. It is a handsome volume of 132 pages. Price, cloth-bound, 75c.

Books without number have been written on the subject of baptism in all its phases. Some of these treatises have been wise and some otherwise. But among them all there is no superior to the work on this subject by Alexander Campbell, Christian Baptism. It is an exhaustive discussion of the ordinance—its action, its subjects and its design. We have in stock a number of copies of the original edition of this work, published by Mr. Campbell at Bethany, in 1852. It is a volume of 444 pages, bound in half-leather. Price, 50c.

Our now familiar offer of Five Books for One Dollar continues so popular that we allow it to remain open, believing that there are yet others who will wish to take advantage of this bargain. The five books included in this offer are Christian Science Dissected, Facts About China, Sabbath or Lord's Day, The Liquor Traffic and The Lord's Supper. These are large, substantial pamphlets, each a first-class treatise on the topic chosen. The price of each of these books, singly, is 25c, but we will send the set of five, postpaid, for $1.

Is it exactly fitting, or seemly, or appropriate, think you, that a china pitcher and glass goblet should be used in the observance of the Lord's Supper by a congregation that is able to provide a more suitable service? There is no virtue, of course, in silver over glass, but there is a virtue in doing all things in good taste, and certainly, where possible, a neat silver communion service is in much better taste in the celebration of the Lord's death than the cheap utensils commonly used on the dining table. We can supply a handsome communion service at a very moderate figure, and will be glad to quote prices and specifications on application. Write to us about it.

No earnest member of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions should fail to secure and read Leaves from Mission Fields, by N. M. Ragland. We quote from a review of the volume in the Christian Guide: "One will have to read many a day to find a volume of rarer beauty, of greater fascination and deeper spiritual insight. It is not a mere compilation of dates and facts, but a living story of noble lives filled with high endeavor for the weal of the world and the glory of God." The book contains 273 pages, is beautifully bound, and sells for $1.

now ready for delivery. It is one of the finest appearing books that we have ever issued. The volume contains nineteen sermons, which were stenographically reported. Their titles are: "The Witness of Jesus," "The Creation—Old and New," "The Coming One," "The Transfiguration of Man," "Foreknowledge and Predestination," "Salvation and Retribution," "The Three Worlds of Revelation," "The Law of Retribution," "Following Jesus," "Knowledge of God—Its Source and Limitation," "The New Birth—Heavenly Things," "Authority in Religion," "The Coming of the Perfect," "The Unseen Things," "The Law of Glorification," "The Creed of the Church," "The Baptismal Formula—Its Significance," "Christian Baptism—Its Meaning" and "Ground of Faith in a Future Life." In addition to these sermons the book contains a preface by J. H. Garrison, who has edited the sermons, and the Memorial Address, including biographical sketch, delivered by T. P. Haley at the Missouri Christian Convention, 1900. Altogether, the book contains 404 pages. Not only those who personally knew Alexander Procter, but many who knew of him and his ability as a thinker and orator, will gladly welcome the announcement that this volume is now ready. The publishers have set the price at $1.25—a very low figure for such a work.

Nehushtan, by J. R. Roe, is a story which deals with Romanism. Especially does it reveal and expose the disruption which Romanism often brings into the domestic circle. The author has pierced through the fair front which Rome ever endeavors to present, and found the rottenness which is within. The book is one which should be read by every patriotic American. There are many good citizens who are not even yet aware of Rome's hatred of the free school, free speech and free government, and such should speedily enlighten themselves. This is a volume of 385 pages, bound in cloth. The price has been reduced to the very low figure of 50c.

The several pamphlets by J. H. Garrison have attained a wide popularity and large circulation. They are masterpieces, which every Disciple of Christ should read and read again. These pamphlets are: Rightly Dividing the Word (five cents), Congregationalists and Disciples (fifteen cents), Union and Victory (five cents), Higher Criticism (five cents), and Our Movement (ten cents). Any of these will be sent, postpaid, on receipt of price. These pamphlets are very valuable for use in private missionary work.

The average preacher has many "experiences"—pathetic, humorous, annoying and delightful. W. T. Hacker, in his book Hot for the Pastor, has skillfully delineated the varied and interesting incidents in the work of an up-to-date pastor in a moss-back congregation. Every preacher who reads the book will find therein many of his own experiences repeated. The price of this work is now 50c.

Your order for Sunday-school supplies for the Fourth Quarter, if not already in, should be sent immediately. There can hardly be any hesitation in the mind of the live, wide-awake Sunday-school worker as to where the order should be sent. Two-thirds of the Sunday-schools among the Disciples of Christ use the supplies issued by the Christian Publishing Company, and thus testify to their unequalled merit. It is a rare occurrence for us to lose a school that we have once had on our books, and when a school does wander off and try another series of supplies, it speedily comes back again.

We handle complete supplies for the church, Sunday-school and Christian Endeavor Society. If in need of anything of this nature, write to us about it, or send for our catalogue, in which you will be certain to find what you desire.

THE President died. The government lives. Anarchism is doomed. God reigns and lawlessness must be put down. Republics, broad-based on the people's will, cannot be shot down. "God buries his workmen, but carries on his work." He brings to naught the plots of wicked men. The treacherous hand that was uplifted against the President will prove the death-blow to anarchy in this nation. It was aimed at government; it reacts upon the lawless. It was intended for evil; God is bringing good out of the dastardly crime. National and international unity has been emphasized. Sectional lines have been obliterated. Patriotism and religion have been exalted. Higher ideals of government and of statesmanship have been lifted up. Our national stability has been demonstrated. Our national faults have been made more apparent. Vice has been made to appear more despicable, and virtue more honorable, by the quickening of the national conscience in this hour of public bereavement and universal sorrow.

Current Events.

The Funeral of the President. The last act of the tragedy which the country has been witnessing and in which it has been participating during the past two weeks was enacted on Thursday of last week when the body of President McKinley was laid away in the cemetery of Canton, O. The ceremonies in Washington on Tuesday were stately and impressive and it was in the rotunda of the Capitol that the exercises appropriate to the high office of the dead were carried out. The service at Canton, like the preliminary service at Buffalo, was rather a tribute of friends to a departed friend. The funeral of the President was at Washington. The funeral of the man and the neighbor was at Canton. Representatives from most of the states in the Union were present at Canton and the day was observed throughout the nation and in many places with a degree of unanimity which has seldom if ever been equaled on such an occasion.

The Memorial Services. By the proclamation of President Roosevelt the people of the United States were requested to refrain from their usual employment on Thursday of last week and repair to their accustomed places of worship to honor the memory of the dead President. Not only was this suggestion very generally heeded by the churches, but in most of the cities immense mass meetings were held. In St. Louis an assembly of not far from 15,000 people gathered in the Coliseum Thursday afternoon. President McKinley's favorite hymns were sung and addresses were made by representative citizens, including a Protestant minister, a Roman Catholic priest and a Jewish Rabbi. It was notable that in all of the addresses, and in those of congressmen and business men not less than those of clergymen, the point most emphasized was the integrity of character, the lofty rectitude and the Christian spirit of President McKinley. These things were more noted even by politicians than the tributes which might well have been paid to his political acumen and constructive statesmanship.

The New President in the White House. The first few days of President Roosevelt's administration have been consumed by the melancholy tasks growing out of the circumstances under which he took office. Those duties being now performed, he has taken up his residence in the White House and the new administration may be considered fairly launched. Yet it will be scarcely a new administration for with rare judgment the President has decided to make no change in either policies or methods and as few changes as possible in the personnel of the administration. The members of the cabinet have all been requested to retain their offices permanently and have consented to do so. Changes may occur before the end of the term, but they will be only such as might have occurred if Mr. McKinley had lived. Mr. Cortelyou, whose efficient service has raised the office of Secretary to the President to a higher dignity than it had before occupied, is to be retained in that position. The executive appointments which the President has so far made are for the most part those which his predecessor had under consideration or had decided upon. In all respects the President's chief endeavor apparently has been to promote the feeling of continuity between his administration and that which was so abruptly ended. The wisdom of this course is obvious and its result has been to remove any feeling of alarm or instability which might have accompanied the sympathy and grief of the nation at the death of its executive head. Mr. Roosevelt's life in Washington will undoubtedly be as free and democratic as that of any of his predecessors. He goes about as he pleases, walks, rides, drives and goes to church, alone or with a companion, as unceremoniously as the most ordinary citizen and resents the efforts of the police department to maintain even the most meager and inconspicuous bodyguard. President McKinley's assassin has been indicted for murder in the first degree, the jury has been chosen and the trial begun. The prisoner pleaded guilty, but the court set aside this plea and his counsel entered a plea of not guilty. The defense will be solely on the ground of insanity, but the experts who have examined the prisoner all pronounce him sane.

Anarchy and Treason. The following statement in Leslie's Weekly by Hon. John W. Griggs, formerly Attorney-General in President McKinley's cabinet, is substantially in accord with what the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has already said editorially on the same subject. The high and semi-official source from which it comes makes this utterance especially notable. The unanimity of such expressions from men high in public life, gives reason to hope that Congress at its next session will pass some sort of alien and sedition law in harmony with the constitution. Mr. Griggs says:

Every man has a right under our constitution to his own opinions. He has a right to express his opinions. He may lawfully seek to impress his beliefs upon others. He may teach that our form of government is wrong; that socialism, or anarchy, or monarchy would be preferable. But no man has a right to teach or advise the overthrow or alteration of the forms of constituted government except by the regular and lawful method provided for its alteration. Whoever does so is guilty of an offense against constituted society that is akin to treason. Let Congress, therefore, declare that to teach or advise the overthrow or destruction of the Federal government by murder, assassination, or any other violent or unlawful means, shall constitute a punishable offense against the United States. Let the states do the same with respect to state governments. Let it be made an offense punishable by imprisonment for life to belong to or knowingly participate in the proceedings of any organization, society, group or circle, which holds as one of its tenets that it is justifiable to assassinate public officers. Let the publications of all such societies wherein such doctrines are taught be denied carriage through the mails, and be made lawful objects of police suppression, and the publishers subjected to indictment. Most, if not all, of this detestable element have come here from abroad. Few of them are citizens. In these facts we find suggestions of further means of protection. Congress should amend the emigration laws so as to provide for the examination or certification of every immigrant as to his belief in anarchistic doctrine and his connection with societies of anarchists. All falling within the dangerous class should be denied admission to this country. We might go further and deport all aliens already within our confines who should be found to belong to the class of dangerous anarchists. Congress would have undoubted power to pass such a statute. It should be made an offense punishable with death to attempt the life or to conspire to attempt the life of a president or vice-president, or of any cabinet officer, or of the governor of any state. For the actual murder of such officials the penalty, of course, is death in all states where capital punishment has not been abolished.

The Terms of Settlement. As has already been announced, the steel strike has been settled on terms which are virtually a defeat for the strikers. President Shaffer of the Amalgamated Association has issued an official statement to be forwarded to the lodges of the Association, surveying the course of the strike and announcing the terms of settlement. After reaffirming the existing agreement as to hours and wages—a matter which was not in dispute at this time—the following stipulations are made: "That the company reserves the right to discharge any employe who shall, by interference, abuse or constraint, prevent another from peaceably following his vocation without reference to connection with labor organization. That non-union mills shall be represented as such—no attempts made to organize, no charters granted; old charters retained by men if they desire. That the company shall not hold prejudice against employes by reason of their membership with the Amalgamated Association." This agreement is to remain in force for three years beginning July 1, 1901, but may be abrogated by either party after October 1, 1902, by giving three months notice. A notable feature of Mr. Shaffer's manifesto is his severe criticism of those labor organizations, and especially the Federation of Labor, which promised sympathy and support but rendered no substantial assistance to the strikers. If they had received the promised help from other organizations, he says, the Association would have won a complete victory, and he offers to resign if his management of the strike is deemed unsatisfactory. We are not prepared to give an opinion as to Mr. Shaffer's motives or principles in this strike, but his explanation of its failure is not at all convincing. No amount of help could have made it a success, and it failed chiefly because it deserved to fail.

The Czar in France. The topic of greatest interest in Europe during the past few weeks has been the Czar's visit to France. A call was made upon the Kaiser as the imperial yacht and flotilla passed along the North German coast, but the main visit was to President Loubet. The imperial party was received by President Loubet at Dunkirk and was taken by rail to Compiegne, where the handsome old chateau had been prepared for the Czar and his suite. The visit lasted only four days, but it is believed that its purpose was accomplished. There has, of course, been no official announcement of this purpose, but there is evidence of two or three ideas which the Czar had in mind in planning the trip. One was to negotiate a loan. The Franco-Russian alliance still holds, but it was believed that it would stand the strain of a loan much more easily if reinforced by a visit from the Czar. A loan raised in France is subscribed very largely by the common people, who are moved more by flattery than by argument. The visit of the Czar pleases them and inclines them to lend him money. A loftier purpose than this is probably to be found in the desire still further to cement the alliance, with a view to preventing European war. As indicated by his initiation of the Hague conference, the Czar is interested in the maintenance of peace. He is a man of naturally peaceable and humane disposition; he could at present ill-afford the expense of a serious war; and he has on hand the still unfinished business of constructing the trans-Siberian railway, which would be a source of weakness at present in case of war, but would be a source of strength if it were completed. It is therefore greatly to his advantage to maintain peace during the next few years until this line can be finished. After his meeting with the Czar, the Kaiser announced that the peace of Europe for many years was assured, and it is reported that a ten years' peace has been agreed upon, during which time the sovereigns of Russia and Germany pledge themselves not to engage voluntarily in war. Although the occasion of the visit to France was the autumn maneuvers of the French army, it is hoped and believed that the outcome will be a firmer establishment of European peace.

A Case of Bad Health. Mr. Cronin, saloon-keeper and Speaker of the St. Louis House of Delegates, has fallen out with his political friends. He has done nothing since his election that was not entirely in harmony with his previous record, and it might be said very plausibly that the decent men of his party ought not to have countenanced him in the campaign if they were not willing to stand by him in office. It would take a professional politician to explain why this should not have been expected, or to bring any charges against Speaker Cronin that were not perfectly well known to his respectable friends at the time when they were most cordially co-operating with him. But then Mr. Cronin is a handy man to have on your side in an election. He has influence of one kind and another. It is common political doctrine to use a disreputable citizen as long as his influence is needed and turn him down when the drag of his reputation becomes greater than the lift of his influence. So it is in this case, and it is believed on what should be good authority that the days of Mr. Cronin's speakership are numbered. He himself professes to be unaware of this situation and declines to admit any knowledge of trouble brewing, but he asserts that his health is very bad and that it may at any time necessitate his retirement from politics. So it is. Mr. Cronin's political health is decidedly precarious. He is the Sick Man of St. Louis. Soon he will be called upon to feel the serpent's tooth of ingratitude from those whom his influence helped to put in power. The present city administration has given evidence of an honest desire to do some much-needed political house-cleaning, and the elimination of Mr. Cronin will be an appropriate part of this process.

Game Preservation. It is natural to think of laws for the preservation of game as intended solely for the benefit of sportsmen, but the case is far different. Game laws, like forestry laws, aim to control conditions which are of importance to the whole country. In the first place, they prevent species which are good for food from being exterminated by the greed of market-hunters; and in the second place, they preserve the equilibrium of nature by protecting beasts and birds which are natural enemies of noxious insects. A bird which preys upon cut-worms and grasshoppers is the farmer's friend, because he is the enemy of the farmer's enemies. During the last few years the game laws in most states have been made much more strict and comprehensive, but the fact has been developed that there is need of uniform legislation which can be secured only by interstate co-operation. Many states have attempted to make their own game laws more effective by prohibiting the shipping of game out of the state; for example, Nebraska prohibits the shipping of quails. Such laws are effective within limits, but they are hard to enforce and the worst evaders of the law are the birds themselves. For our summer birds have a way of shipping themselves out of the state in the fall—that is, they migrate. And when they migrate to states in which they are not protected, the law of the state which they have left does them little good. The robin is protected in the New England states, but is considered a game bird in the south where it spends the winter. The protection promised to a robin in Massachusetts next spring is of little use if he is killed in South Carolina this winter. So it may easily happen that the robins in Massachusetts may be exterminated in spite of the most rigid law for their protection in that state. In 1900 Congress passed the Lacey law prohibiting interstate commerce in birds killed in violation of the local law and putting game protection under the Department of Agriculture. Farther than this Congress cannot go, for the Supreme Court has declared that the right of regulating the killing of game is reserved to the several states. But co-operation among the states is necessary; and not only between neighboring states, but more especially between the northern and southern states to and from which the migratory birds pass.

The St. Louis Exposition. Not only is St. Louis going to have an exposition in 1903, but she has one for six weeks every fall, as most dwellers in this part of the country know. Although its scale is not that of an international exposition, yet it has won the distinction of being the only city exposition in this country which was ever successfully maintained for so long a period as eighteen years. Good music, a good fine arts exhibit and interesting displays of a general sort have been the secret of its success, together with the fact that St. Louis somehow has the knack of doing this sort of thing in the right way. Perhaps the most interesting feature of this year's exposition is a large series of exhibits from the Philadelphia Commercial Museum. Articles of commerce from all lands, including food stuffs, wearing apparel and manufactured articles in vast variety, are here classified and exhibited, not to be looked at as curiosities, but to be studied by those interested in the development of commerce. A foreign commerce which confines itself to seeking markets for our products has not passed beyond the primitive stage. The next step is to learn what foreign consumers want and to make our products fit their wants. To supply the actual present wants of distant peoples is a long step toward creating in them other wants which are to be filled by our own more civilized products. If the Chinaman wants chopsticks, let us sell him chopsticks and not insist on selling him triple-plated knives and forks or nothing. The exposition management is to be congratulated on securing this exhibit and it would be a good stroke if a similar museum were established permanently in this city.

Brevities. A Connecticut woman claims to have discovered a method of making artificial milk. The report is probably circulated by the Concatenated Order of Milkmen, otherwise known as the Knights of the Pump, to encourage the erroneous belief that the milk which we now get is not artificial.

The fact is recalled that after the war of 1812 a naval court of inquiry was held to settle a dispute between Commodore Perry and Captain Elliott and to locate the credit for the great victory on Lake Erie. The inquiry dragged on endlessly and was settled only by the death of all parties concerned. The precedent is a bad one for the Schley inquiry.

English military critics have been finding all manner of fault with the tactics exhibited in the recent maneuvers of the French and German armies. The British ought to know. They have had experience enough lately. But it is particularly significant that the harshest criticisms have come from the men who were boldest in criticising British tactics in South Africa. Evidently military science is getting into a bad way. Perhaps the European armies need to be Funstonized.

Lessons Drawn From the Nation's Calamity.

In reading the funeral orations and sermons delivered in honor of our lamented President, one can hardly resist the conviction that out of this national loss and sorrow there must come a great impetus to Christianity. All the addresses read like sermons, and some of the most valuable lessons drawn are not from the preachers but from political leaders of national and world-wide reputation. We give a few of these that are especially valuable.

W. J. Bryan, late presidential candidate, concluded a eulogy on his late political antagonist with the following statement:

"Unfortunately, in the heat of political controversy, partisanship sometimes becomes so strong as to cause injustice to be done the motives of political opponents, and it should be our constant aim to place our campaigns upon so high a plane that personalities will be entirely eliminated and the issues made to turn upon the principles involved. Let us hope that this national affliction, which unites all factions in a common sorrow, will result in a broader charity and more liberal spirit among those who, by different policies and through different parties, seek to promote the welfare and increase the glory of our common country."

These are true and timely words and we trust they may receive the consideration which their importance demands. Of like import is this statement from a speech by Senator Hoar:

"We shall also, I hope, learn to moderate the bitterness of political strife and to avoid the savage attack on the motive and character of men who are charged by the people with public responsibilities in high places. This fault, while I think it is already disappearing from ordinary political and sectional controversy, seems to linger still among our scholars and men of letters.

"The moral is, not that we should abate our zeal for justice and righteousness, or our condemnation of wrong, but only that we should abate the severity of our judgment of the motives of men from whom we differ."

Ex-President Cleveland, addressing the students of Princeton, gave utterance to these wise and weighty words:

"First in my thoughts are the lessons to be learned from the career of William McKinley by the young men who make up the student body of our university. These lessons are not obscure or difficult. They teach the value of study and mental training, but they teach more impressively that the road to usefulness and to the only success worth having will be missed or lost except it is sought and kept by the light of those qualities of the heart which it is sometimes supposed may safely be neglected or subordinated in university surroundings. This is a great mistake. Study and study hard, but never let the thought enter your mind that study alone or the greatest possible accumulation of learning alone will lead you to the heights of usefulness and success. The man who is universally mourned to day achieved the highest distinction which his great country can confer on any man, and he lived a useful life. He was not deficient in education, but with all you will hear of his grand career and his services to his country and to his fellow citizens, you will not hear that the high place he reached or what he accomplished was due entirely to his education. You will instead constantly hear as accounting for his great success that he was obedient and affectionate as a son, patriotic and faithful as a soldier, honest and upright as a citizen, tender and devoted as a husband, and truthful, generous, unselfish, moral and clean in every relation of life. He never thought any of those things too weak for his manliness. Make no mistake. Here was a most distinguished man, a great man, a useful man—who became distinguished, great and useful because he had, and retained unimpaired, qualities of heart which I fear university students sometimes feel like keeping in the background or abandoning."

The foregoing, with thousands of similar utterances, can hardly fail to make a deep impression on the public mind, and this impression ought to be followed up by earnest and thorough evangelistic preaching during the autumn and winter. It seems to us we have a right to expect that a vigorous campaign on the part of all the churches would result in a remarkable triumph for Christianity.

Missouri Christian Convention.

The sixty-fourth Annual Convention of the Disciples of Christ in Missouri was held last week at Mexico, Mo. We are not able to report the number of delegates present, but judging from appearances there was a good representation, for it was a large convention, and overflow meetings at the Baptist church on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings were found to be necessary to accommodate the people who desired to hear. The evening sessions of the convention were held in the Presbyterian church, which is much larger and more commodious than the Christian church, which was used for the day sessions. We shall not undertake to report in detail the proceedings of the convention, as the minutes of the meeting when published will convey all this information. A few of the more salient features is all that can be mentioned here.

The Christian Woman's Board of Missions held a session on Monday afternoon, thus introducing the convention. Their convention, we learn, was entirely satisfactory and was characterized by the usual harmony and facility in the dispatch of business. The presence of Mrs. A. M. Harrison, of Kentucky, President of the C. W. B. M. of that state, gave added interest to the convention. Her address on Tuesday evening on "Woman's Debt to Missions" was admirable in matter and manner and could not have failed to make a deep impression on all who heard it. The official reports of Mrs. L. G. Bantz, Secretary; Miss Mattie Burgess, Treasurer, and Miss Mollie Hughes, on the Young People's Department, were able and satisfactory, showing the results of work done and indicating encouraging progress. Some of the addresses which we heard were not inferior in literary merit to the best productions presented in the other parts of the convention. Among these was one by Mrs. H. E. Monser and another by Mrs. Fannie Graves. Other addresses of great practical value were presented by such efficient workers as Mrs. Hattie Gillette, Mrs. W. D. Harrison and Mrs. Lewis Wheeler.

The convention sermon of the convention was preached on Monday evening in the Presbyterian Church by J. B. Briney, of Moberly. It was an old-time sermon, such as used to characterize our conventions in earlier days more than in modern times, dealing with doctrinal questions rather than with practical missionary problems. Many felt that the theme selected was inappropriate under all the circumstances. It was ably treated, however, as Brother Briney retains his mental vigor and power of utterance unabated. A hearty greeting was extended to the convention by Brother A. W. Kokendoffer at the Christian Church on Tuesday morning. Brother K. proved himself an admirable host of a convention. J. P. Pinkerton, of Jefferson City, was the President of the convention this year, and his address on Tuesday morning added to his reputation as a forcible and eloquent speaker. Besides the official reports on Tuesday morning there was a brief but able sermon from C. S. Brooks, of New London. He was followed by a tender and characteristic sermon by H. A. Northcutt, of Kirksville.

The forenoon of Wednesday was largely occupied with the reports of committees and with "Talks by the Field Men"—E. J. Lampton, Joseph Gaylor, Horace Siberell. The reports of these men from the front were full of interest. The "Needs of the Southwest" were ably presented by D. W. Moore, of Springfield, who, in closing, made an appeal for the next convention to go to that city—an appeal which subsequently was endorsed by the convention. An address on Church Extension was to have been made by George Darsie, of Frankfort, Ky., but in his unavoidable absence the secretary of that fund, G. W. Muckley, coming from a long tour in the West and Northwest, made a breezy, patriotic and earnest address on the subject.

The conference on "Real Problems in State Missions," presided over by J. H. Hardin (in the absence of W. F. Richardson, who was called away by telegram to the bedside of his dying brother in Quincy), consisted of able papers on "The Problem of Foreign Populations," by W. F. Hamann, of Windsor; "The Problem of the Country and Village Church," by F. A. Mayhall, of Louisiana; "The Problem of the Home," by S. J. White, of Cameron, and the "Negro Problem, his Past, Present and Future," by H. A. Denton, of Warrensburg. These young men all acquitted themselves with great credit in the thoughtful papers which they presented. G. W. Snively, now of St. Louis, secretary of the Benevolent Association of the Christian Church, made an earnest plea for benevolence as a feature of the primitive church which needed to be restored.

As the Tuesday evening audience had to be divided to accommodate the people, Mrs. A. M. Harrison, of Lexington, Ky., addressing the convention audience in the Presbyterian Church, and J. H. Hardin, of Liberty, addressing the overflow meeting in the Baptist Church, across the street, so on Wednesday evening there were two addresses in the Presbyterian Church, one by C. H. Winders, of Columbia, on "The Power of Faith," and the other by A. McLean, president of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, on "Foreign Missions," while the overflow meeting at the Baptist Church was addressed by W. J. Lhamon, of Allegheny City, Pa.

Thursday forenoon was occupied with the reports of committees and an address by W. J. Lhamon, who took the place of B. L. Smith, on the subject of "American Missions." Brother Lhamon had been invited to the convention to confer with the Board of Trustees of the Missouri Bible College, with a view of taking the Bible chair work at Columbia, but during his presence in the convention made two addresses which greatly delighted our Missouri brethren. The features of the forenoon session, which was the last day of the convention, were a memorial service in honor of the death of President McKinley and a session of the Y. P. S. C. E., under the management of the state superintendent, C. E. Hill. The writer was compelled to leave after making the opening address in the memorial service for President McKinley and cannot speak of the exercises which followed. The closing and consecration sermon was to be preached by S. B. Moore, of Moberly.

A Breeze.

In a general way it may be said that the reports of the convention indicated progress, if not rapid yet substantial, along most of the lines of work. There was an increase in the amount of money raised directly for state missions and indirectly through other agencies for the cause in the state. The progress in this direction is not what many of us believe it ought to be and might be. With a view to enlarging the results of our state work the committee on the state of the cause brought in a recommendation authorizing the board at its discretion to increase its agencies by the addition of another man and by a division of the work, so as to enable one man to devote himself exclusively to raising finances. This recommendation was made in view of the fact that a majority of the churches in the state are still non-contributing and non-co-operative in our state work. This report excited about the only spirited discussion which occurred during the sessions of the convention. We were not wholly able to understand the motive of the opposition to it, but the Globe-Democrat of the next day contained a dispatch from Mexico which may throw some light on the question. These reporters have a way of getting at the inwardness of things, and this one perhaps received his information from one who knew whereof he affirmed. The dispatch says:

"Quite a spirited discussion was precipitated when J. H. Garrison, of St. Louis, of the committee on 'state of the cause,' introduced a resolution authorizing the state board to employ an additional helper to the corresponding secretary. Many of the friends of the present secretary thought it a scheme to sidetrack him and take some of his work and give it into the hands of some favorite of the promoters of the resolution. The whole matter was finally left with the state board, which directs the entire work of state missions."

This reminds us that a somewhat similar recommendation a year ago provoked a similar discussion, and was postponed until the present year. Some one, after the convention had adjourned, told us that it was circulated among those who opposed the recommendation that the aim of its advocates was to make T. P. Haley bishop of Missouri! This would be amusing, if it did not indicate an abnormal feeling among some of the brethren of the state. Who the "favorite" is whom the committee on the state of the cause, this year, consisting, besides the chairman mentioned above, of T. P. Haley, R. Linn Cave, D. W. Moore and J. A. McKenzie, had in view, is not stated, and we have no means of knowing, but we suggest that hereafter important committees should be composed of men who are not place-seekers either for themselves or for their "favorites," and whose reputation would protect them from such humiliating suspicion. It is due to the convention and to the committee both to say that the report was finally adopted with practical unanimity when its purport came to be understood.

Aside from the little breeze created by this report, everything was harmonious throughout, and even the discussion referred to was not unparliamentary in character.

Convention Items.

The entertainment given to the delegates by the church and citizens of Mexico was both hospitable and bountiful. Mexico is said to have been the center of the worst drought-stricken region in Missouri this year, but there was no indication of it in the abundance and variety of food served by the ladies of the church at the Central Hotel. This building is not at present run as a hotel, but is occupied by Brother and Sister Hord, who took possession of it recently in order to make it useful to the convention. Besides entertaining several of the delegates, they gave the use of this hotel, which became the social center of the convention and the place where the ladies served their meals noon and evening.

One of the blessings which the convention brought to the city of Mexico and vicinity was a good rain which, at least, came with the arrival of the delegates and greatly refreshed the thirsty ground. Whether it was this fact or the inherent spirit of Missouri hospitality, the citizens of Mexico generally, without regard to church affiliation, seemed to welcome us. The only exception to this was the clerk of the Ringo Hotel, who declined for a time to furnish rooms to some of the delegates after they had registered, but who afterward, when his temper had subsided, decided to furnish them quarters. That old-time hostelry, of good repute, should see to it that the young man who presides at the desk should preserve an equable temper, even under the provocation of receiving delegates to a missionary convention.

The music of the convention was under the management of W. E. M. Hackleman, and there was a large and well-drilled chorus to lead. Brother Hackleman is an excellent leader, and he had a well-drilled chorus of singers, and the music, of the kind, would be pronounced excellent, but we found ourselves sighing often for some of the good old songs, the stately hymns which have borne the religious aspirations and emotions of Christians heavenward for generations. It has come to pass in these last days that one may attend a missionary gathering of his own people and hear but seldom, if ever, a familiar hymn. We do not object to the exhortation of the psalmist to "Sing a new song unto the Lord," but we protest against the exclusion, to such a degree as has now come, of the old familiar hymns. Shall we not have many of these old songs at Minneapolis? Then "all the people" can praise the Lord in song, and feel their hearts glowing within them as the majestic tones of these old hymns are borne upward by thousands of voices. If we cannot use the hymnals of the church in our conventions, let us at least have selections from them of those tried old hymns whose familiar notes bring with them a wealth of tender memories and associations.

J. B. Jones, president of William Woods college, Fulton, and Dr. D. R. Dungan, president of Christian University, Canton, conducted Bible studies respectively, on Tuesday and Wednesday mornings. Each of them made an encouraging report also during the convention of the institution over which he presides. These took the place of the report of the committee on education which at one time was made to the convention. We suggest that this committee should be revived and its work revived also. There ought to be a committee to study the problem of education in Missouri and present the actual condition and needs of our schools in the state, and if possible some plans for their enlargement. This ought not to be left to the men who are in charge of these institutions, but should receive the consideration of men outside the colleges who are interested in the work of education in the state. Either this, or there should cease to be any recognition of any relation existing between the convention and our colleges in the state.

On the subject of education it may be mentioned that a committee was appointed to take under advisement the acceptance on certain conditions of school property at Steelville in Crawford county, Missouri. During the ladies' convention Brother G. A. Hoffmann had urged this matter upon their attention as an enterprise worthy of their consideration. This looks to the carrying on of an academy to meet the local wants in that part of the state, and to serve as a feeder for the colleges of the state. Having once visited this school to deliver the baccalaureate address, we regard the location as a very desirable one and the enterprise of conducting a successful academy there as entirely practicable, especially if the C. W. B. M. should undertake it.

While our State Co-operation is not doing all we could wish, or all it is capable of doing when our forces are properly harnessed, the following figures indicate no mean results:

Total money raised in connection with State work.....	$ 46,713 45
Total money raised for all church work, including education, benevolence and ministerial support.....	756,229 00
Churches organized.....	60
Bible-schools organized.....	110
Baptisms and other additions. ..	2,679

It was fortunate for several of the delegates that some of the citizens of Mexico had two or more overcoats which they loaned to their brethren who had ventured to go to the convention without one.

The great strike has been settled. But has its lesson been well learned by those who precipitated it? This is vastly important. Trades unions are right enough, and the American people will protect laboring men in their right to form such organizations. They will not, however, countenance any effort on their part to force men into labor unions, or to force corporations to employ union men alone. That is to destroy the individual freedom of the workingman on the one hand, and on the other, to deny to men who are managing business concerns the right to choose whom they shall employ. This is not American.

Editor's Easy Chair.

These cool, bright, bracing autumn days with their early nipping frosts stiffen the sinews, oxygenize the blood and put one in the spirit of work unless he be hopelessly indisposed to mental or physical exertion. The long summer days with their distant blue skies flecked with white, floating clouds and inviting to rest and recreation, have gone glimmering into that misty past where all the beautiful summers are sleeping. I can never feel the chill of autumn in the air without associating it with the opening schools. Back yonder along the shining track of many scarlet autumns there rises before me the vision of an old log schoolhouse that stood in the grove, whither troops of boys and girls with cheeks like the flaming sumach wended their way with books and bats and balls on the opening day. How we stood in awe of the new schoolmaster until we found what manner of man he was! What a prize were the new schoolbooks with their clean, bright pages and beautiful pictures! Lessons over, how the grove rang with the shouts of merry boys and girls during recess and the noon hour, as we organized our games on the old play-ground! And so, during the week or two past, the youth of the land, in country, hamlet, village, town and city, have been flocking to the schoolhouses with the same hopes and fears, with the same merry hearts and open minds, and with the same exuberant buoyancy of spirit that marked the boys and girls of the long ago. Blessings on the little men and women gathering in the schoolrooms of the nation, and blessings on their teachers who, in patience and in love of humanity, are to plant the seeds of truth and the love of learning in these young minds and hearts!

Another autumnal scene that associates itself with this season of the year relates to farm life. Autumn is the season of fruition for the farmer. One raised on the farm can easily recall, though he may long have been a dweller in the city, the familiar scenes grouped together in a living picture in the fall of the year. There was the cutting and shocking of the corn, which had a certain fascination about it though it was hard work. The custom was more general when I was a farmer boy than at the present time. This was followed by sowing the fall wheat. Then there was the gathering of the apples into piles under the trees in the orchard to be carried, later, into the cellar for winter use. Then there were the great yellow pumpkins lying scattered over the field, by the withering, frost-bitten vines, to be gathered in, some for feeding to the stock and some for pumpkin pies. Occasionally a stray watermelon might be found under the grass which had escaped notice until the coming of the frost, and how cool and delicious it was! It was like finding a luscious peach on the topmost bough of the tree when it was supposed that it had long ago yielded up all its treasures. There is a pleasure always in gathering in the fruits of the season, which is peculiar to life on the farm. Later on it will be time enough to gather in the falling nuts and the ripening persimmons. Who does not recall with pleasure the nutting expeditions of his boyhood? What other life has in it, with all its toil and drudgery, the amount of real pleasure, and affords such a storehouse of pleasant memories, as the life of the farmer boy? I trust the boys and girls who read this in their rural homes will make the most of their country life, for the time will come when they will look back upon these scenes and associations as the happiest experiences of their lives.

The description and pictures of Minneapolis which we print this week we are sure will whet the appetite of our readers, as they have ours, for a visit there in connection with the national convention. It is a great city, beautiful and varied in its architecture and abounding in evidences of enterprise and public spirit. A twentieth century convention held in such a city ought to be first-class in every respect. It takes a great many things to make a great convention. Every man on the program should seek to give his best thought in the best form. Everybody else should be appreciative. A good convention depends quite as much upon the audience as upon the speakers. There should be a special effort to preserve good order and avoid confusion of every kind in the hall where the proceedings are going on. Greetings and social conferences should be relegated to private rooms or to any place except the hall in which business is being transacted. Every one who attends the convention contributes something towards its success or detracts something from it. It all depends upon the spirit in which he goes as to whether he will lean or lift. By his prompt attendance at the various sessions, by his earnest prayers for the success of the convention, by his hearty appreciation of all that is good and worthy, and by keeping sweet and good-natured, he will scatter sunshine and help to create the right sort of atmosphere for a great convention. The opposite course will have an opposite influence. A well-digested committee report is a great time-saver. Attend the convention first and see the city afterwards or between sessions. In all these ways we may contribute toward the success of our first twentieth century national convention. Of course it is understood that one of the ways to contribute to the success of the convention is to go to it, and it is time that your plans were matured for so doing. Time and money spent for this purpose will be a wise expenditure because it will result in enriching the soul.

Let it be borne in mind that eight years hence there will be a notable anniversary in our religious history. On Sept. 9, 1909, we will have completed a century of history as a religious body. The Declaration and Address was issued Sept. 7, 1809, and from that event Dr. Richardson, the historian of the movement, and Mr. Campbell himself, dated the real beginning of the Reformation which we are still urging upon the people. It is not too early to begin to lay out certain tasks for ourselves to be completed by the time of our centenary celebration. Great things cannot be accomplished without time and plans and organization. What shall we do for education, for missions, for benevolence, for church extension, by the time of our centennial celebration? These are problems for our National Education Society, missionary societies, our benevolent association, and our church extension board to consider. By setting a high mark and planning to reach it by easy gradations during the eight years intervening, we shall accomplish much more than if we had no definite aim and should put forth no special efforts. So important an event as the completion of a century of history of a movement looking to the restoration of New Testament Christianity and to the union of God's people, certainly ought not to be allowed to pass without a united and strenuous effort to signalize it by the highest possible achievement along all the lines of our co-operative work. Perhaps the Minneapolis Convention will appoint a large committee to consider this matter carefully and bring in recommendations for the convention of 1902.

Notes and Comments.

The Herald of Gospel Liberty prints this question from one of its correspondents: "Does the Christian Church fellowship all Christians?" The editor replies: "The Christians fellowship all Christians theoretically and practically." We should have answered the question a little differently. Some Christians fellowship all Christians, whom they believe to be such, and all Christians fellowship some Christians. To another question by the same querist, "Can Trinitarians, Unitarians and Universalists feel at home in the Christian Church?" the editor answers, "All can feel at home in the Christian Church, and usually do." Again, we should have said, that depends on what Christian Church they happen to be in. If they happened to be in a Christian Church whose only creed is the divinity and Messiahship of Jesus, and which emphasized the necessity of acknowledging His Lordship by obedience to all His commands in order to salvation, we imagine some of the classes mentioned would not long "feel at home."

Probably some ministers in this country have imagined that if we had a union of Church and State here as they have in England they would be better paid, provided they happened to belong to the Established Church. But according to the London correspondent of the New York Evening Post many of the clergy in that country are in a state of financial distress. This is due, according to this correspondent, to the abominable system of "livings" which prevails in the Established Church. If this authority be correct there are, in that Church, 14,000 benefices, 7,000 of which are worth less than $650 a year; 1,500 more of them less than $500 a year, while about 300 others furnish an income under $250 a year. There are 61 livings in the diocese of Peterborough furnishing an average annual income of $225, while the occupants of several in the diocese of Newcastle receive about $125 a year. This must be regarded as exceedingly low wages, considering the educational and other qualifications required of the clergy. A State Church, therefore, is not a remedy for low salaries for preachers.

"We are fighting the whiskey trust," says a whiskey advertisement in a recent paper. Why, so are we. It is not often that we can shake hands with a distiller on so fundamental a proposition. But then, we are also fighting the independent distillery.

Minneapolis: Its Growth and Future

By SAIDEE M. FURROW.

Guaranty Loan Building.

Located at the head of navigation on the Mississippi River stands Minneapolis, a city of a wonderful history, a prosperous present and a glorious future. Possessing every advantage of situation, climate and natural resources, grown so large and strong and so beautiful in youth, this maiden city of the Northwest gives great promise of continued progress, prosperity and prominence.

A half century ago this city was not, and to-day it ranks sixteenth among the cities of the Union, numbering its citizens at approximately two hundred and twenty-five thousand and leading the world in many of its resources and industries. The story of the past growth, present greatness and probable future incomparability of Minneapolis almost surpasses powers of credence, and the imagination is taxed to grasp the truth.

Thirty years ago William H. Seward, standing near the Falls of St. Anthony, then a turbulent, useless flood, separating the two parts of a straggling hamlet of wooden buildings, said: "Here is the central place, where the agriculture of the richest region of North America must begin its magnificent supplies to the whole world. On the east, all along the shore of Lake Superior, and on the west, stretching in one broad plain in a belt across the continent, is a country where state after state is yet to arise, and where the productions for the support of the human society in other crowded states must forever go forth."

This saying has proven itself in the few years since its utterance. Minneapolis is founded on a need of humanity, and therefore must continue to stand and grow as long as time and men shall be on the earth. It is the center of the bread-producing area of the world. Men must have bread and Minneapolis can furnish it to them better, cheaper and more of it than any other city. These facts account in part for the commercial importance to which this city has arisen in the past fifty years. That she should occupy such a position is not so much a marvel, when the causes are understood, but that a city should in so short a time come to be a factor in the world's business seems to approach the miraculous.

The future is mirrored in the past and present, and to lead to the conclusion that Minneapolis is destined to become the manufacturing, commercial and industrial center of the great Northwest, and the greater Northwest that is to be, it requires but a review of what has been already accomplished by the very force of her natural advantages, as yet but meagerly developed, and by the untiring enterprise of her citizens.

The whole story cannot be told, but some idea of the city's progress may be gained by noting such facts and figures as follow. Minneapolis now numbers eighteen railways and nine hundred manufacturing establishments, with manufactured products in 1900 valued at $154,000,000. It is the greatest wheat market in the world, has the largest single flour mill, and grinds more flour than any other place in the world. It has for many years stood at the head as a lumber-producing city, and in 1900 manufactured 594,370,000 feet. Its jobbing trade in 1900 amounted to $245,000,000, and its bank clearings during the same year counted up $579,994,076, its post office receipts reaching $698,067. Building permits in 1900 numbered three thousand and four, and footed up $4,235,924; while the permits for the first half of 1901 amount to $3,487,322, as against $2,155,139 during the corresponding time last year. The city has 150 miles of electric railway, so distributed as to make all of the area of the corporation available for residence purposes, and Minneapolis is the only city that runs its street cars by electricity developed by water power. It possesses the second largest developed water power in the country; has within cheap and easy reach the largest body of pine timber in one watershed to be found in the world, and receives into her elevators annually the millions of bushels of wheat from the fertile prairies of Minnesota and the Dakotas, where the best known wheat is raised and where enough might be raised to feed the world.

Minneapolis is a good place in which to live and a poor one in which to "die." The sun shines upon no more self-sufficient city. Her tributary territory produces all that her inhabitants can require, though their requirements be many—all kinds of grain, live stock, wool, gold, silver, copper, iron, power to manufacture these, wood and stone—all in such abundance as to far outrun her needs and leave a surplus for export, thus steadily enriching and increasing her supremacy.

But there is much more to see in Minneapolis than its mills and manufacturing plants, stores and business blocks, and public institutions, although these, housed in splendid structures and finely equipped, are well worth a long journey. It is a beautiful city as well as a great one—a city of homes, educational institutions, libraries, churches, clubs, parks and delightful suburban districts. Its area of some sixty square miles is finely located for residence purposes, and every part of it is made available by excellent car service. There is ample room within the present corporate limits for a population of one million, and no stint of desirable and accessible land outside, as the city is located on a plain. The only possible rival it acknowledges in the number of home owners is Philadelphia.

With foundations unshaken, with resources unbounded, with religious and educational institutions unsurpassed, and with enterprise unlimited, there seems to be nothing to hinder the prophecy once uttered coming to pass, that on this great continent the ultimate last seat of government—political, commercial, educational and religious—will be found at the head of navigation on the Mississippi River, or, in other words, will be Minneapolis.

Minnesota: Its Resources and Attractions.

By WILLIAM DOAN GALVIN.

Minnesota was admitted to the Union in 1858. Nearly two centuries before this Jean Nicolle the French explorer first carried news of the aborigines of Minnesota to Montreal. Two distinct streams of immigration, each entering the territory by separate pathways, mark the history of this northwest country.

The first may be characterized as a period of exploration by the French from Canada. These people, ambitious and restless, sought treasure and adventure. Their movements were confined to a narrow strip running west from Quebec. This was in reality to them a line of least resistance. Being hampered in their movements on the north by the English Hudson Bay Company and on the south by the atrocious Iroquois Indians and the great lakes, they traveled westward to the farthestmost point of Lake Superior where they turned south and entered the territory of Minnesota. They spent their time in trapping, hunting and fishing through the wilds of Northern Minnesota, but did little toward opening the new country for actual settlement. Many of them were French missionaries and disciples of Loyola.

The stream of immigration composed of settlers intent upon the development and advancement of the new territory came from the central and eastern part of the United States. They journeyed westward until the Mississippi river was reached at points in Illinois and Wisconsin, and from there entered Minnesota over this natural highway. The land which they found was endowed with rare physical characteristics.

Grand scenery, leaping waters, and a bracing atmosphere greeted the traveler for a distance of four hundred miles from north to south and only a hundred miles less in extent from east to west. No matter from what quarter the traveler enters the state he finds the surface of the country dotted with lakes. The scenery along the shores of most of these lakes is picturesque. Some are wooded and wild, with precipitous shores, while others are surrounded with beautiful grassy slopes, offering the most alluring spots to the hundreds of campers who each year pitch their tents for a few weeks of pleasure and recreation. So numerous are the lakes, numbering about ten thousand in all, that a seventeenth part of the fifty millions of acres which comprise the state is covered with water. The general character of the land is that of a high rolling prairie, and on account of the plentiful moisture the soil is fertile and productive and well adapted to the growing of grain and small fruit.

Owing to the remarkable productivity of the soil and its adaptability for growing wheat, Minnesota has become one of the leading granaries of the world. As late as 1870 the wheat produced in this state would have supplied the wants of but a small portion of her present population. The south half of the state is now one great expanse of wheat fields, and to the west extending up through the Red River Valley of the North and westward through Dakota is found the greatest wheat region of the world. So great has the flouring industry become in the past thirty years, that the output of the Minneapolis mills alone today would be sufficient to supply the demands of the people of Europe and still have abundance to feed her own people. It is of interest to know that the mills of Minneapolis alone ship to countries of Europe, Asia, Africa and South America, twenty-five per cent. of all the flour exported from this country. To all who visit the city, these great mills afford a most attractive and profitable place for sight-seeing.

For the many who engage in the pursuits of agriculture, there are thousands of rich and fertile acres of uncultivated land in the northern part of the state. So great are the opportunities that the northwestern farm land market is this summer marked with the greatest activity. Hundreds of farmers from Southern Minnesota, Iowa "driven," sometimes over many miles of watery pathway until they reach the main waters of the Mississippi and thence floated down to the mills of Minneapolis where they are cut into various sizes of lumber and shipped to all parts of the country. More than five hundred million feet of lumber are cut each year by the Minneapolis mills alone. One can form some conception of the tremendous proportions of the lumbering business of Minnesota when it is learned that this is a little less than one-third of the output of all the mills of the state. A more interesting manufacturing process is difficult to find, and visitors should not fail to witness some of these great saw-mills in operation.

The great pine forests of the state, together with the numerous beautiful lakes, have suggested to travelers and to citizens of the commonwealth, the desirability of having set apart around the shores of Leech Lake, a large section of forest land for the purpose of a national park. The scheme has met with great approval by thousands of people not only of the state, but of the entire country. However, such fierce opposition has been manifested by those interested financially in the timber lands, that it is doubtful if the plan will succeed.

But Minnesota is rich not alone in her agriculture, flouring and lumbering interests. Along the shores of Lake Superior and located in St. Louis County, some of the richest iron deposits of the world are to be found.

Mines are situated on two separate ranges, one known as the Vermillion, the other the Mesabi. While Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan was in London recently he was asked if the discoveries of ore in Northern Sweden were not a menace to the newly formed United States Steel Corporation. It was reported to him that they had eighty million tons of ore there. Mr. Morgan replied, "Why should we fear those deposits when we have in Northern Minnesota alone, not eighty million tons, but eight times as much?" The iron mining industry is but in its infancy. Ore was first shipped from the Vermillion range in 1884, when shipment of 62,000 gross tons was made; while last year from both ranges over nine million gross tons were shipped. The quality of ore found is of the best. Surface mining is mostly carried on. The surface is first penetrated with drills and then blasted with powder, after which open steam fit shovels are used in getting out the ore. It is immediately dumped upon steel cars some of which have a capacity of 100,000 pounds. Trains haul this ore to the immense docks at Two Harbors and Duluth, where it is loaded on boats and sent down to the steel plants of Pennsylvania and South Chicago. Underground mining is also carried on to a large extent and continues all winter. The winter output is piled up in stock piles to be hauled to the lake during the shipping season. The cost of mining and shipping has been reduced and Illinois are now selling their farms at high prices and buying in these new communities at low prices. From present indications it will not be many years before this expanse of idle land in the north will yield a bountiful return to the labors of the husbandman.

Another natural resource of Minnesota which has contributed much to the wealth and prosperity of the citizens, is the timber land. When the white man first came to Minnesota he found the greater part of the territory covered with a dense primeval forest of pine, spruce, birch, tamarack and cedar. Lumbering is one of the earliest industries of the inhabitants, but it has made its greatest strides during the past thirty years. The great forests are rapidly disappearing before the onslaught of the lumbermen, and it is estimated that by the time another decade rolls around many of the mills will no longer be in operation. Through the pineries of northern Minnesota are scattered innumerable logging camps. Here thousands of men find employment during the winter months. The logging season extends from the time the streams freeze over in the fall, until the "break-up" in the spring. The trees are felled, the branches and bark removed, and the log-mark of the company owning the timber placed upon each log. The logs are then hauled to the nearest stream where they are dumped upon the ice; when the ice thaws in the early spring the logs are to a minimum, so that ore can now be delivered at Lake Erie ports at a cost of about $2.90 per gross ton.

As human agencies have operated in Minnesota only half a century and all forms of industry have already been developed to such an extent, what may we not expect during the next fifty years? When the prosperity of our country depends to such an extent upon the condition of the flouring industry, the lumbering industry, and the iron industry, surely the logical deduction is that the commonwealth of Minnesota contributes more towards making this country the most prosperous one on the face of the globe to-day than any other state in the Union.

Christian Yeomanry of the Northwest

By PROF. W. M. HAYS,
University of Minnesota.

Since the Disciples have found the best soil for the rapid propagation of primitive Christian simplicity in church practice among the farmers of the middle west, the question is often asked, why has not this plea spread more rapidly in Wisconsin, Minnesota and the Dakotas? Is it possible that the yeomen of this section are different in any essential way from those who live on and manage their own farms in Kentucky, Missouri and all the states touching the borders of those two states? Are there any conditions of soil, climate, business or even of church influence which operate against the spread of those principles and practices which the Disciples of Christ are especially propagating? Have the comparatively few disciples scattered throughout these states failed to live worthily among their neighbors? Have our state evangelists, our traveling evangelists and our evangelizing pastors failed in their work? Have our state boards failed to earnestly and intelligently organize the work of evangelizing this field? Or, has the growth of our movement been slow simply because there has been temporarily a wrong chain of circumstances, an accidental failure to bring about the proper combination of forces and circumstances?

The present writer wants to believe, and does believe, the last of the several alternatives mentioned, and has in mind many of the facts which do substantiate that belief. Strong local and state efforts have been made and the national boards have added the weight of influence and labor in all these states. A broad foundation has been laid, good seed has been planted in these four large fields, the cultivation has begun; the first twentieth century Christian missionary convention means that a newly enlarged force of workers will be put in the field. The crop will be perennial, it should be made to increase five fold annually, and the success which comes from succeeding efforts will weave into the situation that new chain of circumstances which will make Minnesota as full of Disciples as Missouri. And since the Disciples have learned the art of winning cities, the townspeople as well as the country folks will swell the numbers of those who in the future will help to extend a united church into all the dark places of the earth.

The earlier settlers of these four states closely followed the parallels of latitude, as did the pioneers of states further south. Instead of being settled with emigrants from the latitude of Pennsylvania, these states received the enterprising young people of New England. With them came, instead of so many Germans and other people of central Europe, more of the hardy Scandinavians of north Europe. Some Germans came, not a few people from Ireland; and mainly by way of Canada came many of Scotch, as well as of English blood, and some Canadian French. The Italian came to work in the cities, colonies of Russians made homes on the broad prairies, and colonies of Finns settled in the pine woods, while a limited number of southern negroes came to serve as barbers, restaurant waiters and sleeping car porters.

Owing to the fact that the prairies from Iowa and Missouri westward to the semi-arid plains were easier to subdue than the timbered lands from Michigan westward, the new lands were there taken up a decade ago, and waves of emigration were made to roll back by the first general drought in the nineties. There has been no occasion for the turning back of the slower tide of emigration into Minnesota. The forests and the disinclination of people to move northward have caused the virgin soils of these northern states to not be taken up so soon as the soils which people were able to reach without swerving either to the north or to the south. With the recurrence of good times, the cities having been shown to have been overdone and the westward emigration having been resumed, the tide of emigration has naturally been deflected to the northward. A Missourian has a feeling that to move to Des Moines is going into the cold north. The Iowan looks at St. Paul as in a very cold region. To one who has made these shifts to the northward, looking backward produces a different sensation. The summer climate is here more enjoyable than further south. In winter, during most of the days the temperature ranges from freezing to zero. The days when lower temperatures prevail are much fewer in number than the days when sloppy, above-freezing weather prevails south of Chicago. Steady cold weather is far more enjoyable and more healthful than weather in which there are days of thawing weather alternating with days when everything remains frozen solid and dry. Where the days are uniformly cold we do not need to change to lighter clothing, our houses are warmly constructed and kept well warmed, and our barns are so built that our animals are not one day shivering in a cold rain or basking in the warm sunshine, and the next suffering in below zero weather.

Much of Minnesota has soils equal to Illinois, and the relative prices of lands are now being equalized by the rapid rise in prices in Minnesota. All admit that some products which thrive further south are not hardy here, but all agree that they are agreeably surprised as to the relative enjoyment on account of climate.

The season is sufficiently long for nearly all the annual field crops. Wheat, oats, barley, field peas, flax and millet could not do better with a longer season, as they do not consume all the season we have. Timothy, brome grass and red top also have time to spare and are perfectly hardy as far north as Winnipeg. Red clover makes two crops, and who could ask more of this "king of the manurial forces?" Kentucky blue grass thrives, but does not make winter pastures as it does in southern Iowa or in Kentucky. In southern Minnesota corn makes crops of ears only excelled by Iowa. In northern Minnesota early varieties are being developed by breeding for growing modest crops of ear corn. Since stock must be housed all winter, winter pastures are not depended upon, and fodder corn has come to take its place. The experiment station and the machine inventors during the past five years have revolutionized the production of very cheap roughage for live stock. Common, rather small, Minnesota varieties of common dent corn are drilled thickly, more than a bushel per acre, in June, harrowed twice, cultivated twice, cut with a corn binder, siloed or dry cured and fed to cattle, horses and sheep. Fodder corn thus grown is coming to be Minnesota's greatest and cheapest hay crop.

Several new crops are coming forward with promise. The cow pea and the soja bean are being bred by the experiment station so as to be early enough to produce the seeds here. Rape for fall pasture is being raised in large quantities, and brome grass, a worthy rival of timothy, is well established. The experiment station has produced many new hybrid wheats, some of which promise to materially increase the yields, and one new wheat has been widely distributed and is increasing the average yield of the state over a bushel per acre. Corn, oats, clover and other staple crops and fruits are being extensively bred to adapt them to the soils and climate of the state, and the experiment stations of the other of these northern states are doing similar work.

The people of these cold states do not sit down when they meet difficulties. They meet them and surmount them in their farming; and they have taken hold of the Christian Missionary Convention as one means of surmounting the difficulties met in introducing the disciples' movement into the northwest.

Our First Twentieth Century Convention.

By Aaron Prince Aten.

To where the city of the North
Impaired in gorgeous setting—
Where Minnehaha ripples, worth
All earthly cares forgetting—
Invites to her grand feast of soul
The earnest hosts and loyal,
May zealous legions onward roll
To our Convention royal.

From this broad land, from orient lands.
Beyond the blue of ocean,
From all the earth, let waking bands,
As in some new commotion,
Bestir their hearts and lift their eyes
To see the lands of beauty
That in their bright outlinings rise
With high behests of duty.

A century of grander things
Than told in earthly story
Unfolds, and to our vision brings
A glimpse of coming glory,
To God's elect who mount the height,
Forever onward pressing,
And plant the banner of the right,
The battlements possessing.

A million quickened eyes shall see Beyond the dim outlining
Of present plans, the things to be
In future years bright-shining,
If out of self the church shall rise
To grander glories growing,
And hear and heed earth's suppliant cries,
The heavenly favor knowing.

As face we all the coming years
In this our great Convention,
And as the scroll unrolled appears
To challenge earth's attention,
May we, our highest duty done,
Hope yet for grander vision
That cometh sure, the victory won,
Upon the field Elysian.

University of Minnesota.

By Dr. Walter M. Brown.

The University of Minnesota has been organized since 1851 but was reorganized in 1860, again in 1864 and finally put on a firm basis in 1868, the charter dating February 18 of that year. Since then it has grown to be one of the foremost institutions of its kind in the United States, with a faculty and corps of instructors numbering 263 and an attendance the past year of 3,413, ranking third in number of students enrolled, and pushing Michigan hard for second place.

The University comprehends seven departments, under which are included several sub-departments, thus making it one of the broadest educational institutions in the country. The departments are as follows: The Graduate Department, the College of Science, Literature and the Arts including the School of Technical and Applied Chemistry; the College of Engineering and the Mechanic Arts; the School of Mines; the College of Agriculture, which includes the School of Agriculture; the Dairy School, the College of Law, and the Department of Medicine, which includes the College of Medicine and Surgery, the College of Homeopathic Medicine and Surgery, the College of Dentistry, and the College of Pharmacy. There are also the Experiment Station at St. Anthony Park and the Geological and Natural History Survey. Recently there has been established at Vancouver, B. C., under the direction of the University, a Botanical Station for the further study of the flora and fauna of the Pacific Coast.

The Mining and Engineering Departments are resident in three buildings located upon the University campus: The Mechanic Arts building, the Machine shop and a Physics building in course of erection at a cost of $50,000. The students in these departments have no difficulty whatever in obtaining situations at first-class salaries, either during vacation or after graduation. In fact many of the students leave school before the completion of their courses to accept positions with railway companies, waterworks plants, mining companies and the like.

The Department of Agriculture includes the College of Agriculture, having a four years' course, embracing botany, chemistry, geology, zoology and physics; the School of Agriculture, located at St. Anthony Park, which gives a broad general education in the common branches and instruction in all lines of scientific farming; and the Dairy School. The Medical Department ranks with the best in the country. It is particularly well equipped for didactic work, its laboratories being admittedly superior to many of those found in larger cities. The students of this school have the clinical privileges of seven hospitals and two dispensaries in St. Paul and Minneapolis. In keeping with its progressive spirit the entrance requirements are being gradually raised until in 1904 a collegiate degree will be necessary to secure admission.

The University Buildings are located in southeast Minneapolis within sight of St. Anthony's Falls and ten minutes' ride from the center of the city. The campus extends from 11th to 18th Avenues southeast and from the river and the Northern Pacific railroad tracks to University Avenue. The buildings are arranged in the form of a crescent about the campus, the effect being to make it one of the prettiest in the country.

Convention Influence.

By A. W. Kokenodoffer.

Too much cannot be written touching our conventions and their influence on the spiritual life of the people. I am glad that many of our writers are finding this a theme worthy of their pens and that our religious papers are giving such productions publication. Why not besiege our dailies too? Great things in the religious development of the people ought to be kept before the people, and only through the secular press can we hope to reach the masses. These are important epochs. They are worth the outlay of money expended. The Christ went up to the top of Hermon, laid aside the garb of humanity that he had worn so long, donned a heavenly dress and had real communion with the saints. That he was strengthened thereby for his great work must be admitted, whatever other significance may be attached to the transfiguration. The apostles that were with him were borne above the ordinary plane of life, and their spokesman was led to exclaim: "Lord, it is good to be here. Let us abide continually in this after glow." Moses went to the summit of Sinai, talked with the Lord Jehovah forty days, and when he came down from the mount his countenance shone so that the children of Israel could not look upon him and a veil was worn as a protection for the eyes of the awe-stricken beholders. But Moses was made strong for the great task of leading a nation out of bondage and sin, fit type indeed of our Savior's life work.

Now if Jesus and his three chosen ones, and Moses the lawgiver and prophet, needed such extraordinary visions of the divine presence and glory—such entrance into fellowship with the heavenly visitants—that they might be clothed upon with power and majesty sufficient for the work assigned them, then we earth worms ought to seek every neighboring hill-top, where purer atmosphere prevails, saintlier fellowship abounds, and nobler pulsings are stirred, that we too may be eminently qualified for our life work of both living and teaching this glorious gospel of the Son of God. There ought to be molting seasons for men. We need to be quickened continually. The new life grows old and callous all too soon. Neglect not the assembling of yourselves together is a valuable exhortation. The greater the assembly the greater the soul-feeling, and thereby the greater need that we exhort one another the more we see such occasions approaching—occasions full of companionship with the best men and most consecrated women, actuated by the same noble impulses that moved the Son of God to lay down his life for the salvation of the world—surely we cannot but be impelled to seek the association and inspiration of such gatherings.

Now, it's hard, single handed, to interpret to a church the spirit, the life, of such assemblies. But where two or three are, if this mind prevails, there will be power even from the Lord, and such communications will not want the overflow of soul essential to arouse the energies of an entire congregation. Therefore let every church, that it may profit in a new and needed way by the coming great convention at Minneapolis, begin preparations at once to send two or three representatives, and the power of a new transfigured splendor will burst at once upon the home church, as it is thus put in communication with the mount. Then will there be an aftermath to this convention that will be glorious. Then will the new century—the opportune time for the Christian Church and missions—be begun aright. Then will the many as well as the few become surcharged with the energies of their leaders.

This Niagara of power must not be lost. Let us be wise as the children of this generation. Let the churches awaken to the demand and to the opportunity. October and Minneapolis should be coupled in our minds and in our prayers. Let us go up like the Jews of old to Jerusalem, and a new era of church life will be born for us that God grant may live with, but not die with, the century.

The Nation's Woe By FREDERIC D. POWER

A great blow has fallen. A nation sits in grief beside the bier of its foremost man. A cloud deep and dark and distressful rests upon us. The Republic has been passing through sore trial. The discipline of sorrow has its uses, and it comes to nations as to individuals. Our Lord speaking of his sufferings asks: "The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?" Anciently it was the custom at great entertainments for the governor of the feast to appoint to each guest the kind and proportion of wine he was to drink, and what was thus appointed it was deemed a breach of good manners either to refuse or not to drink up. Hence a man's cup in both sacred and profane literature came to signify the portion whether of good or evil that fell to him in this world.

David speaks of the Lord as the portion of his cup. "Thou anointest my head with oil: my cup runneth over." "I will take the cup of salvation and call upon the name of the Lord." Our Lord's meaning is made clear in two remarkable passages. In Gethsemane he cries: "Father, if thou be willing remove this cup from me," and in view of his sufferings he asks his disciples, "Are ye able to drink of the cup that I shall drink of and to be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with?"

Christ speaks of his sufferings as "a cup"; not a sea, a dead sea, a wide, deep, great resounding sea, a mighty flood, or a vast ocean, but a cup. In the light of revelation sorrow is comparatively but a small matter be it what it may. The consolation and joy of the Lord, on the other hand, are as a boundless sea, for "the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the great deep," and "peace shall flow like a river and righteousness as the waves of the sea." Compared with the eternity toward which we are journeying the brevity of earthly life is but as a tiny rill down which the child sails its toy boat to the fathomless deep bearing the commerce of all nations on its bosom. Compared with the joys of everlasting life our sorrow after all is but a cupful to a flood, a sea, a great ocean, yea, millions of oceans, surging and billowing in the depth and vastness of their joy forever.

Failing to remember this, Christians are made heavy, sad and even rebellious by sorrow. They think their burden greater than they can bear. They suffer the cup before their lips to shut out all the boundless wealth of God's mercy beyond. They esteem all blessings withdrawn, the sun smitten from the firmament, the stars shaded forever, the light of God's countenance wholly clouded. They weep and mourn as if God had peculiarly bereaved them above all others, and to their grief there could be no end.

If I transplant a frail elm from the meadow to the yard, is it not that it may grow better and be more admired and useful in its new sphere? And are all the loveliness and shade, the fairness and freshness and fruitfulness of the meadow therefore taken away? If God takes a Christian statesman, a noble father or mother, a sweet child, a beloved friend, ready to be thus elevated, to a higher sphere, while there is heaviness of sorrow is there not also cause for joy in the thought of their promotion—a joy greater than the sorrow of separation? And when a blow falls and all for our sanctification, are the gifts of the past to count as nothing, the promises of the future to weigh as down, God therefore unkind and we most miserable children of a hard Father?

But we may mourn for our departed? Yes; that is natural and reasonable. Abraham mourned for Sarah. Joseph mourned seven days for Isaac. For thirty days the children of Israel wept for Moses. David lamented the passing of Saul, Jonathan and Abner. Jesus wept over the grave of Lazarus. Christianity does not repress weeping. But for us there is the Comforter, for us there is the Sympathizer who "bore our griefs and carried our sorrows." We sorrow not as others who have no hope. Soon we shall know even as we are known. All this mystery that surrounds such a dispensation as the fall of our Christian ruler, shall be made plain.

A little while and he that shall come will come. "A little while"—not a millennium, an eon, a century, a decade, a year, nor even a day, but a little while. "He cometh"—not as a cloud, a storm, a destroyer, a withering blast of evil, but the Beloved, the Chief among ten thousand and altogether lovely, the King himself with eternal gifts of blessing and peace and life. "He will not tarry." Other helps may be slow in coming, earthly friends may delay their succor, but he tarries not. By centuries he is sweeping down toward us. Each setting sun marks with golden impress the hastening of his chariot wheel. Morn evoked by the circling hours with rosy hand shall soon unbar the gates of light never more to be closed. Dazzling with ineffable glory the advent throne already appears to the eye of faith. Above all sounds shall come the cry, "Behold he cometh!" And millions straining to catch the fall of his footstep shall rise up and cry: "Lo, it is our God! We have waited for him!"

Affliction is but a cup, and suffering affliction, the draining of a cup. But Jesus said more: "The cup which my Father hath given me." Sufferings, then, are gifts. "Unto you it is given—graciously given—in the behalf of Christ not only to believe on him, but also to suffer for his sake." "We glory in tribulations, knowing that tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience, hope." All things are given us of God, present things and things to come. Affliction, even death, is counted among the Christian's gifts, for "all things are yours, whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come, all are yours."

Is it likely that God will give us what we do not need? Can we not trust his wisdom and goodness and be assured he will do far better than we could possibly do were these interests committed to us? Does not an earthly parent know what is best for his child, and is not correction proof of love rather than hatred? Suffering has kept many from sinning. Afflictions have purified and made sweet and clean and fit for heaven many a soul. God had one Son without sin, but he never had any without sorrow. Tears are akin to prayer. Tears are the showers that fertilize this world. Never trust the man who boasts of eyes to which the heart never mounts in dew. Sorrows are sent for instruction as we darken the cages of birds to teach them how to sing. All great souls have been made great through this discipline. The mourner travels not alone through the valley in the shadow between the hills. The holiest and best have gone that way. Apostles and prophets are of this company. Saints and martyrs go with him. The sorrowful face of the adorable Redeemer with the old look of brotherly sympathy is first in the throng.

Is it necessary now to know why this experience must come to us? Is it not enough that it is God's gift, a necessary gift, for "whom he loveth he chasteneth"? Must not the ground be wounded by spade and plow, and put to the torture by the harrow, before it yields the grain; and when the wheat has come, noblest of all the products of the earth, must it not be threshed, trod upon, swept about, tossed in the air, sifted, shaken, shoveled, and afterward ground, resifted and baked in the oven before it is placed upon the table for princes and kings? And if God sees fit to use threshings and winnowings upon us shall we not take the discipline and be thankful? If it is a cup, a portion which he gives this nation, must we not drain it?

Once more: "The cup which my Father hath given me," says Jesus. A Father gives this cup; one who has a father's authority and does us no wrong, a father's affection and means us no hurt. Does the child fear when the father is with him? Is anything going wrong when the father's hand is holding? Is darkness any longer dark, or roughness any longer rough, or the wilderness any longer wild, when the father's step is heard and his voice directs the way? God has a father's heart that pities, spares, embraces all; a father's wisdom that appoints our path, assigns our work, mixes our cup; a father's hand that regulates our portion and sustains our frame, and is this not enough? "I should have been a French atheist," said John Randolph, of Roanoke, "but for one recollection, and that was when my departed mother used to take my hand in hers and cause me on my knees to say: 'Our Father who art in heaven.'" And is it not sufficient for the child to say of any gift, "It is my father's gift"; of any hand, "It is my father's hand"; of any call to duty or to discipline, "It is my father's call"?

Hear our beloved Christian President in the terrible moment when he is stricken: "Do not harm him. He doesn't know what he is doing." How true and wise and just and Christlike! Hear him as he resigns himself into the hands of the faithful surgeons, saying with the manly faith, and majestic courage, and magnificent simplicity that ever marked his character and his life: "Our Father who art in heaven. Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done"; and passing into unconsciousness with these words trembling on his lips. Hear him as all the glory of this present world fades before his vision, and the gates of the unseen are swinging wide and God and the throne are very near, breathing the hymn: "Nearer my God to thee, nearer to thee." Hear him as the last farewell is taken: "It is God's way. His will be done." How he speaks to the nation! How he speaks to the ages!

This one thought, that God holds the cup, is positive assurance that the draught is wholesome and needful. Remember that affliction, whatever it may be, is a cup, but a cup that is given to us, a gift bestowed for our good; that it is the cup a Father gives; that Christ speaks this word and speaks it in the shadow of the awful agony of Gethsemane and Calvary. We may not understand the mystery of the atonement. We may not know why our Lord suffers more than all others. We may never sound the depths of that mighty anguish which came when all its waves and its billows went over him. But it is something to know that even our sufferings raise us into fellowship with him.

This cruel stroke! O the pity of it! O the deep damnation of his taking off! God pity us. God keep the nation. God make even the wrath of man to praise him.

Washington, D. C.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

The word "altitude" explains many things in this Rocky Mountain region. Denver is one mile above the level of the sea. Many places in Colorado have an "altitude" much greater than that of Denver. If a horse attached to a carriage runs away it is said that the great "altitude" makes him nervous and causes him to run! If a man commits a crime—smites with his fist, cuts with a knife, shoots with a gun—the explanation is that the "altitude" causes him to lose control of himself, and so he commits acts of violence! "Altitude" is a convenient thing. We have almost a feeling of sorrow for those who have no "altitude"!

In my letter of September twelfth certain quotation marks that should have been used were not. The better parts of the letter were original; the inferior portions were quoted, and marks should have been used indicating the quoted words. The "altitude" is to blame for this! But the suggestion here made as to "the better parts" and "the inferior portions" will answer the purpose of quotation marks.

I am surprised to hear that you are ignorant of the time and place of the next general convention of the Disciples of Christ. It is evident that you do not read our papers, or that you read carelessly. When your place of residence is considered you cannot plead "altitude" as an explanation of your ignorance on this subject! The approaching convention has been so fully written up that I feared the work was over done. But in this opinion it must be that I am in error. I take it for granted that you are not the only person benighted concerning this matter in the United States.

The next general convention of the Disciples of Christ in the United States will be held in Minneapolis, October 10-17. This will be, you ought to know, an international, not merely a national, convention of those who plead for a reunion of believers in the Christ by a return to New Testament Christianity in faith and in life.

The Disciples are now at work in Canada, Hawaii, in Porto Rico, in Cuba, in the Philippine Islands, Japan and China, in Australia, New Zealand and New South Wales, in Africa, in Jamaica, in India and Turkey, in Scandinavia and in Great Britain. This movement for the restoration of the lost unity of the church, according to the program indicated above, is now world-wide. It is this unique and most wonderful movement that will be represented in the approaching convention in Minneapolis. Permit me to suggest that you cannot afford to be absent. The ends of the earth will be heard from. To attend this convention will be an important step forward in obtaining a liberal education.

I am sure you are not well informed concerning the work and progress of the Disciples of Christ; nor do I doubt that you will welcome information in regard to them. Note, therefore, if you please, the following facts:

The American Christian Missionary Society was organized in Cincinnati, in 1849. Its Jubilee was duly celebrated in 1899 in the place of its birth. As many persons attended as were present at the International Christian Endeavor Convention in the same city last July. The Christian Woman's Board of Missions was organized in Cincinnati in 1874. The Foreign Christian Missionary Society was organized in Louisville in 1875. These are the national missionary organizations of the Disciples. Including state and district organizations for mission work there are about one hundred and thirty. At the first, the American Christian Missionary Society engaged in work both at home and abroad. It established and maintained for a number of years, a mission in the city of Jerusalem until the beginning of our civil war. Dr. J. T. Barclay was the missionary. It also began a work on the island of Jamaica under the leadership of J. O. Beardslee. This work was also brought to a close by the unsettled condition of business, caused by the civil war. An effort was also made by this society to open up a work in Africa. Alexander Cross, the missionary, a negro from Kentucky, died of fever soon after his arrival. When, therefore, the Christian Woman's Board of Missions was organized in 1874, the Disciples were not engaged in evangelistic and educational work beyond our borders. October 1874 ought, for this reason, to be regarded as the inauguration of a new era in the experience of the Disciples of Christ. The Christian Woman's Board is both a home and foreign society. The organization of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society the following year made still more emphatic this forward movement. It declared its purpose to make disciples of all the nations.

The work at home has gone forward by leaps and bounds since our organization for work in other lands. The American Christian Missionary Society, which, at the time, was in a moribund condition, took on new life. It inaugurated a work in behalf of the negro, educational and evangelistic in character, in our own south land. The Board of Negro Education and Evangelization was organized. The work of this board, at the Kansas City Convention, last October, was placed in the hands of the Christian Woman's Board, with an assurance of financial co-operation for a term of years. The Board of Church Extension was organized after the American Christian Missionary Society took on new life. There are now about $350,000 in the treasury of this Board. The Board of Education came also into existence. The Board of Ministerial Relief must be named also in this connection. The colleges of the Disciples, within the last five years, have made a distinct advance along all lines, but especially in the payment of debts, the securing of better apparatus, buildings, and endowment funds. The one time almost dead American Christian Missionary Society has collected in a single year, since it came to its new birth, $100,000 for work in the home land. When we began to try to obey the Master's command to preach the gospel to the whole creation we were able to pay the salary and traveling expenses of a corresponding secretary! Do you see any progress? The last annual report makes a booklet of 128 pages, packed full of important information. If you have not seen it, before you go to the Minneapolis Convention request Benj. L. Smith, Y. M. C. A. Building, Cincinnati, Ohio, to send a copy of The American Home Missionary for November, 1900, to your address. He will send it. The last annual report of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society makes a booklet of a hundred, or more, pages. The reading of the reports from the mission fields of the world will thrill you. Read them, as a preparation for the coming convention. Request A. McLean, Box 884, Cincinnati, to send a copy of The Missionary Intelligencer for November, 1900, to your address. The reading of these pamphlets will fill you with an uncontrollable desire to go to Minneapolis in October. Do not attempt to control this desire. It is a good impulse. Yield to it and go. To do so will be helpful to you, and through you to others.

All aboard for Minneapolis! You want to meet your immediate kinspeople—spiritual kinspeople—from every part of the United States, from Canada, and from lands beyond the seas. To look into their faces and to hear them tell what God hath wrought will be to you an inspiration. It will be a veritable "second blessing." You will be a larger man, and a better, ever afterward.

Among the ancient Hebrews annual convocations were necessary. The real unity of the people—unity of thought, spirit, speech, purpose, worship, work—was thereby promoted. When Rehoboam divided the kingdom he changed the time and place of the general assemblies of the people. He knew that if the men of Israel were permitted to assemble in Jerusalem, as had been their custom, the divided kingdom would be speedily reunited. So important was this matter, the great annual convocations, that attendance was enjoined by law. Soon after the organization of the New Testament church, a meeting for conference concerning the general interests of the body was called in Jerusalem. The best men in the church attended. We ought to come together in these great conventions. We must do so. They are essential, not simply to our well being, but to our existence. My absence will not be noted. You will not be missed, if you are not present. The convention will go on as if we were in attendance; but our loss, yours and mine, will be incalculable if we are not there. The Lord willing I will be in Minneapolis October the tenth. Hope to meet and greet you.

The Life and Teachings of Tolstoy

By PETER AINSLIE.

(Concluded.)

The reaction from doing nothing in the Greek Church to doing something, as commanded by Jesus, filled Tolstoy with delight. He saw nothing impossible in the Sermon on the Mount. Every command was reasonable, and in his book entitled, "My Religion," he clearly and with wonderful fascination sets forth how the doctrine of Jesus became clear to him. This scriptural passage gave him the key to the whole book: "Ye have heard that it hath been said, an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth, but I say unto you, That ye resist not evil." Like the rest of the human race Tolstoy had always been taught to resist evil, that it was humiliating to submit to wrong, that he must resist all offense against his person, family and race, but this is directly opposed to the doctrine of Jesus. These words, "Resist not evil," were the key that opened all the rest. Jesus did not exhort us to turn the other cheek that we might endure suffering, but his exhortation was, "resist not evil." Whatever the ill-disposed inflict bear it; give all that you have, but resist not evil; never oppose violence, never do anything contrary to the law of love. If anyone takes advantage and affronts you, bear the affront; do not above all have recourse to violence.

While the church had said that this was impossible to be done, yet Jesus saw in it no such impossibility or he would not have given us the command, and besides he said, "My yoke is easy and my burden is light." John said, "His commandments are not grievous." Jesus illustrated this principle in his entire life, which was one continual example of "resist not evil." While nearly all other Christian doctrines have been announced in some form and earnestly believed by other great teachers of mankind, no other teacher ever laid down this principle. It is the central point in the doctrine of Jesus. It is from God and therefore is divine.

Tolstoy finds in the command, "Judge not that ye be not judged," a direct condemnation of all civil courts, basing it upon the fact that the sole aim of civil courts is to resist evil, to punish the offender, to return evil for evil, an eye for an eye; but Jesus said return good for evil, "resist not evil." Courts do not forgive, but punish. Jesus repeatedly declares we must forgive seventy times seven, or as often as we are wronged, and forgive every offense, "resist not evil." In the Sermon on the Mount Jesus is speaking of the ancient criminal law, and by no means, however forced, can it be made to mean otherwise. His command was, "Judge not, condemn not." Your courts are wrong and you must have no part in them. In this Tolstoy is sustained by the early fathers of the church until the time of the arch-pagan Constantine, when the alliance of church and state was first formed.

There is only one way to suppress evil and that is to return good for evil. Your laws make criminals. For thousands of years you have tried the methods of civil courts by returning evil for evil, and evil has increased. Instead of your laws reforming criminals, they have made more criminals. Now try the doctrine of Jesus: "resist not evil." This is more the heart of the church than sending out missionaries, establishing church orders and maintaining church sacraments. It antagonizes the Old Testament, but that was the Sermon on the Mount. Jesus said, "The old law said unto you, but I say unto you." Jesus was all authority and he abolished the old law, and Paul sustains this abolition.

Tolstoy declares that it is wrong to be angry for any cause, since Jesus said, "Whosoever is angry with his brother is in danger of the judgment." The commonly used phrase in this passage of Scripture, "without a cause," Tolstoy declares is an interpolation, and in this he is sustained by our Revised Version. The insertion of "without a cause" makes the command meaningless, for who is to decide when anger is expedient? This phrase does not appear in the Tischendorf manuscript nor any of the manuscripts before the fifth century. Jesus did not make this exception. He did not utter this terrible word, nor could he have done it. It is wrong to be angry for any cause, and Jesus so declared.

Concerning divorce, Tolstoy believes that it is forbidden by the doctrine of Jesus who exhorts us to pardon every one, not excepting the adulterous woman, and this divorce prohibition is sustained by Mark, Luke and Paul. Jesus said, "Whosoever shall put away his wife save for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery." The common understanding is that this passage of Scripture allows divorce for one cause, but such is not the meaning, but instead its real meaning is that there can be no divorce for any cause. An analogous sentence is: Whosoever refuses food to his son, besides the fault of spitefulness, exposes him to the possibility of being cruel. Now this sentence can only mean that a father who refuses food to his son besides being spiteful to him, exposes him to the possibility of being cruel. So the real meaning of the words of Jesus is: Whosoever puts away his wife, besides the fault of libertinism, obliges her to be an adulteress.

Tolstoy believes that the taking of an oath is sinful, because Jesus said: "Swear not at all, neither by heaven, for it is the throne of God, nor by the earth, for it is the footstool of his feet, nor by Jerusalem, for it is the city of the great King. Neither shalt thou swear by thy head, for thou canst not make one hair white or black." The taking of any kind of oath is wrong and is contrary to the doctrine of Jesus, who also taught us that murder is sinful, whether it is the killing of one man in a personal encounter or the killing of hundreds in battle. All wars are wrong and opposed to the doctrine of Jesus, who also gave his opinion clearly when Peter raised his sword against Malchus in the garden of Gethsemane: Put up thy sword, "resist not evil." The doctrine of the world has brought all of our suffering and sin, and the result of its practice to-day is the increase of sin. The doctrine of Jesus alone will give peace and happiness. It may demand poverty, but poverty is necessary to happiness as humility is necessary to peace. The pseudo-Christian doctrines were first announced by Paul who knew but imperfectly the ethical doctrine in the Sermon on the Mount, and it was perfected by Constantine.

Tolstoy sees the abolition of all national lines in these words of Jesus: "Ye have heard that it was said, thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy, but I say unto you, Love your enemies and pray for them that persecute you." The word translated "neighbor" refers to a Hebrew, a compatriot, and the word translated "enemy" refers to Gentiles, people of some other country. Then from this Scripture the command is to love all without distinction of nationality. The love of one's country, one's native land, over that of another country is contrary to the doctrine of Jesus who taught that it is sinful to hold any racial or national animosity. We must love all nations and serve all peoples. Says Tolstoy: "If you will, believe in paradise, in hell, in the pope, in the church, in the sacraments, in the redemption, pray according to the dictates of your faith, attend upon your devotions, sing your hymns—but all this will not prevent you from practicing the five commandments of Jesus: Be not angry, Do not commit adultery, Take no oaths, Resist not evil, Do not make war. These are the commandments of God whom you pretend to worship." And so, says Huntington Smith, a Tolstoian scholar of some note, "although we may smile at the artlessness of this Russian evangelist in his determination to find in the gospels the categorical imperative of self-renunciation, although we may regard with wonder the magnificent audacity of his exegetical speculations, we cannot refuse to admire a faith so sincere, so intense, and in many respects so elevating and so noble. But which of us is willing to accept the truth here unfolded as the veritable secret of life?"

When Tolstoy emerged from his study with this high conception burned into his soul, it is no surprise that his whole life was changed. The past arose before him like a nightmare, and he revolted in the shadow of its memory. He wrote: "I honestly desired to make myself a good and virtuous man, but I was young, I had passions, and I stood alone in my search after virtue. Every time I expressed the longings of my heart for a truly virtuous life, I was met with contempt and derisive laughter; but when I gave way to my passions I was encouraged. I found ambition, love of power, love of gain, uncleanness, pride, anger, vengeance, held in high esteem. When I gave way to these passions and became like most of those around me, I found that my friends were not dissatisfied. That I should marry a wealthy bride, that I should become an adjutant to the Czar—these were their chief wishes respecting me. Work for God, life for the future, treasure in heaven, did not enter into the view bounded by the narrow and impure horizon of their worldly hopes. . . . I put men to death in war; I fought duels; I lost at cards; I wasted my substance wrung from the sweat of laborers; I treated those laborers cruelly; I deceived men; I lived uncleanly; lying, robbery, adultery, drunkenness, violence, murder—of all these I was guilty; yet I was considered by my equals as a comparatively moral man. Such was my life during ten years, and I cannot now recall those years without a painful feeling of horror and loathing."

Wonderful words! It is a marvelous confession, and only two other men in history have so opened to the public gaze their inmost lives. Rousseau dared to make such a confession, so vile and dark. Then he throws the document at the feet of the Eternal Throne, saying as he throws it: "See what I have done, what I have thought, what I was. I have added nothing good. I have unveiled my inmost being even as Thou, O Eternal Being, Thyself hast seen it. There, my fellow men, blush at my wretchedness, and let a single one say, if he dares, I was better than that man." But not so with Tolstoy. He throws open the doors of his inmost life and, like Augustine, he breaks down in tears and finds relief only in walking after the Prince of Peace.

Tolstoy regards the social order of this time as neither sacred nor wise, and consequently he has no respect for it. Believing that the true meaning of human life is in ministering to others, he exchanged the wardrobe of a prince for the plain garb of a peasant. When he first proposed to dispose of all his property for the poor, his family threatened to declare him of unsound mind, which, under the Russian laws, would easily prevent any disposition of his estate. Then he divided his property among his children, one daughter, who is his secretary, refusing any part because of a full acceptance of her father's views, and now Tolstoy is legally their guest. In a fearful storm in 1891, when there was so much suffering through Russia, he traveled for miles over snowdrifts and established more than 200 soup houses for the starving.

Fiction has largely lost its charm for him. Says he: "Write about what you have actually seen and lived through. No lies are needed. There are so many of them." The theater and the ball room that were once his delights, he deplores ever having entered. He spends his winters in Moscow and the remainder of the year on his estate, where he works all day with his men in the field. "Happiness," says he, "is based upon (1) intellectual labor, (2) exercise of the physical powers, (3) the family, (4) intercourse with all classes, and (5) bodily health." He is a vigorous thinker.

One starry night, talking of the family relation, while returning with a friend in Moscow, he suddenly stopped and passionately said: "Heaven, how I want to write! My brain is seething with images." When he goes to his study he works with the enthusiasm of an artist, and some great thought takes hold of him like a cough takes possession of a man. His correspondence is enormous, and letters are received in every language and from every quarter of the earth. These are all answered by his eldest daughter, who serves as his secretary. His home is open to all classes. The artist and plowman, the literati and mechanic, the nobility and peasantry, the foreigner and countryman, all are cordially received. He seldom appears at social gatherings and avoids crowds and everything ceremonial.

At one time he attended the Congress of Naturalists, at Moscow, to hear the address of a friend. He had scarcely taken his seat at the door before it was discovered that he was in the University hall and the meeting went wild in an ovation, but Tolstoy did not enjoy it and never liked for any one to refer to it afterwards. Praise is always distasteful to him, and before it he is sometimes inclined to be curt. All classes love him and he is idolized by thousands. A sect has been formed on the basis of his religious views, and while some of his books have been suppressed by the strict censorship of Russia, some have been translated into the leading tongues of the earth.

I have described Leo Tolstoy, his life and his teachings. It makes a wonderful volume in the world's library of humanity. Coming generations will turn the pages of that life and read them with amazement. It is to be regretted that the false claim of the Greek Church to work miracles with pieces of the cross drove him to deny all miracles. The saddest thing in his life is his rejection of the supernatural, upon which the religion of Jesus Christ is based.

Man could not save himself, but, as Socrates said, "We must wait until a lawgiver is sent from heaven to instruct us." Jesus fulfilled the desire of all nations because he was the only begotten Son of God.

On many things Tolstoy saw far and clearly. His conception of obedience is superb. Perhaps not all of his conclusions we would be willing to follow, many we would declare wrong, but who would deny the splendor and divinity of the five commandments of Jesus as he has shown them to us? Have we forgotten our own William Penn, who lived unharmed in the strict observance, under a limited interpretation, of these five commandments, and that among savages? The American Indians never so loved any man as they did William Penn. It is the ideal state of society, and the Russian evangelist is the chief of idealists in this day. Now, in his old age, having renounced wealth, position, fame, all for Christ, Leo Tolstoy, in his simplicity, sacrifice, intensity of life and devotion to Jesus, presents one of the most unique pictures in the opening days of this century.

The Old Book In The New Crucible

By J. J. HALEY.

IV.—The Crucible of Criticism.

What is now known as the Higher Criticism began its re examination of the historical books of the Old Testament, notably the Pentateuch, more than four hundred years ago, and let the fact be observed in the beginning, this has not been an effort of infidels to overthrow the Bible, but the work of honest men to ascertain the truth concerning it; and the result has been to establish the revelation of the Bible upon a firmer basis than ever.

Biblical Criticism is the child of the intellectual liberty and activity of the Reformation and the Renaissance that preceded it. Carlstadt, a contemporary of Martin Luther, speaks of the opinion that Moses did not write the Pentateuch as at least defensible. Masius, a learned Catholic, who died in 1573, after writing an excellent commentary on Joshua, was of opinion that Ezra or some other inspired man must have reduced the Pentateuch to its present form. In 1670 Spinoza examined more fully than his predecessors had done the passages in the Pentateuch which are incompatible with Mosaic authorship. His own theory is that the five books were written by Ezra, but that the text had been much corrupted after his death. A few years later the French oratorian, Simon, published his critical history of the Old Testament. He does not impugn the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch as a whole, although he admits that particular verses must be of much later date. He refers to the endless repetitions of the same thing in different words, to the fact that Genesis gives two independent accounts of the creation, and mingles together two stories of the flood. He argues from difference of style to difference of authors. In fact, Simon is rightly called the father of Old Testament Criticism, and in him we see the pre-critical passing into the critical stage of opinion on that question.

The fatherhood of Old Testament Biblical

Criticism, however, in the strictest sense of the word belongs to Astruc, a French physician, whose memorable book was published in Brussels in 1753. He made an advance on the discovery of Simon, by endeavoring to show that the documents of Genesis could be separated from each other and assigned to different authors. He distinguished them as Jahvistic and Elohistie, according to the names for God employed in the two documents. The investigations of Astruc were continued in 1779 by Eichhorn, a dry German rationalist, a man of acute mind and an oriental scholar of great learning. He confirmed the results of his predecessors, and showed that in addition to the divine names, there were other divergencies in the use of words. A brilliant Scotchman, by the name of Geddes, a doctor and a Catholic priest, published a work in 1792, in which he announced that the Hexateuch was the work of various hands, and also that a great part of it must have been written long after Moses. He wrote thus in the preface to his translation of the Bible with critical notes: "From internal evidence, three things seem to me indubitable: 1. The Pentateuch in its present form was not written by Moses. 2. It was written in the land of Canaan, and probably at Jerusalem. 3. It could not be written before the time of David, nor after that of Hezekiah." In consequence of this publication in the year 1800, he was suspended from his ecclesiastical functions and denounced by Protestants as an infidel. He fared even worse than Bishop Colenso subsequently for the same offense, whose washerwoman on his return to England refused to handle his linen.

We are now at the beginning of the century when the battle royal of the critics began in earnest. The Old Testament was now thrown into the crucible of criticism heated sevenfold like the furnace of Nebuchadnezzar. Book followed book; critic followed critic; theory succeeded theory, especially in Germany, the wilderness battlefield of the critical controversy. The analytical, documentary, evolutionary, composite theory was accepted in substance by all the new critics, with additions, subtractions, modifications and corroborations, according to the aims, idiosyncrasies and peculiar points of view of the individual thinker, or the critical school to which he belonged. Never, perhaps, in the history of the world, has so much learning been displayed or scholarship expended or labor bestowed in the solution of any problem.

As the outcome of this marvelous activity a literature has been produced, vast in its proportions, exhaustive in its research, profound in its erudition, infinitely painstaking and laborious in its production, and altogether astonishing in its results. The labor performed in this field of industry has been prodigious, and the results achieved the most remarkable in the history of scholarship. All the books in the world put together have not received a sifting so minute and thorough as the Bible in the last hundred years. The German and Dutch have led the way in the original investigation of the problems of Old Testament authorship and composition, and we are still indebted to these sources for the best historical and literary results of the scientific criticism of these inspired books. The English school, which has produced but one great book on the question, or possibly two, is within certain limits a reflection of German scholarship, but is more evangelical and cautious, not to say conservative, and less rationalistic and destructive than many of its German masters. Some of the German Higher Critics, like Delitzsch and Dilman and Hommel, are conservative and evangelical in faith, but Graf, Wellhausen and Kuenen and the powerful school to which they belong exhibit in all their work a bias against the supernatural, which they seek to eliminate as a distinctive and dominant element in the religion of Israel.

The fact, however, must be borne distinctly in mind, that Rationalism and Higher Criticism are in no sense identical and have no logical or necessary connection with each other. When Catholics and Protestants, who are earnest believers, and Rationalists, who reject the supernatural, unite together in the application of certain methods of study to the literary and historical problems of the Holy Scriptures, and cooperate in the production of certain results, it is just as sensible and as true to speak of those results as Catholic or Protestant or Christian, as to speak of them as Rationalistic.

The individual opinions of critics on inspiration and the authority of the books that constitute the Bible, and their views of revelation have no necessary connection with the methods of literary and historical criticism. These opinions may and do exist altogether apart from the scientific method of analyzing the Holy Scriptures. Rationalism and destructive criticism existed before the critical method of inquiry came into vogue, and will continue to exist after all necessity for it has passed away. The analysis of a biblical book with a view to ascertain its authorship, date, and literary characteristics, and place in the history of religious development, is not in itself a destructive process and does not, as a matter of fact, alter our religious views in any essential respect. It is simply a matter of literary criticism and makes the writing more valuable for religious uses, because it gives us the historical setting—the milieu—the place where it belongs in history. It is true that critical methods have been used against the Bible, and conclusions have been drawn inimical to the Word of God, but scientific research in the realm of physics has been used in the same way; but in neither case legitimately.

The claim that modern biblical criticism is only a method of study is not quite correct. It is the scientific canons of literary and historical criticism applied to the origin and composition of the Bible; it is also a body of results produced by the application of this method. The method of study employed by the critics has been universally accepted as legitimate; it is only certain conclusions labeled criticism to which conservative orthodox scholarship has filed objections. Both sides to this conflict are honest in their aims. They are equally desirous of ascertaining the truth about the Bible. When the critics sneer at their opponents and look upon them with contempt, and the conservative believer refers to the critics, without discrimination, as infidels, rationalists, and destructive critics, whose aim is to destroy the Bible, both of them are running counter to the ethics of the decalogue, to say nothing of the Sermon on the Mount. Whatever may be the outcome of this critical movement, whatever attitude it may cause us to assume towards the Bible, the helpers and the hinderers of it have been equally honest, if not equally capable. Most of the work done has been constructive, very little of it destructive, and those who have the most confidence in the Bible as the repository of the Word of God, will be least disturbed as to its ability to stand the ordeal through which it is passing. Calling names to create prejudice against the other side is not the best way to express confidence in our own side. Both sides are seeking truth and the truth will ultimately prevail.

Romans 3:7,8 By C. L. FIDLAR.

"If we can judge by this evening, things look favorable for a good meeting."

It was the first night of the meetings, and the speaker was the evangelist who had come to conduct them. A party was walking leisurely homeward after the services. The meeting had begun at early candle light, so the hour was early and there was no need of haste. Besides, the night was glorious, just cool enough to be exhilarating. Why hurry to bed and shut out all this wealth of moonlight? The Creator of all things certainly expected man to enjoy and use such nights as this, else why were such nights made? By ones and twos the company fell apart as each reached his own home or his own by-road. At last the evangelist and Cliver turned into the little lane that led up to the Cliver home.

"Yes," Cliver replied; "things does look favorable. And if this weather will jest hol' out, I b'lieve the field heyre is white to the harvest, and we have only to thrust in the sickle."

"You know more of the needs of this field than I do," the evangelist continued, "so I want you to feel perfectly free to advise me. I'll do my best to give the people what they need."

"Well," Cliver replied, "we've been a-havin' soft, sorter wishy-washy stuff fed to us in this neck of the woods so long that I think a taste of the ol' Jeruzalem gospel will be good. Been a-havin' big meetin's all around heyre. I've attended some, but I've the first scrap of gospel to heyre yit. I don't believe out of a few famblies, a dozen people can tell you what to do to be saved. So I 'low you might give it to 'em straight."

"Then we'll give it to them to the best of our ability."

"Yes," Cliver resumed, "I 'low that'll be proper. For my part I've failed yet to find any Scripture for gittin' very far from the Jeruzalem gospel. The command was to preach the gospel, not lecture. I don't b'lieve the apostles ever give lectures on pop'lar subjects like we git from the pulpit so much nowadays. All purty enough, but no salvation in it."

"I believe you're right about it," the evangelist returned. "We do often get away from the commission in our efforts to please."

"I wonder if we hadn't better see if we kin git to stay all night heyre," Cliver said as he opened the gate.

The meetings had been continuing for a week. There were few confessions, but the interest was good. The weather and, what was of supreme importance, the roads were all that could be desired, so the people came from far and near. To see the buggies, wagons and horses hitched about the little church, one would think that the political issues of the day were being discussed within instead of the old story of the cross.

"I heyre that Schooner Allen and the boys from the mine are comin' up some evenin' to have some fun," Cliver remarked as he and the evangelist walked to meeting one evening of the second week.

"Who's 'Schooner' Allen?" the evangelist asked.

"Schooner Allen? W'y he's one of the miners down to the Locks. And a purty tough customer, too. He purt nigh broke up a meetin' for us las' winter. Over to Mt. Zion he jest about run things, tell the bretheren over there got the grand jury after him."

This information was anything but comforting to Summers. Just from college and engaged in his first meeting, he had a pardonable pride in its success. His success here would make for or against his securing other fields.

"How do the brethren feel in the matter?" he asked. "Are they disposed to sit still and let him carry things with a high hand?"

"Well, it 'pears that they air. None of them wants to git his ill will. Better have the good will than the ill, even of a dog, as the sayin' is. Of course the matter could be laid before the grand jury as they did over to Mt. Zion, but that was a heap of trouble. And besides, the jury don't set fur I don't know how long now."

It was with some nervousness that Summers scrutinized each face that came in that evening. While he was announcing the opening hymn, a troop of eight or ten young men entered the door beside the pulpit and facing the congregation. Single file and all in step, they marched past Summers to the far end of the room and took the back seat. As the leader slipped through to the far end of the seat and Summers caught a view of his face, he knew him to be "Schooner" Allen. It was not the heavy brutal face he had expected to see, however. Instead, it was a good face, the face of a natural leader. As the evangelist continued to watch the face during the progress of the singing, he saw that "Schooner's" supremacy over so many of the boys of the neighborhood was not a supremacy of brute force, but one of superior intellect. Like many another he was a deviser of mischief. But a high compliment was paid him by one of the boys when he said, "Schooner's" al'ays the first one to help do his own devilment." So it was generally known throughout the country that he was a leader both in plan and execution. It is told of him that on an occasion, when one of his escapades miscarried and some of the boys were landed in the jail at Locksville, he collected the ones that had escaped and at their head went to the jailer and demanded cells. It was only when intoxicated that he was really vicious.

Though Summers was slightly nervous and expected a disturbance, yet the meeting came to a close with nothing but the best of order from the back seat. What he should have done in case of a disturbance, he scarcely knew; he had no plans; the conditions must determine. As the back seat filed out, Summers shook hands with each one and invited him back again. Some received the courtesy with hanging heads, some stolidly, others with a grin, while Schooner glanced up with a look of incredulity.

As Cliver and Summers walked home after the meeting, Cliver said: "Well, you held 'em that time, didn't you? But I'm afeard Schooner's jest gittin' the lay of the land."

"Possibly," Summers replied; "yet they paid splendid attention this time."

"Yes, the best I ever seen 'em pay. But what'll you do if a storm does bust? Give me your plans an' I'm with you."

"Well," the evangelist returned, "I scarcely have any. I'll have to wait and see the nature of the storm first."

"Well, whatever you do, count on me."

"Thank you," Summers replied, "I'll do it."

The next night the boys from the mine filed in again and took their back seat with "Schooner" next to the wall. The singing was vociferous, the back seat being especially prominent because of its volume and because it managed to keep a half measure behind. The boys from the mine could sing "Nettleton," "Mt. Pisgah" and "Martin" with all of the grapevine embellishments displayed by the most devout old sister in Israel.

The Scripture lesson was Paul's defense before King Agrippa, and the sermon was on the conversion of Saul. All went well till the discourse was half through. While Summers was endeavoring to drive home the fact that the Lord can make a good man out of the most hardened sinner, there was a commotion in the back seat. The evangelist stopped in the midst of his sentence, while Schooner clambered over the boots between himself and the aisle. The church was built before ideas of convenience had made their advent, and had a single aisle down the middle with the pulpit between the front doors. When Schooner reached the aisle, all eyes were upon him. It was the custom of the mine boys to begin next the wall, clamber over the others to the aisle, and then stalk noisily full length of the house and out the front door. One would go, and in a few minutes the next would follow till all had left. They made it a point on such occasions to wear the noisiest boots obtainable. Just as Schooner stumbled into the aisle, Cliver arose from his seat, but the evangelist motioned him back. Schooner started slowly and deliberately up the aisle with his ponderous new boots shining to his knees and squeaking at every step.

The silence of the audience hurt. All eyes were now turned toward Summers. What would he do? Would he submit to this interruption? If Schooner left the house, the others would follow to a man. Summers stepped forward to the side of the pulpit, raised his hand and said, "Brethren, we are very sorry that our friend here must leave us, but we suppose it is because those new boots are uncomfortable." Then pointing at the offending boots, he shouted in a grandiloquent voice, "Ladies and gentlemen, behold! Wonderful spectacle! These boots are the largest our friend could purchase for one dollar and twenty-five cents! They were bought of J. T. Lowe, of Lockville! Paid for, spot cash! Twenty per cent. discount allowed for cash! Our friend purchased them on purpose to do honor to this occasion! Behold! friends, ere it is too late! These wonderful articles of apparel shine like the morning star, and like the morning stars, they sing together!"

When Schooner started up the aisle, his head was high and the old dare-devil's spirit shone from his eyes; but before he reached the door, his head was down and his face was scarlet. As he passed the pulpit, Summers adjusted his eye glasses and leaning forward, scrutinized the boots. He threw up his hands and exclaimed, "Number tens! I was mistaken, friends! These boots are a special order! None in stock large enough!"

As Schooner made for the door, Cliver in the amen corner caught the spirit; he arose and craned his neck to get a good look at the boots, then exclaimed, "Wonderful! wonderful!" Schooner shot out of the door and closed it with a bang.

The audience scarcely knew what feeling to give expression to. They were shocked at such irreverence in the evangelist, were horrified at such audacity, and were amused at the discomfiture of Schooner.

Summers straightened up and with all gravity said, "Are there any more boots, new or old, to be displayed? If there are, we will gladly examine them now. Will the gentlemen please come forward while we wait?" But no one moved. Then he took out his watch and carefully noted the time. Looking straight at the back seat he said, "There is a young man in the house whose mother cautioned him; it will soon be time for him to go home. He must not forget that she wants him to get in early, and it's now seven o'clock. She is afraid to have him out late. When he wishes to go home to eat his bread and milk and be put to bed, of course we'll excuse him; but will he please go quietly so as not to disturb us?" He replaced his watch, took up his discourse where it had been broken and proceeded as if nothing unusual had occurred. There was not so much as the shifting of a foot in the back seat. As the boys from the mine filed out Summers shook hands with them and invited them back again as if nothing unpleasant had happened.

"Well, you sot down on 'em like a thousand of brick," Cliver said between his spells of laughter.

"I only hope it will last," Summers replied. "Bro. Burns told me how they were in the habit of doing, so when Allen started out I knew what was to follow. Then I got a good look at him down at the Locks to-day and I decided that he was a fellow who couldn't stand ridicule."

"I guess he got a good dost of it this time," Cliver again laughed.

"Yes, it was rather rough, but we might as well settle it at once. I believe all of those fellows are more afraid of ridicule than they are of the law."

"You want to keep a sharp lookout. Allen won't let you get another chanct like that, but there's no tellin' what he'll be up to next."

"I'll watch for him."

Like Opium Eaters.

Coffee Drinkers Become Slaves.

"The experience, suffering and slavery of some coffee drinkers would be almost as interesting as the famous 'Confessions of an Opium Eater,'" says a Boston man, W. J. Tuson, 131 W. Newton St. "For twenty years I used coffee at the breakfast table and, incidentally, through the day, I craved it as a whiskey drinker longs for his morning bracer. I knew perfectly well that it was slowly killing me, but I could not relinquish it.

The effect on the nervous system was finally alarming and my general health greatly impaired. I had dyspepsia, serious heart difficulty, and insomnia. When I would lie down I would almost suffocate. My doctor assured me it was due to the action of caffeine (which is the active principle of coffee) on the heart.

I persisted in its use, however, and suffered along just as drunkards do. One day when I was feeling unusually depressed, a friend whom I met, looked me over and said: 'Now, look here, old man, I believe I know exactly what's the matter with you. You are a coffee fiend and it's killing you. I want to tell you my experience. I drank coffee and it ruined my nerves, affected my heart, and made me a sallow, bilious old man, but through a friend who had been similarly afflicted, I found a blessed relief and want to tell you about it. Try Postum Food Coffee, a grateful, delicious beverage, full of nourishment, that will satisfy your taste for coffee and feed your nervous system back into health, rather than tear it down as coffee has been doing.'

I took my friend's advice, and within a week from that time, my digestion seemed perfect, I slept a sweet, refreshing sleep all night, and my heart quit its quivering and jumping. I have been steadily gaining in health and vitality right along."

Our Budget.

—Everybody ready for Minneapolis!

—Church Extension offerings are still in order.

—Pay up your missionary pledges, that the amounts may go into the general reports.

—The first frosts of the season have come, and the leaves are putting on their autumnal tints.

—Read what is printed elsewhere under the title "A Double Anniversary and Testimonial." Read and act promptly.

—St. Louis churches have filled their ministerial vacancies, and are preparing for a vigorous fall and winter campaign.

—The old Abingdon College property, buildings and grounds, is for sale and can be had for a nominal price. Why not purchase the same for benevolent use?

—Our special offer of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST until the end of the year, is to give new readers an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the paper. Will not our readers call the attention of their friends to it?

—J. W. Lowber, of Austin, Tex., preached in the Methodist church in the City of Mexico on Sept. 15, the birthday of President Diaz. Members of the church from several states and from various parts of Mexico were present. He says we ought to have a church in that city.

—The Pleasantville (Iowa) Christian Church observed McKinley memorial day with an appropriate program including a memorial address by the pastor, F. D. Ferrall, and other addresses. In the evening the pastor preached on Anarchy, its Cause and Cure. W. J. Bryan was at Pleasantville on Sept. 12 and delivered an address on Fraternities and Civilization.

—The convention of the sixth district of Michigan will be held with the church at Saginaw, Oct. 1-3. H. N. Allen, of Saginaw, is president of the district. The Disciples of Christ in Michigan make up in zeal what they lack in numbers and the convention is sure to be a good one. It includes sessions devoted to state mission work, C. W. B. M., Sunday-school and Christian Endeavor.

—H. F. Burns has recently left the congregation at Holden, Mo., to attend Drake University. Only the desire of obtaining more education, he says, could have taken him away from this excellent church. It has 200 active members, is at peace within and without, and is in good spiritual and financial condition. It needs as pastor a young man who will locate with the anticipation of remaining several years.

—Judge Charles J. Scofield and wife, Carthage, Ill., have just celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of their marriage. On a card bearing their pictures looking still youthful and fresh is the couplet:

"It's we two for aye,
All the world and we two, and heaven be our stay."

It seems but a little while ago when the editor preached at Carthage and this slender youth, a mere boy then, was divided between the law and the ministry. He finally decided on both and succeeds in both. Many happy returns of the day to the happy, useful pair.

—The St. Louis churches are bidding welcome or farewell to four pastors this week. The Carondelet Church gave a reception to its new pastor, G. E. Ireland, Monday evening. The First Church welcomed its new pastor, John L. Brandt, in a reception Tuesday evening. F. G. Tyrrell will be welcomed back by the Mount Cabanne Church after his three months' tour in the West by a reception on Thursday evening. Friday evening the Central Church will give a farewell social to its pastor, James McAllister, whose pastorate closes Oct. 1.

—Dr. A. M. Collins, of Shelbyville, Ill., was in St. Louis Friday, after delivering a memorial address the preceding day at Raymond, Mo.

—Singing Evangelist John Joyce is now ready to resume work and can be addressed at Trimble, O., Box 56, by pastors or evangelists desiring his services.

—The second editorial on "A Problem of Consistency" has been crowded out by the report of the convention in Missouri and will appear in our next.

—W. T. Wells closes his four years' work at Huntington, Ind., about Dec. 15. He has not yet made any definite arrangement for future work.

—J. S. Smith, of Carlinville, Ill., has returned from a six weeks' vacation spent at Buffalo and Boston and is visiting his parents on Prince Edward Island.

—J. S. Hughes, of Chicago, is preparing to publish a booklet on "How to Read the New Testament." The third edition of his work on John and his revelation has been issued.

—The Mason City (Iowa) Christian Church dedicated its building Sept. 22. The sermons morning and evening were preached by H. O. Breeden of Des Moines.

—Any church desiring the services of a preacher and pastor of known ability and wide reputation, may be put in correspondence with such by addressing P. O. Box 102, Carthage, Ill.

—A. M. Growden, of Findlay, O., delivered an address at the McKinley memorial service in that city last Thursday. The auditorium was more than filled and it was a memorable service.

—J. P. Davis, of Burlington Junction, Mo., announces that his church will allow him to hold one meeting this winter and that he will be glad to correspond with a congregation needing his services as an evangelist.

—Christian University at Canton, Mo., has opened for the fall with prospects even more encouraging than the friends of the institution had anticipated. C. J. Burton, principal of the Correspondence Bible College, writes that he expects a successful year.

—The foreign mission receipts are still decreasing. At the present rate the total will be less than last year. The books close Sept. 30 and friends of missions have no time to lose in turning this defeat into victory. Every church, Sunday-school, Endeavor society and individual who has an interest in this cause should come to the rescue at this critical moment. If your offering has not been sent in, send it immediately. If you have sent in an offering, send another.

—A Christian husband and wife to whom God has committed some of this world's goods and who wisely intend to administer on their own estate, have just given to George L. Snively, General Secretary for the National Benevolent Association, $1,000 for the Old People's Home at Jacksonville, Ill., and the Orphans' Home at St. Louis. The motive of this excellent work should appeal strongly to all Christian people and the excellent business methods according to which it is conducted should inspire the confidence of business men.

—Dr. W. T. Moore calls our attention to an error in our statement in regard to the change of management of the Christian Commonwealth of London. As we previously stated, Mr. Paul Moore has been obliged by ill health to resign and Mr. Dawson has succeeded him as managing editor and director. Dr. Moore, of Columbia, however, remains editor-in-chief and is still the largest shareholder in the company. Mr. Dawson is in sympathy with the policy according to which the Commonwealth has hitherto been conducted and will continue it unchanged.

—W. H. Harding, whose work in the maritime provinces of Canada and especially at Lord's Cove, N. B., has been very successful, has come to the United States and has been employed as district evangelist for the coming year by the fifth Illinois district. J. E. Lynn, of Springfield, president of this district, anticipates great success for him, in this field. Any church in the district desiring a meeting or advice and assistance in securing a pastor, should write to him, as should also any minister wishing to locate in the district.

—Central Illinois delegates to the Minneapolis convention are requested to note a slight change in the time-table for their party. The train will be the Prairie State Express of the C. & A., leaving Springfield Wednesday, Oct. 9, at 3 P. M., joining, without transfer at the Chicago Union Station, the Indiana delegation and leaving Chicago at 10:30 P. M. over the C. M. & St. P. The delegation will reach Minneapolis Thursday noon in time for the opening session of the convention. Buy tickets over this route at your home station, one fare for the round trip. Those who expect to join this party are requested to send their names to J. E. Lynn, Springfield, Ill.

—The twenty-first annual conference of the Christian Association and C. W. B. M., of Great Britain, was held at West London tabernacle, Sept. 16-19. The convention was favored by the presence of Miss Graybiel and Miss Josepha Franklin, both of whom are returning to India. One feature of the conference which deserves commendation, and which would be perhaps as appropriate in this country as in England, is a session devoted to the annual meeting of the Christian Total Abstinence Association, of which Mr. Joe Coop, of Southport, is chairman. William Durban, the English correspondent of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, is president of the conference.

—A new departure in divinity school work is marked by the announcement that the University of Chicago will form a class of theological students for study in Palestine during the winter quarter of 1902. The expedition will be under the direction of Prof. Shailer Mathews. The class, which is limited to 20 persons, will sail about the middle of December and will return early in April. At least seven weeks will be spent in Palestine, during which time courses will be conducted by Prof. Mathews in the historical geography of Palestine and the life of Jesus. Members of the class register as students in the University of Chicago, and will be given credit for the work done. Each member will be furnished in advance with a printed syllabus giving an outline of the courses of lectures to be delivered and lists of books upon the places to be visited.

—The receipts for church extension show a slight loss for the third week of September. The receipts from 93 contributing churches are $1,111 59. We lost three contributing churches and $129 32 from receipts. There was also a loss of $1,602 in receipts from individuals during this same period. However, during this time last year $1,350 was received on the annuity plan, while no special gifts have been received this year. But few of the large churches have thus far reported their collections. The churches should not fail to send their offerings which have already been taken, so that they reach the office before the last of the month. Every Sunday in September and October should be used for church extension offerings until your church has been heard from. The board at Kansas City reports that one of the most encouraging features in the preparation for the offering this year was that $5,000 collection envelopes were called for by the churches, which is more than twice as many as were called for last year. More than $5,000 is needed yet to reach the $300,000 of a permanent fund by Sept. 30.

A Double Anniversary and Testimonial.

On the 10th day of October next—the day of the assembling of our national convention—J. Z. Tyler and wife of Cleveland, O., celebrate the 25th anniversary of their marriage, and the 53rd anniversary of Bro. Tyler's birth. Some of his friends have been considering for some time how they might give some substantial expression of their appreciation of Bro. Tyler's valuable services to the cause of Christian Endeavor in which he has sacrificed his health. It is known to many, if not most, of our readers, that Bro. Tyler has been an invalid for several years, though he has kept up his work in a most remarkable manner. Some time ago, however, he was compelled to yield up all remunerative work, as that of pastor, but has kept up the Bethany Reading Courses by his indomitable energy, aided by his wife, both of whom have expended great labor for which they have received no compensation. For some time he has been unable to dress or undress himself, and his devoted wife has become the breadwinner for the family by keeping boarders.

It is time, brethren, we were discharging an unpaid obligation. What we propose, after consultation with some of the friends, is, that we make the coming anniversary, October the 10th, the occasion of presenting Bro. and Sister Tyler a testimonial of our appreciation of their services and of our sympathy with him in his great affliction, in the form of a cash offering, or purse, accompanied by a letter containing the names of the contributors and assurances of brotherly love and appreciation. And so, on each recurring birthday and marriage anniversary, while our brother remains with us, will we remember him and his wife, in the same brotherly way.

As the time is short, we earnestly request an immediate response. We make this public mention of the matter in order that Bro. Tyler's friends, too numerous to reach by private letter, may have opportunity of taking part in this public testimonial to our beloved brother. All donations sent to this office will be acknowledged in this paper, and no doubt our other papers will heartily co-operate in this matter, by receiving and acknowledging donations to this fund.

It is hardly necessary to add that this action is taken wholly at the initiative of Bro. Tyler's friends. Prof. H. L. Willett, who has corresponded with a few persons on the subject, wrote us early in the summer, suggesting some sort of concerted action which we heartily endorsed. Having learned only at the date of this writing of the double anniversary mentioned above, we have decided to ask the friends to make that occasion the time of presenting this testimonial. Bro. Tyler will not be able, he writes us, to be at the national convention, but at the time the hosts are assembling at Minneapolis it will warm his heart to know that his brethren have remembered him in his affliction, and it will be some compensation for the loss of their personal fellowship in convention assembled.

Send donations to this office, or to any of our other papers which, we are sure, will receive and forward the same to their proper destination. If possible let all funds be sent in time to reach the office not later than Monday, Oct. 7, so that they may reach Cleveland by the 10th. Money orders or bank drafts sent to this office may be made payable to J. H. Garrison.

"An Historical Society."

I want to place on record my hearty approval of the proposition of Bro. Errett Gates for the organization of "An Historical Society." The call comes none too soon. The scope of such a society should include the preservation of historic buildings as well as records and other memorials. In regard to some of these buildings the call comes too late, the "decaying tooth of time" has already cheated us of some priceless relics, and men are now at work ruthlessly demolishing buildings whose destruction will, in the years to come, excite deepest regret and bitter but useless tears.

Where is the old Brush Run church, for instance? This first milestone in the restoration movement no longer exists in its original condition. I question if a respectable photograph of the original building is extant. There is an etching of the building after it had ceased to be used for worship and had been converted into a blacksmith shop and local post office. I am given to understand that only a remnant of this famous structure remains and it is used as a barn in West Middletown whence it was moved many years ago. Who will say that it would be merely sentiment to urge the purchase of this remnant by some of our rich brethren and its preservation for the instruction and inspiration of future generations!

The same remarks are pertinent with regard to the old printing house at Bethany, W. Va., now used as a tenement or private dwelling. It would be hard to overestimate the educative value of these buildings, as in the coming years, when the unification of all religious forces in America shall be a fact, the youth of many lands shall ask, "What mean these memorials?"

The old brick meeting house on the hill, at Lexington, Ky., where was witnessed the union of the forces under B. W. Stone and A. Campbell, no longer exists. Who will arise and tell us where even a picture of the building can be found? The same is true of the historic spot where Campbell debated with Owen in Cincinnati. Who does not regret that we no longer own the building, formerly known as the 8th and Walnut St. Church of Christ, Cincinnati, O., which marks the organization of the A. C. M. S. and our "First General Convention"?

There are other buildings of epochal interest that ought to be preserved to the brotherhood, and pictures of many another place of interest should be secured, along with photographs of leading pioneers, etc., to be placed in proper custody and form the nucleus of an historical museum. "I speak as unto wise men, judge ye what I say."

A Universal Food.

Following Nature's Footsteps.

"I have a boy two years old, weighing forty pounds and in perfect health who has been raised on Grape-Nuts and milk.

This is an ideal food and evidently furnishes the elements necessary for a baby as well as for adults. We have used Grape-Nuts in large quantities and greatly to our advantage." F. W. Leavitt, Minneapolis, Minn.

One advantage about Grape-Nuts Food is that it is pre-digested in the process of manufacture; that is, the starch contained in the wheat and barley is transformed into grape-sugar in exactly the same method as this process is carried out in the human body, that is, by the use of moisture and long exposure to moderate warmth, which grows the diastase in the grains and makes the remarkable change from starch to grape-sugar. Therefore, the most delicate stomach can handle Grape Nuts and the food is quickly absorbed into the blood and tissue, certain parts of it going directly to building and nourishing the brain and nerve centers.

An Ancient Foe

To health and happiness is Scrofula—as ugly as ever since time immemorial.

It causes bunches in the neck, disfigures the skin, inflames the mucous membrane, wastes the muscles, weakens the bones, reduces the power of resistance to disease and the capacity for recovery, and develops into consumption.

"A bunch appeared on the left side of my neck. It caused great pain, was lanced, and became a running sore. I went into a general decline. I was persuaded to try Hood's Sarsaparilla, and when I had taken six bottles my neck was healed, and I have never had any trouble of the kind since."

Mrs. K. T. SNYDER, Troy, Ohio.

Hood's Sarsaparilla and Pills will rid you of it, radically and permanently, as they have rid thousands.

A Mild Criticism.

Will you allow a mild criticism of some things appearing in the Sept. 12 issue of your paper?

Errett Gates, of Chicago, proposes An Historical Society. Please allow me to observe (1) The Chicago contingency has already gone quite far enough toward denominationalizing the churches of Christ. (2) The fundamental principles of our movement are found in the New Testament, no amount of records or memorials can add thereto. (3) These records and memorials would tend to swerve, limit and hamper the progress of the churches of Christ by crystallization into a party. (4) The co operation of the churches of Christ ought not to be primarily or incidentally to perpetuate the memory of certain 19th century leaders. (5) Young men studying for the gospel ministry do not need such, if studying for a denominational ministry it would be essential.

I apprehend it will take about as heroic effort in this century to keep away from the denominational idea as it required in the last century to break away from it.

E. H. KELLAR.

Carrollton, Mo.

[How any one can confuse an historical interest in the beginnings of our movement and a grateful remembrance of its leaders, with denominationalism, passes ordinary understanding. If we may not profitably preserve the memorials of the men to whom we are indebted for heroic leadership; if we may not be inspired and enlightened by studying the lives and characters of such men as the Campbells, Scott, Stone and Errett; if our freedom from denominationalism is compromised by learning the history of our emancipation,—then the laws which elsewhere govern the human mind find a singular exception here. We, too, apprehend that it will take as heroic effort to keep away from the denominational idea in this century as it required to break away from it in the last; and we apprehend, further, that this heroic effort in the present century will be facilitated by a study of the men who broke away from denominationalism in the last century. The study of Luther's life probably never led anyone back to Catholicism, and we venture to say that no alarmist was ever ingenious enough to conceive a fear that the establishment of the Luther Museum at Wittenberg would undo the work of the great reformer. The life and times of the Campbells and their associates make a mighty poor course of study for the development of sectarianism.—EDITOR.]

On Trial to New Subscribers.

New York Letter.

By S. T. Willis.

All the churches of the Disciples have reopened their services since the vacation with renewed energy and interest. The work on 169th street is hopeful and the outlook is bright with promise. The New York district of the C. W. B. M. held its quarterly meeting at this church, September 10 with Mrs. E. T. Rummell in the chair. The reports were encouraging, the social features pleasing and the address, by Bro. M. E. Harlan, was inspiring. The New York district of the C. W. B. M. is doing good work. Bro. W. M. Taylor and wife sailed from this city Sept. 17, via the steamship "California" for Porto Rico, where they will represent the A. C. M. S. at the San Juan mission, in place of J. A. Erwin, who has resigned. Bro. Taylor preached for us at the 169th street church Lord's day evening, September 15. He will faithfully present the gospel to that benighted and needy people. Bro. J. M. Philputt, of the 119th street church, has sufficiently recovered to preach once a week to his people. We sincerely hope he may soon enjoy the fulness of health again. The union affected by the fusion of the Kensington and Flatbush missions has been dissolved. The Rev. John Smeltzer, the pastor, and a part of the people have started an independent church. Some of the Disciples have gone back to Kensington and revived the work in that place. It is to be regretted that these good people could not maintain the union of forces in the Flatbush district of Brooklyn.

Dr. John H. Kellogg, of Battle Creek, Mich., who has been experimenting for years in the education of "slum children" was in New York recently and, in discussing the subject, had many hopeful things to say about this important question. Dr. Kellogg believes that environment is more potent as an educational force in the molding of life and character than heredity. Slum children have no chance. Every circumstance in their lives is against hoping anything for them. The child that inherits a predisposition to evil from morally incapable parents has, in almost every instance, evil surroundings too that enter into its life and thought. The evil propensities are fed by evil environments. The child's brain resembles that of its father as much as his eyes, his figure, his voice and his conduct are likely to be similar, for precisely the same reasons. A child born with a small chest and lungs is predisposed to pulmonary consumption, but by removing him to the proper atmospheric conditions and surroundings this hereditary bias may be obliterated. So a child with a natural inclination to theft may be saved from becoming a criminal and be brought up to a useful manhood by the elevating influence of a Christian home. Some of the bitterest fruit of sin is in the fact that the iniquity of the father is visited upon the children to the third and fourth generation. But the blessed truth of the gospel is that Christ can save to the uttermost all who come unto God by him.

Some of the most surprising exhibitions of superstition and religious credulity were seen recently in this city, before the shrine of the relic of St. Anne in the little church of St. Jean Baptiste. The relic, said to be a part of the forearm of the Virgin Mary's mother, was brought to this country in 1892. Several days ago, when a new shrine for this relic was dedicated, it is estimated that 3,000 persons suffering bodily ills presented themselves in the church to be healed. They came in succession to the altar, bowed and kissed the glass case covering the bone of St. Anne as it was passed to them by a priest, who also touched it to the afflicted parts of the body. The holy fathers in charge of this holy bone explained that only those shriven of their sins, through confession and penance, could hope to be healed and blessed by the intercession of St. Anne and the Virgin Mary! When will poor, deluded souls learn that Christ alone is the soul's physician? Surely ignorance is the mother of superstition.

The Rev. John McKim, Episcopal bishop of Japan, said in a recent interview in this city that religious awakening in Japan, of which we have heard so much, can hardly be regarded as of permanent benefit. Some years ago there was a similar movement but it soon died out. The Japanese are a very excitable race. They are quickly brought to a religious white heat, and cool off again almost as quickly. As a rule, after a revival movement, the percentage of those falling away from Christianity is larger than the gains made. Success in missionary work depends largely upon the proper organization and the system of management. For that reason the Methodists in Japan are more successful than the Baptists. Congregationalists are not making the progress that they made some years ago, for their policy seems to be one of disintegration and many of their converts become rationalists.

A very shrewd writer subscribing himself "Observer" has been visiting a number of the famous churches of New York and writing for one of the great dailies his impressions of the preachers and churches. The most glowing description and the highest commendation of the whole series were given to Dr. Edward Judson and the excellent service being rendered by his church—the Judson Memorial. "Observer" speaks of the romance in Judson's life—his famous father and his famous missionary work; he then tells of his "soft place" in an Orange, N. J., church and then proceeds to show that the great impulse that moved his father to go to Burmah, moved the son also to take up foreign mission work in lower New York. The Judson Memorial, in a certain sense, is the greatest institutional church in New York. It is a worthy, living monument built by a devoted son to the memory of a truly famous father. "Observer" says if Dr. Judson were not a preacher he would be an author to whom publishers would pay fabulous royalties. He is a good preacher and the Lord will take care of the royalties.

"I did not sleep a night for seven long weeks."

That prolonged period of sleeplessness is most expressive of the pain and suffering caused by womanly diseases.

It is pleasant to contrast the medical inefficiency which said "I could not be cured" with the prompt and permanent cure effected by the use of Doctor

Pierce's Favorite Prescription. This great medicine for women establishes regularity, dries enfeebling drains, heals inflammation and ulceration and cures female weakness.

"I take great pleasure in recommending Dr. Pierce's medicines to other suffering women," writes Mrs. Mary Adams, of Grassycreek, Ashe Co., N. C. "I had internal trouble very badly until it resulted in ulcers of the uterus. I was troubled with it so that I did not sleep a night for seven long weeks. The doctors said I could not be cured, but I commenced taking Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription and 'Pleasant Pellets.' After taking two bottles I could sleep all night, and after taking six bottles of 'Favorite Prescription' and two of 'Golden Medical Discovery' and three vials of 'Pleasant Pellets' my case was cured. I had told my husband that I would have to die, as it seemed I could not live. He told me to put faith in Dr. Pierce's medicines, for it had cured others and would cure me. So it did, and I thank God and your medicine for saving my life."

Dr. Pierce's Common Sense Medical Adviser, 1008 large pages, is sent free on receipt of stamps to pay expense of mailing only. Send 31 one-cent stamps for the book in cloth binding, or only 21 stamps for the paper covered volume. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

Popular Hymns No. 2

THE ruling purpose of the author has been to give to the public a worthy successor of Popular Hymns. He has not sought to duplicate it, but to make a book as well adapted to the new methods of Church, Sunday-school and C. E. work as the first was to the conditions twenty years ago when Popular Hymns was launched upon its long and useful career. Popular Hymns No. 2 is better than its predecessor, not because it contains better music, but because the music is better adapted to the present wants of all the working forces of the church.

EVANGELISTS will find the Gospel Proclamation in Song a department of the book eminently suited to every phase of a successfully conducted revival.

SINGING EVANGELISTS will be pleased with the analytical classification, enabling them without reference to indices to find a suitable song on a moment's warning.

CHORISTERS will find the average choir supplied with a rich selection of beautiful and impressive solos with choruses, duets, quartettes, invocations, etc., especially selected for the distinctive part a choir is expected to take in the service.

PASTORS who are responsible for the kind of pasture upon which the sheep and lambs are fed, will not find a sentiment out of harmony with New Testament Christianity. He will find a companion vade mecum for his pocket Testament, containing gems for public worship, for the prayer-meeting for funeral occasions, for Baptismal, Thanksgiving and Convention services.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVORERS will find in Popular Hymns No. 2 all that they can wish, because it is full from back to back with soul-stirring sentiment set to soul-inspiring music, the only kind C. E.'s care to sing.

S. S. SUPERINTENDENTS will find Popular Hymns No. 2 richly supplied with music within the voice compass and heart reach of the children, giving them a desire to remain and participate in the song service of the church. Like its predecessors, Popular Hymns No. 2 is an

Texas Letter.

"Uncle Charlie" Carlton, of Bonham, is eighty years young. On the occasion of his birthday the ladies of his congregation wrote him a beautiful "love letter" and accompanied it with eighty dollars and asked him to spend it in going to the Minneapolis convention—a tender and deserved remembrance. If you would know how to grow old peacefully and usefully, study the life of this splendid man.

F. M. Campbell, our El Paso pastor, is responsible for the startling statement that when the thermometer in that city was 108 he was on the summit of Cloud Croft, 40 miles away "sitting by fire and clad in heavy winter garb." The mountain is 9,000 feet high and was destined to fame as a summer resort.

John L. Andrews is making strenuous efforts to build a good church at Mineral Wells, and he is the kind of man that seldom fails. This is an important place and we hope he will succeed. He is our church-building man under the Mission Board.

B. Faulkner is a modest, worthy and useful man. Most of his life has been spent in Collin county, and many are the people he has led to Christ. His chief ambition is not to preach great sermons, or be known as a great man, but to tell the sweet story of a Savior's love and lead men to him.

B. B. Sanders has just closed a fine meeting at De Kalb. This is a new place for us and the prospect is that we will soon have a good church there. A. J. Faris, the merchant-preacher, did the seed-sowing.

W. H. Tipton is to have a new house. C. A. Lee and John A. Lincoln recently closed a great meeting near there and this is one of the best results.

Walter P. Jennings and the Frost brethren have scored a victory for the Lord. There were 25 additions and they enter their new house with much joy. Prof. Eskridge, of Addicks, is their pastor but could not be with them in this work.

Volney Johnson, of Amarillo, has closed his vacation of one month. Like many others he spent it in evangelizing and it was a success—92 additions. We are rejoiced to hear him say: "God has restored me to health and given me my best year's work."

B. B. Sanders has again been induced to do the work of corresponding secretary which he voluntarily resigned at our last convention. He has been eminently successful in his work, and the church of the state will rejoice at this good news because it is a guarantee that the cause of missions will now go on new life and vigor. We have other splendid men in the field, but none of them had the experience necessary to handle the varied interests of this broad field.

There is no longer plain "C. McPherson," as we used to write the name of the Ft. Worth pastor. A change has come over the spirit of his dreams and it is now "Chalmers McPherson." This may be all right, but it doesn't sound natural, and I feel like kicking against it and hoping that everybody else will join in the kick so that the attempted change will fail. For a long time we were used to plain "A. McLean," and many of us had not the faintest idea what that "A." stood for and we didn't care, for the name of our great secretary was all right. But finally from some cause, I knew not what, that "A." expanded and we had "Archibald McLean." The people kicked at it generally and vigorously that the new name failed. So may it in this case.

There is a story which should be passed around. When Buchanan was President, Hon. J. B. Thompson was in his cabinet. Mr. Thompson's mother-in-law was a Hardshell Baptist and her preacher was Bro. Meadows, of Oxford, Miss., the home of Mr. Thompson. The statesman and preacher were fast friends. Bro. Meadows went on a preaching tour north and while there he wrote his friend in Washington that he would call on his return,

Mr. Thompson happened to mention the matter at a cabinet meeting and instantly the President and the whole cabinet expressed a desire to see a real live Hardshell preacher and Mr. Thompson was asked to give them that pleasure, which he did very soon. Mr. Thompson, when he came, took him to a cabinet meeting and introduced him to all the members. In two minutes the preacher was master of the situation and leading the conversation. Soon Mr. Buchanan remarked, "I believe, Mr. Meadows, your people immerse." "Yes," replied the preacher. "I think you are right in that," continued the President. Instantly Mr. Meadows asked, "Mr. President, are you a Christian?" "Yes," was the reply. "Have you been immersed?" probed the preacher. "No, my church does not practice immersion, though I think you have the Scriptures on that subject," answered the President. In great astonishment Mr. Meadows responded, "What! Do you mean to say that you believe Christ commanded immersion and yet as one of his followers you refuse to obey him?" The President had to admit that was the real state of the case. Then the preacher clinched the nail he had driven so well by adding, "Mr. President, I voted for you as a good democrat, and my idea is that a democrat stands for the constitution and with him it is an end of all controversy. I'm afraid I can't vote for you any more. A man who accepts Jesus Christ as the Son of God and his Savior and king with all authority, and will not obey him will not obey the constitution unless it suits his convenience." The argument was a regular sledge hammer knock out, and the President was flat on his back and nobody could help him. His curiosity was settled, for he had now both seen and felt a real live Hardshell preacher.

J. B. Sweeny, of Gainesville, has typhoid fever, and many are the prayers for his recovery.

Add-Ran University has the best opening in her history this year. Every room is filled and the outlook is all that could be desired. One year ago there were but two young ladies on opening day, this year there were thirty-eight and others coming on almost every train. The cash receipts of last opening day were $645 40, this year they are $2,005.25. Let these two eloquent facts tell the story of growth and victory and encourage the friends of the school in their noble work.

Chicago Letter.

The Chicago Disciples will go to the Minneapolis convention over the Chicago & Northwestern route. The delegation from here promises to be larger than any former one. A fellowship meeting will be enjoyed on the way. Such speakers as J. H. O. Smith, J. W. Allen, E. L. Powell, A. M. Harvuot, etc., are expected to participate. If the Minneapolis convention is not largely attended the blame will rest elsewhere than on the Minneapolis committee. It has been untiring in its work. The first convention train will leave Chicago Thursday, 10 A. M., arriving in Minneapolis in time for part of the first session. The route was chosen by the Ministerial Association of this city.

For some time negotiations have been proceeding concerning a union of the West Side and Union churches. Last Sunday a vote was taken in the Union church, resulting in 159 favoring the union and 107 opposing. The passive members were requested not to vote. It is urged by the advocates of union that all ought to abide by the three-fifths majority. The opposition say that 159 votes out of a church with so large a membership is not a large vote. Both churches are burdened to meet their financial obligations. Both cover the same territory. One great church would be preferable to two struggling ones, but owing to the different views in methods and character of work to be done, two distinct organizations will doubtless always continue to be. There are people enough for two if they can be reached. Those voting against the union have arranged to continue the work in the People's Institute. Roland A. Nichols, pastor of the Union church, becomes pastor of the united church, which will not be known longer as the West Side church, but which, on account of there being seven churches on the West Side, will assume a more local designation.

T. S. Tinsley has resigned the pastorate of the North Side church. Bro. Tinsley has made a warm place for himself in the hearts of the Chicago people. He came to a church unusually burdened with debt and has not been able to see his way to relieve it. No censure rests upon him.

Two good stories were told at the session of the National Young People's Union which met here recently. As the stories indicate the convention was predominantly conservative, at least in its utterance. Dr. Weeks, of Toronto, in upholding the infallibility of the Scriptures said: A salvation army lassie riding on the train was engaged in conversation by a higher crit; who abruptly said, "You don't believe all the Bible, do you?"

"Yes, indeed," replied the disciple of Booth, "I believe every word of it."

"Well, do you believe that story about Jonah?"

"Yes, I believe that as I believe all the rest."

"Well, tell me now, how the whale could swallow Jonah?"

"I do not know; but when I get to heaven I will ask Jonah and find out."

"Suppose Jonah is not in heaven?" urged the higher critic.

"Well," replied the lassie, "if he is not in heaven then you can ask him."

Another divine who had a grudge against the lack of enthusiasm of the ordinary seminary professor told this story: A lassie of the Volunteers turned to the man sitting next to her on the street car and said: "My brother, are you a Christian?"

"Why," said the lofty man, "I am a professor in a theological seminary."

"Well, my dear brother," replied the earnest girl, "I would not allow that to stand in the way of being a Christian a moment."

Hugh T. Morrison, Jr., a promising graduate of Drake University, who for the past year has been associate pastor and preacher with his brother, C. C. Morrison, of the Munroe Street church, is compelled on account of throat trouble to give up preaching, perhaps permanently; at least for a year or two. This is a severe trial and we all deeply sympathize with him.

The Munroe Street church, which will be our handsomest church in Chicago, will be dedicated about November 1. It will cost nearly $20,000.

Deafness Cannot be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube! When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

ILLINOIS.

Eureka, Sept. 17.—Closed a three weeks' meeting at St. Augustine, in which there were 20 accessions, 19 by confession. I was ably assisted by B. H. Sealock, a fellow-student, as leader of song.—W. H. KINDRED.

LeRoy, Sept. 17.—I have been unanimously called for a third year here. There have been 76 accessions during the past two years. Our Sunday-school has doubled during the past year; we now have the largest Sunday-school in town. I am now in a meeting with the church at Holder. Bro. W. O. Lappin is pastor.—F. A. SWORD, minister.

Pleasant Hill, Sept. 23.—Four confessions and four by statement to date. Twelve trial subscriptions to the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST. I consider the latter effective work in a protracted meeting, for our present membership is more hopeful if we can convert them to taking a good, Christian paper.—J. S. CLEMENS.

Thomson, Sept. 16.—We had union services with the Baptist brethren last night. I baptized a young lady after the service.—C. C. CARPENTER, minister.

Watseka, Sept. 16.—There have been 35 additions to this congregation in the last 34 weeks, mostly by primary obedience; a young man received by letter last Lord's day. Our Junior and Intermediate Endeavorers have long been supporting an orphan girl in India, and now our senior society agrees to look after a boy at Damoh. We want to be well represented at Minneapolis.—BENJ. S. FERRALL.

Winchester, Sept. 21.—I closed my first year's work with the church here last Lord's day with 93 additions in all. Sixty-four of these are conversions. Recently the auditorium has been newly carpeted and redecorated, besides a number of other improvements on the property. The outlook for the coming year is hopeful.—J. H. SMART.

Woodhull.—Closed my work at Blooming Grove, Sept. 15. Our last meeting was the best. Two additions by obedience. Successor chosen. I labor now at Woodhull and Kewanee, Ill.—CHAS. W. MARLOW.

IOWA.

Akron, Sept. 15.—We have had a fearful struggle here, but we're gaining ground at last. Since Aug. 20 eight have confessed Christ (one of these to-night) and the two others have come to us from sectism, having been formerly immersed. Five of these are young men, and one a middle-aged man, father of a large family. The fact that we once established here and the work went back, and the building was secured to the Catholics, rather hurts, and the fact that the Catholics now hold a mortgage on our property is one of the things that sadly interferes with our progress. But we trust that we will get that mortgage out of their hands Dec. 1, and then we will have a better standing.—R. D. McCANOE.

Collins, Sept. 22.—Meeting three weeks old, seven additions; three confessions, one by statement, one each from Presbyterians, Evangelical and German Baptists. We continue at least one week longer.—T. S. AND J. J. HANDSAKER.

Corning, Sept. 23.—One confession last evening. This makes four added since our last report. We expect to begin a protracted meeting November 1, if we can secure a singer for November. Our audiences are splendid and have been all summer. The Corning church is the best running church I ever worked for. We have home department and cradle roll in Sunday school.—I. H. FULLER.

Des Moines, Sept. 16.—Two were added to the East Side Church yesterday morning; two others were baptized in the evening. The services were very bright and full of life. We were especially pleased to notice a large number of strange men in the audience. We are trying to realize the fact that our beloved pastor has decided to leave us and continue his work in the field at Houston, Tex.—NELLIE G. HUSBAND.

Scranton, Sept. 17.—I have engaged with the church at Scranton, Ia., for the coming year and find them a fine people. On my visit with them last Lord's day had two additions, one by confession and baptism and one restored; both heads of families.—R. M. BAILEY.

Whitten, Sept. 17.—We had three confessions at our services here Lord's day. I am on my fourth year with the church here at Whitten.—EUGENE CURLESS.

KANSAS.

Erie, Sept. 21.—Had a very busy day here yesterday. Four accessions at the morning service and drove nine miles in the country to an appointment at three P. M. Returned and performed a marriage ceremony for the organist of our Bible-school at five P. M., and then conducted the evening service before a very large and attentive audience.—CLAUDE O. McFARLAND.

Potwin, Sept. 16.—Sister Clara H. Hazelrigg just closed five weeks of labor with the church at this place, and as a result of her faithful presentation of the truth 53 were added to the Lord; 37 of which were by confession and baptism and 16 by letter and statement. The meetings will continue for a few days under the pastor. Sister Hazelrigg is one of the most able exponents of the word it has ever been our lot to labor with in the Lord's work.—NEAL OVERMAN.

Seneca, Sept. 23.—Two accessions to the church here yesterday. One by primary obedience and the other reclaimed.—F. H. BENTLEY.

MISSOURI.

Harris, Sept. 12.—One addition to the church at Harris by primary obedience and one at Lucerne by relation.—R. W. BLUNT.

Kansas City, Sept. 18.—Closed our meeting at Second Creek Church with seven added.—ELMER T. DAVIS.

Paynesville, Sept. 20.—One confession at Eolia at my last appointment. I have resigned the work at Paynesville, Eolia and Annada to begin work under the state board of Illinois about Nov. 1. My wife, Belle Ford-Walton, who is quite generally known as a musician and singer, will work with me as conductor of song and soloist. We have a plan which will help weak churches to pay for meetings. Churches desiring meetings may address us here or through Secretary J. Fred Jones, Bloomington, Ill. We can hold a few meetings outside of the state.—J. ORVILLE WALTON.

St. Louis, Sept. 23.—The following items were reported at the meeting of the St. Louis Christian ministers this morning: First Church, John L. Brandt pastor, nine additions. Compton Heights, C. N. Crutcher pastor, two additions. Second Church, W. Daviess Pittman pastor, one addition. Fourth Church, E. T. MacFarland pastor, two additions by letter. NEW TESTAMENT COMMENTARIES

During the past two years there has developed among the Christian people of America a great revival of interest in the study of the Bible. Never before in the history of Christianity were so many people zealously and earnestly studying the Bible, endeavoring to know more of its contents and its meaning. Everywhere there are being organized classes and clubs for Bible study. In consequence of this movement there is a brisk demand for Bible helps—books that have hitherto been sold chiefly to preachers. The people are inquiring for the best commentaries and exegetical works to aid them in their study of the Bible. We are glad to be able to announce that we are fully prepared to supply Bible students with the best books to meet their requirements. A few of these we list here:

COMMENTARY ON MATTHEW AND MARK. By J. W. MCGARVEY. A volume of 392 pages, cloth-bound. The former price ($2.00) has been reduced to $1.50.

COMMENTARY ON LUKE. By J. S. LAMAR. A splendid book by a grand man. Cloth, 333 pages. Reduced from $2.00 to $1.50.

COMMENTARY ON JOHN. By B. W. JOHNSON, the well-known commentator. This is a cloth-bound volume of 328 pages. Price reduced to $1.50.

STUDIES IN ACTS. By W. J. LHAMON. One of the finest works of recent years. Bound in cloth; 420 pages; price, $1.25.

COMMENTARY ON ROMANS. By MOSES E. LARD. A book of 485 pages, bound in cloth. Price, recently reduced, is now $2.00.

COMMENTARY ON HEBREWS. The author, R. MILLIGAN, was one of our most gifted men. Cloth, 395 pages. The reduced price is now $1.50.

PEOPLE'S NEW TESTAMENT WITH NOTES. By B. W. JOHNSON. Two volumes. Vol. I. contains the Four Gospels and Acts; Vol. II. covers the Epistles and Revelation. A concise, but complete work, of as much practical value to the average man as a commentary in 15 volumes costing $30.00. Bound in cloth. Price, per volume, $2.00; per set, $4.00.

Please note that former prices of these works have been reduced 25 per cent. Many thousand copies were sold at the original prices, but we desire that many more thousands shall have the help and benefit of the thought and genius of these eminent Bible scholars. In the case of a class, club or association organized for Bible study, we suggest that a fund be raised to purchase this list of books, and other works, for the joint use of the members. A full description of the volumes in the above list will be found in our 100-page General Catalogue, mailed free on receipt of request. Address,

Popular Hymns No. 2

THE ruling purpose of the author has been to give to the public a worthy successor of Popular Hymns. He has not sought to duplicate it, but to make a book as well adapted to the new methods of Church, Sunday-school and C. E. work as the first was to the conditions twenty years ago when Popular Hymns was launched upon its long and useful career. Popular Hymns No. 2 is better than its predecessor, not because it contains better music, but because the music is better adapted to the present wants of all the working forces of the army of the Lord.

EVANGELISTS will find the Gospel Proclamation in Song a department of the book eminently suited to every phase of a successfully conducted revival.

CHORISTERS will find the average choir supplied with a rich selection of beautiful and impressive solos with choruses, duets, quartettes, invocations and doxologies specially selected for the distinctive part a choir is expected to take in the service.

PASTORS who are responsible for the kind of pasture upon which the sheep and lambs are fed, will NOT find a sentiment out of harmony with New Testament Christianity. He will find it a companion vade mecum for his pocket Testament, containing gems for public worship, for the prayer-meeting, for funeral occasions, for Baptismal, Thanksgiving and Convention services. He will find that an expensive hymnal will not be needed unless it be to keep in the style.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVORERS will find in Popular Hymns No. 2 all that they can wish, because it is full from back to back with soul-stirring sentiment set to soul-inspiring music, the only kind C. E.'s care to sing. The Solos, Duets, and Quartettes may be impressively used to enrich every session of the Society.

S. S. SUPERINTENDENTS who believe the Sunday-school should be the nursery of the church, the church at work saving the young, will find Popular Hymns No. 2 richly supplied with music within the voice compass and heart reach of the children, giving them a desire to remain and participate in the song service of the church. Like its predecessor,

The following poem, which refers to the execution of President Garfield's assassin, was written by Rossiter Johnson, and was published originally in the New York Sun in June, 1882:

Yes, hang him, of course! He deserves to rise

Where his heels may dangle o'er Haman's head,

At least we shall have one scoundrel the less,

Conveniently crazed in his fiendishness,
To walk our streets in an innocent guise,
With his hidden pistol and stealthy tread.

But when we have hanged him, what comes then?

Had he any confederates? Let us see!

For the law is imperfect and lame at best,

And censure's weight should be made to rest

On as many as possible, women or men.

Who've assisted in breaking its just decree.

When a youth the Ephesian temple fired,

That his name, as he said, might live thro' time,

'Twas decreed that it never be written or spoken—

A law by the chroniclers quickly broken,
Who've given him all that he desired,

And offered his chosen reward for crime.

Thus you, the historians, you are to blame.

You offered this fellow a heavy bribe:

If he'll only compass a shameful deed,

A sickening sorrow to all who read,

You'd give him something as good as fame
To any one of his vulgar tribe.

Then you, the reporters, hungry for news,

And nibbling at nothings for printed prate,

You've dosed us to death with his nauseous name,

With how he looks, and whence he came,
And what he drinks, and how he chews,

Till the simple reader thinks him great.

* * * * *

When a few more years bring another such blow,

And the head of the nation lies in state,

While door-posts are darkened and songs are stilled,

While our streets with the emblems of mourning are filled,

While we follow the funeral, sad and slow,

We shall think of these things, God help us! too late.

A Titian in Mexico.

Mr. Hopkinson Smith has told in "A White Umbrella in Mexico" of a magnificent painting hidden away in the parish church of an Indian village far in the western part of Mexico. Tradition says that it is by Titian and that it was sent as a present by Charles V or Philip II of Spain to the Spanish noble who, not long after the conquest of Mexico, had been made bishop of Tzintzuntzan. It was then believed that this place was destined to be the center of the new civilization in Mexico, but these hopes have not been realized and to day it is only an obscure village of Indians who jealously and superstitiously guard the treasure which they have inherited. Mr. Hopkinson Smith believes that this "Entombment" is not only a genuine Titian, but one of the ablest works of that master.

Within the last few weeks, says the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, the inhabitants of the little hamlet of Tzintzuntzan, in the State of Michoacan, Mexico, have been very much exercised over the mysterious actions of two strangers, whose comings and goings to their parish church have caused them much anxiety.

The advent of strangers to this lake hamlet is not in itself so wonderful, for artists, savants and the obnoxious tourists have all braved the discomforts of the trip to view the wonderful art treasure hidden away in its old church.

Strange as it may seem, in the sacristy of the parish church, in what was one of the most inaccessible and out-of-the-way parts of the republic a few years ago, until its fame made it a mecca for tourists, hangs an "Entombment" by Titian.

Fabulous sums have been offered for this painting. The bishop of Mexico not long ago made a bid of 20,000 pesetas for it—a sum of money which would have made each native richer than an Aztec Prince—but the offer was indignantly refused. It has been said that sooner than willingly allow the picture to leave the hamlet the Indians would destroy it.

In the early part of June, so my host in Pascuaro told me, two men arrived in the town and engaged rooms at the hotel. Their first move was to go out to Tzintzuntzan to view the Titian. There was nothing so wonderful in this, but their subsequent actions aroused the suspicions of the natives, who are always on the qui vive for some harm to their beloved painting. Each man watched the other. If one went to the hamlet by the apology for a steamer which plies up and down Lake Pascuaro when the spirit moves it, the other would start at once for the same place on horseback. They are feeling the pulse of the people through the padre. If one opens a bottle of rare wine for his holiness' delectation, the other immediately has the hotel chief prepare some delicacy unobtainable in Tzintzuntzan, wherewith to tickle his palate.

It is said that one man has offered $100,000 for the masterpiece, and that the other has raised him $25,000. They are bidding against each other quietly. A rumor is afloat in Mexico City that the men represent two American millionaires, and the possibilities are that the Titian may soon hang on the walls of a Fifth avenue palace.

The village of Tzintzuntzan lies at the foot of the hills which slope back from the northern end of Lake Pascuaro. Although almost incredible of belief, in view of the present condition of dilapidation and decay, Tzintzuntzan was once the capital of the independent kingdom of Michoacan. It was an important city, and called in the days of Cortes Huitzitzila. It was formerly the residence of the monarch Calsousi, who was an ally of Cortes, and, with his Indian subjects, assisted him in the Mexican war.

It would be impossible for any white man to live in the hamlet, which consists of the ruins of the houses which once marked its importance among cities. The streets run at right angles. High walls are broken by great fissures, through which may be seen ruined tenements, overgrown with weeds and tangled vines, mute witnesses of the story of this deserted town.

A path leads from the beach, which widens into a broad road as it crosses the hill, over which can be seen the spire of the church. This is beaten down by many feet and marks the daily life of the natives—from the church, to pray, to the shore, to fish. With the exception of shaping some crude pottery there is absolutely no other means of support.

And it is amid such poverty, and guard so jealously by a half-starving population that Titian's "Entombment" hangs.

The description of the painting, the reasons why it must be a Titian and its history are given as follows by an eminent critic:

"My first thought was of its marvelous preservation. More than 300 years have elapsed since the great master touched it and yet one is deluded into the belief that it was painted but yesterday, so fresh and pure and rich is its color. This is no doubt due to the climate and to the clear air circulating through the open window.

"The picture is an 'Entombment,' sixty feet long by seven feet high. Surrounding the dead Christ wrapped in a winding sheet one end of which is held in the teeth of a disciple, stand the Virgin, Magdalen, St. John, and nine other figures, all life size. In the upper left-hand corner is a bit of blue sky, against which is relieved an Italian villa—the painter's own, a caprice of Titian's often seen in his later works.

"The high lights fall upon the arm of the Savior, drooping from the hammock-shaped sheet in which he is carried, and upon the head-covering of the Virgin bending over him. A secondary light is found in a patch of blue sky. To the right and behind a group of disciples the shadows are interlarded, relieving the rich tones of the browns and blues of the draperies, and the flesh tones, for which the painter is famous. The exquisite drawing of each figure, the gradation of light and shade, the marvelous composition, the relief and modeling of Christ, the low, but luminous tones in which it is painted, the superb harmony of these tones, all pronounce it the work of a master.

"The questions naturally arise, Is it by Titian? And, if so, how came it here in an Indian village in the center of Mexico? And why has it been lost all these years to the art world?

"To the first I answer, If not by Titian, who, then, of his time could paint it? The second is easier: Until the railroads of the last few years opened up the country Michoacan's isolation was complete.

"A slight resume of the history of the surroundings may shed some light on the question. After the ruin wrought in

The bite of the mosquito is responsible for very many cases of malaria. The best known cure is Yucatan Chill Tonic (Improved). It neutralizes the poison, purifies the blood, and strengthens the whole system. You get more curative properties in one dose of Yucatan than in six doses of the so-called tasteless tonics. Michoacan in the early part of the sixteenth century by the evil acts of Nino de Guzman—the president of the first Audiencia—terminating in the burning of the Tarascan chief of Sinzicha, the people, maddened with terror, fled to the mountains around Tzintzuntzan and refused to return to their homes.

"To remedy these evils the Emperor Charles V selected the members of the second Audiencia from among the wisest and best men of Spain. One of these was an intimate friend of the emperor, an eminent lawyer, the Licenciado Vasco de Quiroga. Having come to Mexico in the year 1533 he visited the depopulated town and with admirable patience, gentleness and love, prevailed on the terror-stricken Indians to have faith in him and return to their homes.

"The bishopric of Michoacan was then founded and this miter was offered to Quiroga, though he was then a layman. Hereupon Quiroga took holy orders, and, having been raised quickly through the successive grades of priesthood, was consecrated a bishop and took possession of his see in the church of San Francisco, in Tzintzuntzan, August 22, 1548.

"He was then 68 years old. As bishop he completed the conquest through love that he had begun while yet a layman. He established schools of letters and the arts; introduced manufactures of copper and other metals; imported from Spain cattle and seeds for acclimatization; founded hospitals and established the first university of New Spain, that of San Nicolas, now in Morelia.

"When Philip II ascended the throne the good deeds of the holy bishop had reached his ears, and the power and growth of his reign had deeply touched the heart of the devout monarch, awakening in his mind a deep interest in the welfare of the church at Tzintzuntzan and Pascuaro.

"During this period the royal palaces at Madrid were filled with the finest pictures of Titian, and the royal family of Spain formed the subjects of his best portraits. The Emperor Charles V had been, and was then, one of the master's most liberal patrons. He had made him a count, heaped upon him distinguished honors and had been visited by him twice at Augsburg and once at Bologna, where he painted his portrait.

"It is even claimed by some biographers that by special invitation of his royal patron Titian visited Spain about the year 1550 and was entertained with great splendor at the court. Moreover, it is well known that he was granted a pension, and that he was kept up by Philip until the painter's death.

"Remembering the dates at which these events took place, the fanatical zeal of Philip and his interest in the distant church, deemed and made glorious by Quiroga, the friend and protege of his royal predecessor, the possible presence of Titian at the court at the time, certainly the influence of his masterpieces, together with the fact that the subject of this picture was a favorite one with him (notably the 'Embarkment,' in Venice, and the replica at the Louvre), it is quite within the range of probability that Philip either ordered this special picture from the master himself or selected it from the royal collection.

"It is quite improbable, in view of the above facts, that the royal donor would have sent the work of an inferior painter, representing it to be by Titian, or a copy by one of his pupils.

"Another distinguishing feature, and by far the most conclusive, is its handling. Without strong contrasting tones of color, Titian worked out a peculiar golden mellow tone—which of itself exercises a magical charm—and divided it into innumerable small but significant shades, producing thereby a most complete illusion of life. This Titianesque quality is particularly marked in the nude body of the Christ, the flesh appearing to glow with a hidden light."

The room in which the Titian hangs is about thirty feet long by twenty wide, with a high ceiling of straight, square rafters. The floor is paved in great squares of marble, laid diagonally. The walls are seamed, cracked and weather-stained.

The only opening besides the door is a large window, protected on the outside by three sets of iron gratings, on the inside by double wooden shutters. The window is devoid of glass. The only articles of furniture are a round table, with curved legs, occupying the center of the room; a towel rack and towel hung on the wall, and a row of wooden drawers, built like a bureau, completely filling the end of the room opposite the door. Over this are hung, or, rather, fitted, the three sides of a huge carved frame, which was once gilded—the space is not high enough to admit the top piece. Inside the frame glows the famous painting.

To appreciate the difficulties attendant upon the taking of a photograph one must remember that though a brilliant Mexican sunlight was flooding the dreary town, the interior of the picture-room was in a deep twilight, save for the shafts of golden light streaming in through the grated window.

An Inverted Fable.

"Now," said the Big Buck Deer to his eldest born, "I will show you a sight that you never saw before and I am so proud of that I feel like walking around on my hind legs all the rest of my life."

"Why!" said the fawn, "it is a man, as I live!"

"Yes," said the fawn's proud parent, dragging out the carcass from behind a tree, "and now, like a good little deer, run and get me my sharpest knife, while I skin him and prepare his head for a dining room ornament. And shall I tell you how your papa did such a brave deed? Then listen, my son. This morning, in company with my faithful bloodhounds, I tracked the man through the forest, drove him into the lake, having first ascertained that he was unarmed, and then, as he was swimming about almost exhausted, I put forth in my canoe and shot him at leisure in a vital spot where it wouldn't show."

Moral: "But, papa," said the fawn, "the man had no chance at all against your skill and science. I don't see anything brave to be proud of."

"But you will," said the Big Buck Deer, "when you get to be as big as I am."—New York Life.

A Lesson for the Crown Prince.

As a child, says Collier's Weekly, the young crown prince of Germany possessed a very exalted opinion of his own importance as heir to the throne, of which his younger brothers were frequently the victims. Admonitions, threats, nothing availed with him. He grew daily more exacting and captious; and when poor Eitel Fritz, the second son, rebelled, he paid the penalty in well-administered cuffs. The emperor appeared unexpectedly in the play-room one day, and finding Fritz in tears, demanded the cause.

"He wouldn't obey me," replied his heir, "and so I punished him, because I'm crown prince."

"Haven't I forbidden you to strike your brothers?" asked his father.

The young culprit nodded assent. The emperor, without a word, stretched him across his knee and administered as sound a spanking as ever youngster, royal or otherwise, received.

"There," he concluded, "I've whipped you because you wouldn't obey me, and I'm emperor."

Peace reigned for some days afterward.

His First Recorded Victory.

The following incident in the life of General Thomas J. Jackson, which, I believe, has never been given to the public, but which I had several times from the lips of my venerable uncle, Mr. Conrad Kester, who lived at Weston, in Lewis county, Va. (now West Virginia), some three miles above the "Old Cummins Jackson Mills," where young Jackson lived with his uncle, will serve to show that those sterling qualities of head and heart which so characterized his life in after years were innate in the boy, and even at the early age of ten years his high sense of honor and keen perception of right fixed in his mind so high a standard of morality that he could not easily be induced to lower it.

At the time mentioned, the West Fork river, on whose banks stood the old mill, was well stocked with fish, among which none was sought after so eagerly as that noble game fish called the "pike." "Tom," as he was familiarly called, partially supplied the demands of the limited fish market at the little village of Weston.

One day Tom proposed to Mr. Kester that he would let him have all the pike he caught a foot in length or over at the price of fifty cents each. Mr. Kester accepted the proposition, so the solemn compact was concluded.

Tom continued to perform his contract faithfully, and sold Kester every pike he caught of the "regulation length," until one day he was seen by Colonel Talbott going through town, making straight for Kester's, bending under the weight of a pike thirty-eight inches in length, when the following colloquy took place:

"Hello, Tom. That's a fine fish you have. I want to buy it."

Tom, without apparent interest in what the colonel was saying, and without halting, laconically replied:

"Sold to Mr. Kester."

"That can't be. You have not seen Mr. Kester. I will give you a dollar for it."

"I tell you it is sold, and is not mine to sell."

"What is Mr. Kester to give you for it?" "Fifty cents."

"I'll give you a dollar and a quarter for it."

Tom cast upon him an indignant look, and remarked: "If you get any of this pike, you will get it from Mr. Kester."

On presenting the fish to Mr. Kester that gentleman said: "Tom, this is a splendid pike. I think I shall have to give you a dollar for it; fifty cents is not enough."

Tom replied: "No, sir; that is your pike at fifty cents, and I will not take more for it. Besides, you have bought a good many from me that were pretty short."

Thus the transaction closed, and Tom was doubtless thereby made stronger for the fierce struggles which awaited him in his future eventful career.—Exchange.

The young woman has a fondness for executing those works of art which consist in the representation of dead game birds hanging by their heels from a nail on a board, fish on a platter ready for the cook, and fruit grouped on a table around a wine glass. These gems she turned off at the rate of about four a year, and presented them to her friends for their dining room walls. She had just completed a twin pair for a bride. One represented a mess of lobsters in a nest of salad; the other a basket of peaches, with down on them like plush. She was so pleased with both that she asked her brother if he did not think they were just splendid. It was evident that the youthful critic liked one and not the other. After looking at them a minute or two he said:

"Sis, you're a peach on lobsters, but you're a lobster on peaches."

"These hirelings of capital may interrupt me," howled the shaggy-haired orator, "but they can't make me stop talking! If they had their way, my fellow citizens, they would silence me with giant powder!"

"Not at all, sir," replied one of the jeering minions of capital. "They would use insect powder on you."

"Your husband seems to be making a large and unique collection of books" remarked the caller, looking with interest at the costly array of rare volumes on the library shelves. "Yes," replied Mrs. Gaswell, with well-bred indifference, "I believe he becomes more bibulous every day he lives."

"How large a permanent population has Crimson Gulch?" inquired the tourist. "Well," answered Bronco Bob, "we've got about four hundred and seven living here. But with so much hoss-stealin' an brace fero goin' on, I wouldn't allude to anybody as bein' particularly permanent."

"Look here!" angrily exclaimed the householder, pointing to a cigar stump that lay on the floor of the back porch. "That was in the lump of ice you left here yesterday morning!" "Well," replied the iceman, "what did you expect to get for fifteen cents? A box of perfectos?"

"What is the remedy for poverty?" demanded the lecturer, in thunder tones. He paused for a reply, and during the pause a man in the rear of the hall called out: "You might try the gold cure."

Sunday-School Literature.

THE matter of Sunday-school Literature is one of very great importance. For, whether it should be so or not, the fact is that the character of the instruction given in nine-tenths of the Sunday-school classes throughout the country is determined by the contents of the Lesson Helps they use. This being true, and the fact that first impressions are most lasting, how important that Pastors and Superintendents of Christian Sunday-schools see that their Schools are supplied with Christian Periodicals. If the children are taught that one church is as good as another, that certain divine commands are of little or no importance, or can be changed or set aside by man, what effect will it have on the church of the future? "Think on these things."

We understand a FEW of our schools are using sectarian or union (so called) supplies, in order to save a few cents each quarter. Are you one of that number? Samples of our Supplies sent free.

A SUNDAY MORNING WALK, by Chrysel Rogers, Seattle, Wash.: It was a delightful Sunday morning. The cool breeze came from the ocean, and white winged birds, called boats, sailed lazily on the bosom of the bay. The distant Olympic mountains looked proud to grace the summer morning, and the white clouds rested on the snow-crowned head of Mt. Rainier. This morning little Bess and Dot decided to go "a-walkin'." They started off hats, passing many houses and closed stores, and often a kind-hearted person stopped to pat the curly heads. At last poor little Bess's feet ached and she began to cry. They had come to a little church, and hearing somebody singing within "so pretty" they decided to go in. They slipped in a back seat. "Oh, how pretty it looks!" It whispered, pointing her chubby finger at the organ. The top was draped with ivy, while lovely sword-ferns hid the body of it, and on a bed of ferns lay a flower box of dainty colors. The children Oh-ed! until a portly lady turned her bead-les eyes upon them accompanied with a frowning look. A gentleman was singing, and his voice grew sweeter and sweeter until on the cross lady wiped her eyes. Bess whispered, "It's wull pity!" Then they passed plates of bread. Dot and Bess watched every movement, and Bess stretched out her hand for some, but the gentleman passed her coldly by. Bess looked hurt and said, "I's awful hungry, Dot, ain't it?" Dot nodded so violently that she gave her head a bump on the back of the seat. When the wine was passed, again they were refused. Bess said, "I's awful thirsty, Dot, ain't you?" She went to sleep when the sermon began, but Dot kept her eyes wide open, and she had a faint recollection of hearing the minister say that the church was builded and r-r-rooted by the apostles. Dot wondered where the roots were, and if they went very deep. After the last hymn they crept out of the church. A boy called after them in a nasal twang, "You legged, two legged, bow legged girls. Went to the Christian Church, he! he! he!"

It was no other than Tommy Jones, who lived next door. Even if he did make poetry at their expense, they were glad to see him, for he was not a bad boy, and he piloted the little girls home.

MRS. SEA'S RECEPTION, by Constant Messing Smith, Fayette, Mo.: "Hurry, girls, 'tis time to go; the carriages are waiting," said Mrs. Cloud, passing through the room where the Raindrops were dressing for Mrs. Sea's reception. When they were ready they tripped downstairs to the carriage and were soon at Mrs. Sea's. Mrs. Booklet received them and took them up to remove their wraps. In the ball room Mrs. Sea received, assisted by Mr. River and Miss Stream. The Misses Snowflakes were as plentiful as the Raindrops. Mr. Webster and the Mermaids were there. Mr. Sun and a Mr. Raindrop quarreled and Mr. Sun got real hot and dried Mr. Raindrop right up. Then he turned to talk to Miss Moon who was conversing with Mr. Tide; he looked unusually cool. Then the music picked up (it might have been the thunder) and all prepared to dance. Mr. Sun and Miss Moon opened the dance and felt quite in the sky. At midnight a light like lightning suddenly flashed. Then diamonds and pearls were presented as souvenirs, and all departed, as happy as they could be.

Edgar Romer, Axtell, Kan.: "You said you wouldn't live in Kansas if there was a brass band in every cornfield. What objection have you to Kansas?" (None, it was the brass bands I objected to.) "I am glad you didn't let Pete die that time. If she had, I wouldn't have liked any more of your stories!" (I am glad to have made such a narrow escape.) "It is funny to me how anybody can think you are a bachelor. Bachelors don't like children very well, they like young ladies. You said not to write about sweethearts or robbers. I don't see how to make a story interesting unless you make it sweet or exciting, one or the other. But I will wait and see what the others write about. I want to join the Av. S." Bertha Beesley, Moselle, Mo.: "I can't write stories or good letters, but I think I can send in as good a report as any one. I will try it next time and see." Vida Wilkinson, Circleville, Kan.: "I took music this summer. My favorites: Beautiful Joe, Errand Boy, Black Beauty, Sweet Girl Graduate. I am in the 5th reader. Bro. Leeson is our minister; he says he is acquainted with you." (You ask Bro. Leeson if I am a bachelor.) "I want to join the Av. S. What are the rules?" (Read 5 pp. history, 30 lines of poetry and memorize a quotation each week; read Bible verse each day; keep account in note book; report to me every 8 weeks.) Erma Ady, Flat Rock, Mich.: "We have just got the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, and reading the letters makes me wish to join the Av. S. I am 12; I live with my grandma, and ever since I could read anything I have read the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST; before that, mamma read it to me. About 3 months ago I came here from Thayer, Kan. It was quite a long trip, don't you think so? For I came all alone. I like Uncle Tom's Cabin, In His Steps and the Rollo series. I think it would be best to alternate continued stories with children's short stories. I think 'Red Box Clew' and 'Pete' are about equals. I am going to send an essay." (It didn't come.) Madge Masters, Ozark, Ark.: "My uncle, Jim West, of Nebraska, with his wife and four children, spent the summer at Manitou Springs. And Vera West (10) says send her name, she wants to join the Av. S. We had such a good time this summer, visiting back and forth; we are about 2 miles from Manitou Springs. I am going to Ozark to school this winter." (How are potatoes in Arkansas this year? Over here, you have to give a quarter for a little paper sack, two-thirds full of potatoes, one-third air; sack somewhat larger than those used in the retail peanut business.)

New HONOR LIST: Madge Masters (11th quarter); Julia Cox, Cox, Mo., (10th qr.); Delight Shafer, Decatur, Texas, (11th qr.); Mary B. Nicholson (age 10), Boyd, Oregon.

NEXT WEEK a story will begin in this department which will be continued right along through the year. It tells about two brothers and their sister, all three of whom ran away from home. I know it is a good story because I wrote it myself. It will be entitled "The Runaways."

Lost Opportunities.*

TEXT:—The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved.—Jer. 8:20.

John J. Ingalls makes Opportunity say,—

Master of human destinies am I,
Fame, love and fortune on my footsteps wait;
Cities and fields I walk; I penetrate Deserts and seas remote, and, passing by Hovel and mart and palace, soon or late
I knock unbidden once at every gate!
If sleeping, wake—if feasting, rise before
I turn away. It is the hour of fate,
And they who follow me reach every state
Mortals desire, and conquer every foe
Save death; but those who doubt or hesitate,
Condemned to failure, penury and woe,
Seek me in vain and uselessly implore.
I answer not, and I return no more.

The stern abruptness of Opportunity thus personified seems to be a real fact in many lives. Such a statement is no doubt true in the numerous details which go to make what men call success. But in spiritual affairs there is a kindlier law. God graciously gives us many opportunities to obey the gospel, to walk in the light, to lay up treasure in heaven. Not a few of these we have missed; shall we miss them all, and at last, when the harvest is gathered, lament in vain?

Harvest Time.

What a lesson in the orderly procession of the seasons! Spring is the seed time, with its opportunities for planting. Day after day the sun shines warm but mild, and the nourishing showers fall. Soil and temperature and moisture all conspire to promote vigorous growth of roots and seeds. In the abodes of men everywhere we see signs of great activity. The industrious are taking advantage of the opportunities offered, and improving the time. Not a day, not a precious moment is permitted to pass unimproved. To such faithful toilers, October comes without regret or reproach. It tells of wine vats overflowing and barns filled to bursting. But what a different message it brings to the sluggard. He did not plow or plant, and the end of the harvest time finds him with barren fields and empty barns. He may awake to a consciousness of his folly, but it is too late now. "The harvest is past, the summer is ended."

And in the same swift fashion passes human life, with its springtime of half-formed purposes, its balmy days of splendid opportunity, and its harvest time. One must follow the other. Life must draw to its close. Each and every one must say, some time, "The harvest is past." Shall it be with joy or sorrow?

Heedless or Unaware.

When the Savior wept over Jerusalem, and foretold her destruction, he said, "Because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation." Blessed in manifold ways by the divine Spirit, the hostess of holy men and faithful prophets, and finally receiving Messiah himself into her streets and temples, Jerusalem was sunk in moral lethargy and groping in spiritual blindness. Her opportunities were many, but she did not recognize them. It was therefore inevitable that finally her doom should come.

We wonder at the stupidity of Jerusalem, the blindness and obstinacy of the Jewish people—and then we imitate them! For multitudes are blessed with opportunities for salvation and service of which they are all unaware. It is also true that many are blind because they are heedless. They are preoccupied. A life full of beneficent and righteous purposes which ripen under divine Providence and stand at last ready for the sickle is altogether admirable; it secures the approval of men and the applause of angels. But a life without noble purpose or high resolve, a life which ignores proffered salvation, and yields to the reign of selfishness, is pitiable in the extreme. When the time of awakening comes, and the irreparable loss is realized, then comes regret, but regret is vain.

The same feeling of sadness, though not so intense, comes to the servants of Christ who have missed opportunities to honor Him in the service of their fellow men. They do much good, but nothing at all compared with what they might have done.

To-day.

Have you rejected Christ, and imperiled your immortal soul? Weep no more over the opportunities you have lost, but improve the one that remains. It may be the last, and even now Eternal Justice may be framing the sentence, "Let him alone!"

"A ship came sailing and sailing
Over a murmuring sea;
And just in sight of the harbor,
Down in the waves went she.

"And the spars and the broken timbers
Were cast on the storm-beat strand,
And a cry went up in the darkness,
'Not far, not far from the land!'"

Travel.

A word or two on the subject of travel is not amiss. The facilities for the transportation of passengers at the present time have certainly been brought to perfection. It isn't like in the old days when it was almost a torture to go from one place to another. Now you get aboard a train and live just like you do at home. The entire equipment is built with a view to your comfort.

For instance: When you go East the B. & O. S-W. offers you Three Daily Solid Vestibuled Trains from St. Louis, leaving at 8:20 a. m., 8:05 p. m. and 2:15 a. m.—made up of the finest Pullman sleepers—a dining car service which cannot be excelled (you don't have to pay for what you can't eat, but just for what you order)—first class high back coaches—in fact the trains are palaces on wheels. The track, roadbed and equipment are entirely new.

It's the best line to Cincinnati and Louisville. Only $21 to New York with stop-overs. (Saves you money and gives you the best service.)

Information in regard to trains, etc., can be secured from any representative. It will be a pleasure for them to answer your questions and help you in every way.

The favor of the public is final proof of merit—and we're after it.

Joseph Sold Into Egypt.*

The meeting with Esau, which Jacob had so feared, turned out better than he anticipated, and the brothers parted in good will toward each other, the magnanimity of Esau appearing to rather better advantage than that of his brother. Jacob did not follow Esau down into the rocky district where he was making his home, south of the Dead Sea, but turned aside to the country known as Shechem, the rich plain lying about the bases of mounts Ebal and Gerizim, in the land afterwards known as Samaria. Here a cruel wrong perpetrated upon the daughter of Jacob by the prince of the land brought a fearful vengeance upon the city of Shechem from the two brothers, Simeon and Levi, which grieved the heart of Jacob greatly, and caused him to move his camp, first to Bethel, and thence to Hebron, where his father Isaac, now a very old man, was still living. On the way, his favorite wife, Rachel, died, after giving birth to Benjamin, whom she, in her dying grief, called Benoni, "the son of my sorrow," but whose name Jacob changed to Benjamin, "the son of my right hand." She was buried beside the road, near Bethlehem, where her tomb is shown to travelers to this day. It was doubtless a great comfort to the aged Isaac that he lived until the return of Jacob, and that he could be buried by his two sons in the Cave of Machpelah, with his parents.

The narrative from this point follows closely the fortunes of Joseph, who is one of the prominent characters of Scripture history. And justly so, for he is the most nearly perfect of any of the Old Testament heroes, showing to us how beautiful might be a life dominated by faith in God, even under the limitations of that time, and subjected to the hardships that marked his singular career. Unspoiled by indulgence, unsubdued by adversity, unconquered by temptation, uncorrupted by wealth and power, he affords the example of a man ever true to his God, his neighbor and himself. Surely his parents must have instilled deeply in his mind the lesson of God's providence over his children, or his many trials would have made shipwreck of his faith, and embittered him against his fellow men.

Joseph's very artlessness and innocence brought him into trouble. The child of Rachel, and personally attractive, he was his father's favorite. This partiality was shown in many ways, one of which was the "coat of many colors" given him by Jacob, a garment which unlike the simple tunic worn by his brothers, had sleeves, and reached down to his feet. He was a good boy, and that was inexcusable in the eyes of his wicked half brothers. He had not learned that it was a point of honor among evil doers to "keep still," and so told his father of the wicked acts of the others. When strange dreams came to him, he told them without reserve to the family, although he must have known, had he been politic in disposition, that their intimation of his future superiority would bring on him the envy and hatred of his brethren. But he was "an Israelite without guile," and prattled of all that passed through his innocent boy's heart, conscious only of his own integrity, and good will to everybody.

He was sent, when about seventeen years old, to where his brothers were grazing the cattle, in fertile Shechem, two or three days journey to the north, to see how they were, and bring tidings to his father. He found them at Dothan, a few miles from the former place. They saw him coming, and said to one another, "Behold, this dreamer cometh. Let us slay him, and cast him into one of the pits, and we will say, An evil beast hath devoured him: and we will see what will become of his

A Rally Day Service.

Rally Day has become one of the FIXED INSTITUTIONS in all well organized Sunday-Schools. A service of this kind is needed after the summer vacation to re-form the lines and get the forces into position for the new campaign. To make it a success a well-prepared program is very essential. To meet this want we have issued dreams." Thus does wicked man propose, but God disposes. Reuben, the oldest son, was not destitute of mercy and brotherly love, so he persuaded them to cast him alive into the pit, intending afterwards to help him out, and restore him to his father. To this they consented, and, after stripping him of his coat, they lowered him into one of the pits, or empty water cisterns, with which that country abounded. Reuben could not endure to listen to the pleadings of the poor boy, but went away from the rest, while they sat down beside the pit to eat, disregarding the cries of Joseph.

Hardly had they begun to eat when they saw approaching in the distance a caravan of merchants of Arabia, known as Ishmaelites, or Midianites, returning from the land east of the Jordan, called Gilead, with spices and ointments for the market of Egypt. These merchants were wont to purchase slaves, and those from all parts of Syria were especially desirable, bringing an extra price among the Egyptians. A likely youth like Joseph would bring large money. Judah proposed that they take Joseph out of the pit and sell him as a slave. In this way they could clear themselves from the guilt of his death, and at the same time profit themselves financially. Judah's motive was rather mercenary than merciful, but he was unconsciously carrying out the purpose of God for Joseph, and bringing to pass the very dreams which he and his brethren thought themselves to be circumventing. They received their twenty pieces of silver, and basely turned away from their young brother, as he was led a slave to a far away land. What will not men, absorbed in a sensual life, do for silver or gold!

After they had gone their several ways with their cattle, Reuben returned to the pit to take Joseph therefrom, but found the pit empty. Coming in great agony to his brothers, he found them preparing to hide their evil deed, by dipping Joseph's coat in blood, and returning it to Jacob, with a story of his death by a wild beast. Whether Reuben was told of what they had done, or was left in ignorance, we do not know. In any event, he did not tell his father, if he knew it, and the poor old man was left to weep out his heart at the evil tidings. His grief was so extreme that he refused to be comforted, saying: I will go down to the grave to my son mourning. Our hearts are stirred with indignation as we read of the base conduct of these brethren of Joseph, who would betray innocence without the slightest compunction, and break their aged father's heart by the lie with which they covered up their awful crime. No wonder that this story, so dramatic yet simple, is the delight of childhood, the romance of youth, and the spiritual idyl of sacred literature. We leave Joseph in the hands of his ruthless masters, but we already feel sure, even if the sequel were unknown, that he could not be forgotten of God, and that the future will bring forth his righteousness as the light.

THE AKRON ROUTE.

Through Passenger Service to Buffalo for Pan-American Exposition.

The opening of the Pan-American Buffalo Line—"Akron Route"—May 5th establishes a new outlet from the West and Southwest to Chautauqua Lake, Buffalo, Niagara Falls and St. Lawrence River and Canada resorts. It also opens a new tourist route via Buffalo and the Niagara frontier to New York and the East.

Schedules for the new route are out, and their arrangement indicates passengers over it are to have enjoyable trips to and from the Pan-American Exposition.

The service from St. Louis for Pan-American Exposition visitors from that gateway and the West and Southwest includes two daily trains in both directions. The Pan-American Express leaves St. Louis Union Station at 8:44 a. m., arrives Buffalo 8:15 next morning. This train has sleeping car on which passengers may go from St. Louis to Chautauqua Lake and Buffalo without change. The Buffalo Express leaves St. Louis at 8:15 p. m. with sleeping car from St. Louis to Columbus and from Columbus through to Chautauqua Lake and Buffalo, arriving at latter point at 12:50 midnight. Passengers occupying sleeping car may remain in their berths until 7:00 a. m. Returning trains leave Buffalo daily at 1:00 p. m., arrive St. Louis at noon next day; leave Buffalo 6:30 p. m., arrive St. Louis 6:40 next evening.

TOPIC FOR OCTOBER 6.

This Grace Also.

2 Cor. 8:7-9.

It was "this grace also," the grace of giving, of liberality, that endeared certain churches of the apostolic world to Paul. The Philippian church which ministered to him not once nor twice, but many times, was one of these. The Corinthian church, too, with all its imperfections, receives from him commendation for this grace also.

Some say that friends who are made by money are not enduring friends. There is truth in this, as Timon of Athens would witness. But there is another side to the case. It is also true that many a warm friend, a lasting friend, has been made by the wise and liberal use of money. Paul was in certain instances so won. The Savior recognizes the value of such friendships, for he urges men to make to themselves friends by the mammon of unrighteousness. And he, himself, no doubt, had a warm place in his heart for those women who ministered unto him of their substances.

Indeed, this is well named a grace. The free giving of one's possessions to worthy ends is one of the most graceful things in any one's life. What is more beautiful than hospitality? What is more graceful than the sending of flowers to a friend? What act was more filled with fragrance of grace than the pouring of Mary's ointment on the feet of the Master? If God abhors the blood of burnt offerings and sacrifice, it is also true, no doubt, that offerings more substantial and useful are a pleasure to him.

And there is a graceful and an ungraceful way in which to give. There are some who give with a pout and a frown, who feel that they are being bled, who complain that whenever any money is to be raised they are unduly gouged "That's always the way. They always come to me first and want me to give the whole thing."

There are some others who seem always ready and willing to do their share, and indeed, must sometimes be restrained from doing more than their part. I know of a woman in an eastern church who washes and scrubs for a living and who yet is foremost in every work of that church. Recently when the church began a campaign for a new organ that woman came quietly to the minister and gave five dollars, the first five dollars, and said when the fund was complete, or nearly so, she would add two hundred dollars.

A poor servant girl in another of our churches came into an inheritance of two thousand dollars, when, at once, she set aside a large portion of this amount to be used for the support of a missionary in India. And to-day she is working by proxy in India at the same time that she works in person in an American kitchen. Withal she is cheery and happy. God loveth a cheerful giver.

A Chance to Make Money.

I have been selling Perfumes for the past six months. I make them myself at home and sell to friends and neighbors. Have made $710. Everybody buys a bottle. For 50 cts worth of material I make perfume that would cost $2.00 in drug stores. I also sold 125 formulas for making perfumes at $1.00 each.

I first made it for my own use only, but the curiosity of friends as to where I procured such exquisite odors, prompted me to sell it. I clear from $25.00 to $35.00 per week. I do not canvass, people come and send to me for the perfumes. Any intelligent person can do as well as I do. For 42 cts. in stamps I will send you the formula for making all kinds of perfumes and sample bottle prepaid. I will also help you get started in the business.

CAIN.

Isaac Newton Cain, of College City, a pioneer of California, answered his Lord's call to a higher life on August 26, 1901, at the ripe old age of 78. He was born in Clay county, Mo., in 1823, and was a cousin of the late venerable G. O. Burnett, whose brother was the first governor of California. Bro. Cain came to California in 1850 with the gold seekers at that time. In 1860 he joined the Christian church, and all these years led an exemplary Christian life. On January 9, 1867, he married Mrs. Susan Miles, who, with their two sons, Edgar and T. D., survives him. In 1866 he was appointed to the office of sheriff to fill a vacancy occasioned by the death of S. M. Wright, and the next year he was elected for the full term. In 1874 he moved to College City where he resided to the time of his death. I was called to College City to help lay our dear brother away to await the resurrection morn. J. DURHAM.

MARTIN.

Nancy Martin, a charter member of the church at Brumley, Mo., born Dec. 5, 1821, died Sept. 5, 1901. Sister Martin united with the Christian Church and was baptized by Dr. Glass about the year 1855, and throughout the remaining years of her life she lived a consistent Christian life. No member of the church did more in word and deed to advance its interest than did dear old Grandma Martin, hers was surely the faith that overcometh the world. There are but few homes in and around Brumley that she has not entered with comfort and counsel for the distressed and bread for the hungry. No one in the community was more loved and respected and the power and influence of her pure Christian life will have a hallowed influence over the lives of all who knew her. She has been a widow for 32 years and leaves an only daughter, the wife of Hon. J. M. Hawkins, of Brumley, Mo., with whom she lived until her death, and there never was a home in which the relations were more lovable and pleasant. The funeral was the largest ever seen in Brumley, was conducted by the writer and Bro. Burks, and it was certainly a sad day for me, for she was the preacher's friend and counselor, we will greatly miss her in the home, the community and especially in the church, which she attended regularly until her death. Dear old sainted mother, rest from thy toil, thy labor is done.

J. C. THOMPSON.

MOSS.

Martha J. Moss was born near Georgetown, Ky., July 17, 1820, and died in Manchester, Ill., July 24, 1901, aged 81 years and one week. She was baptized by Bro. D. P. Henderson in 1854, and from that time till her death she was faithful to her Master. To serve the Lord and do service in his vineyard was her chief delight. She was always present at all the services of the Lord's house unless hindered by sickness. With her the church was first and all other things secondary. Funeral services were conducted by the writer July 26, 1901, after which we laid her tenderly to rest in Jacksonville cemetery. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

Among Our Advertisers.

Barclay Meador, Advertising Manager.

Some of our readers have made such advantageous use of our Subscriber's Want Column, since last this kind of advertising was referred to in this column, that reference to it at this time is in order. A physician who wanted to change his location made the fact known in the fewest possible words and received answers from almost every section in which the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST circulates. An aged couple in the West who desired the presence in their home of a member of the church who could keep house for them and be as a member of the family, also had replies from many quarters. Many others could make use of this column to equally as good advantage.

Edgar Stillman Kelley, who has recently been appointed Professor of Music for the coming year at Yale College during the absence of Horatio W. Parker, has recently scored a great triumph by his music composed to accompany the production of Ben Hur, the dramatization of which has been highly successful.

Words from such an all-round musician, thoroughly equipped in the various branches of musical art, carry a weight and force of conviction which cannot be gainsaid. Therefore, strong praise it is when Edgar Stillman Kelley writes as follows regarding the Mason & Hamlin Pianofortes:

"In a series of lectures recently delivered by me in Albany, N. Y., I had the pleasure of using a pianoforte of your manufacture, and I was highly delighted with it. The tone is sympathetic and distinguished for its purity and singing capacity; its action particularly adapted to the demands of our modern music, there being no blurring in rapidly changing harmonies. The continual crescendo in quality manifested in your instruments during the past few years has deeply impressed me. You know how thoroughly I sympathize with your ideal, and how happy it makes me to see a house managed by true Americans working up to such an ideal. With best wishes, I am Bethany's Prospects.

The alumni and friends of Bethany will doubtless rejoice in the most excellent prospects before that institution.

The financial situation is brighter than it has been for years. Last June the treasurer and chairman of the executive committee, Hon. William H. Graham, reported that $51,000 had been added to the endowment of the college. The Mercantile Trust Co. of Pittsburg. Three months have passed, and now comes the report, personally vouched for by one of the trustees, that $27,500 has been raised on a second $50,000. A floating indebtedness has been cared for by returns from an estate in Scotland to which the college fell heir. Prospects are again brightened by the fact that a number of productive oil wells have been struck in close proximity to 1,100 acres of wild land in Tennessee bequeathed to the school by the late Dr. Gerould, of Cleveland, O. All this puts the old college on a sound financial basis and gives Bethany an opportunity to be restored to her former usefulness.

The announcement of the acceptance of the presidency by T. E. Cramblet, pastor of the East End Christian Church of Pittsburg, Pa., is another reason for rejoicing.

President Cramblet has been fitted for his work of raising a run down college by building up run down churches. He has been eminently successful in his pastoral work. To him is due the credit of making what they are, the Christian churches of Salem, O., Omaha, Neb., and East End, Pittsburg. He has proven himself a man of fine business and executive ability.

The new president was born in Ohio in 1862, and at the age of sixteen entered the Ohio State University at Columbus, and later Mt. Union College at Alliance, O. At the latter institution, he was graduated with highest honors in 1885. He afterwards took graduate work at Kentucky University dividing the honors of the class of 1887 with J. B. Sweeny, now chancellor of Add-Ran University in Texas.

These facts will certainly appeal to the alumni of Bethany, an alumni that is as loyal to their alma mater as can be found anywhere. They give assurance of sufficient money to run the college, and a president who will remain with the institution for not less than five years. The time accordingly, is ripe to act, if ever, for Bethany. No time could be more opportune than right now for the alumni of the institution to set their faces toward the college on the banks of the old Buffalo.

Now while the time is big with opportunity for successful work in this oldest school among us, it is not a time for the writer at least, to suggest big things such as he clearly sees possible. But it is a time for the men and women scattered all over this land who are graduates to do some small thing for the school. Are you a resident of Ohio or Indiana? Write Robert Moffett, Cleveland, O., concerning men who might give to the institution and prospective students you know of in your community, or send him a check yourself for the $100,000 endowment fund. If you are a resident of W. Va. Bible Chair that is to be established in the school. Mrs. Rebecca Richardson, Bethany, W. Va., will gladly receive all moneys sent her for this purpose. If Bethany's alumni in Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Missouri, Kansas and other states will only respond by telling out verbally or through the local papers the good news of the bright prospects of the school, and by writing Pres. Cramblet, Bethany, W. Virginia, of men who will give or of prospective students, the college cannot help but take on new life.

Indeed if the balance strikes success for Bethany, it will not be because of the financial condition, or the new president, but because the alumni, recognizing this as a critical and favorable time, rally to the support of their alma mater. Only a few months shall pass by and June will be here. A reunion of a number of the classes would mean much. I take this early opportunity of asking as senior class president of the class of '97 that the members of the class look toward a reunion next commencement.

There is yet, most assuredly, a place for Bethany among the colleges of our brotherhood—a fact that seems to have been forgotten in recent years in our educational circles. Bethany holds a historic place in the history of our movement, and though in recent years the grip of the college has been lost through financial reverses, there is, through the recent prosperity, every assurance of her being able to prove worthy of filling the place she rightly occupies. There is a stronger faculty, better equipment and brighter prospects for an increased attendance this fall than for years.

Let every alumnus and every Disciple who is a friend to old Bethany, tell out the good news. Bethany lives, and with assured prospects for permanent restoration to her former greatness and usefulness.

Nebraska Disciples at Minneapolis.

The Disciples in Nebraska will have a special train over the Illinois Central Railroad, leaving Omaha Union Station Wednesday, Oct. 9, at 8 P. M., and reaching Minneapolis about 8 o'clock the next morning. The committee appointed at the state convention is trying to induce every congregation in the state to send its pastor, every Sunday-school its superintendent, every Endeavor Society its president. This can easily be done. Every child can contribute a little and will cheerfully do so if called upon. Let an effort be made in every congregation. The committee will supply all needed advertising matter. Ask us for it. We are trying to send to all, but some may be overlooked. We will answer questions; write us. We will do all we can to make you comfortable; command us. If you want a sleeping car let us know.

The brethren from northern Kansas and western Iowa should come by way of Omaha. This is the most direct route. You can buy a one fare ticket from your home station; see that it reads over the Illinois Central from Omaha. It is expected that the brethren from Colorado and the west will join us here. A program is being arranged for the trip. Prominent brethren will take part.

The Christian-Evangelist Special.

At a meeting of the Minneapolis excursion committee of the Central Board of the Christian Church at St. Louis the following were selected as a reception committee to meet the brethren of other localities coming to join the Christian-Evangelist Special at St. Louis Union Station: W. D. Cree, chairman, O. A. Bartholomew, Frank G. Tyrrell, J. N. Crutcher and Paul Castle. This committee will be on hand to welcome the delegates and to give such aid and information as may be needed.

Reports received at this meeting of the excursion committee make it almost certain that a special train, run as a second section of the regular Burlington train, which leaves St. Louis, Wednesday, Oct. 9, at 2:05 P. M., will be a necessity.

If you have not sent in your name as a member of our party, please do so at once. Our arrangements depend very materially on the number and promptness of responses. Let us know how many (one or more) there will be in your party, when you will arrive in St. Louis and by what route. The reception committee will meet you and we will provide accommodations for you on our special excursion.

Do not lose sight of the fact that the brethren of St. Louis know the shortest and best route to Minneapolis and have selected it. The Christian-Evangelist Special runs via the Burlington route (west side line), will have the best of chair cars and modern and improved tourist sleepers. A double berth (which can be occupied by two) will cost $1.50 in addition to the regular fare, but it is entirely optional with members of the excursion to travel in the chair cars or in these sleepers. We will stop at Quincy, Ill., for supper and take breakfast in Minneapolis.

The fare for the round trip from St. Louis is $16, with twenty-five cents additional for the execution of the ticket at Minneapolis. By depositing the ticket with the joint agent there and paying fifty cents the return limit may be extended to October 31.

"I WAS glad when they said unto me, Let us go unto to the house of the Lord." Such was the feeling with which God's ancient people hailed the coming of the time for one of their great annual feasts at Jerusalem. It was a means of manifesting their zeal for God and His law to the nations about them. It promoted the solidarity of the chosen people. It kept alive the national hopes and aspirations. It helped to preserve them as a separate and peculiar people until the Christ should come. Is it not with equal and even greater gladness that we now hear the word passed from lip to lip and from our journals to their readers, "Let us go up to our national convention"? Many motives draw us thither. The glad greetings, the social intermingling, the spiritual fellowship, the quickening influence of large numbers of consecrated workers, the reports of what has been done, the needs of the great field, the presence and utterances of foreign missionaries and of representative men and women from all sections of the country—these all appeal to what is noblest and best within us. The Christ, lifted up in song and praise, in sermon and address, in work done and in plans for larger work, and in the united fellowship of thousands of His devoted followers gathered in His name—that is the supreme attraction.

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

Our New President.

The fact has been sufficiently dwelt upon that President Roosevelt is a young man, that he is several years younger than the youngest of his predecessors in the presidency, and that he is a man of such nervous energy that some have considered him impetuous and even rash. It may be well at the same time to remember that, although young as compared with other presidents, he is eight years above the minimum prescribed by the constitution and is older than many men who have attained exalted positions by their own efforts and have filled them with conspicuous ability. He is nineteen years older than the younger Pitt was when with unparalleled precocity he became Prime Minister of England at twenty-four. He is eight years older than Gladstone was when he first entered the British ministry, and eight years older than Napoleon when, as First Consul, he became practically dictator of France. When Henry Clay became speaker of the House of Representatives he was eighteen years younger than Mr. Roosevelt is now, and Alexander the Great after conquering the known world died ten years younger than our present President. No, a man of forty-three is old enough to have passed beyond the immaturity of youth, and if he has not lost all of its buoyancy, so much the better. With all his force and fire President Roosevelt cannot be called in any sense a radical. Politically he is a very conservative man. Perhaps the possession of family traditions, reaching back unbroken for two centuries, may have something to do with increasing his consideration for the traditions and customs of the government. Beyond exercising a somewhat greater measure of personal liberty in his daily life than most presidents have assumed, it is highly probable that he will appear as a cautious and conservative man rather than rash or headstrong. It is to be noted that he is already taking hold of some important problems by the right end. In summoning Booker T. Washington to the White House and holding a conference of several hours with him in regard to the race problem in the south, there is ground for hope that the administration will see in the relations of the black and white races in the south not a political but an economic problem and will treat it accordingly.

The Revolt Against Tammany.

The anti-Tammany elements in New York have apparently decided to combine their forces for the fight this fall. It requires only a rudimentary degree of political intelligence to see that Tammany can defeat all the other elements separately and it will be a close rub if it does not defeat them in combination, but a fusion of the independents and reformers with the Republican organization, with Seth Low at the head of the ticket, will have all the chances of success that any anti-Tammany crusade can have. In the three-cornered race which resulted in the victory of Mayor Van Wyck four years ago, Mr. Low was the candidate of the independents for the mayoralty, but was opposed by the regular Republican nominee. Four years more of Tammanyism, as administered by Croker, Van Wyck, Devery and their kind, have reduced the usually discordant Tammany-hating elements to the condition of wild animals in the presence of a forest fire or a flood—minor hostilities are forgotten and all lesser foes become allies against the great common foe. It is almost certain that there will be only two tickets in the field this year and with Seth Low at the head of one of them, supported by the Republican machine and by all the independents and reformers as well, there ought to be a reasonable chance of success. The nomination of Mr. Grout for comptroller, an independent Democrat who did good work on the honest side of the Ramapo water-works fight, will strengthen popular confidence in the real nonpartisanship of this fusion ticket.

Tammany's Advantage.

The strength of Tammany lies not in any plausible pretense of decency, honesty, or good government, but in the fact that there are thousands of voters in New York who have some selfish, personal interest in perpetuating the regime of bribery and blackmail. The total number of qualified voters in Greater New York is approximately six hundred thousand. Mr. Ludwig Nissen, chairman of the anti-Tammany committee, says that there are fifty thousand city employes who are directly interested in the maintenance of the present administration, and that each one of these can influence at least one other voter. Here are a hundred thousand votes already secure without regard to the merits of any question which may be at issue. He estimates further that there are not less than one hundred thousand voters who, for private and selfish business reasons prefer Tammany rule. The vast army of criminals, semi-criminals, gamblers and saloon-keepers belong in this class. These men without doubt pay for police protection and get it; they do not like being blackmailed, but they prefer it to imprisonment at hard labor, so they uphold the present order. In addition to these, there are vast numbers of respectable citizens who find blackmail cheaper than honest taxes; or who bribe the police to obtain illegal privileges—such as the use and obstruction of sidewalks by wholesale houses—which would not be permitted under an honest enforcement of the law. These too, with such of their employes as they can influence, are on the side of Tammany without regard to any consideration of honesty or public welfare. So here are altogether two hundred thousand votes, or one-third of the total registration, already enlisted on the side of corruption—and they are the voters least liable to be kept from the polls by bad weather, rush of business, or forgetfulness. Only one hundred thousand more votes—or one out of four of the disinterested citizens—are needed to make a majority, and all the good weak men, who vote with their party regardless of issues, will go toward making up this number. The fight will be for that last hundred thousand. No argument can appeal to those who are selfishly interested and who put their own interest above their city's honor. It will be a hard fight, even with Tammany's enemies united. The following is the platform upon which Seth Low, president of Columbia University, is nominated for mayor:

1. Progressive, businesslike, and non-partisan administration of municipal affairs, with a special view to cutting down public expenses and reducing the present excessive burden of taxation.

2. The toleration of the innocent customs and habits of our cosmopolitan population by rational laws and regulations, assuring the largest measure of personal liberty consistent with the maintenance of law and order.

3. The conservation of the interests of capital and labor by an equal enforcement of laws, and the enactment of such new measures as the welfare of the toiling masses may require.

4. The extirpation of the police blackmail iniquity and of the system of political jobbery maintained in the interests of the Tammany Boss, who though a foreign resident and a British taxpayer, yet rules the City of New York by virtue of his control of Tammany Hall.

5. The steady betterment of municipal conditions by furthering such necessary public improvements as tend to the greatest good of the greatest number.

Contemporaneous Medievalism.

The story of the capture of Miss Helen H. Stone, an American missionary, who is now being held for ransom by Bulgarian or Roumanian brigands, sounds like a chapter out of the middle ages. In the days of Richard Coeur de Lion it was customary for impecunious or malicious potentates to capture important personages as they had opportunity and hold them until their friends paid a vast sum for their release. Richard himself obtained by experience a deep insight into the workings of this ingenuous method for replenishing a depleted treasury. But it was always an essential condition of this scheme that the captured one be a person of some importance and value. The worthless and inconsequential are never held for ransom. So, after all, it was in strict keeping with the traditions of their craft that the brigands chose a missionary as their victim. Princes are not easily accessible to bandits in these days, so they have recourse to that stil more valuable class, the true royalty of the church—the missionaries. We accept with all due appreciation this unexpected tribute to the worth of a Christian missionary, while withholding approbation from the impetuous and irregular method by which the brigands have expressed their esteem. This is not Miss Stone's first experience with bandits on the Turkish frontier. She is a woman of many years' experience in the field and has been captured before but never held for ransom. In fact, such an event has never occurred before, at least in this region. The robbers demand $110,000, and threaten that if this amount is not paid within thirty days, Miss Stone will be killed or compelled to marry one of her captors. The Woman's Board of Missions, under the auspices of which Miss Stone works, a society which co-operates with the Congregational American Board of Foreign Missions, declares that it will not pay the amount because it would be only the beginning of a series of such captures. Missionaries have the same right to governmental protection that any other citizens have, and the United States government should at once take measures as strenuous as may be necessary to secure the safety of Miss Stone. Turkish soldiers have already been sent after the brigands, but so far without success.

The Yacht Race.

The first of the series of international yacht races for this season was sailed on Thursday, Sept. 26. The dying of the wind prolonged the race beyond the time-limit and it was consequently declared off. The race was repeated on Saturday and the American boat "Columbia" won over the British challenger, Shamrock II, by a margin of 39 seconds actual sailing-time, or one minute and twenty seconds corrected time. For a thirty mile race, this is about as close as it could well be. The series will consist of five races and the winner of three will be the winner of the series. They will be held on alternate days, Sundays excepted, until the contest is decided; and if failure of wind makes it impossible to finish the course within five hours the race shall be called off for that day and repeated on the next regular racing day. Three of the races are over a course fifteen miles to windward and return, from a point just beyond Sandy Hook, and two are over a triangular course ten miles on a side. The race this year is of especial interest because of the apparently greater probability that the British challenger will capture the cup which the New York Yacht Club has guarded for fifty years. This is Sir Thomas Lipton's second attempt to win the trophy and he has won such good opinions from all those who have had dealings with him, that there are many, even on this side of the Atlantic, who would not greatly regret to see him carry back the cup.

The Origin of Contest.

The cup for which the rival yachts are competing is nothing extraordinary as a piece of silverware, but it has had a history which makes it well worthy of the interest which attaches to it. The first international yacht race was sailed just half a century ago. In connection with the Crystal Palace Exposition of 1851 in London, the first genuine world's fair, of which Prince Albert, Queen Victoria's consort, was the chief originator and promoter, it was planned to have a yacht race open to all sailing craft of all nations. The Royal Yacht Squadron took charge of the event and offered as a prize a hundred-guinea ($500) cup, to become the absolute property of the winner. It was never the Queen's cup, though often called so. Cowes, on the Isle of Wight, then as now the chief meeting-place for British yachtsmen, was the starting-point and the course was around the Isle of Wight. There were more than twenty entries from all nations, ranging from cutters of forty-five tons displacement to three-masted schooners of nearly four hundred. The only American representative was the "America" a two-masted schooner of one hundred and seventy tons. She won the race by such a margin that her nearest competitor was ten miles behind when she crossed the finish-line. The cup was brought home by its American winner and served as a parlor ornament for a few years until his death, at which time it passed to the custody of the New York Yacht Club, which he had been instrumental in founding, to be held as a perpetual challenge cup to be competed for by the yachts of the world. During the first few years there were no challengers but when peace had come after our civil war, challengers began to appear and have come almost annually from then until now. But the New York Yacht Club has always found an efficient boat to defend the cup. Yacht-construction has seen many changes in this half century and yachting on a large scale has become almost as expensive as conducting a foreign war. Although in one sense it is a socially exclusive and ultra-fashionable sport, it is at the same time highly popular. Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, who owns the Columbia, and Sir Thomas Lipton, who owns the Shamrock II, are paying the expenses, while the boat-loving but impecunious public on both sides of the Atlantic enjoys its cheapest amusement—watching the races which the rich men pay for.

The Secretary to the President.

An office which has of late years come into a degree of prominence which formerly it did not know, is that of Secretary to the President. So long as the President's confidential agent and assistant was known merely as a private secretary, it was not possible for the office to attain any considerable degree of honor. It was during the administration of Mr. Cleveland, that Daniel Lamont brought the office of secretary into greater prominence by reason of his intimate friendship with the President and the high regard in which he was held; and when Mr. Lamont passed from the secretaryship to a cabinet position in Cleveland's second administration, it was regarded as an unprecedented promotion. Some seemed to consider it as almost equivalent to promoting a congressional page to a seat in the senate. But it has been recognized that the President needs an assistant who shall be more than a stenographer, amanuensis and clerk—a man of ability, tact and discretion. So the name of the office was changed to Secretary to the President, and its responsibility and dignity were alike raised. But neither before nor since has the position been filled by one who so adorned it as has George B. Cortelyou. During the administration of Mr. McKinley, and equally during the last days at Buffalo, Washington and Canton, his good judgment, executive ability and admirable modesty have deserved the heartiest commendation. His retention in office by President Roosevelt will be approved by the public as a fitting recognition of the faithful performance of difficult and delicate tasks, and will make much easier for the President the entrance upon his new duties.

The Cuban Election Law. The election law which has been framed and adopted by the Cuban Constitutional Convention has been presented to the United States government and to Governor General Wood for examination and endorsement. Gov. Wood disapproves of it in only one particular—it provides for too many separate elections. As it stands, there would be separate elections for senatorial electors, for governors and councilors, for representatives and presidential electors, and for senators. These four scattered over six weeks, as the law requires, would be equivalent to an attack of intermittent political fever, which would be sure to disturb business conditions and make the naturally stormy politics of the new republic more tempestuous than necessary. Gov. Wood recommends that there be but two elections: one to choose the electors who will elect the president and senators; and the other to choose all other officers and electors. This is simplicity itself and, like most of Gov. Wood's recommendations, eminently sensible.

Brevities.

Judge J. M. Wilson, senior council for Admiral Schley before the naval court of inquiry, died suddenly Sept. 24 at the age of 73 years. Though he had served in Congress he was more widely known as a lawyer than as a legislator.

A French cyclist has performed the wonderful feat of riding 745 miles in 52 consecutive hours. Interesting and remarkable. But why should a man care to compete with a steam engine on its own ground when he must inevitably be beaten?

President Roosevelt is the first President since the Civil War who is too young to remember the events of that stirring time. He was only three years old when the war broke out. With the exception of Mr. Cleveland, his predecessors for the last thirty-five years have all been veterans of the Civil War. It is not improbable that McKinley will be the last of the Civil War veterans to attain the presidency. So it may be said that that office is now entering upon a new epoch.

President McKinley's assassin will meet death in the electric chair some time during the week of Oct. 28. The trial was just and every legal protection was allowed the criminal, even to the ruling out of his plea of guilty. Two ex-judges of the New York Supreme Court defended him. Mr. McKinley died Sept. 14. The trial was begun Sept. 23. The jury brought in a verdict of guilty on Sept. 24. Sentence was pronounced Sept. 26. The law is not always slow. All was done calmly, deliberately yet promptly. It was an object lesson of the superiority of the law of the courts over lynch law.

A Problem of Consistency Further Considered.

In taking up the subject introduced in a previous editorial it may be well to state a few general propositions which we think will command the assent of all of us who are identified with the current religious reformation, including those who hold the view stated in a previous article. These general principles should help us to decide wisely the special question to which we have adverted.

The plea for Christian union which we have made from the beginning of this movement has never contemplated the compromise or surrender of any truth, or of any man's conscience. Valuable and desirable as Christian union is it would be secured at too great a price if it involved the sacrifice of either truth or conscience.

In fact such a union would not be Christian. It would violate some of the clearest teaching of Christ. Truth is divisive only between those who ought to be separated because they belong to different classes. Conscience is the supreme law of every man's conduct and he who is not loyal to its mandates, that is, to the decisions of the moral judgment, cannot be united to Christ, and is therefore not a subject of Christian union. The moral judgment may be wrong or immature, but until it is changed by increasing light, to which every honest mind should be open, it must be obeyed.

No union that can properly be characterized as Christian can be secured at the sacrifice of liberty. This right of proclaiming the truth, as God gives us to see the truth, lies back behind our own and all other religious reformations, and alone has made them possible. Any combination or consolidation of forces that requires a denial of this right, or of its exercise, would prove a fatal blow to spiritual progress. A heterogeneity of beliefs or of convictions among the members of any organization, which involves silence on any scriptural doctrine or command, as a condition of peace, is a violation of the fundamental principle of unity, and of Christian liberty. Better, far, liberty with division than the unity of compromise which involves the sacrifice of religious freedom on its altar.

Christian union is not yet a realized fact. In other words no one religious organization holds all Christians. Nor do all the organizations on earth calling themselves churches contain all who are Christian in spirit and character. Perhaps the divided condition of Christendom is responsible for this fact. It is but fair to admit that those who are attached to these various ecclesiastical organizations are acting conscientiously. If so, nothing short of a clearer and better understanding of the gospel and of Christ's purposes, is likely to change their conscientious convictions or their ecclesiastical relationship. It is not by conforming our conditions of membership to every man's view of what those conditions should be, that we are to promote unity, but rather by re-proclaiming the same terms of discipleship and of church membership which were taught and required by the apostles who first "preached the gospel with the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven."

Now let us turn directly to the question, as to whether we are consistent with our plea for Christian union, based on a return to the doctrine and practice of the New Testament church, when we are insisting on immersion as a condition of church membership. We have assumed, in our previous article, that those among us who doubt this consistency believe with us in the wisdom and necessity for this return to the original constitution of the church in order to unity. So far as this may not be the case this argument will not apply. It remains for those who think they have a better method of Christian union than a return to the original basis, to point out what it is. But if this be a legitimate plea and the true method of promoting unity, and if it be true that the apostles, acting under the inspiration and teaching of Christ, did teach and practice the immersion of believers alone, and that the original churches were constituted solely of these baptized believers, then how could our practice be consistent with our plea unless we insist on the same terms of membership? If the plea itself be wrong, if the plan of returning to the original apostolic basis of church membership be defective, that is another matter and should be pointed out.

We are aware that there are those who hold that baptism is not a requirement of Christ, and who hold such a view of apostolic authority as to enable them to discard the teaching and example of the apostles as only human, and without divine sanction. Such was Dr. Parker's position in his recent interview with Dr. Moore in London. We are not now talking to that class of thinkers, but to those who hold that whether Christ or his apostles enjoined baptism as a condition of church membership, it remains forever a perpetual ordinance to be observed by all Christ's followers, since the apostles received the Holy Spirit in such a measure as to qualify them for conveying to us and to the church of all ages, the mind of Christ concerning the constitution of his church. To these our question is directed when we ask, what other course could our fathers have adopted and we have followed, than that of making no new terms of fellowship, but simply insisting on those which we find taught and observed in the New Testament?

It is at this point that we meet with the objection so often urged by a certain class of thinkers, whose motives and spirit are not here called in question, that many of the saintliest characters which the world has ever known have never been immersed and that to exclude such persons from membership in our churches is to make a basis of fellowship too narrow to hold all Christians, and therefore to make a sectarian foundation. We have already stated that we have had nothing to do with making this foundation. Our mistake, if it be a mistake, is either in our understanding of what that basis is, or in supposing that the foundation laid by Christ and his apostles is a foundation not for the first century alone but for all succeeding centuries. But if we adopt the principle which the foregoing argument suggests of so modifying that basis as to take in all who manifest the Christian life and character we shall not stop by waiving immersion as a condition of fellowship. The Quakers or Friends do not observe baptism or the Lord's supper and many of them possess the loveliest of Christian characters. Not only so, Unitarians, Universalists and some agnostics live pure and unselfish lives which would put to blush many who hold membership in orthodox churches. What then? Shall we surrender the inspired confession of faith upon which Christ said he would build his church, because there are good and devout people who are not able to accept the divinity and Messiahship of Jesus? The same logic that demands that we surrender baptism, requires that we also surrender that confession of faith which Christ said was fundamental to his church. Some churches carry out this argument to its logical result, and have no confession of faith which they require as a condition of membership. If we are not prepared to go so to that extreme, why should we take a step that has only this logical terminus?

But there is something more important than logic involved in the policy we are here opposing. It would be introducing a principle of discord which would result in division instead of unity, and in strife instead of peace. We must respect the conscientious convictions of the great body of believers with whom we are associated, if we are to study the things which make for peace, for unity and for prosperity. If the blessing of God has rested in a remarkable degree upon a program of religious reformation which is nearing the end of a century of glorious history, nothing short of the clearest convictions of duty, based upon the clearest teachings of God's word, should cause us to depart from any of its fundamental principles.

This course involves no denial that God's grace and truth manifest their power far beyond the limits of all religious organizations. Nor does it require a narrow and uncharitable view of the Christian character and attainments of others who do not see with us in this program of religious reform. It simply means that in all charity to others, we should be loyal to our providential mission, and to the dispensation of truth which God has granted to us, in order that the world shall have the benefit of our testimony of those things for which we stand and for which we plead.

Notes and Comments.

The matter of buying and selling honorary degrees is receiving its periodical airing. It is charged by a New Jersey minister that three ministers in his presbytery have paid cash for fake degrees from a bogus concern in Chicago. Verily, they have their reward. They want a means of impressing foolish men with their learning, and they probably do impress some. But one might expect a minister of the gospel, even if he is vain enough to desire this, to shrink from incorporating a lie into his very signature.

The chaplain of the Texas senate in his prayer at the first session after the shooting of President McKinley, said; "We pray that our people may learn to offer unto their rulers the same honor and love in their hours of health and service that they show in time of trouble and sickness." Our political caricatures and cartoons are well enough—sometimes, but a caricature expresses an idea. Any editor who publishes in his paper a caricature expressing an idea which he knows to be a lie, belongs to the same class with those who perpetrate falsehood in any other manner. How many of the papers which were fond of representing President McKinley as a pygmy in ability and a tyrant in ambition, have characterized him editorially since his death as a Christian gentleman of spotless character, a sincere patriot and an able (though perhaps mistaken) statesman?

A technical advertising journal, which is perhaps as purely secular as any paper can be, asks why so few religious papers succeed in increasing their circulation, and answers that it is because they "follow narrow dogmatic lines." "The majority of publishers of religious papers stunt their papers' growth in failing to cultivate their readers' tastes by publishing news of the universal church, the church of all Christian creeds as one, having but Christ as their mentor." Pretty good Christian union teaching from a strictly business paper.

We call attention here in this place to the proposed testimonial to Bro. J. Z. Tyler on the occasion of his 53rd birthday and 25th anniversary of his marriage, mentioned in last week's paper. This testimonial is in view of the fact that Bro. Tyler has been disabled from earning a salary by his unstinted labors in behalf of the work of Christian Endeavor among our young people. By every consideration of brotherly love and fellowship in Christian service, we should use this occasion for giving a substantial token of our appreciation of his work. The anniversary is Oct. 10, and the time is very short and there is need for immediate action. We have already received a few responses in the brief time since our notice was published, but we hope to hear from many others who will send either through this office or directly to Bro. Tyler as they may elect.

The Sunday-School Times makes a clear distinction between theology and religion, and quotes approvingly the reply which the great theologian Tholuck made to a godly woman who was troubled because she could not understand the doctrine of the Trinity. This doctrine, he said, "is a purely theological question and not in the least necessary to religion." And yet the Disciples of Christ were for a generation or two looked upon as religious outcasts, because they would not incorporate the doctrine of the Trinity into their confession of faith, and because they held that this and many other equally theological questions were "not in the least necessary to religion." Somehow, in the process of the suns, the thoughts of men have widened until those principles which used to be considered distinctive of our movement have become common property. So much the better! We have no copyright on them.

One of the great interests which will no doubt come up for consideration at the Minneapolis Convention will be the newly organized American Christian Education Society. This organization was effected at our last Congress at Lexington, Ky., and has not yet been brought before one of our national conventions. This, as it seems to us, is one of the great departments of our work which we cannot afford to neglect, and this society looks to a more earnest and systematic effort towards promoting the prosperity and efficiency of every institution among us which, by its past history and work, and its present condition and outlook, has won the right to live and to receive the patronage and encouragement of the brotherhood. What the society needs now, we take it, is funds coming through life memberships to enable it to carry on the work for which it was organized. All who are interested in the work of education among us and who are able to help it along should do so by taking membership in the society.

At the suggestion of the Christian Commonwealth, a greeting was recently sent through the medium of that paper by the Archbishop of Canterbury to the Pan-Methodist Congress which was in session in London. As a further expression of Anglican friendliness, the Bishop of London sent a cordial message expressing the hope that the Methodist and Established Churches would some day be reunited. This was doubtless intended for nothing more than a general expression of goodwill and a token of Christian esteem for the Methodist brethren. But the conference apparently took it quite seriously as an overture for union and informed him, through a letter written by Bishop Stevenson, that union is impossible between an Established Church and the millions of independent Methodists who are unalterably opposed to the establishment of a state church. It is also pointed out that union is impossible so long as the Church of England is unwilling to recognize the legitimacy of the Methodist ministry and the validity of their ordinances. All this is very true. The Episcopal Church cannot unite with any independent Protestant denomination until it makes some concessions which it has never yet made in regard to the ministry. But if the Bishop of London wants to fraternize with the Methodists, why not let him fraternize without coldly reminding him of the present impossibility of union. We shall never be satisfied with less than the complete unity of all Christians; but, while we are approaching that consummation and are yet a long way from it, we will welcome interdenominational fellowship and goodwill, wherever it may be exhibited. We hope the Bishop of London will not be discouraged.

We understand that the executive committee of the foreign society has unanimously agreed to recommend to the forthcoming convention the gradual withdrawal of our missionary forces from Turkey. They have reached this conclusion after a long and careful consideration of the matter, and after personal examination of the situation on the ground by the president of the foreign society. As we understand, this action is not the result of any dissatisfaction with the character of our missionaries there, who have been faithful and earnest men and have done what they could under the circumstances. It is without any reflection upon these missionaries that this recommendation is to be made. Such are the peculiar conditions in Turkey that, in the judgment of the committee, the results of our labor in that field, judging by the past, are not likely to be such as to justify the expenditure we are making there, in view of the limited resources of the society and the pressing demands from more promising fields. The pre-occupancy of that field also by the Congregationalists of this country gives rise to complications which make the withdrawal advisable. We understand that Brother Chapman, who has been our missionary in Constantinople, is in hearty accord with this recommendation, though it is, naturally enough, disappointing to the Armenian missionaries who are laboring in that field. We can heartily sympathize with them in their feeling of disappointment, while at the same time we recognize the imperative obligation which rests upon the executive officers of the society, and upon the society itself, to make the wisest use of the funds committed to its care, by expending them where they will accomplish the best results. When the committee has presented to the convention through its general board of managers, the reasons for this proposed action, we trust the matter will receive that careful and dispassionate consideration which its importance requires. The subject is one that must be considered in the light of all the facts, and in the spirit of Him under whose supreme authority missions are carried on.

Editor's Easy Chair.

Distance is not the only thing which lends enchantment to the view. The haze which, in the autumnal season, is spread over the landscape like a thin, translucent veil, lends an enchantment to the scene which no lover of nature has failed to appreciate. It softens the glare of the sunshine and gives a tone and color to the atmosphere which seems to harmonize well with the spirit of the season. October is one of the fairest and most brilliant of all the months, in this latitude. The heat of summer is gone and the "melancholy days" of which Bryant sings with "meadows brown and bare," have not yet come. It is the period of the "Indian summer" than which there is no season of the year more delightful. The only discordant thing about it is that it woos one to the woods and to the streams at a time when a score of pressing interests are claiming his attention in the city. What right has nature to be waving her red banners on the hillsides, and chanting her sweet melodies in the flowing stream, and arraying herself in her most gorgeous robes, when the demands of business, of education, of the church and its manifold activities, are occupying the attention of the people? But after all a majority of us are not living in the cities yet, and those who live in country and town and village are permitted to enjoy the full benefit of the season. Nor can those of us whose misfortune it is to be confined to the cities this season of the year be wholly deprived of these charms of nature. We see something of its beauty, feel something of its tonic, catch something of its spirit, and so manage to keep step with the procession of the seasons. And when we do get out into the midst of it how the glory of it fills the soul with delight and makes us glad that we are living in so beautiful a world!

This last phrase reminds me how much this world has been abused, even in our hymnology. Some of the old songs most guilty of this sin are getting out of fashion and I am glad of it. No longer do we hear the doleful strains of

"Dark and thorny is the desert
Through which pilgrims make their way"

The idea of s'andering this beautiful earth, with its trees and flowers, its mountains, hills and vales, its streams and groves and sweet-smelling landscapes, by calling it a "dark and thorny desert"! This is base ingratitude. Another one of these songs which has not yet dropped into the "innocuous desuetude" which it merits, charges this world with being "a howling wilderness." Men who write such songs are probably chronic dyspeptics whose stomachic disorders are mistaken for piety. "A howling wilderness," indeed! These men are guilty of doing most of the "howling." When the Almighty created this world He pronounced it "good", and he who differs with this judgment pays scanty respect to the Creator of the world and of man. He made it a beautiful world, and He made man with a sense of beauty to enjoy it. It is not piety but indigestion or a false view of religion or some other perversion of man's nature, that prevents him from enjoying what God has made for his enjoyment. The only thing wrong with this world is sin and what sin has wrought to deface it. When we get rid of sin and its defilements and ugliness there will be little left of which to complain. It is not the world in which we live that is at fault, but the sin and misery which men have brought into it. Let us help extend the kingdom of God all over it and it will blossom again with more than edenic beauty.

But whether the material world be beautiful or ugly depends altogether on the eyes that are looking at it. We are quite inclined to forget that a landscape, a work of art, a poem, a sermon, are quite as dependent, for the impression they make, on the subjective condition of the seer or hearer, as upon their objective merit. Some one has very truly said that we do not see things as they are, but as we are. It is this fact that makes the world a "howling wilderness" and a "thorny desert" to some, while to others it is a place where God's glory and wisdom and beauty are manifested. It is the office of education and religion to open the eyes of the mind and the heart that we may appreciate all the beauty that God has placed in this world, and all the glory which He has written across the face of the heavens, and all the majesty and might of wheeling suns and systems in the universe of which we are a part. Life is made richer, happier and more useful in proportion as we are able to take into our souls the great lesson which is written upon the pages of nature, as well as those on the pages of Revelation. Why is it that men and women move indifferently through a world crowded with wonders and see so little to excite their admiration and awe? It is because they fail to give attention to the ten thousand animate and inanimate things about them. Careful study of the most insignificant flower or insect will reveal a symmetry, an order and a beauty never dreamed of in these smaller things of nature. The same infinite Hand that paints the glory and splendor of the evening and the morning sky, beautifies with equal care the beetle's wings and the tiniest flower that grows by the wayside or that "wastes its sweetness on the desert air." In this God would teach us that the least thing that is worth doing at all should be done in the best manner possible. Two things filled Kant with awe: the starry heavens above him and the moral law within him. But without the moral law within him, there would have been no awe for the starry heavens above him. Only man made in the image of God can appreciate the grandeur and majesty of the material creation

Let us turn this lesson to where all our eyes are turning just now—the Minneapolis Convention. What will we get out of it? What impressions shall we carry away from it? How much widening of our mental horizon and of our sympathies and how much deepening of the spiritual life will we get out of the convention? That depends, not so much upon what will be said and done at the convention, as upon the mental and spiritual condition in which we go there. There is little doubt but that the occasion will have very much in it that is inspiring, that the music will be uplifting, that the addresses and sermons and devotional meetings will have in them the dynamic of high thought and of spiritual earnestness, but all that will be largely wasted upon us unless we go there in a condition of mental and spiritual receptivity, with a hungering and thirsting after truth and righteousness. If we go in that state of mind and heart we "shall be filled," and the families and the churches and the communities from which we go will be blessed by our going and by what we shall bring back with us of the thought and spirit of the convention. The convention will be great just in proportion as it is deeply religious in spirit, and profoundly in earnest in all its efforts to grapple with the great problems which are connected with the world's evangelization. Nothing short of divine strength and wisdom will suffice to deal successfully with these problems, and our going and our convocation will be largely in vain, unless we go in the spirit of prayer, sincerely and in all confidence seeking for that light which cometh down from above. Meeting together and working together in this spirit our convention will be great in its inspiration, great in its plans for the future and great in the far-reaching results which shall flow from it. Once more we repeat the message which came to us afresh from the lips of an ascending saint at the Jubilee Convention: "Quit you like men. Be strong."

Questions and Answers.

Bruce Brown writes: "All that he (Christ) taught was true before he came into this world and would still have been true had he never been born." Is this statement true? How can it be reconciled with Christ's statement, "I am the truth"? Is there not a relation between Christ and the truth he taught, so close that one cannot be separated from the other? Theo. A. Johnson.

Poplar Hill, Ontario, Sept. 17.

The statement quoted from Brother Brown does not seem to be in opposition to the statement of the Saviour. Certain truths doubtless would never have been known to men had they not been embodied in a personality like that of Jesus. For instance, God's love for men would never have been fully realized had he not given his only begotten Son that "whosoever believeth on him might not perish but have everlasting life." But Christ's coming did not create that love, but was the manifestation of it. As to whether there is "not a relation between Christ and the truth he taught, so close that one cannot be separated from the other," this is doubtless the case with those truths which relate to his own person and nature. What Christ taught about his coming from the bosom of the Father and about his mission in the world can only be true, of course, on the ground that he, the divine Word, did become incarnate and dwell among men, but it was not this class of truths, which grow out of the fact of Christ's having come in the flesh, to which Brother B. referred.

How do you account for the fact that so many well-to-do people who have passed for being intelligent are the victims of such transparent humbuggery in the business of healing as Doricism, Christian Science, etc.? Rusticus.

It is in part an illustration of the truth of what Barnum said, that the American people love to be humbugged. It also indicates how many people, fairly intelligent, are incapable of dealing with such questions as are involved in the claims of these various isms and fads. Lack of mental discipline, of a knowledge of human nature, of the exploded theories and humbugs of the past, and especially a very superficial knowledge of Christianity, lies at the bottom of all this susceptibility to inoculation by these modern fads. A wider knowledge of history and a better understanding of the relation between the mind and the body would enable people to see that what truth there is in these theories of modern healing is not new, and that what is new is not true. The remedy for the tendency on the part of a certain class of Christians to run off after these modern "healers" is a more widespread diffusion of knowledge and especially the knowledge of the Bible and of human nature, of Christ and Christianity.

Why do the members of the Christian Church stand during prayer when the early Christians of whom mention is made were to "kneel down to pray"? A Reader.

There is no uniformity as to the attitude of prayer among our churches. Some of them stand in prayer, some of them bow their heads and in some cases they kneel. We do not know of any instance where the early Christians in their public worship were said to kneel in prayer. The attitude of the body in prayer should be reverent and when that end is attained nothing further is necessary as to the body. The habit which some have of sitting upright and looking around during prayer is both irreverent and ill-mannered, and indicates both a lack of reverence and of good breeding.

Is it right for a Christian to take whiskey as a medicine? A Sister.

There is nothing wrong in a Christian's taking whiskey as a medicine when it is prescribed by a competent physician. Not many physicians, however, prescribe whiskey as a remedy for anything now, and no wise physician will do so where there is the slightest danger of its leading to evil results. No man, be he saint or sinner, should prescribe whiskey for himself, as we fear many do.

Confession in its Relation to Evangelization

By D. G. PORTER

A true conception of baptism in its relation to evangelization is most important, but a true understanding of the use and place of confession is scarcely less so under the conditions which prevail at the present day. The Disciples alone, so far as I know, seem to attach importance to it, or give it a prominent place in evangelical work. They seem, however, to have given much less attention to it than to baptism, not so much indeed as the importance of the subject seems to demand.

Faith says, "Jesus is the Christ of God." If he is the Christ, he is by divine authority the rightful Lord over all men, and all men owe him their allegiance as such. But it is one thing to believe that he is the Christ your rightful Lord, and another to act upon that belief and really accept him as Lord. Baptism in his name is, I believe, the divinely appointed means of rendering to him the act or pledge of allegiance, appointed expressly, it would seem, so that the subject may be able to do this, and know that he has done it in an acceptable manner.

When Peter, at Pentecost, proved to his hearers that "God had made this same Jesus whom they had crucified both Lord and Christ," they were naturally greatly disturbed at the thought that they had persecuted and put to death him who was the hope of Israel and their rightful king, thus apparently making him their implacable enemy. In their distress they turned to Peter and the other apostles and asked, "What shall we do?" Peter said in substance, "Turn from your evil way. Instead of continuing to oppose and persecute, become his faithful and obedient subjects, rendering to him the pledge of faithful allegiance by being baptized in his name, and your sins will be pardoned and you will be received into favor." To this they gladly consented to the number of 3,000 in a single day.

But where now is the place of confession? Apparently nowhere at all, but really in the baptism itself—baptism in the name of Jesus Christ. In baptism the subject is dealing as it were directly with Christ. Baptism is "toward God," not toward the minister, the church or the world—being the direct response of an honest purpose to the claims of the gospel (1 Pet. 3:21). Baptism in the name of Jesus Christ is in itself confession, a solemn, direct, personal acceptance of Jesus as Lord. Often, perhaps generally, there was in New Testament times apparently no confession except as it appeared in baptism. But confession aside and apart from baptism has an important place, since Paul declares that "if thou shalt confess Jesus as Lord with thy mouth thou shalt be saved." These words indeed seem apparently to rule out baptism as unnecessary, but only apparently, since as confession is involved in intelligent scriptural baptism, so baptism is implied and virtually promised in intelligent scriptural confession.

It is important, however, to consider just what is necessary to intelligent evangelical confession. The word in the original Greek is ὁμολογέω which means to say the same thing with another person, that is to come to an agreement with him, to acknowledge that what he says is true, that the claim he makes is just. The word "confession" in English according to the significance of its Latin derivation, corresponds almost exactly to the word ὁμολογία in Greek, and either word indicates that there are two parties to the transaction, and the relation between them is radically changed by it. Jesus claims in his gospel to be the rightful Lord over all men. To acknowledge the claim directly and personally for one who has not before admitted its truth, evidently changes the relation between him and Christ. The faith of the crucified robber could recognize even the dying Jesus as Lord, and he confessed him as Lord with his mouth. In Peter's declaration of faith in Matt. 16:16 he does not call Jesus Lord in express terms, and his words regarded as a model of confession are to that extent defective. We learn, however, from verses 21 and 22 of the same chapter that he did acknowledge and call him Lord "from that time forth." When Thomas was finally convinced that he was raised from the dead and was really the Christ he made his confession in the words, "My Lord and my God." Paul when convinced of the truth acknowledged Jesus as Lord whose commands he was presently willingly to obey by saying, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" In all these cases the subjects do not merely call Jesus Lord as a term of complimentary address, but they actually accept and take him to be the Lord and Ruler of their lives, and were hence not of the class to whom Jesus referred when he said, "Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?" This is what the believer who also is willing to obey the truth should do. "For if thou shalt confess with thy mouth Jesus as Lord and believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead thou shalt be saved."

But it is important to observe that the confession in the nature of the case should be made to Jesus himself in direct address. It was so made in all the examples recorded in the New Testament, and there is no reason why it should not be so made now, but rather every reason why it should. If Jesus was raised from the dead, he is alive and can hear what is said to him. He has authorized his ministers to baptize, but not to receive confessions for him and in his name. That would make the ministers figure too much in the role of priests. There are no examples in the New Testament of confessions made at second hand. The whole matter is between the subject and his Savior and there is no reason for calling in a third party. In verse 13 of the chapter above cited, Paul identifies confession with calling on the name of the Lord, which of course must be done in direct address.

Further, the confession must be made "with the mouth." In definite, intelligible words the subject must say to Jesus that he acknowledges and accepts him as his Lord. If he merely thinks his confession instead of expressing it in broken words, it will not be satisfactory even to himself. He will not know whether he has done anything or not, and can receive no assurance. And even the spoken words are to be confirmed and emphasized later by the solemn and impressive act.

But if the confession is to be made or repeated in connection with baptism, why is there need or occasion for any previous confession? Because there were anciently and have always been since, cases where immediate baptism was impracticable. Not all are so fortunately situated in this respect as were the Philippian jailer and the Pente-costians. But when a man believes and is decided in his own mind, he naturally wants to act, and to have the matter of his salvation settled without waiting on the convenience of ministers and baptisteries. He can do this previous to baptism by means of confession, and can take the word of a prophet and of an inspired apostle for his assurance. The confession above considered may properly be termed the evangelical confession. It is that which must be made in some form by every one who would become a Christian, and without which no one can be a Christian at all. All will admit that acknowledged lordship of Jesus and loyalty to him are the sine qua non of Christian life.

But there is another kind of confession mentioned in the New Testament which in contrast with that above, named "evangelical," may be properly termed the heroic confession, the Scripture term for which seems to be καλός, noble, beautiful or good. There seems to be a certain propriety in this designation since this confession requires steadfastness, courage and sacrifice, and is often to be made in the face of danger or derision or even death. The evangelical confession is to be made by all, and once for all. The other is not to be made by all, nor once for all, but may be required many times in the course of a Christian life. In exhorting to steadfastness in this latter kind of confession, Jesus bids his disciples not to fear those who can only kill the body, but rather him who can destroy both soul and body in hell. And he promises to acknowledge before his Father and the angels those who have the courage and are not ashamed to face danger and derision by acknowledging their relation to him before men. Paul mentions two cases of this kind of confession, namely that of Jesus before Pontius Pilate, and that of Timothy before many witnesses, among whom we are at liberty to infer were powerful enemies and opposers, so that the confession had enough of the heroic quality to justify Paul in classing it with that of Jesus before Pilate, and in characterizing it by the same word.

If the disciples have made any mistake in this matter, I should say it is in that they have generally failed to distinguish between these two kinds of confession, and that they sometimes seem to accept as confession what is simply profession. When a man rises in a congregation after the sermon and says, "I believe that Jesus is the Christ the Son of the living God," it is not the evangelical confession which according to Rom. 10:9 would entitle him to salvation, and no one can see a reason why it should. He does not call on the name of the Lord, nor accept and acknowledge Jesus as his Lord by these words. As a matter of fact he probably does not believe that Jesus is the Christ any more than he did the week or the year before. His utterance on this occasion means simply that he is ready and willing to become a Christian. Other evangelical bodies reach the same result by asking those to rise who are willing to lead Christian lives, and there is really no more confession in the one case than in the other. The advantage of the disciples is that when a man has thus expressed his desire to become a Christian they let him do it, while the others send him to the inquiry room and wait for further mental or spiritual experience. This is a considerable advantage, but it would be much greater in my opinion, if instead of accepting the words of a profession, often, if not generally, imperfectly understood, they should require the true evangelical confession by sending the subject directly to Jesus to place himself under his lordship in definite, intelligible, spoken words. I would not make priests and confessors of the ministers and preachers, but I am not sure that I would not sometimes make "confessionals" of the retiring rooms about the baptistery, or provide other places of retirement in connection with evangelical services, for the benefit of those who could not otherwise have the desired opportunity of privacy. "And thou, when thou prayest, enter into the closet and shut the door."

The Problem of the Home

By S. J. WHITE

It is not brag or bluster, but sober judgment, when we affirm that the best government under the sun, the one of highest hopes and noblest opportunities, is the one that has for its banner the Stars and Stripes. We are leading in the grand march of the world's progress. We are fashioning a civilization more beautiful than the arts of Greece, more divine than the golden dreams of Plato, more diffusive than a hemisphere, and more enchanting than all the flowers that ever grew in the intellectual gardens of the past. In no other land is conscience so untrammelled, are men and women so royally and affluently endowed, and is it possible for angelic truths and sentiments to flutter and sing divinely in every soul. We have buried the divine right of kings with the rubbish of the centuries, we trust, never to be resurrected. We know—

" 'Tis liberty, fair liberty alone
That gives to the fleeting flower of life
Its sweetness and perfume."

But notwithstanding the wonderful achievements and progress of our Republic, it behooves us to recognize the fact that there are in our body politic to-day discordant and conflicting elements which, if left uncontrolled or misdirected, may yet rend our Nation into atoms. There are weighty questions before the American people demanding the most solemn and earnest consideration, and presenting problems the proper and timely solution of which will put to the test the highest possible order of the most profound and mature Christian statesmanship. When we seek for an explanation of the wonderful progress and achievements of American civilization, we are brought face to face with the fact that the religion of Christ has been the most potent factor in the construction of the American Republic and one of the greatest bulwarks of its magnificent principles and institutions.

It is the experience of many who are actively engaged in Christian work, that some of the greatest hindrances to the progress of the Master's cause are found to-day in many of our homes. The church prospers or languishes as the home life is Christian or non-Christian. The state can never rise above its homes. As go the homes of our land, so goes society, the church, the nation. When we learn to make more of our homes, our homes will make more of us and they will make the church and the state more what they ought to be. When there is not enough moral principle to make the family adhere, there will not be enough political principle to make the state adhere. If the American people desire universal moral and mental stagnation, like that which for forty centuries has characterized the nations of Asia and Africa, a religion as stereotyped, lifeless and unexpansive as that which permeates Buddhism; trade and commerce as dull as that which pervades the Ottoman empire; mental sterility, social stolidity and spiritual inanity, like that which marks the utter blackness of John Chinaman, they can come into the possession of all these by keeping Christ out of their homes. The salvation and safety of the state depend upon the salvation and safety of the home. There is something sublime and majestic in the white-haired veteran Joshua standing before Israel and confessing with heroic determination: "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." That testimony of a completed household for God moved all Israel to renewed fidelity and inspired the whole nation that day with uplifted hands to give themselves afresh to God in solemn, holy covenant. When the homes choose to serve God and him only, there will be no difficulty about missions and no evils powerful enough to destroy our civil and religious institutions.

The non-service of God, and disloyalty to Christ in our homes, is the secret of whatever weakness there is in our state mission work. These homes must be converted from the error of their ways. And this work of conversion should begin with the parents. Paul wrote to the Corinthians, "For the children ought not to lay up for the parents, but the parents for the children." He also wrote to the Ephesians, "And, ye fathers, stir not up the anger of your children; but bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." When spirituality is below par with the parents, it is generally at a discount with the children. It is the plain teaching of Christ that parents, both by precept and example, should educate their children first in divine things. But is not the very opposite to this found to be the teaching in many of our homes? Instead of cultivating the Christian virtues in the home, too many parents are fostering those evils which, in time, will destroy all interest in Christ and his cause.

In some homes, parents cultivate the idea that the chief end of life is to spend one's time in one perpetual round of worldly pleasures and festivities. In such homes, heroes of faith are not found. Is it possible that the parents in such homes are ignorant of the fact that there is no more effectual way to destroy a great nation than to give its young men and young women all the money they want, provide them with plays and festivities and amusements and leave them to sweat the life and manhood out of body and soul in the hot-bed of pleasure and self-indulgence? Have they forgotten that it is an incontrovertible fact, that the downfall of Babylon was due more to the sensual and self-indulgent spirit of her young men and young women than to all other evils combined? That is the way Babylon was ruined. That is the way imperial Rome became an easy prey to northern barbarians. That is the way Christian Constantinople came under the debasing and abominable sway of the Mohammedans. That is the way Venice ended a thousand years of independent and glorious history. And I know of nothing that could come to this fair land of ours that would be more disastrous than a generation of young men and young women without energy, without principle, without conscience, and without ideas which beautify and enrich the soul and make for the enlargement of Christ's kingdom. Let such young men and young women give tone to public opinion, and take the lead in the highest circles of society, and it will not be long until you can look upon the political map of the world for the free America of to-day as vainly as you look for the lost Atlantis that lies buried in the ocean. I frankly confess that I despair of such a permanent triumph of right in our state as we all desire until there is a most radical change in our home and social habits. The father of Hannibal brought him to the altar when he was very young and made him swear eternal hostility to Rome. Our home must be made the sanctuaries at whose altars we shall make our children vow eternal hostility to all unrighteousness.

There are homes in which the parents are given to avarice, covetousness, and selfishness, and their example is such that the children infer that the whole duty of man is to seek first the kingdom of gold and silver. There is an idol in our civilization like that which the Chaldean monarch set up in the plain of Dura—an image of gold. The lovers of wealth are prostrating themselves before it, and the worship of this idol is as corrupting to our civilization as the worship of Baal was to Israel. A careful investigation discloses the fact that the shrines of this idol are in our homes, and, consequently, our children too often imagine that to be rich is the sum of human happiness, and, therefore, the most important thing in life. If this idol ever falls, it must fall like Dagon before the ark of God. And as the ark that contained God's righteous laws rested in a private family before it found a place in the temple, so must the gospel of Christ be in the family before it can be in the state. One of the great needs of our time is more men who will not bow down to Mammon though he should offer all the kingdoms of the earth and the glory of them.

The men who laid the foundation of our government and the men who have built thereon the most beautiful temple of liberty in all the annals of history, were men who were reared in homes where selfishness and the idolatry of covetousness were strangers.

"They were the luster lights of their day,
The sacrificial giants who Cleaved the darkness asunder
And beckoned us where we are."

Let parents do their duty in the home, teaching the life of self-denial exhibited by Christ, and this temple of liberty will stand in the ages to come a monument to the self-denial of our fathers and an inspiration to coming generations to live like the noble Fabricius of whom his enemy, King Phyrus, said, "It would be as easy to turn the sun from his course as Fabricius from the paths of honor."

"God give us men! A time like this demands Clean minds, pure hearts, true faith, and ready hands.

Men who possess opinions and a will;
Men whom desire for office does not kill;
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy;
Men who have honor; men who will not lie;
Tall men; sun-crowned men; men who live above the fog

In public duty and in private thinking;
Men who can stand before a demagogue And denounce his treacherous flatteries without winking.

For while base tricksters with their wornout creeds,

Their large professions, and their little deeds,
Wrangle in selfish strife, lo! Freedom weeps.
Wrong rules the land, and waiting Justice sleeps."

We have the godless home: the home where vicious literature is read instead of the Bible; where there is no sacred regard for the Lord's day, no desire to worship, no prayer, no praise. In such homes there is no religion, and where there is no God, there is no conscience, and where there is no conscience there is no respect for the rights of men, and where there is no respect for the rights of men, there is no security for life or property, and where there is no security for life or property, there is anarchy. The love of country, the love of man, the love of self, and the love of God demand that anarchy at once be blotted from our civilization. But it will never be done until our godless homes are made Christian homes.

Two things at least must be done: First, our pulpits must be occupied by larger men—men who will not be satisfied with themselves until every home in the church with which they are laboring has a part in sending the gospel to the needy places; the responsibility for success or failure rests very largely with the preachers. Second, the eldership of our churches must recognize more and more the power of the religious press. The time has come when every church should be so managed that at least one religious paper will be found in every home in that church. The people will not and cannot be expected to be interested in something that they know nothing about. Give the people the facts, and when the call for help comes, they will respond.

Books are the food of youth; the delight of old age; the ornament of prosperity; the refuge and comfort of adversity; a delight at home, and no hindrance abroad; companions by night, in travelling, in the country.—Cicero.

Romans 3:7,8 By C. L. FIDLAR

II.

The incident was the talk of the neighborhood the next day. That night the house could not hold the people. Some came to see the preacher, some to enjoy the meeting and some to see what Schooner Allen would do, and to enjoy any fun that might be on hand. But Schooner and his boys failed to appear. He was heard to say down at the Locks the next day that it was all right, that he only got what he deserved; but that he felt like shooting the other fellows for not taking their medicine too. But those who heard him thought that he was only "layin' low." But another week passed and still no Schooner or his followers.

There had been several confessions this evening and Cliver and the evangelist were walking home after the services. As usual their little company dropped apart as each reached his home. As Summers and Cliver turned into their own lane Summers noticed that Miss Edmonds was left alone. "See here, Bro. Cliver, it won't do for Miss Edmonds to go all the way home alone. Just leave the door unlocked for me." He soon caught up with her.

"Pardon me, Miss Edmonds," he said, "but you seem to be alone; so with your permission I'm going to see that nothing makes away with you down this hill and all the way home."

"I'm ever so thankful to you for your kindness, Mr. Summers. I was expecting my brother at church this evening, but I suppose he forgot it."

They walked along together down the long winding hill. The moon was at the full, and the whole sky and air seemed surcharged with glorious light. The night was not cold and the hour was early, so what wonder if they failed to make the half mile as quickly as they might have done. He was a preacher, true, and no doubt should have been thinking of the sins of the world and the awful condition of fallen humanity; but who, be he preacher or sinner, can resist the witchery of a night such as this, and the charm of an intelligent, laughing girl? I doubt if you could, and I frankly confess that I could not, so let us be charitable, for Summers was but of our susceptible human dust if he did wear the cloth. No doubt he should have discussed weighty questions of deepest moment to the soul's salvation; but he did not. No, he spoke of the moonlight, of the trees, now almost bare, of a little owl that flitted past like a speck of shadow cast by nothing. They laughed and chatted like the weakest of human atoms. When they took a short cut through the pasture and the strip of woods, it was not to lessen the distance, but because it was away from the road. They felt like they were the only creatures enjoying this night, and anything to remind them that others existed was an intrusion.

So they left the highway of men and crossed the fields. He helped her over the old rail fence just as if she had not climbed it unassisted since she could remember. But he was sure the rail would turn with her this time. She thanked him and he made some nonsensical reply about its being some sort of a pleasure. They both laughed and started across the pasture. A startled crow flew out of some bushes and he quoted a verse of "The Raven." She liked it and he quoted another. Possibly he might have quoted the whole poem had they not reached the little branch that reeled its way across the pasture. It was not frozen, so he must assist her over. The water scarcely covered the old rails thrown into it, but he again feared that they might turn, or that her foot might slip. So he went before, and reaching back, took her hand and steadied her over. As he assisted her up the bank a brier caught on her skirt. He held it with his foot and pulled it loose. Then he told her what it was a sign of. She replied that she did not believe it, for it had never come true in her case. He then told of a girl who had such faith in it that she used to scatter briers along her path on purpose. They both laughed again and were happy.

As they passed through the shadow of the woods, she was not afraid, but he was fearful lest she would be. Did he take her arm? Well, I could not see, but he being a preacher and she a sinner, and the Bible saying something against being unequally yoked together, I judge that he did not. Still I am not certain that that particular passage of Scripture occurred to him just then. But the danger of the woods and the danger to the preacher were soon passed, and they were again in the road.

Ahead of them a man was approaching, and it was soon plain that he was intoxicated. As he neared them Miss Edmonds laid her hand on the preacher's arm. It was a little thing, but to him she turned for protection if need be. He felt the confidence in the light trembling touch and gently but firmly drew her arm through his own. Just as they met, the stranger stepped in front of them. His face was from the light and under his slouched hat they could see no familiar features. Summers and Miss Edmonds attempted to pass him, but just then he caught at her and growled thickly, "Gimme that gal." Summers stepped before her and caught the man's arm. What should he do? Should he use force? For once he wished he was not a preacher and an advocate of moral suasion. Possibly he might have released the arm and attempted to pass on, but just as this resolution was forming, he caught the glint of a knife or a revolver. At that glance he was not a minister. He was the "quarter-back" again; he was on the gymnasium floor with the gloves; he was training for the pentathlon; his specializing in theology was all a myth. Moral suasion to the winds! He had a physical opponent and he was angry. A lady was looking to him for protection. She was even now trembling at his side. His loose glove was off in an instant and with bare fist he dealt his opponent a crushing blow square in the face. All the force of many friendly bouts was back of it, and the stranger went heavily over into the ditch beside the road. Summers turned to Miss Edmonds and said, "I think he'll know better next time. Let him lie there awhile." He drew her arm again through his and turned away, leaving the intruder still in the ditch.

"Don't go back that way," Miss Edmonds pleaded as they tarried a moment at the gate. "That man might be waiting there yet."

Summers laughed and said, "I won a half-mile foot race when I was in school."

"Yes, but you won't run now."

"I'm not so sure of that. There's nothing like the presence of a lady to give a man courage."

"But can't you go some other way?" she continued to plead. "Take the short cut back through the woods."

"I'm going to take our short cut through the woods and the pasture," he replied. "But I think when he crawls out of that ditch he'll be sobered. So you need have no fear. Good-night."

But she did have fear, and instead of entering the house she stood in the shadow of the cedars and watched him till he blended into the moonlight.

As Summers walked slowly homeward the moonlight lost some of its glory. He was disturbed in mind. Had he done right? He had struck a brother; had given the blow in anger, and with all of his might. No doubt the man was wounded severely, for a square blow of his fist was always dreaded in the gymnasium, even though the blow was accompanied with a laugh. But then, what else could he do at the moment? As a gentleman he could not step aside and yield to the demands of the man. But could he not have reasoned with him? Did he even try? He recollected that he had not spoken so much as a word. But he saw a weapon, and doubtless the man would have done one or both of them harm. It was self-defense. Yes, he was justified in his deed. Any court would uphold him. But should he as a minister of peace and a follower of the unresisting Nazarene resist unto force, and that in an angry spirit? He might have secured the weapon. No, he was guilty. In his anger he had not so much as stopped to see how severely he had wounded the man.

Thus did he reason with himself. When expediency held sway he was justified but when conscience spoke, he was guilty. His struggle was desperate; so desperate that he failed to note the distance he had come. He raised his head, he was again at the place of the encounter. He involuntarily glanced into the ditch. There was a dark object lying in it. He paused and a tremor shot through him. What was it? Could it be? He looked more narrowly. Yes, it was true.

"My God," he cried, "have I committed murder?" He sprang into the ditch and bent over the prostrate man. He raised the limp, helpless head and with his handkerchief wiped the blood from the cut and bruised face. As he wiped it clear, a ray of moonlight fell across it. It was Schooner Allen. Was he dead? In terror Summers bent low over him. "No, thank God, he breathes! I'll save him yet with God's help. Father, hold not this sin against me! Help me to atone for it!" He almost cried aloud in his anguish.

Taking the fallen man in his arms he scrambled from the ditch. Down the road, through the woods, across the pasture, he almost ran. It was the very way he had come with Miss Edmonds, but all was different now. As he crossed the branch at a bound, he felt no light hand in his, but a leaden head on his arm. The startled crow that again flew from the bushes called forth no poetry this time. Up the long winding hill he went without a pause. Ah, how his severe physical training stood him in hand! He saw no moonlight on the fields now; it seemed to center with all of its power on a little crimson stream that trickled down a white face and over his coat sleeve. He ran up the little lane to the Cliver home and knocked loudly at the door.

"That bruise on the back of his head must have come from striking a rock or something in the ditch," Summers said as he bent over him.

"You give him a good lick for onet," Cliver replied. But Summers made no answer. He was still fearful, not only on Schooner's account, but of what effect this would have on the meeting if it should get out. The meeting was now at its height and every night was witnessing conversions.

"What do you think, Bro. Cliver, shall we keep this to ourselves till the meetings are closed, or shall we make a clean breast of it now?"

"Well," Cliver replied, "I 'low it might be best to say nothing about it at present. Nobody knows about it but us, and Schooner won't git out of that bed fer a spell."

"No, no one knows of it but ourselves and Miss Edmonds and she doesn't know who it was. I'll see her and tell her what we have decided to do. But I must make a clean statement of it before I leave." So it was decided to keep the matter secret till the meetings closed, or at least as long as possible.

(TO BE CONCLUDED.)

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

Why did God permit the death of President McKinley? He was a good man and a great. He was a useful man. The nation needed him, and the world. His wife needed him. Why did God permit the bullet of the assassin to terminate his honorable and useful career? Why?

I do not know. This an inexplicable event. There are many such. But this is not a new question. It has been propounded again and again. It is as old as the race. The name of William McKinley is the only new feature of the old inquiry. Twenty years ago the name of James A. Garfield was in the question. Thirty-six years ago it was that of Abraham Lincoln. More frequently the name used in the agonizing inquiry is that of wife, husband, son, daughter, father, mother. The name, probably, of one not known to the world, but whose life seemed essential to the home. Why this bereavement? It is an old and always new question. In its presence we are dumb.

Perspective is needed in order to make even a partial reply. Just now we are too near the awful tragedy which has been enacted to think soberly. We are yet dazed—I am. As we read the farewell words of our noble and good President tears fill our eyes. How thoughtful of others. How considerate.

"My wife: be careful about her: don't let her know." "Let no one hurt him." "I am sorry to have been a cause of trouble to the Exposition." "Good-by, all, good-by." "It is God's way: His will be done, not ours."

This death scene unnerves us as nothing since the assassination of President Lincoln. By and by we may understand—not now.

Perspective, as I was saying, is needed. This helps us to see that many, at the time, inexplicable sorrows and bereavements have resulted in incalculable good. Let us trust God. He has compelled so many dark experiences to work for the betterment of the world we can believe that he will bring blessing out of this terrible tragedy. Can you not believe this? I can: I do. God reigns. His hand is at the helm. He directs the course of the ship of state. It is plain that he has been in our life, in our national life, from the beginning. He has not left us now. He controls all the affairs of our little world. Not a sparrow falls without his notice. The hairs of our heads are numbered. Nothing happens. There are no accidents. Believe in God. Believe in his Son, Jesus Christ our Lord. Let not your heart be troubled. This is the divine prescription for sorrow. In his own good time he will throw light on the mysteries of bereavements, sufferings, sorrows. God is our Father: we are his children. He is infinite, we are finite. He loves us. His resources are boundless. Hold fast these truisms.

What a puzzling problem was the experience of Moses. He had a mighty brain and a great heart. He was an educated gentleman. His manners were those of a courtier. Moses was a born king among men. All other statesmen are small compared with him. If he was not inspired by Jehovah, he was a demi-god. He was heir apparent to the throne of Egypt—at the time, the greatest government on earth. A great purpose animated him from his youth. His people were in slavery and he determined to give them freedom. A lofty purpose this: a worthy aim. He slew an Egyptian in a moment of excitement. The Egyptian was maltreating a Hebrew. 'Tis easy to excuse Moses. But he became a fugitive. He fled for his life. He lived in exile forty years. If you had lived at the time could you have explained this singular and sad turn in the fortunes of this great, this noble, man? It is more than probable that your faith in God would have faltered. Where now are the promises of Jehovah to Abraham, to Isaac, to Jacob? What is the use of trying to be good, noble, helpful to others? His father, mother, sister, brother, are broken-hearted. I can hear his poor mother cry out in the deep anguish of her soul: "Would God he had died in infancy. My son a murderer and a fugitive! Why has Jehovah permitted this?" The condition of the Hebrew people is now worse than it was before. All hope is gone. While in exile Moses served as a shepherd. Educated in all the learning of the Egyptians, the adopted son of a princess, accustomed to the manners of royalty and aristocracy, with mental powers fitting him for the most exalted station, with a culture which made him a fit companion of the noblest of earth, he cares for a flock of sheep! Can you explain this? Could you have explained it at the time? No indeed. The mystery was deep, dark, impenetrable. Now we see that his experience in exile was a necessary part of the preparation that Moses needed to do the work for which the Lord intended him. His experience, in appearance, was evil: in reality it was good—good for Moses, good for the Hebrews, good for the world, good for us now. He was not prepared to undertake the work of emancipation and leadership when in a moment of indignation he fatally smote the Egyptian. All is plain now: all was dark then.

Recall the story of Joseph the Hebrew slave who became the Viceroy of Egypt. There is nothing more mysterious than the experience of this boy who when he came to man's estate was given a position in the government second only to that of the monarch. "Is there a God?" he might have asked in the midst of the unjust treatment that was meted out to him and the sufferings that came upon him. His envious brothers sell him into slavery. While a slave and faithful to his master he is falsely accused and thrown into prison. Two years he serves as a convict. Disgrace covers him. The only friend he seemed to have was untrue to him. The case is hopeless. Not a single ray of light can be seen in any direction. All is darkness. Jacob in Canaan is mourning the death of his favorite son. "What have I done that I should be thus bereaved?" he said to himself. "Jehovah cared for my grandfather Abraham, and he cared for my father Isaac, and he was with me and blessed me in Padan Aram; but he has forsaken me now." At that moment Jehovah was preparing a wonderful deliverance for Jacob and his family. "God moves in a mysterious way his wonders to perform." Now we know that God's hand was in these strange events. Jehovah was good, infinitely good, in all that he did. Never more gracious was he than in the bitter experiences of Joseph and his father Jacob. "These things are written for our learning." As Jehovah wrought then so he works now. Dost thou believe?

Imagine the feeling of Mary, if you can, as she saw her son die on the cross. She did not know what his death meant. His disciples did not understand. Out of heart they returned to their former vocation. Some light came to them when Jesus arose; but how mysteriously dark were the days until the day of Pentecost was fully come. Now we are familiar with the thought that in all these transactions our Father was revealing his love. Then it seemed as if God were dead!

What is death anyway, that we should feel as we do about it? Paul says that it is an item in the inventory of the believer's wealth. It is the gateway through which the children of God by a spiritual regeneration pass to glories inconceivable by the human mind. "Why do we mourn departing friends?"

God's in heaven and all is well. Comfort your heart with these thoughts.

Anarchism and the Saloon.

By H. K. Hinde, M. D.

[The following remarks by Dr. Hinde at the McKinley memorial services in Mexico were reported by Clayton Keith.]

There are some things that have no right to live in this free American republic; and for the simple reason that they strike at the very foundation of all law and order. I venture to name in this presence two things of this class, that of right ought to die, and as a matter of fact are doomed to die at no distant day: Anarchism and the Saloon. These twin children of the devil, these murderers not only of our presidents, but of our children, and destroyers of our homes—I name them together because they belong together and go together; and would to God they could be buried in one common grave.

They represent the lowest and vilest and most destructive elements that our ruining our beloved land. They are outlaws and deserve no favor or mercy at the hands of American freemen.

The saloon is the hotbed where these vipers of anarchism are hatched and nursed into life to go about their hellish work. Trace the history of this man Czolgosz, and Miss Goldman, the Isaacs, Herr Most, and the rest. Where do you find them? Always in the saloon. There it is they meet and plot, and from there they go to their diabolical work. We have tried every other remedy. It is useless to dally with these questions any longer. The life of our country is too dear to longer experiment with remedies of doubtful efficacy. We cannot afford to lose another Lincoln, another Garfield, another McKinley. Nor can we afford to lose tens of thousands of promising young men that are going to drunkard's graves through the enticements of the saloon.

Let the Christian nations of the world select an island in mid-ocean, the farthest from all other land, and there transport these murderers and free-lovers and disturbers of society and there let them enjoy to the full the results of their own teaching. As lepers of society let them be inexorably excluded from any contact with Christian civilization, except it be through the service of Christian missionaries, who are willing to die as martyrs for the Master. And then when we are rid of this vile brood, let us shoot to the death with the ballot these saloons all over our Christian land so that there shall be no hatching places for all these vices that tend to undermine and destroy us as a people. This the Christian people of America have the power and the opportunity of doing, just as soon as they have the will.

The Situation in China.

By WILLIAM REMFREY HUNT.

We stand appalled at the magnitude of the evangelization of this swarming yellow race. In his address delivered recently before the conference of missionaries at Shanghai, Dr. Timothy Richard urged the importance of this great problem of the Christianization of this wonderful empire. Quoting Sir W. Hunter, he said: "There are fifty millions in India who will join some new religion within the next fifty years. China's four hundred millions are beginning to consider seriously whether the adoption of a new religion may not be advantageous."

This new attitude of a changing state confronts the Christian Church with its most titanic task. Think!

The Supreme Need.

The voices of eighteen hundred missionaries (there were two thousand last year) call loud and long for more workers! Send us men and women who will come with a soul-burning desire to save their fellow men. Send us those who are filled with the Spirit and with self sacrifice. Send us those whose equipment is of the very highest kind. Above all send us those whose lives will be the grandest witness to their calling long before their lips are unsealed to lisp the name of Jesus in Chinese. O for men, for men of God, for Christlike, humble, persistent, toiling souls whose faith and devotion shall be to their fellows a consuming fire. Never before was the need so great and the call so real.

The Workers.

The fields are all now occupied. Most of the stations were months without the missionary. The native Christians stood the refining like pure gold. Its reflex influence on the workers kindled faith and inspired enthusiasm. Dr. Macklin is as busy as ever. Dr. Butchart is busy building a hospital in Lu Cheo fu. Dr. Osgood is building a dispensary in Chu Cheo. W. R. Hunt opened a new substation at Woee. Evangelist Shi and his wife preach the gospel there.

T. J. Arnold yields the school over to F. E. Meigs and takes up evangelistic work in Nanking. Miss Lyons's school is prospering. It is good to see her back at her place again. Pray for the girls that they may be all won for Jesus. Some of the boys in the Christian college are developing into fine preachers. T. J. Arnold did good solid work during his tentative office in the school.

C. E. Molland and family with Miss Kellar make up the happy little mission band at Wuhu. We do not often see them but when we do we hear of good work done and the cause prospering. C. B. Titus and Eunice Titus work in Lu Cheo fu. Bro. Titus is prospering well in the language. He is a bold preacher. His wife is one of the bravest women in the field and has a splendid work among the women in that city. She has been the only resident woman worker in that great district for three years. Asking her, the other day, if she did not feel lonely, she brightly replied, "I am too busy to think about it, and the need is so great." She is looking forward to Miss Mary Kelly's going there as her co-worker.

Frank Garrett and wife go to Luho to live this fall. Nanking is sorry to lose them. They go to take up the long neglected work in Luho. There is a harvest of souls to be gathered in there. May the Lord make them bright witnesses and fruitful soul winners. They speak Chinese well.

We learn that F. E. Meigs sails this month. We are all looking for him and shall give him a warm welcome back to the land of his adoption. We are also to welcome some workers from Australia, viz., Bro. and Sister Ahgan and Miss Toukin. James Ware and family were welcomed back to China. He is busy building a home in Shanghai. He is an able linguist and preacher and does good work on the Bible translation and revision committee.

W. P. Bentley's institute is his darling. He regards it thriving, successful and aggressive. He has good fortune in securing good native assistants. Besides his own evangelistic work he superintends thirteen Chinese colporteurs for the American Bible Society.

The ladies of the mission who are married do much good missionary work, besides that of an occasional evangelistic trip with their families, by receiving the Chinese women into their homes. By this means the heathen women get an object lesson of the transforming and beautifying influence of Christian home life. Let Christ reign in a hundred million homes in China and there will be no more yellow peril!

The Outlook.

From a political viewpoint the outlook is anything but satisfactory. The court is still stubborn and hostile. The conservative element is in the ascendant. The Manchu regime must go before there can be any permanent progress. It is sensual, corrupt, dark, sinister, heathen and steeped in the blackest of murderous intrigue. The Empress Dowager still reigns and while this red-handed Chinese Jezebel rules, there can be no peace or justice. From the imperial harem she rules the eunuchs and princes and will continue to do so whether the capital be Peking, Nanking or Hsian.

From the missionary viewpoint the prospect is still hopeful. Already the progressive mandarinates are assisting to reconstruct the broken mission stations. Missions in China will triumph! But the churches must send more men and more means. Whole districts are shepherdless. The need is vital and imperative. Well might Dr. Josiah Strong pertinently ask, "What are churches for but to make missionaries? What is education for but to train them? What is commerce for but to carry them? What is life itself for but to fulfill the purpose of foreign missions, enthroning Jesus Christ in the hearts of men?"

Let Us Pray.

How little we have realized the dynamic force of prayer. All the great missionaries were hot in prayer. They burned out for God. Think of Brainerd, Hannington, Mackay, Keith Falconer, Morrison, Livingstone, Garst, Law, Chalmers and the host of missionary martyrs recently ascended. How they spent themselves in prayer. The very missionary societies were born in and out of prayer. Would that the whole church of God would unite in heart, purpose and determined faith to say, "Let us pray." Should we not then expect wonderful power, advancement and blessing? Your missionaries in China are praying with our devoted president, A. McLean, for the Minneapolis Convention and for the results of that great and grand gathering of the Disciples. We are praying too for F. M. Rains, our able and aggressive financial manager of the foreign society and expect him to impart unto us some spiritual gift and cheer us.

"Onward! till the course is finished,
Like the ransomed ones before;
Keep the faith through persecution,
Never give the battle o'er."

Our Christian greeting to the convention at Minneapolis!

Chu Cheo, via Nanking.

The murderer and the unloving sit on the same bench before the Judge of eternal truth. . . . Until we love our brother,—yes, until we love our enemy,—who is yet our brother,—we contain within ourselves the undeveloped germ of murder. And so with every sin in the tables, or out of the tables.—George MacDonald.

Our New Departure.

Having just enjoyed the annual convention of the Christian Association of Great Britain, it is a pleasure to me to record the experiences of a memorable week. This was the twenty-first annual conference. Certain American friends may happen to read these lines in whose minds the mention of the Christian Association will call up vivid reminiscences. To Bros. Moore, Van Horn, Richardson, Earl, will come back the memory of the meeting twenty-one years ago in the village of Helsby, Cheshire, where they and some English friends, as well as M. D. Todd of sainted memory, gathered to form a co-operation of new churches of Christ. A leader in the holy effort was the beloved Timothy Coop. Out of that incident issued the association to which now belong nearly 2,500 Christians. We meet year after year at this or that spot where we possess a church; and this time "our cathedral," West London Tabernacle, was the scene of the convention. The session has been memorable. It was felt by the hundreds of delegates and visitors present from the churches that the time was fully ripe for a new departure; that we must go in instantly for church extension; that an evangelist should be at once sent out into the open field; and that efforts must be made on the spot to raise a goodly fund by self-sacrifice all round.

Our New Evangelist.

After careful discussion it was resolved to ask J. H. Bicknell to leave his Liverpool pastorate in order to take the field and challenge the people of England wherever he can go to hearken to our grand plea. It has been the habit of this vivacious American preacher to hold frequent protracted meetings at Liverpool, leading them himself if he could not manage to bring in some outside evangelist, and his success has made him famous among us. Naturally, he has been constantly importuned to go to hold protracted meetings for other churches, and he has added these to the labors of his pastorate, thus running the risk of exhaustion. To continue thus would break down any man, and the Liverpool church has been induced, for the common good, to surrender their minister's services that he may be free. The results of Bro. Bicknell's coming efforts are likely to be very fruitful. He recently returned in excellent health, with Mrs. Bicknell, from a restful holiday in his American home. The second item in our fresh departure initiated at this convention was the resolution to plant a church of Christ at Brighton, the beautiful town commonly called "London-by-the-Sea." Brighton is a great city. It is on the Sussex coast and is the most important town on our southeastern English shore. I remember how J. M. Van Horn and I used to talk about Brighton as a choice location for a mission, and how that able brother felt strongly impelled to start the movement there. The new resolution is due to the initiative of Milner Black, who was formerly one of our preachers in Melbourne, then amongst you in the States, and afterwards at our Liverpool church which he left to go into business at Brighton. He succeeded in bringing the convention to adopt his idea of now commencing a mission, and in a few weeks premises in Brighton are to be converted into a small preaching hall. The convention, for this purpose and one or two other schemes which have been well discussed, opened a list of pledges. The money thus raised in an enthusiastic meeting amounted to nearly 600 pounds. This shows that we are alive and in earnest. After a season of depression the tide has turned.

Missionaries and Our Conference.

It is generally our blessed fortune to secure the presence at our annual assemblies of several missionaries going to or returning from the far east. On this occasion we have had at the meetings Mr. and Mrs. Menzies, J. O. Grainger and Miss May Johnson, all going out as new missionaries to India, and Miss Josepha Franklin, returning to the same country to resume her work at Damoh. Each of these gave a stirring address. All seemed deeply interested to be among us in transitu. Of course Miss Josepha Franklin's speech was the piece de resistance of our great missionary meeting in West London Tabernacle. That speech will stand out as the monumental incident of our 21st convention. Miss Franklin is a great missionary. She is one of those heroines who are absolutely absorbed in the interests which she represents. Those interests are the interests of the heathen who are to be brought to Christ. Her description of the famine will never be forgotten, and yet it was not so much a delineation of the horrors as of the wonderful work attempted and achieved by the missions, in which the Indian government gratefully joined. I want to emphasize this last fact. Missions have triumphed in India over all political and bureaucratic indifference and prejudice, through the splendid Christian heroism of the missionaries. India has been made to feel that the very element of philanthropy lacking in its hoary paganism is the most shining factor in Christianity.

My Interview with Miss Franklin.

It is quite a liberal education to listen to some people, as Lord Chesterfield said in particular of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu. One of these informative personalities is Miss Josepha Franklin. I could not make myself contented with what I had heard from her at the meetings, and I felt myself fortunate in being allowed to interview her at the Avondale Hotel, near the British Museum, where she is staying a few days, with her new young colleague, before sailing for India. To my many questions she gave most interesting answers. I especially wanted to know her opinion on the blessings or curses of the "British Raj," or English rule over India. On this she talked for two hours, much like Bro. Wharton talks on this great subject. She considers that British rule is all for good in India, and that the disparaging critics who tell how England is blocking, ruining, destroying her grand Eastern dependency, simply circulate shameful libels. The benefits conferred on India include the vast irrigation works, the great government railways, the immense length of good roads, the grand system of hospitals and dispensaries, and the thousands of schools, as well as the colleges and universities. We English Disciples of Christ are manifesting increasing interest in the Indian mission. We have two missionaries of our "very own"—

Miss D. McGavran and Miss E. Clarke. These are supported by our English C. W. B. M. But our hearts are touched by the fact that so many young American men and women elect to leave glorious America to work for the heathen under the British flag. Miss Josepha Franklin's heart is especially with the Hindoo children. She is passionately devoted to the Christian education of the young. She has been asked by the Indian government to take charge of the Government Public School for girls in Damoh. This is a proof of the profound confidence of the authorities in the mission.

Homage to President McKinley.

Deep pathos attached to the closing proceedings of the convention. The meetings terminated with the communion, and this commenced exactly at the moment when we all knew that President McKinley's funeral was beginning at Canton. The whole assembly rose and with bowed heads listened to the offering of prayer by E. H. Spring, our pastor at Gloucester. We were acting in unison with the whole nation. All England manifested like sympathy with America. Truly these two nations are allied by a union of hearts. Political federation is often a fiction, but the affinity between the branches of the Anglo-Saxon community is the supreme fact of the age.

WILLIAM DURBAN.

London, Sept. 21.

Missions in the Northwest.

By H. D. Williams.

The coming National Missionary Convention at Minneapolis will assemble in the heart of a missionary country for our people.

Minnesota, Wisconsin, the two Dakotas, and Montana constitute an area of 494,745 square miles, making them a section larger than the whole of the Pacific coast. In natural material wealth it is surpassed by no other section of the land. In rapid and substantial development at present in progress, it is equaled by no other section of the whole earth.

It has a population of 4,785,000, and there are only about eighty of our churches in the entire section. No other section of the country so large, so intelligent and so rich in possibilities for the future, has been so neglected.

Thirty and forty years ago was the time above all times to send money and missionaries into this country. To-day we work at great disadvantage because it was not done then. We who live here find ourselves saying: "Oh, that somebody had aroused our fathers to missionary work in these parts!" One dollar then was worth ten dollars now. This is not said to repine over the unfortunate past, but rather to arouse to the opportunity of the present.

To-day one dollar will do as much as five dollars in the next generation. We cannot go back to correct the mistakes of the past, but we can begin now, on some adequate scale, to plant churches all over these states.

The American Christian Missionary Society should put at least $10,000 into this field during the next year. All the great denominations, though strongly established here, put more than that in the field.

Convention Reminders.

By Adelaide Gail Jenks.

Minneapolis, being the first "Mecca" in our march toward the conquests of the new century, is just now a hive of industry in the effort to supplement by energy and forethought her lack in numbers and resources in preparing for the coming convention; hoping to see the world's untiring workers in conclave here, planning great things for God, worthy of the day and the hour, and adequate to the great ends to be attained.

And we would remind not only our leaders but the rank and file, the picket guards, the lone watchman upon the walls, the isolated disciple who is true but fights alone (yet not alone, for one with God need never lose a battle), that we would count their name among the loyal legions who move upon this land to claim it for the Master.

"Minnesota for Christ," has long been our watchword, even when the altar fires burned low, believing He would give the victory at last if our faith and fervor fail not.

And we ask our brotherhood the world over to come with their spiritual loaves and fishes that with His blessing we may gather up of the fragments that remain enough righteous manna to infuse new life and vigor into our depleted ranks, forever moving westward.

Remember the time and the season.

When the mellow tints of autumn
Steal upon the plain and woodland,
When the maple and the elm trees
Fling their banners to the west wind,
Flaming gold and flushing scarlet
At the bidding of the hoar frost;
When the migratory song bird
Leaves its summer and its singing,
And the fulness of the harvest
Lies within the bulging garner, then shall we watch for a surging tide of consecrated souls to fill our gates, coming as an army with banners panoplied with truth's invincible armor, and set for the defense of the gospel and the restoration of the ancient order in its simple forms and primitive power.

The life sea is flecked with spent boatmen.

Truth's fair city enthroned on a hill,
Must keep his beacon light shining,
His sacred command to fulfil.

Oh, help us to send the glad message
Where darkened lives evermore see,
And beat 'gainst the bars of a prison—
Loose the soul! for his gospel is free.

The rough waves of strife drop to stillness
When white sails speed over the sea,
To carry this blessed evangel,
Ye laden ones—come unto me!

The flint of the wayfarer may fire a forest; then what may we not hope from the associated ardor of these congregated thousands?

May each one of the returning hosts carry back to the home field a stalwart courage, equal to the measure of their joy, and as telling as Luther at the Diet of Worms or Paul on Mars Hill.

Look at God's heroes the wide world o'er!
Towering above the wrecks of time—
They compassed earth and sea and sky
For love of truth and life sublime.

We look at Paul 'mid the breakers' roar,
Listen to songs from his prison cell;
Beaten and bruised for the Master's sake
He lived, that wonderful love to tell.

There are heroes still, and every day
Amid life's tumults and its jars,

They live a life for truth and God

That finds its orbit above the stars.

And as we stand at the portal now

Of the hundred years of joy or blight,

With eager courage we pledge anew

To labor for God and plead for right.

Campbell on Conventions.

By A. M. Growden.

The regular annual national convention of the churches of Christ will convene in the city of Minneapolis Oct. 10 and will continue a week.

The sessions will be held in convention, Minneapolis Exposition building which has a seating capacity of 6,000.

With the exception of the Christian Endeavor conventions, these are the largest religious gatherings in the states.

"It is estimated that never before in the history of Christianity did so many communicants sit together at the Lord's supper as at the union communion of the Jubilee convention at Cincinnati, 1899." Three great missionary organizations will be represented, viz: C. W. B. M., Foreign Christian Missionary Society and American Christian Missionary Society.

These conventions are purely missionary. They are called together, not to hunt for heresy, not to examine candidates for "holy orders" or novices in "theology," but to deliberate on worldwide evangelism. These churches exist for the restoration of The Lost Unity, and the evangelization of the world.

We are growing twice as fast as the population of our country. Minneapolis, a city of homes and hospitality, will be almost ideal for a visit in October after the sultry heat of summer has passed away. In less than fifty years it has reached a population of 202,718, and in point of size it is the sixteenth city in the Union.

To the lover of nature, a visit to Minnehaha Falls and Como Park, and Lake Harriet and White Bear Lake will be an added delight.

Hear the princely Campbell on conventions: "Conventions are as ancient as families. . . . I design no work of supererogation, and will not imagine that any brother or sister dissents from me in the utility, importance and blessedness of large protracted conventions of Christians assembled to worship God our Father.

"Through Jesus Christ our common Savior to exhort and stir up each other to adorn our calling, and to commend by preaching, teaching and exhortation, the gospel of our salvation to our fellow men, that they may freely and cheerfully participate with us in the blessings of the common salvation. . . . But besides these conventional meetings, there are those for the business proper to the Christian community. There are confessional meetings on the whole affairs of the Christian kingdom.

"There are fields of labor to be selected, evangelists or missionaries to be sent abroad, and the ways and means for accomplishing these objects are to be considered and provided for.

"Brethren, nor churches as individual communities CANNOT, in their individual capacities, accomplish these objects."

INAUGURATION OF KENTUCKY UNIVERSITY'S NEW PRESIDENT

The inauguration of President Burris A. Jenkins took place at Morrison Chapel of Kentucky University, on Thursday, Sept. 26. The exercises began at eleven o'clock with a sermon from Bro. E. L. Powell, of Louisville, who never spoke more thoughtfully or more effectively.

At one o'clock Acting President Milligan gave a luncheon to the distinguished guests of the university, among whom were: President Charles F. Thwing, of Western Reserve University, Cleveland, O., President Roberts, of Central College, Danville, Ky., President Weber, of Kentucky Wesleyan, Professor W. D. McClintock, of Chicago University, A. McLean, J. T. Brown, of Louisville, E. L. Powell and others.

At three o'clock the exercises began again in the Morrison Chapel. An address on behalf of the curators of Kentucky University was made by James H. Hazelrigg, ex-chief justice of the Supreme Court of Kentucky, a graduate of the institution and member of the board. It was exceedingly enthusiastic, and stirred the audience deeply.

This was followed by an address from President Thwing, of Western Reserve, the author of many books and articles on education. It was a scholarly, a religious, and an effective address. The subject was "The University in the Prosperous Democracy."

It was 4:20 o'clock when the new president arose to deliver his inaugural address. The audience had been wrought into a high tension of enthusiasm by the previous addresses, and when the incoming president stood up, as with one accord the entire audience arose to its feet and greeted him with cheers and college yells and the waving of handkerchiefs.

The vast assemblage seemed transformed into a sea of white sails. Above the storm of applause could be heard the students' "Hug, gah, hah!" It was a fitting tribute to the young man who will preside over the destinies of a great institution.

President Jenkins held throughout his address the undivided attention of his audience. He was frequently interrupted with applause. When he had finished, the orchestra started up "Dixie," a huge bouquet of crimson roses given by the student body, was placed at his feet, and he was greeted with round after round of cheering. The college boys sang the K. U. song, written by Bro. Ben Herr, an alumnus, who recently died, the whole audience joining in the refrain:

"K. U., K. U., we love thy crimson glory,
K. U., K. U., oh loud her praises tell.
K. U., K. U., in legend, song and story,
K. U., K. U., thy name shall ever dwell."

In the evening, a reception at the gymnasium brought together about one thousand students, alumni, and friends of the university. Refreshments were served by the ladies of the Christian churches of Lexington, and after this, brief addresses were made by President Roberts, of Danville, Professor McClintock, of Chicago, Professor Roark, of Kentucky State College, and President Gray, of Georgetown College.

President Jenkins has had more varied experience than most men of his years. Graduated from Bethany as valedictorian in 1891, he spent three years at Yale and Harvard, has served as pastor of two large city churches in Indianapolis and Buffalo, was professor of New Testament in Butler Bible College and later the first president of the University of Indianapolis, has preached from Honolulu to Cambridge, has ranched in Colorado, cycled in Europe, canoed on the Ohio and sailed on the Gulf of Mexico—and has for some years been a valued contributor to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Success to the new administration!

President Burris A. Jenkins.

Our Budget.

—The breeze is northwest—right from the Twin Cities.

—The din of preparation for our coming is distinctly audible.

—St. Louis will send a good delegation and will ask for the convention for 1903.

—One of the most attractive features of the great Louisiana Purchase Exposition will be a world convention of the Disciples of Christ.

—Let us decide it now and we will plan and execute large things for that convention. If we are to go ahead of Minneapolis we must have more time than Minneapolis had. No doubt about that.

—The headquarters of the editorial department of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will be at the Nicollet Hotel, where we will be glad to meet many of our friends. This is one of the old established hotels in the city and is near to the hall where the convention is to be held.

—"The Church Bulletin" is the title of a new 8-page local paper, edited by E. T. McFarland, pastor of the Fourth Christian Church, this city, designed to be a medium of communication between the twelve St. Louis congregations, all of which are to co-operate in carrying it on—another evidence of our growing unity and solidarity.

—J. P. Pinkerton, of Jefferson City, has resigned his pastorate to accept a call to the Forest Ave. Church, Kansas City. It will be remembered that this congregation was left pastorless recently when A. W. Koken-doffer went from there to Mexico, and the congregation has been searching diligently since that time for an able and devoted minister.

—Lawrence Wright closes his work in Iowa as state evangelist Oct. 1, after working under the state board for nearly two years. He will enter the field at once as a general evangelist and is now ready to make engagements beginning immediately after the national convention. He has had nine years' experience and will have a good singer. Address Jefferson, Ia.

—We shall next week report names and amounts contributed to the J. Z. Tyler Testamental Fund. Meantime let every one who reads this paragraph, and who wishes fellowship in this good work, send a contribution at once. In making this testimonial we are only discharging a debt we all owe to Bro. Tyler for his consuming and unceasing labors in our behalf.

—Hon. James H. Richardson, of Quincy, Ill., brother of our well known W. F. Richardson, of Kansas City, Mo., died Sept. 18, 1901. Mr. Richardson was born March 25, 1834, having lived for many years in Quincy, Ill. He was an honorable, upright man, a public-spirited citizen, an affectionate husband and father. He served at least one term in the state senate of Illinois. He reared a family of children who are left with his widow to mourn his loss. Our sympathies are extended to his Christian wife and family in this their great bereavement.

—Charles A. Young, Ph. B., 5641 Madison Ave., Chicago, Ill., sends us a list of topics constituting eight courses of lecture studies in biblical history and literature. These studies cover Old Testament characters, book studies in the Old Testament, studies in prophetic literature, in the earthly life of our Lord, in the life and letters of Paul, book studies in the New Testament, and studies in the literature of the Bible. These lectures have been highly commended by those who have heard them and it would be well if Bro. Young could be kept busy delivering them for the churches. For terms address him as above.

—J. S. Smith, of Carlinville, Ill., desires to take a medical course and wishes to make an engagement to preach for some church near a medical school.

—The church at Belmont, Ill., wishes to secure a good evangelist to conduct a protracted meeting beginning in October or early in November. Address B. French, Jr.

—Howard T. Cree bade farewell to the congregation at Maysville, Ky., Sept. 22, and preached the following Sunday in Covington, Ky. He will begin his pastorate with the Central Christian Church, St. Louis, Oct. 6.

—Clyde V. Callahan has resigned the work at Greenfield, O., to continue his course at Hiram College. The church at Greenfield has grown and is in a prosperous condition. Mr. Callahan will preach at Hartford, O., while in college.

—Joe Shelby Riley, who has done successful work in the west, north and south and has good recommendations, is open for pastoral or evangelistic engagements. He is a vigorous young man of thirty-three years. His address is Valley View, Tex.

—And now comes a distinguished preacher and foremost pastor among the Disciples of Christ, and testifies that "the issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of Sept. 19, which I have just read, is the best issue of the paper ever published, and as good a number as I have ever seen from the press of any religious paper in the world." We are offering three months of this paper to trial subscribers for twenty-five cents. Now is the time to subscribe.

—The copies of Bro. Procter's book of sermons, "The Witness of Jesus" which were taken to the Missouri Convention went off like hot cakes in maple syrup season. There were not enough to supply the demand. But we are able to fill all orders promptly which may come to this office, until the present edition is exhausted. That ought not to be very long. All of Bro. Procter's friends will want it, and no preacher's library will be quite complete without. Price $1.25.

—"As the night brings out the stars so these light afflictions of ours are giving us glimpses of things which cannot be so well seen in the day of undimmed prosperity. It has shown us that we have some very warm friends. We are very happy. We are learning some of the sweetest lessons of life. The Lord is very gracious to us. Do not for a moment think that we are cast down." So writes our beloved J. Z. Tyler in a personal letter to the editor. A man who can write in that spirit has "been with Jesus," and has entered into the "fellowship of his sufferings" and also into the fellowship of his joy. What a privilege it is to be able to give some tangible expression of our appreciation and love of one who, walking in the valley of earthly shadows, has the sunshine of God's love in his heart!

—We understand that the committee on program has left Wednesday afternoon of the national convention at Minneapolis for college reunions and banquets. This strikes us as a capital idea. It seems important to have these college reunions, and yet they have interfered not a little heretofore with the proceedings of the convention. The arrangement mentioned above is designed to remedy this fact. The afternoon is a better time for these reunions than at night, as many of the boys who take part in these reunions are grey-headed, and do not like to keep late hours. We hope that the colleges will make a note of the time which has been left open for their benefit, and avail themselves of it to the best possible advantage. This would leave the time for the sessions of the convention free for the business of the convention and permit all who are interested to be present. Let every hindrance be taken out of the way of the success of the convention.

—D. A. Wickizer has resigned at Beatrice, Neb., and will go east at once. Bro. Cramblet also has resigned at South Omaha.

—Samuel Gregg, Nebraska state evangelist, began the year's work at Wymore and is hoping to establish the work at this point and at Blue Springs.

—Imri Zumwalt has resigned the pastorate at Herington, Kas., to accept a call from the First Christian Church at Phoenix, Ariz. He began work at the latter place Sept. 15.

—The Burlington Route announces that Oct. 11 has been decided upon as an additional selling day for tickets to the Minneapolis Convention. The dates of sale now are Oct. 9, 10, 11, 12 and 14.

—The church at Brunot, Mo., needs an organ which it cannot afford to buy. Any church or Sunday-school which is buying a new organ might dispose of the old one by addressing D. A. White, Brunot, Mo.

—Christian College at Columbia, Mo., has opened with the largest attendance in its history and notwithstanding the drought. In the music department alone 178 were enrolled up to the middle of last week and new pupils are still arriving.

—The First Christian Church in South Bend celebrated its semi-centennial on last Saturday and Sunday. A history of the congregation was read by the present pastor, Perry J. Rice, and the anniversary sermon was preached by H. L. Willett.

—Miss Stella Masters, of last year's class in the School of Pastoral Helpers, is assisting Bro. Allen in a meeting at Ft. Wayne, Ind. Pastors desiring competent young lady helpers should address A. M. Harvot, principal of the School of Pastoral Helpers, 617 Richmond Street, Cincinnati.

—The church at Carthage, O., C. M. Fillmore pastor, had its fall roll call, rally and revival service Sunday, Sept. 29, by way of inaugurating the fall and winter campaign. This is the beginning of a week of rally, which will be followed by three or four weeks of revival services under the leadership of the pastor.

—Elder William Pinkerton, of Gillespieville, O., passed his 65th anniversary on Sept. 25. He is one of a distinguished family whose names are familiar among the families of the reformation. He was personally acquainted with many of the pioneers and distinguished men in the earlier history of our movement. In a note to the editor he says that it is almost fifty years since he was baptized in the small stream which flows near his place. He is now on a visit to his father, Dr. Thomas M. Pinkerton, probably the oldest living Pinkerton, who is now in his 88th year, and who lives near Lynchburg, O.

Get the Most Out of Your Food

You don't and can't if your stomach is weak. A weak stomach does not digest all that is ordinarily taken into it. It gets tired easily, and what it fails to digest is wasted.

Among the signs of a weak stomach are uneasiness after eating, fits of nervous headache, and disagreeable belching.

"I have taken Hood's Sarsaparilla at different times for stomach troubles, and a run down condition of the system, and have been greatly benefited by its use. I would not be without it in my family. I am troubled especially in summer with weak stomach and nausea and find Hood's Sarsaparilla invaluable." E. B. HICKMAN, W. Chester, Pa.

Hood's Sarsaparilla and Pills

Strengthen and tone the stomach and the whole digestive system.

—An up-to-date Christian physician desiring to locate in a good town of over 500 inhabitants with two railroads and in a prosperous farming community, can secure information of value by addressing F. H. Horton, Browns, Ill.

—The forty-ninth session of Roanoke College at Salem, Va., opened Sept. 18, not only with signs of general prosperity, but with an unusual distinction of royal patronage. Among the new students are four Koreans, one of whom is His Imperial Highness, Prince Euiwha, second son of the Emperor of Korea.

—The new church building at Waldron, Mich., was dedicated Sept. 15, by L. L. Carpenter. While the indebtedness was double the amount expected, it was all provided for and more than $100 extra. There are four houses of worship in Waldron of which this is by far the best.

—We regret to learn that our genial and brilliant fellow knight of the quill, Dr. Gray, editor of The Interior, is seriously ill, and is in great suffering. He has made The Interior one of the ablest organs in the great Presbyterian body. We shall miss his refined humor and graceful and lucid style in the paper, and earnestly hope for his recovery.

—The Entertainment Committee at Minneapolis wishes to say for the benefit of those who will arrive late in the evening that the registration and assignment will continue until 11:30 P. M. Street cars run until 12. Delegates coming in on any of the trains which arrive after this hour—six out of the total of forty—will seek temporary lodging until morning and will then go to the registration office.

—A new house of worship at Mill Grove, Ind., was dedicated Sept. 8, by J. H. Mac Neill, of Muncie. The congregation was organized a year ago and after meeting in a school building during the winter promptly began to build a house in the spring. The people have given generously and the house was dedicated free of debt. The church has services and Sunday-school every Lord's day and J. A. Brown, of Lynn, Ind., assures us that it is on the way to larger prosperity.

—Church Extension receipts for the week ending Sept. 26, showed a loss of $266 and a decrease of fourteen in the number of contributing churches. In the contributions from individuals, however, there was a gain of $70. If your church treasurer will not forward your money to G. W. Muckley, 600 Water Works Building, Kansas City, Mo., send it yourself. The fiscal year closed Sept. 30, but churches which did not get their offerings in before this date need not be discouraged on that account. Send this year's offering at once for there will be another to be sent next September before the close of this fiscal year. The same applies to all the other missionary offerings.

—Brother Daniel Trundle, of Elma, Wash., whose accident from being thrown from a bicycle was mentioned in this paper a few weeks since, writes that though he was injured more than was at first reported, he is well on the way to recovery, though it will be several months yet before he is entirely relieved from the effects of the accident. He expresses his gratitude for the letters of sympathy he has received, and especially for the "wealth of compassion" which he has discovered in the hearts of his flock. This, he feels, is compensation for the pain and inconvenience of his suffering. He reports that Elder J. W. Watson, of that place, died on the 23rd ult., the funeral services being conducted by Rev. Eben Sherwood. Bro. Watson was born Feb. 18, 1818, being 83 years, 7 months and 5 days old at the time of his death. He began preaching in 1836, at the age of 18, having preached 5,896 sermons, baptized 1,102 persons, organized 52 congregations. He was the youngest of five brothers, all preachers. For ten years past his life had been enfeebled by a trouble that darkened his mind. He went to the Pacific coast in 1865, and now has migrated to a still more pacific coast where life's struggles are over.

—The church at Valparaiso, Ind., from which John L. Brandt recently resigned to come to the First Church at St. Louis, has called J. H. O. Smith and the call has been accepted. We are in receipt of a letter from Congressman Crumpacker, who is a member of this congregation, recounting the history of the church and of Bro. Smith's former pastorate there. In 1888 he found a membership of 80 and after ministering for seven years left it with an increase of over 1,200 and a new building with large seating capacity. His resignation six years ago to go to Chicago was against the protest of the church. Bro. and Sister Smith occupy a large place in the affections of the Valparaiso congregation and will be heartily welcomed back in their old field, which is one of especial importance because of the proximity of Valparaiso Normal College, an immense institution with an average attendance of 2,500 and an annual enrollment of over 4,000.

—Bro. James McAllister, who has been a supply for the Central Christian Church in this city for one year, having been engaged originally for only three months, closed his labors with the church on last Lord's day, preaching morning and evening to large audiences with additions at both services. On Friday evening preceding the Endeavor Society the church gave him a farewell reception which was largely attended. At the close one of the officers of the church made a brief speech, stating the pleasant relations which had existed between Brother McAllister and the church during his stay and the high esteem in which he was held by the church and the good wishes that would go with him wherever he may go. To this Brother McAllister responded in a happy speech in which he took occasion to deny the correctness of a statement in one of the city papers purporting to be an interview with him, in which he was made to say that he had undergone a change of religious views since his connection with us. He said that such was not the case, but that he had received a call from a church connected with the people whom we sometimes designate as the Old Christian Connection, that he had this call under serious consideration but did not yet know what action he would take concerning it. Whether he accepts the call to this congregation or takes work among us, no one who knows him will doubt the sincerity of his action or his Christian character. Our best wishes go with him and his family into whatever field of labor he may elect.

Close to the Convention.

It is to be anticipated that upon arrival at Minneapolis everybody and his friend will desire to stop close to the convention auditorium. You will avoid great disappointment you will kindly and carefully consider the following:

The Exposition is on the east side of the river and in a district of the city not well supplied with hotels and restaurants. Its only considerable residence portion is near the University of Minnesota and these homes are filled with the over 3,000 students of that institution. The principal hotels are on the west side and are from three-fourths to one and a half miles away. Most lodgings are further and the residence portion in which we hope to place 2,000 of our guests is still further. These are most desirable and worthy of your presence; and to reach them, once on the car of the finest system in the country and seeing the varied and desirable features of the city, the small additional time is not a loss. Be sure to come; to take these homes and be well pleased.

Thousands Have Kidney Trouble and Don't Know it.

How To Find Out.

Fill a bottle or common glass with your water and let it stand twenty-four hours; a sediment or settling indicates an unhealthy condition of the kidneys. If it stains your linen it is evidence of kidney trouble; too frequent desire to pass it or pain in the back is also convincing proof that the kidneys and bladder are out of order.

What to Do.

There is comfort in the knowledge so often expressed, that Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney remedy fulfills every wish in curing rheumatism, pain in the back, kidneys, liver, bladder and every part of the urinary passage. It corrects inability to hold water and scalding pain in passing it, or bad effects following use of liquor, wine or beer, and overcomes that unpleasant necessity of being compelled to go often during the day, and to get up many times during the night. The mild and the extraordinary effect of Swamp-Root is soon realized. It stands the highest for its wonderful cures of the most distressing cases. If you need a medicine you should have the best. Sold by druggists in 50c. and $1. sizes.

You may have a sample bottle of this wonderful discovery and a book that tells more about it, both sent absolutely free by mail.

Address Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y. When writing mention reading this generous offer in this paper.

Convention of 1903.

It has been suggested that our national convention be held only once every two years. If the suggestion is adopted our next convention will be held in 1903. If not it is immaterial to the purpose of this note. Our convention of 1903 should be at St. Louis. This would give our people an opportunity to see the greatest exhibition ever presented to the world and to attend the greatest convention in the history of Christianity and also make it possible for vast numbers of people to attend who could not otherwise do so.

There are at least two reasons why our convention should go to St. Louis in 1903. (1) It would make possible the largest attendance ever known. The people could see the fair and attend the services, rates would be exceedingly low and we ourselves could get some idea of the power and influence of the primitive gospel—realize our own strength. (2) The convention would be an object lesson to the fair and to the world. Visitors of every denomination would be invited to attend. Representatives of foreign countries would feel the charm and simplicity of the true gospel and our cause would receive an impetus such as it has never known.

Genuine revival services should be a feature of this convention. The enthusiasm of our own host would do wonders. The most strenuous efforts of our best men would be used with telling effect. It is not possible to say what fruit such an undertaking would yield, but surely it is worth the effort.

Let the word pass along the lines, "St. Louis in 1903."

Campbell on the Holy Spirit.

In the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of Sept. 5, in an article by S. M. Fowler on "The Old Christians and Disciples of Christ," I find these words: "I have even felt that Mr. Campbell placed undue emphasis upon the word, especially in regard to ordinances, and not enough upon the presence and help of God by the Spirit 'who works all in all.'"

As I happened to be reading the article of Mr. Campbell on Sanctification in his celebrated work on Christian Baptism, I have concluded, by your permission, to put into your excellent paper some of his great thoughts on the work of the Holy Spirit.

On page 289 I read: "I could not, indeed, esteem as of any value the religion of any man, as respects the grand affair of eternal life, whose religion is not begun, carried on, and completed by the personal agency of the Holy Spirit. Nay, I esteem it the peculiar excellence and glory of our religion that it is spiritual; that the soul of man is quickened, enlightened, sanctified and consoled by the indwelling presence of the Spirit of the eternal God."

The personal agency of the Holy Spirit in conversion and sanctification could not be expressed in plainer words than these of this man of such marvelous intellectual powers and such a wonderful knowledge of the great plan of salvation.

On page 290 we find these words: "The Spirit now advocates Christ's cause, and not Christ his own cause. The Holy Spirit now animates the church with His presence, and not Christ himself. He is the head of the church, while the Spirit is the heart of it. The Father originates all, the Son executes all, the Spirit consummates all. Eternal volition, design, and mission belong to the Father; reconciliation to the Son; sanctification to the Spirit." On page 291: "Now as Jesus, the Messiah, in the work of mediation operates through his blood, so the Holy Spirit in his official agency operates through his word and its ordinances."

On page 298 he says in speaking of signs and miracles: "Thus the Spirit sought to convert men. He used means, rational means; therefore, we argue, such means were necessary, and are still, in such modifications of that same supernatural grandeur, necessary to conversion and sanctification. Signs, as Paul explains them, were necessary, not for believers but for unbelievers. They were necessary to faith. The miracle opened the heart, the testimony of the Lord entered and the Spirit of God with it, and the work of conversion was finished."

One more quotation and we rest our case.

On page 287 in speaking of the belief of the "Disciples of Christ" he says: "In this school conversion and regeneration are terms indicative of a moral and spiritual change—of a change accomplished through the arguments, the light, the love, the grace of God expressed and revealed, as well as approved by the supernatural attestations of the Holy Spirit. They believe and teach that it is the Spirit that quickens, and that the word of God—the living word—is that incorruptible seed which, when planted in the heart, vegetates and germinates and grows and fructifies into eternal life."

Now it seems to me that in all of these quotations Alexander Campbell exalts and magnifies the great work of the Holy Spirit both in conversion and in sanctification, and he gives to the Holy Spirit the glory due to his great name and not to the word of God. I do not worship Mr. Campbell, but I do revere his great name for the wonderful work he has accomplished in removing from the word of God "the accumulated rubbish of centuries," and in presenting to the world the plan of salvation just as it was given by the Holy Spirit through his inspired apostles. All other contemporaneous names, with me, at least, pale before the name of this illustrious hero of the faith once delivered to the saints.

Letter from Jeu Hawk.

Macau, China, Aug. 1, 1901

DEAR BRO. GARRISON:—I presume you have read a great deal lately in the dailies about the bubonic plague in China and wonder whether we are dead or alive. Through the blessing of our heavenly Father our lives have been and are yet spared to do his work. The plague has gone down considerable now and only once in a while do we hear of a case now. I have seen quite a number of cases since I came here. At first I was afraid, but soon got brave. If the patients can be properly taken care of, less deaths will take place. Four cases of mine got over it all right. We are very thankful to our heavenly Father for his divine providence over us. We are getting on fairly well here. We cannot expect to make much money by our practice. It is for the good work that we may do for him who died for us all. I am sorry to inform you that we are not allowed to hold public meetings here. The Catholic authority does not allow us. Rev. Banmet, of the Church of England, advised me some time ago not to hold any public meeting. So I only can now have tracts, Christian literature and Bibles on the table of my waiting room for the patients to read and take home with them. I talk to nearly all patients that come to me about Christ and his love. The Catholic patients do not like it so well. I want to tell you about a sick girl who has been and is yet under my care. This girl is a member of the Presbyterian Church. Her name is Yit Woh, 14 years old. She took sick quite a while ago, maybe two or three years ago, but had no money to have any doctor to see her. Her mother is a missionary working among the ladies here. Before they came here she worked in Shew Hang for a few dollars a month for many years. She has three children to care for, feed and clothe. She works very hard among the ladies, a good earnest Christian worker. Indeed she is poor, not a dollar left over the month, hence her sick daughter could not have the medical care given her. There are more than half a dozen foreign medical missionaries here. They all know this lady and her daughters and yet none of them care to step in to see them. I am taking care of her free and even buy the medicine for her when I do not have any in my possession. I am treating hundreds of others free here and elsewhere. I can not say how long I shall be able to remain here. Our means are getting short and it is impossible to get any pay from the poor patients. I am doing my best to help them all. I am very thankful for the help I received—$17.25 not yet acknowledged. Address Dr. Jeu Hawk, care of Ye Yee, 192 Wing Lock St., Hong Kong, China.

I have been selling Perfumes for the past six months. I make them myself at home and sell to friends and neighbors. Have made $710. Everybody buys a bottle. For 50 cts. worth of material I make perfume that would cost $2.00 in drug stores. I also sold 125 formulas for making perfumes at $1.00 each.

I first made it for my own use only, but the curiosity of friends as to where I procured such exquisite odors, prompted me to sell it. I clear from $25.00 to $35.00 per week. I do not canvass, people come and send to me for the perfumes. Any intelligent person can do as well as I do. For 42 cts. in stamps I will send you the formula for making all kinds of perfumes and sample bottle prepaid. I will also help you get started in the business.

MARTHA FRANCIS.

11 South Vandeventer, Ave. St. Louis, Mo.

It is very convenient to attribute the disasters which overtake us to fate. But for the most part man is the arbiter of his own fortunes. Business men are struck down suddenly as by lightning. The verdict is generally "heart failure." "His heart was weak. It was fate for him to meet this end." But if we went behind the "weak" heart we should find a "weak" stomach, probably, and back of the weak stomach is careless eating at irregular hours.

When the stomach is diseased the organs depending on the stomach for nutrition are starved. Starvation means weakness of the body and its organs.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery cures diseases of the stomach and other organs of digestion and nutrition. When these organs are cured, diseases of heart, liver, lungs and kidneys, caused by the diseased stomach, are cured also.

"In the fall of 1897 I was taken with smothering spells, palpitation of the heart, and a distressed feeling in my stomach," writes Mr. H. W. Kinney, of Knight, Doddridge Co., West Va. "I consulted a doctor and he said I had organic heart trouble. He gave me some medicine, but it did me no good. I then tried different kinds of patent medicines, but they only helped me a little. I then sent and got five bottles of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. Before the first bottle was gone I felt a change. When the five bottles were gone I began to work. I had not worked any for a year before."

"I am well and can eat anything now with the exception of pork and greasy food."

WHY?

Why do you, who live in the Mississippi Valley, send to New York, Boston, Philadelphia, or even to Chicago for a desired volume, when you can secure it much more quickly and just as cheap in St. Louis? This is a question that is very difficult to answer. We can supply you with any book that you wish—any respectable book, that is; French novels and blood-and-thunder-seven-buckets-of-gore-to-the-chapter romances are barred—no matter where or by whom published. Our business is by no means confined to the books we ourselves publish. Our catalogue contains only our own publications, in the main, but we can sell you any book you wish to purchase.

Maryland and District of Columbia Convention.

More than one hundred delegates from Maryland, Delaware and the District of Columbia met in their twenty-third annual convention at Jerusalem, Harford county, Sept. 24-27. Jerusalem, called "the mountain church," has had a long and honorable history and many hallowed memories are associated with our gatherings there. Our Israel was glad once more to stand within her walls and to give testimony and thanks unto the name of the Lord.

H. C. Kendrick, who has entered recently with such vigor upon the work of the Hagers-town pastorate, preached the convention sermon.

Preacher's day was devoted to the consideration of the church fathers. W. J. Wright discussed "Paul as a Preacher"; B. A. Abbott, "Origen: Form and Substance in Preaching"; F. D. Power, "Athanasius: Doctrinal Preaching"; Ira W. Kimmel, "Basil: Expository Preaching"; Peter Ainslie, "Augustine: Consciousness of God as a Source of Power"; J. A. Hopkins, "Peter the Hermit: Earnestness in Preaching"; M. H. H. Lee, "St. Bernard: Goodness in the Preacher"; D. M. Austin, "Carey: The Preacher and Heathen Missions"; W. H. Dickinson, "Finney: the Revivalist"; and Jacob Walters, "Alex. Campbell: The Reformer of Reformers." The people seemed especially pleased with the addresses of our eastern shore men, Walters and Austin, and of our colored preacher, Dickinson. The thoughtful consideration of the subject, "Does Our Position on Christian Union Need Revision?" by R. G. Frank, of Philadelphia, formed a fitting close for this profitable day.

Space will not permit me to tell of all the good things of the C. W. B. M. session. The thirteen auxiliaries report a membership of 832, offerings amounting to $832 and eight orphans in India supported.

The Tribune Home for Working Girls had an income last year of $1,704 and has provided accommodations for 78 girls since its opening.

F. D. Power, chairman of the committee on summer assembly, reported the auspicious opening of the new ocean resort at Bethany Beach, with 225 visitors from eight states, and said that the projectors of this enterprise had fulfilled their contract with our society, and presented on their behalf a deed to property at Bethany Beach valued at $10,000.

The educational committee reported five young men assisted at college, $447 raised and assets in cash and notes amounting to $1,500.

The 29 churches in the co operation report a membership of 4,628, with 576 additions, $1,196 raised for foreign missions, $785 for the American Christian Missionary Society, $1,747 for state missions and $36,785 for all purposes. If the people of our entire brotherhood would do as well as the disciples in this district, we would raise $1,394,000 for missions.

Every organized church in our territory but two contributed to the state work and the money was collected and expended at a cost of only $43 to the society. The convention agreed to appropriate next year $500 for the support of a pastor at H Street, Washington; $600 to Fulton Avenue, Baltimore; $250 to the eastern shore of Maryland; $300 to Huntington Avenue, Baltimore; $150 to Martinsburg, W. Va; $400 to South Baltimore, and $50 to the work of our colored brethren.

The progress of the work in Baltimore the past year has been most gratifying.

Sept. 15 a new house of worship was dedicated on Huntington Avenue. The building cost $3,000, upon which a debt of $1,500 remains. The congregation numbers 45, the Sunday-school about 100. This is the outgrowth of a mission Sunday-school started two years ago by the Calhoun Street church. Not satisfied with one mission, Peter Ainslie and his enterprising people have started another mission in South Baltimore. A wealthy gentleman has offered a lot at a reduced ground rent, will give $1,000 and loan the balance necessary for the construction of a house of worship. J. O. Shelburne, of Virginia, has been called to serve this mission and will probably accept.

C. C. Jones, of Hyattstown, has become assistant pastor at the Calhoun Street church

William J. Zeiders.

William J. Zeiders was born on a farm in Pennsylvania, Oct. 13, 1861. He was graduated from the Bloomsburg Literary Institute and State Normal School in 1886. From the same institution in 1888 he received the A. M. degree. In 1892 he was married to Miss Alice Eshenauer, of Middletown, Pa. She is a graduate of a first class seminary, and has also taken a thorough course in elocution. Of the three children born to them, one remains to brighten their home. In 1894, Mr. Zeiders was elected to a professorship in Temple College, Philadelphia, of which Russell H. Conwell is president. Subsequently, he became the business manager of this institution. Temple College conferred the degree of A. M. upon him in 1896. At present he owns and manages the Co operative Educational Bureau, which does a thriving business. He has decided, however, to close his office and give himself exclusively to the Christian ministry. Until recently, when he was baptized and received into the Third Christian Church of this city, he was a leading member of the M. E. Church. He filled my pulpit last Lord's day, and did it acceptably. As a popular lecturer, Mr. Zeiders ranks with the best. He is forty years old and has had wide experience both as teacher and speaker. I have known him for several years and can most heartily commend him to the brotherhood. He is an accomplished man, and I feel confident that the church which secures him as pastor will not regret the bargain. Churches wishing to negotiate with him can do so either by addressing him at Room 5 Odd Fellows' Temple, Philadelphia, or by writing to me.

Boxes of Gold.

Sent for Letters About Grape-Nuts.

330 boxes of gold and greenbacks will be sent to persons writing interesting and truthful letters about the good that has been done them by the use of Grape Nuts food.

10 little boxes, each containing a $10 gold piece, will be sent the 10 writers of the most interesting letters.

20 boxes each containing a $5 gold piece to the 20 next most interesting writers, and a $1 greenback will go to each of the 300 next best. A committee of three not members of the Postum Co. will make decision between Dec. 1st and 10th, 1901.

Write plain, sensible letters, giving detailed facts of ill health caused from improper food and explain the improvement, the gain in strength, in weight, or in brain power after using Grape-Nuts food.

It is a profound fact that most ails of humanity come from improper and non-nourishing food, such as white bread, hot biscuit, starchy and uncooked cereals, etc.

A change to perfectly cooked, predigested food like Grape Nuts, scientifically made and containing exactly the elements nature requires for building the delicate and wonderful cells of brain and body, will quickly change a half sick person to a well person. Food, good food, is Nature's strongest weapon of defense.

Include in the letter the true names and addresses, carefully written, of 20 persons not very well, to whom we can write regarding the food cure by Grape-Nuts.

Almost everyone interested in pure food is willing to have his or her name appear in the papers for such help as they may offer the human race. A request, however, to omit name will be respected. Try for one of the 330 prizes. Every one has an equal show. Don't write poetry, but just honest, interesting facts about the good you have obtained from the pure food Grape-Nuts. If a man or woman has found a true way to get well and keep well, it should be a pleasure to stretch a helping hand to humanity, by telling the facts.

Write your name and address plainly on letter and mail promptly to the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

Kansas State Convention.

The annual convention of the Christian churches of Kansas opened at Hutchinson Monday evening, Sept. 9, with the C. W. B. M. period. The address of welcome was given by Bro. D. Y. Donaldson, of Hutchinson, responded to by W. Chenult, of Ft. Scott. Sister Payne, of Lawrence, gave a splendid address on "Consecration of Self," followed by Bro. A. McLean's stirring address on "The C. W. B. M. as I Saw it in India."

Tuesday, A. M., Bro. Wallace C. Payne, who has taken charge of the Bible chair work at the State University at Lawrence, gave a "Bible Study." Then followed the president's address by Cragie McDowell, of Iola. A matter of much interest to the junior workers was the awarding of the state banner to the society that had rendered the best service. It was presented to the Junior society of the Third Church at Topeka. Sister E. C. Pile, of Parsons, gave an address on Junior work.

Following this, Bro. Payne, of Lawrence, presented the Bible chair work. Bro. Payne's half hour Bible study was a special feature of the convention and all felt well paid in this one good thing of the convention.

Tuesday afternoon there was an interesting Y. P. S. C. E. session which brought forth much discussion as to "What is the Matter With the C. E.?" It was almost unanimously agreed that there was nothing the matter with the C. E.

Tuesday evening the praise service was led by Bro. Imri Zunwalt, formerly of Herington, but now of Phoenix, Arizona. Following was Edw. Fredenhagen, of Topeka, whose subject was, "Christ's Prison Gospel." The evening session closed with the splendid, soul-stirring, characteristic address of our brother, John E. Pounds, of Cleveland.

The especial features of the Bible-school period Wednesday A. M., were the address on: Is the International System the Best? by W. T. Adams, The Question Box, by R. H. Waggoner and Our Religious Literature, by Baxter Waters, of Lawrence.

Wednesday evening came one of the best things of the convention, the missionary address by A. McLean.

The church period Thursday morning consisted of report of superintendent W. S. Lowe and report of treasurer, Rozella Pendleton, followed by a round table: Our State Organization, How Increase its Efficiency? A special feature of this period was the introduction of about 20 new preachers principally from Missouri and Kansas. Bro. William Alphin spoke on "Our Negro Work in Kansas." He reports 13 congregations.

The following officers were elected: President, W. Chenult, of Ft. Scott; vice president, F. E. Mallory, of Topeka; superintendent of Bible school, C. A. Finch, of Newton; superintendent of C. E., R. E. Rosenstene, of Manhattan; secretary and treasurer, A. Rozella Pendleton, of Topeka; advisory board, W. S. Priest, Atchinson; W. E. Ireland, Topeka; Milton Brown, Topeka. New officers of C. W. B. M.: President, Mrs. Libbie F. Ingels, Leanna; vice president, Mattie C. Titus, Lawrence; secretary and treasurer, Miss Pendleton, Topeka; Junior superintendent, Miss Evelyn Moore, Kansas City.

The convention closed Friday A. M., with an address on: What Should be Our Attitude and Place as a People With Respect to the Present Stage in Religious Progress? by C. E. Pile, of Parsons.

FOR CHILDREN

Nothing, that comes in a bottle, is more important for children than Scott's emulsion of cod-liver oil.

And "important" means that it keeps them in even health. Whenever they show the least disturbance of even balance of health, it promptly restores them.

It is to be used as a food, whenever their usual food does not quite answer the purpose of food.

Kansas Delegation to Minneapolis.

Kansas must have a large delegation at Minneapolis next month. We believe such will be the case.

It will be a rare opportunity. Let the churches see that their preachers are supplied with the necessary cash for the trip. Work up a little surprise on your preacher.

The Kansas delegation will leave Kansas City about 6:30 P. M. Oct. 9, over the Chicago Great Western.

The delegation from Indian Territory and Arkansas will probably be on the same train, as they are going over the same line.

Buy your ticket of your home agent and state that you want to go over the C. S. W. from Kansas City. The rate is one fare for the round trip. Buy a round trip ticket if possible.

We should know as soon as possible how many are going so that we will know whether to order a tourist sleeping car.

These berths must be sold in advance, they are $1.50 each, two persons can occupy one berth.

Send your name to either of the undersigned,

Wisconsin State Convention.

The twenty-ninth state convention of the Wisconsin Christian Missionary Association met at Waupun, Sept. 18-22.

The convention was entertained by the Union Church, an organization made up of two branches of the Baptist Church and the Church of Christ. The welcome was a most cordial one and the hospitality bountiful. They were union not only in name but in spirit, and the fellowship was helpful.

The spirituality of the convention was especially prominent, but with such men and women of God as W. B. Taylor, H. H. Guy, Mrs. Louise Kelley and Miss Mattie Burgess, how could it be otherwise?

Brother Taylor's "Bible Studies" deserve special mention. In his study on the book of John he brought us all nearer our Savior than we had ever been before. We stood with John close to Jesus. It was a spiritual uplift never to be forgotten.

C. M. Kreidler, of Milwaukee, was chosen president for the following year and with the experience he has had in New York state work, we are expecting great things.

J. H. Stark was continued as state evangelist and also given the position of corresponding secretary. I bespeak for him the hearty support of every church.

The next state convention goes to Footville.

Through the efforts of the W. C. M. A., two churches were organized, one reorganized, one Bible-school organized and about one hundred brought into our churches. Our watchword for the coming year is "Enlargement."

It was my opportunity to speak to the inmates of the state prison. I never had a more attentive audience. There are more than five hundred men in the institution. An officer told me that ninety per cent. directly or indirectly came there through drink. Eighty per cent. directly through drink. Is it not time that we quit playing with this evil and with the help of God go forth and kill it?

CALIFORNIA

Los Angeles, Sept. 26.—Sept. 9, 1901, I began the 12th year of my pastorate for the First Church of this city. Nearly 1,000 persons have been added to our church during my pastorate. Last year was the best one in my work here. We raised about $1,400 for missions in that year. I now have the largest pastorate in the city. The future is bright with promise.—A. C. SMITHER.

Yountville, Sept. 26.—Three by confession and baptism and one by statement at our regular service the third Lord's day in August at Yountville. One confession last Lord's day evening at our regular service. In a short meeting in June, held by Bro. C. E. Engle, there were five added by confession and baptism. The next day after the meeting closed there were two more confessions and baptisms. In a short meeting held by Bro. Engle at Monticello, there were six additions; five confessions and baptisms and one restored from the Methodists, making in all 17 additions in this missionary field since last report.—C. E. EDGMAN.

COLORADO

Golden, Sept. 24.—Three additions here last Sunday; one from the Lutherans, one by confession and one by statement.—R. W. MOORE, pastor.

ILLINOIS

Baders, Sept. 30.—J. T. Davis, of Carmi, Ill., closed a successful meeting with us last night, one reclaimed with his wife who came from the Browning church.—W. M. VENTERS.

Hoopston, Sept. 28.—Have been in a meeting here two and one half weeks. The whole country is stirred and many are turning to the Lord—three times as many men as women—a very unusual occurrence. This is the richest and finest community I ever saw. I will close as soon as possible as I am due in Auburn, N. Y., Oct. 8. I go then to Nelsonville, O., to assist C. M. Keene. Bro. Cappa will be my singer. I preached the McKinley memorial at Antioch on Sept. 19, just 20 years (lacking two days) after I delivered a similar one over Garfield in the same state. After the sermon I took the first offering ever made for the McKinley monument fund, and the people responded liberally amid tears. Great service—fine gift. It was sent by draft to headquarters in Chicago.—H. C. PATTERSON.

Hoops on, Sept. 30.—Glorious meeting here; 18 last night and still they come nightly. Go to New York next.—H. C. PATTERSON.

Quincy, Sept. 31.—Dr. W. W. Rumsey preached for us yesterday two fine sermons. One confession at night service.—Mrs. O. RICHARDSON.

Watska, Sept. 25.—Took the confession of a young man at his own home recently. My work is very pleasant. The church quartette will sing at the state Endeavor convention at Danville, next week.—B. S. FERRALL.

Williamsville, Sept. 23.—Three additions at evening service yesterday.—W. W. WEEDON.

Windsor, Sept. 24.—Congregations increasing at each service at Windsor. Have had four added since last report.—E. F. KERAN, pastor.

INDIANA

2931 Capitol Ave., Indianapolis, Sept. 26.—The year which closed one week past has been a successful one at the North Park Christian Church, Indianapolis. Besides current expenses and all our general offerings, which were faithfully taken, there has been paid on indebtedness and remodeling nearly $600. All departments are in a prosperous condition. There is a forward movement all along the line. There have been 35 accessions at the regular services during the year. Eleven in the last three weeks not reported. Four of these by primary obedience. This church is only four years old. I will continue my graduate work at Butler College.—J. P. MYERS, pastor.

Martinsville, Sept. 27.—Two confessions since last report. I close my pastorate here Sept. 29 and begin at Washington, Pa., Oct. 6.—E. H. COLE.

Shoals, Sept. 28.—Our meeting began on Sept. 1 and closed on Sept. 22, with 48 additions. C. H. De Voe did the preaching. Geo. Porter led the music; and in all we had a good meeting—strengthening and reviving the church all around. A. W. Gehres is our pastor and we anticipate a good year's work on all lines.

IOWA

Des Moines, Sept. 26.—Close my work here Sunday and begin the next in Houston, Texas. Work flourishes here. Six added this week; 315 in the year.—E. W. BRICKERT.

Holly Springs, Sept. 23.—I have given ten lectures here the past ten nights. Had one addition at regular services yesterday and others will follow.—H. H. RAMA.

KANSAS

Caney, Sept. 23.—Yesterday I visited my old home church at Elk City and preached for them morning and evening. One addition at the morning service. Preached Bro. Calvin Rice's funeral at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. The church at Elk City is without a pastor and I will preach for them the second and fourth Lord's days for awhile until they can locate a suitable man. It is a good church; all they need is waking up a little. Two confessions and baptisms at Tyro since my last report. We are preparing for a meeting in a few months. The work is in good shape there and at Jefferson.—J. R. CHARLTON.

Dodge City, Sept. 23.—Two confessions yesterday. My subject at night was "Anarchy." We have the largest house in the city and it was crowded.—ELSTER HAILL.

Lawrence.—Have received 10 into our fellowship in the last few Sundays. The work is opening up very hopefully. The State University has enrolled thus far over 1,000 students. We get a portion each year. This will be the first year of the Bible chair at Lawrence. The prospects for its success are good.—BAXTER WATERS, pastor First Christian Church.

Leavenworth, Sept. 25.—Two additions last Sunday. There are said to be more men in this church now than there have been in 20 years.—S. W. NAY, pastor.

LeRoy, Sept. 30.—We have just closed a meeting of three weeks with Bro. Simpson Ely. Last night of the meeting house would not hold his audience. Bro. Ely has not only done the church a wonderful good but the community also. Visible results, six baptisms, one by letter.—DUNCAN MCFARLANE, pastor.

KENTUCKY

Maysville, Sept. 25.—Preached my last sermon here last Sunday, prior to leaving for St. Louis. There have been 16 additions to the church during the past week, mostly by baptism. My successor, R. E. Moss, is already on the ground, and the expenses of the church for the next year are already provided for by pledges.—HOWARD T. CREE.

MISSOURI

Canton, Sept. 27.—Closed a short meeting recently at Ursa, Ill., with six conversions, two by letter just before the meeting. All my work is moving along nicely. Had one baptism at Kahoka recently also.—J. D. GREER.

Carrollton, Sept. 29.—Three additions to the church here yesterday.—E. H. KELLAR.

Greenville, Sept. 21.—Just closed a ten days meeting at Elsinoe, Mo. Seven made the good confession, and others were reclaimed. We reorganized a church with 23 working members.—J. C. WILLIAMS, F. R. DAVIES.

Hannibal, Sept. 28.—The improvements on the auditorium and lecture room of the church that were instituted during the pastor's vacation, are completed. Last Lord's day was reopening day and the people rejoiced in their beautiful sanctuary. The winter's work starts

By hard labor we are getting our plea before the people. Our meeting here begins next Sunday with Guy B. Williamson and wife as song leaders.

Princeton, Sept. 23.—We had excellent services here yesterday. I drove into the country and preached in the afternoon. Have done this for the last month. I preach at the Christian Union church in the west end of town next Sunday afternoon. Next Sunday morning we begin our meeting here with Guy B. Williamson and wife as assistants. Pray for our meeting. M. L. Anthony has been employed by this district as evangelist. His success in the past will warrant every effort our brethren put forth in helping him. Let's assist him.—J. E. DAVIS.

Shannondale, Sept. 28.—A series of meetings lasting twelve days has just closed at this place. Bro. George E. Prewitt, of Brunswick, Mo., had charge of the meeting and five additions to the church, four by primary confession and baptism and one by statement, was the immediate result. Bro. Prewitt, though a young man, is an able preacher. NEBRASKA.

Lincoln, Sept. 28.—In less than three years under the leadership of its present pastor, T. J. Thompson, the First Christian Church of Lincoln, Neb., has increased its membership from 250 to 370 without a protracted meeting; has cleared off the records judgments aggregating $5,000, defeating a suit against it involving $13,000 more; has accumulated a building fund of $3,000, mostly cash, and has, through the board of church extension, secured the most eligible site for a new church in the city. The Central Church on Aug. 4 disbanded and added its membership list to that of the First Church, still further increasing the membership to about 440.—T. J. THOMPSON.

Ord, Sept. 27.—Our splendid meeting is still progressing in fine shape; 18 added to date. Large audiences every night. We have had rain 11 nights without materially injuring us.—H. H. UTTERBACK, pastor; A. L. OGDEN, evangelist.

Mungen, Sept. 23.—Three young ladies confessed Christ last night. Work prospering.—JOHN MULLEN.

TENNESSEE.
Clarksville, Sept. 25.—Closed a 15 days' meeting at Tracy City, Tenn., 16 accessions; 12 baptisms, 3 restored, 1 membership. Tracy City is a remarkably moral mining mountain town.—ROBERT LORD CAVE.

TEXAS.
Bay City, Sept. 26.—This is the county-seat of doubtless the oldest organized county in the state, made famous in its early history by being the landing place of LaSalle on one of his expeditions. The Disciples at one time had the largest membership in the county, but the church like the county went through a standstill period and without a minister the church disorganized. A change has come to the county in the last 18 months. Two railroads have entered the county and the cultivation of rice has been introduced, and has grown from an experiment crop of 700 acres last year to 18,000 acres this year that if nothing happens will bring to us a revenue of more than half a million dollars, with prospects of much greater developments next year. Most of the rice is adjacent to Bay City and hence this place, now a town of 700 or 800, is growing so rapidly that a resident citizen can hardly keep up with the new buildings and it is in this rapid development that we aim to keep abreast, and the Lord willing we hope to have a strong working church. We organized during August with 18 members, with Bro. A. L. Oder, a recent graduate of Kentucky University, as our minister, and last Sunday the Disciples held their first communion in Bay City, presided over by Elder E. W. Taylor. Through the kindness of our Methodist brethren we are permitted, one Sunday in each month, to use their church. We hope to build this fall.—WM. CASH.

Lockhart, Sept. 20.—There was one addition to the church here at our service last Sunday and two at our prayer-meeting service Thursday night. All by confession and baptism.—J. J. CHAMER.

UTAH.
Salt Lake, Sept. 25.—Seven added by letter here yesterday.—W. H. BAGBY.

VIRGINIA.
Big Stone Gap, Sept. 26.—Dedicated church at Mt. Olivet, Lee county, Va., Sunday. The debt was raised in a few minutes. Followed with a two days' meeting; 3 confessions and some reclaimed. The following preachers were present: Davis, West, Osborne, Howard and Wolf. Convention in session here. Will dedicate the new church at this place Sunday. It is a beauty. J. W. West is the preacher in charge. He is doing a great work.—W. H. BOOK.

Norfolk, Sept. 22.—One fellowship after baptism and two confessions.—ALBERT BUXTON.

WEST VIRGINIA.
Morgantown, Sept. 26.—I am sowing the seed in this region, recently baptized two. I have in press a new edition of my book on the Devil. Price 25 cents. Those who wish it should write me immediately.—LAURENCE W. SCOTT.

STUTTERERS

Its True Character.

Catarrh is Not a Local Disease.

Although physicians have known for years that catarrh was not a local disease, but a constitutional or blood disorder, yet the mass of the people still continue to believe it is simply a local trouble, and try to cure it with purely local remedies, like powders, snuffs, ointments and inhalers.
These local remedies, if they accomplish anything at all, simply give a very temporary relief, and it is doubtful if a permanent cure of catarrh has ever been accomplished by local sprays, washes and inhalers. They may clear the mucous membrane from the excessive secretion, but it returns in a few hours as bad as ever, and the result can hardly be otherwise because the blood is loaded with catarrhal poison, and it requires no argument to convince anyone that local washes and sprays have absolutely no effect on the blood.
Dr. Ainsworth says, "I have long since discontinued the use of sprays and washes for catarrh of head and throat, because they simply relieve and do not cure."
"For some time past I have used only one treatment for all forms of catarrh, and the results have been uniformly good; the remedy I use and recommend is Stuart's Catarrh Tablets, a pleasant and harmless preparation sold by druggists at 50c., but my experience has proven one package of Stuart's Catarrh Tablets to be worth a dozen local treatments."
"The tablets are composed of Hydrastin, Sanguinaria, Red Gum, Guaiacul and other safe antiseptics, and any catarrh sufferer can use them with full assurance that they contain no poisonous opiates, and that they are the most reasonable and successful treatment for radical cure of catarrh at present known to the profession."
Stuart's Catarrh Tablets are large, pleasant-tasting 20-grain lozenges, to be dissolved in the mouth and reach the delicate membranes of throat and trachea, and immediately relieve any irritation, while their final action on the blood removes the catarrhal poison from the whole system. All druggists sell them at 50c. for complete treatment.

The Co-operative Society.

"The wood-box is empty!" called mamma, suggestively.

"Oh bother! There's always something to do!" and Willie fretfully laid down his knife with which he was making a Jack-o'-lantern out of a round yellow pumpkin. "Nobody has so much to do as I—it's work, work, work the whole time!"

"And no play at all?" asked grandma, quietly, from her sunshiny corner by the window.

"Sometimes," assented Willie, "but 'tis wood, water, chips, and—and everything, mostly!"

"Let me see," and grandma laid down her knitting within the bright-colored Indian basket. "Yesterday, a little boy I know spent the afternoon with Harold Bent, fishing. After the chores were done, this same little boy rode to the village with his grandpa to hear a band concert. This morning he was allowed to run over to his Uncle Sam's to get two golden pumpkins—not to be made into delicious pies, but—"

Just then Willie remembered the empty wood-box, and so grandma didn't finish her sentence.

When he came back in better spirits, grandma had gone. Presently she returned with a small brown-covered note-book.

"I have a plan, dear," said grandma, as she drew her chintz-covered rocker up to the table where Willie was operating on the Jack-o'-lantern's eyes.

Willie laid down his knife and looked up curiously.

"Now," resumed grandma, "I want you and mamma to form a co-operative society."

"Oh, grandma, I?" interrupted Willie, amazed at the long names.

"Yes; a co-operative society, of which mamma will be the president and you the secretary. Come to think of it, I'll be the auditor."

"What shall I do?" asked Willie.

"Your duty will be to keep the records."

"And mine?" laughed mamma.

"Oh, to be general overseer," replied grandma, smiling. "As the name implies, you will work together—that is, you will work for each other to advance a common interest—a cheerful, happy home."

"Goody, I'm ready!" exclaimed Willie, thoroughly interested. "And you, mamma?"

"Certainly; 'tis a delightful plan," said she.

"Of course, you will do what is necessary for each other's comfort," continued grandma, "and Willie will keep the record of each day's doings. At night we will balance accounts. Devote one page to what mamma does for you," explained grandma, "and the opposite page to what you do for her. Do you see?"

Willie nodded and took the book, while grandma went back to her knitting.

Soon Willie needed a candle for his lantern.

"This will do for both if you divide it," said mamma, giving Willie an extra fine taper.

"Thank you. One item for mamma's account," he added.

'Twas nearly dinner time before he had one single entry on his own page—while mamma's was half-full!

"I didn't think she did so much for me," said Willie, rather soberly to himself.

When the sitting-room lamp was lighted, grandma thought it would be a good time to examine the accounts of the co-operative society.

Willie produced the account-book. Then he and the president drew up their chairs on either side of the auditor.

The secretary colored a little as grandma (rather the auditor) turned to the first page. She read just as it was recorded:

CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETY RECORD.

PRESIDENT'S ACCOUNT.

President furnished me, no, the secretary, with two candles for Jack-o'-lanterns.

Made secretary's bed.

Got dinner and boiled an extra egg for said secretary.

Mended stockings for secretary.

Patched pants for same.

Helped him write a letter to papa.

Ironed secretary's collars.

Cleaned secretary's Sunday coat.

Took splinter out of secretary's finger.

SECRETARY'S ACCOUNT.

Got president one pail of water. (Used for secretary's dinner!)

Got wood. P. S.—Don't suppose secretary's collars could have been ironed without fire!

Helped carry away the dishes.

WILLIE CONANT, Sec'y.

The next page showed a like result.

"I declare, the president seems to have the most credit!" said grandma.

"The secretary may have omitted to make entries on his own page," suggested mamma.

"No, mamma," said Willie, honestly, forgetting her official title, "you do ten times more for me every day than I do for you, but I shouldn't have known it if it hadn't been for grandma!"—Youth's Companion.

Clip Your Coupons.

Perhaps the most gross neglect on the part of Christians to-day is the failure to clip our spiritual coupons. Unlike those of earth, these are worthless in less than thirty days after maturity; they are payable only at the office of present opportunity; they are canceled the moment the office is closed, and the office closes every day with many coupons unredeemed. By prayer, by Bible study, by devotion, by struggle, by building the life foursquare, do we administer the trust in our own lives; and only thus. To get Christ's work into our hearts is to get our hearts into Christ's work. The compound interest of heaven is paid to those alone who keep the trust by administering it to themselves daily, hourly. Christians who, careless of their trust, pass their dividends, never possess them. Theirs is an unjeweled crown. —Nehemiah Boynton in C. E. World.

What Sort of Young Man Should Go to College?

President Hadley of Yale, writing in Success, says:

For the great majority of men, a college course is of inestimable value. For a minority it is worse than useless. How shall a boy determine to which of these classes he belongs?

A good college offers a student three things: theoretical knowledge of principles connected with his business, breadth of general culture, and friendships that are of service to him now and hereafter. If he appreciates these things, and can take them seriously, a college is a good place for him. If he cannot thus appreciate at least one of them, he would better not go to college at all.

None of these things can be played with. They must all be achieved by hard work,—none the less hard because it is so often pleasurable.

If a boy thinks that the study of theory is a short and easy way for the attainment of practical skill, he is greatly mistaken. It is quite apart from practical skill, and its results show themselves more in the later stages of the student's development than they do when he first goes into the office or the shop. The theory of mechanics or of physics is not to be studied by lectures and experiments. It means knowledge of analytical geometry and the differential calculus. The theory of chemistry is not to be learned by amusement in the laboratory, but by attention to dry principles which require the utmost exactitude of application. The theory of political economy is not to be learned by the reading of entertaining books and magazine articles. A student who would really master it must understand the principles of law and of ethics, which are more difficult than those which he meets in the routine of ordinary business. Those so-called theories which are easily acquired and glibly recited are met, in practice, with a contempt which is well deserved.

Coffee For Mothers.

The Kind that Nourishes and Supplies Food for Mother and Child.

"My husband has been unable to drink coffee for several years, so we were very glad to give Postum Food Coffee a trial, and when we understood that by long boiling it would bring out the delicious flavor, we have been highly pleased with it.

It is one of the finest things for nursing mothers that I have ever seen. It keeps up the mother's strength and increases the supply of nourishment for the child if partaken of freely. I drank it between meals instead of water and found it most beneficial.

Our five-year-old boy has been very delicate since birth and has developed slowly. He was white and bloodless. I began to give him Postum freely and you would be surprised at the change. When any person remarks about the great improvement, we never fail to tell them that we attribute his gain in strength and general health to the free use of Postum Food Coffee, and this has led many friends to use it for themselves and children.

I have always cautioned friends to whom I have spoken about Postum to follow directions in making it, for unless it is boiled fifteen or twenty minutes, it is quite tasteless. On the other hand, when properly made, it is very delicious. I want to thank you for the benefits we have derived from the use of your Postum Coffee." Mrs. W. W. Earnest, 721 9th Ave., Helena, Mont.

Opposed to Everything.

A friend called our attention, says the Christian Herald, to the fact that Sanballat wanted to hold consultation with Nehemiah in the plain of O-no. That is the place where more people stay to-day than in any other. They are always protesting, throwing doubt on grand undertakings; and while you are in the mountain of O-fes, they spend their time on the plain of O-no. In the harness of society, they are breeching straps, good for nothing but to hold back. You propose to call a minister. All the indications are that he is the right man. Nine-tenths of the congregation are united in his favor. The matter is put to vote. The vast majority say "Aye!" the handful of opponents respond, "Oh, no!" You propose to build a new church. About the site, the choice of architects, the upholstery, the plumbing, and the day of dedication, there is almost unanimity. You hope that the crooked sticks will all lie still, and that the congregation will move in solid phalanx. But not so. Sanballat sends for Nehemiah, proposing to meet him on the plain of O-no. Some men were born backward, and have been going that way ever since. Opposition to everything has become chronic. The only way they feel comfortable is when harnessed with the face toward the whiffle-tree, and the back toward the end of the shafts. They may set down their name in the hotel register as living in Boston, Chicago, Savannah, or Washington, but they really have been depending all their lives upon the plain of O-no. There let them be buried, with their faces toward the west, for in that way they will lie more comfortable, as other people are buried with their faces to the east. Do not impose upon them by putting them in the majority. Oh, no!

A Social Glass.

It is not always possible for a prying critic, even when moved by the best intentions, to tell what beverage a man fifty feet from him is drinking, and we have often wondered if the reports of people who have been shocked at seeing President McKinley drinking wine at banquets might not find an explanation in such a circumstance as the following. They knew he drank because they saw him do it, but perhaps they would be slow to take affidavit as to what he drank.

A member of his official family recently said:

"In all my experience with public men and all public entertainments, it has never been my lot to see a more abstemious man, so far as intoxicating liquors are concerned, than President McKinley. This trait in his character was brought out prominently on the trips he made south at the conclusion of the Spanish war, and caused no end of comment among the hospitable people with whom he was daily brought in contact. One incident occurs to me most forcibly, which took place at Atlanta. There was a grand banquet in the evening prior to the departure of the Chief Magistrate further south. But amid all the enthusiasm and hilarity attendant upon such an entertainment, there was one cool, collected individual, who failed to partake, as his host thought he should, of sparkling and refreshing beverages set before him.

Upon returning to his hotel to make arrangements for continuing his journey, he was again importuned to take something to stimulate him before the trip. In a laughing manner he remarked to the committeemen accompanying him, 'You boys are so persistent, I will join you in a parting glass. Let it be apollinaris, though, for that is all I need to invigorate me and help me to digest that good dinner you had prepared for me.' His manner was so cordial and sincere as he carried out his intention that his hosts joined heartily in the toasts he proposed. President McKinley had the courage of his convictions, which made him more popular with his southern friends than if he had succumbed to their wiles and partaken of wine."

How to Wash China Without Removing the Gilt.

It is mostly young beginners in house-keeping who write to me to know how to preserve their beautiful china—many such pieces being bridal gifts and very dear to them. The reason our dear grandmothers kept their gilt-banded china sets for years was, that they washed and wiped each piece themselves, no matter how many servants they had. It will have to be done in this day if you wish to preserve your gilt-edged china. You can wash it a long time by putting the dainty pieces in a pan of warm water and dissolving a teaspoonful of pearl-ine into it, and putting in one piece at a time so as not to chip it, or hurt it. Wash quickly and rinse in warm water, having the second pan filled with clear water sitting by you, and wipe carefully upon a soft old linen towel. You can wash handpainted china pieces beautifully this way. It takes time and patience, but after a dinner or luncheon, set them aside until you have time to do them yourself and can put them carefully away. You asked about your steel knives: by dipping them into a warm solution of borax water and wiping dry quickly and putting away in flannel you can keep them from rusting. For your table linens: the stains can be removed by stretching the stained portion over a bowl and pouring hot water through the stain. Washing in sweet milk is also good for fruit or ink stains. For hinges or door knobs that creak or are rusty dip a feather in sweet oil and rub on them.

Whistler is noted almost as much for his eccentricity as for his artistic skill. While he was trying on a hat in a London shop one day a customer rushed in and mistaking him for a clerk, exclaimed: "I say, this 'at does not fit."

The artist eyed him for a minute, and then replied scornfully: "Neither does your coat, and I'll be hanged if I like the color of your trousers."

Ballade of Literary Letters.

Of old it was an easy thing
To write a letter to one's dear,
To line the words we felt, and cling
To simple sentiments and clear;
But times are sadly changed, we hear—
Love grows enamoured of the mint;
We pen our lines with care and fear—
Our letters must be fit to print.

No more in our accustomed way
We say the tender things we mean;
Our letters may be made to play
A part in book or magazine.
Ah me! They once by one were seen—
We did not have to hedge or hint;
But now the public com's between—
Our letters must be fit to print.

Whene'er the lean wolf snarled of old,
A man sought friends without demur,
Or left his watch in Shylock's hold,
Or starved or stole as he'd prefer;
But now he takes the notes of Her,
The honeyed lines she did not stint,
And hies him to a publisher—
Our letters must be fit to print.

L'Envoi.

Sweetheart, henceforth with words alone
Shall Love his fond expressions tint.
It grieves me sore, yet I must own
My letters are not fit to print.

A Statement From the New President.

Mr. Theodore F. Seward sends us the following letter which he received a few months ago from Mr. Roosevelt, together with some comments on the same. They are particularly timely now:

In the sad experience of the present hour the American people are moved and stirred as they have not been since the tragic death of Abraham Lincoln. Not even by the assassination of Garfield were they affected as they are affected now. The conditions have changed. Responsibilities have fallen upon our nation that were not dreamed of at that time. Never did the question of a new ruler's motives and principles seem more important than they do in the present case.

It is a most striking fact, so striking as to seem nothing less than providential, that President Roosevelt was led a few months ago to give expression to his views in the clear and positive manner which is so strongly his characteristic. It is a letter written in March, 1901, expressing his regret at being unable to attend the great Golden Rule meeting of March 29, in New York City, from which the Golden Rule Brotherhood originated. It is herewith quoted in full:

Vice-President's Chamber,
Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir:—I have your letter of the 11th inst. It is a matter of real regret that I cannot be with you. In this country, of all others, it behooves us to show an example to the world, not by words only, but by deeds, that we have faith in the doctrine that each man should be treated on his worth as a man, without regard to his creed or his race. Wonderful opportunities are ours, and great and growing strength has been given us. But if we neglect the opportunities and misuse the strength then we shall leave to those who come after us a heritage of woe instead of a heritage of triumph. There is need of the aid of every wise, strong and good man, if we are to do our work aright. The forces that tell for good should not be dissipated by clashing among themselves. In no way is it so absolutely certain that we will worse than nullify these forces as by permitting the upgrowth of hostilities and division based on creed or race origin.

Jew and Gentile, Protestant and Catholic, if we only have the root of right thinking in us, we are bound to stand shoulder to shoulder and hand to hand in the effort to work out aright the problem of our national existence, and to direct for good and not for evil the half unknown social forces which have been quickened into power by our complex and tremendous industrial development.

With all good wishes, I am faithfully yours,
THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Mr. Roosevelt has been known as an apostle of "the strenuous life." If any apprehension is felt that this phrase may indicate a spirit of aggression on his part, that fear must surely be banished by these stirring and sterling words.

More than this. There are many who believe that in the development of mankind a new type of life is now being evolved in which the moral and spiritual qualities shall be more predominant than they have been in the past. Reading between the lines as one studies Mr. Roosevelt's letter—and it is worthy of the most profound study that we can give to it—it is plain that our President is, or is being prepared to become, one of the new type rather than the old. This is clearly and strongly indicated by the words, "If we only have the root of right thinking in us." The brief sentence speaks volumes. It goes without saying that one who indites such a sentence must have the root, or at least a capacity for the root, of right thinking—of the best type of thinking—in his own nature.

Mr. Roosevelt's letter, written when there could have been no possible thought of the exigency which now gives it such a vital significance, will be a comfort to all earnest-minded American citizens. It will also move them to resolve to do all in their power to aid our President in carrying into practical realization his noble ideal.

THEODORE F. SEWARD.

Too Particular.

A business man who had eaten a meal at a restaurant where he frequently, says the Youth's Companion, took his midday luncheon, walked up to the cashier and said:

"I find I haven't a cent of change about me to-day. If you will kindly let me owe for this until I come in again, which will certainly be in a day or two, I will square up then."

The cashier was not a good judge of human nature, or was under the influence of a momentary irritation, for she replied:

"We don't run any accounts at this shop. If you haven't anything to pay with, you can leave something with us as security."

"I didn't say I hadn't any money," the customer rejoined. "I said I had no change. Please take the amount of my check out of this."

And he took a fifty-dollar bill out of his pocket-book, and handed it to the astonished cashier.

"It will be better to pay it now, perhaps," he added, "than to leave something as security, for you will not be likely to see me here again."

Then picking up his change, which comprised about all the money the cashier could find in the establishment, he bowed and walked out.

The Runaways.—I.

Emily Lamont and her two brothers were orphans. I have named her first although Zep was fifteen, and Harry fourteen, while she was only twelve. Their parents were dead, and they had become pretty well acquainted with their poor uncles and aunts. There was a rich uncle in New York, but he was only a tradition.

"Gettin' tired, Em?" asked Zep, as he led the way down the dusty country road; Harry came next, then Emily; does not the youngest always come last?

"I can't hardly take another step," panted the girl.

"There's a railroad track, anyway," observed Harry Lamont. They would have disputed it if they could, they were so dusty and weary and dispirited. But there is no getting around a railroad; one must cross it, or stay on this side.

"And, oh, there's a box-car on the switch!" exclaimed Harry. "The very thing for us! Now we won't care if we don't come to a house to-night." They had just walked three miles through a Missouri wood without having seen any other sign of civilization but the road with deep ruts on each side and high weeds in the middle.

A warm September day had come to a close, and already the haze of autumn twilight was mingling with the deep blue of the sky. "We will sleep in that box-car!" said Harry, suddenly dancing with joy at the thought.

"But if it went away with us?" Emily suggested, timidly.

Zep laughed. "Where's your engine? Do you think the farmers will come and hitch up their teams to it? And what if it did go away with us? We'd travel all the faster, then!"

In fact, these three were running away. You have heard of a boy running away from home, but not, I think, of the exodus, as it were, of an entire family. If they were doing wrong, it was not Emily's fault, as you shall presently find. Their flight had begun the night before, a little after midnight,—and oh, how dark that night was, and what strange sounds were in the air!

"Let's see if the box-car is locked up," said Harry. "They generally are, you know."

"Ain't it a lonesome looking coach," said Emily, "lost out here in the middle of nothing!" They had been raised in a big city, and they were inclined to patronize rural landscapes.

The railroad was about half-a-mile from the extensive wood. They trudged along with more spirit, and at last came to the switch. "Here's a wagon been backin' up to the car-door," said Zep, examining the ground. "Yes, the door's locked,—just our luck—no she ain't, either! Hurrah! Lookie!" And pushing with all his might, he slid back the door.

"Let me in first!" cried Harry.

"Not much," replied his brother, climbing in. Harry always wanted to do things first, and although Zep never let him, Harry would request this favor with all the optimism of fourteen years.

Zep looked about. "Oh, Harry, Emily, —come in quick! Here's things!"

"Things?" repeated Emily. "I'm afraid."

"They won't bite," Zep laughed; "big boxes; bedsteads; stoves; tables."

Harry, who now stood beside his brother, called, "Empty fruit jars; brooms; a sprinkler; a cradle; a little bitty chair on rockers."

Zep chimed in, "Sofa; bureau;—oh, I know!—somebody is moving, and they've hauled away part of the furniture and left the rest till to-morrow, and forgot to lock the door!"

They helped Emily in, and all three examined their hotel with great attention. More than half of the car was empty, and in this empty end they would pass the night. They did not touch the things that had been stored in the car, for these children were as honest as they were ragged and dirty. In a word, their honesty was as great as their poverty.

"We will make our bed," said Zep. "Come, let's get a whole lot of grass."

"All right," said Harry. "I'll go first."

"No you won't" said the older brother.

"I guess I'm the captain of this retreat." They had been playing all day that they were the American army retreating before overwhelming numbers of the English; period, 1777.

"And I'll sit here and watch you gather the grass," said Emily who, like most people (they will not confess this, however), would rather watch others work than personally endure the toil.

"No you won't," said Zep, "you'll come on and help, Miss Emily!"

"Come on, Em," said Harry, "and I'll gather half of your share."

"Oh, Harry, gather all my share," pleaded Emily as she sat on the floor of the car, swinging her bare feet out the door.

"All right," said Harry, "only the next time we have something good, I'm to have half of your part."

"All right," agreed his sister. It seemed so far off,—that hope of having something good!

When the grass had been gathered and spread out on the floor, it was not yet dark. It made it so warm and oppressive when they closed the great door, that they decided to stay up late,—and to stay up high. They found that iron ladder that runs up the end of box-cars, and presently all three sat aloft, enjoying the prospect and the delicious breeze. On their right they saw the great wood stretch away, a black whispering mass, while on their left was a rolling prairie, cut up into squares by fences. At a great distance was visible the roof of a barn. The switch slanted into a track that ran straight as a needle, till it dipped out of sight. At last they began to count the stars. There was only one in sight—no, two!—no, three, four, five,—each tried to discover a new one. It was hard to find them because the moon was so bright. The top of the box-car was coated with silver light; the faces of the three children were etherealized by the moonbeams. The delicate features of Emily were revealed, the sweet, pretty face, the little hands and feet, the heavy brown hair,—I am sorry it looked so towed. Even her torn dress fluttered with a rhythmic sound, making her more picturesque. Zep was broad-shouldered and sturdy, as became the captain of a retreat. His hair stuck out at angles like open scissors; his head was round and his neck short; but his eyes spoke of a dauntless spirit, a tireless energy. Harry looked more like his sister,—he had her fineness of expression, her delicacy of features, and a forehead that prophesied the student. As they sit there talking in subdued voices while Emily, lying with her head on Harry's knee—these two are "chums"—tried to keep from falling asleep, let us look into the history of these three. We cannot hear what they are saying; it is no use to just watch them as they half-whisper in the moonlight; perhaps we can amuse ourselves by looking into the causes of their running away.

The Place of Safety.*

TEXT:—From the end of the earth will I call unto thee, when my heart is overwhelmed: Lead me to the rock that is higher than I.—Psa. 61:2.

The place of safety is a place from which, no matter how widely we wander, we should never go forth; we should seek it zealously, and having found it, abide in it. For a state of conscious security, even in the midst of peril, is possible to the trusting child of God. As Harriet Auber sings,

They who on the Lord rely,
Safely dwell, though danger's nigh;
Lo! His sheltering wings are spread
O'er each faithful servant's head.
When they wake or when they sleep,
Angel guards their vigils keep;
Death and danger may be near,
Faith and love have nought to fear.

The Citadel.

The passage in John assures us that this place of safety is nothing less than a living Personality. The sheep were held as in the hand of the Great Shepherd; "they shall never perish, and no one shall snatch them out of my hand." As the passage in Proverbs literally implies, this place is "set aloft," out of gunshot. No weapon framed by satanic malice can reach those whom God defends. When men take refuge in a fortress, the fortress must be stormed before their enemy can harm them. If your refuge is in God, then the Almighty himself must be overwhelmed before you can be touched.

"When His wisdom can mistake,
His might decay, His love forsake," then, but not till then will you be exposed to danger. This place of safety is therefore impregnable. It is also ever-present. "God is not far from every one of us" (Acts 17:27). If by some mischance we are lured forth into the way of danger, we can turn again for refuge to Him who hovers over us, and thrusts His protecting arms under us.

What a contrast between the Christian's refuge, and all others! Men have built bulwarks for defense against armies; they deemed them impregnable, but the enemy found or made a breach, and scaled the wall. Or time has taken vengeance on them, and their high towers have crumbled. Wealth is thought to be a defense, a refuge, and so it is, from some things. But it cannot purchase immunity from sickness. Sorrow can smite the rich as well as the poor; and at last death crushes down the poor defense, and drags off his unwilling prisoner.

Its Protection.

In God we are protected from the power of sin. It has "no more dominion over us." Temptations may assail, but they cannot overwhelm him who trusts in God. He has broken with his sinful habit of life, and lives now a life of righteousness; not in his own strength, but in the power of God. This is a species of safety which many a sin-scarred soul seeks elsewhere, but he seeks in vain; it can be had only in God, through faith in Jesus Christ. Annoying cares, vexations, difficulties, disappointments, none of these things can distress him whom God keeps. What we call a dis-appointment is often but a divine appointment instead of our own appointment. As such the child of God accepts it smilingly and uncomplainingly. And finally, he is safe from the shafts of death. He shall never perish. "He that liveth and believeth in me shall never die." Death, as we still term it, is but a point of transition to the soul that trusts in God. It is a black portal, dark on this side, but wondrously light beyond.

The Path to Safety.

God has opened as many avenues to this serene height as there are wanderers. Or a better statement is, God has opened up a way of escape from peril which lies clear and plain before the feet of every prodigal, no matter how far he has strayed. He has warned you of the danger, He has permitted you to suffer from transgression and voluntary absence, and then in His word He has pointed out the way of escape. But how shall we escape, if we neglect it? Christ declares, "I am the way." He flings himself down, and makes of his bleeding body a bridge from sin to righteousness, from condemnation to justification. "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."

*Prayer-meeting Topic for Oct. 9.

And so the churches are busier than ever preaching Christ. He has become the central theme of modern literature. His words are being recognized as authoritative, binding upon the consciences of merchant and banker and artisan. And His ministers and followers all go forth, led by Him, to do battle with every enemy that menaces our blood-bought race, and rescue the perishing, and establish upon this swinging earth the city of God.

Prayer.

Almighty God, thou art from everlasting to everlasting; an eternal refuge to thy children. Again and again when sheeted storms deluged the world, thou hast been an ark of safety. When the black legions of death and hell assailed, thou hast been our deliverance. We praise thee for peace and safety, even in the midst of tumult. Help us, O God, to abide with reverent faith in thee, and win others to peace and safety, by the sweet solicitude of love, through Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE AKRON ROUTE.

Through Passenger Service to Buffalo for Pan-American Exposition.

The opening of the Pan-American Buffalo Line—"Akron Route"—May 5th establishes a new outlet from the West and Southwest to Chautauqua Lake, Buffalo, Niagara Falls and St. Lawrence River and Canada resorts. It also opens a new tourist route via Buffalo and the Niagara frontier to New York and the East.

Schedules for the new route are out, and their arrangement indicates passengers over it are to have enjoyable trips to and from the Pan-American Exposition.

The service from St. Louis for Pan-American Exposition visitors from that gateway and the West and Southwest includes two daily trains in both directions. The Pan-American Express leaves St. Louis Union Station at 8:44 a. m., arrives Buffalo 8:15 next morning. This train has sleeping car on which passengers may go from St. Louis to Chautauqua Lake and Buffalo without change. The Buffalo Express leaves St. Louis at 8:15 p. m. with sleeping car from St. Louis to Columbus and from Columbus through to Chautauqua Lake and Buffalo, arriving at latter point at 12:50 midnight. Passengers occupying sleeping car may remain in their berths until 7:00 a. m. Returning trains leave Buffalo daily at 1:00 p. m., arrive St. Louis at noon next day; leave Buffalo 6:30 p. m., arrive St. Louis 6:40 next evening.

Information about fares to Buffalo, Niagara Falls and beyond, stop-over privileges at Buffalo and other details may be ascertained by communicating with J. M. CHESBROUGH, A. G. P. Agt., St. Louis.

Wholesome Advice

For People Whose Stomachs are Weak and Digestion Poor.

Dr. Harlandson, whose opinion in diseases is worthy of attention, says when a man or woman comes to me complaining of indigestion, loss of appetite, sour stomach, belching, sour watery rising, headaches, sleeplessness, lack of ambition and a general run down nervous condition, I advise them to take after each meal one or two of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, allowing the tablet to dissolve in the mouth, and thus mingle with the food eaten. The result is that the food is speedily digested before it has time to sour and ferment. These tablets will digest the food anyway whether the stomach wants to or not, because they contain harmless digestive principles, vegetable essences, pepsin and Golden Seal, which supply just what the weak stomach lacks.

I have advised the tablets with great success, both in curing indigestion and to build up the tissues, increasing flesh in thin nervous patients, whose real trouble was dyspepsia, and as soon as the stomach was put to rights they did not know what sickness was.

A fifty cent package of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets can be bought at any drug store, and as they are not a secret patent medicine, they can be used as often as desired with full assurance that they contain nothing harmful in the slightest degree; on the contrary, anyone whose stomach is at all deranged, will find great benefit from the use of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. They will cure any form of stomach weakness or disease except cancer of the stomach.

Joseph in Prison.*

In the slave market of the capital of Egypt, which was probably either at Memphis or Heliopolis, the youth Joseph attracted the eye of Potiphar, a king's officer, captain of the guard, who purchased him for a house servant. Here his capacity and fidelity were so marked as to win the unbounded confidence of his master, and it was but a short time till he was made the overseer of all his master's interests. Under his charge, Potiphar found his affairs to prosper beyond all precedent, so that he soon left everything to Joseph, only excepting, as we are told, "the bread which he did eat." Caste was strong in Egypt, and Potiphar would not take his bread from the hand of a foreigner, especially from one like Joseph, of the shepherd caste, which was particularly despised in that country. Joseph served his master with absolute fidelity, his handsome person being but the mirror of the beautiful soul that dwelt within, to which all evil doing was abhorrent.

But neither innocence nor virtue can exempt us from trial. The guileless lad became the victim of his base minded brothers, and the pure-hearted man suffered for his purity at the hands of a vile woman. Refusing to yield to her guilty solicitations, the comely young man becomes the object of her bitter hate. His reply is worthy of being written in letters of gold. "Behold, my master. . . hath committed all that he hath into my hand. . . how then can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?" Gratitude to his master and loyalty to his God were the bulwarks of his soul against temptation. It is easy for the wife of Potiphar to secure the conviction of Joseph upon her mere word, for who would suspect her of such an infamy? But possibly Potiphar himself may have cherished some doubt; else it seems that he would have inflicted some severer punishment upon Joseph for so gross a betrayal of trust and so vile a crime. Cast into the prison where the offenders against the king were kept, Joseph might well have felt something of the doubt that entered into David's heart, when severely tried, "But as for me, my feet were almost gone; my steps had well nigh slipped. For I was envious at the arrogant, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked." Joseph seems never to have doubted God, nor become embittered against men. His trials only made him trust God more absolutely and wait for time to vindicate his innocence.

In the prison, Joseph's character shines with the same luster as in the palace of Potiphar. The keeper of the prison finds him so capable and reliable that he commits everything into his hands, and affairs go forward with perfect satisfaction. Even the prisoners learn to love and trust him. Among these are two notable ex-officers of Pharaoh, his chief butler and chief baker. The former served as cup-bearer to the king, and tasted the wine which the king was to drink. The latter prepared his food and was responsible for its purity and good quality. These had in some way offended Pharaoh, and for some time had languished in the prison, until they had perhaps begun to despair of ever being released. One night they each had a dream, so strange as to impress them as of peculiar significance. Egyptian inscriptions show that that people attached great importance to dreams, their actions very often being guided by such intimations as seemed to be thus conveyed to them in sleep. Theirs were perfectly fitted to their former offices. The butler dreamed of seeing a vine with three branches, upon which grapes grew instantaneously, and whose juice he pressed into the cup of Pharaoh, the king. The baker, on his part, dreamed of carrying on his head three baskets of white bread, from which the birds ate as he bore them. The sad faces of the two men showed Joseph that they were troubled, and a question from him brought forth the story of their dreams. "Interpretations belong to God," said Joseph; but God honors his servant by revealing to him their meaning, and he tells the butler that in three days he will be restored to his office, while at the same time the chief baker will be beheaded and his body hanged up where the birds can devour it. The appeal of Joseph to the chief butler is pathetic. "But have me in remembrance when it shall be well with thee, and shew kindness, I pray thee, unto me, and make mention of me unto Pharaoh, and bring me out of this house: for indeed I was stolen away out of the land of the Hebrews; and here also have I done nothing that they should put me into the dungeon." Did we not know human nature so well, it would be incredible that the butler actually forgot all about Joseph, and suffered him to remain two whole years in prison after he himself had been released. Such is human gratitude.

What thoughts passed through the heart of Joseph, while he waited in vain for the deliverance he hoped for and deserved, at the hand of the ungrateful butler? We know not. "Hope deferred makes the heart sick," and injustice often leads to despair. Yet the darkest hour is often that which precedes the dawn, and thus it was with Joseph. The aged Jacob, when he heard that Benjamin must go with his brothers down into Egypt, cried out, "All these things are against me!" But they were all for his good, and that of his household, and joy and deliverance were at hand. The two years that elapsed after the release of the ungrateful butler may have been dark and hopeless ones to Joseph, but even the forgetfulness of the cup-bearer was to work out good and glory to Joseph and his father's family. The outcome proved that "it is good that a man should hope and quietly wait for the salvation of the Lord." The character of Joseph was perfected through suffering, and the providence of God vindicated to all generations.

And does not the story of Joseph prove to us, also, that God works by means of the ordinary events of life, to accomplish his purposes of grace toward them that believe in him and do good? He fulfills his promises to the chosen family, through Joseph, not by constant miracle, but by linking together events and influences so as to bring about the final victory of truth and virtue. Except the instances of interpreting dreams, there seems to have been nothing miraculous about the life of Joseph. He was one who believed in God, loved righteousness, kept a pure heart and a steadfast will, and God used him for glorious ends, and gave him immortal glory.

*Lesson for October 13. Genesis 39:20-40:8.

Christian Endeavor

Burris A. Jenkins

TOPIC FOR OCTOBER 13.

Dark Days and Their Lessons.

(Psalms 107:1-15.)

As I write this the rain is falling for the first time after many days of sunshine. The sunny days have been very grateful and beautiful, but after all, the rain, too, is grateful and beautiful. The perpetual sunshine of some climates grows stale and monotonous. Our natures call for a varied atmosphere.

And is this not true also in a figurative sense, of our lives? Do we not need sunshine and shadow? Is there not a necessity for rain and storm, if we would grow? There is a certain meditative melancholy which, no doubt, is to the soul what a tender, gentle rain is to the growing plants. We may not, at the time, appreciate the value of this brooding, lowering sky. It may seem to us very leaden and drear, but all the while it is producing thoughts, emotions, resolutions.

But the psalm which forms our lesson of today, has a still stormier and darker day as its background. It refers to the sad days of Israel in Babylon, in captivity; and tells of the surety that Israel feels in spite of all, that God is with them, that "Behind a frowning providence

He hides a smiling face."

He it is who will lead them, who has led them out of the dangers of captivity and its darkness.

Is there not in this psalm a message for us, to-day? Some of us have our days in captivity. Some of us have our bands of iron, and our prison houses; some of us have hung our harps on the willows of Babylon and wept when we remembered Zion.

To us come the comforts and consolations of the God of Israel that he will lead us with his eye, guide us with his hand, break our bands asunder and bring us into a large place.

Some of the best Christian lives you and I have ever seen have been lives lived among sorrows and tribulations, just as some of the most rugged and gentle characters are developed amid the rains and storms of mountain climates. Adversity often seems to develop in us a sort of humble heroism, of which we ourselves may be absolutely unconscious, but which brings brightness and beauty into the world. I have known Christians whose lives seemed to shine the brighter for their sorrows. Just as the stormiest days at sea are often brightened by the clearest sunshine, so the lives of deepest tribulation often show the brightest surface to the world.

As Longfellow says in his Hyperion: "The setting of a great hope is like the setting of the sun. The brightness of life is gone. The shadows close around us. We look forward into the coming lonely night. Then stars arise and the night is holy."

May God above teach us to know and to profit by the uses of adversity.

"For we know not every morrow can be sad;
So, forgetting all the sorrow we have had,
Let us fold away our fears,
And put by our foolish tears,
And, through all the coming years,
Just be glad."

So do the dark days, according to the Hoosier poet, give place to a joyous tomorrow.

A GREAT BOOK FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

The Young Man from Middlefield

By MRS. JESSIE BROWN POUNDS

THIS ENTRANCING STORY of twenty-six chapters ran as a serial in the columns of OUR YOUNG FOLKS during the first half of the year 1900, and was followed with absorbing and ever-increasing interest by the many thousands of readers of that weekly journal. It relates, in the popular author's most charming style, the trials and triumphs of a plain young man from the country, who left his father's farm and went to the great city to fill a position in the lumber yard of his uncle. In his new surroundings he came into contact with a variety of people, every way different from the plain, honest country folks with whom he had formerly associated; but in the midst of his new surroundings, with their many temptations, he maintained his Christian integrity and lived up to the motto he had adopted, to "Make Christ First in Everything."

His good influence soon began to be felt in his uncle's family, among his fellow-workmen, and most of all among the young Christian Endeavorers with whom he associated, whose society was in due time revolutionized.

EVERY YOUNG PERSON should read this charming volume, and it should at once find a place in every Christian Endeavor and Sunday-school Library.

MAPLE.

A. M. Maple, one of the oldest citizens of Maquon, Ill., died at the home of his son Charles F., Aug. 14, 1901. Augustus Melville Maple, son of David and Mary (Buchanan) Maple was born April 9, 1819, on a farm on Cabin Creek, Lewis county, Ky. His early life was spent upon his father's farm and sugar camp. In 1843 he rode on horseback from Kentucky to Canton, Ill., and in March came to Maquon. For full half a century he was prominently identified with the business interests and public life of Maquon. On April 3, 1851, A. M. Maple was married to Miss Mary Sheaff, of Philadelphia, Pa. Mrs. Maple died on April 4, 1901, it being just fifty years from the day she came to Maquon. Mr. Maple possessed many sterling qualities, and was a model of honor and integrity. His life was clean and pure. For 20 years he was superintendent of the Christian Sunday-school. He has energetically opposed the liquor element for fifty years. His three children, Harriet L. Haven, of Wichita, Kan., A. L. Maple, of Hulls, Ill., and C. F. Maple of Maquon, Ill., were present at the funeral, which was held Friday at 2 P. M. from the M. E. Church. Rev. D. T. Wilson, assisted by N. G. Clark, conducted the services.

RICHARDSON.

My oldest brother, James H. Richardson, died at his home in Quincy, Ill., on Wednesday morning, Sept. 18, 1901, at the age of 67. He was born near New Albany, Ind., but had spent most of his life in Illinois. He was a lawyer by profession, and practiced for perhaps 25 years, until the condition of his health caused him to give up his practice, that he might enter business with his sons, which enabled him to travel a great deal, with excellent results upon his health. He had been honored by his fellow citizens with various positions of trust, among which were those of city attorney and state senator, and was postmaster under President Cleveland. All these offices he filled with credit, and his integrity was never doubted by even his political opponents. He was an honest and upright man, generous in his sympathies, and beloved by all who knew him. During the pastorate of the lamented J. T. Toof, my brother obeyed the gospel, and became a member of the church in Quincy, to which faith and fellowship he was loyal to the end of his earthly life. He was ever a kind and loving husband and father, and to the younger children in his father's family he was all that an elder brother could possibly be. He left a devoted wife, five sons and one daughter and a large circle of other relatives and friends to mourn his loss. In the absence from home of the family's pastor, Bro. L. H. Stine, the funeral services were conducted by Bro. W. W. Rumsey, of Hannibal, Mo. W. F. RICHARDSON.

Kansas City, Mo., Sept. 28, 1901.

SWEENEY.

On Monday, Sept. 23, J. B. Sweeney, pastor of the church at Gainesville, Texas, passed into life eternal. He had been ill for several weeks with typhoid fever. When the summer came, instead of taking a vacation, he went to Detroit, Texas and held a meeting with 107 added to the church. His condition was that bordering on nervous prostration at the close of the meeting and the frail body was an easy victim for the dreaded typhoid. Bro. Sweeney was a graduate of Add-Ran College, Waco, Tex., and the College of the Bible, Lexington, Ky. He was for seven years practically the manager of Texas mission work, adding this burden to his duties as pastor of the church at Taylor, Texas. He had been preaching in Gainesville about three years and more than 300 were added to the church there under his ministry. Bro. Sweeney was thirty-five years old and leaves a wife and several small children. He was to go to Palestine in February, but the course of his journey has been changed and he is now in the land of the blest. May God bless the church that loses his ministry and all who grieve beside the new made grave. J. N. CRUTCHER.

Travel.

A word or two on the subject of travel is not amiss. The facilities for the transportation of passengers at the present time have certainly been brought to perfection. It isn't like in the old days when it was almost a torture to go from one place to another. Now you get aboard a train and live just like you do at home. The entire equipment is built with a view to your comfort.

For instance: When you go East the B. & O S-W. offers you Three Daily Solid Vestibuled Trains from St. Louis, leaving at 8:20 a. m., 8:05 p. m. and 2:15 a. m.—made up of the finest Pullman sleepers—a dining car service which cannot be excelled (you don't have to pay for what you can't eat, but just for what you order)—first class high back coaches—in fact the trains are palaces on wheels. The track, roadbed and equipment are entirely new.

It's the best line to Cincinnati and Louisville. Only $21 to New York with stop-overs. (Saves you money and gives you the best service.)

Information in regard to trains, etc., can be secured from any representative. It will be a pleasure for them to answer your questions and help you in every way.

The favor of the public is final proof of merit—and we're after it.

the value Of Charcoal.

Few People Know How Useful it Is in Preserving Health and Saut.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better: it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines, and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking, or after eating onions or other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion; it whitens the teeth; and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics, in tablet form, or rather in the form of large, pleasant-tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood; and the beauty of it is that no harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician, in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

Popular Hymns No. 2

THE ruling purpose of the author has been to give to the public a worthy successor of Popular Hymns. He has not sought to duplicate it, but to make a book as well adapted to the new methods of Church, Sunday-school and C. E. work as the first was to the conditions twenty years ago when Popular Hymns was launched upon its long and useful career. Popular Hymns No. 2 is better than its predecessor, not because it contains better music, but because the music is better adapted to the present wants of all the working forces of the church.

EVANGELISTS will find the Gospel Proclamation in Song a department of the book eminently suited to every phase of a successfully conducted revival.

SINGING EVANGELISTS will be pleased with the analytical classification, enabling them without reference to indices to find a suitable song on a moment's warning.

CHORISTERS will find the average choir supplied with a rich selection of beautiful and impressive solos with choruses, duets, quartettes, invocations, etc., especially selected for the distinctive part a choir is expected to take in the service.

PASTORS who are responsible for the kind of pasture upon which the sheep and lambs are fed, will not find a sentiment out of harmony with New Testament Christianity. He will find it a companion vade mecum for his pocket Testament, containing gems for public worship, for the prayer-meeting for funeral occasions, for Baptismal, Thanksgiving and Convention services.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVORERS will find in Popular Hymns No. 2 all that they can wish, because it is full from back to back with soul-stirring sentiment set to soul-inspiring music, the only kind C. E.'s care to sing.

S. S. SUPERINTENDENTS will find Popular Hymns No. 2 richly supplied with music within the voice compass and heart reach of the children, giving them a desire to remain and participate in the song service of the church. Like its predecessors, Popular Hymns No. 2 is an

Book Notes.

We urge our friends and patrons to remember that the business of the Christian Publishing Company is by no means confined to the books which we ourselves publish, or to the works listed in our catalogues, or to those which we advertise, from time to time, in these columns. We do a general book business, and can supply, at the regular price, any book in print, no matter where or by whom published. We solicit correspondence regarding any desired volume. If you see, anywhere, an advertisement, review or notice of any book, and decide to purchase it, send your order to The Christian Publishing Company.

Already we are rapidly receiving orders for "The Witness of Jesus," the book which contains the sermons of the late Alexander Procter. Every preacher among us should read and re-read these sermons, and keep them in his library, to read again. There are nineteen of them, selected, because, together, they give the reader an idea of the preacher's conception of the Christian system. Besides the nineteen sermons, there is a preface by J. H. Garrison, who edited the sermons, and the Memorial Address by T. P. Haley, delivered at the Missouri Christian Convention in 1900. The book is a handsome volume of 404 pages, and the price is $1.25.

Once more—and for the last time—we call attention to The Crisis, the great historical novel by Winston Churchill. We have sold a number of copies of the book, but for the pleasure and the information of our patrons we would like to sell a great many more. We repeat our former declaration, viz., that this is not exceeded by any work of fiction published within a decade. The scene of the story is, for the most part, in St. Louis. The time is from 1855 to 1865—the years just preceding and during the great civil war. The work of Mr. Churchill, better than any other book of which we know, brings before the present generation a picture of politics, business, social life, etc., in the Mississippi Valley forty years ago. It is a splendid book, handsomely illustrated and bound. Price, $1.50.

The seven great presses in the Mechanical Department of the Christian Publishing Company were never more busy than at present. Besides the extra work caused by the rapid increase in circulation of our various periodicals, the rapid growth of our book business is making heavy demands upon our machinery. We have recently had to print new editions of The Christian System, The Divine Demonstration, The Christian Worker, Christian Science Dissected, and other standard works; and as for song books, we can hardly keep up with the demand. We are sending out many thousand copies each week. There seems to be a regular program in the song-book business. Ordinarily we receive three communications from persons ordering them, as follows:

1. Patron orders sample copy. Examines this carefully, and straightway
2. Sends order for 50, 100, or 250 copies. These are taken to the church and used by the people, and a few days later,
3. Writes again, saying all are delighted with the new book.

The Christian Endeavor Societies throughout the land are evidently getting ready for increased activity during the autumn and winter. A large proportion of orders, just now, are for C. E. topic cards, pledge cards, invitation cards, pins and badges, constitutions, C. E. books, etc. We have a complete stock of everything needed by Endeavor societies. Catalogue mailed free on application.

"I can't afford to buy books," says a preacher. Consequently there is a lack of freshness about his preaching; consequently he finds it harder and harder to secure a place to preach, as the years go by; consequently, about the time he is 45 or 50 years old, he is puzzled to understand why it is that he is laid on the shelf, just when he is in the prime of life, and can preach as well as he ever could. Exactly! He preaches just as well as ever—and not a bit better. The people demand growth in a preacher, and when they see that he is standing still, they release him in favor of a more progressive man. Moral: Choose, with discretion, a few new books, each year, and absorb them. Keep up with the progress of religious thought, the world over. Don't fancy that you learned all there was to know in college, twenty-five years ago, and have no need to study. The people have no objections to a white-haired pastor, but they have no use for white-haired theology and age-worn sermons.

The Historical Society.

What is Said About it.

George A. Miller, Covington, Ky., says: "I am with you in this movement. Count on me for anything I can do to promote the enterprise."

J. Z. Tyler, Cleveland, O., says: "Your proposal to form an historical society is timely and I want to join it."

W. E. Garrison, St. Louis, Mo., says: "The proposed historical society is a first-class suggestion. We ought to have had it long ago and every year that its organization is postponed will increase the difficulty of collecting the original documents which constitute the chief wealth of such a society. I suppose no really great history ever came out of this sort of organization, but it can encourage the publication of memoirs which are indispensable to the real historian when he comes."

J. N. Dabney, Scranton, Pa., says: "I think something of this kind is just the thing. I will help you in any way possible."

B. B. Tyler, Denver, Col., says: "Of course I am in favor of organizing an historical society. To organize such a society is an important step in the right direction."

Russell F. Thrapp, Jacksonville, Ill., says: "I am decidedly in favor of an historical society. I read your communication in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST several days ago and it struck me as a matter needing attention at once. We have lost much now. Let us move swiftly in the matter."

The foregoing extracts from letters show the response such an enterprise will meet with generally. This is a matter in which we desire to enlist all, whether minister or layman. Let others express themselves on the subject and offer any suggestions that ought to be carried out by such a society. A meeting of those interested in the matter will be called at Minneapolis to form a preliminary organization. It need not be consummated until the meeting of the congress in Cleveland or the next general convention.

A MOUNTAIN top in Galilee. A group of twelve men. One in the midst of the eleven has the look and bearing of the Son of God. It is He, the Master, who, a few days before, had been crucified between two thieves outside the walls of Jerusalem. He has conquered death, and is now planning to conquer the world. These about Him are His chosen apostles. He has met them there by an appointment made before His death and renewed after His resurrection. He speaks: "All authority is mine. Go, disciple all nations." Wonderful words! How can these unlettered men take this world for the Master? "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world!" Result: Christendom. A Christian civilization that outshines that of the Roman Era, as the sun outshines the glow-worm. Humanity enfranchised. Tyranny doomed. Democracy triumphant. Slavery slain. Womanhood honored. Childhood crowned. The home made sacred. Walls of separation crumbling. International good will triumphing over narrow prejudices. The brotherhood of man recognized in world-wide benevolences. The Galilean Prophet, from His mountain throne, gathers His mighty conventions, summons to His aid vast armies, which, under the white banner of Peace, march forward to the world's conquest.

The Reformation of The XIXth Century

A Series of Historical Sketches, dealing with the Rise and Progress of the Religious Movement inaugurated by Thomas and Alexander Campbell, from its Origin to the close of the Nineteenth Century.

✧ Edited by J. H. Garrison ✧

This great work, which has been eagerly awaited for some time, is now ready for delivery. It is truly a notable work—a splendid addition to the literature of the Disciples of Christ. It is the only complete and modern history of the current reformation, and therefore should at once find a place in the home of every earnest and zealous Disciple.

This history is divided into eight periods, as follows:

Introductory Period	- - - - -	Chas. Louis Loos.
Period of Organization	- - - - -	B. B. Tyler.
The Turbulent Period	- - - - -	W. T. Moore.
The Transition Period	- - - - -	T. W. Grafton.
Period of Revival of Home Missions	- - - - -	Benj. L. Smith.
Period of Foreign Missions	- - - - -	A. McLean.
Period of Woman's Work	- - - - -	Lois A. White.
Lessons from Our Past	- - - - -	J. H. Garrison.

Chas. Louis Loos was personally and intimately acquainted with the fathers of the reformation, and associated with them in their work. His statement of the origin of our movement, and of its early connection with the Baptists, is the most satisfactory which has yet been made. B. B. Tyler has for many years been an untiring student of the history of our movement. W. T. Moore was an active and prominent participant in the events of the period beginning with 1861. His sketch of Alexander Campbell is a masterpiece, and is alone worth the price of the book. T. W. Grafton, in his "Life of Alexander Campbell," and "Men of Yesterday" has shown his ability as an able historian. Benj. L. Smith, A. McLean and Miss White have been most conspicuously identified with the enterprises of which they write. The closing section, by J. H. Garrison, is the address delivered by him at the Jubilee Convention in Cincinnati, October, 1899.

"The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century" is a handsome volume of 514 pages, bound in cloth. It is an addition to that list of books which, whatever other books he may have, every earnest Disciple of Christ should possess. This history is not only a volume full of facts and information, but a story of absorbing interest.

Anxiety or Curiosity?

Critics over-seas are perhaps excusable if they do not look upon the beginning of the Roosevelt administration with that calm confidence which is the characteristic American attitude toward our new president. An English writer, T. P. O'Connor, expresses this European uncertainty as follows: "Rennan, when he was close to his last hour, wrote that he would like to survive to the middle of the century, so that he might know the ultimate fate of the young emperor of Germany, whose tumult was then filling and alarming the ear of Europe. If the great philosopher had survived to this hour he probably would have found a subject of equal curiosity and uncertainty—the accession to the presidency of this red-haired, restless, short, muscular man, as ready with his fists as with his pen, a soldier and literateur, a realist and dreamer, who now occupies the bleak white palace at Washington from which are ruled the eighty most active, energetic and vital millions of the human race." This, it will be seen, is not the note of serious apprehension, but of curiosity to know how such a man will accomplish the task before him. He is almost certain to do some new things. What will they be? What precedents will he ignore, what movements initiate? Mr. Roosevelt has done a good many different things in his brief career, none of which seems, when viewed from the outside, to afford any very adequate preparation for the presidency. But the adequacy of the preparation appears when it is seen, from the inside, how he has done those things—with what unswerving rectitude, with what high sense of public duty, with what intelligent foresight, with what tireless energy. There is room for curiosity concerning his methods in his new office, but not for anxiety as to the outcome.

Army and Navy Improvements.

The new administration will without doubt have some definite and characteristic views on the subject of strengthening the army and navy. It is long since we had a president who was so thoroughly acquainted with our fighting machinery by actual experience as is Mr. Roosevelt. He has been assistant secretary of the navy and he has seen active service in the army, both within the last four years. It is no secret that he believes in increasing the effectiveness of both branches of the service. Within the last few days he has expressed the belief that this increased effectiveness ought to come not so much through increase in numbers of either men or ships as through keeping both army and navy, of whatever size they may be, in fighting trim. To this end he proposes a regime of drills, maneuvers and marches which will keep our fighting machines in such shape that they can be used on short notice if they are needed. When the Spanish-American war called our troops into service, it was found that there was a woeful inefficiency in all the details connected with transporting and providing for the troops, and an opportunity ought not to be allowed for a second exhibition of that sort in any emergency. These suggestions do not indicate an expectation of war, but are merely an expression of the common sense opinion that, if it is worth while to have military and naval equipment at all, it is worth while to have it in usable condition. Every argument in favor of having any army is an argument in favor of having one which is trained to do all the things which an army may be called upon to do in case of war. It is generally believed that Mr. Roosevelt as secretary of the navy was chiefly responsible for the navy's beautiful fitness for its work in both hemispheres, and as colonel of the Rough Riders he learned, in his attempts to secure necessary supplies for his soldiers, that the army was not in a similar state of preparedness. So he proposes now that the army be put through an annual round of marching, embarking, disembarking and all the processes which are necessary in putting an effective force in the field. As to the navy, the President believes in heavy battleships rather than in the swift and light vessels which are best fitted for preying upon the enemy's commerce. In fact, he does not believe that preying upon commerce is any part of legitimate warfare.

A New Canal Treaty.

It is reported from Washington that representatives of Great Britain and the United States have reached an agreement in regard to a canal treaty which will be submitted to the Senate for ratification soon after Congress convenes. The gist of the matter is that it abrogates completely the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and provides that the canal shall be built by the United States, that it shall be neutral in time of peace, and that the United States may do what seems best with it in time of war. The other powers are not invited to join in guaranteeing neutrality and Great Britain guarantees it only inferentially as a party to this treaty. Inasmuch as there has never been in the United States any intention of favoring our own commerce by a preferential rate through the canal, this point can be easily conceded and it is the point of by far the greatest importance to Great Britain. It is sincerely to be hoped that the report of these negotiations is true, for the arrangement is probably as just and as acceptable to all parties as any that could be made. The general public is not engrossed in the fine points of diplomacy which it necessitates, but the belief that the canal is needed is almost universal in this country and any arrangement will be approved which will provide for building the canal without surrendering, even in time of war, the rights which we ought naturally to exercise over that which we build with our own money. There is no occasion for getting up international agreements and bringing into the negotiations other governments which have no special interest in the matter. In consideration of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, Great Britain certainly has a right to be consulted, and American diplomacy will score another of its periodical triumphs if it can, without ruthlessly over-riding any rights guaranteed in the old treaty, clear the way for the construction of a thoroughly American canal from ocean to ocean.

The Cup Is Safe.

In three consecutive races—not counting flukes on account of failure of the wind—the American defender, Columbia, won from Sir Thomas Lipton's challenger, Shamrock II., in the international yacht race. The championship cup is apparently screwed down, and Sir Thomas has been heard to express the opinion that the only way to lift it is to get the Herreschoffs to build a challenger to beat their own defender. But it was a splendid series of races, and in none of them did the successful boat win by more than a minute or two. The second of the series was the fastest thirty-mile race on record in half a century of yachting, and in the third the margin which made the victory was shaved down to a few odd seconds. Sir Thomas has no reason to be ashamed of his boat even if she did not carry off the cup, and his country has no need to be ashamed of him, for he has given an exhibition of those true sportsmanlike qualities which are dear to the Anglo-Saxon heart on both sides of the Atlantic, and which show to even better advantage in defeat than in victory. It is an open question whether he will make another attempt next year or subsequently. The old motto, "Try, try again," is all right, but it cannot always be followed literally, even by such a wealthy and devoted sportsman as Sir Thomas Lipton, in cases where the cost is about a million-dollars per try.

Lieutenant Peary's Expedition.

In the pressure of more absorbing events, the news which was received a few weeks ago from Lieut. Peary's Arctic expedition has excited less interest and comment than is justly due to it. On Sept. 13 the steamer Erik arrived at Cape Breton with Mrs. Peary and her daughter on board and bearing letters from Lieut. Peary. His expedition, which sailed in the Windward in July, 1898, has now been in the Arctics over three years. It has not reached the pole, but it has made some valuable geographical explorations and has moreover demonstrated the practicability of remaining for a considerable time in the frozen north and living largely upon the country. The highest latitude which has been attained is 83 degrees 50 minutes, farther than which in the western hemisphere no expedition has ever gone. The most valuable explorations made during these three years have been along the north coast of Greenland, which has now for the first time been traversed and mapped. As soon as the results of this work can get into the text-books the vagueness which now characterizes the outline of that coast as depicted in the geographies will disappear. Lieut. Peary will make his headquarters during the fall and winter at Herschel Bay, near Cape Sydney, and will spend the fall in exploring the interior and western coast of Ellesmere Land. Next spring, when the sun rises after the long Arctic night, he will start for the pole. Of the 1600 miles which now separate him from the coveted goal, it is estimated that the first 1100 are comparatively easy traveling, as Arctic traveling goes. The test will come with the last 500 miles. But whether he reaches the pole or not, Lieut. Peary has shown himself to be a scientific explorer of great ability and no mere adventurer.

The Schley Inquiry. So far the testimony in the court of inquiry has not been favorable to Admiral Schley. Evidence so far appears to show that Schley, before leaving Cienfuegos, decided that the Spanish fleet was not in Santiago harbor; that he went to Santiago with reluctance, considering it a useless expedition; that after arriving he made no effort to determine whether the Spanish fleet was in the harbor or to communicate with the insurgents on shore; that he made no effort to coal his ships while blockading the harbor, although colliers were at hand and coaling would not have been impossible; that he had no plan of battle and let the squadron go into action without orders; and that his flag-ship, the Brooklyn, by her famous back-handed loop, endangered the Texas which, in endeavoring to get out of the Brooklyn's way, endangered the Iowa. These are not conclusions which have been proved, but are conclusions toward which the testimony up to the present time points. But the testimony is not all against Schley, for there are plenty of witnesses to testify to the active part which the Brooklyn took in the running fight, leading the chase after the Spanish vessels. It is also testified that even while making the famous loop, Schley's flag-ship never got out of range of the Spanish boats and kept up an effective fire at them. It is predicted that the trial will in all probability consume at least a month from the present time.

Miss Stone and the Brigands. An extraordinary amount of general interest has been aroused by the capture of the American missionary, Miss Stone, by the brigands on the Turkish and Bulgarian frontier. As stated last week, the Missionary Society by which she is employed decided that it could not pay the ransom of $110,000 demanded, for fear of encouraging such kidnaping and compromising the safety of all its other missionaries. A movement was started, however, by Miss Stone's friends to raise the necessary amount by popular subscription. The call was published in the morning papers of last Friday, and before noon of that day the Boston banking firm of Kidder, Peabody & Co., which had been designated as the receiving agent for the fund, had received $17,000. This amount has been increased to $35,000, besides pledges for half as much more. The cash has been forwarded by cable to an agent in Constantinople who will conduct the negotiations. Oct. 8 was the last day of grace allowed by the brigands, but the time will doubtless be extended when they see that the money is coming. One of the explanations of this kidnaping episode is that the bandits were hired to do the work by the Macedonian Committee, an organization which devotes itself to opposing the Turkish government, and it is supposed that this means was taken to secure funds for carrying on its revolutionary propaganda. Our government has been active in taking such steps as were possible through diplomatic channels to secure release of Miss Stone without ransom, and everything which can be done will be done.

Pan-American Congress. Beginning with Oct. 21, a congress will be held in the City of Mexico participated in by representatives of all the governments of North, Central and South America. The United States delegates leave Washington by special train Oct. 12, accompanied by several of the South American ministers who are commissioned to represent their respective governments at this congress.

As the party passes through St. Louis, opportunity will be taken to hold it over for a day and exhibit the site of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition to the distinguished visitors. There are many important matters to be considered by this Pan-American Congress, chiefly matters of a commercial sort. Arbitration, reciprocity, international railways, telegraphs and canals, and uniformity of consular service will be among the topics for consideration. The fact is that, with all our commercial expansion, the United States is not quite getting its share of the South American trade and such a conference as this upon topics intimately connected with the growth of trade can be of great value. Last year when the Latin conference was held in Madrid and representatives of the South American republics were entertained by the Spanish government, the fact was impressed upon us that Spain is still a factor in the commercial situation in South America although she is out of its politics. In dealing with the South American peoples, Spain has the advantage not only of a common language and of all those small but potent considerations of habit and custom which give direction to the current trade, but also—it seems surprising—an advantage in the matter of proximity so far as a large part of South America is concerned. It is hard for us to remember that the eastern coast of South America is nearer the longitude of western Europe than of our eastern coast. Rio Janiero and all the ports south of it are nearer to the Spanish and Portuguese ports than to New York. It is a shorter sail to the western coast of South America via Cape Horn from the European ports than from our Atlantic or Gulf ports. The opening of an isthmian canal would put our Atlantic ports into close connection with the South American Pacific ports, for it must be remembered that the western coast of South America is in almost the same longitude as the eastern coast of North America. But for the present the matter of distance is a handicap which we must overcome.

Brevities.

Marquis Ito, the greatest of Japanese statesmen and patriots, landed at Victoria, B. C., a few days ago. He will make a tour of several months in this country and will possibly visit London before his return. He has been here before and travels in ordinary European garb. To him more than any one else Japan is indebted for the progressiveness of her administration during the last quarter of a century.

Plans are maturing for the construction of a Pacific cable connecting San Francisco, Hawaii and the Philippines. One company, which has been trying to get a concession from the President without waiting for an act of Congress, asks no subsidy but merely permission to lay a cable with landing places at the three points indicated. The President seems inclined to leave the matter for Congress to act upon. If such a concession is made, it ought to embody a provision for continuing the cable to Hong Kong.

The Cuban Constitutional Convention has been dissolved by Gov. Wood on the completion of its work. His suggested changes in the election law reducing the number of general elections were adopted. In connection with the closing of the convention there was a grand celebration including a petition for the granting of reciprocity with the United States and especially for a reduction in the tariff on Cuban sugar and tobacco. The Cubans unanimously appreciate the advantages of commercial annexation to the United States whether they are ready for political annexation or not.

The catastrophe in the island of Samar, the loss of almost an entire company of U. S. infantry, reminds us that there is still some unconquered territory in the Philippines. Samar is a mountainous island as large as Ohio and was never pacified by Spain in all the years of her occupancy. The natives who still resist American rule are comparatively few, but treacherous, and the character of the southern islands, with their thick tropical vegetation, offers every opportunity for ambushes. Gen. Hughes will conduct an expedition in Samar and it is not believed that this incident will interfere with the reduction of the military force in the archipelago.

It is with deep regret that we learn of the death of Dr. Gray, editor of the Interior, whose serious illness we mentioned recently. He was among the ablest and by all means the most vivacious and interesting editorial writer among the Presbyterian editorial corps, so far as they are known to us. His place will be hard to fill. The Interior can hardly ever be what it was, without the light of his genial humor and racy, incisive style. But the editorial chair makes such demands these days, that its victims are not few. Our sympathies are extended to his family and to the bereaved patrons of the paper.

The Convention: Who? What? Why?

By the time this issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST reaches its readers throughout the country there will be gathering in the city of Minneapolis a great convention of earnest Christian workers from various sections of the United States and from some other parts of the world. Not so much for the benefit of our regular readers as for the benefit of others to whose attention this number of the paper may come, we deem it well to say a few things concerning the who and why and what of this great convocation.

The membership of the convention is composed of representatives of a religious movement which had its beginning in the first decade of the preceding century, and is therefore a little less than a century old. In that length of time it has grown from a handful of bold reformers to a great body of believers aggregating more than a million, embracing more than 12,000 churches, 9,000 Sunday-schools, 800,000 Sunday-school scholars and teachers, over 5,000 Endeavor societies, about 7,000 ministers, 35 religious journals and periodicals, 36 institutions of learning, with three national missionary societies—the Home, Foreign, and Woman's Board for both home and foreign work—sustaining missionaries and missions in India, China, Japan, Turkey, Scandinavia, England, Africa, Hawaii, Cuba, Porto Rico, Mexico and the Philippines. The aggregate amount contributed for missions by these three organizations during the past year is $611,220.00. Besides, there are 35 state missionary organizations.

The present annual convocation now assembling embraces a convention of each one of these three organizations, with such branch interests as education, church extension and benevolence, which are features of the general home work. The first convention, in the order of time, will be that of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, an organization holding its twenty-seventh annual convention, and managed entirely by women, which not only collects its funds, but disburses the same and employs and controls its own missionaries.

The American Christian Missionary Society, and the Foreign Christian Missionary Society follow with their conventions. The former is the mother missionary organization, meeting now in its 52nd annual convention. The Foreign Christian Missionary Society, which is holding its 26th annual convention, is one of the most vigorous and prosperous missionary organizations in the country considering its age.

Who are the people who have formed these missionary organizations through which they are prosecuting their missionary work, and who are now gathered in Minneapolis in convention? They are known as Christians or Disciples of Christ, and their churches as Christian churches or churches of Christ. They prefer these scriptural names because they are pleading for a return to New Testament Christianity and to the unity of the primitive church.

Why are they thus gathered? Not to enact any ecclesiastical legislation, not to formulate a creed nor even to modify one, not to conduct a heresy trial or to pass upon the soundness in the faith of its members, but simply to devise ways and means for carrying out the great commission of Jesus Christ, who commanded His apostles to make disciples of all the nations, and to do whatsoever they can to further the interests of the kingdom of God. These conventions neither claim nor exercise any legislative function, nor exercise any authority over the churches. They are free, voluntary associations of Christian people, coming together for the purpose of extending the kingdom of Christ throughout the world.

What distinguishes them from other religious bodies? Their scriptural names, their rejection of all human creeds and confessions of faith, as bonds of union and communion, the acceptance of the old creed confessed by Simon Peter—"Thou art the Christ the Son of the living God"—as the true foundation of the church, and the Bible as their only rule of faith and doctrine, and the effort to unite all Christians upon this simple yet broad basis of fellowship.

They are evangelical in the true sense, believing in the deity of Jesus Christ, the tri-personality of God, as Father, Son and Holy Spirit, in the inspiration and authority of the scriptures, in the necessity of regeneration and of holiness of life, in the resurrection of the dead and the life hereafter.

Why have they grown so rapidly, surpassing all the great Protestant religious bodies in the percentage of increase? They attribute it to their plea for Christian unity, which accords with the spirit of the times, and to their straightforward method of preaching the plain, simple gospel to the people and urging immediate acceptance of the same. Men are asked to believe on Christ, to confess Christ, to obey Christ and to follow Christ, becoming thereby Christians and Christians only, without prefix or affix.

To the people of Minneapolis and of the northwest they bring their message of fraternal greeting, and ask of those who are strangers to their plea and mission, a candid investigation of what they are seeking to accomplish for the glory of God and the good of man. May the blessings of our common Father and of his Son, whom we call Lord and Master, and of the Holy Spirit, rest and abide upon the convention, upon the city in which it meets, and upon all the agencies and instrumentalities which have for their end and aim the universal triumph of the kingdom of God among men.

The Expansive Power of a Great Idea.

We have heard much since the days of Jonathan Edwards of "the expulsive power of a new affection," and justly so, for it is only by the coming into the heart of a pure affection that all unworthy affections can be cast out. But there is something to be said about the expansive power of great ideas. It is not any more certain that God wants men to have pure hearts, than that He wants them to have large hearts. It is certain that God needs honest-minded men, but it is no less certain that He needs men of large intellectual mold, of comprehensive minds, capable of dealing with large questions. This is evident from the fact that the problems involved in the successful on-going of the kingdom of God are the largest and most difficult of which we have any knowledge, and require for their solution the highest order of intellect.

What problems are to be compared in magnitude with the evangelization of pagan lands; the reorganization of the social, industrial and political life of these countries on a Christian basis; the moral and religious training of the young, so as to equip them for the duties and responsibilities of life; the subordination of the material to the spiritual life of the people of civilized lands; the Christianization of the great cities and of modern society; the lifting up of Christian ideals in literature, in art, in industry, in social life and in political life? All mere questions of statecraft, or of commerce, or of partisan politics, dwindle into relative insignificance beside these stupendous questions which have to do with the welfare of the race and the progress of the kingdom of God.

No man has ever entered heartily into the work of solving any of these problems without having been enlarged by it, both spiritually and intellectually. It is of the nature of great ideas to make great men and women. It takes great tasks to develop great capacities. You cannot separate the great characters of history from the great principles and enterprises for which they stood. If there have been great rulers, they have not been great because of their position, but because of the great principles which controlled their administration, and the great ideas which inspired their policies. Paul was great because of the great ideals which inspired his life. Nero was infinitely small, though he occupied the throne of the Cæsars, because his life was inspired by unworthy motives and ambitions. Even ordinary men have attained to greatness because they have been brought under the sway of great ideas and great enterprises.

As there are no tasks so great as those to which God calls men and therefore none so well calculated to create great characters, so there is no book in all the world that contains so many great ideas and broad principles as the Bible. Its thoughts of God, of eternity, of time, of the spiritual universe, of the human soul, of man's relations to God and his capacity for God, God's love for the world, His message to it through Christ, and His method of reconciling the world unto Himself—what other book furnishes such a class of themes or deals with such lofty thoughts? Is it any wonder, then, that we must go to Christian lands where the Bible has exerted its influence for generations, to find the highest ideals of manhood and womanhood, and the greatest characters of history?

What better school for implanting the germs of greatness in the human soul than a great missionary convention, where the great thoughts of God relating to man's duty and destiny, and the evangelization of the world, are presented, and where great tasks are outlined to enlist the sympathies and energies of men? No doubt many receive their inspiration at such conventions for careers of unselfish service to humanity which alone can produce true greatness of character.

President Roosevelt is the third Harvard graduate to attain the presidency. John Adams and John Quincy Adams were both Harvard men. We believe in the small college; but a country is fortunate in having, besides its small colleges, one or two great institutions which, like Cambridge and Oxford, like Harvard and Yale, embody a large part of the history of the nation's intellectual life.

The Yale Bicentenary.

The Yale Bicentenary, which will be celebrated with varied and impressive ceremonies during four days beginning Oct. 20, will be an interesting and significant occasion. It is expected that six thousand Yale alumni will be present and one hundred and fifty college presidents will be guests of honor. All the solid evidences of a great history and a greater present in this typically American institution would mightily surprise the spirit of old Elihu Yale, if he could look in and see how his first gift of a few hundred pounds to found an academy had led to such great results, and how after these two hundred years his name is held higher in honor than those of men who have since given gifts a hundredfold greater.

Old Eli Yale did not know that he was founding one of the world's great universities, any more than Columbus knew that he was discovering a continent. Great things, like great men, have a habit of beginning in a small way. Eli Yale aimed only at starting a humble institution and especially one where candidates for the ministry could be trained; and Columbus aimed only to find a new way to an old continent. But both were aiming at the biggest thing on their horizons. And the man who tries to do the biggest and best thing in sight, often ends by doing a far bigger and better thing than there was in sight—at least in his sight.

Back in the early days, in the first decade of the eighteenth century, the Yale faculty consisted of two members: the president, who lived at Saybrook, Conn., and a tutor who lived wherever he could get a church to preach for. The senior class lived with the president at Saybrook, and the junior class lived with the tutor wherever his parish happened to be. That was all. It was very simple. Running a university then was not so much like managing a department store as it is now. President Hadley, as he wearies even his tireless brain in planning for the prosperity of the many departments of his vast institution, may be easily forgiven if, in the midst of his days of labor and nights devoid of ease, he lets slip an occasional sigh for the good old days of nearly two centuries ago, when the college dormitories were the president's own spare bed rooms, when the college library could be contained in a bookcase behind his study door, when the campus was his own front yard with the village green as an athletic field, when no one had ever yet thought of specialties and specialists as having to do the work of a college, and when the science of pedagogy had not yet been invented. Given the dignity of demeanor and the ecclesiastical position, it was easy to be president of a college then. But now the successful executive of a great university must have the business sagacity of a Wall Street broker, the organizing ability of a major-general, the aggressive energy of a commercial traveler, the general culture of a polished gentleman and a high reputation as a specialist in some one department of learning to give him consideration among educators.

Yale began simply enough, but she began to turn out eminent men almost immediately and some of the greatest names on her roll of alumni date from this day of small things. But the many-millioned

Yale can now look back at these lowly beginnings with the same joy and innocent complacency with which a bank president remembers the time when he used to measure calico in a country store. Humble beginnings are always an object of pleasing reminiscence—when contemplated from a pedestal of present affluence.

Mutual Church Insurance.

There are some mutual and co-operative schemes that fail and there are some that succeed. Those that fail usually fail because they undertake to furnish to their members certain benefits more cheaply than the same benefits can be furnished by those who make it a regular business, and they find the estimates on which they based their reduction of cost were erroneous or depended upon elements which were necessarily temporary. Such have been some of the fraternal insurance societies which promised to furnish life insurance very cheaply because they would take in only vigorous young men and would therefore have a low death rate. But the young men grew old and the death rate increased accordingly, with corresponding assessments. The members, being all nearly of the same age, approached simultaneously the period of greatest mortality. The addition of young blood was not enough to keep down the average and finally—collapse!

This has been the history of so many mutual insurance schemes that the public has grown wary. But here is one which is free from all such flaws, so far as we can detect. We refer to the project for mutual church insurance as set forth in an article by Bro. W. S. Priest elsewhere in this paper. Its principle is very simple. The risk on churches is much lower, proportionately, than the premiums paid. Why not pay the premiums to one of our missionary societies and receive in return the obligation of the society to make good the loss in case of fire? Statistics show that, taking any considerable number of churches or any considerable extent of territory, the premiums paid for the insurance of churches always far exceed the loss by fire.

Individuals or corporations owning a large amount of property widely enough scattered so that it could not all burn at one fire, frequently carry no insurance; that is, they "carry their own insurance." They expect an occasional fire-loss, but, by the mathematical theory of probabilities, upon which all insurance is based, it is practically certain that such losses will be distributed almost as conveniently as would the premiums on insurance, and will be considerably less in the aggregate.

Why should not churches pursue a similar method? If a hundred congregations voluntarily co-operate to pay their regular insurance premiums into a common fund, from which all losses to the contributing churches by fire shall be paid, the fund would be sure to accumulate a handsome surplus because churches are an extra good risk. Increasing age would not operate in this case, as in some forms of mutual life insurance, to convert a selected group of extra good risks into bad risks.

The scheme seems to us entirely feasible. Its feasibility springs partly from the fact that it does not require unanimous consent to its adoption, but only that enough churches shall go into it to make a fair basis for estimating probabilities. Churches which do not contribute to it will have no claim upon it in case of loss by fire. We hope that Bro. Priest's article will be carefully read and the facts which it cites attentively considered.
