A Presbyterian contemporary quotes approvingly the statement that "one of the specious pleas for church union is that Protestantism loses most of its power by its divisions." The different denominations, it says, are based on convictions and "at any sacrifice of conviction, even the slightest, even a reunited Christendom would be too dearly bought." If the sects of divided Protestantism would "sacrifice"—that is, learn the error of—the conviction that theological agreement is necessary to complete religious fellowship, there could be a union which would be neither half-hearted, mechanical nor insincere, and which would not demand the sacrifice of any religious convictions.

We are told occasionally that the Catholic Church is the church of the poor. Hall Caine has lately uttered that sentiment in an admiring tone. In a sense it is true. It is the church in which millions of the poor contribute to the support of a luxurious hierarchy. The pope, with his annual income of millions from Peter's Pence (gifts from the poor); the cardinals, with the title and style of princes; the bishops, drawing stipends (by the generosity of the poor) equal to railroad presidents' salaries—these are the exponents of this "church of the poor." True, the Catholic Church does much charitable work; but no secular organization would be tolerated for a month if, under the guise of charity, it collected money from the poor and wasted so large a proportion of it in maintaining its officers in regal state. The Catholic Church is the church of the people in the same sense that Turkey and Russia are governments of the people: the people pay the bills and the hierarchy does the rest.

The trying weeks through which the nation has lately passed ought to be the occasion of one comforting reflection: We are not a nation of spiritual degenerates. We are too much beset by the cares of this world and vexed by the deceitfulness of riches—those of us who have them not, as much as those who have them. But under it all the nation has still an abiding faith in God, in his beneficent rule over the affairs of men, and in the justice of his moral order. The religious expressions drawn from all classes by the death of the President were not a veneer of sentiment put on for the occasion like the garb of mourning, they were the heart of the nation, the substratum of abiding faith, stripped of its accustomed veneer of sordid commercialism and for once laid bare to the eyes of men. Our mixed population has at least the common heritage of a religious ancestry. Some inherit the traditions of English Puritanism, some of Irish Catholicism, some of Scotch Presbyterianism, and even those who have in general least to commend them are derived from Catholic ancestors in southern Europe who, however much they may have erred on the side of superstition, lacked nothing in the way of reverence. Our religious sentiments would be the better for a more frequent public acknowledgment and the accompanying danger of Pharisaism would be slight. Which is worse, the Pharisee who prayed publicly desiring to be seen of men and praised, or the American who will not pray publicly because he fears to be seen of men and laughed at?

The Boers have started a chain-letter scheme to enlist the sympathy of the civilized world. This is their first real evidence of weakness. They can't hold out much longer if they are putting their trust in so frail a thing as a chain-letter. It can develop more missing links in a week than organic evolution encounters in an æon.

Mrs. Mary Baker G. Eddy issued an encyclical to her followers in regard to the assassination. We are glad to note that it breathed the right spirit and did credit at once to her patriotism and to her sympathies. In diction, however, it presents the same combination of sky-scraping rhetoric and cryptic meaning which habitually characterizes the deliverances from that eminent source. Take this sentence: "May his history waken a tone of truth that shall reverberate, renew euphony, emphasize human power, and bear its banner into the vast forever." While it is safe to say that no one else would be capable of expressing this elevated sentiment in exactly this way, and while the veriest tyro in literary criticism could at a glance determine the authorship by the style, yet it differs from Mrs. Eddy's utterances in one important and gratifying particular. It will parse.

The unknown author's chances of having a book manuscript accepted for publication without a personal pull and without paying the expenses out of his own pocket, have been much discussed lately. Some assert that all manuscripts are conscientiously read and judged by the publishers to whom they are submitted; others claim that it is chiefly a matter of personal influence and reputation. The publishers of Mr. Winston Churchill's recent books, in recalling the fact that the first of his three successful novels was rejected by six publishers, admit that "it is as much a question of chance as of judgment sometimes." A publisher would be very foolish, however, to be guided in the acceptance of manuscripts by anything but his best judgment as to the merit or salability of the work. Sometimes, of course, he makes mistakes, as the six above did, but he pays dearly for every such error of judgment.

The People's Church, Chicago, has received a gift of a million dollars from an anonymous benefactor. This congregation was founded by Dr. H. W. Thomas with a view to propagating a sort of liberalism based not like Unitarianism on a denial of the doctrines of Protestant orthodoxy, but on such a change of emphasis as would leave all the creeds and denominational lines out of consideration and teach only the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. The plan is to extend this work to other cities and instead of building churches to use the theatres for religious services as the congregation in Chicago does. It may do much good, but its name is weak. It would make a stronger appeal to the people if it called itself Christ's Church. Among the people whom it aims to reach, there is no popular demand for the throwing off of Christ's authority and the more clearly it is recognized the better.

The Baltimore Sun, in beginning the issue of a Sunday edition, explains that it still agrees with the best moral sentiment of the country in condemning frivolous and sensational Sunday papers, but it does not believe that Sunday papers per se are an evil. We have never seen any of that kind. In the absence of any purely per se Sunday papers we are forced to base our conclusion on the actual Sunday papers which are printed and circulated. Some are worse than others, but we have yet to find one in which the good parts were not covered over and hedged about with a mass of irrelevant, frivolous and (more or less) sensational matter. And the best of them sin by their time-consuming bigness.

Editor's Easy Chair.

When the Jews in the olden time turned their faces to Jerusalem to attend one of their great national feasts in the days when their glorious temple crowned Mt. Zion, their hearts glowed with religious enthusiasm as they journeyed thither. Mounted on camels and asses and afoot, they traveled in caravans, and the more pious ones talked, as they journeyed, of the great events in their national history and of the hopes of Israel in the future. At night when they camped they must have presented a picturesque scene as they were grouped about their campfires, singing, it may be, their religious songs and enjoying that social communion with their brethren which must have formed no small part of the enjoyment of these great annual convocations. The fourteen psalms following the 119th, called "Songs of Ascents," are supposed to have been written for, and to have been used on, such occasions. The sentiments of these psalms indicate the spirit in which they went up to Jerusalem:

"I will lift up mine eyes unto the mountains;
From whence shall my help come?
My help cometh from the Lord,
Which made heaven and earth."

Again another pious heart exclaims:

"I was glad when they said unto me,
Let us go unto the house of the Lord.
Our feet are standing
Within thy gates, O Jerusalem;
Jerusalem, that art builded
As a city that is compact together;
Whither the tribes go up, even the tribes of the Lord,
For a testimony unto Israel,
To give thanks unto the name of the Lord.
Pray for the peace of Jerusalem:
They shall prosper that love thee.
Peace be within thy walls,
And prosperity within thy palaces."

And so they breathed out their pious sentiments as they journeyed toward Jerusalem and their beloved temple.

But we have no Jerusalem or Mount Gerizim. We have no central place whither the tribes must go up to worship God. We have no temple to which people must make pilgrimages to present their offerings. We live in the dispensation of which Jesus spake when he said: "The hour cometh, when neither in this mountain nor in Jerusalem shall ye worship the Father." . . . "But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshipers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth." Christians are God's temple now, and all places are holy where the soul comes into communion with God through faith. Nevertheless we must have our great religious assemblies. But how different are the motives which bring us together in these conventions from those which prompted the Jews! Theirs was a national religion. Ours is a religion for the whole world. It was no part of the program which called them together to set in operation plans and forces for the conversion of the world and for the extension of the kingdom of God throughout the whole earth. As the reasons which underlie our conventions are deeper and higher than those which prompted the Jews, so should the feeling of obligation and of gladness characterize us in greater degree in our attendance upon our great missionary gatherings. What psalmist among us will write us some "Songs of Ascents," inspired by our national conventions and expressing the joy which we feel in going thither? There may be a few such, but they are not widely known nor in popular use. Here is a chance for some musician among us to link his name with our missionary gatherings for generations to come. They must be conceived in the spirit of gratitude and devout reverence which characterizes these inspired Songs of Ascents, and be so filled with the missionary spirit and with the joy of Christian fellowship as to be to us what those songs were to the Jews. Who will write these "Songs of Ascents"?

The suggestion made in our Easy Chair, in a recent number, of a great centennial celebration in the year 1909, covering the first century of our history, is meeting with favor among the brethren wherever it has been mentioned. The importance, too, of beginning at once to plan something worthy of a century of such history, is also generally recognized. No doubt the Minneapolis convention will take some action looking in this direction. An extensive program of work should be mapped out which would call into active operation all our forces along all the lines of interest among us. College endowments, missionary enlargement, centennial edifices in great centers, wide-reaching plans of beneficence, the occupation of strategic places, the perfecting of our missionary methods, the devising of some means for a more energetic propaganda of our plea for Christian union and some concerted action looking to a revival of New Testament evangelism—these are some of the great interests which should be planned for and promoted as the best possible preparation for a great centennial in the autumn of 1909. It is the long look forward and the wise planning and the steady and energetic carrying out of these plans that accomplish great achievements. We have passed the period of immature youth and have reached the state of manhood, as a religious movement, and we must plan large things for the glory of Him who hath called us and sent us on such a mission in the world. "When I was a child, I spake as a child, I felt as a child, I thought as a child: now that I am become a man, I have put away childish things." So did Paul. So should we.

Romans 3:7,8 By C. L. FIDLAR.

III

Toward morning Schooner opened his eyes and looked about him in a bewildered way. It was a new world to him. Cliver stepped up to him and spoke. "Well, comin' 'roun', air you?" he asked.

"Where am I? What's been the matter?" Schooner asked.

"You know me, don't you?"

"Yes, Mr. Cliver."

"Well, you jest lay still; you're in my bed; you've bein hurt. I'll tell you all about it after 'while. Heyre, drink this and go to sleep."

Schooner drank and was soon sleeping. After a time he again turned to Cliver, who was still beside him, and said, "Now tell me all about it, for I'll have to be getting out of this."

"Well, there hain't much to tell. You wus found in a ditch with your face pretty much cut up an' fetched heyre and put to bed."

Schooner was silent for a time, then he turned to Cliver and said, "I've been drunk, that's what's the matter."

"No, you've bein hurt," Cliver returned.

"I've no business here in your bed. I must get out of this." He attempted to rise and would have fallen had Cliver not caught him and placed him again on the bed. As he bent over him and smoothed the pillows he said, "Schooner Allen or anybody else, you're a sick man and you don't leave that bed till you're well." Schooner looked up into the kind old eyes above him, then turned his face to the wall.

He did stay in the bed "fer a spell." The concussion on the back of his head was more severe than they had thought, and for several days he was delirious. In his wanderings he talked of "boots and mornin' stars"; then he was in the mine, and his confused brain struggled with "rooms," "entries," "squibs" and "shots." Now he was shouting encouragement to some fellow workmen who were imprisoned by a cave-in. "Keep a stiff upper lip, fellows," he called, "we're coming." Then he was planning some escapade. Through it all, Summers left his bedside only to attend the meetings and to snatch a very little rest.

It was the last week of the meetings. Schooner had gone back to his work. "Yes," Summers said, "Allen told me to come down at ten o'clock and he'd show me through the mine." He stepped onto the elevator and was lowered into the shaft. Down, down he went into that black, reeking, dripping pit! It seemed bottomless! Would they never stop? At last he heard faint voices mingled with the clash and clatter of iron. Suddenly they ceased to descend. All that Summers could see was a constellation of dim, smoking, flickering stars. As his eyes became accustomed to the darkness, he made out that under each star was a black face. A face bearing its star came forward and greeted him. Only by the voice did he know it to be Allen.

"Come this way," Allen said, and together they stumbled and stooped along a dark, narrow, muddy "entry." They crowded to the wall to let a string of cars loaded with coal pass by. The train was drawn by a mule. At the mule's heels, with his back to the car, shambled a boy. A false step would have meant his life.

The whole train was belched out of the dark throat of the "entry," and was swallowed up by the Stygian darkness in front of it. It made Summers shudder.

"Isn't that very dangerous work?" he asked of Allen.

"Yes, rather. But not many get hurt. Still, sometimes we have to carry some fellow to the shaft. This way," and Allen opened a door that turned into a side "entry." Along this "entry" they passed miners at work in their little "rooms" or stalls. They entered one and stood beside the miner as he shoveled the loose coal into a car. In another, they watched the laborious process of boring for the placing of a "shot." In still another they stood over a man as he held a "puncher." Flat on a board he sat and with hands and feet held and guided the machine. With vindictive hatred and feverish haste, it shot out its steel fang against the solid coal. All of the recoil the man on the board must check, and with each stab it all but raised him from his seat. Hour after hour he must sit on this board and control this demon as with fiendish delight it tore at the vitals of the earth.

"Here's my room," Allen said. "I made a shot just before you came down, and I'm waiting for it to clear. Let's go in and see how much is down."

They clambered over the pile of fallen coal to the farther end of the "room." The air was still heavy with smoke from the shot. They sat down on the coal and Allen explained many things about the mine and about mining in general. It was all new to Summers, and he began to realize that there were vast fields of knowledge never entered at college, fields of which he knew nothing. At last the conversation came to a pause and each seemed revolving a question in his mind. Each wished to broach his subject, yet each hesitated. Allen was the first to speak.

"Mr. Summers," he said, "I wish to ask your pardon for disturbing your meeting. I have no excuse to offer for it."

"I certainly grant it," Summers replied as he extended his hand.

Allen continued, "I don't know much about religion, I've never given it any thought. I never was in a Christian home till I was laid up at Mr. Cliver's, but I saw there was something there that I had never known. I don't know what it was, but I suppose it was that they were Christians. But they didn't say anything about it. I won't say I haven't enjoyed my kind of life, for that wouldn't be the truth. But when I saw those people, I saw that with all my fun I was nothing but a low-lived dog beside them."

"No, not that," Summers objected.

"Yes, all of it. Now I want to ask you plainly, do you think there is any chance for me to do better?"

There, seated on that pile of coal, many, many feet down, down below the hills and the forests, surrounded by walls whose masonry was laid when time was an infant, in the feeble flare of that miner's lamp, Summers began at that same Scripture, his inquirer's need, and preached unto him Jesus.

Summers was still in doubt. He had never revealed to Allen that it was he who knocked him into the ditch. Many times he was on the point of disclosing it, but he kept it because of the meetings. It was all but spoken when he was talking to Allen in the mine, but he feared its effect on Allen's budding reformation. Thus far he had found no opportune time to disclose it. It was known all about the country that Allen was found in the ditch by the preacher. But how he came there was a mystery. Summers felt that he could not leave without clearing this load from his conscience, but how and when? The affair was partly a mystery to Allen. He knew that some one had knocked him into the ditch, but who it was, he did not know.

It was the closing night of the meetings. The invitation hymn was being sung. Again Schooner Allen, from the last seat next the wall, scrambled over the boots to the aisle. All eyes were upon him. What was he up to now? Was it his old trick again? Some looked for the boots, but they were not present this time. He strode forward to the pulpit and extended his hand to Summers. The hymn almost pulled in two! Old Bro. Cliver, although he had always expressed a dislike for shouting, called out—he didn't shout—"Glory!"

After Allen had made the confession, Summers said, "Friends, this has been a blessed meeting. All the good my coming among you has done for me, I can never express to you. I trust that our labors together may have been of some good to you as well. We shall part in a few days at the most and the Father only knows if we shall ever meet again. And now before we close this meeting, I wish to relieve my mind of a burden that has been on it for many days." He paused for a moment. The attention was oppressive. "Bro. Allen, as you all know, met with an accident some weeks ago. It was I who str—"

But Allen sprang to his feet. "Just a moment, Mr. Summers," he said. "My confession comes first. I was going home half drunk and met a gentleman and lady. I insulted the lady and when the gentleman attempted to defend her, I drew a revolver. I'd ask the lady's pardon if I knew who she was, but I now ask the gentleman's. I'm ashamed and sorry for what I did." He extended his hand to Summers.

Summers grasped it eagerly and said, "And it was I who knocked Bro. Allen into the ditch. But I have repented of it many times and now ask him to forgive me." They looked into each other's eyes and words were not needed.

"Let us pray," Summers said. Hand in hand they stood there, the college man and the toiler in the earth, and the preacher prayed to their common Father for the same needed blessings on them both.

Summers was engaged in a meeting many miles away from Bethel church. He opened a paper that came in his mail and his eyes fell on a marked article.

"George Allen and Letha Edmonds! Let me see," he mused. "Oh yes, Schooner. That was four years ago. Well, seeing all the good that came of that blow, I don't know but—mine boss! Well!—I ought to be glad I gave it. But the Scriptures say we are not to do evil that good may come."

(THE END.)

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

Good news from Colorado! The nineteenth annual meeting of the Colorado Christian Missionary Society was held in the South Broadway church, Denver, Sept. 23-26. Three years ago a new policy was adopted which is producing results so satisfactory that the recent convention, after deliberation, determined to continue the same through the coming missionary year.

Progress has been made along all lines. Our work in Colorado has never been in as good a condition as it is now. At the convention in Pueblo in '98 a resolution was introduced to attempt to raise $600 for state mission work the following year. This resolution was amended by striking out $600 and inserting $1,000. This was a new departure. More than the amount named was collected. The Christian Woman's Board of Missions, the steadfast friend of our work in Colorado, determined about the same time to make a part, at least, of its contribution to the cause in this state conditional. If the Disciples in Colorado would contribute a certain amount of money for work in the state the Christian Woman's Board would give a stipulated amount. This plan has worked well. Since its adoption there has been a steady growth.

At the Pueblo convention Leonard G. Thompson was elected corresponding secretary. How satisfactorily he has filled and now fills the office is seen in the remark of F. N. Calvin, made publicly, that after an acquaintance with missionary secretaries in nine states for twenty-five years he had never known a man who so perfectly filled the place as does Leonard G. Thompson. To his indefatigable industry, and more than common wisdom, Colorado Disciples are indebted for their recent progress and their present good condition. The care of all the churches in the state is on his mind and heart by day and by night. This one thing he does. Under his administration it is impossible for a man of unworthy character to secure a pastorate in Colorado in a congregation of Disciples. He has kept more than one bad man out of the state, and others of immoral character have been driven out. Threats of libel suits do not terrify him. How much his vigilance means to the cause of Christ in Colorado you cannot understand until you spend some time here. The Disciples in Colorado are not numerous, nor is their increase rapid, but they are building solidly. There are forty congregations and four thousand five hundred members. Thirteen small churches received financial assistance from missionary funds during the year. I believe you will be interested in a brief statement of the work in some of our mission congregations.

M. A. Thompson has been at Grand Junction during the year. This place is the key to western Colorado, and western Colorado is as large as Pennsylvania. A new house of worship will be dedicated before long in the most desirable part of the town. Bro. Thompson is a Drake University man. He is pure gold. He has a wife, too, who is a worthy helpmeet. No wonder that the work in Grand Junction is in a prosperous condition. This congregation gave to missions $106.

David Lyon is at Florence. Thirty-five dollars was contributed to missions by this church of only fifty-five members. This is one of our heroic little bands. The Christian church in Florence will not always be numerically small. The hope is cherished that soon ground will be purchased and a chapel erected. A heroic preacher leads this heroic company.

At the beginning of the year J. S. Riley was in Cripple Creek. R. H. Lambkin, of Kentucky, took up the work the fifteenth of January. Cripple Creek is a peculiarly difficult field. A few years ago W. T. Hunt, now at Loveland, wrought nobly in Cripple Creek. The present chapel was built while he was pastor there. The church is in better condition now than at any previous period. A hundred and seven dollars were contributed by this mission church of a hundred members to missions. What a church does for missions indicates its spiritual condition—that it is dead, dying or alive. This is the sign of a standing or a falling church. It seems strange, does it not, that one of the richest gold camps on earth should receive financial assistance in its church work? But remember, please, that the gold mines are not owned by men who live in Cripple Creek, nor are they the property of persons who are especially interested in the extension of the kingdom of righteousness.

There is a membership of 68 in Trinidad. F. W. Henry has been in this difficult field during the year. He has given up the work there. He is a fine young man. The church that secures his services will be fortunate. The congregation at Trinidad under the pastorate of Bro. Henry makes a better financial showing than for years. The receipts during the past year are fifty per cent. better than they were the previous year.

David C. Peters is one of the Lord's noblemen. He came to the Disciples from the Baptists, and he came bringing a clean bill of health. After the annual convention in Colorado Springs a year ago he began work at Monte Vista. This congregation of 63 members gave $44.35 to missions.

Walter S. Hayden, Jr., recently came from Pembroke, New York, to La Junta. He belongs to the deservedly famous Hayden family of Ohio—famous in the history of the Disciples. He has only been in La Junta about two months. The work starts off well. There is $400 in the treasury as the beginning of a building fund. This congregation of only about a hundred members, meeting in an upstairs hall, gave more than $40 to missions. The church owns building lots on a fine street and corner. There will be a house of worship erected in La Junta in the not remote future.

Clay T. Runyan, at Lamar, is a young man of vim. The church of 59 members under his energetic leadership is gaining ground. He is a man who laughs at impossibilities. The Lamar congregation gave half a hundred dollars to missions. There was a net gain of twenty-six in the membership during the year. The rosters of our mission congregations are not padded. It would be well if the same could be said of self-supporting churches.

Not all our men in Colorado are young. H. T. Morrison, of Manzanola, is old enough to have two sons in the ministry. C. C. Morrison and Hugh Morrison, in Chicago, are his sons. Bro. Morrison began work at Manzanola the first of last May. Up to that time Manzanola had received assistance from the missionary society.

Rocky Ford is only nine miles distant. Bro. Morrison visited Rocky Ford and in July a church of seventy members was organized. Rocky Ford and Manzanola support Bro. Morrison. There is no good reason why a man in the ministry should cross the dead line simply because he has lived forty or fifty years!

Flournoy Payne is a grandson of John T. Johnson. He has in his veins the best southern blood. He is at Colorado City. His work is remarkably prosperous. While he successfully cares for the Colorado City church he does the work of a student in Colorado College at Colorado Springs. The church has eighty-five members. There was a net gain during the year of twenty. Finances are in much better condition than they were a year ago. The building has been enlarged and otherwise improved. This little church contributed almost a hundred dollars to missions.

T. T. Thompson, of the East Side Christian church in Denver, is one of the pluckiest young fellows you ever saw. He came to Denver less than a year ago. After a few weeks he was stricken with a serious illness. He was sick nigh unto death. He persisted in preaching when all who knew his condition knew that he ought to be in bed. He finally could not go any longer; his illness lasted six months. That he is alive seems to be almost a miracle. But he is now very much alive. T. T. is making things hum! I do not find the word "hum" in the sense in which I use it in the dictionary; but you know what I mean. The membership of the East Side church is not more than a hundred, but $78 was given to missions.

Who among the Disciples does not know of the Darsie family? There is George, in Frankfort, Ky., and another George in some other place, and Lloyd in Paris, Ky., and John, whose home is in Hiram, O., and Charles at Newport, Ky., and Clyde, at Pueblo, Col. The father and grandfather of the Darsies here named, and probably others, was a pioneer among the Disciples, and a veritable man of God. Clyde has been pastor of the Mesa church in Pueblo almost since its organization two or three years ago. The name of the congregation is now the Broadway Christian church. Why? Because it bought a while ago the Broadway Methodist church. There is no finer location in the southern part of Pueblo for a church than the corner of Broadway and Evans. Gov. Orman and ex-Gov. Adams live in that part of Pueblo, within a stone's throw of the house of worship now owned by the Disciples of Christ. This congregation has a membership of 152 and gave $118 to missions.

I mention only a few facts concerning some of our mission churches. Altogether they have 991 members and gave $790 to missions this year. The recent convention resolved to raise $1,600 next year for state mission work. Is not all this good news from Colorado?

Denver, Col.

[This "good news from Colorado" reminds the editor of his visit to that state in search of health, in the summer of 1879. We had no church building then in the city of Denver and only one in the whole state—a small brick church at Golden. Things have advanced in the Centennial State since then.—EDITOR.]

The Birds In October

By OLIVE THORNE MILLER.

In the month of October the most interesting phase of Nature is her show of color, the exhibition of what she can do in the way of brilliant hues with bare leaves, which all summer have been simply green. The result is a wonder and a delight. The most gorgeous array of flowers pales beside the glory of October trees. At this time a railway trip through the Alleghany or any of the eastern mountain ranges is something never to be forgotten. Each mountain is a huge bouquet of red and yellow, of all shades and every sort of combination, toned down and harmonized by the dark green of scattering evergreens. And, as if to round out the season with a blaze of glory, this wonderful color exhibit is usually accompanied by some of the most enjoyable weather of the year—crisp, but not cold, airy but not windy, fresh but not wet.

In this month migration may be said to be over, though a few birds linger in the eastern and middle states. But they are silent and retiring, so that only those who seek them are aware of their presence. Of those who have been around our houses during the summer, the field and vesper sparrow may be found by searching; the purple finch and the hermit thrush have not entirely deserted; and the red-winged blackbird and purple grackle still linger in their summer haunts. When the season is not too severe, some of the seed-eaters will see the year out before leaving us, but we cannot count on this good fortune.

It is a good time to make the acquaintance of a class we have neglected during the bird-full days of summer; some of the silent ones who do not come about us or make themselves obvious by song, yet who are as worthy of study as any of our winged neighbors. These are the hawks and owls, unfortunately under the ban of popular prejudice simply because they are not known. Owls especially are most interesting, and show to those who win their confidence not only great individuality of character, but unusual intelligence, perfect fearlessness and an affectionate disposition.

The writer who signs himself "A Son of the Marshes" has studied birds of prey from his boyhood and is moved to remonstrate against the injustice of the common notions and the usual treatment of those birds. "Is it not possible," he says, "for the beings that have been created with man as his companions, to have fair play in God's world?" It appears at present it is not, if they happen to be classed as birds of prey. It seems impossible to awaken any interest or secure any mercy for them. Notwithstanding the work of the Department of Agriculture of the United States, and the published proofs of the great usefulness of this class of birds, it seems utterly hopeless to attempt to convince farmers and cultivators that the occasional chicken that falls into their talons is amply paid for by the mice and other destructive rodents which preceded it. "I always shoot hawks and owls," said a farmer, "we are never troubled by mice or any small animals."

"Yes," I said, "simply because the birds you are killing have served you so well. Go on and kill your hawks and owls, and see how long you will be able to say that."

This man's attitude was the more discouraging because he had been bright enough to find out for himself the usefulness of another misunderstood bird—the common crow.

"I learned," he said at another time, "in one lesson to respect and even value the crow, and now I never allow one to be shot," and he went on to tell me the story. He had one year a plague of cutworms, which got into a cornfield and threatened to destroy it. Some one wise in those matters told him the only remedy was to go through the fields every morning, and where he saw a stalk of corn cut off, to dig out the worm and kill it. In desperation he began on his big cornfield this almost hopeless undertaking. He worked one day at it, tired himself completely out, and nearly broke his back, as he said. The next morning the worms were as plentiful as ever. He began to think he would abandon the corn to them, when he noticed some crows walking around among the young plants. Of course he thought they belonged to the army of destroyers—as if the worms were not enough to finish the crop. For a wonder he did not at once proceed to shoot them, but in an unusual "spasm of sense" he resolved to find out positively what they were about. To his surprise he discovered that they were doing just what he had been attempting at such expense of muscle and temper—digging out and killing cutworms. He instantly decided to leave the field and let the crows work for him. He did, and the birds cleared the ground completely, doing no harm whatever to the corn. He will probably need a similar lesson to teach him the value of the birds of prey.

The writer above mentioned tells many interesting things characteristic of owls. Among the rest, of their control of their plumage. The breast feathers of one of his pets, he says, seemed to grow in long stripes, and he could throw them back each side, as a man throws open his coat. Other observers have noted the same peculiarity, particularly Frank Bolles, who says that his owls would tuck back their feathers when taking food, as a lady lifts her dress out of the dirt. Also, that for purposes of concealment, making himself look like his surroundings, an owl can make himself—by control of his plumage—tall and slim, when he is among splinters of a broken stump, or wide and flat if he is on the ground.

"The Son of the Marshes" dwells particularly upon the affectionate disposition of those birds, and especially their attachment to people. He says—what will seem absurd to persons who have decided that birds are machines, governed entirely by "instinct" and incapable of any of the emotions of humanity, but will not surprise those who have closely studied living birds—that "it is quite an easy matter to break the heart of a bird," and he gives some instances which could easily be matched on this side of the water.

The absence of fear in these "wise men of the woods" is a remarkable and interesting trait. It has often been observed by persons who have captured owls, that they are never wild; though they are sometimes savage they show no fear.

Both hawks and owls are birds of dignity. They are always ready to defend themselves and they never allow indignities, but they do not go into panics and "lose their head." The popular saying "stupid as an owl" arises, no doubt, from the bird's manner, and proves only the stupidity of the originator of the saying. Audubon speaks indignantly of the outrage of branding a bird as stupid, simply because he is misunderstood. He says: "When I read or hear of a stupid animal in a wild state, I cannot help wishing that the stupid animal who speaks thus was half as wise as the brute he despises, so that he might be able to thank his Maker for what knowledge he may possess."

That those birds are capable of strong attachments among themselves has been seen in many instances. Such, for example, as a widowed bird plainly mourning and grieving over his loss, and remaining in solitary condition year after year. A striking instance of attachment was told by an observer, of a pair of fish hawks whose nest tree was burned in one of those carelessly started fires in the Minnesota woods. As the fire drew near their nest, in which were the featherless young, the birds showed great anxiety, flying around, uttering cries of distress, and every few moments going to the nest to look after the helpless nestlings. At length the fire reached their own tree and quickly swathed it in flames, upon which both the distracted birds, with one accord, plunged through the cloud of fire and smoke, and perished with their little ones.

Hawks and owls are solitary, each pair living by itself, and some of them are known to mate for life.

Church Fire Insurance.

By Walter Scott Priest.

Bro. Fred Scamell, the efficient treasurer of our church in Atchison, has been working on a plan of insurance for our church buildings which would give us ample protection, at a rate twenty per cent. less than old line companies charge, and besides give any one of our missionary societies, for instance the home society, a fund of several thousand dollars annually to be used for the spread of the gospel. This was suggested to him by the fact that the three year term of insurance on our church house ran out this summer, and it seemed that the premiums we were paying were out of all proportion to the amount of the risk, yet as low as any of the old line companies charge. That it is entirely practical for churches to carry their own insurance is shown by the fact that the great lumber companies and other big mercantile firms carry their own risks and save vast sums of money by so doing.

After Bro. Scamell had worked on the idea some time he discovered that the M. E. Church has been carrying insurance on their buildings, and in the thirteen months of their operation they have written $8,000,000 of risks, at a great saving to the churches. The Roman Catholic diocese of Indianapolis has a similar plan and they have written ten million dollars on churches and five million dollars on other church property at an annual premium rate of one quarter of one per cent., while the charges of old lines (for five years) are three quarters of one per cent. (See Literary Digest, Sept. 21.)

Letters have been received by Bro. Scamell from some of the best business men from New York to Denver, and all say the scheme is feasible. In 1897 not a dollar of loss was sustained by any of our churches in Kansas, and only $1,700 loss by fire among all denominations; yet the churches of Kansas that year paid the old line companies over $30,000 in premiums! Why couldn't these churches have carried their own risks and had that $28,300 to use in mission work in the state? It is to be hoped our Minneapolis Convention will take time to look into this. It is bound to come some day. Why not now?

New York Letter.

By S. T. Willis.

The Madison Avenue Baptist Church of this city, served so faithfully and so long by Dr. Henry M. Sanders, is in search of one to become his successor, since his resignation. The church has extended a call to the Rev. Dr. George C. Lorimer, of the Baptist Temple, Boston. Dr. Lorimer is inclined to accept the call and so has offered his resignation to the Temple. His desire to change is not because he wishes a larger salary, for he has refused once or twice to accept an increase in his salary tendered him by the Temple congregation; but he thinks some one else can carry on the work with success, and he is conscious that the heavy strain is too much for him to bear much longer. He has guided that great church through two pastorates of several years each, and his people are not willing now to release him. They feel that if they can pay off $200,000 of their $300,000 indebtedness, they can thereby induce Dr. Lorimer to remain with them, and this they will endeavor to do. George C. Lorimer is an ornament to any church in any city. He is a man of versatile ability and of international reputation. Christian New York would be pleased to have his help in preaching the gospel of the grace of God.

In the untimely death of its pastor, Dr. George T. Purves, the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church lost a faithful pastor and an able teacher. It is a strange fact that three of the largest and most widely known churches on Fifth Avenue, New York, have lost their pastors by death within a comparatively short time. Dr. John Wesley Brown was called in death from the fashionable St. Thomas Church, Dr. Maltbie D. Babcock, of the Brick Church, died suddenly in Italy last spring and Dr. Purves of the Fifth Avenue Church has just been called away. Dr. Purves was a native of Philadelphia, a graduate of Princeton, and had been pastor at Wayne, Pa., Pittsburg, Professor of N. T. Creek in Princeton Seminary, and pastor in this city, succeeding the famous Dr. John Hall. He was only fifty years of age and apparently in the prime of a vigorous manhood. God has his own time for us to go. We must obey the call when the messenger comes. Be ye also ready, for ye know not the day nor the hour.

The question of a McKinley memorial is among the things uppermost in the public mind to-day. The Rev. H. A. M. Briggs, of Jersey City, has suggested that all the Christian people of the country co-operate and buy the Temple of Music on the grounds of the Pan-American Exposition and put it into permanent form; that a great organ be placed in it, and at stated periods services be held in which the dead president's favorite hymns, "Nearer, My God, to Thee," and "Lead Kindly Light," be sung by the entire congregation assembled. He also suggests that in the building there be painted allegorical representations of the sentiments expressed in the two hymns, and that a memorial altar be built so that the name of William McKinley be not forgotten by the Christian people of America. He further suggests that all the churches and Sunday-schools throughout the country contribute toward this end—that it be made distinctly a Christian monument.

At the reopening of Union Theological Seminary in this city last week Prof. Geo. A. Knox made the address, speaking on "Problems for the Church." He claimed that the most serious difficulties confronting the church to-day are not so much external conditions as internal weakness—in the faith, and service of the church toward the world. The chapel was crowded with professors, preachers and students whose concurrence in the sentiments uttered was evinced by the hearty and prolonged applause—rather an unusual occurrence in that institution. Union Seminary is making an important departure in the scope of its work this fall, in offering courses of instruction to laymen who do not intend to enter the ministry. They are designed for Sunday-school workers, young men and young women secretaries, missionary workers and others engaged in Christian service. Prof. Moulton of Chicago University, Rev. G. S. White, Prof. McMurray, of Columbia, and others will assist the teaching force of the seminary. Some of the classes will be held in the evening to suit the convenience of students, and others late in the afternoon. In this broader field the seminary will render valuable service.

The most important issue before the recent diocesan convention (Episcopal) of New York was that of dividing the see, and of appointing a bishop coadjutor with Bishop Potter. But the bishop would not agree to it, and the matter was voted down. Just before the final adjournment of the New York convention the delegates to the general conference of the Episcopal Church started from this city, the most prominent of whom was J. P. Morgan, the Wall street financier. The special train to carry him and about a dozen rectors across the continent is said to be the most luxurious train in the world. Besides the regular train crew, a dozen negro porters, four waiters, and three chefs accompany these humble divines and this religious millionaire. A week before they started a contingent of special chefs, cooks and butlers left Sherry's in this city for San Francisco where they will prepare for Mr. Morgan's coming, at the Charles Crocker Mansion on Nob Hill in that city. There does not seem to be a superabundance of self sacrifice or personal humility in this moving palace of luxury. Such unnecessary display upon the part of Churchmen as such, will not tend to commend the gospel of the meek and lowly Jesus.

At the last meeting of the Lutheran synod, or more strictly speaking, of the Evangelical Lutheran Ministerium, which closed its semi-annual conference in Brooklyn a few days ago, a split between the German and English speaking elements took place. This action was taken by the English Lutheran ministers because they felt that the churches using the English language in their public services were slighted by the synod. Ex-Mayor Scheiren, of Brooklyn, himself a Lutheran, explains the matter by saying that frequently the children of German parents refuse to attend the German services, and the German pastors in many cases refuse to allow English services in their parishes. So those in favor of services in the English language thought best to secede and form an independent synod of English Lutherans.

Under Tammany rule many of the New York little children cannot get all their rights in matters of public education, while thousands of useless and incompetent clerks get increased salaries. There are 52,000 children of our school in half-day classes because our school-houses are not built rapidly enough to accommodate them. The average yearly increase in the number of school children is 28,000. It is estimated that if things go on in our school management as at present, in 1903 we will have 114,000 children in our city without full school time and privileges. When a city with New York's wealth does not provide the necessary school facilities for all her children of school age, it is time that there be a change in the government of the city. Our public school system is one of our most important and vital institutions. Politicians should keep their hands off.

The Failure of Dogma.

By J. M. Lowe.

Truth does not grow, but our conception of it grows. What is true always was true and always will be true, but as we pass along the highway of life different aspects of truth present themselves to us. The other day I took a ride through the foot hills of the Rockies. At every turn a new scene burst upon my view. It is so with truth to the growing mind, whether of the individual or the race. There is no place to stop and say, this is the truth or, that is the truth. It can be but a present view of truth, for as we pass on we catch a better and larger view and find ourselves reading new meanings into those statements which once seemed to encompass the truth.

There may be those who fear that the destruction of dogma would mean the destruction of the truth. That is as wise as to suppose that a change in botany would uproot all the flowers, or a new science of astronomy would dash the stars out of the sky and lead the worlds astray. The universe is not so dependent upon human thought. Knowledge is a thing of life that grows forever. Every truth gained casts a new light upon all that has been learned before. Every new fact that enters the mind compels an adjustment of all older facts to the new one and a readjustment of the old facts to each other. Thus are dogmas jostled around until we become aware of their uselessness and cast them out.

Herein is dogma a failure, in that it is a band around the tree of human knowledge, an obstruction to the machinery of progress. It is as if a farmer should burden his self-binder with all previous harvesting tools—the reap hook, cradle, reaper—and hinder the free movements of the new machine.

Truth is with us yet and we are gathering a richer, larger harvest than ever, but please excuse us from using those outgrown tools which but for their useless use would have been destroyed by rust before the present century was born.

We are free citizens of a boundless universe where we may wander at will. Let no self-appointed guide who cannot keep up with the procession raise his voice to warn us of a danger which he himself does not see. We are going everywhere. We are in our Father's house. No harm can come to him, wherever he may be beneath the stars, who walks whither the light leads.

"I know not where His islands lift
Their fronded palms in air;
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond His love and care."

The Old Book In The New Crucible

By J. J. HALEY.

V. The Crucible of Criticism.

It would be easy enough to show that the two views under consideration, the traditional and critical theories of the origin of the sacred books, are not in substance so hopelessly divergent as many people suppose, and certainly to make the fact appear that the critical investigation of the Scriptures has not been made to weaken their hold upon the intelligence and conscience of mankind. After a century of minute and exhaustive criticism, and many conflicts of opinion on minor points, and not a few modifications of critical positions, practical unanimity has been reached by the critics on three of their fundamental contentions. First, the soundness and legitimacy of the critical method of Bible study; second, the composite authorship of the historical books of the Old Testament, and some of the prophetic; and third, the later dates of most of the books than those assigned to them by tradition. The composition of the Bible according to modern criticism extended over a period of about nine hundred years, beginning about 800 B. C. Previous to that time there was practically no part of the Bible in existence. Earlier than the eighth century there were in Israel songs, laws and traditional stories relating to the history of the nation, some of them most likely in writing, of which the first Old Testament writers made use, but nothing more. Some time before the downfall of the northern kingdom in 722, E. wrote his history of Israel to the time of Joshua and on. The characteristic from which the writer gets the name E. is the habitual use of "Elohim" for God. The Jehovist writer known as J. produced a parallel but independent narrative about the same time approximately. Many of the narratives now composing Judges, Samuel and the early part of Kings were parts of the original works of E. and J. During the captivity in Babylon, or soon after the restoration, a bevy of unknown priests gave the finishing touches to a third narrative of the early history known as P., the main body of which was probably written by Jerusalem priests before the exile. Beginning with Amos and Hosea, some of the prophets began to reduce their discourses to writing. This happened about the year 800 and was the beginning of the inspired literature, not the inspired history, of the Hebrew people.

Three centuries or more after the death of David, a few of the earliest Psalms may have been written, though most of them were not produced till some centuries later. A few of the Psalms are allowed to David by conservative critics, but most of them are assigned to the period of the Maccabees. Leaving out a few prophetic books, the earliest definite date for any part of the Old Testament is 621 B. C., the 18th year of King Josiah's reign, when Hilkiah the priest found "the book of the law" in the temple. It is held that this book was chapters 12-26 of Deuteronomy, possibly the whole of the book. The claim is made that it may have been written a few years before its discovery, several decades perhaps, but it virtually dates from the time it was found and published. Later additions were made to the original Deuteronomy, and the earlier writings, notably the histories from the time of Joshua, were rewritten and enlarged from the Deuteronomist point of view. So there are at least four great documentary strata running through and making up the historical books of the Old Testament, known for short as J., E., P. and D. There are supposed to be other original documents by many of the critics, redactions of the chief sources for the most part, but these are the big four agreed on by all. A composite element has also been found in some of the prophets. Zechariah has been dismembered by the critical knife, and the unity of Isaiah, once taken for granted, has been found to be a mistake. The first 39 chapters were written by Isaiah of Jerusalem in the time of Hezekiah, and the last 27 chapters by a great unknown prophet in Babylon, 150 years later, known as second Isaiah. Canon Cheyne in his Polychrome Isaiah, finds ten or a dozen hands at work in the production of these prophecies. It is claimed that parts of the Hexateuch were written during and after the exile. Nearly a century after the captivity, in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, the various component parts were put together, forming our Hexateuch as a whole. The remaining parts of the Old Testament were produced at various times between Josiah 621 B. C. and the beginning of the first century.

The evidence on which the writers of this school of Old Testament criticism base their conclusions may be roughly distributed into two classes: first, literary phenomena; second, the facts of the history viewed from the standpoint of the theory of development. Or the argument stated more in detail may be grouped under four heads: the philological, the phraseological, the historical, the theological. The literary analysis of the documents is only the means of detecting and unfolding the internal sources of the argument. Words and the changes they undergo are one of the conspicuous landmarks of development. There are 63 words and phrases in the Deuteronomist literature to be found nowhere else, and many of these are recurring and characteristic phrases. The phraseological argument would be of little strength if peculiar words and phrases were scattered indiscriminately through the literature, but they are grouped in distinct and well defined sections coinciding in almost every instance with the repetitions and duplicate narratives of the historical books. There are not only words and phrases, but constructions peculiar to E., others to J., others to P., others again to D., and these run along the same lines as the literary analysis.

Different points of view appear in the history, as illustrated, for example in the two historic representations in Joshua. The first represents the land as having been completely conquered and divided among the tribes under Joshua; the second represents the conquest of the Canaanites commenced by Joshua as a prolonged and gradual process of reduction carried on by the tribes separately and never quite completed. In perfect harmony with the old idea of the progressive development of revelation, the conception of God grew in these sacred books in all the varying degrees and shades of evolution from the anthropomorphic and tribal God of the early times to the ethical and universal God of the prophets. The fact that these phenomena occur in the literature of the Hebrew people is beyond question. The only question remaining for settlement is their significance.

I can not undertake to indicate with any degree of fullness the lines of evidence on which these modern conclusions are based, for this is not possible within the limits assigned to these articles, and I have stated the theory, albeit with damaging brevity, for the purpose of showing two things germane to the end I have in view in these papers. The first is to demonstrate, if I can, that the two views of the Old Testament, as already intimated, for substance of doctrine, at all events, are not so hopelessly divergent or so far apart as many good people imagine. And then to point out in the second place that the Old Testament on the general assumption of the truth of the critical theory, remains to us intact as a book of revelation. Tradition and criticism are closer together than they were ten years ago, and the trend is more strongly in a conservative direction than it has been since the war of the higher criticism commenced. The attack of radical criticism has spent its force, and ultra traditionism has almost ceased to exist.

Bishop Ellicot, the strongest man on the traditional side in England, admits a non-Mosaic element in the Pentateuch. Geographical and archeological notes chiefly, were placed in the margin to explain the history, and these in the course of time were inserted in the body of the text, and this the Bishop believes accounts for the anachronisms and strong Palestinian flavor of the Pentateuchal books. The late Principal Cave, of Hackney, held to what he called the journal theory. Moses kept a diary or a journal, in which he jotted down the events of history of which he was the maker, and fundamental laws for the guidance of Israel; and out of this matter, with such other material as could be gathered from authoritative documentary or traditional sources, inspired men in after time constructed the Pentateuch. Canon Rawlinson, in Lex Mosaica, in his zeal for the antiquity and Mosaic authorship of Leviticism, traces to Egypt and Babylon the whole structure and principle and many of the details of Levitical Judaism. Prof. Sayce in the same book, observes that both in the Phœnician and in the Assyrian religious systems there were numerous parallels to the ordinances of the Mosaic law. This brings the opposing schools on to common ground in one important particular, the distinct admission that many of the rites and ceremonies of Mosaism were adopted and adapted from old Semite heathenism as the symbols and channels of a divine revelation. The literary analysis amounts to little after this common ground in the origin and history of Judaism.

On the other hand Dilmann, one of the soundest, as he is certainly one of the ablest and most learned of the German critics, maintains against all comers that the priest code was completed about 900 B. C., and another eminent German scholar puts it down as 1,000 before Christ, within two or three hundred years of the time of Moses, and both of these critics express the conviction that the law is substantially Mosaic. Hommel, another of Germany's great critical scholars, has written a book in which he completely overthrows the radical assumption that the proper names of the priest's code were manufactured at the time to give the law the semblance of being an ancient document, in accordance with a theory of the men who wrote it. He shows, on the contrary, that these names had not been invented by the priest writers for a purpose, but were actually derived from a remote antiquity in the Arabian desert.

No moderate school of critics maintains or ever did maintain that the Levitical law was invented by Jerusalem priests in exile, or soon after the return from Babylon. The position of Driver, Briggs and their school of critics is that the final revision and codification of the law took place during the captivity or soon after the restoration in Jerusalem, with such additions and modifications as the altered circumstances of the nation rendered necessary. The critics are about unanimous in the belief that the laws and institutions of the priest code were ancient in Israel, reaching back in their origin and essence to Moses himself. In treating the several parts of the Pentateuch, Professors Driver and Adeney give space to affirming that there may be Mosaic elements even in writings produced many centuries after Moses. Prof. Adeney goes so far as to doubt whether any of the Psalms are Maccabean, and to intimate that Moses may, in a modified sense, be regarded as the author of the Pentateuch. These two English critics with the addition of Prof. Bennett, of Hackney College, insist that they accept the essential doctrines of Christianity, including the doctrine of the inspiration of the Old Testament, and its foreshadowing of the Messiah. It is clear that these views, and they represent the tendency of the best and latest criticism, with a little more adjustment, might be reconciled with what Christ and the Apostles, as they have been commonly understood, say concerning Moses and David and Isaiah. With criticism going back and traditionism coming forward, the final position of scholarship is likely to be on middle ground.

Infinite Pity for a World of Weak Ones.

By E. S. Allhands.

Could we be lifted to some sublime height where we could see things in their just proportions and from that exalted view-point look down on the world, perhaps we would smile as we saw the multitudes madly rushing over enduring things, while pursuing things that vanish as a vapor; trampling on realities while grasping after shadows; often like children falling into the ditch while heedlessly chasing a butterfly; but our smile would vanish and we would grow heart-sick as we heard the cries of bitterness and groans of unutterable anguish, and saw the tears flow from despairing eyes, down hopeless cheeks.

If we, in our higher and holier moments, catch a glimpse of the relation of time and eternity, have some conception of the folly of worldliness, and our hearts grow full of pity for human weakness, what must be the feelings of the father-heart of God, who alone can comprehend eternity; who alone can measure the heights and sound the depths of a human soul.

What infinite pity fills his heart as he sees a world of weak ones tossed hither and thither with ever an inclination to do right and ever a temptation to do wrong. "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him." How an earthly father pities his little child striving to do what it can not do, or in its folly bringing injury to itself. Infinitely greater is the pity of God toward us.

"For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish but have everlasting life." How he reaches out with boundless love and pity, "seeking to save the lost."

How often does he plead in vain, and we can almost hear the heart-rending cry, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem—how often would I have gathered thy children together even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not."

In Gethsemane, and on Calvary the Father-heart was breaking over his wayward, sinful, and rebellious children. No wonder, with this all-consuming love and pity, that there is joy in heaven over one repenting sinner, one that has broken the magic spell of the Prince of Darkness, and realized his need of a Father's love. No wonder that there is joy among the angel servants, when the Father with beaming face welcomes a prodigal home. But oh, how often must the Father's heart bleed, as he sees the bitterness, malice, anger, and strife among his children as they contend over the perishing things of earth; but how sweet to know he will not judge us harshly, but with infinite compassion, "He knoweth our frame; he remembereth that we are dust."

He will not leave us alone in the struggle, but will make all things work together for our good, if we love him; teaching us the vanity of earthly things; making us to know more of the eternal realities, purifying our souls by sorrows and trials; until wearied with toil, in the closing of the day, at the setting of the sun, we shall hear the Father calling us home, calling to rest; then we shall see him as he is, and know the fullness of his love.

A Pastor's Mistake.

By C. H. Wetherbe.

I know a pastor who, in order to avoid being on too familiar terms with the men who gather in the stores to gossip and indulge in coarse story-telling, keeps himself almost wholly aloof from such a place. The place in which he now resides is a hamlet having only one store, where the post office is located, and, I have been told, he quite generally sends a boy or some one else to the post office to get his mail, the object being that of avoiding the necessity of his going there and being in close company with a lowish class of people. This is the way that the situation is represented to me. This pastor, from all that I have seen and heard, is a most excellent Christian and is held in high regard by his own church people as well as by others; and yet many of those in the community who do not belong to any church are not particularly interested in this man, for the reason that he does not mingle among them as much as other former pastors did. Now, this man's motives are undoubtedly of the best quality, but I think that he makes a mistake in keeping himself so largely out of contact with the people. While a pastor should not go to the extreme of making himself commonly familiar with people of lowish instincts, joining them in irreverent stories or in unbecoming remarks, yet he ought to so mingle with them as to express a wholesome interest in their affairs. In a self-respecting way a pastor should show all classes of people that he is, in a good sense, one of them, a brother man, one who wants and seeks their good will and betterment. I am sure that unless a pastor can win the favorable consideration of the unconverted in the community he cannot reach them unto salvation. So I say, judiciously and frequently mingle among your people, and those who do not belong to your church, pastor, and then you may have gracious access to their hearts.

Ven. M. George Daniel.

A Band of Robber Kurds.

The Oldest Christian Church

By VEN. M. GEORGE DANIEL.

The oldest Christian church was founded by St. Thomas, one of the Twelve, who organized and established Christianity in Kurdistan, Persia, and Mesopotamia, where the church was in all prosperity, and many bishops and archbishops were ordained and put in charge of a certain district.

For instance, the second bishop after Thomas was Marie Addi, who succeeded Thomas when St. Thomas left the country and went to India, as he saw in a vision during the night that the Lord was calling him to that land.

We see in the history that St. Thomas had great prosperity among the Hindoos, and later on the whole church sent missionaries to India, where they prospered very much and established 360 congregations in Milobar near Madras, where even now are many who belong to the same denomination. Seven hundred years after Christ there were millions of people in these regions who were called the Thomas Christians because they had received Christianity through what St. Thomas had preached among them. Even now the church is under the same name, and there are many such congregations in the eastern parts of Turkey and in Persia. There is no church or denomination so old as that of the Thomas Christians. Their history began with the first century of Christianity and at Antioch, where they first were called Christian.

The Thomas Christians, sometimes incorrectly called Nestorians, have a very simple teaching according to the Bible. The discipline of the church contains elements from the old and new dispensations. Some people think that all the church is descended from the lost ten tribes of the Israelites. Accordingly the clergy of the church have special costumes when they are in the church, exactly like those prescribed in old Mosaic law. In the church there is a place where there is an altar and into that place only the minister can enter and nobody else, as it is considered holy.

The Lord's Supper is celebrated every Sunday. Every day, morning and evening, they have a prayer-meeting. During the time of prayer they must read two chapters from the Bible, one from the Old and one from the New Testament, and sing a few pieces of psalms just as they are standing without alteration. After reading the elder or archdeacon must preach at least fifteen or twenty minutes. Usually they go to church between 5 and 6 A. M. and between 5 and 6 P. M.

Until 482 A. D. the whole church was in fellowship with the other Christians. By that time the quarrel rose between Nestorius, Gregorius and Cyril regarding the birth of Christ as the Son of Man, and Christ as the Son of God, and also regarding the Virgin Mary, whether she should be called the Mother of God, or only the Mother of Jesus. Nestorius strictly rejected the appellation, Mother of God, as heathenish and contrary to Hebrews 7:3. Resting as he did on the orthodox doctrine of the eternal generation of the Son, certainly he could easily say no mortal has given birth to him who is not to be created, for in the beginning was the Word, as John says.

But the Nestorians by no means refused to worship the human nature of Christ. The church believes that in Christ are two natures, human and divine, and the Virgin Mary is not called Mother of God, nor worshiped as the Greeks and Roman Catholics who have placed Mary in such a high position that only through her do they think that they can go to heaven. But the Thomas Christian church's doctrine is that we go to heaven only through Christ and not through Mary.

However, many writers have made this mistake in criticism against the teachings of Nestorius. But we must not forget all the literature in Greek or Latin which his followers as well as his enemies produced. There are now in the possession of prominent Nestorians manuscripts of Nestorius and his teachings from the fifth century on, and in none of them is that doctrine held. The opinions of Nestorius were vigorously combated by Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, who by the advice of Pope Celestine called a council to Alexandria in 438 A. D. to decide the controversy. By this council Nestorius was judged guilty of blasphemy and was anathematized. Nestorius in turn charged Cyril with confounding the two natures of Christ and anathematized him.

The Thomas Christian church uses an early Syriac version of the Bible called the Peshuto. The origin of the Peshuto Bible is explained by the following tradition: During the life of Jesus on earth, Abgar, king of Edessa in Syria, sent to Jesus a letter inviting him to his city, to escape the persecutions of the Jews, to heal him and to bless his people. Jesus replied that he must remain in Judea to finish his work, but would after his death and ascension send a disciple who should heal and teach him, this disciple being in after years sent and kindly received. The gospel of Matthew was written in Syriac, and in the course of the second century the rest of the Bible, save the second and third epistles of St. John and the second epistle of Peter. The epistle of Jude and Revelation were not amongst the canonical parts of the New Testament. They were translated into what is called Peshuto Version. This version on account of its age is used by the Thomas Christian or Syrian church, which was founded in the time when the disciples were scattered by reason of the persecution in the years 45-287. (See Acts 11:19.) By the exertions of the Apostle Paul (Gal. 1:21), it grew to be one of the most flourishing and is often mentioned, (Acts 13:1; 15:23, and 35:41.)

The Thomas Church began to fall in the year 1400 through the enmity of the Mohammedans and the persecution by the Roman Catholic and Greek Churches. There are now only about 150,000 who belong to this church including 100,000 in the mountains of Kurdistan and 50,000 in Persia. The majority of those people are very poor and cannot afford to send their children to school. There are no colleges built in those lands and people are in darkness, spiritually and bodily. The church now is under the direction of Patriarch Mar-Chamoun. There are about ten bishops in the whole church. Each bishop has a certain district under his control and each district has an archdeacon. The clergy of the church are called the elders, first, second, and third.

In the time of the Armenian massacre we (the church) lost a great many people, and several villages were destroyed by the Mohammedan Kurds, for, though our Thomas Christian Church is entirely different from the Armenian church, it is an equal object of the hatred which the Mohammedan Kurds and Turks feel toward all Christians.

The Kurdish tribes are under the rule of local chiefs who are but slightly, and sometimes not at all, under the control of the Turkish government. There is little security for life or property and the government could not protect the Christians without great difficulty, even if it were much more desirous of doing so than it is.

There is an opening for the Christians in this land to try to help their brethren in their great agony and we have now a great many people who have not sufficient bread and shelter for their children.

[The title of the above article is the choice of the writer and not of the editor, and readers who consider that there is an older church than the one founded by the Apostle Thomas must not hold us responsible for the contrary opinion expressed above. The writer of the article is an archdeacon in the Thomas Christian Church, otherwise called Nestorians, and is by race a Kurd. Our readers will, we are sure, be interested in this account of an ancient branch of the church which has existed these many centuries in eastern Armenia, in the midst of a Kurdish population the greater part of which is fanatically Mohammedan, and beset on west and east by Persian and Turkish Mohammedans.—EDITOR.]

The Grave of Barton W. Stone.

By Clayton Keith.

Even to the very presence of the man of genius will men involuntarily pay a tribute of admiration. There is a grandeur in his look that commands their homage.

Such men were Alexander Campbell, Walter Scott and Barton W. Stone. Honored in life—in death we revere their memories. Like pilgrims we love to honor their shrines, to pile the monumental columns higher and higher. And as we behold the garlands of cypress encircling them, the grateful encomiums inscribed upon them and the tears of a sorrowful people watering the willows that weep over them, we feel that we tread upon holy ground, that Nature's noblemen lie beneath the sod.

On a bright Sunday morning in July, 1865, in company with an aged minister on a trip through Kentucky—passing through a beautiful country, on a delightful turnpike road, we came to the Cane Ridge Chapel where sleep the remains of Elder Barton W. Stone. Leaving our vehicle and walking within the cemetery, we found that a monument of beautiful Italian marble had been erected over the spot, bearing the following inscription:

THE CHURCH OF CHRIST AT CANE RIDGE, AND OTHER GENEROUS FRIENDS IN KY., HAVE CAUSED THIS MONUMENT TO BE ERECTED AS A TRIBUTE OF AFFECTION AND GRATITUDE TO
BARTON W. STONE,
MINISTER OF THE GOSPEL OF CHRIST; AND THE DISTINGUISHED REFORMER
OF THE 19TH CENTURY.
BORN DEC. 24TH, 1772,
DIED NOV. 9TH, 1844.
HIS REMAINS LIE HERE.
This monument erected in 1847

In conversation with his daughter, Sister Bowen, of Hannibal, Mo., in 1869, I learned that he died at the home of his daughter, in Hannibal, Mo., and was buried on his own farm in Illinois; that he had often expressed a wish to be buried at Cane Ridge, Ky., and that with the consent of his family, his remains were disinterred and taken to that place, where they were deposited March 9, 1847.

In the same conversation Sister Bowen gave me a very impressive account of that wonderful phenomenon witnessed by her among the multitudes who attended the camp-meetings held near her father's house in 1803, called in his biography, by Elder John Rodgers, "the jerks."

I transcribe from my note book a short poem on the grave of B. W. Stone, by S. W. Irvin, of Lexington, Ky., written May 15, 1851, which Sister Bowen had preserved and which she treasured very highly. Unless my memory is at fault, "Good Sister Bowen," as she was known in Hannibal, was the mother of Mrs. J. K. Rodgers, now of Kansas City, and of Mrs. Henry Haley, who passed away perhaps twenty years ago.

Here is the poem:

THE GRAVE OF BARTON W. STONE.

They have made him a grave and his form interred,

'Neath the green and grassy sward;

On the hallowed spot where his voice was heard,

When he pointed the way to the Lord.

It is meet where the banner of Christ he had reared,

And where praise had expended his breath;

Where the church by his presence so often he cheered,

He should slumber—a trophy of death.

The hand of affection has hallowed his home—

While the rock shall above him appear;

The ivy, or grass, that may grow 'round his tomb,

Will be watered with many a tear.

Let him sleep with the dead that have died in the Lord,

For 'tis meet that the laborer rest;

His spirit has gone to obtain its reward,

And now ranges the fields of the blest.

In the list of the greatest, we reckon him great;

How few have attained where he stood,

Tho' many as brilliant in church and in state—

Yet who has been equally good?

Sleep on then in quiet, we bid thee farewell!

Till the graves of the saints shall be riven—

Till the good of all ages God's army shall swell;

Farewell! 'til we meet thee in heaven.

Our Budget.

—The wind now blows toward Minneapolis, and it is something of a gale.

—We shall try to give our readers a good report of the convention. That they always expect.

—The first installment of the Tyler testimonial has been forwarded, but it is not too late for you to join in. See report on opposite page.

—How would Buffalo or Pittsburg do for our next national convention? Even the capital of the nation wouldn't be a bad place. We should probably go somewhere East if invited.

—Beloved, let us finish our speeches on time. The spectacle of a chairman holding and snapping his watch, rising at last behind the speaker, who slowly retreats from the platform, as he hurriedly rushes through his peroration, is more amusing than edifying.

—With college meetings arranged for Wednesday afternoon, fishing excursions postponed until after the convention, and sight-seeing thrown in between sessions, the convention ought to have a free course.

—John Boyle, formerly of Camp Point, Ill., but for many years resident of California, died at Woodland, Cal., Sept. 28. Bro. J. J. Morgan officiated at the funeral services. Our sympathies are extended to the bereaved family.

—The Shelby (Mo.) Christian church, J. H. Wood pastor, held its missionary rally Sept. 22, and raised $100 for missions in addition to $50 which had already been raised during the year for various missionary enterprises.

—Howard T. Cree made an auspicious beginning of his ministry at the Central Christian church, this city, last Lord's day, preaching morning and evening to large audiences that were delighted with his earnest and eloquent presentation of the gospel.

—The church at Joplin, Mo., W. F. Turner, pastor, laid the corner stone of its new building Sept. 29 with appropriate exercises. A large audience was present including visitors from the surrounding places, and the sermon was preached by S. M. Johnson, of Carthage.

—We are pleased to chronicle the marriage of Miss Bessie Lee Homan, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. K. Homan, to Mr. E. E. Faris, one of our foreign missionaries who is home from Africa on a furlough. Bro. Faris returned from Africa in the spring and expects to go back to his field on the Congo in about a year.

—W. H. Book writes that the church at Big Stone Gap, Va., dedicated a beautiful house of worship Sept. 29 with the debt fully provided for. Bros. J. W. West and R. L. Potter are largely responsible for the organization and Bro. M. C. McCorkle for the new house. Bro. Book began his fourth meeting in Martinsville, Va., Oct. 3.

—W. H. Bagby has resigned his pastorate at Central Christian church, Salt Lake City. The resignation was accepted only after his insistence. During his pastorate the church has nearly doubled its membership and has made great progress in paying off a heavy debt. We have not learned the plans of either the church or the preacher for the future.

—A. J. Hargett, pastor of the Christian church at Ashland, Ill., has two old papers of value which he would like to sell for the benefit of a struggling church. They are the Ulster County Gazette for Jan. 4, 1800, containing the obituary of George Washington, and the Prairie Farmer for June 6, 1861, containing the obituary of Stephen A. Douglas.

—During the first month of John L. Brandt's ministry at the First church in this city, there have been 21 additions. The present building has proved inadequate to accommodate the people who wish to hear, and the officers of the church have unanimously voted to take steps looking to the enlargement of the building.

—C. A. Hill has resigned the pastorate of the church at Canton, O.

—J. A. Seaton, who is at present at Brookings, S. D., will be located with the church at Webster City, Ia., after Nov. 1.

—The University Place Sunday-school at Des Moines had its annual rally on Sept. 29, with an attendance of 1,293.

—The eleventh anniversary of the pastorate of M. M. Davis with the Central Christian church at Dallas, Tex., was celebrated by a special service on the first Sunday in October.

—The Church of Christ at Georgetown, Ill., will dedicate its new house Oct. 20. The dedicatory sermon will be preached by W. W. Weeden, who will continue in a series of evangelistic services.

—The address on "Anarchy" by J. B. Jones, president of William Woods College, has been published in the Fulton (Mo.) Twentieth Century in response to a numerous signed petition.

—James R. McIntire closes his pastorate at Ames, Ia., on Oct. 13 and begins the next Lord's day at Fort Dodge. There has been an average of 35 additions per year during each of his three years at Ames.

—E. A. Orr writes that the Redwood Falls (Minn.) church enjoyed the presence of Mrs. Louise Kelley on September 29, representing the C. W. B. M. Large audiences heard her appreciatively, and the woman's auxiliary was much strengthened. Redwood Falls appreciates the comparative nearness of the national convention, and will go to Minneapolis in force.

—T. E. Crambley, whose resignation from the East End Christian church of Pittsburg, to accept the presidency of Bethany College, has already been announced, preached his farewell sermon September 29, thus ending a five years' pastorate. The culmination of his work was in making the final arrangements for paying all the remaining indebtedness upon the handsome building which the church now occupies.

—It is gratifying to learn that the West Side church and the Union Institute church have united under the leadership of Roland Nichols. The church is to be henceforth known as the Jackson Boulevard church. About a hundred members of the Institute church remain out of this union and will carry on work at the Institute. In addition to this the news comes that the two Christian churches in Decatur have united. All this looks as if we were learning to practice Christian union as well as to preach it.

—For the convention of the Virginia Christian missionary society to be held at Richmond, Va., Oct. 29 to Nov. 1, says E. N. Newman, secretary, the Southern Railway, the Atlantic Coast Line, the Norfolk and Western, the Richmond, Fredericksburg and Potomac, and the Seaboard Air Line railways announce a rate of four cents per mile one way for the round trip from points within the state. Tickets will be sold Oct. 28 and 29, with Nov. 4 as the final limit for return, good only for continuous passage in each direction. The Chesapeake and Ohio railway announces one and one-half fare on the certificate plan.

—It will be remembered that a large element of the population of Minnesota is Scandinavian—a people who have manifested a great readiness for the primitive gospel when it has been presented to them and who are singularly loyal in their allegiance to Christ when once they are enlisted. It would be strange if our national convention in Minneapolis did not result in some practical measure looking to greater evangelistic effort among this worthy class of our foreign population. We are sure that this subject will receive the favorable consideration of any committee of thoughtful brethren to whom it may be referred. We have a few faithful Scandinavian preachers whose zeal for their people is very commendable and whose time and talents should be devoted to winning their countrymen to New Testament Christianity.

—Any one of the three Minneapolis daily papers will be sent for ten days, covering the convention period, to any address in the United States for 20 cents in stamps. It is expected that the reports given will be unusually full and accurate. Orders should be sent at once to L. O. Pettit, 502 Guarantee Building, Minneapolis.

—Let us hope that the fish in the lakes about Minneapolis will not be biting during the sessions of the national convention. No doubt the local committee has seen to that matter. We have delightful remembrances of the fishing excursion to Medicine Lake with a delegation of the Minneapolis church and a fish fry on the bank of the lake. It makes our mouth water to think about it and if there is another excursion to the same place after the convention we may be counted in.

—The excursion referred to above occurred during the pastorate of Enos Campbell back in the 80's when the church in Minneapolis wouldn't have even entertained the idea of entertaining a national convention. But both the church and the city have grown wonderfully in the intervening years. We are looking forward with pleasure to renewing some of the pleasant associations of those times, but the beloved pastor of that day and his saintly wife have joined the church triumphant. Will they not look down from above on the great convention convened in the city, and entertained by the church which they loved and in which they labored?

—We call attention to the article on a preceding page by Ven. M. George Daniel, entitled "The Oldest Christian Church." Mr. Daniel is a native Kurd and an archdeacon in the Thomas Christian Church. The followers of this ancient faith are usually called Nestorians, but they repudiate the name, claiming that their doctrines are older than Nestorius, who was only a conspicuous member of their church, and not its founder. Living in Eastern Armenia, in the midst of a Mohammedan population, and under Turkish rule, the Kurdish Thomas Christians are subject to the same persecutions as the Armenians. Mr. Daniel himself has narrowly escaped, and not without wounds, from more than one Armenian massacre. He is educated in several languages, speaks fluent English and German, and is at present lecturing in the United States, making his headquarters for the present at St. Louis.

—G. L. Snively, general secretary of the Benevolent Association of the Christian Church, writes as follows, especially to the Iowa brethren:

"Bro. Gilbert J. Ellis, for a number of years pastor of the Church of Christ at Adel, Ia., has been engaged by the National Benevolent Association of our brotherhood to represent its interests in the state of Iowa, and is authorized to receive subscriptions of food, clothing, money and annuities for the association. We ask the co-operation of the ministry and all the churches in bringing this benevolent feature of our restoration into harmony with other characteristics of the primitive gospel we are trying to restore to the world. We hope Bro. Ellis will be invited by our pastors to speak to their congregations upon this subject, that the people at large may know of the enterprise and have the opportunity of taking fellowship with us in this fundamental gospel of loving and giving for the help of deserving needy, and to the glory of our Father."

—The church at Los Angeles, of which A. C. Smither is pastor, held its annual fall rally on Oct. 6 beginning with the Sunday-school and continuing through the services of the whole day.

—Howard Cramblet has left Nebraska and accepted the pastorate at Hampton, Ia. C. L. Morrison has taken the work at Harvard, Neb., which David Gregg leaves to enter the evangelistic field. Bro. Gregg is at present at Wymore with F. McVey as his singer.

—The church extension receipts from the churches for the past week were $3,111.36, from 192 churches. This was a loss of thirty in the number of contributing churches and $270.58 in receipts. There was a gain through the whole year of 113 in the number of contributing churches and $2,374 in receipts over last year. The receipts from individuals for the past week were $1,909.06. This is a loss of $3,475.64 over the same time last year. However, during the same time last year, there was a special gift of $4,000, and this year a special gift of $1,735. Let the offerings continue without abatement through October until all the missionary churches are heard from. Remit to G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., Kansas City, Mo.

—Why not have a general conference of the old preachers before they cross the river? A few years more and not many of these will be left on this side. Would not such a conference be worth while? Holy memories could be revived and much important information secured, which may be lost forever if the conference is not held. But best of all will be the opportunity for fellowship before our work is finished. What do the old men say? Time and place open to suggestion. Let all speak who are interested. All fifty years old and over are included. The conference should last a week.

W. T. MOORE.

Columbia, Mo., Oct. 5.

The main trouble would be to find enough old preachers to make a conference of respectable size. Most of the preachers who might otherwise have been suspected of being beyond fifty have shaved and are not consorting with old preachers as a class. True, Bro. Moore preserves his patriarchal appearance, but we fear he would be lonesome in an old preachers' conference. Nevertheless, let the graybeards get together if they can at Minneapolis and hold a symposium on "How not to be laid on the shelf."

—We learn that our reference to the reports of William Woods College and Christian University by their respective presidents, in our account of the Missouri state convention, has been interpreted by some as a criticism upon these men for reporting only their own schools. Nothing was further from our thought. The point of our criticism was against the brethren of the state in laying the whole responsibility upon the men who are directly connected with these schools, instead of having a committee which would interest itself in the subject of education in the state, investigate all the conditions and needs, and submit a thorough report to the convention. We believe this to be due to these colleges and to the men who are running them. Our point was that this is a matter that concerns not the presidents of these colleges alone, but the whole brotherhood, and they should manifest more interest in it than to passively receive the reports of the schools as made by their immediate representatives. We trust that the committee on education, appointed for the next year, will give us a well digested report on the educational situation in Missouri, with recommendations looking towards larger and better things than we have yet realized in that line. This was the meaning of our reference to the matter.

J. Z. Tyler.

Testimonial to J. Z. Tyler.

We take great pleasure in acknowledging the following responses to our suggestion for a testimonial to our beloved brother, J. Z. Tyler, on the occasion of his 53d birthday and the 25th anniversary of his marriage. The limits of our space forbid us to copy the tender expressions of love and sympathy which have accompanied these donations from various parts of the country. Some of the donors were baptized by Bro. Tyler's own hands and have been led to Christ under his ministry. Others have been profited by the Bethany Reading Courses which we owe to his indefatigable labors. All have learned to love him for his work's sake, some of them not knowing him personally.

We report here only the amounts which have come through this office to date, which are as follows:

Prof. Willett wires that he had secured pledges amounting to near $400 before public announcement, $100 of which has been paid to Bro. T. The testimonial should reach not less than $1,000.

In behalf of all these donors, and many others whose prayers and sympathies are all that they can give, we tender you, Bro. Tyler, this testimonial of our appreciation of your abounding labors, of your pure Christian character, and of our brotherly love for you and our sympathy with you in your affliction, on this your fifty-third birthday and the twenty-fifth anniversary of your marriage. This is only a foretaste of what your brethren will do when they have time to act. We are glad to know that your faith in Christ triumphs over these light afflictions which are but for a moment, and that you are walking in the radiance of His presence who said, "I will never leave you nor forsake you." May his tenderest love and unceasing care be over you and yours, is the earnest prayer of your brothers and sisters in Christ everywhere.

All Stuffed Up

That's the condition of many sufferers from catarrh, especially in the morning. Great difficulty is experienced in clearing the head and throat.

No wonder catarrh causes headache, impairs the taste, smell and hearing, pollutes the breath, deranges the stomach and affects the appetite.

To cure catarrh, treatment must be constitutional—alterative and tonic.

"I was afflicted with catarrh. I took medicines of different kinds, giving each a fair trial; but gradually grew worse until I could hardly hear, taste or smell. I then concluded to try Hood's Sarsaparilla, and after taking five bottles I was cured and have not had any return of the disease since." EUGENE FORBES, Lebanon, Kan.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Cures catarrh—it soothes and strengthens the mucous membrane and builds up the whole system.

A Mild Criticism.

DEAR MR. EDITOR:—Concerning your criticism of my mild criticism of Mr. Gates' proposed Historical Society please allow a reply.

1. "How any one can confuse an historical interest in the beginnings of our movement and a grateful remembrance of its leaders, with denominationalism, passes ordinary understanding." Now here are two things (a) "beginnings of our movement," (b) "grateful remembrance of its leaders." What is the essence of denominationalism but an historical interest in the "beginnings of a movement" and "a grateful remembrance of its leaders"? Does that pass ordinary understanding? Look at Lutheranism, look at Presbyterianism, look at Methodism, look at the Church of Christ (scientist), etc., etc. How much of these parties would there be, Mr. Editor, if it were not for "an historical interest," etc., and a "grateful remembrance"? Does that pass ordinary understanding?

That there is an historical interest and a debt of gratitude is unquestioned, but 1 Cor. 3:22 covers the ground: "Wherefore let no one glory in men. For all things are yours; whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas—" or Luther, or Calvin, or Wesley, or Campbell, or Mrs. Eddy, or Dowie.

2 "If our freedom from denominationalism is compromised by learning the history of our emancipation,—then . . . laws . . . find . . . [exception here." Let me ask, is the genius of our emancipation resident in Campbells, Scott, Stone or Errett? or is its history coincident with these men only? I have thought our emancipation from denominationalism to be resident in the New Testament, Matt. 23:8: "For one is your teacher and all ye are brethren. And call no man your father on the earth, neither be ye called masters: for one is your master even the Christ." The historical interest is from the preaching of the apostles and continues to this day. Waldus, Savonarola, Huss, Luther, Calvin, Knox, Wesley, Campbell, Scott and Stone, Garfield and Gladstone, Errett and Garrison, C. A. Young, H. L. Willett, Gates, Redgrave et al. All ye are brethren, does that pass ordinary understanding?

3. "The study of Luther's life probably never led anyone back to Catholicism." It never led anyone any further away from Roman Catholicism than Luther himself went—with his infant sprinkling and consubstantiation. The study of Luther's life with the establishment of the Luther museum at Wittenberg probably had something to do with Lutheranism, either as cause or effect or perhaps a little of both.

We do with Bethany (W. Va., scene of Campbell's labors) what Methodists do with Epworth, and Presbyterians do with Westminster. Do you think it about time to call a halt? It's Bethany Park, Bethany Reading Circle, Bethany Beach and must it be, alas! Bethany Historical Society? Does that pass ordinary understanding?

4. "The life and times of the Campbells and their associates make a mighty poor course of study for the development of sectarians." Yes, a mighty poor course of study for everybody but for "The Disciple Church" (the Campbellite builders). Does that pass ordinary understanding? Allow me to repeat (1), (2), (3), (4), (5), a mild criticism, see CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, Sept. 26 issue.

E. H. KELLAR.

[No, the "essence of denominationalism" is not "an historical interest in the beginnings of a movement and a grateful remembrance of its leaders." Not by a good deal. The difference between the two is the difference between ancestor-worship and filial gratitude.

It is very true, as our correspondent says by implication, that the study of the lives and work of Campbell and his co-laborers will not lead one any farther from denomination-alism than Campbell himself got. But most of us believe that Campbell, whatever his limitations in other respects may have been, got clear away from denominationalism, and the study of his life is not likely to lead one to love what he hated.

"All things are yours" Very well. Then our correspondent has closed his own argument. We shall hold ourselves at liberty to enter into the heritage by learning from the lives of Luther and Campbell and all the other great leaders who have helped men to understand the will of God. If Campbell and Stone and Scott do not belong in that list, of course there is no profit in studying them. But if they did add anything to men's understanding of God's will, how vain is the fear that an acquaintance with their work will lead to the undoing of what they accomplished.—EDITOR.]

W. J. Lhamon.

This brother, whose picture is below presented, has just accepted a call from the trustees of the Missouri Bible College at Columbia, Missouri, as Bible lecturer and instructor in that institution. It will be remembered that Brother C. B. Newnan, of Detroit, Mich., early last summer accepted this work, but after mature consideration, for reasons satisfactory to himself, he asked to be released from his engagement. His request was granted, and the offer was subsequently made to Brother Lhamon, pastor of the church at Allegheny City, Pa., one of the largest and most influential churches of the brotherhood. Brother Lhamon was born in Ohio in 1855. He graduated from Butler College in '79 and post-graduated in '80, receiving the degrees of A. B. and A. M. He preached in Indianapolis before his graduation and since then has held pastorates in Ada, Lima, Kenton, O., in Minneapolis, Minn., in Toronto, Ont., and in Allegheny, Pa. He is a contributor to our leading religious journals and has for some time been an editorial contributor to the Christian Standard. He has written also for various magazines. He is the author of the following works: "Studies in Acts, or the New Testament Book of Beginnings," by the Christian Publishing Company; "Missionary Fields and Forces of the Disciples of Christ," and "Heroes of Modern Missions," by Fleming H. Revell Co., Chicago. The last two books were prepared especially for the Bethany Reading Courses, the missionary department of which he has conducted almost from the beginning. The Missouri brotherhood is to be congratulated on the coming of Brother Lhamon to this Bible College work. He will probably not be able to enter upon his duties fully before the first of January. Meanwhile the work there will be carried on by W. T. Moore, who has been in charge of it from the beginning.

The Christian - Evangelist, Three Months, 25c. On Trial to New Subscribers.

West Virginia Convention.

The West Virginia Christian missionary convention assembled at Parkersburg, W. Va., Oct. 1-3, in the new Christian church building, at which place O. G. White is the industrious and much beloved pastor. The unique building with its roof garden for Bible-school and summer evening assemblies is the result of Bro. White's excellent planning. It is a model structure for economy of space and comfort. The people of that thriving city and the members of the local church nobly and royally entertained the convention.

The churches of the state were better represented than for years before. The interest in the plans for future work was intense. The reports of state evangelist and of the treasurer showed that much lasting good has been done among the churches; more money raised than heretofore; and the indebtedness of the state board canceled and all bills paid. A mighty cheer of enthusiasm greeted them, as it has required diligent labor.

Andrew Linkletter with all the enthusiasm of his great soul has gone tramping up and down the state (where he could go no other way) preaching the much needed gospel of co-operation and rarely goes to a church without accomplishing his purpose. Great credit is due him for his persistent effort. None save those who have been in this field can realize how much conservatism and do-nothingism we have to contend with here in this beautiful mountain state. But the light is breaking and noble brethren are repenting over follies of the past and are redeeming the time with good works. A. Linkletter was very properly called by the whole convention to serve another, his eighth year. Over half of his salary was pledged at this meeting.

The officers for the ensuing year are: Hon. J. A. Campbell, New Cumberland, president; J. A. Canby, Cameron, secretary; J. B. Smith, Moundsville, treasurer.

The daily papers all gave liberal and prominent notice of each session and we feel that much good has been done for our state work and for our cause in Parkersburg.

Abandoned It.

For the Old Fashioned Coffee Was Killing.

"I always drank coffee with the rest of the family, for it seemed as if there was nothing for breakfast if we did not have it on the table.

I had been troubled some time with my heart, which did not feel right. This trouble grew worse steadily.

Sometimes it would beat fast and at other times very slowly, so that I would hardly be able to do work for an hour or two after breakfast, and if I walked up a hill, it gave me a severe pain.

I had no idea of what the trouble was until a friend suggested that perhaps it might be caused by coffee drinking. I tried leaving off the coffee and began drinking Postum Cereal Food Coffee. The change came quickly. I am now glad to say that I am entirely well of the heart trouble and attribute the cure to leaving off coffee and the use of Postum Cereal Food Coffee.

A number of my friends have abandoned the old fashioned coffee and have taken up with Postum, which they are using steadily. There are some people that make Postum very weak and tasteless, but if it is boiled long enough, according to directions, it is a very delicious beverage. We have never used any of the old fashioned coffee since it was first started in our house." Mrs. L. A. Smith, Blodgett Mills, Cortland Co., N. Y.

The Proposed Historical Society.

What Is Said About It.

P. J. Rice, South Bend, Ind., says: "I must heartily approve the suggestion and hope that it may be successfully carried out. I shall be glad to give any assistance I can."

F. D. Power, Washington, D. C., says: "I was pleased to see the notice in regard to an Historical Society. You have my vote in its favor. We have all been too careless in this matter and some movement of this kind will be of great value."

J. E. Lynn, Springfield, Ill., says: "I am very much in favor of the Historical Society as outlined in the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST."

W. F. Richardson, Kansas City, Mo., says: "I do not see why such an Historical Society might not accomplish much good among us. It may be a little early to organize such a society, but I suppose the sooner we begin, the better the work will be done; and much of our history for the past century ought, I suppose, to be made matter of record very soon, if its accuracy is to be assured. I will be glad to encourage such an effort in any way possible."

T. W. Grafton, Ann Arbor, Mich., says: "I most heartily concur with you in your suggestion regarding the Historical Society. It should have been organized twenty-five years ago, when many of the pioneers were still alive. A few men like the venerable Loos, Dr. Belding, Harrison Jones and Lamar, yet remain. Your proposed society should be put in operation while their memory of the earlier times may be secured."

C. S. Paine, Omaha, Neb., says: "I have noticed with a great deal of pleasure your advocacy of a plan for the organization of an Historical Society for the Disciples of Christ. I have long had in mind such an idea. It seems to me such an organization for the conservation of historical data relating to the Church of Christ would not only be of lasting and permanent good to future generations, but would prove an inspiration to present workers by promoting a study of the lives of the pioneers."

F. M. Green, Kent, Ohio, says: "I am heartily in favor of an Historical Society with such a purpose as named in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of Sept. 12."

Prof. C. L. Loos, Lexington, Ky., says: "Years ago I suggested that steps should be taken in every state where our reformation has a history, to collect all such information as would illustrate the story of this great religious movement, yet my suggestion was not heeded. Not a day should be lost to do what can yet be done to collect all the historical information—facts about persons and actions of moment."

As has been suggested in several of the foregoing letters, the lives of the pioneers are of intrinsic value. Many of them are as full of romance, heroism and lofty aspirations as the lives of any heroes. They are as worthy of study as the lives of the pioneers of the American Republic. The characters and careers of such men as Thomas Campbell, Alexander Campbell, Walter Scott, Barton W. Stone, John Smith and a host of others will compare favorably in point of genius, principle of action, nobility of conduct, with such as Franklin, Patrick Henry, Washington, Hamilton, or Abraham Lincoln. In their spheres of action they were just as great. They belong to the whole Christian world, the same as Wickliff, Luther, Calvin, or Knox, Jonathan Edwards, Frederick Robertson, or Phillips Brooks. No one section of the church has an exclusive title to their memory or access to their life and work. They are worthy to become the inspiration of the Christian youth of the entire land, as they have of the Christian youth of the Disciples of Christ.

The people known as the Disciples of Christ have already made a history in the midst of American Christianity. People are asking, "Who are they, whence have they come?" Their history is going to be written by some one, either by those indifferent if not hostile to their principles, or by those friendly to them. It matters not, that history will be written. The impartial, religious historian must know about them. Whether written by one or the other, whoever writes ought to have access to the facts, and all the facts. Such is not possible to-day. Where are the records of what transpired in Ohio, Kentucky, Missouri and all the other states during the days of relationship with the Baptists? They must exist, and some one has a knowledge of their whereabouts. In all cases, an Historical Society could collate this information and make itself the clearing house for all periods and all territories, to the one who would know a single period in particular, or all periods alike. At this very time the writer would like to know a great many facts concerning the period from 1813-1830. He would like to have a copy of the "Declarations, determinations and desires of the Brush River church," set forth as the condition of union with the Redstone associations of Baptists. The assertion is made that that document "is lost," "was not preserved." Has any one instituted a careful and exhaustive search for it?

These are but a few indications of the work and place of such a society.

So far as can be determined now there will be a meeting of all interested in this movement, at Minneapolis, Tuesday, P. M., at 1 o'clock, Oct. 15. The place will be announced before the convention. ERRETT GATES.

Boys' and Girls' Rally Day.

[I am permitted to publish this open letter to me, relating to the Boys' and Girls' Rally for America. B. L. SMITH.]

MACATAWA, MICH., AUG. 16, 1901.

Benj. L. Smith, Cor. Sec. A. C. M. S.,

DEAR BROTHER:—In our religious calendar we have several different days set apart to as many different purposes, all of which are important to the success of our general work. Two of these relate especially to the young people; namely: Children's Day for foreign missions, and Boys' and Girls' Rally Day for America. The latter has not as yet come into as general observance as its merits deserve, and for this reason I wish to say a word in its behalf.

It has come to be generally accepted among us that America, and particularly the United States, is the base of all our worldwide missionary movements. Just in proportion as we are strong and healthy in this great home field, we shall be able to vigorously prosecute our work in other lands. It is the fuller realization of this truth, together with a clearer recognition of the paramount claims which our own country has upon us as citizens, that is bringing home missions to the front. The Boys' and Girls' Rally Day for America fits exactly into our general missionary scheme, while, at the same time, it falls in beautifully with that strong, patriotic impulse which is so noble a characteristic of our national life. It is well calculated to foster love of country in the boys and girls, and to cultivate that higher type of patriotism which looks to virtue and intelligence as the chief guards of our free institutions and our national honor.

By all means, rally the boys and girls for America and for Christ; for the United States and for a united church; for the freedom won by our fathers, and for the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free. So shall we best promote the welfare of the land we love, and the interest of that cause to which we have dedicated our lives.

ON FIRE.

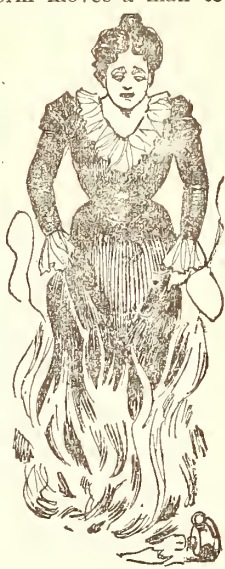

An exploding lamp; the clothing in a blaze; a paragraph in the paper telling of horrible suffering from burns. Tragedy in this form moves a man to tears. But for women who are daily being consumed by the smouldering fire of disease there is little sympathy.

Inflammation, with its fierce burning; ulceration, eating into the tissues; the nervous system almost shattered by suffering; these are only part of the daily agonies borne by many a woman.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription puts out the fire of inflammation, heals ulceration, and cures female weakness. It tranquilizes the nerves, restores the appetite, and gives refreshing sleep. "Favorite Prescription" is the most reliable put-up medicine offered as a cure for diseases peculiar to women. It always helps. It almost always cures.

"When I first commenced using Dr. Pierce's medicines," writes Mrs. George A. Strong, of Gansevoort, Saratoga Co., N. Y., "I was suffering from female weakness, a disagreeable drain, bearing-down pains, weak and tired feeling all the time. I dragged around in that way for two years, and I began taking your medicine. After taking first bottle I began to feel better. I took four bottles of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, two of 'Golden Medical Discovery,' one vial of the 'Pleasant Pellets,' also used one bottle of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. Now I feel like a new person. I can't thank you enough for your kind advice and the good your medicine has done me."

Dr. Pierce's Common Sense Medical Adviser, paper bound, is sent free on receipt of 21 one-cent stamps to pay expense of mailing only. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

Texas Letter.

T. J. Harris, of Lockhart, Tex., about a year since, finding himself out of harmony with the Methodist Church, joined the Christian. For several years he had been preaching for his people, but after the change he gave himself to preparation for the same work in his new field, and on Sept. 1 he was set apart to that work by J. J. Cramer, who speaks in high praise of him. Give him work, brethren.

The Cumberland Presbyterians in their synod at Hillshoro the other day took strong ground against tobacco using by their ministry. Good. Would it not be well for all the churches to sound out a note clear and strong on this subject?

L. A. Dale, of Ahilene, is succeeding well in that city. More than one hundred additions during the year, and a very handsome new house soon to be finished, are the substantial evidences of this fact.

S. M. Martin is in a meeting with C. McPherson and the First Church of Ft. Worth. The preaching of course is fine, and the audiences are large. There have been fifty additions to date.

The first Sunday in November is Texas missionary day. At that time every loyal Texas preacher, church, Sunday-school and Endeavor Society is to rally round the Lone Star banner of Bethlehem and make a mighty effort for state missions. May there not be a single laggard in the line. For once let all be heroes.

G. B. Ranshaw, after a ministry of three and a half years in San Antonio, resigned on Aug. 31. He says that J. S. Myers may succeed him. Do not know Bro. Ranshaw's future plans.

Devine has just dedicated a new house, Bro. Ranshaw officiating. Speaking of the success of the work he says: "The energy, perseverance and noble generosity of Bros. J. Q. Evans, J. A. Kercheville and C. A. Duncan and their wives have made these things possible."

Jno. A. Lincoln, of Davilla, is one of our most successful evangelists, but his modesty prevents the report of his meetings. It is claimed that since July he has had over two hundred additions.

Guy Inman, one of the brightest of our Texas boys, goes to New York as assistant pastor to Bro. Denham in the W. 56th Street church, and the prayers of a multitude of friends go with him.

T. E. Shirley, financial agent for Add-Ran University, reports that he has passed "the three-quarter pole" and is now on "the home stretch." He promises to announce soon the time and place of the great meeting when we will "celebrate our emancipation." Let the Lord be praised.

The saddest thing which has occurred in Texas for many a day is the death of J. B. Sweeny. He died at his home in Gainesville at 9:35 of the evening of Sept. 23. He was called up higher in the morning of life, being only 36 years of age. He was well equipped for his work and was one of the most consecrated laborers in the vineyard of the Lord. His gentleness, kindness, modesty and transparent sincerity, coupled with fine natural ability and a thorough education, made him a rare man among even the best of men. He could do more different things and do them better than any of us, and was thus perhaps the best all-round preacher in the state. It was difficult to decide as to whether he was most at home as pastor, evangelist, teacher or field agent for Add-Ran. He graduated from this school in 1885, and later won a diploma at Kentucky University. Besides this he has done a large amount of post-graduate work, and hence was one of our ripe scholars. His first pastorate was at Leavenworth, Kan., and the second was at Taylor, Tex., where for seven years he was a mighty power for good. After this he became dean of the Bible department of Add-Ran University and professor of Hebrew and Sacred History. In 1899 he returned to the pastorate, locating at Gainesville, where his work has been little short of phenomenal, adding nearly one thousand to the local membership, besides hundreds of others in his various meetings in the field at large. Perhaps his death was brought on by overwork in such meetings. His church gave him a vacation of two months this summer which was spent in evangelistic work. His last meeting at Detroit resulted in 107 additions and left him so exhausted that he became an easy prey to typhoid fever. In this regard his death was very similar to that of the beloved John W. Mountjoy in Columbia, Mo., several years since. On Sept. 10, 1886, Bro. Sweeny was married to Miss Lelia May Williams, who has been to him a wife indeed. God has given them three girls and two boys who linger by the side of the broken-hearted mother on this side of the dark river. May God prove himself a husband to the one and a father to the others. M. M. DAVIS.

Concerning Jacksonville.

It is impossible for me to appear before each congregation to make an appeal for the Church of Christ in Jacksonville, Fla.; neither is it desirable that I should. I pray you consider:

1. It is impossible to build without the help of the brotherhood. One-half of the members were hurned out of house and home, not even saving wearing apparel, and still others lost in their business.

2. To erect a suitable building is to advance the cause of Christ in Jacksonville and in all Florida. Not to build means more than to retard the work; what has been accomplished will largely be lost.

3. Other religious bodies will build splendid houses and with money gathered entirely outside of Jacksonville. The Masons and Knights of Pythias did not lose their lodges, and yet for the relief of their members in Jacksonville they have sent in more money than would be required to build our church. The colored Bethel Baptist church will receive more money, five times over, from sympathizers in the North than the Disciples of Christ have received.

But for the above facts I might think I was asking too much. The Disciples of Christ are not fewer in number, poorer per capita, nor more meager and penurious than others. Certainly the lack of response has been a failure to understand: (1) The need—A good house. (2) The condition—Burned out. (3) The opportunity—For the brotherhood to rally as one body to the rescue of a single congregation is practical Christian union. The least time lost the best. We are the first to begin to build, with your help we will be the first to finish. (4) What about help from the general missionary society and the church extension, has so often been asked. I do not understand that it is the purpose of the missionary society to build houses. As to the church extension if it had an abundance of money it could only lend. Masons and Knights of Pythias are sending in tens of thousands of dollars for the relief of their members, who did not lose their lodges, and who suffered no worse from the fire than our brethren did. If they need help, is it expected that our brethren shall be self supporting, maintain the running expenses of the church, and pay interest and principle on money to erect a new building? Does not the situation call for gifts? Put your congregation in the place of the Jacksonville congregation and apply the Golden Rule. I hope it is not asking too much to beg you to set some Sunday for a collection for the stricken cause in Jacksonville, make the announcement at least one week in advance and urge the best offerings the hearts and means of the members will allow. J. T. BOONE.

The Proposed Christian Home at Hot Springs, Ark.

Some progress in our educational work is being made.

One by one the brethren are learning of this enterprise and its great need.

We have just had a report from our committee on hotels and sanitariums, and as a result of this careful investigation we find that the Home when once built will be self-supporting, and will not have to draw on the churches for funds to pay running expenses; that in addition to paying all running expenses, we can, for every guest stopping at the Home, care for a destitute brother or sister in the free sanitarium.

With a one-hundred-guest capacity we can provide a home for from 60 to 100 brethren who may need our assistance, and that, too, without an additional cent's cost to the brethren who pay for their accommodations.

Study the possibilities of such a home to the whole church of God. I know of no similar institution in all our country. There is, perhaps, no other locality where it would be possible to meet a great need so easily as in Hot Springs. I am reminded occasionally by a doubting brother that the home can never be built, that it will be impossible to raise the funds needed. What! A people 1,000,000 strong cannot raise $75,000 for a work like this? I do not believe it for a moment. What others are doing, we can do. The Pythians are pushing their $500,000 sanitarium, and the Odd Fellows are putting a movement on foot to build a $350,000 home.

Shall the fraternal orders care for their sick and needy and our brethren go begging? I appeal to every brother to rally to our assistance at once, to every preacher to co-operate with us in this. We need your help, and now. At present we need immediate funds to pay for the fine location we are purchasing.

We can use two or three good men who are gifted in raising funds. Write us for information. Address, Hot Springs, Ark. T. NELSON KINCAID.

Doubters.

Can be Changed by Knowledge.

If there is any doubt about making brain power by the use of certain food, the doubter should make the following experiment.

Helen Frances Huntington of Gainesville, Ga., says: "Just a word of commendation concerning Grape-Nuts which I have found to be the most wholesome, nourishing and appetizing food that has ever come to my knowledge."

I am not a dyspeptic, but being constantly engaged in severe brainwork I found that I did not thrive on ordinary diet; even a moderate dinner dulled my brain so as to be practically incapable of critical work. I tried meat juice, peptonoids, the two meal system of light breakfast and no supper which brought on nervous depletion and sleeplessness, so I resorted to one and another of the various health foods which all seemed alike tasteless and valueless as a brain food, until quite by chance, I had a dish of Grape-Nuts food served as a dessert. I liked it so well that I began to use it daily, for supper four teaspoonsful in a saucer of hot milk, eaten before it dissolves to mushiness.

This point should be remembered as, after a certain time, evaporation seems to affect the sweet nutty flavor of the food as in the case of certain fine-flavored fruits.

The result in my case was simply astonishing. I had no desire whatever for sweet pastries, meats, or in fact anything else; and my brain was as clear and active at night as on awaking from a long, refreshing sleep.

The peculiar advantage about Grape-Nuts food is that it supplies the nutritive qualities of a varied diet without the bad results of heavy eating. I cheerfully recommend its use to all brain workers, if not as an exclusive diet, certainly for the last meal of the day. I always take it with me when traveling, which saves a deal of annoyance and discomfort."

Our Colored Disciples.

After ten years of silence I again seek admission to the columns of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to say a few words concerning my work among my people. For ten years I have labored here in this new country to build up the cause of Christ, and find for my wife and children a home. Ten years ago it was S. R. Cassius, Sister Julia March and Bro. Alexander Reed against the combined forces of sectarianism and Catholicism here in Oklahoma. During that time things have changed. We have grown from three to one hundred and fifty. Our work has spread from under one tree to three counties. Now, there is not a Lord's day that colored disciples do not meet to break bread.

When I began here I had thirty cents, an ax and a pone of cornbread. Many a time have I walked eight miles and preached and returned home to make my dinner on bread and water. At one time I lived here six weeks, preached every Lord's day and only had one dollar and fifty cents to live on during the six weeks, not because I could not do better in other places, but because I saw here a great field and was determined to stay with it. When the convention met in Nashville, I went there to see if the negro board of education and evangelization would help me. I was told that it would be ten years before any help could be given to this work, and I told them that in ten years the work would not need the board, and praise the Lord! I did not miss it. The work here has reached a point where it will live even if I die. The trouble is, it is getting too large to be properly cared for by one, like myself who has to struggle daily for bread. I need a team for the purpose of visiting these different points. I need a press to put a paper of our faith into the five thousand colored homes of these three counties. I want Christians to help me for Christ's sake, not for the glory of any man or body of men. You ask me how I have lived and kept up this work? It is very simple. Everywhere in our great brotherhood are men and women who would love to see the gospel cover the earth as the waters do the great deep, they, hearing of my efforts, have from time to time helped me.

I suppose during the past six years I have received $700. I have built the Tohee Industrial School at a cost of over $400. I published for a year the Industrial Christian. I have written and circulated 10,000 booklets on different topics, and some of it I have spent directly on myself. I have not fought organized work, except to keep it away from my race. I have always said that societies might be a good thing for white Christians, but it was bad for my people. My people like office too well to have the temptation of being heads of societies placed before them.

As I said before, the work here will live even if I should die. But during these years I have been very unfortunate, death, sickness and crop failures have caused me to get into debt. Even now I am sued for foreclosure on my home and I will have to raise $350 within ninety days. Can you afford for me to drop out of this work just at a time when its growth needs the most aggressive work, or do I deserve to lose my home after having spent the best ten years of my life to build up the cause of my blessed Master? A small gift from a few would save my home and give me the things I need to do a greater work. I am not begging, I am simply telling our great brotherhood what I have done and what I need. I am writing this letter at the request of a brother in Missouri, who sent me $1, and asked me to mention the fact that I received it, in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, and also give a sketch of my work.

Ohio Letter.

The largest rally yet on record must surely be credited to Ohio. On September 22, the High St. church of Akron held a rally with 1,198 present and 336 in the pastor's class. J. G. Slater is an adept at Sunday-school work.

Two new church houses were dedicated to the worship of God in Ohio last Sunday. New Holland set apart a neat $4,000 house. L. L. Carpenter officiated. Lorain also moved into new quarters. Z. T. Sweeney was master of ceremonies there.

A. Skidmore returned from his meeting at the historic Dutch Fork church in Pennsylvania telling of excellent results. In spite of almost constant rain and a county fair near by, there were 21 baptisms in 16 days.

W. J. Russell, of Rushville, Ind., has held a meeting at New Lexington, the capital of Perry county. This is new territory and a good point. The church at Crooksville gave much material assistance to the effort. An organization of some 20 members into a congregation was effected.

O. L. Cook is in a meeting at Lafayette, Adario P. O. in Richland Co. This is also a new point and the fact that Bro. Cook is there means a church if such a thing is possible.

We now have a new factor in our Ohio work. C. A. Kleeberger has assumed the place of Sunday-school evangelist. His first work was at Fostoria and was very successful. There is plenty for him to do. He is well fitted for the place.

This reminds us that Ohio day draweth near. Remember, oh ye Buckeyes, that this is jubilee year. 10,000 conversions; $25,000 for Ohio missions and $100,000 for all missions from Ohio pocketbooks is the watchword this year. Sec. Bartlett is sowing the state with literature and enthusiasm. Whatever you do do a great thing for Ohio November 3.

Another good preacher has "flew de coop." This time it is Clarence Mitchell, of Lima, who has gone to Wellsville, N. Y. He did a remarkable work at Lima in building up the Second church. From a distance it seems too bad for a man to leave a church where the work has been so successful. A change of pasture may make fat calves, but the principle is somewhat doubtful as applied to preachers and churches. Any church loses at least six months of life by a change of pastors.

On account of sickness W. R. Walker cannot take the church at N. Baltimore. Z. T. Sweeney preached Sept. 29, for the church at Athens. T. L. Lowe is the efficient bishop of this diocese. A certain Athenian said to the writer the other day, If you want to hear a fine quartette at Athens, go to the M. E. Church; if you want to hear a dry essay, go to the Presbyterian church, but if you want to hear preaching, hear Lowe.

When this is in print the hosts will be assembled at Minneapolis. It will be good to be there. Next year we hope the convention will come east.

Blackton, Sept. 30.—Bro. E. W. Sewall commenced a meeting here two weeks ago which resulted in 50 souls being added unto the Lord, and a church organized. Among those added were 16 baptists, 12 M. E.'s, one Adventist and one Baptist preacher. People attended from 10 to 15 miles away. Three M. E.'s came from Clarendon, 15 miles, and were added to the church. Bro. Sewall presents the gospel in the strongest manner possible. He goes from us to Thayer, Mo., and from there to Monett. The writer is among the happy number that answered the Master's call during this meeting. Our hearts and prayers are with Bro. Sewall wherever he may go.—LULA BRATTON.

Clinton, Oct. 7.—Closed a three weeks' meeting last night with Thomas J. Shuey doing the preaching. Eighteen were added to the church.—E. A. GILLILAND.

Erie, Oct. 5.—Our meeting here is growing in interest. Nine additions up to date. Bro. Kopp is the pastor and an excellent, enthusiastic Christian worker. Mrs. Sadie Hamilton, of Dixon, is conducting the song service. Sectarianism, lodgery and infidelity are damaging to the church life. The church house is undergoing repairs and remodeling and will be the best in the town when completed.—JOHN G. M. LUTTENBERGER.

Illioopolis, Oct. 5.—Our revival meetings lasted with the church at Bethany, Ill., over three Lord's days. One from Baptists, 21 baptisms. In all my revival or pastoral work I never had so many words of appreciation of sermons preached. They are a noble, faithful band of Christians.—H. B. EASTERLING.

Rantoul, Oct. 2.—I have just closed a meeting for the Walnut Corner church with 18 additions; all by obedience. Bro. W. H. Baker, of Covington, Ind., ministers for this church and the success of the meeting was due largely to the work he has done.—HARRY M. BARNETT.

Washington, Oct. 7.—Recently held a short meeting at Secor, Ill. Three were added to the church.—H. H. PETERS.

INDIANA.

Franklin.—I spent the fifth Lord's day in September with the church at Paragon. Two were added, a father was reclaimed and his daughter made the good confession.—WILLIS M. CUNNINGHAM.

Lynn, Oct. 7.—In meeting here; one confession, one by statement. The antielement went out some time since and have a building almost completed.—A. B. MOORE.

Madison, Oct. 7.—Just closed a 13 days' meeting for Bro. Harlan C. Runyan at Mt. Olivet, Ky., resulting in four confessions and baptisms. We held a meeting there last year of 13 days in which there were 51 additions. Have been requested to return next fall and hold our third meeting. Our work here in Madison is moving along nicely. Additions at nearly every service—two confessions last night, one woman 69 years of age.—J. MURRAY TAYLOR, minister.

Sullivan, Oct. 1.—Closed my work here last night with four baptisms. There have been 140 additions during my four years' work; 72 baptisms. Begin work for Greenwood, Ind., Nov. 1. Ordained Bro. Will Curtis to the ministry Sept. 22.—M. W. YOCUM.

IOWA.

Albia, Oct. 3.—I have just returned from a short visit to relatives in Smith county, Kan. While there preached ten days in a union meeting house resulting in 13 confessions and two restored. Four of these will probably take membership in the M. E. church. Of the fifteen seven were young men and nine were relatives of the writer. My brother, C. M. Ingram, superintends a union Sunday-school which is doing great good. Bro. Williamson continued the meeting. One confession and two baptisms at prayer-meeting at Albia last night.—R. H. INGRAM.

Holly Springs, Sept. 30.—Since the establishment of the church of Christ here seven years ago I have been anxiously looking forward to the time when it should enter upon a steady and firm growth, and I trust now that that time has come. Our pastor, H. H. Roma, has been giving a few night lectures which were highly entertaining, and the immediate results were four additions to the church with much added interest.—IRA C. HARLAN.

Lake City, Oct. 1.—One young man added Sunday morning. Railway conductor's wife baptized Wednesday evening. Preaching at 10 A. M. Railway brakeman's wife baptized Sunday night. Wedding in church parlors Sunday 6 P. M.; 500 people in evening audience. Our work is moving nicely and we are happy in the work.—F. H. LEMON.

Oelwein, Sept. 30.—We have just closed a five weeks' meeting, with Bros. Omer and Sprague as evangelists. The meeting resulted in many being added to the church and a great interest and regard for the church in this little city of nearly 6,000 inhabitants. Bro. Omer preaches the gospel with power. He has done us much good. The last night of the meeting we called an after-meeting of the membership and made an earnest appeal for money to pay off indebtedness on church property which has been discouragingly in our pathway for some time. So hearty was the response that in less than thirty minutes over $1,100 was raised. The mortgage on the lot will be consumed to ashes by Jan. 1, 1902, and a fine new church house is assured ere the leaves of another autumn fall. The church is alive, wide awake, and will lead the town in all religious enterprise.—J. T. SHREVE, pastor.

Villisca, Oct. 7.—Eleven accessions since last report; 5 by letter, 6 by baptism. Have planned our winter's campaign to begin Nov. 4, and will be in continual revival effort until March 1, with exception of holidays.—S. M. PERKINS.

Twenty-one were baptized; two came from congregations elsewhere. Bro. Briney is held in very high esteem in this community. This is the second meeting he has held here in the last two years. His earnest work in our midst has done great good.—RICHARD W. WALLACE.

Kirksville, Oct. 1.—There were 13 additions to the church here last Sunday.—H. A. NORTHCUTT.

Compton Heights, 2 by confession and 2 by letter; Eilendale, 1 from Baptists.

Tipton, Oct. 4.—W. E. Harlow and Miss Murphy have been with us in a meeting for four weeks. We have had a very good meeting; 29 additions. Of these 24 were by baptism. Bro. Harlow is a straight gospel preacher and has more Scripture on the end of his tongue than any man I have ever met.
We raised $50 more than sufficient to defray expenses of meeting and then raised $100 to improve the church. No trouble for him to raise money. We all enjoyed Miss Murphy's leading and singing. This makes 85 additions here during my pastorate. They go to Springfield next week. I begin at Olean.—

Denton, Oct. 1.—Have just completed two months' labor with this church. Twenty-eight have been added. Sunday-school has more than doubled. This being the seat of the North Texas Normal College and of the John B. Denton College it is quite a school town. There are over 300 students in the former and 150 in the latter. Of these we have a good number at our services. We need a new church edifice and are planning to build early in the coming year.—S. K. HAL-

Missouri Mission Notes.

This is the very first time that I have had a chance to note anything since the Missouri convention. Wasn't it great? There was great fear before the convention that the attendance would be cut down on account of the drought, but we had the greatest attendance for several years, as our registration and that of the entertainment committee demonstrates.

The spirit of the convention was better than for several years. Of course, there was a breeze but that is an indication of the keenest interest. If we cared not how the work was going, there would never be any breeze, but infinitely worse, stagnation. One writer seems to think that he has discovered the secret of certain opposition, because "reporter" have a way of getting at the inwardness of things," and he lives in a great city too. We believe that the men on both sides were perfectly honest and sincere and were interested in measures and not men, and all for the best interest of the work.

It is worthy of note that every mission interest showed increased receipts. That of the state mission showed by far the largest gain in years—nearly $1,700. This, when we consider the awful effects of the drought, is cause for the happiest congratulation. True, we have not done all that we should. There are a great many churches that could pay but do not. But we must also remember that we have a large number of congregations that cannot even raise the money to pay a preacher for themselves. All the financial agents we could put in the field could never make them able to give. What they need is building up so that they can give. One good thing about the year's receipts is that we have more of the poor congregations giving than ever before.
These gifts were small, but they gave and we thank God for it.

Now, however, we are facing a condition and not a theory. While our receipts were much larger than last year, we so increased our field force that it is all gone. The treasurer's report showed only a little over $50 in the treasury. True, we received some money at the convention that is not included in the above report, but we must have immediate help from somewhere, borrow money, or else cut down field forces. Every man we have is needed; in fact, an increase of our field force is imperatively demanded. What then? There are a great many churches that promised to give for state missions before the first of September, but did not. Let their promises be fulfilled. Immediate contributions are asked for from the churches and people able to do this. Can you find a holier cause, or one more righteous than that of winning every part of the state for the Son of God? We appeal to all to push this matter now.

The Attack on the President.

A land of freedom! Who is free?
The kindly heart, the trusty brain?
Or lawless fiends of anarchy,
Low-browed, black-hearted, and insane?

A land of boasted liberty?
But liberty for doing—what?
For righteousness, or infamy?
For manly toil, or beastly plot?

Free speech! that loosens from their cage
A thousand passions of the pit.
Free press! with license to enrage
By lying slanders foully writ.

A refuge for the world's oppressed!
And for the world's oppressors, too.
Its white and red that bleeding breast,
A darting adder for its blue.

And, when, ah, stupid patriots, when Shall empty phrases find their graves,
And we, vain-fancied freedom's men,
No longer wear the yoke of slaves?

By every form of lawlessness
That stalks unfettered through the land,
Our freedom dwindles, less to less,
Our bondage wins a stronger hand.

For flaming words of blinded hate
Run swift and sure to fiery deed.
Dost fear the serpent? Do not wait,
But go, destroy the serpent's seed.

By brave McKinley's martyr moan
Be taught, O sorrowing citizen,
That freedom rests on law alone,
And law alone—on manly men.

Bob's Birthday Cake.

By Mrs. Kate W. Searcy.

Great preparations were going on for the baby's third birthday dinner. The deliveryman came to the door with groceries and remarked as he emptied his basket, "You're a lucky little miss, Nina. I was twenty-four years old more than seven months ago, yet in all my life, I never had a cake baked for me, nor ever had a birthday present of any kind whatever. That may sound strange to you, but it's as true as God's truth—twenty-four years old and never one present or as much as a slice of cake specially for me on my birthday."

"Poo' Misser Bob!" said little Nina when he was gone. "Never had a birthday present! Mamma, let's div him sumfin'. Let's div him my bes' doll."

"I don't think Mr. Bob would want a doll, dearsie," said mamma gently.

"Would a birthday cake do?" eagerly asked the little one then.

So it was arranged. When the baby's big silver cake was made, allowance was made also for a small one for Bob, to be baked in her largest little cake pan.

"I mus' he'p make Misser Bob's cake," said the baby, bustling about like a busy housewife. She brought the cake pans from the pantry shelf, the thick paper and pencil to mark it for cutting to fit the pans, held the measuring cups and uncorked the bottle of flavoring extract. These things she had been permitted to do from the time she had begun to toddle. Standing in a chair she dipped flour from the tray to the mixing bowl. Then, when the cakes were in the oven, how she tiptoed to prevent their falling! They rose beautifully and baked to perfection.

"Don't they look 'plendid as oo ever saw!" she exclaimed. "Now let's put on the white icin' an' names, an' candy. I mus' he'p, mamma. May I?"

"Yes, but you must be careful to put the candy just where I tell you."

"I'll be careful, mamma, you know I will," promised the baby in her earnest way.

N-i-n-a was a word she had heard spelled so often that she had come to know the i well, and was ready with a small silver sphere of candy for the dot. Soon the name was done and other decoration made with the candies of all shapes and colors.

When it came to putting the name on Bob's cake, "B-o-b, Bob," spelled mamma.

"B-i-b, Bob," corrected Nina.

"No, B-o-b is the way to spell it," said mamma.

"Why, mamma, my mamma!" cried the baby, with wonder and reproach commingled in her tone. "Don't oo know there has to be an i in names? B-i-b, Bob, an' here's a silv'ry dot ready for it, like mine."

In the end she agreed amiably to the o and used the silvery dot for a period.

When the cake was ready she kept a sharp lookout for Bob. Evening came and he had neither stopped at the house nor passed by the gate. Nina begged so hard to be allowed to hold the cake until she spied him, that her little rocker was placed on the cool front porch and she watched there with the cake in a plate on her lap.

After dark she came in dolefully. "P'enty of 'livery wagons rattled by, mamma," she sighed, "an' p'enty of 'livery mans on the seats, but none of 'em was Misser Bob. I wis' oo'd sen' it to the groceryman's store an' tell him to div it to his Misser Bob."

"Very well, dear, in the morning," said mamma.

An accident was the reason of Bob's non-appearance. A collision on the street had sent him to bed with a broken leg.

A broken leg in midsummer is no comfortable or convenient thing. It is accompanied with real distress under any conditions, but in sweltering summertime, when the sufferer is very, very poor and virtually alone in the world, the situation is sad indeed.

Poor Bob had lain in lonely agony for three days when Baby Nina's cake reached him. He had seen no face but that of the city surgeon who came once daily to look at the bandages and a kind old washer-woman who ran in for a minute or two at a time two or three times a day.

Then the little cake came. The washer-woman brought it in to him, holding it joyfully in her steaming hands.

"And where did that come from?" asked Surgeon Boyce later. "And why don't you eat it?" he demanded, after Bob had explained.

"Eat it?" gasped Bob. "Why, I'd as soon think of eating my best friend if I had one."

"It won't hurt you!" commented the surgeon shortly, at the same time making a memorandum in his note book. A few minutes afterward he was ringing the bell at Nina's mamma's door. You would not have thought it of him—the things he said to Nina's mamma. You would have thought, to see him on the street hurrying from patient to patient, that his only aim

NOT HEREDITARY

In the main, consumption is not hereditary; it is infectious.

Low vital force is hereditary; which gives consumption its chance. An infection starts it.

Between the two, the crop is a big one: about one-sixth of the human race.

We suppose it needn't be more than 5 per cent, if people would take fair care and Scott's emulsion of cod-liver oil.

We'll send you a little to try, if you like.

in life was to set poor people's bones with deftness and dispatch. Slowly and thoughtfully, and in tones soft and low, he seemed to be setting some serious subject before the eyes of Nina's mamma.

She was a member of a certain young people's religious society. The surgeon's appeal was for the enlistment of her services in behalf of Bob, whose condition was very serious. So low was he that the surgeon's hope hung by the merest thread. Nothing could save him but constant and careful nursing.

From that hour there was scarce a limit to the attentions Bob received. Motherly women saw that every sick-room necessity was supplied. Young men came and cared for him day and night. He had dainty and nourishing food and plenty of pure fresh water to drink. Perhaps none who read this know, from having suffered lack of it, what a blessing to the sick in poor quarters of large cities is pure cold drinking water.

One year later Bob stood up and "made a talk" before a large gathering of delegates to a young people's convention in the city where he lived. Every sentence was as strong as a sermon on the importance of little deeds of kindness. Bob himself had become a Christian, active and untiring in good work. His speech was none too long to listen to, but too long to repeat here, excepting the last few sentences: "In living a religious life I sometimes find my path rather rough and my steps limpy, but I manage to keep a firm foothold. I'm always certain of the right direction and sure of a better place than this world to rest in by and by. If any of you ever have the least chance to do some little act of kindness, do it quick, before the chance slips or the devil whispers 'Don't!' Remember what powerful help went along with the little birthday cake Baby Nina sent to Bob."

A murmur of appreciation swept over the vast audience, like a gentle wave coming over a broad expanse of water. It grew louder, distinct ripples broke out here and there, and then a volume of applause burst forth to testify to the sympathetic impulses aroused by the deliveryman's simple little story.

Asters.

Walled in with fire on either hand
I walk the lonely wood-road thro';
The maples flame above my head,
And spaces whence the wind has shed
About my feet the living red,
Are filled with broken blue.

And crowding close along the way
The purple asters blossom free;
In full profusion far and wide,
They fill the path on every side,
In loose confusion multiplied
To endless harmony!

The autumn wood the aster knows,
The empty nest, the wind that grieves,
The sunlight breaking thro' the shade,
The squirrel chattering overhead,
The timid rabbit's lighter tread
Among the rustling leaves.

And still beside the shadowy glen
She holds the color of the skies;
Along the purpling wayside steep
She hangs her fringes passing deep,
And meadows drowned in happy sleep
Are lit by starry eyes!

The Revival at Lynford.

Joseph Hocking, the author of "All Men are Liars," "The Purple Robe," and other tales, is writing a tale of Methodist life in Lancashire, called "O'er Moor and Fen," for the British Weekly. The following is a bit of dialogue which occurs after a revival meeting:

The people seemed loath to leave the chapel. A kind of spell appeared to rest on the place, and the spirit of expectancy prevailed.

Presently, as I was preparing to go home, I saw old Dicky Scott coming towards me.

"Weel, Caleb," he said, gripping me by the hand.

"Well, Richard," I said, "I'm glad to see you here."

"Ay, and I'm glad to coom."

"And can you say with the lad in the Scriptures, 'One thing I know, that where-as I was blind, now I see?' " I said.

"Just a little bit, Caleb. I'm like the man who said, 'I see men as trees,' that's all. But I'm noan goin' to gi' up."

"No, that's right."

"Yo' see, I'm fair stalled, wi' the infidel tack. There's nowt in it. Everything is 'I doan't believe,' and that'll ne'er do onybody good. Ay, I've been weary on it for years, Caleb, for years; but I've been too praad to say I wur mistook. I've kipt on shaatin' when our spaikers have pretended to find a new proof that there wur no God, as though it wur summat to be glad of. And then when I've got home I've seed what a fooil I've been."

"Yes, I don't wonder."

"The truth is—weel, aw've never fair understood what religion meant till to-neet. I've read the Bible through more than once, just to find aat the mistakes o' Moses, and to laugh at they curious stories in the Books o' the Chronicles, but naa—"

"Yes, what now, Richard?"

"Ay, it's a weary business this tryin' to pick hoils in the Bible. Yo' geet nowt for it all, and when three weeks sin' I went to see owd Micah Bentley what wur dyin' o' th' asthma, weel I just felt like a fooil."

"How is that, Richard?"

"Why, I ses to him, I ses, 'Weel, Micah, we've got rid o' hell for yo'.' "

"'Ay,' he ses, 'and thou'st got rid o' heaven too.' "

"'Weel,' I ses, 'superstition can noan do good.' "

"'How dost a know it's superstition?' "

"'How do I know?' I ses; 'ave yo' been comin' to our meetin's all these years and don't know that?' "

"'Dicky,' ses he, 'y' reckon to be a man o' larnin', and one as is a laider among the Secularists.' "

"'Ay,' ses I, 'perhaps I am.' "

"'Then, Dicky,' ses he, 'gie us a bit o' comfort,' he ses. 'I lost my little lass Rosey ten year agone, and I've never been the same man sin'; and then two year agone I lost th' owd woman. I would like to see 'em agean,' he ses. 'Gi' us a bit o' comfort, Dicky.' "

"Well, and what did you say?" I asked.

"I could say nowt, Caleb. I wur just like a ninny, I wur for sure. Ay, ther's a lot o' truth in th' owd book, Caleb."

"It's the word of God," I said.

"Ther's one verse that's true, 't ony rate."

"And which is that?"

"'The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God,' " he replied. "I've got as far as that."

"I pray that you may have sight in its fullness, Richard," I said.

"I'm goin' to pray, and live for 't, Caleb. Now that thou'rt converted, one of my chief stumbling blocks is gone. Ay, Caleb, doant go backslidin', ef yo' did it 'ud be an awful blow for me."

"May God help us all," I answered.

I have written down this conversation not because it is of particular interest, but because it is suggestive of many hundreds of others that took place all over Lynford. Indeed, I may say here, that ever since that night the Lynford Secular Society has ceased to exist, and most of its members are now members of Wesley Chapel. And yet there are some who say that Christianity is played out.

"Idiom" of the People.

A professor in the Chicago University proposes to teach history "in the idiom of the common people," whereupon the New York Times suggests the following paraphrase of Macaulay's account of the close of the reign of Charles I: "Charles was a good many different kinds of a chump. He couldn't play a square game, and made ducks and drakes of everything he got his hooks on. He had a first-class show at the king business, but he slipped his trolley every time he undertook to touch the Democratic bosses. He tried a lot of monkey business with Parliament, but it landed him in the soup; and when he tried to tackle old Pym, who was a tough proposition, he found himself up against it to beat the band. Pym took a fall out of him every round. He had no more chance to win than a pair of deuces against a straight flush, and though he put up a first-rate bluff it didn't go. It took him a good while to drop to it that the old gag of divine right was well enough when playing to the gallery, but that the orchestra and boxes were on to it, and that it was played out, anyway. Cromwell and Ireton were too fly to be scooped by any such tommyrot. Charles had always been a high roller, and when his gang got to scrapping with the Roundheads he was dead broke and had to pull the leg of all the dead-easy tenderfeet in the kingdom. The ante was too much for him. Cromwell finally sized him up and got the district attorney to press the indictment of his royal nibs for everything that was out. Charles worked his pull for all it was worth, but he got the razzle-dazzle just where the chicken got the ax. They waltzed him off to the boneyard, and Cromwell had the innings. See?"

That scheme of teaching history "in the idiom of the common people" is a great idea. One can see with half an eye what a field it opens up for new and idiomatic versions of the classic history.

"How do you manage to get ahead of all your colleagues in securing important facts in a case?"

"Oh," answered the great detective, "that is easily managed. I subscribe to a newspaper."

Wanted—Lady Bugs.

What will happen to the crops of New England if 20,000 lady bugs are taken from the Berkshires and shipped to South Africa? queries a writer in the New York World.

Professor Lounsbury, the official British entomologist of South Africa, has ordered a supply to kill a certain injurious insect which abounds near Cape Town. F. C. Tobey, of West Stockbridge, Mass., has engaged 100 children to fill the order. The little red-dotted beetles are being scooped up in great numbers. The Berkshire farmers are beginning to protest. The lady bug is estimated to be worth, any day, ten times her weight in gold.

She comes of a family which has a good many black sheep in it, as black sheep go in the insect world, but the lady bug is a lady "for a' that."

Of all the myriad insects in the world this little reddish beetle is the most useful to man. Its value is beyond all price. It saves more crops the universe over, year after year, than any other agent.

Its whole life is a warfare against other insects that destroy the farmer's substance.

French children long ago named it bete a bon Dieu (the insect of the good God), and in English we have the gentle and affectionate rhyme,

"Lady bug, lady bug, fly away home"

The lady bug is found in every country on the globe, although the species in some localities are more useful than those in other localities.

It has a round body only about one-eighth of an inch in diameter, and is unobtrusive both in looks and manner. Its long suit is its appetite. It is always hungry. It feeds entirely upon the eggs of other insects and upon the insects themselves if they are small enough to be swallowed by a specimen so diminutive as the lady bug itself.

The lady bug lays a string of tiny yellow eggs. She is cunning enough always to lay these amid a colony of plant lice. As soon as the larvae hatch out, looking like miniature alligators, they begin to eat, and being carnivorous they fall upon the tiny insects around them. In the five or six weeks that they are growing up they destroy a whole plant-lice settlement. Then they roll up as cocoons and hang suspended head downward in nearly any available nook. They come out of the shell full-grown lady bugs and keep on their carnivorous career.

Curiously enough, the lady bug itself has few enemies. Its only means of defense is a pungent liquid which is not poisonous, is not really of a bad odor and probably frightens none of its haphazard foes. When it is frightened it draws its feet up close under its body and sticks tightly to the under side of a leaf. Presently, if nothing alarming happens, it spreads its small wings and flies away, all the time watching sharply out of its brilliant black eyes.

The lady bug really has two pairs of wings, although it seldom gets credit for them. The front pair fold over and form part of the hard shell that incases its body. The hind wings are used for short flights.

Nearly every insect which destroys the crops is the prey of the lady bug. Many of these are the lady bug's cousins, such as blister beetles, squash bugs, cabbage bugs, weevils, bark-boring beetles, flour beetles, bean beetles, and cotton bugs, all of which belong to the coleoptera order.

The lady bug's greatest service, perhaps, is in the devouring of the deadly aphids. These plant lice, little green insects no bigger than a tiny pinhead, are the most prolific of insects. They infest all plants and are particularly injurious to cotton crops. Too small and frail to eat the leaves, they suck out the juices.

But the lady bug pounces upon the plant lice. If it were not for this warfare scarcely any small crop or any flowers could be grown.

In California a few years ago a particularly large lady bug was introduced from Australia. It was found to be the only agent which could cope with the aphids which caused the cottony cushion scale on grapes. In two years the work of the lady bug netted a profit of $500,000 to the state. It has now practically exterminated this special scale insect.

A little boy who is interested in photography was taken to the court-house to see the end of a certain trial. He came home, and told his mother about it. "The judge made a speech to the jury," he said, "and then sent them into a little dark room to develop."

A little girl who was applying for admission to a certain grade in the public schools found the following question in her entrance examination:

"Compare the physical features of Europe and Africa."

This was her answer: "The physical features of Europe are fair complected and blue eyes; those of Africa are mostly black and woolly."

With the Children.

The Runaways.—II.

Mrs. Lamont died when Emily was born, and as Zep, the oldest, was then only three, none of them could remember her. Their father—a Kansas City minister, who preached for little churches in the suburbs and received very small pay for doing it—kept the children with him until three years before the beginning of this history. Then he died from a cold contracted while driving to preach a funeral, through a snow-storm, in a carriage, which the grief-stricken relatives allowed him to pay for himself. The Rev. Henry Lamont left nothing behind him but his children and a good name, and some mourning creditors. Aunt Mary took the children.

Aunt Mary lived in St. Joseph, but not in a stonefront with a grass lawn in front, and a long hose and somebody to work it. In fact, she kept that little bakery you find on your left hand, when walking uptown from the union station. It is such a little house to be in so large a city—only one room wide, and a narrow room at that. It stands alone, with an alley on one side and a lumber yard on the other. In the front room are round pies at five cents a pie, and candy hardly up to date, but candy for all that. Back of the store-room are two rooms standing in a row, with it for their captain. In these lived Aunt Mary and her husband and their five children. When Zep, Harry and Emily came to live there, the quarters were rather crowded, especially when company came. But Aunt Mary had a way of making you feel at home as long as there was a square foot of it left for you to stand on. She was so big and smiling, and took everything in good part,—even the flies—and then those round pies she baked! And she let you go barefooted, and never once corrected your grammar, for, if the truth must be told, she knew a good deal more about pastry than she did about verbs. The five children were nearly always sweet-tempered and well-behaved, especially if their mother was not present, and as she had to stay in the store all day, this kept them good. Her husband was Uncle Ben. He was different. He was thin and never looked as if he liked it, either. His five children preyed upon his mind. He would sometimes look at them in a dazed way as if wondering where so many came from, and how he could make enough to feed them.

At the end of a year, things began to go wrong. The pies were just as good, but people felt they ought to do without them. It was one of those annual periods known to the unsophisticated as "Hard Times." Money was described as "scarce,"—as if usually it was rather in your way when you walked. A dollar was said to be "hard to get a-hold of now." People grew alarmed, cut down their subscriptions to their churches, and stopped pies. Uncle Ben said he could not afford to keep the orphans longer, besides, he felt he had done his part. Aunt Mary was obliged to agree with him. So she kissed the children and wept over them, and sent them to their Uncle Tom who lived in Campton. Uncle Ben said it was Uncle Tom's "turn."

Uncle Tom was not a satisfactory uncle. He was sorry for his turn to come, and he let them know it at once. He was one of those men who pride themselves on always saying what they think, which meant, in his case, that he took his recreation in saying disagreeable things. Besides, he was an old bachelor, so perhaps that is why he was so cross. But he was poor and had to work hard, and the coming of three orphans was really a heavy burden. Let us be just to Uncle Tom. He was a farmer, but he rented his farm, and it was a small one. The weather never worked right on his farm. The crops could always have been better. Uncle Tom did his own cooking, and he thought you ate a good deal. Indeed, you never ate as much as you wished at his table. It is great fun to play in the branch, and watch the milking, and help turn the grass seed, but it is not pleasant to go to bed with an ache in the stomach calling for another piece of bread. Uncle Tom thought the orphans should be bound out, and when he harped upon this, the children became very unhappy, for the thought of being bound out for service till they were of age seemed a frightful calamity. Perhaps it would have been best for them—perhaps they would have enjoyed it, but, then, they did not think so. If Uncle Tom had been well on in the world, which happy condition is usually called being "well off," he might have been willing to share his wealth with his sister's children. But I am not sure about that, you always have to take people as they are, and Uncle Tom was poor and plain-spoken.

The real trouble of the children began when they went to their Aunt Sarelda. She lived in St. Louis on a very modest income. She was a maiden lady, and was perfectly contented with life before the children came. Then everything seemed to go wrong. Their grammar vexed her, for their living with Aunt Mary and Uncle Tom had been a serious injury to their syntax. There was another thing, they liked to move about—they did not enjoy sitting upon chairs. Aunt Sarelda was very fond of chairs, especially for children. She decided to teach them, instead of sending them to the public school, and this teaching was an agony to her, yet she persevered. It was not fun to the children either. She found them very ignorant. Their father had been too busy preaching to other people to give much attention to just his own children. Sometimes Emily would try to hold a friendly conversation with her aunt whom she greatly admired and feared. It would go thus:

"Aunt Sarelda, I seen—"

"Saw!" said Aunt Sarelda.

"I saw the purtiest—"

"Prettiest, prettiest, child." (Aunt Sarelda pronounced "pretty" to rhyme with Betty.)

"The prett-iest ring layin' on—"

"Lying, Emily, and give the g full utterance. Thus, lyingg, ly-ingg."

Emily would continue. It was impossible to discourage her. In the meantime Emily, Zep and Harry still perch on top of that box-car in the moonlight. But I must tell you more about that gold ring Emily was talking about, for it was one of the causes that led to their running away. I do not say running away from home, for, alas! to orphans, home is but a name—a memory.

Hall Caine Uses His Bible.

Mr. Hall Caine, the novelist, states that he is largely indebted for his literary successes to the Bible, says the C. E. World.

"I think," he says, "that I know my Bible as few literary men know it. There is no book in the world like it, and the finest novels ever written fall far short in interest of any one of the stories it tells."

"Whatever strong situations I have in my books are not of my creation, but are taken from the Bible."

"The Deemster" is the story of the Prodigal Son. "The Bondman" is the story of Esau and Jacob. "The Scapegoat" is the story of Eli and his sons, but with Samuel as a little girl, and "The Manxman" is the story of David and Uriah."

The Triumphant Believer.*

TEXT.—For I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor things present, nor things to come, nor powers, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.—Rom. 8:38, 39.

We seek not enjoyment, nor sorrow, but progress. The church of Christ moves like a victorious army, from point to point, and its victories always bless the vanquished. The individual believer shares in these lustrous victories of the army to which he belongs, and, at the same time, makes conquests of his own.

Enemies.

Doubt is always a lurking enemy of the child of God. When trouble and affliction come, when distress and persecution darken the sky, then he is prone to think that God has forsaken him. Again and again the cry has gone up in rebellious protest against affliction and sorrow,—“God is cruel!” But Paul here corrects this blind impulse, and rebukes doubt. Suffering is a proof of God’s presence, not of His absence. Chastisement comes in love. The fires are to burn away the dross. This language was peculiarly appropriate to the early Christians, whose sufferings were heroic; many of them endured the pains of martyrdom. But it is full of comfort likewise to the tried and the smitten in every age, whether their sorrows come from vindictive human rulers and tyrannous laws, or, on the other hand, from the unfortuitous events which fill some lives. None of these things can separate us from the love of Christ.

Victories.

The faithful disciple, the obedient and loyal soldier of the Cross, conquers; but he “more than conquers.” A victory is inspiring; but sometimes it is won at such a fearful cost as to make even the moment of triumph sad. Or it is of doubtful value, because it is scarcely decisive of anything. But that is not the nature of the victories of grace. The believer triumphs, and he triumphs gloriously. “Our sufferings are short-lived,” writes Moses E. Lard, commenting on this passage, “they quickly end. We not only live through them, but we shall live forever beyond them. Nay, we are even crowned over them, with immortality and eternal life.”

Such victories over temptation, as well as over sorrow and trouble, every believer should seek. The half-and-half Christian is never a happy Christian; he must be out-and-out! Write upon your banner, “No compromise!” Press your righteous contention at every point, and strike valiant blows against all forms of sin. You need not fear “death, nor life, nor angels”; if good angels are meant, then it is an assertion that even they, if they should attempt it, with all their might, could not cut you off from the love of God. And this sublime enumeration, as if some plotting enemy might have been overlooked, closes with the phrase, “nor any other creature.” Whom shall I fear?

Helpers.

Not alone are these triumphs won. “Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall.” We have need of this caution, for it is inevitable that victory should beget self-confidence. The valorous soldier feels that he conquered by his personal prowess, by the strength of his arm, or the cunning of his brain. And the self-confident warrior is in peril. Recall the experience of the Hebrews before Ai. No, your conquests are not yours; they are won because God fights for you, and works in you.

Our achievements are all due to the help of Christ, who loved us and gave himself for us.

*Prayer-meeting topic for Oct. 16.

Your own experience corroborates this. When incises, feeling weak and impotent, you have gone to Christ for help, you have triumphed gloriously. But when, flushed with pride, you have relied upon your own wisdom and might, you have ignominiously failed. Happy are these experiences, if they have but taught you to rely always upon heavenly helpers. No trembling, warring soul ever sent up a cry for help in the thick of battle, that immediately the air was not stirred with angels’ wings, and the chariot lifted forward by unseen hands. Why, then, should we ever be weak and lonely? Reinforcements are ever at hand, thank God. The Captain of our salvation never leaves us; He marshals His cohorts for our defense. But unfortunately, we can refuse His assistance.

Be comforted with the assurance of final victory, and more than victory. Keep close to the triumphant Christ, and you will be a triumphant Christian.

Prayer.

O God, Thou knowest our weakness and unwisdom, our poverty and pride. Have mercy upon us, and renew our minds; cleanse our hearts, and equip us for the struggle. Place in every trembling hand the sword of the Spirit; inspire every faint heart with confidence; and lead forth the bannered host to conquest, in Jesus’ name, Amen.

Travel.

A word or two on the subject of travel is not amiss. The facilities for the transportation of passengers at the present time have certainly been brought to perfection. It isn’t like in the old days when it was almost a torture to go from one place to another. Now you get aboard a train and live just like you do at home. The entire equipment is built with a view to your comfort.

For instance: When you go East the B. & O. S.-W. offers you Three Daily Solid Vested Trains from St. Louis, leaving at 8:20 a. m., 8:05 p. m. and 2:15 a. m.—made up of the finest Pullman sleepers—a dining car service which cannot be excelled (you don’t have to pay for what you can’t eat, but just for what you order)—first class high back coaches—in fact the trains are palaces on wheels. The track, roadbed and equipment are entirely new.

It’s the best line to Cincinnati and Louisville. Only $21 to New York with stop-overs. (Saves you money and gives you the best service.)

Information in regard to trains, etc., can be secured from any representative. It will be a pleasure for them to answer your questions and help you in every way.

The favor of the public is final proof of merit—and we’re after it.

Danger In Soda.

Serious Results Sometimes Follow Its Excessive Use.

Common soda is all right in its place, and indispensable in the kitchen and for cooking and washing purposes, but it was never intended for a medicine, and people who use it as such will some day regret it.

We refer to the common use of soda to relieve heartburn or sour stomach, a habit which thousands of people practice almost daily, and one which is fraught with danger; moreover, the soda only gives temporary relief, and in the end the stomach trouble gets worse and worse.

The soda acts as a mechanical irritant to the walls of the stomach and bowels, and cases are on record where it accumulated in the intestines, causing death by inflammation or peritonitis.

Dr. Harlandson recommends as the safest and surest cure for sour stomach (acid dyspepsia) an excellent preparation sold by druggists under the name of Stuart’s Dyspepsia Tablets. These tablets are large 20-grain lozenges, very pleasant to taste, and contain the natural acids, peptones and digestive elements essential to good digestion, and when taken after meals they digest the food perfectly and promptly before it has time to ferment, sour and poison the blood and nervous system.

Dr. Wuerth states that he invariably uses Stuart’s Dyspepsia Tablets in all cases of stomach derangements, and finds them a certain cure, not only for sour stomach, but by promptly digesting the food, they create a healthy appetite, increase flesh and strengthen the action of the heart and liver. They are not a cathartic, but intended only for stomach diseases and weakness, and will be found reliable in any stomach trouble except cancer of the stomach. All druggists sell Stuart’s Dyspepsia Tablets at 50 cents per package.

Joseph Exalted.*

Two years passed after the release of the butler of Pharaoh from prison, and in his restoration to favor he forgot his promise to Joseph. Thirteen years had gone by since the innocent young lad was sold by his brothers into bondage, and much of this time had doubtless been spent in prison. He was now a young man of thirty, and in the bloom of his youthful vigor. Instead of repining at his lot, he made the best possible of his situation, and won the confidence of all about him, so that he became a trusted servant and keeper of the jail, and thereby his personal comfort was ensured. But he still rested under the stigma of disgrace, and his soul was grieved that he should be thought capable of the evil charged against him. Deliverance was at hand, however, and he was yet to learn that his sufferings could be made the means, through the providence of God, of ministering life to multitudes of his fellow men. Had Joseph's career been one of unbroken prosperity, few would have heard of him, perhaps. And those who did would have been disheartened when they compared his good fortune with their hard one. But, by his severe and undeserved trials, so patiently borne, and so amply recompensed, he has strengthened thousands to endure and be faithful to God and their fellow men.

We have already referred to the significance given to dreams, by the people of the Orient. The Egyptians were fond of reading the will and purposes of their deities in these night visions. When, therefore, the reigning Pharaoh saw in his sleep the strange sights of the lean cattle devouring the fat ones, and the full heads of wheat swallowing the thin and blasted ones, he felt that something of great importance was intended to be conveyed thereby. The fact that the cattle came up out of the sacred river, the Nile, whose annual overflow was the source of the land's fruitfulness, may have added to the dream's impressiveness. Egypt was the world's granary, her wheat being shipped in the vessels of Alexandria, or carried on the backs of the caravans of camels to every neighboring country. This fact would make the second dream appear to Pharaoh as of special significance. His spirit was troubled, we are told, and he called in all his sages and magicians to interpret the dreams. But they could not offer any satisfactory interpretation. Then the treacherous and ungrateful memory of the chief butler recalled his own experience while in prison, and he told the king of what Joseph had done in explaining the dreams of himself and the chief baker, and how the issues had been precisely as he foretold. Joseph was at once sent for, and, after being shaved and washed and newly clad, as befitted one who was to stand before the king, he appeared in Pharaoh's court.

To Pharaoh's complimentary statement of what he had heard regarding Joseph's ability to interpret dreams, the young man replied, "It is not in me: God shall give Pharaoh an answer of peace." Not even such sudden exaltation can turn the head of this noble young Hebrew, and he will not suffer the honor due to God to be attributed to himself. Well he knew that unaided of God he would be as helpless as the magicians of Egypt. But he likewise knew that "the secret of the Lord is with them that fear him," and he assured the king that God had given a token of his gracious purpose toward Egypt in the dream which had so troubled his spirit. Pharaoh then recounted his dreams, which Joseph interpreted in such manner as to impress the king with the fitness of his explanation. The seven fat cattle and the seven full ears of wheat signified seven years of plenty, during which the land would bring forth in great abundance. These would be followed by seven years of famine, during which the stores laid up in the years of plenty would be devoured. The two dreams were given to the king, that he might be assured of the facts they foretold. Emboldened by the evident favor with which Pharaoh listened to his interpretation, Joseph advised him to choose out the wisest man in his kingdom, and give to him authority to gather up the surplus of grain during the plentiful years, to keep the people when the awful famine should arrive. Thus would the people be saved from starvation, and the kingdom from calamity.

Pharaoh was completely captured by the bearing, the wisdom and the strange knowledge of the future exhibited by Joseph, and it was but natural that he should appoint him to the position of overseer, to carry out the plan he had himself outlined. "Can we find such a one as this, a man in whom the spirit of God is?" asked Pharaoh of his servants, and they approved of his decision. It was ever thus,—the presence of the divine Spirit will manifest itself, and he who seeks ever to know and do the will of God alone will be led of him. It was said of the early followers of Jesus that men "took knowledge of them, that they had been with Jesus." And the conduct of Joseph told with unmistakable clearness that God was with him, whether in the palace of Potiphar, in the prison, or on the throne. He was set next to the king himself, given the second chariot, arrayed in royal robes, trusted with the signet ring of Pharaoh, and in every way honored as the noblest man in the kingdom. His name was called, in the Egyptian tongue, Zaphnath-paneah, meaning, according to some authorities, "Savior of the world," a noble title, and one which would perpetuate his beneficent work to future generations. He was given a wife from the priestly caste, which implies that he was adopted into that caste, and thus received full recognition as one of royal blood.

The confidence of Pharaoh was not misplaced. Joseph went through the land, during the seven years of abundance, and gathered the grain into great storehouses, where it was preserved until the years of want. It was probably due to the foresight of Joseph, which saved the land of Egypt from the horrors of famine, that future kings continued to build these storehouses, such as those of Pithom and Raamses, afterward built by the oppressed Hebrews, under the "king who knew not Joseph." There is no record of any future famines of so great duration as this one, but the Nile has frequently failed to overflow its banks sufficiently to properly fertilize the soil, thus bringing great distress upon the land for at least a year or two. An inscription on the wall of a tomb, believed to be that of the period we are studying, has the following language, written by a servant of Pharaoh: "When a famine arose, lasting many years, I issued corn to the city to each hungry person." Can it be that we have in this an inscription of the very man of God whose life we are studying?

*Lesson for October 20. Genesis 41:38-49.

Christian Endeavor

Burriss A. Jenkins

TOPIC FOR OCTOBER 20.

A Bad Bargain.

Gen. 25:29-34.

The difficulty with Esau was that he had no foresight. He saw too short a distance. He felt that everything was likely to be lost because he happened to be very faint with hunger. Because for the moment he was physically weak he allowed himself to be mentally and morally weakened.

How often it chances that, because we consider ourselves abased or unfortunate, we indulge ourselves in some wrong. We say, "Oh, I'm having such a hard time to-day. I'll do this just this once to relieve the darkness of to-day. I know I coughtn't. It isn't just the thing, but, then, things have been all against me to-day, and I'll do it just this time." Possibly Esau's reasoning was something of this sort.

We talk to ourselves in this way, knowing all the time that, sooner or later, we must pay for our indulgence. We are short-sighted enough to seek a present pleasure at the expense of future good. This is the manner of a child, of a savage, of the uncivilized man or woman. Here is a young woman who eats chocolates when she knows well enough that she must take medicine afterward, yet she eats, and even sets the medicine-bottle close at hand while eating. Here is a young man who stays out late at night, and dissipates, knowing that he will suffer the next day, and fall asleep over his books in the office or the class-room. It is the same short-sightedness of Esau, and they are selling the birthright of manhood and womanhood for mouthfuls of sawdust.

To be sure, Jacob is not without blame in this bargain. But, then, that does not alter the case for Esau. You and I, too, will always find the devil (or at least the devil of a fellow) ready to co-operate with us in our bad bargaining whenever we are weak. Don't imagine for a moment that the company you keep is going to preserve you altogether from harm. You'll find temptation lurking even among angels and people of that sort.

And, last of all, let us consider that Esau got himself into trouble by being intemperate at the very start. It is not a bad thing to hunt, but it is a bad thing to hunt too much. Some people are forever doing a good thing so much that it becomes a bad thing. If Esau had been self-controlled at the start he would not have put his foot into it so badly.

All round, Esau is not such a very bad fellow.

He was simply foolish and "didn't think." How many there are who get into difficulties because they "didn't think." If no man can add a cubit to his stature by taking thought, he can at least add armor to his safety by taking thought. In all our living let us think ahead, count costs, and stiffen up our weak backbones.

BROWN.

□ After an illness of more than a year, Mrs. Grace Daily Brown passed from earthly to heavenly life, at Amarillo, Tex., Sept. 20, 1901. She became a Christian at the age of 18 years. From the day of her obedience she led a faithful, consecrated, Christian life. She was loved and respected by all who knew her. She was taken to Amarillo, last June, by her devoted husband in the vain hope that the change would benefit her health. She endured her affliction patiently and uncomplainingly. She fully realized that she must go and was ready. Her remains were laid to rest in the beautiful cemetery near this city. Mrs. S. D. DUTCHER.

FOUCH.

David W. Fouch died at Parma, at the residence of his son, F. R. Fouch, July 30, 1901, aged 73 years, 1 month and 12 days. He was born in Ohio and lived there until 1862, when he crossed the plains with his family, first settling in Grand Ronde Valley. In 1863 he removed to Idaho and settled at Star, where he lived until within a few months of his death. He became a member of the Christian Church when quite a young man, and for over thirty years was pastor of the Christian church at Star, while during that time, for a number of years, he filled other appointments many miles from home, to which points he traveled in all kinds of weather, going through all the experiences of a pioneer preacher. A man of bright mind but little education, he spent all the time he could well spare from his farm labor, in reading and study. He became a fluent speaker, able to cope with men who had had greater advantages. His ministry was almost entirely a labor of love. For all the many years of his service he received very little remuneration, but he wished it so. He was ever zealous for his church and during the last few days of his declining strength his thoughts ever turned towards his church, and his oft expressed desire for its welfare and progress showed the interest he retained to the last. He was twice elected to the territorial legislature, each time holding the office of speaker. Deceased had been in feeble health for some time; on July 19 he was stricken with paralysis. On the evening of July 30 he was seized with heart failure and passed away in a few moments. Three sons and two daughters are left to mourn his death. The remains were interred at Star beside his wife. Services were conducted by Bro. Clay, of Boise.

HOLMES.

J. Q. Holmes was born Nov. 14, 1825, in Indiana, and died at South Haven, Kan., Sept. 25, 1901. Few men have given more time to religious work than he. Beginning at the early age of eighteen, he has given a long life devotedly to the cause of Christ. He was intensely missionary, and his only regret was that he could not do more in that direction. It was my pleasure to know him only in the declining years of his useful life. He leaves a wife, to whom he was married about the year 1893, who feels deeply the loss she has sustained in his death. He has four children by a former marriage, three daughters and one son, all of whom are members of and consecrated workers in the Christian church. The funeral services were conducted by the writer at the church in South Haven where he spent the last ten years of his life. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST was his constant companion, and he in return was its tried and true friend. P. H. GUY.

MOORE.

Nancy Martin Moore was born near Antioch, Ohio, May 7, 1837, died near Cowden, Ill., Sept. 5, 1901. Her maiden name was Nancy Huffman. She has been a member of the Christian Church since she was 16 years old. She was married Aug. 12, 1855, to Enoch Martin, who on May 12, 1885, preceded her to the grave. Of this union three sons were born, two of whom, S. M. and R. A. Martin (both preachers) are still living. She was married on April 9, 1890, to Z. Moore who still survives her. Her remains were laid to rest in the new cemetery at Cowden, Ill. Farewell, mother! We shall meet again. S. M. AND R. A. MARTIN.

SPEARS.

Mrs. Emily Spears was born in Crawford county, Ill., Feb. 15, 1823, moved to Orange county, Ind., 1839, was married to John D. Pinnick Nov., 1841. This union was blessed with five children, three of whom survive her. They moved to Sullivan county, Mo., where Mr. Pinnick died and then she, with her children, moved to Adams county, Ill. in 1866. In 1869 she married John Spears with whom she lived happily until her death which occurred Sept. 6, 1901. The writer conducted her funeral at her late home near Ursa, Ill., Sept. 8. Sister Spears was a devoted Christian lady. She loved God, Christ and the church. She loved humanity and was loved and respected by all who knew her. J. D. GREER.

WARFIELD.

John S. Warfield was born in Macoupin county, Ill., Jan. 20, 1852; was married to Miss Martina Varnier Oct. 5, 1880. To them were born three children, who with his faithful wife survive him. He fell asleep in Jesus August 31, 1901, and the writer conducted his funeral at the Christian church in Ursa, Ill., Sept. 2, 1901. Bro. Warfield became a Christian early in life and ever afterwards remained true to his Master. He was for many years an elder in the church at Marceline, Ill. May the God of all grace comfort his bereaved family and his friends, who are legion. J. D. GREER.

YALTON.

Eva Jordan was born in Marceline, Ill., Dec. 24, 1874, married Wesley Yalton, Sept.

19, 1895 and died Sept. 3, 1901, at her home in Kahoka, Mo. Her funeral was conducted in the Christian church Sept. 5 by the writer. Sister Yalton was one of the best loved women I have ever seen. She was one of our most faithful workers in the church, Sunday-school and Y. P. S. C. E. Young, buoyant and happy and with a readiness for every good work she was an inspiration to all in her faithfulness. As a wife, a friend, or Christian she had few equals and, I believe, no superiors. When she married and came to Kahoka she took bold of the work as if it had always been her home. We miss her very much and mourn with her beloved husband, Bro. Yalton, her untimely death. J. D. Book Notes.

We urge our friends and patrons to remember that the business of the Christian Publishing Company is by no means confined to the books which we ourselves publish, or to the works listed in our catalogues, or to those which we advertise, from time to time, in these columns. We do a general book business, and can supply, at the regular price, any book in print, no matter where or by whom published. We solicit correspondence regarding any desired volume. If you see, anywhere, an advertisement, review or notice of any book, and decide to purchase it, send your order to The Christian Publishing Company.

Christian Science-Dissected continues to enjoy an increasing popularity. Many persons, after buying and reading one copy, send to us for half a dozen copies to circulate among their friends. It is the best antidote for Eddyism yet discovered. Price 25 cents.

Thousands of our preachers will want The Witness of Jesus, the book containing Alexander Procter's sermons. Books of sermons are not so much read now as in past years, as a rule, but this is an exceptional book, and is proving an exception to the rule. Price $1.25.

The preacher who does not possess a copy of The Christian Worker is depriving himself of a valuable hand-book of helpful hints and suggestions, covering all the various phases of the preacher's work. Price $.75.

Can it be simply a coincidence, or is it a matter of cause and effect? We go over our books and note the names of preachers who are regular purchasers of books, and we fail to find the name of any man who is always hunting a new field, or who complains that he is being turned down for younger men!

Moses, the Man of God, is one of the best of D. R. Dungan's works. The career of Moses was most thrilling and wonderful, and the story of his life as told by Dr. Dungan will hold the interest of young and old. Cloth, illustrated, $1.00.

The Concise Church Record, price $1.00, is an excellent book of record for the church clerk. Still better is the Church Register and Record, which may fairly be called perfect. It makes easy the work of keeping church records. There are two sizes: 160 pages, $2.00; 300 pages (for large congregations), $3.50.

G. W. Longan has gone to his rest, but he still lives and labors through his really great book, Origin of the Disciples of Christ. If you have never read this work you owe it to yourself to do so immediately. Primarily this work was written as a reply to the book of the same title, by Prof. Whitsett, but in refuting the false statements of Whitsett, the author has given the true history of the origin of our movement. Price 50 cents.

Organic Evolution Considered, by Prof. Alfred A. Airhurst, is a work which opposes the Darwinian theory, and which gives in the strongest possible manner, the ablest arguments against organic evolution. It is highly endorsed by prominent scholars and thinkers, and should be read by all who have an interest in science. Cloth, 386 pages. Price, $1.50.

America or Rome; Christ or the Pope, by John L. Brandt, is not excelled by any book on Romanism ever published. The American who fails to fully inform himself concerning political Romanism is falling short of his duty as a citizen. Do you realize that there is only one thing that to-day prevents Rome from abolishing our public schools, our form of government, suppressing our free press and instituting the Inquisition, and that that one thing is lack of power? Do you know that every Romish priest dreams of the time when "the Church" will be strong enough to throw off her mask of toleration and throw all

All of the works of Alexander Campbell have a steady sale, both singly and in the complete set, but the volume that is most in demand is The Christian System. There are two reasons for this. In the first place, the book is a great masterpiece, written by the greatest religious thinker and leader of the nineteenth century, and it is naturally sought by men who wish to sit at the feet of the "Sage of Bethany." And then, too, the book is quite popular with the preachers of the Methodist Church. We are constantly filling orders that come from these M. E. brethren, and sending wholesale lots to their publishing houses. It has been hinted that the demand for this particular work, from this particular quarter, is the result of the perennial effort to prove that the Disciples of Christ have a definitely formulated creed, prepared by Mr. Campbell. We prefer, however to believe that the demand is but the result of a commendable desire, indicative of a broadness and liberality of mind, to know all truth and profit by all light, whence-ever it may come. A new edition of The Christian System is just ready. The price is now $1.00.

The nineteenth century, just ended, was the century of religious debates in America. Most notable of all these forensic controversies, beyond all question, was the memorable debate between John B. Purcell, archbishop of the Roman Church, and Alexander Campbell, a Disciple of Christ, which occurred at Cincinnati in the first half of the century. It was especially notable because unique. Never before or since has a representative of Rome met a champion of Protestantism in open, oral debate. There are probably none now living who were present at the discussion. Fortunately, however, the entire discussion was reported by shorthand and published in book form. Any one who desires may read every word spoken by both debaters, and we assure our patrons that it makes "mighty interestin' readin'." Cloth bound, red edges, 360 pages; price reduced to $1.00.

In the dawning light of the world's best century; on the heights of nearly two millenniums of Christian history; in the geographical center of the continent; on the highest plateau between Hudson's Bay and the Gulf of Mexico; in one of the most enlightened commonwealths of the Union; under the sheltering folds of the fairest and most potential flag that floats under the whole heaven; in the light of the best civilization the world has yet seen; inspired alike by the great achievements of the past and the brighter promise of the future, we meet in our first National and International Convention of the New Century.

WHAT WE STAND FOR

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth against superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

Popular Hymns No. 2

THE ruling purpose of the author has been to give to the public a worthy successor of Popular Hymns. He has not sought to duplicate it, but to make a book as well adapted to the new methods of Church, Sunday-school and C. E. work as the first was to the conditions twenty years ago when Popular Hymns was launched upon its long and useful career. Popular Hymns No. 2 is better than its predecessor, not because it contains better music, but because the music is better adapted to the present wants of all the working forces of the army of the Lord.

EVANGELISTS will find the Gospel Proclamation in Song a department of the book eminently suited to every phase of a successfully conducted revival.

CHORISTERS will find the average choir supplied with a rich selection of beautiful and impressive solos with choruses, duets, quartettes, invocations and doxologies specially selected for the distinctive part a choir is expected to take in the service.

PASTORS who are responsible for the kind of pasture upon which the sheep and lambs are fed, will NOT find a sentiment out of harmony with New Testament Christianity. He will find it a companion vade mecum for his pocket Testament, containing gems for public worship, for the prayer-meeting, for funeral occasions, for Baptismal, Thanksgiving and Convention services. He will find that an expensive hymnal will not be needed unless it be to keep in the style.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVORERS will find in Popular Hymns No. 2 all that they can wish, because it is full from back to back with soul-stirring sentiment set to soul-inspiring music, the only kind C. E.'s care to sing. The Solos, Duets, and Quartettes may be impressively used to enrich every session of the Society.

S. S. SUPERINTENDENTS who believe the Sunday-school should be the nursery of the church, the church at work saving the young, will find Popular Hymns No. 2 richly supplied with music within the voice compass and heart reach of the children, giving them a desire to remain and participate in the song service of the church. Like its predecessor,

A Second Tammany.

A representative of the Quay-Ashbridge Republican machine in Philadelphia has given this ingenuous and succinct exposition of the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth concerning the workings of practical politics in the City of Brotherly Love and municipal jobbery. "The organization in Philadelphia," says its official representative in this unusual burst of confidence, "occupies the same position to the people of this city as Tammany does to the people of New York. The cohesive power of the organization is the offices. There are ten thousand of them at the disposal of the organization. The Poles, Hungarians, Italians and other foreigners vote with us because we control the offices. They want favors and know that they cannot get them unless they stand in with the organization. That is why they vote with Tammany in New York." This is the naked truth, stripped of all veneer of political sophistry and pretense. It is not a question of public welfare or private honor, but just a matter of jobs. Public office is no longer a public trust; it finds a higher usefulness in furnishing "the cohesive power of the organization." But what need of further characterization? It is all said in the first sentence: The organization in Philadelphia occupies the same position as Tammany does in New York. Can the decent people of Philadelphia understand that?

The Episcopal Convention.

The triennial general convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States is now in session in San Francisco. The assembly is organized somewhat after the pattern of the national congress. The house of bishops meets behind closed doors, corresponding to the senate in executive session, while the lower house is composed of clerical and lay deputies elected from the several dioceses. About eighty bishops are assembled at San Francisco; the house of deputies, composed of four clergymen and four laymen from each diocese and two representatives from each missionary district, contains about five hundred and thirty members. The convention is a legislative assembly which of necessity cannot follow any fixed daily program. It continues until its work is done and the session usually consumes about three weeks. The most important matters for consideration at this session are: the adoption of the new constitution for the church which was drafted by the convention at Washington three years ago; a new law on marriage and divorce; a new name for the Church; the creation of an American Episcopal archbishopric; some changes in the judicial system of the Church, especially by the formation of a court of appeals; the extension of an American Episcopate over Porto Rico and the Philippines. On the subject of marriage and divorce the house of bishops has already taken action, prohibiting clergymen to marry persons who have been divorced for causes arising after the former marriage. This resolution has yet to pass the lower house. With regard to the name it is felt by many that the name "Protestant Episcopal" is too obviously sectarian to be consistent with their claim to be the Church, and substitutes, such as "the American Church," have been suggested. A joint committee of fifteen, composed of bishops, clergymen and laymen in equal numbers, has been appointed to report at the next convention on the question of changing the name.

"Lest We Forget."

Mr. Kipling, patriot and imperialist that he is, has joined the ranks of the critics who think that the British army is going to seed. The appointment of Sir Redvers Buller, of Tugela fame, and Sir Evelyn Wood to command army corps has been severely criticised from many quarters. "In spite of the pledges of the government," says Mr. Kipling in a letter to the Spectator, "the whole army machine is to be hauled back as soon as it may be to the old rules of impotence, pretense and collapse." Kipling's recent poem, "The Lesson," atrocious as it was as poetry, will be even more regrettable if it turns out that the lesson that "two and two makes four" has not yet been learned by the British army and those responsible for its management. The Spectator has been a faithful supporter of the government's war policy but it is now not only opposing the reappointment of Buller and Wood, but suggesting the recall of Kitchener. Everybody admits that Gen. Kitchener is a man of uncommon ability when it comes to hammering an enemy's force with massed battalions, but it is maintained, with a fair show of plausibility, that Kitchener's method is as ineffective against the wily and slippery Boers as a sledge-hammer would be for killing mosquitoes. It is also suggested that Lord Roberts be sent back to South Africa to finish the war again. Since he has been already honored, decorated and rewarded for ending the war, it would seem only fair to send him back to finish the job.

A Sign of Progress.

It is reported that physicians in a pest-house in Arizona have discovered that apple cider is a cure for small-pox. Country people, who do their own doctoring and rarely patronize an apothecary, knew the medicinal virtues of wild cherry long before the makers of patent medicine found them out, and it has not been unknown that both apples and cider possess some curative qualities and have the additional virtue of never killing even when they do not cure. Now the doctors have gone one better by finding in them a remedy for small-pox. Thus medical science goes forward by strides and the land of the big red apple gets another boom. But shall we without protest see plain sweet cider put up in little bottles labelled, Dr. Dusenberry's Invincible Oriental and Asiatic Small-pox Specific, one dollar per bottle? Hard fate for the honest apple. But there is no withstanding the advances of medical science. Hail to the new patent medicine!

The New Ameer.

The death of the Ameer of Afghanistan may entail some important consequences for Europe. The late Ameer was a man of remarkable personality and gave signal proof of his ability by sternly resisting the encroachments of Russia which would gladly make of Afghanistan a pathway into British India. Great Britain on the other hand is equally anxious to push back the Afghan border to head off this anticipated Russian advance. Thus located between the devil and the deep sea, the Ameer needed all his shrewdness to play his two enemies against each other and keep them both out of his borders, and it is questionable whether his successor will be strong enough to maintain the equilibrium of his state between the two rival and potentially hostile powers. Any considerable weakening of the Afghan government would probably be the signal for a dash at Herat, the key to the country, by both Russia and England. It is reported, indeed, that Russian troops have already been ordered to the frontier to be in readiness for any emergency or opportunity. Running south from the Trans-Caspian Railway, Russia has constructed a military railroad, which is not open to civilians or foreigners, which runs to within about forty miles of Herat. This road has no meaning except as the prophecy of a Russian invasion of Afghanistan at some convenient season. Whether or not this season shall prove convenient will depend chiefly on Habib Ullah Khan, who has been proclaimed Ameer as successor to his father. England already has on her hands more war than she can handle, and the Czar, during his recent conference with the Kaiser and visit to France, expressed strong hopes that the peace of Europe might not be broken for many years to come. But Afghanistan is very tempting. For England it means a buffer state to protect her Indian frontier; for Russia it means a means of attacking that same Indian frontier at some time and possibly winning the whole Indian empire. Much depends on the new Ameer. There are many kings in Europe who are less potent factors in the preservation of European peace at present than this young pagan ruler of an Asiatic principality.

Canada's Census. It was undoubtedly disappointing to those who are most interested in the development of Canada to find by the report of the recent census that the present population of the Dominion is only 5,338,883. It had been estimated that the returns would show at least 6,000,000. During the past decade, strenuous efforts have been put forth to direct the flow of European emigration to Canada, whose broad fields and undeveloped resources, especially in the Northwest, await only tillage and development to make them richly productive. A gain of only 505,644 in ten years, or less than ten per cent., is rather slow growth. But Canada can at least congratulate herself upon the character of her immigrants. Those who go to British colonies are for the most part British, and they are a staunch and sturdy race, whether Saxon or Celt. Canada is flooded with no such deluge of delinquents, defectives, dependents and degenerates as Poland, Hungary, Bohemia and Southern Italy pour upon us. Canada and the United States have each a different immigration problem: With us it is a problem of selection and exclusion, with them it is a question of encouragement and increase.

A Sea Tragedy. The news comes from Hong Kong that there has been found on Bikar Island, a small uninhabited atoll in the Pacific ocean, wreckage and other evidence proving that the British ship Manchester came to grief there, and that the ship's company perished of thirst. There is no water on Bikar, and those of the crew of the ship who managed to reach the land after the wrecking of the ship found they had escaped death in one form only to find it in a worse form. There are a few small trees and shrubs on the island, and these were discovered gnawed and torn by human teeth, in the frantic search for moisture. No bodies were found and it is conjectured that, crazed with thirst, the survivors finally set forth in a small boat to find some other island, and perished before sighting land or being picked up. Altogether the story reads like a chapter from one of the sea stories of W. Clark Russell.

A Doctor's Error. General statements about the ineffectiveness of prohibitory laws, statements of the "prohibition-doesn't-prohibit" sort, are so obviously fallacious that every intelligent person knows how to answer them. Few, if any, laws against crime succeed in rooting out entirely the evils at which they are aimed. The question is, Do they reduce the evil? But occasionally a critic tries to show by garbled statistics that such laws do not even lessen the evils which they try to restrict, and it is a pleasure to see such critics brought to book as positively as the Chicago Record-Herald rebukes the London Lancet in the following editorial utterance:

The London Lancet is a medical publication of the highest standing, and it is to be presumed that Dr. Reid, who is one of its editors, ranks well in his profession, but his advice, "let natural law solve the question of alcoholism," is bosh, his assertion that coercive legislation swells the tide of inebriety is mere assertion and his statistics of drunkenness are absurd.

Fifty years ago Sweden had a natural law, with the result that there was "a public house in every cottage" and pretty much every large landholder was a distiller. The ravages of drunkenness were so frightful that the whole country was aroused to take measures for national defense against the scourge, and under the restrictions of the Gothenburg system and of prohibition there has been a tremendous change for the better.

This modern instance, like many an older one which carries us back to the license of drunken savage and half-savage, proves the absolute necessity for some restraint upon the liquor traffic, so that today the only remaining problem is, "how far shall the restraint be carried?" Dr. Reid with his theory of natural law inclines, of course, to the least possible restriction, and it is in this connection that he introduces his curious statistics. Portland, a prohibition town, has forty-two drunkards to the 1,000 inhabitants. New York, Chicago and London, which are without prohibition, have respectively twenty-three, thirteen and seven to the 1,000.

How, we should like to know, has this count been kept? There is no complete enumeration of drunkards anywhere, and certainly there cannot be in New York, Chicago and London. Secretary Charles Smith, of the Kent County Temperance Federation, who replied to Dr. Reid at the meeting of the Society for the Study of Inebriety, said that the magistrates of London agreed that not one drunkard in ten was ever arrested in that city, and this is perfectly credible. London actually swarms with drunkards to an extent that shocks a person from Chicago, and there is no doubt that it is cursed by its public houses and taprooms. To hold up the British capital as a model of sobriety is to fly in the face of the most notorious facts.

Furthermore, all Great Britain is suffering from the want of more stringent checks upon the sale of liquor. The traffic is a national curse, as it was in Sweden, a curse that is helped along by the customs of society, the power of vested interests, which oppose restrictions for business reasons, and the usual incapacity of drunkards for self-help. That is why a great crusade has just been started in the country against the drink evil, and we may add that this crusade deserves the special sympathy of physicians who should understand above all other people how little of benefit there is in alcohol for the human race, how much of injury, distress and ruin.

Brevities.

The monks of La Grande Chartreuse, dwelling in the famous monastery near Grenoble, France, are likely to be disbanded or exiled by the application of the recent law against religious associations. It is by these Carthusian monks that the liqueur is made which bears the name of their monastery, and to put them out will be a blow to what is considered an important business interest. It would be a great thing for France if she could get the whole liquor business into the hands of the monks—and exile the monks.

Speaking of our new President and his attitude toward the Boers, Harper's Weekly says: "The report from Brussels that President Kruger has decided to send a special mission to President Roosevelt, though probably untrue, recalls to mind that two years ago, when Colonel Roosevelt was not considered so eminent a specialist in discretion as he has since become, his friends proudly certified as proof of his capacity for prudence that no man knew his views about the Boer war. It does not seem likely that Mr. Kruger's emissaries, if they come, will learn anything more on that subject than other persons have learned."

It is hard to imagine more water power coming through one plant than there is at Niagara. In the nature of the case probably only a small per cent. of Niagara's power can ever be utilized. The power station recently opened at Massena, N. Y., on the St. Lawrence River, is said to develop more power than the plant now in operation at Niagara. 75,000 horse-power are counted upon at a charge of $13 per hour per horse-power, which is scarcely more than half of the price for Niagara power. A canal three miles long has been dug, turning from the St. Lawrence River a stream 25 feet deep and 265 feet wide. With both of these wonderful power supplies in a single state it would seem that New York ought soon to be beyond the necessity of producing power by combustion.

President Roosevelt is reported as having said, very recently, when a delegation came to urge him to appoint to a high office a man of notoriously bad morals, though of wealth and undoubted ability: "I am going to select the very best men for public positions. Men appointed to high public places must be high in morals and many other respects. If the American people care to show their approval of my course during the three and one-half years that I have to serve, by placing me at the head of the Republican ticket in 1904, I shall feel deeply grateful. It would be an honor that it would be difficult for any man to decline. But if I have to pander to any cliques, combinations or movements for their approval, I would not give the snap of my finger for it, under such circumstances. My endorsement must come from the people of the country." The President did not say this in public, where there might be a suspicion that it was a "grandstand play," but in private, without the thought that it would ever be published. He means it. We predict that the American people will give an enthusiastic endorsement to the man who fearlessly carries out such a policy as that proclaimed by President Roosevelt.

The mayoralty fight in New York City between Low and Shepard is growing exceedingly warm, with the chances, so declare the best political prophets, in favor of the election of Seth Low and the defeat of Tammany and Croker. 'Tis a consummation devoutly to be wished, truly. Croker has such a hold on New York, a grip such as the devil-fish takes on his victim, that if he is shaken off it will be an occasion for bonfires, illuminations and general rejoicing. Croker and his gang have been beaten before, but the trouble is that they do not stay beaten. Every now and then, when conditions become so outrageous as to arouse even the slumbering conscience of the average good citizen, the average good citizen arises in his might and casts out the devils. Then he rubs his hands, hurrahs that evil is finally and forever overthrown, and goes back to his business. Next election he is slumbering again, while the devils, who have been working every minute since their defeat, are all on hand and the result is that the good done previously is overcome, and the old gang is back in power again, to continue in control until, once more, conditions become bad enough to wake up the respectable citizen. So things go around in a circle. What New York and every other American city needs, is a kind of good citizenship that is everlastingly awake and on the alert.

The Latest from Minneapolis.

Special dispatch to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

Minneapolis, Minn., Oct. 14. If there were any who doubted the wisdom of holding our National Convention so far to the North as Minneapolis, fearing that the people would not journey so far to attend, their doubts are now at rest. Our first Convention in the great Northwest is a complete and demonstrated success. From the East and the West and the South the delegates have gathered, and we are here in force. Vast audiences convene in the large auditorium of the Exposition Building at each service, and much enthusiasm marks each gathering.

The Foreign Christian Missionary Society and the American Christian Missionary Society have held their general board meetings, and heard reports of the work of the year. These reports have given general satisfaction. Much ground has been gained, and all our lines seem to be advancing on the works of the enemy.

The Saturday evening session was devoted to Christian Endeavor. There was a vast outpouring, not only of visiting delegates, but of local Endeavor unions. The annual report of Secretary Pounds, read at this meeting, showed substantial gains for the year in the number of societies organized and work done. The meeting was addressed by John Willis Baer, of Boston, general secretary of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, and by J. H. Garrison, of St. Louis, editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. The audience was enthusiastic, and it was a glorious meeting.

On Sunday the pulpits of Minneapolis and St. Paul were turned over to the preachers attending the Convention. The weather was quite inclement and unpropitious, but lowering skies and cold, drizzling rain did not prevent large audiences greeting our preachers in most of the Protestant churches of the Twin Cities.

At 3 o'clock, Sunday afternoon, was held the great communion service in the Exposition Hall. Nearly four thousand persons were present and participated in a most impressive service. The service was under the direction of Rev. C. J. Tanner and Rev. A. D. Harmon, of the Minneapolis and St. Paul Christian Churches, respectively. J. Walter Wilson, of Indianapolis, led the music, C. L. Loos and E. J. Lampton conducted the devotional exercises, and Dr. A. B. Philpott, of Indianapolis, made an address on "The Table of His Memory." At the close of the service there was taken a collection which added $500 to the Ministerial Relief Fund.

To-day the Foreign Christian Missionary Society holds its sessions. Among those who will prominently participate are C. L. Lockhart, E. E. Faris, F. G. Tyrrell, W. B. Warren, Dr. Susie Rijnhart and H. L. Willett.

From present indications it appears that Omaha will secure the Convention for 1902. There is general consent, apparently, that in 1903 the gatherings will be held in St. Louis, and that there will be a World's Convention of Disciples in connection with the World's Fair.

The sessions of the Convention will continue until Thursday. Wednesday afternoon is to be devoted to college reunions, receptions, social gatherings and sight-seeing. The delegates are being most hospitably entertained, and those present are sorry for those who did not come.

The Minneapolis Convention.

We are at this writing only in the beginning of one of the greatest conventions in our history. It is in some respects a unique convention. The delegations are still arriving as we pen these lines. The gates of the city are thrown wide open to receive the convention. The energetic and enterprising local committee has succeeded in interesting the press of the city, all the churches and the citizens generally. Hotels and street cars are crowded with good looking men and women wearing the badges of delegates. Each incoming train that arrives adds to the magnitude of the gathering.

The Christian-Evangelist Special.

Our special train on the Burlington left St. Louis at 2:05 P. M. Wednesday, and reached Minneapolis about 11 A. M. the next day, being two and a half hours behind schedule time. None of us complained of this delay, as it gave us opportunity of seeing more of the scenery along the upper Mississippi than we would have had otherwise. And such scenery! The magic hand of Nature's special artist, the Frost, had done its best to glorify the forests as if to prepare them for our coming. How the hard maples, the hickory, the oak and the lowlier sumach, flamed in crimson and gold in the morning sunlight! There was little singing along the way by the delegates, as all were too busy admiring the beautiful lakes and the many-colored trees to indulge in music. As we passed Canton, Mo., the students of Christian University came to the train in a body and greeted us with their college yell: "Boom-a-raka, boom-a-raka, boom-a-raka-ree! Rip-a-zippa, rip-a-zippa! Who are we? C. U. C. U. Don't you see? Christian Universtee!" They recited this in chorus for us several times, while the train made its usual stop.

Arriving at Minneapolis.

At 11 A. M. the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST special landed about 75 delegates at the convention city, where we were met by white caps who directed us whither we desired to go. Those who had engaged hotel rooms beforehand were fortunate. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST representatives reached the exposition building on the western side of the river about noon and devoted the afternoon to fitting up headquarters for the Christian Publishing Co.

in one of the many booths outside the hall proper. With white and yellow muslin, numerous flags, an abundant supply of autumn leaves, a picture of the martyred President, some cheap matting for the floor, and tables for books and papers, and chairs for visitors, we soon had a very respectable headquarters which is proving very popular. Other publishing companies have done the same, and so have the colleges. Many of the leading states have fitted up state headquarters very tastily, and the state delegations meet in these places to take counsel together on any matter that needs their attention. This is one of the unique features of the convention to which we referred in the beginning. It is really a religious exposition. Among the most handsomely-fitted up state headquarters is Nebraska, and that enterprising state has a large and enthusiastic delegation here headed by Sumner T. Martin, working for Omaha as the place of the next national convention. At present it has no competitor, and if one develops it will have a hard task to defeat the Nebraskan metropolis.

The Opening Guns.

Thursday evening was devoted to addresses of welcome and responses, Mrs. A. M. Atkinson presiding. Hon. A. T. Ankeny gave a welcome in behalf of the Minnesota churches. He called attention to the great events which had been associated with the beginning and close of the centuries, and thought it not improbable that we were on the eve of great events. S. H. Hall, Chairman Public Affairs Committee of the Commercial Club, welcomed us to the city. Faith was alike the basis of religion and business. Neither could get on without it. Gov. Van Sant welcomed us in behalf of the great state of Minnesota, whose praises he sang. He told of her wheat and butter products and said she had earned the title of "Bread and Butter" state. We needed "more Christianity and less creeds." He knew about Alexander Campbell and admired him because he was a "good fighter," and good fighters were needed in religion as well as elsewhere. A. McLean, president of the Foreign Society, read a happy response from Gen. Drake, who was unable to be present. Bro. McLean also reminded the people that this ground on which we were gathered was missionary ground, the site having been fixed by foreign missionaries. The infidel's boast that Christ should never cross the Mississippi River had proved idle. B. L. Smith, corresponding secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society, told the story of one who, having heard Jamestown praised so much, prayed that he might go to heaven if possible, but if not he begged that he might be permitted at least to go to Jamestown! He thought some of us might be willing, after hearing what we had, to compromise on Minneapolis. He reminded the people that the absence of titles from the names of men on the program did not argue the absence of men of ability and scholarship. We were a simple people and take not much to titles.

There was a great audience present for this introductory evening, and the speeches were all bright and breezy. The music, led by J. Walter Wilson, was inspiring. Every one felt that our first convention in the great Northwest had had a most auspicious beginning. The weather has not been cold so far and many heavy wraps are not yet needed. The real business of the convention now begins.

The C. W. B. M. Sessions.

The sessions of the C. W. B. M. occupied Friday and Saturday, the first two days of the convention, during which time reports and addresses alternated in such a manner that the laying of definite plans for future work and the generation of enthusiasm for carrying them out were mingled in the convention as they must be in the work. Among the inspirational addresses exalting the work of missions in general and the part which women have played and can play in missionary work, were the addresses of Mrs. David Owen Thomas, Prof. L. W. Fairfield, Miss Rose N. Wood-Allen, Mrs. A. M. Haggard, C. C. Smith, Mrs. Anna Atwater, and others. Mr. Ernest Wiles, who recently received his A. M. degree at the University of Michigan, and is now assisting Prof. Coler in the Bible chair, spoke on "University Bible Work from the Student's View-Point"; and Miss Rebel Withers, who has had exceptional opportunities for seeing the home and family life of the British nobility, told of the good work that is being done in the cause of missions, temperance and Bible study by some of the titled women of England.

It was much regretted that illness prevented Dr. Susie C. Rijnhart from making the address which was announced for Saturday morning. Mrs. Rijnhart, as a missionary for four years in Thibet, has had experiences which are rare even in the heroic field of modern missions. The Foreign Society is to be congratulated on having secured her services. She will be sent back to Thibet as soon as a suitable man and wife can be secured to accompany her. The convention, however, hopes still to have an opportunity of hearing Dr. Rijnhart before its adjournment.

These inspiring addresses are in keeping with the character of the convention as a great popular mass meeting. Enthusiasm is as essential to the convention as business. But the business is essential too, for the C. W. B. M. is pre-eminently an association for doing things. Even dry figures and statistics become eloquent when lit up by such devotion and enthusiasm.

The motto of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions for the year was a brave one: "Missionary education for the world's evangelization; twenty thousand readers of the Tidings; twenty hundred auxiliaries for the twentieth century." At the close of the year's work the number of auxiliaries reported is 1,796, a gain of 64 auxiliaries for the year, and 11,924 subscribers for the Tidings. In these two respects the Board did not reach the goal which had been set. The total receipts for the year were $135,441.58, showing a gain for the year of $28,711.82. As the mark had been set for a gain of twenty thousand dollars, it will be seen that, as regards finances, the women did even more than they had planned to do. Here is a proof and an illustration that it is easier to get money than to get devoted men and women, easier to give money than to give self.

The C. W. B. M. at present occupies the following foreign fields: Jamaica, with 21 stations and 18 missionaries; India, 6 stations and 35 workers; Mexico, one station, one out-station and 7 missionaries; Porto Rico, an orphanage and 2 workers. In the home field the C. W. B. M. supports 106 workers located in 28 states. The whole number of C. W. B. M. missionaries in all fields is 167.

The local societies which are auxiliary to the Board and are carrying forward this work are planted in 40 states and territories and in three foreign countries. Ohio is the leading state both in total membership and in the amount contributed, having given $18,692.48 during the past fiscal year. Kentucky ranks second, with $17,261.73; Indiana, third; Missouri, fourth; Pennsylvania, fifth; Iowa, sixth.

To Michigan, however, belongs the honor of having the largest number of members of C. W. B. M. auxiliaries in proportion to the church membership of the state. We are not numerically strong in Michigan, but that our members there are the right sort is evidenced by the fact that the C. W. B. M. membership is equal to ten per cent. of the church membership. In Ohio, Illinois and Missouri the proportion is from two to four per cent. Michigan's remarkable record may be partly accounted for by Miss Lura V. Thompson's work in that state as an organizer during the past year.

The work projected for the coming year is one of enlargement and strengthening of what is in hand, rather than of entering new fields or planting new stations. The only new station now planned for this year is the one which will be located and supported by the Ohio auxiliaries in Hamirpur Province, India. The Mahoba station, the only one which we have in that province, is in the extreme southern part of the district, and the new station in the northern part is much needed. Bro. E. C. Davis and wife will go out to establish this station as soon as the necessary funds can be provided—probably early next fall. Bro. Davis is a graduate of Hiram College, and has in him the stuff of which missionaries are made.

A commendable feature of the plans for the new year is that many states are centralizing their special gifts for a specific object. Besides Ohio's new mission in Hamirpur, Indiana will support Miss Tonetta Vance, Iowa Miss Bertha Mills, Missouri Miss Mattie Burgess, all in India, and Illinois will devote her special gifts to city evangelization in Chicago. This special work will be done in addition to the regular contributions to the general work of the C. W. B. M.

The following general officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, Mrs. O. A. Burgess; Vice-President, Mrs. A. M. Atkinson; Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. Helen E. Moses; Recording Secretary, Mrs. Anna B. Gray; Treasurer, Mrs. Mary A. Judson; Superintendent of Young People's Work, Miss Mattie Pounds.

Merely Superficial.

The missionary convention did not have Minneapolis all to itself. A football game between the state universities of Minnesota and Nebraska filled the city with a noisy, beribboned contingent of football rooters from Lincoln and an equally noisy and more numerous body of rooters from the local institution. As makers of din, they were all right.

The governor of Minnesota, in his address of welcome, exhibited the unction and fervor of a Methodist class-leader.

When the governor told us we were welcome, we had to believe it.

The number of white heads and white beards in the convention was surprisingly and painfully small. There were only Bros. Chas. Louis Loos, B. B. Tyler, W. T. Moore, F. D. Power and a few more of the prematurely gray who have put on the white roses while yet in their prime.

We had a Midway. It was in the vast corridors surrounding the convention hall, and the side-shows were booths representing our various colleges, publishing houses, state missionary boards, and other interests. It cost nothing to get into these shows but sometimes it cost money to get out.

There is more cordial fellowship at a convention between brethren who differ in matters of policy or interpretation, than one might be led to expect by reading some of our papers. The men with the trenchant quills often become all smiles and handshakes when they meet their controversial antagonists face to face. The vitriol is in the ink-pot rather than in the man.

It was a cosmopolitan convention. Three delegates came together almost at the same moment and recalled that the last time any of the three had seen any of the others was at Constantinople, where the same three had enjoyed a former chance meeting.

Bro. G. L. Snively had charge of a prominent booth in our Midway, representing the work of our national benevolent association. It was strategically located where no one could get past it without seeing—and those who saw were conquered. Several of the ladies who are interested in this work, Mrs. E. B. Redd, Mrs. L. G. Bantz, Mrs. Hansbrough and others, were also faithful in their attendance at the booth and in giving all possible publicity to the B. A. C. C.

A traveler claims to have followed ten thousand soldiers into St. Peter's Cathedral at Rome and then lost them in the vast interior. We do not say the same, literally, of the Exposition Hall, but for practical convention purposes it is limitless. Yet it has never seemed empty while the convention has been in session.

Alexander Procter was present at the convention in his sermons, the newly published volume entitled "The Witness of Jesus." As our greatest conventions used to delight to listen to his words, so now many young preachers have taken the opportunity of becoming acquainted with him through his printed sermons and those who knew him have expressed great satisfaction at seeing this ripest fruit of his powers put into permanent form for preservation, re-reading and reference.

Omaha wants the convention in 1902, and the delegation charged with the Omaha campaign is showing almost as much zeal and enterprise in bidding for the next convention as the Minneapolis committee showed in preparing for the entertainment of this one.

St. Louis ought to have no difficulty in securing the convention for 1903. This location will put us in a position to engage vigorously and effectively in whatever co-operative Christian demonstration is planned in connection with the Louisiana Purchase Exposition.

It is rumored that the Pacific coast will be in the field asking for the honor of entertaining the national convention within two or three years. Why not? It is a long way from our center of gravity; but, a Californian might answer, the very best is always a long way from the average. Besides, the coast has entertained successful and well attended national or international conventions of the Y. P. S. C. E., the Epworth League and the Protestant Episcopal Church.

At no previous convention has so generous an allotment of space been given to our publishing houses to show their goods. Our publishers do not ask to divide time with the missionary societies on the floor of the convention, but they know the importance of their work in the progress of a religious people, and like to have the same recognized by affording them facilities for doing their work.

W. H. Waggoner's vast, hand painted missionary maps are in evidence here, there and everywhere, and they furnish a vivid presentation of much information about missionary fields and forces.

Notes and Comments.

A contemporary of another "persuasion" is quoted as saying that its observation has led it to believe that "the growth of the reformation has been chiefly under the brethren of radical views." That depends on what is meant by "radical views." If to believe in the principles of the reformation which we plead heartily and thoroughly is to hold "radical views," as it probably would be considered by the contemporary quoted, then its observation is quite correct. But with us who are in the reformation, this holding steadfastly to the simple gospel of Jesus Christ, as preached and practiced by the apostles, and the practicability of Christian unity on that basis, is not "radical," but normal, natural, Christian. Those whom we regard as "radical" or extremists are not the men who to-day are doing most to build up the reformation. Much of their work has to be done over, and it is much harder to do it than if they had never touched it. Very few churches, seeking a pastor, want one holding "radical views," as we understand the phrase. They want well-balanced, level-headed men who can preach a full-orbed gospel, and preach it loyally and lovingly.

The report of the acting board of managers of the American Christian Missionary Society for the year ending Oct. 1, is a pamphlet of eighty-eight pages, containing information concerning our various missions and missionaries, with a full report of work done and of moneys received. It is copiously illustrated, containing pictures of the various home missionaries and others of our prominent men. It is really a compendium of a great deal of very useful information relating to the progress of our cause in the United States, and a copy of it should be secured and carefully studied by every one who is interested in the great work that is being carried on by this mother missionary society. The receipts of the society during the year past have been $91,716.68. Compared with last year this shows a gain of $28,089.38. The real gain is larger even than this, considering that the moneys given to the board of negro education and evangelization, which were credited to the Society last year, go this year to the C. W. B. M. This is a creditable advance, though it must not be supposed for a moment that we have reached, even approximately, the limits of our ability in this direction.

The Lutheran Church observes what it terms Reformation Day, which is Oct. 31. It was on that morning in the year 1517 that Luther nailed his ninety-five theses to the door of the Old Castle church in Wittenberg. St. Mark's Messenger, issued by the St. Mark's Lutheran Evangelical church of this city, referring to this fact, says:

This day also commemorates the beginning of our beloved Lutheran Church, the first, the most honored and the largest numerically in Christendom. Its claim to be is unquestioned. Its history is a noble testimony to the truth of the gospel. Its great distinction, justification by faith alone, is held by all truly orthodox churches, but it marks the Lutheran Church in a sense different from all others. Under God Luther recovered it; the church was born with this mark of distinction upon it, and the claim is legitimate. Moreover, it is the clear mission of the Lutheran Church to emphasize this truth, and the need was never greater than now.

This claim to be "the first" and numerically the largest body in Christendom must refer to Protestant Christendom. It also takes count of the state churches of Germany, Norway and Sweden, where the entire population is included. Many of the things for which Luther contended have been lost sight of by a majority of those calling themselves Lutherans. Even the great doctrine of justification by faith has received an interpretation which Luther probably never thought of and which certainly is not to be found in the teaching of Paul. There is, indeed, great need of emphasizing that view of faith which affects the life and conduct, and which involves obedience to Christ in spirit, as well as in outward form.

Editor's Easy Chair.

This might be called Minneapolis Musings, if it were not for the absurdity of the idea of one's having time to muse in a city like this, with a great National Convention in progress. There is altogether too much hurry and bustle, too many board and committee meetings, and too many greetings from old friends, and meeting new ones. And yet it is a place to muse if one had time. What mighty progress in the material development of the nation do these twin cities represent! When the writer was a boy these great cities, representing at present a population of nearly 400,000, were little more than outposts in a wilderness. The men and women are still living who were pioneers in this vicinity. Fort Snelling no longer guards a few hardy pioneers against the invasions of the savages. The wigwam of the Indian and the cabin of the early backwoods man, have given place to stately cities, and to all that appertains to a high grade of civilization. This is the American spirit, dauntless, daring, progressive and aggressive!

The Mississippi river, which we cross to and fro from our hotel to the Exposition Hall on a bridge which spans it above St. Anthony Falls, is a small stream compared with the lordly current of the same river at St. Louis, but we are now in the state which is the mother of the "Father of Waters." This high plateau—the highest between Hudson's bay and the Gulf of Mexico—is a water-shed whence flow three great river systems in different directions. The greatest of these is the mighty Mississippi. What changes have taken place along its shores since the date of the Louisiana Purchase! How much history has been made! The St. Louis Exposition in 1903 will illustrate these changes. The hotel in which we are stopping is within the limits of the Louisiana Purchase, but the Exposition Building, being on the east side of the river, is not within the Purchase. But no doubt the whole state will be represented in the great World's Fair of 1903. It is justly proud of its history and progress.

About thirty years ago the writer held a meeting in a small infidel town in Illinois. Among the persons baptized was a prominent young citizen of the town, who had also been a skeptic. To-day this same man, now one of the substantial citizens of Minneapolis, and a pillar in the church here, entertained myself and wife at dinner at the Commercial Club in the city. He remembers more about that meeting, and the sermons preached by the young preacher, than the preacher does. During all these three decades he has stood steadfastly by his Christian colors, and rejoices to-day in that turning point of his life which means so much for him. The young preacher, full of fear and trembling, preaching the gospel in a nest of infidels where no church had ever been established, builded much better than he knew when he baptized B. H. Morgan, on a confession of his faith in Jesus Christ. No man knows how much good he is accomplishing when he is preaching Christ's gospel and persuading sinners to turn to God. Mrs. Morgan is an active worker in the C. W. B. M., and the ladies of that organization are to have a reception in their residence during the convention.

It is gratifying to see the number of hoary heads present in the Convention. There may be something pathetic in the fact of their growing old, but there is something sublime in growing old in the service of God. There is nothing that adds more dignity to a great missionary convention than a liberal representation of gray hairs. These venerable men, aye and women, too, have borne the burden and the heat of the day and of the conflict. Their memory carries them back to the time when we were a feeble folk, and the hands of stronger religious bodies were lifted against them. They stood by the cause when it was feeble in material wealth and numbers, and now that it has grown strong and conquered the respect of Christendom how it must thrill their hearts to be in a great convention like this, and witness the growth, the increase in missionary work, and the lofty enthusiasm of the multitudes! God bless our living pioneers, present and absent, and make their closing days bright with his presence and peace!

The Foreign Christian Missionary Society

TWENTY-SIXTH ANNUAL REPORT

Survey of the Fields.

India.—Much time was given to famine relief. The missionaries were entrusted with the distribution of funds by the government, by the English Baptist Society, by the Christian Herald, and by the brethren in Australia and America. As the end of the famine approached they gave out seed corn, clothing, money and animals. They sought to help the people to begin life anew. Hundreds of boys were gathered into the orphanages. These are being trained for lives of usefulness and nobleness. The sick are healed. The gospel was preached in the stations and out-stations and in hundreds of towns and villages in the regions beyond. As a result of the relief given in the time of famine great numbers are inquiring concerning the gospel. The number added is larger than in any previous year.

China.—During the Boxer excitement the workers in China deemed it prudent to retire to Shanghai or to Japan. In their absence the Viceroy of Nankin protected the property. In their enforced absence they were not idle. They preached much to the soldiers and sailors and natives. They translated a number of books into Chinese. They have all been back at work for several months. All departments of work have been resumed. The officials and people are unusually cordial, and the outlook is brighter than ever before.

Japan.—In Japan the work has proceeded without any interruption. There are open doors on all sides. There are more invitations than the workers can accept. Japan is now enjoying a season of revival. Thousands are turning to the Lord. One of the missionaries has spent most of the year in evangelistic work. He has traveled all over the empire. The other members of the mission have preached and taught in their own fields and in the adjacent country.

Africa.—Frank T. Lea and wife have removed from Angola to Bolengi, on the Congo. They are now associated with Dr. and Mrs. Dye. Dr. and Mrs. Edwin A. Layton were sent out early in the year. At Bolengi the gospel has been preached. Medical work has been carried on among the natives, the state officials, traders and other missionaries. A school has been opened and children have been brought in and taught.

Scandinavia.—The church in Copenhagen has celebrated its silver jubilee. It is now twenty-five years since Dr. Holck began his work in that city. In Sweden work is carried on at two points. "Our Position" has been translated into Swedish and has been instrumental in winning souls. In Norway E. W. Pease reports that Plymouthism has made serious inroads into the churches. Some of the members have been drawn away by it. He is doing all in his power to instruct the members in all that pertains to life and godliness. At the same time he has sought to set in order the things that are wanting.

England.—In England the churches have raised handsome sums for self-support and for missions. They have done better in raising money than in increasing their membership. There have been about as many baptisms as usual, but owing to a revision of the rolls, there has been a loss in the total membership reported. It is said that some of those whose names have been dropped have gone elsewhere and are doing good work. Though lost to the local churches they are not lost to the cause of Christ.

Turkey.—For some time the work in Turkey has not been satisfactory. One of two courses seems to be open to the society; either to send a number of Americans to take the oversight of the churches and to spend many thousands for the support of the schools, or to withdraw entirely. As there are no men ready to go to Turkey, and as the treasury does not warrant the necessary increase of funds for that field, and as the Turkish field is limited and pre-occupied, the executive committee has decided to recommend that the foreign society withdraw from that field as soon as it can do so consistently with all the interests and rights at present involved.

Our New Possessions.—In Cuba the gospel has been preached in English and Spanish. Sunday-schools and day schools have been taught. Much work has been done among the American soldiers. The missionaries have devoted much time to the study of the language. Havana is an expensive field. Prices are much higher there than they are in America. Havana is a cosmopolitan city. At the services in the chapel are seen English, Germans, Americans, Swiss, Russians, Italians, Mexicans, Boers, Cubans and Spaniards. A. E. Cory and wife have been busy in Honolulu. In one section of that city a new work has been begun. That station bears the honored name of Lathrop Cooley. It was through his munificence that the work was inaugurated and has been sustained in the Hawaiian Islands. Our missionaries have come in contact with Hawaiians, Portuguese, Chinese, Japanese, Americans and families of mixed blood. Sunday-schools and night schools have been taught. Work has been begun in the Philippines. The last report showed that Lathrop Cooley had given $5,000 for that field. Later on a friend of the society offered to give $1,500 a year for five years and $500 for traveling expenses in case a family was sent to Manila without delay. Within a month W. H. Hanna and wife were on their way to that field. Chaplain Hermon P. Williams and wife are under appointment and will leave for Manila within a few days.

The Missionary Force.

No one of the missionaries has fallen in the year. The only case of death has been that of little Hugh, the youngest child of Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Molland, of Wuhu, China. Eight new missionaries have been sent out: W. H. Hanna and wife to the Philippines, Dr. Edwin A. Layton and wife to Bolengi, Africa, O. J. Grainger to Hurda, India, Miss Maud Plunkett to Damoh, India, Miss Nellie Daugherty to Nankin, China, Miss Jessie Asbury to Akita, Japan, and Mrs. F. E. Stubbin to Damoh, India. The following missionaries have returned to their work: F. E. Meigs and family, James Ware and family, and Miss Emma Lyon to China; Miss Josepha Franklin to India; and Miss Kate Johnson to Japan. Some changes have been made in the location of the missionaries. Thus, Frank T. Lea and wife have been removed from Angola to Bolengi, Africa; Frank Garrett and family have removed from Nankin to Luhoh, China; A. E. Cory and family have removed from Honolulu to Shanghai; C. S. Weaver and wife have removed from Tokio, Japan, to Osaka. A. L. Chapman and wife resigned and left Turkey on the 4th of July. M. D. Adams and wife have come home on a furlough. It is eight years since they were at home last. They have now completed their second term of service. Dr. Susie C. Rijnhart has been appointed to Tibet. She will go as soon as a suitable man and wife can be found to go with her.

The Work of the Missionaries.

The missionaries have made it their chief business to preach the gospel far and near. They sow beside all waters. In addition to the preaching 50,000 patients have been treated in the hospitals and dispensaries. Every patient hears the gospel preached; he receives a gospel or a tract. He carries back to his own home some of the knowledge that he receives while a patient. The medical work does much to open the hearts and homes of the people. It paves the way for the acceptance of the truth. Thousands of children are taught in the day schools and in the Sunday-schools. In these schools many will be trained who will serve in after years as evangelists, teachers, colporteurs and Bible women. The Government Inspector says that the school in Damoh is the best he has seen in forty years. Many thousands of copies of the Scriptures or portions of the same have been distributed. Some of these have been carried for hundreds of miles. The word of God is the incorruptible seed of the kingdom, and only He can foretell what a harvest it will yield in after years.

Buildings and Land.

In Damoh, India, a bungalow is being built for John G. McGavran and family. This will cost when completed about $2,500. Money has been granted for various school buildings near Damoh. One school building has been erected at Handia, on the Nabada river; another has been erected near Bilaspur. M. D. Adams reports a chapel built in Bilaspur that cost $5,000. This building was erected with money sent for famine relief, and did not cost the society anything. It is a beautiful building and a great addition to the mission. It is the first church erected in Bilaspur. The government commissioner says it would be an ornament to any place. A home is in course of erection for James Ware at Shanghai, China. This will cost, when completed, about $3,000. A building and lot were bought in Luhoh, China, for $1,500. This will be a home for Frank Garrett and family. A hospital is in course of construction at Lu Cheo fu, China. On this building $1,500 has been paid. The building will cost, when completed, about $5,000. Six hundred dollars was granted to repair the house in Hongo, Tokio, Japan. Land was bought in Tokio upon which the house occupied by Miss Oldham and Miss Rioch stands. For this land $3,000 was paid. Six hundred dollars has been granted to finish the house occupied by R. L. Pruett and family in Osaka, Japan.

Finances.

The receipts for the year amount to $171,898.20. This is $8,167.96 less than was given last year. But last year $15,149.46 was given for famine relief. If this amount be deducted the receipts this year for missionary purposes amount to $7,031.50 more than they did last. For some reason the churches gave $3,956.70 less this year than they did last. Fewer churches gave. The number of contributing churches is 2,762 as against 3,067 last year. This was a loss of 305. The Sunday-schools gave a little more money this year than they did last, although there were 44 less schools that gave. The Endeavorers gave more this year than they did last. The increase was $1,842.62. The increase in contributing societies was 159. The Endeavorers have undertaken to support most of the boys in the orphanage in India. There were 71 more individuals gave this year than last, though they gave $2,771.78 less. The society lost $7,682.98 on annuities and gained $12,435.74 on bequests. It is believed that in the early part of the year the receipts were cut down because of the superabundant prosperity of the country. They were reduced somewhat at the close of the year by the long continued drought. It has been much harder to raise money this year than last. Of the churches that gave last year, 925 did not give this year. Again, 690 churches gave this year that did not give last. If every church that ever gave had given this year, the offerings would have amounted to $250,000. Of those that gave 619 reached their apportionment; of the Sunday-schools that gave, 1,229 reached their apportionment.

Bequests and Annuities.

The society received this year from bequests $14,611.65. The largest amount came from the estate of Dr. H. Gerould, of Cleveland, O. It was $9,000. The second largest amount was from the estate of Annie J. Watters, of Pittsburg, Pa., and was for $3,750. There were eleven bequests received in all. The smallest amount was $9. Seventeen gifts were made to the annuity fund. These aggregate $22,742.02. The largest amount received was $10,000; the second largest was $5,000. Two other amounts of $1,500 each were received. The smallest amount received was $50. Of the annuity fund $12,300 was put into real estate and buildings.

Living Link Churches.

Five new churches have been added to this list. These are as follows: Central Christian Church of Cincinnati, O., the church at Deerfield, O., the church at Crawfordsville, Ind., the First church at Akron, O., and the Mt. Cabanne church, St. Louis, Mo. These churches have given enough to support a missionary each. There are many other churches able to do as well. What is needed is not more wealth or more members, but more of the spirit of consecration. It is believed that before many years go by there will be hundreds of churches giving as much for missions as they now give for self-support.

The Co-Operation of Other Countries.

As in other years the brethren in Australia, in Canada and in England have had fellowship with us in the work. The churches in Australia support Miss Thompson and Mr. and Mrs. F. E. Stubbin in India. They gave most generously in the time of famine. They are sending three new workers to China and are talking of supporting P. A. Davey in Japan. They have sent a number of offerings to the field for different purposes. The women of England support Dr. Mary T. McGavran and Miss Clark in India. They are putting up a hospital in Damoh. The women of Canada support Miss Mary Rioch in Japan. The Endeavorers of Ontario have built a dispensary for Dr. Osgood in Chu Cheo, China. They propose to support Dr. Susie C. Rijnhart in Tibet. They have given $400 already for this purpose.

The Work in the Office.

The secretaries have done what they could to keep alive and increase the interest in world-wide missions. The Missionary Intelligencer and Missionary Voice have been published regularly. Myriads of tracts have been sent out. Conventions and colleges and churches have been visited as far as practicable; rallies were held in many of the leading cities of the land. Efforts have been made to introduce the Missionary Campaign Library. A circulating library has been founded in the mission rooms; any book will be sent out for two weeks simply for the postage. With a view to a more vigorous prosecution of the work Justin N. Green was employed as associate secretary. He will work amongst the young people for the most part. F. M. Rains has gone on a visit to Japan and China. This visit was authorized by the convention two years ago. The bulk of his traveling expenses will be no charge on the society. It is hoped that he will return in perfect health. It is certain that his counsels will be more valuable and his appeals more effective because of this tour. Moreover, his visit will cheer the workers and gladden the hearts of the converts wherever he goes.

The Needs of the Work.

Every station occupied is undermanned. Great and effectual doors are open on all sides. The missionaries are begging for reinforcements. We should respond gladly and promptly and generously to these calls. We should not only send out more workers, but equip them thoroughly for the service. Training schools are needed in Japan, in China and in India.

We must educate our own workers if we wish the best results. The society needs a larger income. For two years we have been aiming to reach $200,000. Thus far we have not succeeded. We should do that in the coming year. We are a strong and growing people. The Lord has entrusted us with great wealth. The nation was never before so prosperous. The American people are rich beyond the dreams of avarice. We are committed to the missionary enterprise by our pledge of fealty to our Lord and by the nature of our plea; we have begun well, we must continue until the whole world has heard the gospel of God's grace. If we honor Him with our substance He will honor us with his blessing. He is able to make all grace abound toward us that we, always having all sufficiency in all things, may abound unto every good work.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

The following came to me a few days ago:

"I must start a Bible study class among our young people. They have had the 'Bethany Reading Circle.' Do inform me how to advance. I am young in this work and need help. Have you a Bible outline study? Where can I get such a book? What do I want? Help me if you can; I am going to put these people to some systematic Bible study if possible."

The foregoing reveals a spirit and purpose worthy of commendation. The young people ought to be encouraged to read and study the Bible. Every pastor in whose congregation there is a lack of systematic Bible study ought to determine to enlist his people if possible in the study of the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures. And it is possible to interest the people in this study. The whole congregation, not simply the young, ought to be encouraged to study the Bible systematically. The entire congregation should be enlisted in this, not alone the members of the church.

In the South Broadway church we are reading the New Testament by books in our Wednesday evening meeting. The plan has worked so well thus far that I will tell you some things about it.

An announcement is made from the pulpit on the Lord's day that a certain book of the New Testament, or portion of a book, will be read this week as a preparation for the midweek meeting. After the congregation has assembled on Wednesday evening the services begin by singing and prayer. Let common sense decide as to the number of songs and prayers in each meeting. After singing and prayer the pastor gives a talk on the book appointed to be read. For this address he makes special preparation. It is not an offhand, rambling talk. Those present are encouraged to propound questions. Some of the questions are answered at once; others are referred to the next meeting for consideration. It is well to designate some one to briefly return an answer at the next meeting to a specified question. The pastor may take one or more questions under consideration for a week. The effect is good. In this way the people are encouraged to think. There must be flexibility in the conduct of such a meeting. Keep out of the ruts. To make it successful much thought must be given to it by the leader. Do not permit controversy; encourage the freest expression of opinion, but insist upon it that there shall be self-restraint if views are expressed, as probably will be the case, from which there is dissent. If discussion in the sense of debate is permitted the meeting will degenerate into an unseemly wrangle. Do not lose sight of the devotional feature of the meeting. See to it that criticism, geography, history, archæology, etc., are not permitted to crowd out praise and prayer. To preserve harmony and proportion between a digging for facts, truths, information, and acts of devotion, in which there is a real spirit of worship, is not an easy matter. Emotion must have a place in this meeting as well as thought. Let emotion come as a result of thought.

A printed outline of Bible study is not the first need in preparing for this kind of work. I have prepared nothing of this character. Use the Bible itself. The number of congregations in which the Bible is not used at all by the people is surprisingly and shamefully large. I have been in churches where not a copy of the Scriptures could be found about the building, other than the pulpit Bible. Some of them are congregations of Disciples of Christ, too. "Where the Bible speaks we speak: where the Bible is silent we are silent!" USE THE BIBLE. Make your own outline; an inferior outline prepared by yourself to meet the peculiar necessities of your own people is better than a superior outline wrought out by some other person. Consult outlines, obtain suggestions from them; but make your own. The prime requisite is to be thoroughly familiar with the lesson itself as it is in your English Bible. You are dealing with plain people; deal with them in a thoroughly honest, plain, straightforward manner. Do not forget that it is a knowledge of the ancient Hebrew and Christian Scriptures that is desired; not a knowledge of some man's views of the Bible. This can best be obtained by an independent reading and study of the Bible.

Encourage the people to read the Bible by such an announcement, from the pulpit, on the Lord's day, as that mentioned above. Many will pay no attention to the announcement; a few will. They are the elect. This is a beginning. They constitute a nucleus. Out of this small number will come, in time, a larger company. A good way to encourage the reading of the Bible is to read it a great deal yourself. Read it a great deal in your study; read it freely from the pulpit in preaching. Study to be a good public reader of the Bible. The manner in which this peerless literature is sometimes read from the pulpit is pitiful. An intelligent reading of the Scriptures before the sermon and in the delivery of the discourse is second only, in interest and value, to an efficient public proclamation of the gospel. When the people see that their pastor is full of the Word, that he has a real relish for it, manifesting by word and deed an enthusiastic interest in it, he is in a fair way to generate an interest on the part of those for whose spiritual health he has a care. "Be an example to believers" is an apostolic injunction to one whose life was devoted to the ministry of the word. "Be an example to believers" in the reading and study of the word, as well as in other matters. Make not simply the Wednesday evening meeting, but every meeting of the church, and of every section of the church, as the Sunday-school, Christian Endeavor, ladies' missionary society, the Lord's day morning meeting, etc., a time for the study of the Scriptures. This, in part, replies to the question as to how to advance.

Helps in the study of the Bible abound. Here is, for instance, a little book, worth probably twenty-five or thirty cents, entitled: "Bible Facts for Busy People," by Calla Scott Willard, and published by the Fleming H. Revell Company, 63 Washington St., Chicago. It contains a series of lessons, the purpose of which is to give the student a general knowledge of the Bible. The author is a teacher of more than thirty years' experience. Her book is not, therefore, the outgrowth of untried theories of normal work.

"The Normal Instructor," by W. W. Dowling, and from the press of The Christian Publishing Company, St. Louis, is another booklet of similar character and purpose, likewise from the brain of an experienced Bible teacher. For a class of young people something of the kind here mentioned is good; but the leader needs something, in the way of helps, larger and more thorough than either of the works named.

Since your young people have had a "Bethany Reading Circle" they have gone through President McGarvey's "Guide to Bible Study," and Professor Willett's "Life and Teaching of Jesus" and his "Prophecies of Israel." Have they studied F. D. Power's "Bible Doctrine for Young Disciples"? This may be what you want.

For the present let this suffice. My next will be from Minneapolis and will be about the great convention.

The American Christian Missionary Society.

SUMMARY OF THE REPORT TO THE NATIONAL CONVENTION AT MINNEAPOLIS, MINNESOTA.

The report of the American Christian Missionary Society to the National Convention at Minneapolis, is by far the finest report ever given by our home board to a national convention.

The report mentions the names of our prominent brethren who have passed away during the year, including the names of Henry R. Pritchard, of Indiana, Robert Graham of the Bible College, Lexington, Ky., Hugh McDiarmid and Dr. Henry Gerould, of Ohio, John T. Phillips, of Pennsylvania, D. W. Pritchett, of Texas, and George Christian, of Arkansas. The summaries of the report are as follows:

Summary.

During the year we have assisted in the support of 225 missionaries, an increase of 30 over the number of any previous year. These missionaries have labored to an amount equal to 120 years, 10 months and 22 days, have assisted 341 places, have organized or reorganized 93 churches, have received into the various churches 6,912 members, of which number 3,660 were by confession of faith in Christ as the divine Son of God and baptism into his name; 28 church buildings have been erected.

Financial.

The total receipts for the year are $91,716.68 which is a gain of $23,089.38 over the receipts of last year. If we subtract $7,584.37 of special money received last year for the Board of Negro Education and Evangelization, the real gain is $35,- 673.75. This gain is a matter of congratulation.

The State Boards and their Work.

There is a state board of missions in 39 states. The summary of their work is:

Missionaries employed, 415.

Churches and places helped, 1,359.

Members received into churches, 17,623. Churches organized and reorganized, 184.

Amounts collected on fields for local work, $2,147,684.95.

Amounts for state missions, $122,214.82.

The total of reports of state and national boards of home missions, shows the following:

Missionaries employed, 640.

Number of additions to churches by missionary effort, 24,535.

Number of churches organized and reorganized, 277.

Amount raised for state and general home missions, $213,921.50.

The report discusses the offerings made to home missions, saying: "The amount of money entrusted to us for home missions is not in any measure a test of our ability as a people; it is the measure of our interest in home missions. Of our more than 1,000,000 members, not more than 300,000 are giving as much as 10 cents a year to obey the command of the king to preach the gospel in this good land. The board received a total of $13,700 on the annuity plan this year, a gain of $6,950 over the year before. The society received two funds of $5,000 each as named memorial funds. The first of these is in the name of Dr. Henry Gerould, late of Cleveland, O., the second is in the name of George Bates, of Nebraska. The board agrees, with these funds, to keep a missionary preaching during all the years. In clear form the board presents the report of the work of home missions as conducted in the United States, both by itself and the various state boards in the country. We have not space to even approximate this part of the report, but only desire to show that we are employing a total of 225 missionaries. These assisted 342 places, and they received 6,912 persons into the churches. This view of the field as presented by the board is most interesting.

German Population.

The board calls especial attention to the work that is being done among the German population. Here is a magnificent field of missions which we have hardly touched. R. H. Timme has organized two churches in Cleveland, O., and is planning for larger work in the future.

City Evangelization.

The work of city evangelization is receiving an increased amount of attention. The society is assisting in Chicago, St. Louis, Cleveland, Buffalo, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Richmond, Va., Charleston, S. C., New Orleans, Galveston, San Antonio, San Francisco, Portland, Seattle, Tacoma, St. Paul, and other prominent cities in the country. This is a most hopeful work, and should be very greatly enlarged.

Missionary Protracted Meetings.

The report says: "Your board believes that the coming winter is going to see a wave of evangelism sweep over our churches, such as was never known before. Numbers of letters have come to the office, asking for the names and addresses of evangelists, and asking that some good evangelists be recommended. Were our leading evangelists each multiplied into ten men, they could not meet the calls that are made upon them for service this winter. Some of them have engagements taking all their time for two and three years to come.

Your board would earnestly plead for missionary protracted meetings to be held by our ministers. The new century should witness a great revival of religious life among the American people, and believing that we should be workers together with God in the saving of souls, the board suggests that a movement be inaugurated in this convention pledging a thousand of our churches and preachers to hold a missionary protracted meeting during the year, of at least ten days' duration, either under the auspices of the state or district board of missions.

A missionary protracted meeting is one held at some weak point away from one's own church, the minister consenting to receive whatever compensation the brethren at such point may be able to give.

We hope this movement may receive the hearty support of the convention, and that much good may come in the name of the Lord Jesus.

Our churches should lend and send their ministers to this great work. There are veritable mission grounds in adjoining neighborhoods—delay now, means forever, and refusal will dwarf ourselves for all time to come. We need more of the itinerant spirit of our fathers, and of the Methodist Church, they have taken new point after new point, and hold them by making a preaching place of some needy neighborhood, and held on until it was developed.

Organized work will never do a tithe of what should be done in winning small neighborhoods to our Lord and his Christ; this personal labor that stops not to be sent, but goes; that halts not because no money is offered; that goes because the love of Christ constrains the going; that is the work that is abundantly blessed by God, and honored by good men. God help us to move out of our rocking chairs!

Reaching Self-support.

Your board increasingly realized the need of pressing upon all churches receiving missionary money, the duty of sacrificing much to reach self-support.

It is easy to help toward helplessness—it is hard to take on the necessary additional burden of releasing the mission board and carrying the work alone. Mission churches come easily to think of the missionary appropriation as a right, and resenting its proposed withdrawal is not an unheard-of thing. One missionary pastor wrote: "I have worked hard and built up this church, and now the home mission board proposes to punish me for my hard work by the withdrawal of the missionary appropriation." What a conception of the work of the board of missions!

In order to train our missions toward self-support, the board has planned all appropriations to mission points on the descending scale, by the insertion of the following clause in the contract with every mission assisted by the society:

This contract is on the descending scale—it is understood that unless the church at _____ suffers unusual loss from death, removal, or division, the amount appropriated will be reduced each year, until the church becomes self-supporting.

The acting board at its meeting, June 20, 1901, passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the secretary be instructed to call the attention of all the churches receiving appropriations from this board, to the fourth item of this contract, and to say to such mission churches that the board must insist on some reduction being made in the amount appropriated to each mission, unless special reasons existed for continuing the appropriations at the old amount.

It is the purpose of the acting board to help the mission churches help themselves, by a prompt, cheerful compliance with the above article of the contract. This does not apply to our appropriations to state boards of missions, nor to city boards for the evangelization of our cities, but it does apply to all individual congregations receiving aid from our treasury. We print on our roll of honor, the churches that will assume self-support.

Roll of Honor for Self-support.

Porto Rico.

J. A. Irwin, who practiced law in New Mexico before he became a minister, was appointed district judge, by the governor of Porto Rico, with headquarters at Mayaguez. This rendered his resignation necessary. Your board counts itself fortunate in securing W. M. Taylor and wife, lately of Chattanooga, Tenn., as successors to Brother and Sister Irwin.

Porto Rico ought to be a "rich port" indeed, for missionary work; careful sowing will be followed by reaping. We have three mission stations, San Juan, Port Du Tierre and Bayamon.

Could we realize the blessing we have sent to the people of Porto Rico in sending to them the gospel, we would gladly double our offerings to help a people so needy, so receptive and so grateful.

Recommendations.

The board presents two recommendations to the convention:

First, that Forefathers' Day be assigned to the board of ministerial relief, and the proceeds be devoted to the assistance of our needy ministers, and those dependent upon them.

Second, that Article VIII. of the Constitution be so amended as to substitute "Indianapolis" for "Louisville" as the home of negro education and evangelization, and that the work be put under the direction of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions.

The board makes an earnest appeal for enlarged assistance.

What Shall We Do?

Your acting board appeals for a greater emphasis to be placed upon the work of home missions. There is a condition of things just now in our country, that justifies a strong, earnest, emphatic appeal for home missions to the front. This is far from asking for less emphasis upon any other work of the brotherhood. Our home mission work has been allowed to lag behind in our benevolent enterprises; the churches began to think that was the way it ought to be and think far too little of our home mission work. But the pathetic appeal of our own brethren scattered far and wide over the northwest, the west and southwest, the magnificent field of the east, with 20,000,000 people, and only a few churches of Christ, the foreign-home field, right at home, among the foreign populations, the great opportunities of the cities there, all these call in trumpet tones for home missions to the front. Add to this the fact that America is our base of supplies, that, as we make our cause strong at home, we will make it strong abroad, and if we neglect our home field it will make feeble our outgoing to other lands. Add to this the ripeness of the home field, where every $500 put into the evangelistic fund will win a soul to Christ, add to this the call of patriotism, that if we would save our country from anarchy and crime, we must save it to righteousness, and then add the heart's desire of our Lord and Savior that America may be saved for the sake of the souls of men, that he may see the travail of his soul and be satisfied, all these are angel messengers pleading, urging, that we give the work of home missions no secondary place.

To-day seventy-five millions of freemen, rejoicing in their civil and religious freedom, are giving their energy and their skill and their enterprise to the promotion of her prosperity. Before the close of the first half of the present century, her statisticians tell us, not less than one hundred and fifty millions will reside within her borders. And when the coming generation shall crowd through the opening gates of the next century, there will be three hundred millions of them to rejoice in what has been achieved, and in the grander destiny that opens before them. In the face of facts like these, it is impossible for us to resist the profound conviction that here is to be found the grandest mission field of the globe. From these people must go out long lines of moral and intellectual influence that shall extend themselves to the very ends of the earth. Not many decades will pass until this people shall control the commerce of the world. All that commerce will have interwoven in its very fibre the moral and religious influences that pervade our land. Who does not know that English opium is the most powerful foe to the progress of Christian missions in China? Who does not know that New England rum is debasing the swarthy tribes of Africa until they are almost beyond the reach of the gospel's power to save? If unchristian, what will America be but a vampire, preying upon humanity? If the future of this land shall be but a repetition of the history of the Spanish rule, if its controlling minds shall present the greed and crime of Cortez and Pizarro, if the "accursed thirst for gold," that is the dominant passion of our people when uncontrolled by the gospel, shall give vent to its insatiable thirst in every land to which it may find access, what will it be to our fallen race but the most awful curse that ever smote our sinful world? But if this land of ours, permeated by Christian influences, shall send forth to the world's remotest bounds, commodities that shall be cleansed from all that is impure and unholy, send forth nothing but that which ministers to the uplifting of the people and to the comfort of the nations, if these mighty engines that plow the great deep shall bear, along with the material things, the gospel's purity, and the gospel's power to sanctify and to save, what will it be but the ushering in of the day when the earth's dark history shall cease, when the sighing of the nations shall be ended, and the year of God's redeemed shall have come? This would be life from the dead. We are standing to-day at the crisis of the ages, and when we plead for the gospel of our own land, for those that live in the secluded valleys of our mountains, for those that build their frontier cabins on the borders of our wide prairies, for those that crowd the factories and workshops of our great cities, for the boys that play along our streets, and for the girls that look out of our windows—when we ask for that which shall cleanse from their pollution the slums of our cities, that which shall drive ignorance and vice from all our homes, and which shall lift this land of ours in its entirety into the light and glory and blessings of the gospel of Jesus Christ, what do we ask for but that which must be the highest factor in the world's deliverance from the bondage of its guilt and the enthronement of Christ over the nations? Such are the conditions that environ us to-day. Such is the responsible position, so solemn and awful in its grandeur, held by our country and the churches of the living God, in this land of our birth. Our hearts, like that of Eli of old, tremble under these solemn thoughts, and our souls are awed by the majesty of these grand events about us. Like the great apostle of the Gentiles, we exclaim, "Who is sufficient for these things?" Surely this is not a time to be afraid lest we spend too much money in trying to make our own land what it ought to be for God and for the world. The board makes another earnest appeal to the convention. It must have a larger income to meet the demands of this work. Without specifying here the needs of her particular fields, we are profoundly impressed with the idea that this coming year the board should have not less than $200,000 or else leave undone work whose pressing and imperious demands should not be refused, and will not be if we discharge our full duty to our country and our Master's cause. In our wide and growing field, there is ever enlarging need and opportunity. Events succeed each other with hastening footsteps, and enterprise, and machinery, and productive industries, and capital, and discovery, and invention are crowding into our territory as they never have into any territory in any age of the world. It is the day of opportunity. How shall we meet it?

Addenda to the Report.

The board would call attention to the very low expense account as indicated in the above report. The secretary has faithfully endeavored to follow the instructions of the Kansas City convention and keep the expense account down to the minimum with efficient work.

The board would call attention to the fact that we have had but one secretary during the past year. Brother Smith has done a tremendous amount of work, and this in connection with the fact that Mrs. Smith was ill for several months in the year. We have been anxious lest his health should break down in consequence, but the Lord has graciously preserved his health.

We feel that this acknowledgment is due to our secretary for his careful conduct of the work, and for the cheerful meeting of the great responsibilities and the load of detail in carrying this work to its present measure of success.

An Hour in His Courts.

By L. H. Stine.

The day was dark and dreary, and an autumnal chill pierced the air. Yet an unsetting sun, shining with a holy light, the dawn of an eternal day, scattered blessings from his beams, and drove away the shadows of the heart. The day was the queen among the seven, the best of all the week. Mercy looked down from her throne with "smiling eye," then it was a day of rest, of joy, of hope, of heavenly peace. Well for this world, with its broken hearts, its blighted hopes, there is a day in seven, of repose from worldly care, of love, of resurrection life. So much of dull care, deep anxiety, trouble, sorrow, to corrode the heart, to quench hope.

Through the dismal atmosphere, over the damp pavement, hastened a company of the Father's chosen to enter into his courts and to wait under the shadow of his wing. Some that entered the holy place wore smiling, happy faces, unmarked by trouble, while others entered with a steadier step, as if balancing themselves under a heavy load. The deep scars on their brows told of their conflict. The aged and the young, the grave and the mirthful, all sat together as a band of joyous friends. They were thankful because of the benignant providence that had brought them safely through another week. The uncertain voices of the aged and infirm blended in sweet cadence with the crisp voices of the young, in their songs of praise. With one accord, the troubled heart, in communion with the gay and happy, sought supplies of grace. In the delight of holiness, all praised the name that had crowned the day with goodness. Without hesitation or delay they gave themselves to the performance of the work that is so wondrous in our eyes.

The house was of plain architecture, and its furniture simple. The service was beautiful in its unadorned simplicity, agreeing with the plainness of the surrounding architecture. No loud-pealing organ blended its swelling notes with those of a high-sounding anthem.

The sentiment of a hymn touched the sympathies of the worshiper and on the wing of its simple melody were his feelings borne aloft. A man arose and, in a few sentences, turned the waiting hearts to the throne of grace. The prayer abounded in words of thanksgiving for benefits received, of confession of sins, and of invocation for mercy and for help. A maidenly voice was heard in the reading: "The Lord is my light and my salvation." Then followed readings from the Master's sermon after the last supper. Comments and readings, exhortations and prayers, came from every quarter of the little company. Every one seemed to have a voice he thought the Master would be pleased to hear, even as he had a heart he would be pleased to have the Master enter and abide.

The mind of the Master was in the disciples. They adored him. They blessed him because he came to them, even that dreary day, bringing his gift of salvation. His presence was in their midst and his spirit renewed their hearts. His ear was reached by simple sounds of praise, his heart was touched by the finger of gentle love. The light of his countenance painted their faces with the hues of ancient promise. The service was a heart to heart communion with the Lord of life.

The service rose to its highest pitch of interest when a reverent hand removed a linen, pure and white, exposing to view the mysterious symbols of an atoning death. A solemn feast, a loaf, a cup. Bread from the ground grain, wine from the pressed grape! Strange philosophy! The eyes of the disciples around the table were unsealed and they beheld in them the communion of the body and the blood of him who gave himself for the life of the world. By the alchemy that transmutes doubt into faith and despair into hope; that converts sinners into saints and fishermen into apostles, the loaf became the bread of life and the cup of blessing a fount of cleansing. By faith they saw our Savior bleeding on the cross as they fed on the earthly loaf and cup. They tasted of the Living Bread, they drank of the fountain head.

The Master was near the disciples at this gracious feast, near as when he ate with the fishermen at the first communion service under the shadow of Calvary. As the disciples bowed before his glory he revealed his presence at the supper, and they saw in his face of love the perfect likeness they would wear through the ages endless. A feast of heavenly love. Wonders of his grace. A vision of the throne, of the fellowship above.

Without distracting the attention of the disciples, the service of simple ritual appealed in the directest way to their hearts, and concentrated their minds on God, the Father of their spirits. Without display the people fed on the word and ate the bread and drank the cup. One called to mind David's shepherd hymn and pondered over the "pastures of tender grass," and the "waters of quietness." A good place for a hungry, thirsty soul to be. Light for the eye, music for the ear, hope for the heart. The sunshine of infinite love gleamed about the symbol of grace and helped one to mark the footsteps of the Master.

Did one approach the door of mercy with a bleeding heart and a drooping spirit, discouraged and forlorn because a night of adversity had overshadowed hope? Did he come with doubts that canker faith? He departed from that royal feast encouraged to believe that all things work together for good to them that love God, and that the Star of Bethlehem shines in the night. The service was God's remedy for a broken heart or a vanquished faith. Peace and repose welcomed a returning joy.

A stranger departed from that door of mercy with his faith confirmed that Jesus is the true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world, and that through simple ritual he can inspire with light of hope and power of faith the lowly disciple.

When the meeting was over the sun was breaking through the clouds, and soon the sky was clear and the day was bright.

Athanasius—Doctrinal Preaching.

By F. D. POWER.

"Know that we must not serve the time, but the Lord" is a word of Athanasius that well illustrates his character. Born in Alexandria in 297 and trained in theology by men who had suffered pagan persecution, born in a city which was a fatal and prolific source of speculative controversy, and living in an age when errors affecting the great foundations of the Christian religion were urged with unusual subtlety, he was a valiant defender of the faith. Dean Stanley calls him "the Theologian of his age, in one sense of all ages; the Father of all theology, the Founder of Orthodoxy."

This story is told of his boyhood. Alexander, Bishop of Alexandria, was entertaining his clergy in a house overlooking the sea, when he observed a group of children playing on the shore and was struck by the religious character of their game. His attendants were sent to catch the boys and bring them before the bishop who charged them with imitating religious ceremonies. At first they denied, but at last confessed they had been playing at the sacrament of baptism, and one of them had been selected to perform the part of a bishop and that he had duly dipped them in the sea with all proper form. When Alexander found this ceremony had been observed he determined to recognize the baptism as valid and himself administered confirmation, and was so struck with the knowledge and gravity of the boy-bishop that he took him under his charge and had him trained for holy orders.

In the year 319 when Athanasius was a young deacon and secretary to the Bishop of Alexandria, the speculations of Arius began to attract wide attention. The Council at Nice, 325, was called to consider these errors. The Sabellians considered Father, Son and Holy Spirit as one in person, thus "confounding the persons." The Arians considered them as differing in essence—three beings—this was "dividing the substance," and against these hypotheses the Nicæan Creed was framed. The creed overstepped the modesty of Scripture in attempting to define with accuracy where the sacred writers are silent, and introduced damnatory clauses, consigning to everlasting punishment such as refused to accept its statements concerning the Trinity. It lacks, to say the least, the spirit of Christ.

In this council Athanasius came to the front. The Athanasian Creed was not written by him, as has been thought, but he was the chief opponent of Arius. Athanasius came to Nicæa a young deacon; he went away a world-famous man. Five months after the council, Alexander, Bishop of Alexandria, died. The people cried, "Give us Athanasius!" and the majority of Bishops voted him in as the successor of Alexander, a position which he held through manifold trials and varied fortunes for 46 years.

From his youth this man was inflamed with the passion which makes saints—the love of Christ. The center of his theology was the doctrine of the Incarnation. The excellence of any theologian must be measured not by his attacks upon error, but by his defense of the truth. His pulpit was a great breakwater of faith, his life in support of the doctrine of Christ reads like a glowing romance, and his position for the truth has passed into a proverb most sublime in its expressiveness of the claims of individual private judgment against the claims of general authority: "Athanasius Contra Mundum," Athanasius against the world.

His chief contention from the beginning was with Arius. He denounces the Arians as "devils," "anti-Christ," "polytheists," "atheists," "dogs," "wolves," "chameleons," "hydras," "eels," "cattlefrogs," "gnats," "beetles," "lions," "hares," "leeches," "maniacs," "Jews"—which only shows how far a heroic soul may be betrayed by party spirit and the violence of the times and which serves as a warning rather than an example. Arius stood for the doctrine of Homoiousian, that Christ was of like nature and characteristics with the Father, of similar, but not of same nature or substance; Athanasius for the position that Christ was of the same nature or identical with that of the Father. Here was the issue. "We have seldom an opportunity of observing," says Gibbon, "either in action or in speculative life what effect may be produced or what obstacles may be surmounted by the force of a single mind when it is inflexibly applied to the pursuit of a single object. The immortal name of Athanasius will never be separated from the Catholic doctrine of the Trinity, to whose defense he consecrated every moment and every faculty of his being. Five times was Athanasius expelled from his throne, twenty years he passed as a fugitive, and almost every province of the Roman Empire was successively witness to his merit and his sufferings in the cause of Homoousian, which he considered as the sole pleasure and business, as the duty and glory, of his life. Although his mind was tainted by the contagion of superstition, Athanasius displayed a superiority of character and abilities which would have fitted him far better than the degenerate sons of Constantine for the government of a great monarchy."

"Athanasius endured persecution, calumny, exile," says Milman, "his life was frequently endangered in defense of one single tenet, and that the most purely intellectual and apparently most remote from the ordinary passions of men; he confronted martyrdom not for the broad and palpable distinction between Christianity and heathenism, but for a fine and subtle expression of Christian Creed."

"Only of Athanasius there was nothing observed," says Hooker, "through that long tragedy other than such as well became a wise man to do and a righteous man to suffer, so then this was the plain condition of those times: the whole world against Athanasius and Athanasius against it."

Homoousios, "Of one essence," Consubstantialis, Unius Substantiæ, Ejusdem Substantiæ, the council accepted as the test of orthodoxy concerning the Godhead—a position which has never been retracted. In Goethe's Faust Mephistopheles counsels: "Pay no attention to things in theology, but dwell solely on words." This is the devil's advice to theological students, and by too many in all ages has been most faithfully followed. The advice and example of Athanasius are exactly contrary. Words are of high importance in theology. Both in ecclesiastical history and in the interpretation of Scripture, the study of their origin and meaning is vital. Athanasius himself introduced one of the most famous, but this gives greater force to his warning when he bids contending parties ascertain first what is the meaning of terms they use and then fix attention "not on words respecting which they differ, but on things respecting which they are agreed." If ever there was a man who was not the slave of language, who had his eye upon ideas, truths, facts, and who made language submissively do their work, it was the great Athanasius. Let no one recognize the sneer of Gibbon that those who accept the Homoiousian while they reject the Homoousian were the victims of a diphthong. Change of a letter may make the infinite difference between idolatry and the worship of the true God, for to the Homoiousians Christ was practically only a creature; to the Homoousians he was Creator. Creature and Creatour, as it was once spelled, also differ by a single letter, yet the difference spans infinity. Nothing is more frivolous than to attempt to represent this whole dispute as simply verbal. The question at stake was nothing less than the doctrine of the Incarnation in its fullest significance. The word Homoousian came to be of supreme importance when no other word could be discovered which absolutely excluded the impieties of Arius. The tenacity, sobriety, endurance, genius, inflexibility and lucid exposition of Athanasius rendered the church an inestimable service. So far from being a curious speculator, a rash intruder into the secrets of deity, Athanasius was opposing speculations. "We are contending for our all," he said. So it was Athanasius Contra Mundum.

"Royal-hearted Athanase
With Paul's own mantle blest."

Athanasius stood for the doctrine—the fundamental doctrine of Holy Scripture, the preaching of doctrine, and he is an example also of the plainest presentation of doctrine. We associate him with metaphysical distinctions and subtleties. It is unjust. It is recorded of his preaching: "In sermonibus ubique, in locutione clarus et brevis, et simplex, acutus tamen et altus."

Quintillian observes that our meaning, "like the light of the sun, should obtrude itself upon the eyes of the ignorant, not only without any pains to search for it, but as it were, whether he will or not."

Luther used to say: "To preach plainly and simply is a great art."

Archbishop Usher declares: "It requires all our learning to make things plain. It is not difficult to make easy things appear hard; but to render hard things easy is the hardest part of a good orator and preacher."

"He is the powerfulest preacher and the best orator," said Dr. South, "who can make himself best understood."

"The greatest learning," says Bishop Wilkins, "is to be seen in the greatest plainness. The more clearly we understand anything ourselves the more easily can we expound it to others."

"Your sermons can not well be too plain," said Bishop Hurd to his preachers.

Archbishop Tillotson was in the habit of reading his sermons to an illiterate old woman of plain sense who lived with him and of altering his words and expressions till he had brought the style down to her level.

"The very essence of truth," said Milton, "is plainness and brightness; the darkness and crookedness are our own." So the common people—the plain people—heard the greatest of all preachers "gladly." So Paul declares: "In the church I had rather speak five words with my understanding, that by my voice I might teach others also, than ten thousand words with an unknown tongue."

Doctrinal preaching of the plainest and most biblical kind is the need of the hour. What is doctrine? Simply teaching—instruction. Ordinarily we use it in reference to the primary principles of our faith. Principles or positions of any master or sect constitute the doctrine of that teacher or system. Doctrines of the Bible are the first principles or foundation of our religion. Presented in the Scriptures we have a copious fund of evangelical truth which, united in all its parts, makes the most complete body of doctrine that has ever been known, and all promises and blessings within the range of our experience and hope are grounded upon these doctrines. These are the substance of the religion of Jesus Christ.

"Preach Christ and let doctrines alone," is sometimes a word to preachers. Impossible. Sorry, meatless, unsatisfactory preaching is that which is void of doctrine. There is much of it; and for thinness, feebleness, barrenness, and utter stupidity it surpasses everything else that is poor and attenuated and invertebrate. And no wonder that lectures, and literary discussions, and magic lantern exhibitions, and marriages in costume, and all sorts of grotesque topics must be resorted to in order to keep together the congregations condemned to sit under such babble. Mockery is it to say "Come to Christ," "Believe on Christ," "Obey Christ," without at the same time telling who Christ is, what is meant by believing on Christ, and what men must do to be saved through Christ, and to do this is to preach doctrine. To preach Jesus is to preach doctrine. All the doctrines of the Bible are embraced in the fact that Jesus is the Christ. All sound doctrine clusters about and lives upon this truth. Hence to preach Christ is to preach the oldest, loftiest, most far-reaching doctrine of revelation, to dip from the fountain head and dispense to the people.

The church needs pure doctrine. Let our people be thoroughly educated in the doctrine of Christ, and the Lord's work will be done. And faith, repentance and baptism are not the sum of sound doctrine. To preach these is not to proclaim the whole counsel of God. A thousand things besides are matters of sound doctrine. The discipline and instruction of the Lord cover the whole field of faith and service, and men need to study more than the Second of Acts. Time was when our people took their Bibles to church and read with the reader and noted carefully every word—they don't do it now; when Bibles were worn, and old, and bethumbed, and marked throughout, and invaluable because of the association with every page and the familiarity of the reader with every line—they are not so now; when every member of the church could in a moment give an answer to every man that asked a reason for the hope that was in him, and even the children among us could meet the strongest enemy and rout him with "It is written!" as Christ overcame Satan in the wilderness of temptation—but we are not so ready now. Too great attention was given by our fathers to the letter of the law, to some of the "first principles" of the gospel, and a reaction has set in. We are going to the other extreme. Some preachers even among us are too much afraid they may be called "Campbellites," and one may attend their ministrations for months and never recognize their position.

Either extreme is perilous. The church must be fed on strong meat. Sound, earnest, doctrinal preaching makes stable disciples. Not faith, repentance, baptism, served up on every Lord's day and over every Lord's Supper, and at every church prayer-meeting, but all the grand, fertile and feeding doctrines of the religion of Christ. Say what we may, it is doctrine that moves the world. Logical men, dogmatic men, doctrinal men, rule this age and every age. No system can be exact, solid, and maintain its place from century to century whose elements of strength are not rooted and grounded in the bed of eternal truth, and which do not stand out before men like the pillars of the Parthenon from the Athenian Acropolis, clear cut, in colossal might and incomparable grace. All the great revivals in the history of the church have come from such preaching as Athanasius illustrates. Witness Pentecost, the reformations in Germany and in England, the revivals under Wesley and Whitefield, Edwards and Nettleton, the work of Stone and Scott and Campbell.

Never was the need of sound doctrine greater than at the opening of this twentieth century. We must guard the truth of God with jealous eye, courageous heart, and swift and ready hand. Said Paul to his preachers: "Take heed to the doctrine"; "Give attendance to reading and to doctrine"; "Charge them that they teach no other doctrine"; "In doctrine show uncorruptness—sound speech that can not be condemned"; "Speak the things that become sound doctrine"; "Adorn the doctrine of God our Savior in all things."

"Whosoever abideth not in the doctrine of Christ hath not God," says John. "If there come any unto you and bring not this doctrine receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed."

There is peril of false doctrine. There are divers and strange doctrines, doctrines variegated and foreign, by which some are carried about—whirled out of the true way. There are the doctrines of men, and there is the doctrine of God. There is the doctrine of vanities, and there is the doctrine of the Lord, which is perfect. There is the doctrine of the Pharisees, of which men are to beware, and there is "the apostles' doctrine." There is the doctrine of Balaam and the Nicolaitans, and there is "the doctrine that is according to godliness." There are the doctrines of devils and of seducing spirits, giving heed to which men depart from the faith, and there is "good doctrine," "sound doctrine"; and Paul predicts a time when men "will not endure sound doctrine," but after their own lusts will heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears, and they shall turn away their ears from the truth and shall be turned unto fables.

At every period in the history of the church these perils are threatening. To-day Satan is busy. The mystery of iniquity doth work. The spirit of antichrist is abroad. Armageddon approaches. From the trumpet of him who watches on the tower there must come no uncertain sound. Preach certainties. "How not to do it" men can readily learn any day without teaching. The unknown doctrine of an unknown God proclaimed in an unknown tongue is poor stuff for a dying world. In Pompeii they have god-makers who make all parts of the body but the face and leave that until they learn what a purchaser may desire. They can thus produce Venus or Minerva, Mars or Mercury, or any of the multitudinous gods or goddesses that may be wanted. So there are theologians prepared to put on the face according to the company in which they are found. "What color will you have, gentlemen?" asks the juggler with the ribbons—"What color?" and out it comes! twenty yards of blue, and then twenty of pink, and then twenty of green; and more and more and more as it is ordered. So of many a pulpit. Words, words, words. Vox est, Præterea Nihil. Preach certainties. Preach the word. "Take heed unto thyself and unto the doctrine; continue in them: for in doing this thou shalt both save thyself and them that hear thee."

By J. J. Haley.

VI. The Crucible of Criticism.

But suppose it be taken for granted that scholarship has spoken its last word in the solution of these problems; that the status of Old Testament criticism must remain substantially as it is to-day; that the Pentateuch as a literary production is not a work of the time of Moses; that there are four or five strata of narratives running through the historical books, pieced together at different times, and by different persons, fusing documents into one from many original sources, and not always into a harmonious whole; that there are different religious ideas, theological conceptions, and stages of moral development in these separate documents; that there were two Isaiahs with one hundred and fifty years yawning between them; that Solomon did not write Ecclesiastes; that David did not write all the psalms attributed to him; that Job is a dramatic poem written about the time of Antiochus Epiphenes; that the so called historic chapters of Daniel are a tangle of Jewish haggada written by a Maccabean Jew a century or more after the exile; that Jonah is not history but fiction with a lesson, poetry with a moral; that the Chronicler wrote the present into the past to glorify his caste and a theory of the national history; that tradition in its ignorance has dogmatized on questions of date and authorship on which little data is forthcoming to justify positive conclusions.

It is not necessary to believe or disbelieve all this in order to salvation, but if we do believe it, what then? A spiritual revelation and the literary form of it, not to speak of the historical setting, are very different things. Many good people are afraid that the results of modern biblical criticism will have the effect of weakening our faith in the supernatural. There are two considerations that will help us to understand that there is no contradiction between the legitimate results of criticism and the facts of a supernatural revelation. The first is, that inspiration is co-extensive with revelation, it covers the same ground and no more. The subject of revelation is the character of God and his relation to the universe, the method of its expression is inspiration. The man who reveals God and the redemptive purpose of his manifestation must be inspired, and it is always within this sphere that we are to look for the supernatural. God reveals to man what man does not know, and cannot find out for himself, and this requires a perception of the spiritual world and contact with the Spirit of God that we have agreed to call inspiration. On the lower plane of the large human element in the Bible we cannot predicate such illumination and elevation of human faculty, for the twofold reason that the facts do not show it, and the nature of the case does not require it. The monotheism of the Old Testament is manifestly a divine revelation which no historical or literary criticism can affect, but in such things as the compilation of genealogical tables, the description of battles, the composition and preservation of national archives, the annals of the reigns of kings, and plain historical narratives drawn from contemporary records, or pre-existing documentary sources, no such miraculous inspiration was required or bestowed. If we can affirm inspiration at all in this lower element of the Scriptures, it is an inferior grade that does not always secure accuracy, to say nothing of infallibility. A very superficial knowledge of Old Testament history and prophecy and the rudiments of intellectual honesty, will abundantly confirm the truth of this distinction.

The second point is the necessity of distinguishing between the historical trustworthiness of a narrative and revelation. The identification of revelation with the mere details of Old Testament history and tradition is a transparent absurdity on the face of it. It is well known that a narrative may be entirely historical and strictly accurate in all its details and not have one word of revelation in it. On the other hand it may be unhistorical and idealistic from beginning to end, and be studded with revelation as the mighty heavens are gemmed with stars. God has not confined himself to the historical annals of Jewish literature as the media of his revelation to man. The parable of the prodigal son is certainly not historical, that is to say, the historicity of the story is not necessary to the integrity of the parable or the significance of the lesson it conveys, and yet it contains more pure revelation than ten times the space in any other part of the Bible. We know that God has revealed himself in allegory, parable, poetry, fable, and in the symbolic imagery of glowing apocalypses, and why not in other forms of the constructive imagination, if need be?

If all that the critics have said about the early chapters in Genesis should turn out to be true, it would not affect, in the least, the undoubted element of supernatural revelation the book contains. If it were decided that the creation story is the Hebrew version of a primitive legend common to the different branches of the Semite race, no truth it is supposed to teach as literal history would be lost. There is as much revelation in a poem like Job as there is in a history like Kings and Chronicles.

If these simple considerations were borne in mind they would remove a world of difficulty regarding the Old Testament created by an irrational theory of its authorship and composition. The monotheistic revelation of the Old Testament and the Messianic revelation of the New, the two great zones of the divine manifestation, are left untouched, even in form, by the new criticism, which seeks to ascertain the date and authorship of books by the use of the ordinary canons of historical and literary criticism applied to other ancient documents. If candid scientific inquiry into the literature of revelation is going to overthrow or jeopardize the revelation itself, the sooner it is done the better. If, however, the Bible, as we believe it does, contains the will of God to man, investigation can only make that fact more apparent. If the mind can grasp this larger and more comprehensive view of revelation, faith will be lifted away from the lower realm of critical controversies about the letter and structure of the literature of the Bible and placed upon the immovable rock of eternal truth that changes not with changing time.

When criticism has done its worst it leaves us the word of God in the Old Testament. The anonymous character now attributed to these sacred books, is naturally distasteful to the old fashioned believer, yet it emphasizes afresh their intrinsic value, and shows us that they do not need the authority of great human names to make them divine. It is a mistake to imagine that no book can be inspired unless it can be ascribed to a distinguished author. If we take DeQuincey's advice when he adjures us to be done with the chains and props of inspiration on the ground that the great ideas of the Bible can take care of themselves, the books that contain these great ideas would rise away from all critical solvents, and stand out as the Himalayas of a divine revelation, on their own merits. If we were compelled to admit the anonymity of so many of these books, it would enable us all the more to realize that the great words of Psalmist and Prophet, and Sacred Philosopher do not need to be accredited by the spiritual authority of Moses, or David, or Isaiah, still less by that of Solomon. By their own intrinsic self-evident truth they compel our faith and obedience. I read Isaiah with delight, not because there was one or two, or ten Isaiahs, not because one Isaiah wrote in Jerusalem in the seventh century, and another wrote in Babylon in the fifth century, but because it finds and feeds me. God is the more conspicuous in it when the human author is out of it. These prophecies live forever because of their ethical might and spiritual worth, not because they were written in this place or by that person. Henry Ward Beecher said he saw a forest in England that was said to have been planted by King John. He did not know whether the tradition was correct or not, and he did not care, for the forest was just as beautiful and its shade just as grateful whether it was or was not planted by order of the king who granted Magna Charta. I saw an immense grape vine, the second largest in the world, at Hampton Court on the Thames, said to be one hundred and thirty years old. The keeper told me it was planted in the reign of George the third. I did not believe his story, but there was the vine and there were the grapes, and they were none the better for his story and none the worse for my critical skepticism. An inspired document is inspired, and is profitable for teaching, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect and thoroughly furnished unto every good work, no matter when written or by whom. The greatest revelations in the Old Testament, the Psalms, Job, and second Isaiah, are anonymous, as the second greatest book in the New Testament, the epistle to the Hebrews, is by an unknown author. The authors of inspired books were so muca engrossed in their mission that they forgot to label them with their own names, and their contemporaries and successors were so absorbed in the message that they forgot the messenger. In other times when the question of the authorship of the documents came up, it was customary to refer them to the greatest man of the time in which they appeared. Moses wrote the Pentateuch, David the Psalms, Solomon the Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, and Isaiah the prophecies that bear upon the exile. It is on this principle that the authorship of Hebrews is ascribed to the Apostle Paul. If criticism teaches us that inspiration has been more widely diffused and continuously bestowed than we have been in the habit of supposing, what then? When you multiply the witnesses you do not weaken the testimony. The more inspired men the better. Two Isaiahs are better than one, ten than two. The more men who could write poems like the Psalms the better for the glory of Israel and none the worse for the edification of Christians. If six men wrote the Pentateuch, we retain Moses and gain a half dozen inspired witnesses to the truth of revelation. Is a truth any the less true because it is not linked to the personality of the man who wrote it down? Can we risk the truth on its own merits? The distribution of inspiration through long periods and many persons, is not less consistent, or less convincing than its concentration in exceptional epochs and great personalities. The accepted view of the Bible is fond of ascribing as many books as possible to a few of the most illustrious political and military heroes of Scripture—Moses, David, Solomon, and when these are not available, to credit distinguished prophets, like Isaiah and Jeremiah, with as many Psalms, prophecies, and narratives as can be made to take refuge under the shield of their authority. The inspired books were concentrated into a few exceptional periods. Modern criticism has distributed the books ascribed to Moses, and Isaiah, and other favored names, among a number of inspired writers, and shows us the collection of Old Testament literature gradually forming itself, from the beginning of the monarchy till the time of the Maccabees, under the continuous operation of the divine Spirit. A Christian may hold either of these views he likes, but one no more than the other, even so much as squints in the direction of surrendering the Bible as the Book of God.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Our Budget.

—The church at Amarillo, Tex., desires a pastor. It can pay $900 to the right man. Address W. E. Gee.

—C. A. Hill has resigned the pastorate of the church at Canton, O. He will be succeeded by J. V. Updike.

—Volney Johnson has taken charge of the church at El Paso, Tex., succeeding Bro. Campbell, who was compelled to resign on account of ill health.

—The new church building at New Holland, O., was dedicated Oct. 6, by L. L. Carpenter. Enough money was raised to cancel all indebtedness. Wesley Hatcher is pastor.

—Edward Oliver Tilburn, of Butte, Mont., has accepted a call to the church at Tonawanda, N. Y. He expects to enter upon his work there about Nov. 15, by which time it is expected the new church building will be completed.

—The two churches at Decatur, the Edwards Street and the Tabernacle Church, united on Oct. 6 to form a single congregation under the corporate name, the Central Church of Christ. F. W. Burnham and J. C. Coggins have been the pastors of the two churches.

—W. J. Battenfield, pastor of the church at Loami, Ill., recently closed a successful meeting with his home church, in which there were 34 additions. Guy B. Williamson and wife led the music. The latter are now assisting J. E. Davis in a meeting at Princeton, Mo. 12 added to date.

—We cannot thank all the friends personally who are writing us kind words about the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, but we assure you that we appreciate them nevertheless, and they will strengthen us in our purpose and plans to make the paper worthy of its plea and patronage.

—We regret to learn of the death of J. W. Ingram, which occurred at Los Angeles, Cal., on the morning of Oct. 10. Bro. Ingram was very widely and favorably known, and the news of his death will cause widespread regret. A suitable obituary notice will be published later.

—We regret to see in the daily press an account of the death of G. C. Montgomery who was a member of the First Christian church at Winfield, Kan. He was a Santa Fe detective and one of the best known secret service men in the West and was killed by an ambushed assassin, presumably one of a gang which he had recently been instrumental in suppressing.

—The church at Ipava held a jubilee and celebration on Thursday, Oct. 3. The special cause of the rejoicing was the canceling of an indebtedness upon church building and parsonage of $1,194. H. O. Breeden, of Des Moines, was present and he, with other visiting brethren, rejoiced with the Ipava brethren as the old notes, mortgages and subscription lists were burned. The cause at Ipava is prospering in every way under the leadership of J. E. Diehl who has been with the congregation nineteen months.

—The brotherhood will be glad to hear that on Sept. 30, 1901, at the close of the present missionary year, there was $305,342.26 in our church extension fund. The total new receipts for the year were $65,846.61. For the whole year, there was an increase of 113 in number of contributing churches and a gain of $2,358.43 in receipts. 80 churches were helped to complete their buildings, and loans were promised to 69 others and this work covered 28 states and two territories. Including the returned loans, the total receipts for use in our church extension work for the year were $103,851.11. The churches should continue their offerings. Remit to G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., 600 Water Works Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

—W. J. Bennington, Ritzville, Wash., would like to be put in correspondence "with a live, spiritual, energetic evangelist whom we can employ for $1,000, to do county evangelistic work." A second man of the same description is wanted to do pastoral work at a small salary for the church at Delight, Wash. Address T. M. Morgan, Delight, Wash.

—The pulpit of the Central Christian church of San Antonio is vacant and the church would like to correspond with a first-class man to locate there. This is a very important point, and one of the largest churches in the southwest can be built if the right man is obtained. Address Ed. Kneeland, San Antonio, Texas.

—The congregation of fifteen members, organized at Weiser, Idaho, last March by S. G. Clay, is preparing to purchase a lot and build a house. The few sisters upon whom the work largely devolves have decided to hold a sale early in December and they request the sisters of all states to send articles, either useful or fancy, for the sale not later than Nov. 25. Address Mrs. S. L. Beswick.

—The church building at Mason City, Ia., has just been completely remodeled and enlarged at an expense of $13,000. The church was re-dedicated by H. O. Breeden, of Des Moines, on Oct. 6. The auditorium now seats 1,000 people and the church building contains thirty rooms, being an up-to-date workshop. It is only ten years since the church at Mason City was organized. The growth of the cause there has been marvelous, the present membership being 1,100.

—We are glad to learn of the increased interest which is being manifested throughout the country in the "boys and girls' rally day for America," which comes on the Lord's day before Thanksgiving. This is one of the most important days in our calendar, as it is intended to educate our young people as to the greatness and the needs of this great home field. Let the Sunday-schools everywhere plan to make this a great day in the interest alike of patriotism and Christianity.

—Mr. Holland S. Reavis, who has been absent from St. Louis for several months, has returned to the city and has opened an office in Room 613, Security Building. Mr. Reavis is well known in the city, having been for years night city editor of the St. Louis Republic, and a favorite member of the choir of the Central Christian church. He left St. Louis last spring to visit the Beaumont, Texas, oil fields as a newspaper correspondent. He spent six months in Beaumont and vicinity, becoming thoroughly acquainted with the field and the oil business. He is now the St. Louis representative of several of the best producing properties in Beaumont. He is prepared to sell oil, oil stocks and oil-producing land, and will gladly give full information to any who call upon or address him. Mr. Reavis is very well and favorably known to the editor of this paper as an honest, reliable, enterprising young man.

—W. E. M. Hackleman, of Indianapolis, writes us a note concerning our reference to the music at the Missouri state convention in which he claims that we have unintentionally done him an injustice in stating that there were too few of the old hymns used. He says: "I have just gone through and marked the hymns and songs used at the convention. The result is as follows: 22 old familiar hymns, 17 old popular songs and 11 new songs. This shows that your criticism is unjust and misleading." If it does we accept the rebuke and correction. It will be admitted, however, that there is room for a difference of opinion as to what constitutes an "old familiar hymn" and "an old popular song." If there were twenty-two of the old hymns of the kind which we had in mind sung at the Missouri state convention they were sung while the editor was doing committee work or otherwise detained from the conven-

Aching Joints

In the fingers, toes, arms, and other parts of the body, are joints that are inflamed and swollen by rheumatism—that acid condition of the blood which affects the muscles also.

Sufferers dread to move, especially after sitting or lying long, and their condition is commonly worse in wet weather.

"It has been a long time since we have been without Hood's Sarsaparilla. My father thinks he could not do without it. He has been troubled with rheumatism since he was a boy, and Hood's Sarsaparilla is the only medicine he can take that will enable him to take his place in the field." Miss Ada Dory, Sidney, Iowa.

tion. The songs were "familiar" enough to the people who had been drilled in them, and "popular" enough with those who like that kind of music, but we insist that in our conventions, and we fear in our churches, too, we are lowering the standard of music from the grand old hymns to the more modern tunes and words, and it was against this that we lodged our protest. The criticism was not intended to apply to Bro. Hackleman, but was aimed against a custom that has come into vogue among us to the detriment, as we believe, of the musical part of our conventions and to their devotional spirit.

Boxes of Gold.

Sent for Letters About Grape-Nuts.

330 boxes of gold and greenbacks will be sent to persons writing interesting and truthful letters about the good that has been done them by the use of Grape-Nuts food.

10 little boxes, each containing a $10 gold piece, will be sent the 10 writers of the most interesting letters.

20 boxes each containing a $5 gold piece to the 20 next most interesting writers, and a $1 greenback will go to each of the 300 next best. A committee of three, not members of the Postum Co., will make decision between Dec. 1st and 10th, 1901.

Write plain, sensible letters, giving detailed facts of ill-health caused from improper food, and explain the improvement, the gain in strength, in weight, or in brain power after using Grape-Nuts food.

It is a profound fact that most ails of humanity come from improper and non-nourishing food, such as white bread, hot biscuit, starchy and uncooked cereals, etc.

A change to perfectly cooked, predigested food like Grape-Nuts, scientifically made and containing exactly the elements nature requires for building the delicate and wonderful cells of brain and body, will quickly change a half sick person to a well person. Food, good food, is Nature's strongest weapon of defense.

Include in letter the true names and addresses, carefully written, of 20 persons, not very well, to whom we can write regarding the food cure by Grape-Nuts.

Almost every one interested in pure food is willing to have his or her name appear in the papers for such help as they may offer the human race. A request, however, to omit name will be respected. Try for one of the 330 prizes. Everyone has an equal show. Don't write poetry, but just honest and interesting facts about the good you have obtained from the pure food Grape-Nuts. If a man or woman has found a true way to get well and keep well, it should be a pleasure to stretch a helping hand to humanity by telling the facts.

Write your name and address plainly on letter and mail promptly to the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

Milligan College.

The present is the fullest opening which we have ever had of college students. Our Young Ladies' Home is full before the close of the first month. We have not sufficient college room. We are seeking to do our best under the difficulties and believe that God will lead us along the way that will enable the buildings to be enlarged and the work widened. He alone knows how that will be done just now, but we hope to find some man or men and women who love God and love the human race, that can be made to understand the situation of this institution and its wide possibilities. Our young people can be brought here and started into a course of usefulness to the world. Very many of them would never have the advantage of a higher Christian education if they had to go into other parts of the country to start. The school must remain here to be accessible to them. They are a class of young men and women with as great possibilities as any in the world.

Our greatest need at present is a young ladies' home. The one we now have is entirely too small. It can be used for a young men's dormitory. We need a Home to accommodate about seventy-five or a hundred young ladies. We pray that God may open the understanding and the hearts of some good men and women who have money and want to do the greatest possible good with it, to investigate the question here, that they may see for themselves what could be done to advance the interest of our race from this place.

We hope that great good may come out of the Minneapolis convention and the cause of missions receive fresh life and power. We congratulate those who shall have the pleasure of being there. They have our joy and our prayer in their fellowship.

Your brother in Christ,
J. HOPWOOD.

William Woods College.

It will be gratifying to the churches throughout the state, to the 160,000 Disciples, and to the friends of education everywhere, to know that this institution has made the largest enrollment of boarding pupils in its history. The recent redemption from debt and the change of name have contributed to this great success. The school has always enjoyed a reputation for thoroughness and its graduates have won golden opinions in the school room and have taken high rank wherever they have gone. The unparalleled drought which threatened every business interest did not prove to be an insurmountable obstruction in the pathway of its progress.

During the summer the benevolence of the widow of Col. D. M. Dulany, of Hannibal, built and equipped ten music rooms, thereby enlarging the capacity of the school and enabling the management to accommodate 114 boarders, while heretofore 99 is the largest number ever received in the building at any one time.

The building is now lighted by electricity, the heating apparatus is being overhauled and the school in every respect will be more fully equipped. The institution is to be congratulated upon the fact that it has a finance committee composed of Dr. W. S. Woods, of Kansas City; Mr. George A. Mahan, of Hannibal, and Mr. J. T. Mitchell, of Centralia, who stand ready to receive, invest and rightly manage all funds committed to them in trust, whether as memorial funds, scholarships or endowment. The long hard struggle through which the school has passed is now crowned with abundant success. It merits the support of the brotherhood and the president of the institution and the board of directors expect to press its claims on the people for speedy enlargement and endowment. By provision of the charter the benevolent feature of the DIVIDENDS OF FROM 16 TO 80 PER CENT THE FIRST YEAR!

Stock of large, producing Oil Companies can be bought at par now. The opportunity will not last long.

After six months' experience in the Beaumont oil fields I have returned to St. Louis as the representative of several Spindletop companies owning gushers whose product is being marketed at a large profit on long-time contracts, thus insuring dividends for years to come. It is my object to handle only substantial, dividend-paying stocks which yield quick returns to the investor. An intimate acquaintance with the Beaumont fields and the large operators there qualifies me to do this.

I will sell a limited amount of Heywood oil stock on extraordinarily advantageous terms, lower than any other agent can sell it. A quarterly dividend of four per cent will be paid by the Heywood Company this week from sales of oil. The next dividend promises to be even larger. This stock will go fast, and orders for it should be sent to me at once.

I also have a few hundred shares of Ground Floor stock to sell at par, $1 per share. This company is capitalized for only $100,000 and owns a piece of land on Spindletop Hill which to-day is worth $75,000. Its Spindletop property is four times as large as that of the Lucky Dime Oil Company, whose capital stock is more than twice as great. It has one gusher yielding 70,000 barrels of oil a day and has closed contracts to sell 90,000 barrels of oil. The money thus obtained will be paid out in dividends. It has also sold a gusher on one corner of its land for a very large sum. This money will also go into the treasury and will be paid to the stockholders in dividends. Alba Heywood, of the Heywood Oil Company, one of the organizers of the Ground Floor company, writes me the latter company will pay a dividend of from 20 to 40 per cent the first six months. This is a sure chance to have your idle money double itself within a short time.

The German-American Oil Company has sold the entire output of its seven wells in the Corsicana (Texas) oil field. This company has two of the largest gushers on Spindletop Hill, and is marketing its Beaumont oil in Europe, where one of its directors is actively engaged in selling it. Shares $100 par value. This stock is quoted at $105 on the oil exchanges.

I will also sell a limited amount of Trenton Rock oil stock at 60 cents per share par value. This company is capitalized for $300,000, owns one of the best gushers on Spindletop Hill and has sold part of the product of its well, assuring dividends at an early date.

I will sell Spindletop property, guaranteeing the purchaser a gusher, the purchase money to be deposited in the bank and not to be delivered until the well is "in," a satisfactory gusher.

Figures on Beaumont Oil by the car-load at St. Louis cheerfully furnished to fuel consumers. Accurate and trustworthy information concerning the Beaumont field given to all inquirers.

school forever remains the same, but, in the future as in the past, the institution must rely upon the patronage of persons who can pay, for otherwise there is no adequate income to carry out the purpose for which the school was founded. Experience has shown that the co-education of rich and poor, orphans and those not orphans, yields the best results. Each class supplies what the other lacks.

"The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century."

This sumptuous volume of over five hundred pages, edited by J. H. Garrison and published by the CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING COMPANY, is timely and a valuable addition to the historical literature of the Disciples of Christ. The time from 1809 to 1899 is divided into periods of somewhat unequal length, each of which represents and emphasizes a certain condition of things in the progress of what is called "The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century." Each period is represented by a different writer who presents from his point of view the facts of the period which he describes. Thus we have the general represented by the editor in his "Introduction" and "Conclusions"; the "Introductory Period" by Prof. C. L. Loos; the "Period of Organization" by B. B. Tyler; the "Turbulent Period" by W. T. Moore; the "Transition Period" by T. W. Grafton; the "Period of Revival of Home Missions" by Benjamin L. Smith; the "Period of Foreign Missions" by A. McLean; and the "Period of Woman's Work" by Lois A. White. These various divisions represent very well the different steps in the progress of the "Reformation." Each of the authors has apparently done his best to cover his field, but the result is very unequal, as would be expected. In some cases the personality of the author is so continually seen that a reader would be almost unerringly to conclude that he was the storm center of that period. In other cases the style is that of the platform speech rather than the severe, accurate, impartial style of the real historian. Taking the book as a whole the impression is made that it is an argument for certain things based on certain facts, rather than a clear, full statement of facts from which the intelligent reader could form his own conclusions. The chapter on "Woman's Work" is a fairly good essay but not what it ought to be either in fact or expression. It is not a historical document such as the Christian Woman's Board of Missions is fairly entitled to. Another hand should write the history of the C. W. B. M. for its first twenty-five years. But the book is a good one, written by good and true disciples of the Lord, in a good spirit, in the midst of present, pressing duties, and with a good purpose. Naturally such a composite volume would be uneven and unequal in its parts. The writers were not of the same grade in experience, habits of thought, knowledge of the subject, and in what may be called the "historical instinct." But it is a good book, of great value and ought to have a large circle of readers.

A Japanese Summer Resort.

August 21, we left Yokohama for Karuizawa, a distance of 130 miles. The trip was made by rail. All the railways in Japan are narrow-gauge. The first lines were built by the government, and the question whether it shall purchase those afterward constructed by private companies is much discussed. Fares are of three classes: First, second and third. Travel is cheap. First-class is the equivalent of one and one-half cents per mile, second class one cent and third-class one-half cent per mile. The third-class is very poor, hardly as good accommodations as a "caboose" on an American freight train. We traveled second class, which is good enough. No drinking water and other ordinary accommodations are provided. Baggage is checked as in the United States, each first-class passenger being allowed 100 pounds and each second-class passenger 60 pounds, free of charge. The trains run slow, about fifteen to twenty-five miles per hour.

We passed through great rice fields, pear orchards and fields of small mulberry growth used in the silk industry. We saw idols and heathen shrines on every haud. After passing through a rich and charming valley we came to mountains, not surpassed for beauty in all the United States. In passing up the mountains to Karuizawa, 3,270 feet above the sea level, the route is unique. The grade is one foot to every fifteen, and almost the whole way is a succession of bridges and tunnels. There are twenty-six tunnels in a distance of seven miles. The engine is placed behind the train, and with a system of cog-wheels working on rack-rails, the trip is easily and safely made. The total tunneling aggregates almost three miles. There is a curious arrangement to prevent inconvenience from heat and smoke in the large tunnels. As soon as the train has entered a tunnel a curtain is drawn at the lower end, which prevents the smoke from being sucked up along the tunnel. This could be done in the United States if we had the engines on the other ends of the trains.

Karuizawa is a delightful summer retreat. The temperature is seldom excessive during the daytime and always cool at night.

Hither the missionaries come from every quarter of Japan and many from China, to rest from the excessive heat. About three hundred missionaries gathered here this summer, about twenty-five of whom were from China. Among this number was Dr. Wm. Ashmore, of Amoy, China, who has been a missionary in that land for fifty years—a grand old man now 76 years old. The Baptists have a right to be proud of him. Dr. Tewksbury and Miss Sheffield, who were in the siege at Pekin, were also present. The whole number of missionaries in Japan is about 750.

All the missionaries in Japan in the employ of the Foreign Society have been here. Miss Wyrick is also here. They are well and in good spirits and are most hopeful for the future of the work. During the past year there have been 137 baptisms; 54 of this number since the first of May. Eighteen were baptized in Tokyo in one day not long since. Many more believe and will be baptized when they receive some necessary teaching.

A great religious revival is now sweeping over Japan and the effect is being felt in all mission stations. Our missionaries are planning for a great forward movement during the coming year. We now have nearly a thousand members in Japan. The missionaries are all harmonious and are expecting great things. I have had some delightful conferences with them concerning the different departments of the work. They are impatient for a larger force in Japan and for more money to push forward. Our work in this empire has never been more promising than at this time. There are open doors on every hand. The field should appeal with great power to well educated and consecrated young men in America. Dr. Ashmore said to me to-day that stronger men were demanded for this eastern field all the time. This is true. Strongmen level-headed men and men with a robust faith are demanded to grapple with the problems of this heathen land. And the needs of Japan should appeal with wondrous force to all our churches in America. We could use wisely at least $100,000 in this field alone every year.

The missionaries have given us a most cordial reception. They are doing all in their power for our comfort. They keep me on the move. Meetings, receptions, conferences, etc., consume the time rapidly. I have been here a week. To-morrow we all go to Tokyo to attend the annual meeting of our Japanese brethren. This is the best place in Japan to spend a week in the study of missionary questions. I am glad our missionaries came here to spend a little time during the hot season. They need the rest and change. Heathenism is depressing and exhausting. Its sins and stenches are a constant draft upon the bodies and nerves and hearts of the workers. In this country the atmosphere is lacking in ozone. At Tokyo or Osaka the atmosphere contains one-third less ozone than in America. The heat is oppressive. Five years is the average time a missionary spends in this land. Many die, others break down and are driven home. The average term of our missionaries here is less than five years. The longest term of service of our missionaries on this field at this time is nine years. Japanese food, Japanese climate and overwork caused the death of C. E. Garst in December, 1898.

There is no more delightful place for rest in the empire than this. It is cool and quiet. It is only an ordinary village and the cheap wooden houses of the foreign summer residents dot the neighboring plain like the beginnings of a new settlement in the back woods. The largest active volcano in Japan is only seven miles away. It is almost 9,000 feet high. It belches forth smoke and ashes and hot stones almost constantly. Mrs. Rains thinks it worth a trip to Japan to see it. The crater is almost a mile in circumference. There are many other mountains near here. There is a union church erected by the missionaries of all boards, except the Church of England. They built a small chapel of their own. During the season of rest there is one large communion service. All participate except the Church of England and the Baptists. Our missionaries and native Christians commune every Sunday morning at 8:30. They meet in the home of one of the missionaries for this service. One of the most touching and impressive services I ever attended was this meeting last Sunday morning. Some of the songs and prayers and talks were in Japanese. Every native Christian made an offering.

Our home here has been with E. S. Stevens and it has been a delightful one. One afternoon Brother and Sister Stevens gave us a reception and invited a number of the older missionaries of other boards. This gave us a fine opportunity to meet and confer with many of the oldest and most distinguished workers in Japan and China. I have also had four different conferences with our own missionary force. We have talked over the work face to face and I see it clearer and understand it far better. I begin my journey to-morrow to visit the mission stations at Tokyo, Akita, Sendai and Osaka, and also the various out-stations near these centers of work. One or more of the missionaries will be with me all the time. I have reached a land where I cannot talk to be understood without a helper. Expect to be in Japan until October 3, when we will sail from Kobe for China.

My health is better than when I left America. Mrs. Rains is in perfect health. Only one thing troubles me. I notice from the reports in the papers the receipts at home for foreign missions are not what they ought to

THE RACE

Does not depend on the start but on the finish. It's staying power which carries many a runner to victory. It's like that in business. Many a man starts off in the race for business success with a burst of speed which seems to assure victory. Presently he begins to falter and at last he falls and fails. The cause? Generally "stomach trouble." No man is stronger than his stomach. Business haste leads to careless and irregular eating. The stomach and other organs of digestion and nutrition become diseased. The body is inadequately nourished and so grows weak.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery cures diseases of the stomach and other organs of digestion and nutrition. It strengthens the stomach and so strengthens the whole body which depends on the stomach for the nourishment from which strength is made.

There is no alcohol in "Golden Medical Discovery," and it is entirely free from opium, cocaine and all other narcotics.

Accept no substitute for the "Discovery." There is no medicine "just as good" for diseases of the stomach and allied organs.

"Your 'Golden Medical Discovery' has performed a wonderful cure," writes Mr. M. H. House, of Charleston, Franklin Co., Ark. "I had the worst case of dyspepsia, the doctors say, that they ever saw. After trying seven doctors and everything I could hear of, with no benefit, I tried Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and now I am cured."

Southern Indiana Notes.

There have been six additions here in the past month, three by primary obedience. All departments of the work are in good shape.

Elder E. W. Sears is helping me in the work and preaching in the churches around Bedford on Sunday. Harley Jackson, our late assistant, has gone to Butler College.

M. J. Ferguson, of Los Angeles, Cal., preached for us a few times lately and has helped two of our churches in the county. His plea is that holy living is the real proof of our love for Christ. "He that hath this hope in him purifies himself even as he is pure." He has a remarkable insight into God's word. Churches needing a strong preacher to deepen their spiritual life should secure this devoted and scholarly man of God for a two weeks' meeting.

I shall help Orleans church, just over the county line, in a two weeks' meeting soon, not preaching for them on Sundays, however.

We have lately organized a debating club in the church, with Mrs. Grace Homan as president, which is proving to be a success. Mrs. H. is the daughter of Bro. Joseph Franklin.

Oklahoma Convention.

The eleventh annual missionary convention of the Christian churches of Oklahoma was right royally entertained by Bro. L. Williams and the church at Stillwater. Here we have one of the best churches in the territory. This church, with its splendid Sunday-school, is the direct fruit of Oklahoma missions. The board of missions sent Bro. Virtes Williams, now our corresponding secretary, to Stillwater a few years past with instructions to remain there until he had developed the church. Should any one in or out of the territory entertain doubts as to the wisdom of continuing Oklahoma missions, let such one visit Stillwater, the seat of one of our best territorial institutions of learning, the A. and M. college, and be convinced.

We were fortunate in having with us in this convention two able men, G. A. Hoffmann, of St. Louis, Mo., and R. H. Waggoner, of Kansas City, Mo. These brethren rendered invaluable assistance in making the convention the splendid success that it was.

Bro. Hoffmann preached the opening sermon of the convention on Tuesday evening.

Bro. W. A. Humphrey, who has done so much for Oklahoma work, in the absence of Bro. Dick T. Morgan, presided over the first session of the convention.

The Sunday-school section was presided over by Bro. Hutchison, of Perry. The reports showed that our schools are in fine condition throughout the territory.

Our C. W. B. M. sisters, with Sister J. M. Monroe, of El Reno, as president, held one of the very best sessions of the entire convention. Sister Monroe was re-elected president for another year.

All the great interests of the church were ably represented at this convention. Church extension, home missions, foreign missions, education, Oklahoma missions—not one was slighted. The report of Virtes Williams, as corresponding secretary, was very gratifying, and showed a vast amount of work done with more than satisfactory results. Bro. Williams was re-employed for another year by the board. The bulk of his salary is paid by the A. C. M. S.

Brethren R. S. Smedley and Howell Smith accomplished fine work for the Lord in western Oklahoma. Bro. Smith pledged at our convention one year ago, a year's work without remuneration. He faithfully kept this promise, organized four churches and preached constantly and for his services received six dollars.

Bro. and Sister Smedley purchased a "Billhorn Telescope" organ and traveled overland in their work. During the year they drove about 2,800 miles, did a vast amount of work and received for their combined labors just a little more than $100.

Bro. C. H. Hilton, our C. W. B. M. evangelist, though in the field but a few months, had a good report. We believe him to be the right man in the right place.

The board of missions has opened up work at the three county seats in the "new country"—Lawton, Hobart and Anadarko. The board of church extension furnished money to buy lots, and very desirable locations for churches were secured in these new towns.

Services are held each Lord's day in good tents. At Lawton, where Bro. Carpenter preaches, there are 200 men in the new church. They have not had time to count the women as yet, but they are there. Bro. J. M. Monroe and the church at El Reno were the prime movers and factors in starting the work at Anadarko. The convention closed with a fine sermon by Bro. S. D. Dutcher, of Oklahoma City. Bro. Dutcher dropped into the work of the territory by the close of the convention, as an old hand. He was placed on the territorial board.

The convention was very fine, and we face the new year well organized and hopeful of accomplishing great things for God. Oklahoma is evidently the ripest mission field on the globe to-day. At least that is the way we see it. More than $500 was pledged for the new year.

Wonderful Cures By Swamp-Root.

To Prove what the World-famous Discovery, Swamp-Root, will do for YOU, all Our Readers may have a Sample Bottle Free by Mail.

Weak and unhealthy kidneys are responsible for more sickness and suffering than any other disease and if permitted to continue fatal results are sure to follow.

Your other organs may need attention—but your kidneys most, because they do most and need attention first.

So when your kidneys are weak or out of order you can understand how quickly your entire body is affected, and how every organ seems to fail to do its duty.

If you are sick or "feel badly," begin taking Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney, liver and bladder remedy, because as soon as your kidneys are well they will help all the other organs to health. A trial will convince anyone.

Among the many cures of this wonderful medicine, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the ones which the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST publishes this week speak in the highest terms of the wonderful curative properties of this great remedy:

DES MOINES, IA., Oct. 20, 1900.
"I had been out of health for a long time, and I was taking medicine from a doctor's prescription when I received your sample bottle. I stopped taking the doctor's medicine and used the sample bottle of Swamp-Root. I afterwards took two of your large bottles, bought at my drug store, and they cured me entirely, and I have not felt so well for years. I thank you very much for sending me the sample bottle."

Mrs. H. N. Wheeler, of 117 High Rock St., Lynn, Mass., writes on Nov. 2, 1900: "About 18 months ago I had a very severe spell of sickness. I was extremely sick for three weeks, and when I finally was able to leave my bed I was left with excruciating pains in my back. My water at times looked very like coffee. I could pass but little at a time, and then only after suffering great pain. My physical condition was such that I had no strength and was all run down. The doctors said my kidneys were not affected, and while I Did Not Know I Had Kidney Trouble.

I somehow felt certain my kidneys were the cause of my trouble. My sister, Mrs. C. E. Littlefield, of Lynn, advised me to give Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root a trial. I procured a bottle and inside of three days commenced to get relief. I followed up that bottle with another, and at the completion of this one found I was completely cured. My strength returned, and to-day I am as well as ever. My business is that of canvasser, I am on my feet a great deal of the time, and have to use much energy in getting around. My cure is, therefore, all the more remarkable, and is exceedingly gratifying to me."

Let every teacher or officer contemplating the purchase of a Bible, be sure and buy the American Revision. You will see the great advantage in every reading, while the price is as for the old version.

Let the parents in their gifts to the youths of the family make such a gift as will be beneficial and appreciated in the years to come.

J. H. Jones wishes to change his field of work about January 1, and it is to me a pleasure to commend such to the brotherhood. He is active and zealous in all departments of the church and is most acceptable in the pulpit. The congregation calling him to their work will make no mistake, while Garden City will regret his leaving.

Some of the communities have continued their Bible school work with great difficulty, among them being Louisville. The brethren are scattered over a large territory, the weather is often bad, the roads are heavy, almost impassable and the hearts are discouraged. But by persistent faithfulness, a few continue and do their best. Your servant visits them, revives the workers, enlists others and is helped on the way. It was so during my last visit with pastor S. W. Marr and the results were such that all took heart and thanked God. The church and school were peculiarly kind to me and I thank them very much for it.

C. G. McMillen and Pickering are not satisfied with what is, as no good worker should be, but are seeking the newer ideas all the time. By the way, the apportionment accepted by our good friend, F. E. Blanchard, is paid in full and you may have noticed that that is one of the ways of these up to date people, they are never behind in anything.

Our Rally Day was fine and the eighty-two schools keeping the day were most fortunate. Vandalia reports a great day of it, with more than the apportionment, at which W. H. Kern and Brother Dye are happy.

Let every school that can combine our rally day offering with one for home missions, both worthy and needy. Do not forget to remit us immediately. H. F. DAVIS.

Good Coffee Maker.Experience With the Berry.

"I have gained twenty-five pounds since I left off coffee and began drinking Postum Food Coffee in its place.

I had become very thin in flesh and suffered tortures with heartburn, was a nervous wreck with headache practically all the time until one dreadful day when the good doctor told me I must quit drinking coffee, as he had nothing left to try, to relieve me.

I could not drink tea and had tried everything else, even Postum, but put it hy at the first trial, because it was tasteless.

Forced to it again, I determined to see if it could not be made palatable and found at once that when I followed directions and boiled it long enough, that I not only liked it but gave it to my husband for several days without his finding it out. I have the name of making splendid coffee, and we always used the best, but of late I have given Postum to guests many times in place of coffee and have never been detected yet.

Our four children have not drunk coffee for three years, and all have gained health and flesh since using Postum. One son, who was always sick, has been greatly benefited by its use, and as above stated, I have gained twenty-five pounds since taking up Postum. I am healthier to-day than I have been for years and give Postum all the credit. Please do not use my name in public."

State Mission Notes.

The last Sunday in September was spent in Wishart, Polk county, dedicating the church. This is the result of our mission work. They have a good house, not large, yet large enough, commandingly situated, it is neat and trim, and strange to say it cost only about $650. Of this, $316 was still to be raised, and while the full amount was not realized, it was taken care of, and the house was dedicated to the Lord. One year ago Bro. J. R. Blunt, by my advice, was called to hold a meeting at Bolivar, and out of that meeting grew one near Wishart that has resulted in the church organization and this happy dedication. Bro. R. B. Havener, of the Bible-school board, had also, in the meantime, held a short meeting and strengthened the congregation. Brother Blunt was with me during the services and was a true yokefellow indeed. He continued the meeting.

The mission work done in the state in the year which closed Aug. 31, grows on me all the time. Comparisons, which are said to be odious, are often indulged in, contrasting our collections with those of former years. I have been looking over the tables of work done and I find that the last twelve months stand right up by the side of these boasted years of the past wonderfully. We organized 60 churches this year and 110 Bible-schools, 3,596 souls were added to the church, 1,686 of which were baptized. In 1887-1888, when the receipts were $10,506.97, there were 1,951 baptized, 263 more than last year. The same year 35 churches were organized, a little over half of the number last year. In 1888-1889, the receipts were $11,151.52 and the baptisms 2,150, and churches organized, 45. These were the days for which we sigh, call them "good old days," and wail on account of present degeneracy, when the fact is, we are getting nearly, if not quite, equal results from the expenditure of a little over half the money.

It is a marvel to everyone who studies the figures, how so much is done with so little. The fact is, we are striving to learn all the time how to accomplish the most with the least possible expenditure. That reminds me again, something was said about the expense of carrying on our work. Now listen, every $2.50 spent by our board in what is called expenses, resulted in the raising of $1,000 for state missions in the state. That is, one-fourth of one per cent. went for expenses. We court the freest investigation. There is no business known to me that is conducted on such an economical basis. The constant query of the board is, "How can we make this money do the greatest work in the mission field?"

The board has just held its first meeting in the new year, and the sad thing is that our funds are almost exhausted. It is three months to state mission day, January 12, 1902. We must have funds for present needs or else call our men from their posts and beat a retreat. This would be our humiliation. We cannot, we must not. What then? We resolve to make a direct appeal to the thousands of brethren in the state for each to send one dollar to help us in this great crisis. To thousands it is a small matter, but to us it means the power to carry on our work. We are going to make this appeal personally, but don't wait for that, send it now. Instant response is absolutely needed. A failure now means ruin to many of our mission enterprises. Don't delay, act promptly, do it now. Who will be the first?

Yours in His name,

T. A. ABBOTT.

Book Notes.

Have you read The Young Man from Middlefield, by Jessie Brown Pounds? It is the latest and one of the best stories issued by the Christian Publishing Company. Every father having children old enough to read should make it his rule to provide from two to four new books each month for his family. Remember, fathers, that if you select and provide the books your children read, you can keep control, in a large measure at least, of their mental food. If your children are worth much, they are certain to do considerable reading, in this day and generation, and if you do not provide the reading matter, they will. What kind will they choose? Not always the best, perhaps, nor as good as you could select. Ponder on this problem, and when you send us a book order, include The Young Man from Middlefield. Price, 75 cents.

Doctrines and Dogmas of Mormonism, by D. H. Bays, is indubitably the best of its kind. No other work tells so much about Mormonism, or tells it so accurately. Mr. Bays, the author, was for over a quarter of a century a prominent preacher and well-known leader in the Mormon Church. He knows it from the inside. He is an authority on this subject, and there can be no questioning his knowledge. In many sections of the country Mormon missionaries and evangelists are to-day perniciously active in their work of proselytizing. Wherever one of these emissaries goes to work, the Christians in that community should prepare themselves to meet the false claims and fallacious arguments that he will put forth. The very best preparation of this kind is the careful reading of Mr. Bays's book. The author, so long an advocate of Mormonism, is now a successful preacher among us. The book is a fine volume of 39 chapters, 460 pages. Price, $1.50.

Nothing can be more interesting than the study of the lives and careers of prominent Bible characters, and particularly those of the Old Testament, concerning which the average individual is not very well informed. What romance and adventure there was in the life of Moses, for example. What character in fiction has a greater career of adventure? A slave babe, adopted son of an Egyptian princess, prince of Egypt and prospective heir to the throne, slayer of a cruel master, fugitive and exile from the land of his adoption, wanderer in poverty and rags through a strange land, champion of the imperiled Midianite shepherdesses, husband of the girl he had rescued, leader and spokesman of his people in Egypt, wizard and wonder-worker before Pharaoh, rescuer of a nation from bondage, guide and prophet of his race in the wilderness, the mouth-piece and medium of God in speaking to men, and finally laid to rest in a grave that angels prepared! Does any popular hero in fiction have a more strenuous career? D. R. Dungan, in his book; Moses, the Man of God, tells the whole story with a wealth of detail that gives it thrilling interest. It will charm you. It is a book of 303 pages profusely illustrated, bound in cloth. Price, $1.00.

And then there are also Esther and Elijah, of whom M. M. Davis has written such delightful biographical narratives. And there are King Saul and Jehu, whose careers have been taken by Breckenridge Ellis as the bases of two charming stories. You ought to have every one of these works in your home, and thus make the learning of Bible history easy and pleasant to your children. King Saul is $1.00, and the price of each of the other three volumes mentioned is 75 cents. Besides these, there is Shem, by Ellis; a story dealing with Jerusalem and its people in the days of captivity. 299 pages; price 50 cents. These biblical historical romances have a positive value, which should not be overlooked or neglected.

Now here is a first-class opportunity to secure all these historical romances very cheaply. In the preceding paragraphs we have enumerated six volumes—Moses, the Man of God, Queen Esther, Elijah, King Saul, In the Days of Jehu and Shem. Regular price of the six volumes, $4.75. For the present and until further notice, we will send them by express, not prepaid, for only $3.50. We shall be very much mistaken in our guess if we are not kept busy filling orders for this great set of books.

Alexander Campbell's great debate with Robert Owen, the noted infidel, was stenographically reported and is published under the title The Evidences of Christianity. This is a great book. Mr. Owen marshaled every possible argument and brought out every conceivable objection to the religion of Jesus, only to have each new assault repulsed by the clear logic of the Defender of the Faith. The price of this volume is now but $1.00.

Are you a Christian Endeavorer? Is your society rather "run down" and lifeless? Do you desire to revivify and resuscitate it? Send 25 cents for a copy of W. W. Dowling's Helping Hand. It is a book which tells all about the organization and working of C. E. societies, and will show you where the trouble lies and how to remedy it.

We supply a better grade of baptismal pants than others offer at a lower price than others ask. At least, our customers say our goods are better and we know our price is from $1.00 to $2.00 less, per pair, than is asked for the inferior goods. If you have been getting unsatisfactory goods, give ours a trial, and learn that we are not claiming too much for them. Price given on application.

It has been a number of years since "Hezekiah Hobson" wrote Troubles of the Beanville Church, but the little pamphlet sells and sells. It is the funniest thing in all our literature, and has done a great deal to laugh "anti-ism" out of existence. Price 5 cents.

Turn to pages 60, 61 and 62 of our catalogue and examine our list of tracts and pamphlets. You will surely find some that you can use to good advantage in doing quiet, effective missionary work among your personal acquaintances. Prices on tracts are very reasonable, especially in large quantities.

Do You Read the Bible?

ARKANSAS.

Hope, Oct. 11.—Moved to this place six weeks ago. Preach here two Sundays each month. A noble band of workers here. All lines of work looking up; congregations and Sunday-school larger. We began our mid-week prayer-meeting two weeks ago with 16 present. This week had 40. Also one confession Sunday night and three more Tuesday night at our song service, who will be baptized Sunday.—W. O. BREEDEN, pastor.

ILLINOIS.

Normal, Oct. 7.—Four additions recently.—E. B. BARNES.

Maroa, Oct. 8.—Just closed a 13 days' meeting at Texas church. Audiences very large. There were six added, four by obedience, one reclaimed and one from the Christian union people. Work at Maroa is prosperous.—S. ELWOOD FISHER.

Waverly, Oct. 7.—The church at Loami is rejoicing because of a large accession to their membership as the result of a meeting recently held there. It began Sept. 1 and continued for 31 days resulting in 34 additions, 28 by baptism and six otherwise, one from the Baptists and two from the Methodists, the rest from the world. Bro. and Sister Williamson led in song and praise service until Sept. 26. Bro G. W. Cline was with us the last week. Other than this the preaching was done by the writer. This makes 55 additions to the two churches with which I have been laboring since the first of the year.—W. J. BATTENFIELD, pastor.

INDIANA.

Ambia, Oct. 10.—We are in a good meeting at Prairie Green, five and one-half miles northwest of Ambia, Ind. Thirteen additions to date. Bro. R. Leland Brown, of Newman, Ill., is doing the preaching. Will report at close of meeting.—WERNER KING.

Mt. Vernon, Oct. 11.—Wm. A. Ward, minister at Mt. Vernon, Ind., recently held a meeting at the Baker school-house, a few miles from Mt. Vernon on the Kentucky side. Fourteen sermons were delivered and at the close of the series a church was organized with 21 members. Six of these had been Christians before and the rest came, some from the sects and some to obey Christ for the first time. This new congregation includes some of the most influential and prosperous farmers in that district.

COLDS

The quickest relief for a cold is by Scott's emulsion of cod-liver oil.

You will find the edge taken off in a night; and, in three or four days, you'll be wondering whether that cold amounted to anything anyhow.

That's relief. If you tackle it quick, the relief is quick; if you wait, the relief won't come—you know how colds hang on.

We'll send you a little to try, if you like.

Sac City, Oct. 9.—Am assisting the pastor, D. F. Snider, in a meeting at this place. Prospects very bright. A fine church, a harmonious membership, an excellent choir and an enthusiastic soul-seeking all point to success. The meeting will last till Nov. 4.—A. R. DAVIS, singing evangelist.

KENTUCKY.

Barbourville, Oct. 9.—Our meeting is now ten days old. Seven by confession, and one by letter. There is the most perfect co-operation and love. We expect more to follow those who have made the good confession. Bro. T. M. Myers, Asheville, N. C., is doing the preaching. It will greatly gratify his friends to learn that his health has so far improved that he is able to work again. God sent to us a great blessing when he sent Bro. Myers to us.—J. J. COLE Monticello, Oct. 11.—We are in a short meeting here with good interest; will close Sunday night. I can engage for other work. Address me at Lexington, Ky.—C. M. HUGHES.

MISSOURI.

The M. E's let us use their house; will report again at the close. Several requests are in for meetings; will respond as quick as we can. We could use a good leader of songs and soloist at small salary. If any one should write me on this subject, please enclose stamp. Permanent address, Altamont, Mo. Its True Character.

Catarrh is Not a Local Disease.

Although physicians have known for years that catarrh was not a local disease, but a constitutional or blood disorder, yet the mass of the people still continue to believe it is simply a local trouble, and try to cure it with purely local remedies, like powders, snuffs, ointments and inhalers.

These local remedies, if they accomplish anything at all, simply give a very temporary relief, and it is doubtful if a permanent cure of catarrh has ever been accomplished by local sprays, washes and inhalers. They may clear the mucous membrane from the excessive secretion, but it returns in a few hours as bad as ever, and the result can hardly be otherwise because the blood is loaded with catarrhal poison, and it requires no argument to convince anyone that local washes and sprays have absolutely no effect on the blood.

Dr. Ainsworth says, "I have long since discontinued the use of sprays and washes for catarrh of head and throat, because they simply relieve and do not cure."

"For some time past I have used only one treatment for all forms of catarrh, and the results have been uniformly good; the remedy I use and recommend is Stuart's Catarrh Tablets, a pleasant and harmless preparation sold by druggists at 50c., but my experience has proven one package of Stuart's Catarrh Tablets to be worth a dozen local treatments."

"The tablets are composed of Hydrastin, Sanguinaria, Red Gum, Guaiacal and other safe antiseptics, and any catarrh sufferer can use them with full assurance that they contain no poisonous opiates, and that they are the most reasonable and successful treatment for radical cure of catarrh at present known to the profession."

Stuart's Catarrh Tablets are large, pleasant-tasting 20-grain lozenges, to be dissolved in the mouth and reach the delicate membranes of throat and trachea, and immediately relieve any irritation, while their final action on the blood removes the catarrhal poison from the whole system. All druggists sell them at 50c. for complete treatment.

Family Circle

God Still Rules.

By Mrs. Philip F. King.

The nation mourns, but, through her tears,
The golden gem of faith appears;
Faith in the hero of her love,
Faith in the God who reigns above.

The life of him we honored most
Can not to history be lost;
'Tis written on our nation's heart,
'Tis of her very soul a part.

May we not take the stepping stone,
The life of him not lived alone,
And build for us a higher claim,
A nobler, purer, better name?
A name that man will honor most,
A name redeemed among God's host.

President Roosevelt on the Bible.

The following words, spoken by Mr. Roosevelt four months ago when he was vice-president, have acquired a new and wider interest since his accession to the presidency. At the annual meeting of the Long Island Bible Society, held at Oyster Bay, Mr. Roosevelt delivered the following address, which we are permitted to reprint from the Bible Society Record:

The Bible is not only essential to Christianity, but essential to good citizenship. As you all know, there are certain truths which are so very true that we call them truisms; and yet I think we often half forget them in practice. Every thinking man, when he thinks, realizes what a very large number of people tend to forget that the teachings of the Bible are so interwoven and entwined with our whole civic and social life that it would be literally—I do not mean figuratively, I mean literally—impossible for us to figure to ourselves what that life would be if these teachings were removed. We would lose almost all the standards by which we now judge both public and private morals; all the standards toward which we, with more or less of resolution, strive to raise ourselves. Almost every man who has by his life-work added to the sum of human achievement of which the race is proud, of which our people are proud, almost every such man has based his life-work largely upon the teachings of the Bible. Sometimes it has been done unconsciously, more often consciously; and among the very greatest men a disproportionately large number have been diligent and close students of the Bible at first hand.

Lincoln—sad, patient, kindly Lincoln, who, after bearing upon his weary shoulders for four years a greater burden than that borne by any other man of the nineteenth century, laid down his life for the people whom living he had served so well—built up his entire reading upon his early study of the Bible. He had mastered it absolutely; mastered it as later he mastered only one or two other books, notably Shakespeare; mastered it so that he became almost "a man of one book," who knew that book and who instinctively put into practice what he had been taught therein; and he left his life as part of the crowning work of the century that has just closed.

In this country we rightly pride ourselves upon our system of widespread popular education. We most emphatically do right to pride ourselves upon it. It is not merely of inestimable advantage to us; it lies at the root of our power of self-government. But it is not sufficient in itself. We must cultivate the mind; but it is not enough only to cultivate the mind. With education of the mind must go the spiritual teaching which will make us turn the trained intellect to good account. A man whose intellect has been educated, while at the same time his moral education has been neglected, is only the more dangerous to the community because of the exceptional additional power which he has acquired. Surely what I am saying needs no proof; surely the mere statement of it is enough, that education must be education of the heart and conscience no less than of the mind.

It is an admirable thing, a most necessary thing, to have a sound body. It is an even better thing to have a sound mind. But infinitely better than either is to have that, for the lack of which neither sound mind nor a sound body can atone, character. Character is in the long run the decisive factor in the life of individuals and of nations alike.

Sometimes, in rightly putting the stress that we do upon intelligence, we forget the fact that there is something that counts more. It is a good thing to be clever, to be able and smart; but it is a better thing to have the qualities that find their expression in the Decalogue and the Golden Rule. It is a good and necessary thing to be intelligent; it is a better thing to be straight and decent and fearless. It was a Yale professor, Mr. Lounsberry, who remarked that his experience in the class room had taught him "the infinite capacity of the human mind to withstand the introduction of knowledge." Some of you preachers must often feel the same way about the ability of mankind to withstand the introduction of elementary decency and morality.

A man must be honest in the first place; but that by itself is not enough. No matter how good a man is, if he is timid he cannot accomplish much in the world. There is only a very circumscribed sphere of usefulness for the timid good man. So, besides being honest, a man has got to have courage, too. And these two together are not enough. No matter how brave and honest he is, if he is a natural born fool, you can do little with him. Remember the order in which I name them. Honesty first; then courage; then brains, and all are indispensable. We have no room in a healthy community for either the knave, the fool, the weakling, or the coward.

You may look through the Bible from cover to cover and nowhere will you find a line that can be construed into an apology for the man of brains who sins against the light. On the contrary, in the Bible, taking that as a guide, you will find that because much has been given to you much will be expected from you; and a heavier condemnation is to be visited upon the able man who goes wrong than upon his weaker brother who cannot do the harm that the other does, because it is not in him to do it.

So I plead, not merely for training of the mind, but for the moral and spiritual training of the home and the church; the moral and spiritual training that have always been found in, and that have ever accompanied the study of, this book; this book, which in almost every civilized tongue can be described as "The Book," with the certainty of all understanding you when you so describe it. One of the highest tributes of modern times to the worth of the Bible as an educational and moral influence of incalculable value to the whole community came from the great scientist Huxley, who said: "Consider the great historical fact that for three centuries this book has been woven into the life of all that is noblest and best in our history, and that it has become the national epic of our race; that it is written in the noblest and purest English and abounds in exquisite beauties of mere literary form; and finally, that it forbids the veriest hind, who never left his village, to be ignorant of the existence of other countries and other civilizations and of a great past, stretching back to the furthest limits of the oldest nations in the world.

"By the study of what other book could children be so much humanized and made to feel that each figure in that vast historical procession fills, like themselves, but a momentary space in the interval between the eternities?

"The Bible has been the Magna Charta of the poor and of the oppressed. Down to modern times, no state has had a constitution in which the interests of the people are so largely taken into account; in which the duties, so much more than the privileges, of rulers are insisted upon, as that drawn up for Israel in Deuteronomy and Leviticus. Nowhere is the fundamental truth that the welfare of the state, in the long run, depends upon the righteousness of the citizen, so strongly laid down. The Bible is the most democratic book in the world."

The teaching of the Bible to children is, of course, a matter of especial interest to those of us who have families—and, incidentally, I wish to express my profound belief in large families. Older folks often fail to realize how readily a child will grasp a little askew something they do not take the trouble to explain. We cannot be too careful in seeing that the biblical learning is not merely an affair of rote, so that the child may understand what it is being taught. And, by the way, I earnestly hope that you will never make your children learn parts of the Bible as punishment. Do you not know families where this is done? For instance: "You have been a bad child—learn a chapter of Isaiah." And the child learns it as a disagreeable task, and in his mind that splendid and lofty poem and prophecy is forever afterward associated with an uncomfortable feeling of disgrace. I hope you will not make your children learn the Bible in that way, for you can devise no surer method of making a child revolt against all the wonderful beauty and truth of Holy Writ.

Probably there is not a mother or a school teacher here who could not, out of her own experience, give instance after instance of the queer twists that the little minds give to what seem to us perfectly simple sentences. Now I would make a very strong plea for each of us to try and see that the child understands what the words mean. I do not think that it is ordinarily necessary to explain the simple and beautiful stories of the Bible; children understand readily the lessons taught therein; but I do think it necessary to see that they really have a clear idea of what each sentence means, what the words mean.

Probably some of my hearers remember the old Madison Square Presbyterian church in New York when it was under the ministry of Dr. Adams, and those of you who remember the Doctor will, I think, agree with me that he was one of those very rare men with whose name one instinctively tends to couple the adjective "saintly." I attended his church when I was a little boy. The good doctor had a small grandson, and it was accidentally discovered that the little fellow felt a great terror of entering the church when it was vacant. After vain attempts to find out exactly what his reasons were, it happened late one afternoon that the Doctor went to the church with him on some errand. They walked down the aisle together, their steps echoing in the vacant building, the little boy clasping the Doctor's hand and gazing anxiously about. When they reached the pulpit he said, "Grandpa, where is the zeal?" "The what?" asked Dr. Adams. "The zeal," repeated the little boy; "why, don't you know, 'the zeal of thine house hath eaten me up'?" You can imagine the Doctor's astonishment when he found that this sentence had sunk deep into his little grandson's mind as a description of some terrific monster which haunted the inside of churches.

The immense moral influence of the Bible, though of course infinitely the most important, is not the only power it has for good. In addition there is the unceasing influence it exerts on the side of good taste, of good literature, of proper sense of proportion, of simple and straightforward writing and thinking.

This is not a small matter in an age when there is a tendency to read much that even if not actually harmful on moral grounds is yet injurious, because it represents slipshod, slovenly thought and work; not the kind of serious thought, of serious expression, which we like to see in anything that goes into the fiber of our character.

The Bible does not teach us to shirk difficulties, but to overcome them. That is a lesson that each one of us who has children is bound in honor to teach these children if he or she expects to see them become fitted to play the part of men and women in our world.

Again, I want you to think of your neighbors, of the people you know. Don't you, each one of you, know some man (I am sorry to say, perhaps more often, some woman) who gives life an unhealthy turn for children by trying to spare them in the present the very things which would train them to do strong work in the future? Such conduct is not kindness. It is shortsightedness and selfishness; it means merely that the man or woman shrinks from the little inconveniences, to himself or herself, of making the child fit itself to be a good and strong man or woman hereafter. There should be the deepest and truest love for their children in the hearts of all fathers and mothers. Without such love there is nothing but black despair for the family; but the love must respect both itself and the one beloved. It is not true love to invite future disaster by weak indulgence for the moment.

What is true affection for a boy? To bring him up so that nothing rough ever touches him, and at twenty-one turn him out into the world with a moral nature that turns black and blue in great bruises at the least shock from any one of the forces of evil with which he is bound to come in contact? Is that kindness? Indeed, it is not. Bring up your boys with both love and wisdom; and turn them out as men, strong limbed, clear eyed, stout hearted, clean minded, able to hold their own in this great world of work and strife and ceaseless effort.

If we read the Bible aright, we read a book which teaches us to go forth and do the work of the Lord; to do the work of the Lord in the world as we find it; to try to make things better in this world, even if only a little better, because we have lived in it. That kind of work can be done only by the man who is neither a weakling nor a coward; by the man who in the fullest sense of the word is a true Christian, like Great Heart, Bunyan's hero. We plead for a closer and wider and deeper study of the Bible, so that our people may be in fact as well as in theory "doers of the word and not hearers only."

Didn't Know it Was Loaded.

There are a few lines in "The Art of Revolver-Shooting," a recent book by Mr. Walter Winans, the noted revolver shot of Great Britain, which were specially penned for a small but dangerous class of people, says the Youth's Companion.

Mr. Winans once left a revolver lying on a table in his tent at Bisley during a competition. Some visitors dropped in, one by one, to lunch. First came an elderly lady. She sat down near the table, and her eye immediately fell on the revolver. She snatched it up with a laugh, and pointing it at Mr. Winans, said:

"I'll shoot you!"

"Put it down," said Mr. Winans, speaking as peremptorily as a host may. The lady obeyed, and Mr. Winans explained to her how injudicious it was to point a revolver at any one, how it might have been loaded, and so on.

While he was speaking in came a clergyman. He sat down and began talking pleasantly. All at once his eye caught the revolver. Seizing it and roaring with laughter, he pointed it at Mr. Winans, saying:

"Now I'll shoot you!"

"I locked up that revolver!" is Mr. Winans's grim comment. And he would have been glad, we may be sure, to have made the same disposal, temporarily at least, of his silly guests. Had the jocularity of the lady or the clergyman resulted fatally, as similar conduct has often done, the plea at the coroner's inquest would have been the old weak one: "Didn't—know—it—was—loaded!"

The Shah of Persia, during his recent visit to Europe, is said to have told the Duchess of Westminster that the fame of her beauty had reached Teheran. "Ah," said she to some one who stood by, "he takes me for Westminster Abbey."

The World's Fair.

[The following verses by Dr. Rufus Gibbons Wells exhibit a most laudable desire to push a good thing along. The Louisiana Purchase Exposition of 1903 will be a great thing. If you don't believe it, read the following.]

St. Louis will have a wonderful fair,
Many millions of people will then gather there,

The flags of all nations will then be unfurled,
And we shall be ready to welcome the world.

We will open the gates on the first day of May,
Nineteen hundred and three, and have a display

That will 'stonish the nations, in the highest degree,

And be a great honor to this land of the free.

Americans will work and will do what is best,
To send the glad tidings to the East and the West;

To the North and the South, and let all the world know,
That St. Louis will have then a tremendous show.

All the charms of this fair, there is no one can tell,

We know that all others 'twill surely excel,
We will make it stupendous and really sublime,
And its glory endure through the arches of time.

Millions of women in beauty and pride,
From all over the world, will come with the tide,

To see the display of our dear Uncle Sam,
And mix with the crowd and the tremendous jam.

We hope all the people from East and from West,

Who visit the Fair may be very much blessed,
And be pleased and delighted with all that they see,

At the World's Greatest Fair in the Land of the Free.

Get Into Debt.

On the face of things, it seems rather poor advice to give a young man, says Roberts B. Kidd in Success, and, without qualification, it cannot stand; but a word or two of explanation will suffice to show that systematically getting into debt may make you independent.

The president of one of the strongest national banks of the central states attributes his success to the "systematic assumption of monetary obligations." He commenced his business career at a salary of a few dollars a week, and, by hard work, and actual privation, he saved two or three hundred dollars, and then put into practice the plan he had in mind. He bought a piece of land and borrowed enough money, together with his savings, to pay for it. He saved small sums and credited them at intervals on his loan, and, in his own words, he had it paid for before he realized it. He did this again and again, on an increasing scale, as his income increased, not always in real estate, but in property in its broad sense, and today he is a millionaire. It was getting into the right kind of debt that made him rich.

The secret of the banker's plan, if there is a secret, is that, all the time he was paying for his property, he was parting with his money, spending it, practically,—and thus he had nothing on hand to be tempted away by the innumerable "opportunities" and "chances in a million" that are constantly appearing. The fact that the ground was his, but for an incumbrance, furnished an incentive to get it clear as soon as possible.

It is possible to accumulate just as much money in the same time, by putting your money in a savings bank, but every man of twenty-five years' experience, who has tried it, will tell you that, at some stage in the operation, there come speculations, gold mines, and other "get-rich-quick" schemes to sap the life out of your little hoard, and the only way is to put your money where it is difficult to get it, except at the proper time, and to avoid studiously all investments that promise enormous returns.

The Mule.

The mule, whether military or civilian, is often made the butt of unseemly jests, but we of Missouri know his solid and sober value. We are, therefore, glad to have our opinion corroborated by a serious agricultural journal. The Tennessee Farmer says of our semi-equine friend:

"The mule is an easy animal to raise. He doesn't eat much, as compared with a horse. An energetic mule will make a trip quicker than a horse, though he may not go so fast. The secret of his speed is his uniform gait—steady and persistent. You hardly ever see a sick mule; he seems practically immune from the diseases which attack horses. A mule can endure more hardship than a horse, will pull more in proportion to size, and will 'stay with it' longer. A mule is easier broken or trained to work than a horse, and is more reliable after initiated. If a team of mules run away they look out for themselves and though they make close turns and go through a needle's eye, so to speak, they usually come out unharmed. We would rather plow corn with a team of mules than with horses—they break down less and turn around quicker. Hot weather affects the mules less than the horse. A good, honest, business mule is worth, and will command, a good price any day in the week. The usefulness of the mule continues longer than that of a horse. The mule is not handsome, doesn't make a good roadster, isn't stylish, doesn't 'do himself proud' if hitched to a fancy yellow wagon or cart, but what he lacks in appearance he makes up in actual usefulness on the farm."

The Runaways.—III.

The orphans had been with aunt Sarelda about five months, and all that time she had instructed them in reading, writing, arithmetic and that science (it is called geography) which had so much to say about the world which cared so little for them. This school teaching was a great cross to the maiden aunt, who had been accustomed throughout life to do without husbands and other vexatious cares. But she felt this her duty and she was resolved to do it. The children liked it still less, for summer, they felt, is not made for books. Besides, hard as it sometimes is to do one's duty, it is usually easier than to have somebody else's duty done to you.

One day—on the fatal day that saw the beginning of all the trouble—Emily and Zep sat in the backyard, a little court, two sides of which were formed by the high brick walls of next-door houses. The third side was made by the back of aunt Sarelda's house, while a high plank fence shut off the alley. It was one of those St. Louis backyards, paved with sooty bricks, blackened with coal smoke, dark from towering unpierced walls of three-story bricks, damp from the indefinable moisture that seems to steal through the crevices of the plank fence—over which the very tallest man could not peep. Here and there a brick has been torn away from the paving, leaving a black oblong of unhealthy-looking earth, while in a corner are several layers of bricks, "left over," probably. In the most unpromising nooks weeds spring up as it were from the very stone, looking eagerly about them with their pale heads while they cling with might and main to their uncertain living.

Aunt Sarelda was away from home, else that back gate leading into the alley would not stand open. Zep and Emily sit on the bench facing the gate through which comes a moist, alley breeze. It is an oppressive day, and the only breeze comes from that direction. Still, Zep should close the gate; he knows his aunt would not approve of this. Emily has more than once asked him to do so, but he is resolute: and since the gate is not to be closed, why should not she also derive benefit from this violation of aunt Sarelda's rules? It is wrong—but she feels that it is Zep's wrong, and her conscience is clear. She is playing with that beautiful gold ring she had discovered lying on the mantel,—a girl's ring, a souvenir of her aunt's youth. Aunt Sarelda has rewarded her for the eight's column in the multiplication table, by allowing her to wear this ring a week. Emily is in such ecstasy over wearing a sure-enough gold ring,—not the kind you get in a nickel's worth of candy,—that she cannot keep it upon her finger, but slips it on and off repeatedly,—a dangerous pastime.

Zep, also, has been rewarded for faithful study. He does not envy Emily her ring; rings are not for men. He carries this day his grandfather's gold watch, which aunt Sarelda has intrusted to him with the belief that such a trust will make him more manly and mature,—it is always desirable that orphans should grow up just as soon as possible. It is a very handsome watch, and how he has longed to carry it, and hear it tick against his very ear! Until to-day, aunt Sarelda has refused his many petitions.

She has always been just a little afraid of these children. Their grammatical lapses have led her to fear moral lapses. She has always been looking out for something. For instance, she began with the impression that they would not tell her the truth. Now, she thinks they are truthful children, but she is not perfectly sure. If she should come home and find that gate open,—but it is not near time for her to come home! It was very wrong in Zep to leave it open; he should have sat there and let the perspiration trickle from his eyebrows upon his upper lip. But he did not think it made much difference. He did not see how it could. No child is perfect. Doubtless grown-up people would not be so wicked. But after all,—though I am not trying to excuse him,—if he had been your child, instead of nobody's, I imagine you would not have thought his disobedience so dreadful. At all events, he is soon to be punished, as you shall find.

Suddenly a man appeared in the open gateway. Emily gave a start and dropped the ring. Zep suddenly laid his watch down upon the bench, unconscious of the movement, thinking only of the intruder. It was a young man with a handsome face, and he was dressed with elegance and care. He held a light cane in one hand, and with his other he lifted his hat very gracefully to Emily, while a smile played upon his face. She sat very straight and awkward; what right had he to bow to her? The next moment this strange young man vanished.

"Oh, Zep!" cried Emily, "please go and bolt that gate. Aunt Sarelda would be so angry if she knew. And if she asks, I'll hate to tell her you had it open!"

"Well, it's the only place they's any breeze," said Zep, rising. "But I guess I had better bolt it and not have the whole city staring in here at us." So saying, he started toward the gate, leaving the watch upon the bench. Emily stooped down to look under the seat for the ring. She could tell by the jingling sound about where it had fallen, but rings roll so you never know where they will stop. Just at that moment they heard a loud crash from the house, followed by the cry of Harry; "Oh, oh, oh, Mee-e-e!"

"What is it?" shouted Zep, turning pale, while Emily clasped her hands in terror. "Oh, oh!" wailed the voice of their brother. "Oh, oh, Mee-e-e!"

"He's killed himself!" shrieked Emily, rushing toward the house. Zep came close behind her. They raced through the kitchen and dining room into the front hall. There they gazed upon a catastrophe. Do you know what a catastrophe is? It is when your aunt keeps goldfish in a large glass tank, and you break her tank, sending the water flooding over the beautiful Brussels carpet, while the poor goldfish fall with a thud to the floor and find themselves stranded on large flowers worked in the pattern.

State Ownerships.

The ownership of the telegraph and the railways by the government is likely to be much discussed in the United States within the next generation, says Charles A. Conant in the Atlantic. There are many objections to such control, but the proposition is capable of candid discussion and does not in itself go beyond the confines of a legitimate political issue. Railway corporations hold their privileges under the right of limited liability. This makes each of them an artificial creature of the law. They have obtained by favor of the state another important privilege, in the right to take land for their tracks by right of eminent domain. That the state has the right to revise these grants of special privileges so as to establish a closer supervision over their use and abuse is unquestionable, except perhaps in exceptional instances. If the proposal that the government shall acquire the railways is socialistic or revolutionary, it is a form of revolution already achieved in the most conservative countries of Europe—Germany, France, Belgium, Switzerland, and Russia. Switzerland has only recently completed arrangements for the acquisition of the chief private lines and their conversion into state railways. The telegraph lines are now controlled by the government in nearly every European country, including Great Britain, and the functions of the post office are steadily encroaching upon the business of the express companies.

Heroes of the Faith.*

TEXT.—And these all, having had witness borne to them through their faith, received not the promise, God having provided some better thing concerning us, that apart from us they should not be made perfect.—Heb. 11: 39, 40.

The eleventh chapter of Hebrews reads like a roll-call of the departed, or a eulogy on the heroes of the ages. Well may it introduce an hour's study of the pioneers to whom we are indebted for the light and liberty which are ours as disciples of Christ. No age is sufficient unto itself. Each generation roots back into the generation which has preceded it, and our religious faith and practice are largely determined for us. The Jewish Rabbi who cried,—"Let us keep our religion as we have inherited it from our ancestors!" was not right in such contention, but in his appeal he voiced a fact; we do inherit our religion, at least, to some extent.

Ancient Worthies.

Fox's Book of Martyrs recites the achievements of a mighty host. Its pages are all aglow with the fires of their enthusiasm, and many a cold heart has been warmed by them. But the Bible contains the story of still more ancient heroes. If biography is always fascinating, then what an attractive literature we have in the Books of our Bible, for they abound in biographical sketches. From Abram to Stephen, from the pit where Isaiah suffered to the rocky Isle of Patmos, we tread upon sacred ground, and converse with great souls. Faith, as an inspiration, a motive power, is seen in their careers, and they encourage us by their example and endurance.

The disciples knew what they were to receive, for the Master plainly told them; accusations, persecutions, stripes, bonds, imprisonments; and yet, knowing that these things awaited them, they went forth in the way of duty! That is heroic. One who has been surprised into trouble, may be brave while it lasts, and then avoid it ever after; but to go knowingly in the right path, expecting afflictions, promised afflictions, that requires a high order of courage. O you tired toilers, you laggard soldiers, read again these fragments from the lives of the heroes of the faith, and then go forward with renewed zeal, ashamed of your weariness and discouragement!

Our Pioneers.

All these heroes are ours. The men who made the Old Testament and the men who made the New are ours. That is, we can rejoice in their courage, and claim a share in the purchase of their blood. So likewise of the sufferers under Nero, and the Inquisition. We can claim an inheritance in the fame of all scholars and prophets and apostles. But there are men and women to whom we are especially indebted, and who stand closer to us in point of time,—the reformers of the nineteenth century.

The Campbells, Stones, Smiths, Lards and Erretts are men to be proud of; we should cherish their memory, and emulate their achievements. But let us avoid anything like partisan or sectarian pride. They rose above it; why may not we? Indeed, it is because of the service they rendered in breaking the fetters of tradition and battering down the walls of religious partyism that they are reared. They encountered bitter prejudice and determined opposition. They were ostracized; were denied admittance to buildings in which they had a right; they were satirized and nicknamed and treated as the off-scouring of the earth. The world was not worthy of them. And there are sections in which similar conditions still exist, and where therefore we find living heroes.

Children of Heroes.

The debt we owe these toilers is simply incalculable. We owe to them our religious liberty; we owe a new, clearer and more scriptural knowledge of the conditions of salvation; and an assurance of pardon that is altogether unmistakable. It is pertinent to inquire whether we are worthy of such a heritage, whether we are indeed, the children of heroes, inspired by their example and filled with their spirit. Our recent history is encouraging; but may we not dare more? sacrifice more? endure more?

Our forefathers began a great work; reformation by restoration: it is for their children to carry it on, animated by a courage as dauntless, a spirit as sublime.

Prayer.

We bless Thy name, O God, because Thou hast always brooded over the world and raised up great souls to speak for Thee. We thank Thee with overflowing hearts for the heroes of the faith in all ages, especially for the Fathers of this Reformation. Make us worthy children of honored sires; fill us with wisdom; enkindle our zeal; guide our activities, and multiply our victories in Jesus' name. Amen.

Southern California Ministerial Association.

The southern California ministerial association of the Church of Christ met at Los Angeles, Sept. 30. Those present were Brethren Crawford, Wagner, T. D. Garvin, A. C. Smither, and H. Elliott Ward of Los Angeles, Buff and Grant K. Lewis of Pomona, Bate-man of Whittier, Greenwell of Long Beach, Thomas of Santa Ana, J. R. Speck of Santa Monica, J. P. Ralstin of Ontario, H. J. Otto of Azusa and Jay C. Hall of Artesia.

They elected officers for the year as follows: President, Grant K. Lewis, Pomona; Vice-president, A. C. Smither, Los Angeles; Secretary, Jay C. Hall, Artesia.

Reports from the churches showed that church extension day had been generally observed, that additions to the churches continue to come, and that vigorous evangelistic campaigns are being planned for the fall and winter.

Brethren Crawford and Smither will probably attend the general convention in Minneapolis, and we hope that upon their return they may bring us new plans of work, refresh our minds on the best of the old plans, and inspire us if possible with even greater zeal for the Master's work.

Travel.

A word or two on the subject of travel is not amiss. The facilities for the transportation of passengers at the present time have certainly been brought to perfection. It isn't like in the old days when it was almost a torture to go from one place to another. Now you get aboard a train and live just like you do at home. The entire equipment is built with a view to your comfort.

For instance: When you go East the B. & O. S-W. offers you Three Daily Solid Vestibuled Trains from St. Louis, leaving at 8:20 a. m., 8:05 p. m. and 2:15 a. m.—made up of the finest Pullman sleepers—a dining car service which cannot be excelled (you don't have to pay for what you can't eat, but just for what you order)—first class high back coaches—in fact the trains are palaces on wheels. The track, roadbed and equipment are entirely new.

It's the best line to Cincinnati and Louisville. Only $21 to New York with stop-overs. (Saves you money and gives you the best service.)

Information in regard to trains, etc., can be secured from any representative. It will be a pleasure for them to answer your questions and help you in every way.

The favor of the public is final proof of merit—and we're after it.

The Value Of Charcoal.

Few People Know How Useful it Is in Preserving Health and Ease.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better; it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines, and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking, or after eating onions or other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion; it whitens the teeth; and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics, in tablet form, or rather in the form of large, pleasant-tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood; and the beauty of it is that no harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician, in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

WHY?

Why do you, who live in the Mississippi Valley, send to New York, Boston, Philadelphia, or even to Chicago for a desired volume, when you can secure it much more quickly and just as cheap in St. Louis? This is a question that is very difficult to answer. We can supply you with any book that you wish—any respectable book, that is, French novels and blood-and-thunder-seven-buckets-of-gore-to-the-chapter romances are barred—no matter where or by whom published. Our business is by no means confined to the books we ourselves publish. Our catalogue contains only our own publications, in the main, but we can sell you any book you wish to purchase.

Joseph and His Brethren.*

Nine years passed between the time of our last lesson and the present one. The seven years of plenty had filled the granaries of Egypt with grain, and two years of famine had begun to consume the store. The wisdom of Joseph had been fully vindicated, and he ruled in Egypt with the authority of Pharaoh himself. Meanwhile, the famine extended to all the surrounding countries, and the people of all the neighboring nations came to Egypt to buy grain. Among them came the ten older brothers of Joseph; Benjamin, as the child of his father's old age, remaining at home. The wealth of Jacob is indicated by his possession of money in sufficient quantity to purchase food during this time of distress. When they came into the presence of Joseph, under whose direction the sale of grain to foreigners was made, they did not recognize him. This was not strange. He is now a man of nearly forty years of age, and they had not seen him for two and twenty years. Besides, he was dressed in the Egyptian style and in robes of royal splendor, and spoke the Egyptian language. There was little chance that they should know him. But he could easily recognize them. Their familiar dress and speech, and even their countenances would appeal to his memory, for they were all men grown at the time of their cruel treatment of him.

Deeply moved as Joseph must have been at sight of his brothers, he restrained his emotions and assumed a stern demeanor toward them. He desired to learn of his father and his brother Benjamin and what were the feelings of the ten brothers toward them. Had they been as cruel to these as to him, and were they living or dead? Concealing his identity, therefore, he talked with them through an interpreter, and harshly charged them with being spies, come from another country to discover the weakness of Egypt and prepare the way for an invasion. Upon their denial and the statement of their identity, he proposed that they send one of their number back to Canaan, to bring the younger brother of whom they had spoken, and thus prove their story true. He emphasized his words by putting them in prison three days. Then he released them all save Simeon, whom he kept as a hostage, and sent them back with their sacks filled and their money in the sacks' mouths. The story they told their aged father Jacob added to his grief, while the memory of their cruelty to Joseph so many years ago arose to smite them with remorse. The fact that their money had been placed again in their sacks added to their perplexity and alarm.

The store of food was soon consumed and Jacob bade them go again to Egypt to buy. With great reluctance he let Benjamin go with them, his forebodings of evil making the departure of the young man seem almost like the parting of death. Arrived in Egypt, they are amazed to be invited into Joseph's house to dine with him. He sat apart from them, since as a priest he could not eat with others. But he sent portions of his food to them all, and a much larger portion to Benjamin, toward whom his heart yearned with exceeding desire and joy. He then sent them away again with a generous supply of grain, charging his steward to put their money in their sacks, and also to put his divining cup in the sack of Benjamin. Then the steward followed them up and overtaking them charged them with theft and, opening the sacks, found the cup of Joseph and brought them back to the court. The story of their trial before Joseph, their humble appeal and offer to be bondmen in Benjamin's place—above all, their pitiful plea for their aged father, is most pathetic to read. The heart of Joseph was full to overflowing. He had proven them and found them penitent for the great wrong done to him and cherishing a true affection for their father and youngest brother.

The time had come to make himself known. Ordering from the room everybody except his brothers and himself Joseph spoke to them in the familiar Hebrew and told them who he was and, weeping, asked of his aged father. The brothers were speechless with fear. "Thus conscience does make cowards of us all." What dire punishment may he not inflict on them, this brother whom they had so basely treated in his innocent youth. But they knew not the pure heart and tender spirit of Joseph. He was one who had learned the lesson, long after taught by the Savior, whose gentle and sorrowful life was so like his own, "Love your enemies; bless them that curse you; do good to them that hate you; and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you." So he called them nearer to him and comforted their hearts with most gracious speech. He told them not to reproach themselves, for God had but sent him before them to preserve life. Not their own lives alone, but those of a great host; for the famine was to last yet five years, and Egypt was to supply the food for a starving world. All that had happened to him God had overruled for his own good, and for the deliverance of others. They are bidden, therefore, to return to Canaan and tell their father Jacob that the son whom he had so long mourned as dead was now ruler in Egypt, and that he and all his household were to come down and be nourished by him the remainder of their lives. When his brothers could not yet believe for joy, Joseph embraced his brother Benjamin and wept with him, and then in turn kissed and embraced all the others and talked with them of the old home and the familiar scenes of his youth, until they were put at ease and their fear departed.

In all history, sacred or profane, no other such instance is found, save in the story of Jesus himself, of such magnanimity of spirit, such steadfastness of character, such enduring faith in God and love for man, as this of Joseph. He is an embodiment of the spirit of our golden text, "Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good." For curses he gave blessings; for blows, kisses; for envy and hatred, love. His effort to excuse his brothers to themselves is as artless as anything ever said by a little child, while it exhibits the wisdom of the sage and the faith of a saint. After studying this picture of forgiveness, how can we ever again cherish a bitter feeling toward a brother, or speak an angry word, even against him who has wronged us? Lord, help us ever to keep thy gentle injunction in memory, "Be ye kind one to another, tender hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you."

TOPIC FOR OCTOBER 27.

Bible Reading.

"I will make it the rule of my life to read the Bible every day."—2 Tim. 3:1-17.

Timothy was instructed from childhood in the sacred scriptures of the Jews. His mother and grandmother had taught him in early childhood, according to the custom of the Jews. In every Jewish family the children were carefully taught in the scriptures until they knew all the story of their national life, and all the tenets of their religion. In other oriental countries the same custom prevails. Children must learn the sacred writings. In China, only that man is great who knows the books of Confucius, who has memorized the ancient classics of his people. It is by memorizing thousands of verses of scripture that men became Mandarins.

Now, something of a lesson is contained in these facts for us of the western world. We must teach ourselves and teach our children to know the sacred books from earliest youth. Our fathers realized the need of this, and in their cabin homes or on their broad plantations talked of and taught the scriptures to their children. By the fireside the Bible was read and its doctrines argued. By the furrow in the field the dog-eared Testament was thumbed and conned, until they knew its exact words, and some of them could, if it had been destroyed, have produced whole books of it from memory.

This devotion to the scriptures has not altogether been handed down to us. We are so busied and careful for many things; we have so many irons in the fire; our modern life is so distracting and distracted that we fail of the same devotion that our fathers had for the old volume. It is ours, then, to foster every tendency to Bible reading, and when we are neglectful, to arouse ourselves and turn back to search the scriptures.

But even more than the formal reading of the Bible is it necessary that we take its spirit into our hearts. Just as there are many that cry Lord, Lord, and do not the will of the Father, so are there some who read page after page but fail of the spirit. After all, it is to catch the vision of those masterful and pious lives of the past, to brood over the revelation of God's spirit in men and most of all in the Man of Nazareth, that we ought to pore over these sacred pages, and to strengthen our lives and purify our hearts in the process.

This result, however, can be accomplished more than we often think, by regularity of habit in reading. We are accustomed too much to reason, "Well, I don't believe I do any better by regular reading than by regular neglect. I don't see any effect upon my life from one more than from the other." The development of the spiritual life, we must remember, is a thing so slow, so slow. We may not see the grass growing, nor a soul. We cannot measure the gradual increase of spiritual stature. So many great and good men have told us that regularity of reading the Bible develops Christian character that we ought to accept their unanimous testimony and follow their advice.

"Habit is a cable. We weave a thread of it each day, and it becomes so strong we cannot break it." The habit of Bible reading grows with the years. I know an aged Christian woman who can be found up early every morning while the rest of the household are sleeping, with her Bible on her knee, and her gray head bowed over it. Do you fancy her day's work and day's life are not better accomplished for this early exercise?

The Christian Endeavor Society made no mistake when it put this clause into its pledge. It has made thousands of lives richer and better, thousands of homes brighter and sweeter, thousands of churches stronger and more devoted.

WHAT IS YOUR LIFE?

A large interrogation, truly! It would be difficult to frame a more fundamental question than this, which has been chosen as the title of the new book by W. J. Russell. No more valuable volume for young people has ever been issued. What is Your Life? is easily worth $10,000 to any young man or woman who will faithfully follow its teaching. The general scope of the book is shown by the titles of some of the chapters: "The Value of Time," "The Body and Good Health," "Character Building," "Good Books and Good Reading," etc. The volume is not only helpful and profitable, but is also interesting and entertaining. Mr. Russell has avoided that didactic, dogmatic, prosy style so usual in works of this class. He has written in a bright, lively vein. His book will be read by young people who would refuse to read the average volume of advice to the young.

WHAT IS YOUR LIFE? By W. J. Russell. Cloth, 316 pages. Price, $1.00.

An Attractive Book Offer!

During the past few years there has been a rage for the historical romance. This has been a profitable and sensible fashion, for it has given something of a knowledge of secular history to persons who would not have taken the trouble to study, but who enjoyed reading fiction.

Why should not Bible history and knowledge of the characters of the Old Testament be disseminated in the same manner, especially among young people. They will gladly read an interesting story, and what can be more interesting, for example, than the career of Moses, skillfully narrated?

We offer six splendid romances from Bible history in one set. The books are: MOSES, THE MAN OF GOD (Dungan); QUEEN ESTHER (Davis); ELIJAH (Davis); KING SAUL (Ellis); IN THE DAYS OF JEHU (Ellis); and SHEM (Ellis). Five of these are cloth-bound books; SHEM is bound in paper. The regular price of the six volumes is $4.75. For a short time we propose to offer the complete set for $3.50. At this price the books will be sent by express, not prepaid.

The children and young people will be delighted with these books. They will help to pass many a long autumn or winter evening. Better still, they will impart much information about Bible history. It is sometimes difficult to get boys and girls to study the Bible directly, but there will be no trouble getting them to read these interesting stories.

Six Volumes. Over 1400 Pages. Many Illustrations. $3.50.

BAKER.

Miss Essey M. Coleburn was born Jan. 8, 1877, united with the Christian Church at Loami, Sangamon county, Ill., in 1896. She was united in marriage, by the writer, with Mr. G. W. Baker, a prosperous merchant of Loami, March 22, 1899. She was the sunshine of the home. Faithful to Christ and the church. She was the only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. D. Coleburn. Idolized by them and by her husband, loved by all who knew her. She died at her home in Loami after two weeks' suffering, Oct. 4, 1901. The writer held her funeral services Sunday, Oct. 6, and amid tears and grief she was laid to rest in Loami cemetery. J. E. DEIHL.

Rhoda Parr was born Feb. 11, 1865, died Sept. 9, 1901, aged 36 years, 6 months, 28 days. She became a Christian early in life and lived a faithful member of the Christian Church. Her suffering was long and severe. She leaves a husband and two children to mourn their loss. Funeral was held in Arcola, conducted by the writer. L. T. FAULDERS.

THOMPSON.

A father and mother in Israel have passed away from our midst. On June 12, 1901, Mrs. Amelia Beach Thompson, aged 74 years, 10 months, was called to her abiding home and her exceeding great reward. For nearly 60 years has Sister Thompson been a devout soldier of the cross. She united with the Church of Christ shortly after her marriage in 1841 and has continued faithful unto the end. Even in the last days of her illness, through all her suffering, was she the same sweet-spirited, loving disciple of earlier years. A little less than three months after the decease of Sister Thompson her aged husband—77 years and 11 months—went to join her in the rewards promised to God's children. Having lived long together it was impossible that they should be long separated. Who can measure the influence and good of such lives? Through long years of life's trials and hardships have they toiled on together bearing the banner of the cross on before them, laying it down only when the summons came to join a brighter company above.

H. P. SHAW.

Franklin, Ill.

WILKISON.

Geo. Wilkison was born in Ohio in 1839 and died at McLoud, Okla., Oct. 2, 1901, aged 61 years. He became a Christian in early life and was for many years an elder in the Church of Christ. He was a faithful and devoted Christian at the time of his death. He leaves a wife and three sons, one of whom is an evangelist in the Christian Church. The funeral services were conducted by J. C. Winn, after which the body was shipped to Oklahoma City for burial, S. D. Dutcher concluding the sad rites at the grave. The deceased lived for a number of years in Wayne Co., Ill., and northwest Kansas, but for the last six years in Oklahoma. A good man has gone home to God and left a precious heritage to his own—a good name. O. W.

BETHANY BEACH.

Seaside PropertySeaside Property

Investment--A Golden Opportunity

BETHANY BEACH

Delaware

"Bethany Beach, the Beautiful," as one visitor exclaimed, is a new ocean resort on the Atlantic Coast in Sussex County, Delaware, and is a little over one mile from Ocean View. Last summer (1901) the great Christian Church inaugurated a work that, in scope, will be similar to Ocean Grove and Ocean City, N. J. They now have a splendid auditorium and a large assembly grounds. As the Christian Church, whose individual members are known as disciples of Christ, numbers over 1,000,000 communicants in the United States and Canada, and as they have no other such resort on the Atlantic Coast, it is easy to predict a glorious future for Bethany Beach.

The year 1901 will be written by future historians as the first season for Bethany Beach. They will say that a boat line was started, an auditorium with a seating capacity of 1,200 constructed, and splendid cottages erected by Mrs. Wheeler, of Baltimore, Md.; D. C. France, Esq., of Philadelphia, Pa., and Miss J. Dimmitt, of Xenia, Ohio. In addition to these, a large house, which was upon the grounds, was renovated, as was also an old-fashioned house called the Surf House. The latter was constructed by a private party to entertain his friends and guests, and has been on the beach for 20 years. We mention this fact to show how safe Bethany Beach is. Plans for other cottages have been submitted to contractors and bids on same are requested. Next year the first section of a magnificent hotel will be completed and in all probability a pier will be run out into the ocean. A petition is being circulated for the establishment of a United States life saving station. Should such a movement be successful it will prove a great attraction. The practice of these brave men leaves an indelible impression on the minds of the spectator.

It is interesting to learn that visitors were present from Nebraska, Kentucky, Ohio, Illinois, Virginia, District of Columbia, New York, Michigan, Maryland and Pennsylvania.

Next season (1902) promises to be an eventful one. Great meetings will be held in the auditorium. An invitation to hold its sessions at Bethany Beach has been extended to the North Atlantic Conference. Letters are being received from a vast number of people in which the writers express their determination to be present next season. A certain State evangelist writes that a company of 30 will charter a car to come, and that their party will represent Virginia, Tennessee and Kentucky.

Lots at Bethany Beach.

The Bethany Beach Improvement Company takes great pleasure in stating that they have many choice lots for sale. These lots are 40x125 feet in size, and are within 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 minutes' walk of the Ocean and the Auditorium. Over $20,000 worth of lots were sold the first year. It is confidently expected that many thousands will be sold this coming year. This company owns all the land surrounding the vast assembly grounds.

Our Splendid Terms.

It has been suggested that we give every person an opportunity to purchase a lot. After much consideration we have determined to place over 200 lots on the market with the most liberal terms possible. We take particular pleasure in stating the prices and payments:

Lots at $75.00—$10.00 down, $1.00 per week.

Lots at $100.00—$15.00 down, $1.00 per week.

Lots at $125.00—$20.00 down, $1.25 per week.

Lots at $150.00—$20.00 down, $1.50 per week.

Lots at $200.00—$25.00 down, $1.50 per week.

Now is the time to buy. Best bargains are often lost through delay. Lots at Atlantic City, Ocean City, Ocean Grove, and other ocean resorts, cost very little in the early beginnings of these places. Now they are sold at fabulous sums. Bethany Beach, with its magnificent shore, splendid natural facilities and glorious beginning, promises well for the lot purchaser.

We again call your attention to the easy terms in the purchasing of lots. "Money saved is money earned," is an old maxim. Why not invest a part of your earnings in something that has a bright future before it? Bethany Beach will be a great place. It is bound to grow. Do not let a golden opportunity pass by.

We shall be glad to send you all necessary information. Write us at once for plans and testimonials.

THE convention is over. The great multitude has dispersed. The voice of eloquence, the sweet melodies, the tender prayers, the high enthusiasm, the ringing applause, which made Minneapolis a Mount of Vision, have died away. What then? If this were all, it might well not have been. But it is not all. It was a preface, not a finis. Now for the results: A widening wave of enthusiasm and consecration among the churches; a deeper sense of gratitude to God for His blessings on our efforts to spread His kingdom; a higher resolve to live and act as becomes those to whom has been committed such a work; a closer bond of unity among ourselves, and greater zeal in promoting that wider unity for which Christ prayed; more humility, more reverence, more zeal in evangelism, in works of benevolence, and in Christian education; greater confidence in the truth and value of the position to which God has led us, with the deepening consciousness that we must be what we teach, and live the gospel which we proclaim. These should be among the results following our first twentieth century convention.

Reciprocity and Patronage.

That the tariff will again be brought into the foreground as a political issue there is now little doubt. The President is an ardent advocate of reciprocity and hints have been dropped that this subject will form an important section in his first message to Congress. It is believed that he will go no farther than a general recommendation of the principle and will wait for Congress to do the rest. He believes in reciprocity, not as a vague sentiment of benevolence toward that portion of mankind which is so unfortunate as to dwell beyond our borders, but as a national tariff policy, and it is probable that the principles which President McKinley stated in his famous Buffalo speech the day before his assassination, will be embodied in definite legislation by the coming Congress. The south and west can be counted on to favor the sort of reciprocity which the President will probably advocate. If there is trouble it will be in the east. Mr. Roosevelt has put a stop to the numerous conflicting rumors about his attitude toward a second term by stating frankly that he is not averse to it. He will pander to no cliques, but if the people like his first term and want another like it he will be at their service. The appointment of Gov. Jones, of Alabama, as a federal judge by the President has provoked general comment and almost universal approbation. Gov. Jones is a Gold Democrat, and is considered by men of all parties as having good judicial timber in him. His appointment is significant of a more liberal attitude on the part of the administration toward the Democrats of the south. But when this appointment was followed a few days later by the appointment of another Gold Democrat, Mr. George E. Koester, as collector of internal revenue for South Carolina, it aroused some Republican criticism. There are some who think that this is too much. To give two federal offices in the whole south to men of the other party seems to them to imply that the President thinks he cannot find good men in his own party. It is remarkable how easily some office-hungry politicians get their feelings hurt.

The Color Question Again.

The action of President Roosevelt in entertaining Booker T. Washington at dinner at the White House has called forth a discordant chorus of comments from north and south. It is said to be the first time that a negro has ever dined at the White House table and indignation naturally runs high in some quarters. One southern paper characterizes the President's invitation as "a blunder that is worse than a crime," and another gently remarks that it is "the most damnable outrage that was ever committed by any citizen of the United States." To the sensitive mind of this critic it is evidently far more atrocious to eat with a negro than to burn, hang or shoot one. These latter acts may be reprehensible; under some circumstances they may be errors of judgment; they may be indiscreet or unnecessary; but the most foul and loathsome crime in the whole calendar, "the most damnable outrage," in fact, according to our excited contemporary, is to invite a negro to dinner. For our part, we heartily agree with the men of the south that the less that is said about the social equality of the races the better it will be for both. Whatever may be true about political rights and equality before the law, we do not blame our southern brethren in the least for their desire to keep white society and negro society separate. But there are some among them who are a trifle too inflammatory in their defense of this position and who emphasize it to the exclusion of certain weightier matters of the law. The criticism called forth by this Booker Washington episode is particularly regrettable because Mr. Washington is not one of those "smart niggers" who are anxious to secure social recognition for themselves and their race. His work as president of the Tuskegee Industrial Institute has necessarily brought him into contact with many eminent men and into prominence as a speaker before white audiences. But the whole tendency of his work is to make his people cease their clamor about their rights, and fit them for the performance of their duties. In this way, he rightly thinks, the rights can be left to take care of themselves. It is safe to say that President Roosevelt did not invite Mr. Washington to dine with him simply that he might startle the south, or gratify the north, or preach a sermon on negro equality. That would indeed have been foolish and uncalled-for. He himself says that he invited the negro because he wished to confer with him about matters pertaining to his race, and since Mr. Washington is the highest authority in this country on those matters, the explanation ought to be accepted in good faith.

Mr. Watterson's New Role.

Henry Watterson is in the field as a candidate for governor of Kentucky in 1903. Mr. Watterson has long been considered an important factor in Kentucky politics, but has always hitherto disavowed any ambition for office. But he is tired, apparently, of acting the part of king-maker. He was one of the leaders of the bolt against Mr. Bryan in 1896, and has of late been playing the role of peace-maker between the two wings of the Democracy. It is not improbable that, in becoming a candidate for governor in 1903, Mr. Watterson really has his eye on more ultimate things and covets the Democratic nomination for President in the following year. Somehow one cannot contemplate Mr. Watterson as a candidate for office without recalling his enthusiastic approval of an election law in his state which, in his own happy phrase, "left nothing to chance." Commenting editorially in the Louisville Courier-Journal on the recent Booker Washington episode, he calls it an ill wind for the President and for his hopes of winning the south by appointing Democrats to office, and prophesies that it will blow good to the Democracy. He hopes to see the Democratic ship wafted by this and similar breezes into the haven of victory in 1904, and probably there is not absent from this pleasing thought in his mind the fancy of himself as standing at her helm when she makes the port.

The New Mark Twain.

Mark Twain, having now fully recovered after his bout with the missionaries, has again eschewed humor for a season and plunged into the New York mayoralty campaign. It is grim business for a humorist. Like Carl Schurz, he declines to support his friend Shephard, the Tammany candidate, and goes on the stump for Seth Low. It is the natural penalty for his reputation as a humorist that he will scarcely be able to get the people to take him seriously. If "Sunset" Cox could not persuade the public that he was other than a funny man, how can the immortal Mark, even if he is disguised by his introducers as "the Honorable Samuel L. Clemens," expect to be received with grave and serious attention? A recital of the corruptions of Tammany from his lips will awaken peals of laughter, and his most eloquent tirades against Croker will smooth the corrugations from anxious brows and give his delighted auditors the merriest evening they have had this year. But why should he wish to be taken seriously? Let him use the glittering blade of ridicule. Let him be a greater Mr. Dooley. His anti-missionary campaign in the North American Review exhibited an almost naive incapacity for logic; but if a lifelong career as a humorist has unhinged his logical processes and left every argument a dismal non sequitur, there remains at least the sequence between a joke and a laugh—and this he understands as well as any man living. Let him get the laugh on Croker and he can leave the arguments for others.

Tammany's Fight for Life.

The combination of all the anti-Tammany elements in New York and their united support of Seth Low for mayor has evidently given Mr. Croker a more serious view of the situation than that which he entertained just before his return from England. He seemed to think then that all he had to do was to whistle once and the specter of Reform would vanish in the same old way. But it refuses to vanish. Mr. Low is not the vanishing kind. And it is now reported—unofficially, of course, but with a good show of plausibility—that Croker is preparing to sell out his own candidate, Shephard, and bend his energies upon keeping control of the minor offices, especially that of prosecuting attorney, in the borough of Manhattan. In fact, Mr. Shephard is personally much too decent a man for Croker to be permanently interested in. He has, to be sure, been on both sides of most of the important questions at one time or another, but he has always been considered a well-meaning individual and was the supporter of the reform ticket against Tammany four years ago. It was, on the whole, rather a shrewd piece of business for Tammany to secure a man with a reputation for respectability as its candidate this year. The minor offices are quite as important as the mayoralty, and the use of a respectable figure-head may help to get them. Mr. Shephard must feel comfortable when he reflects that his position is about as honorable as that of a wooden decoy duck. He insists that he is running on his own record. Not a bit of it. He is running on Tammany's record and on Croker's record. A politician is known by the company he keeps.

Criticism of the British Army.

The storm of criticism, which has been beating upon the British war department with increased force during the past few weeks, shows no sign of abatement. The onslaught upon Gen. Buller, when his re-appointment to the command of an army corps was suggested, was a mere episode, though by his own indiscreet reply to his critics he made it a startling one. But, Buller or no Buller, there are plenty of people in a position to know the facts who think that the whole army system needs re-adjustment. It suffers from both political and social influence. A cabinet minister in a meeting of his party a few days ago said: "We have got to put an end to the system by which the smart ladies of society have a voice in promotion." This admission by one on the inside that the smart ladies of society do have a voice in the army promotions at present, is somewhat remarkable. There is renewed talk of the possible necessity for increasing the army by conscription, since enlistments are about at an end and there are only three army corps, consisting altogether of 30,000 or 40,000 men, left in England. Mr. Broderick, as the civilian head of the war department, paints fair pictures of the condition of the army, but these, in connection with such admissions as the above and the discouraging reports from the field, fail to carry conviction. From South Africa there has come during the past week almost no news—which, in this case, is bad news. It is reported that Gen. Botha has again escaped from a trap which was laid for him. It is a habit which he has acquired during his strenuous life the last year or two.

The McKinley Memorial. The organization of the William McKinley National Memorial Arch Association has been completed. Among its general officers are Henry B. MacFarland, Secretary Gage, Chief Justice Fuller, Admiral Dewey, Gen. Miles, Miss Helen Gould, Mrs. C. W. Fairbanks, Cardinal Gibbons, Bishop Potter, Dr. F. E. Clark and Presidents Eliot, Hadley, Harper, Patton and Jordan. Two vice-presidents will be appointed for each state, and through this far-reaching and representative organization funds will be collected for the erection of a suitable memorial to President McKinley, the exact nature of which is to be determined later.

Metropolitan Art Gallery.

By the decision of the court in the Rogers will contest the Metropolitan Art Gallery in New York gets $5,000,000. Jacob S. Rogers had no special concern or acquaintance with art and chose the Metropolitan Gallery as the object of his benevolence chiefly because he thought it would vex his relatives—which it did. There are a great many worse uses to which the money might have been put, and it was a lucky chance which turned his fancy in this direction where the money will be wisely spent even if it was foolishly given. Perhaps the country at large does not appreciate as fully as it should what a magnificent institution New York has in its Metropolitan Art Gallery. Of course it has no such collection of Old Masters as some of the European galleries, but in many respects it is entitled to rank among the greatest collections in the world. People who have money to give for art should remember, however, that the best service which they can render in this direction is a general dissemination of the knowledge and love of art among all the people, and that this cannot be accomplished by establishing an institution, however complete, in New York city or at any other one point. As educators know the value of the small college, which comes close to the homes of the people, so artistic educators and donors should recognize the desirability of having good, even if small, collections at many points throughout the country. The plan of planting all your seed in one hole and then going fishing, is easy for the fellow who plants, but not conducive to a large crop.

Mr. Gage's Financial Creed.

The National Bankers' Association, which was in session last week in Milwaukee, was addressed by the secretary of the treasury, Mr. Gage. In his speech to the association, he stated his financial creed, which included the following points: that the government's demand obligations, i. e., legal tender notes, should be gradually retired and canceled; that our system of bank-note circulation should be made more responsive to commercial needs; that, beyond acting as a guardian and trustee for the people in relation to national banks, the government guaranty to bank-note issues should cease; that the public money in excess of a reasonable working balance should be deposited in national banks; that in times of peace the national revenue should exceed the expenditure and the surplus be used in reducing the public debt.

Miss Helen Gould's name heads the list of lady managers for the Louisiana Purchase Exposition. No name in that place could give the public greater confidence that things will be well managed.

Brevities.

A witness in the naval court of inquiry testified a few days ago that Admiral Schley's loop was a good move, and now Capt. Cook of the Brooklyn testifies that it was he, and not Schley, who gave the order for the loop. Presently we shall have a trial to locate the credit for devising this masterly maneuver and thereby winning the battle of Santiago.

Joseph F. Smith has been chosen as President of the Mormon Church to succeed Lorenzo Snow, who died last week.

King Leopold of Belgium is about to visit the United States. Leopold may have some virtues but they are not notable. During the sixty-six years of his royal life he has devoted himself chiefly to escapades which would disgrace a college freshman.

The official report of President McKinley's doctors, covering the time from the shooting to the autopsy, has been published. The doctors used fifteen thousand words to say that they really do not know what caused the President's death and do not think any one ever will know.

The brigands who are holding Miss Stone for ransom, after being pursued by Bulgarian soldiers, have again given their pursuers the slip and are in hiding in some unknown place in the mountains. Several days ago the subscriptions toward the ransom fund were still $50,000 short of the required amount. A new appeal has been made and funds are again coming in.

The Episcopal convention at San Francisco has adjourned to meet three years hence in Boston. The House of Delegates rejected the canon on divorce and re-marriage which the House of Bishops had drawn up and approved. The prohibition of the re-marriage of divorced persons, whether guilty or innocent, except those divorced for causes arising before the first marriage, was objected to by the delegates.

The gold mines of the Pharaohs are said to have been rediscovered in Egypt. New mining methods applied to those old mines may make them more productive than they ever were before. But the real gold mine of the Pharaohs was the River Nile and the narrow strip of fertile soil on each side. The application of modern methods of agriculture here would probably produce some results which would startle the Shepherd kings.

St. Louis is having this week an election for the adoption or rejection of certain amendments to her charter which are essential to her proper growth and development. They have reference chiefly to public improvements, paving and cleaning streets, making sidewalks, laying sewers and the erection of public buildings. This is a necessary preliminary to the house-cleaning we must do to be ready to receive our visitors in 1903.

Herr Johann Most, anarchist and nihilist, has been sentenced by a New York court to one year of imprisonment at hard labor on Blackwell's Island for publishing in his paper, Freiheit, an article advocating the assassination of rulers. Most was born in Augsburg, Germany, in 1847; began his career of protest by refusing to go to confession, and has been a violent objector ever since to everything except beer, idleness and inflammatory speech. This will not be his first experience in prison.

The First Twentieth Century Convention

Some Features of the Convention.

Prophecy has given place to history. Promise has found its fulfillment. Expectation has not been disappointed. The Minneapolis convention has gone to record and takes high rank among our great national assemblies. It was an experiment to go so far to the Northwest. Some doubted, but we believed from the first that we could hold a great convention there, with the aid of such an enterprising local committee. The result has not disappointed us. The attendance from abroad was larger than in any previous convention except that of the jubilee celebration two years ago. Conservative estimates put the total attendance at 4,000, though the registration did not reach that number. The great hall in the Exposition building, capable of seating 3,500 people not including the gallery, was comfortably filled on several occasions.

While the convention was, therefore, large enough for all purposes of enthusiasm and for that wisdom which comes from a "multitude of counselors," its magnitude was by no means its chief element of greatness. It was great in the character of its addresses, and the motives and spirit which inspired them. We have probably never had a line of addresses at one of our conventions that averaged higher in range of thought and literary excellence. There was justification for the repeated emphasis given to the fundamental things for which we plead in the circumstance that we were meeting in new territory. A further justifying cause for at least occasional addresses by some of our representative men on the nature and scope of our plea on such occasions is the fact that there are always young people, including young ministers of the gospel, attending these conventions who would probably never have opportunity otherwise of hearing so clear and forcible a statement of the things which are commonly believed among us. Such addresses are therefore educative in their influence and tend to the promotion of that unity among ourselves which is essential to the furtherance of the cause which we plead. No convention ever held among us has given a more judicious emphasis to what is fundamental and vital in our position. If there were an occasional departure from the canon of good taste, it was exceptional, and in the minor addresses.

A still higher test of the convention was in the work it accomplished and the results which are likely to flow from it. We believe that in this respect the Minneapolis convention will prove to be a great one. The reports of last year's operations in every department show that we are progressing steadily along all lines, and are destined to exert a deeper and a wider influence on the religious thought and life of the world as the years go by. The net result of the influence of the reports made and of the addresses delivered was the widening of our horizon, the stimulation of faith and hope, a clearer conception of the world's needs and greater courage to go forward in the mighty task to which God has called us. Not the least of the beneficent results of such a convention is the lofty optimism which it inspires in the minds of those who attend it and who become acquainted with its spirit and its action. When it is seen how much has been accomplished by the limited amount of means and the limited number of workers coming from only a partial consecration, one cannot help feeling that with whole-hearted consecration of our lives, our energies and our means, vastly greater achievements will be possible.

The recommendation by the convention of a field secretary in our foreign work, and that we attempt to bring the contributions of that society up to $200,000 the coming year, and to send out at least twelve new missionaries each year, are indications of the enlarging faith and zeal among us as regards world-wide evangelization. The appointment of a committee to submit, at our next annual convention, a plan for a great centennial celebration in 1909 on the completion of an hundred years of history of our restoration movement, marks a forward look that means a great advance during these intervening years along the lines of our missionary, educational and benevolent work. The effort to accomplish something worthy of such a movement by the close of the first century of our history will be the very best test we can give to ourselves of the earnestness and zeal with which we are carrying forward the work which our fathers began, and the best demonstration which we can give to the world of the power of the principles we hold to inspire men to unity of action and to unselfish and heroic service for God and for humanity. There is not an organization among us which does not feel that it is only in the beginnings of its history and of its usefulness, and that infinitely greater things are to be accomplished in the future than have been realized in the past. It is this confident expectation of growth and of enlargement which is the surest prophecy of better things to come.

The unity and fraternity manifested throughout the convention was most gratifying to those who believe that people who preach unity should practice it among themselves. While there were differences of opinion upon minor questions of policy there was essential unity of thought and feeling upon all those matters which relate to faith and duty. There are some influences among us, it is true, which do not make for unity or fraternity, and their presence was not without evidence in the outer circles of the convention and in social conversation, but they did not touch in the least the action of the convention, and the unanimity of sentiment against all unfraternal criticism gives proof that such influences cannot long remain active. No man can be a helper of the great cause we plead who does not recognize love as the supreme force in the kingdom of God, and the supreme law to regulate our Christian intercourse.

Nor was this fraternity and fellowship limited to the delegates of the convention. A minister representing the Free Baptists was present to bring the greetings of his brethren to us, and received in return an equally fraternal message to his brethren from us. The Minnesota Baptist Association, which was in session at the same time in St. Paul, sent us very fraternal greetings, and good wishes for our success, and in response a committee consisting of three prominent members of the convention was sent to visit their convention and convey to them our cordial Christian greetings and Christian fellowship. They visited the Baptist brethren in convention and were cordially received, as was also the message which they delivered to them. When the committee returned and reported through Prof. C. L. Loos the cordiality with which they had been received by the Baptist brethren, the announcement was received with great enthusiasm, showing that the passion for Christian unity which animated our fathers still survives in the hearts of their spiritual descendants. This incident gave rise to the reappointment of a committee on Christian union, which had been neglected for several years. This committee will serve as a sort of connecting link between ourselves and other religious bodies who may wish to cultivate fraternal relations looking to closer unity.

The result of the convention on our cause in Minneapolis and St. Paul, and in the new and growing northwest which was represented in the convention, cannot fail to be good and enduring. The presence of so many men of wide reputation and of ability, whose addresses and sermons reached large multitudes of people, the character of the work done by the convention and the great communion service on Sunday afternoon, when more than 3,000 believers sat down together at the table of memory to remember their common Lord and Savior and to pledge themselves anew in allegiance to Him—all this must have made deep and lasting impression upon all those who were ear and eye witnesses. The brethren at Minneapolis and thereabouts with whom we talked were abundantly satisfied with the convention as meeting their expectations and promises to the people, and felt sure that its influence would be very great. On our part we were abundantly satisfied with the entertainment we received and with all the preparations which had been made by the brethren in Minneapolis and St. Paul for the convention. This local committee deserves chief credit for the success of the convention.

One fact detracted more than any other from the continued interest of the convention to the close, namely: the large number of delegates leaving on Wednesday evening, missing one entire day of the proceedings, and the closing consecration service on Thursday evening. Some remedy must be found for this, or it will prove a perpetual source of weakness in our conventions. One way to remedy it is to postpone such matters as the selection of place of next convention, and the election of president and vice-presidents by ballot, until the closing session of the convention. Interest generally culminates in these acts of the convention. Another remedy would be to make the convention proper a more strictly delegate body. This is important from several considerations. Before our next convention the brotherhood should be made thoroughly acquainted with the conditions of membership in the society, entitling persons to vote, so that delegates may be duly appointed and accredited to the Omaha convention. The delegates should sit together, probably grouped by states, where they could confer together on any matter of interest. Delegates appointed to attend the convention to transact its business would not feel at liberty, or ought not to feel at liberty, to leave the convention until the business is complete, without the most urgent reasons. This, of course, need not interfere with securing as large attendance as possible at these conventions. As it was, the sectional divisions on Thursday were rather meagerly attended, with the exception of the evangelistic section which met in the hall where the convention was held, and which attracted the main body of those who remained. The educational and benevolent sections were sparsely attended. The most deeply religious and tender of all the sessions we attended, however, was that of the benevolent section on Thursday afternoon at the Portland Avenue Church of Christ. While the attendance was not large it represented several states, and both the reports of the sisters and the addresses made profoundly stirred the hearts of all present.

Taken all in all we feel justified in pronouncing the Minneapolis convention a great gathering in numbers, in ability, in enthusiasm, in wide-reaching plans, in the spirit of consecration to higher service, in its noble optimism, and in its influence on the cause in the interest of which it was held.

The Foreign Society.

The sessions of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society occupied Monday morning, afternoon and evening. After devotional exercises, the committees were appointed and reports read. An abstract of the report of the board of managers of the Foreign Society was published in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST last week. The report presented at this time by the president, A. McLean, dealt with the general aspects of the work for the past year. Attention was called to the fact that the receipts showed a falling off of about $8,000 for the year from all sources—a result accounted for by the president on three grounds: the superabundant prosperity of the early part of the year, which tempted those who had money to invest it instead of giving it; the drought of the summer, which cut off a large part of the income of the rural members and increased the living expenses of all; and the attack upon the missionaries, led by Mark Twain, growing out of events in China which furnished an occasion for criticism though offering no just ground for it. Nevertheless, in spite of decreased resources, the work has prospered during the year. Having failed by nearly thirty thousand dollars to reach the two hundred thousand dollar mark, that same figure will be looked upon as the goal for the coming year. It was announced that a committee of five had been appointed to consider the advisability of discontinuing the Turkish mission and to report at the next convention.

Prof. Clinton Lockhart, of Drake University, delivered an inspiring address on "The Constraining Love of Christ," in which he set forth the fundamental missionary principle that the love of Christ is the impelling motive to Christian service, and that it is the greatest force in the world.

The following missionaries were introduced to the convention and spoke very briefly, some in English and some in the language of their work: M. B. Adams, of Bilaspur, India, W. C. Weeden, of Honolulu, Herman P. Williams, who is going to the Philippine Islands, Mrs. C. E. Garst, of Japan, Miss Mattie Burgess, of India, Mr. and Mrs. E. E. Faris, of Africa, and Mr. Paul Moore (not a missionary), of London, England.

E. E. Faris, who has spent four years on the Congo in the heart of Africa, made one of the best speeches of the convention, an unvarnished and unadorned story of some of his experiences at Bolengi. Mr. Faris's keen sense of humor and his disclaimer of any special virtue or heroism did not make less evident to the audience the true heroism of the work which he has been doing. Many were heard to remark that they had never before had so vivid an impression of the work of a mission station as they had received from this description of the work at the crossing of the equator and the Congo.

A devotional Quiet Hour, at the close of this session, was conducted by F. G. Tyrrell, of St. Louis.

The Monday afternoon session opened with the reports of committees. The committee on Children's Day reported that the amount collected for foreign missions by this means last year was one-fourth of the total receipts of the Foreign Society; emphasized the education of the children in missionary giving as more important than the immediate cash returns of their offering; and recommended that this educational feature be made more effective by the general adoption of some plan of systematic missionary giving which would be continuous through the year.

The committee on present work spoke of the diminished receipts for the year, and of the five new "Living Link" churches, each supporting its own missionary—the Central of Cincinnati, Mount Cabanne of St. Louis, First of Akron and the churches at Deerfield, O., and Crawfordsville, Ind. The work in the Philippines is being inaugurated through the gift of $5,000 by Lathrop Cooley. The committee on future work noted that the growth in the society's receipts during the last twenty years had been gratifying as compared with that of other foreign missionary societies. It was recommended that special attention be given to the 60 per cent. of our churches which are not at present contributing to our co-operative missionary work, and to this end recommended the establishment of missionary lectureships in our colleges, and the appointment of a field secretary by the executive committee. The present officers were nominated for the ensuing year and unanimously re-elected.

Addresses were made at this session by W. R. Warren, of Connellsville, Pa., on "The Immediate and Imperative Claims of Mission Lands," and by M. D. Adams, who has been eighteen years in Bilaspur, on "Mission Work in India." E. N. Clemenson, of Utah, made an appeal for the bringing of pressure to bear upon Congress to secure an anti-polygamy constitutional amendment.

The Monday evening session was occupied by addresses by W. E. Ellis, of Nashville, and H. L. Willett, of Chicago.

The Home Missionary Society.

The convention of the American Christian Missionary Society occupied two days, Tuesday and Wednesday. After the devotional exercises, I. J. Spencer, president of the A. C. M. S., took the chair. A few of the society's workers were presented to the convention by Secretary B. L. Smith and spoke very briefly. R. A. Timme, who is working with the Germans in Cleveland, among whom we have two churches, two Bible-schools with 700 members, two Christian Endeavor societies, an orphanage, a children's hospital, a deaconess work with five deaconesses, and a sewing school, appealed for more attention to the fifteen millions of Germans in this country. G. K. Hester presented the needs of southern Michigan and northwestern Indiana, where there is a district thirty miles square without a resident minister of any denomination. J. P. Lichtenberger, of Buffalo, spoke of New York state as a field for city evangelization. Among 7,000,000 of population, we have only 8,000 members and 49 churches. These three appeals, which were only three out of forty-seven such received by the managing board within a few weeks, put the convention in a mind to appreciate the urgency of the work of home missions.

The president's address, delivered by I. J. Spencer, was one of the great speeches of the convention. It was a masterly presentation of the plea made by the Disciples of Christ. He called it not "our plea" but "the Divine Plea"—ours only in a subordinate sense, as the violet can look up and say "my sun" and as doubting Thomas can cry out, when convinced, "my Lord and my God." The familiar motto, "Where the Scriptures speak, we speak," etc., was given this forcible statement: The Church of Christ is a democracy in all matters of expediency, but an absolute monarchy in all matters wherein the King has declared his will. The speech abounded with crisp epigrammatic statements of the great truths for which the Disciples of Christ especially stand, and the audience gave vociferous approval to the declaration that, since all Christians are essentially alike, unity would be found when they are content to be Christians only—plus nothing, minus nothing, divided by nothing.

The report of the acting board of managers was presented by the corresponding secretary, B. L. Smith. An abstract of this report appeared in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of last week and printed copies of the full report were in the hands of the convention. The corresponding secretary called attention to the more important points in the report and to the recommendations of the board, which it is not necessary to repeat here.

The report of corresponding secretary of the Board of Church Extension, G. W. Muckley, showed that more than this year's proportion had been raised toward bringing the church extension fund up to the desired half million dollars by 1905. In explanation of the fact that the map showing the churches that have been helped by this board is thickly dotted in the central states and that comparatively few loans have been made in the extreme east and extreme west, the secretary stated that this was only because the applications came chiefly from the central states. The policy of the board is to grant every loan asked outside of this central territory and, when it is necessary to refuse any for lack of funds, to refuse those in regions where we are already strongly represented. The secretary's tour of the western states, occupying eight months from January to September, gave him a broader knowledge of the field and a deeper insight into its needs.

The report of the statistical secretary, G. A. Hoffmann, showed our present total membership in the United States to be 1,179,541, a net gain of 30,459 during the past year. The number of churches is 10,689, a gain of 161. The number of Bible-schools has increased from 7,829 to 8,002 and the number of ministers at present is 6,385, a gain of 42 over last year. The total amount of money raised during the fiscal year ending Sept. 30 is as follows: for all missionary purposes, foreign, home, state and district, including church extension, $611,220; for education and benevolence, $219,269; for local church work, $5,401,000. Total for all purposes $6,310,489. This is a gain of $576,850 over last year and means an average contribution of over $5 per member.

An address on the Twentieth Century City was delivered by J. A. Lord, who sang the praises of stone-bruised heels and defective suspenders of the one-gallus variety as constituting an infallible index to incipient genius and future greatness. If these be indeed the surest criterion of youthful promise, then a new danger is added to the increase of our urban population. We have an idea, however, that in the twentieth century village, as in the twentieth century city, the wearing of shoes and galluses in pairs has already become practically universal. The best in material things is none too good for the man on the farm and we hope to see the day when he will come into his own. Stone-bruises and single galluses are no part of his legitimate inheritance. Meanwhile the farm has not all the virtue in the country, though it has its share.

Tuesday afternoon was devoted to business. Chief interest centered in the reports of the committee on place of next convention and on nominations. The committee on place recommended Pittsburg. A motion was at once made to substitute Omaha, and the fight was on. It was an entirely good-natured one, however. There was quite a general feeling that the next convention should go east, but it was understood that the invitation from Pittsburg had been solicited, while the invitation from Omaha had been pushed vigorously from the beginning by a well-organized delegation. Under these conditions Omaha won by a good majority and was then made unanimous. The committee on nominations, nominated as president of the next convention Gov. McMillen, of Tennessee, and as vice-presidents, Judge Charles J. Scofield, of Illinois, Carey E. Morgan, of Virginia and T. E. Cramblett, of West Virginia. H. O. Breeden, of Iowa, was put in nomination for president. This seemed to necessitate a ballot, and pending preparation for this, the name of Gov. McMillen was withdrawn and on motion the secretary was instructed to cast the ballot for H. O. Breeden for president, and the names mentioned above for vice-presidents. A. L. Orcutt, secretary of the ministerial relief fund, made a strong plea for "Primitive Christianity" as illustrated in ministering to the poor saints under its care, together with a report of the board of ministerial relief, showing the need of increased attention to this feature of our work. The committee on resolutions through its chairman, A. B. Philputt, submitted its report, thanking everybody who deserved it for the success of the convention, pledging continued opposition to the liquor traffic, recommending the selection of St. Louis as the place for the convention of 1903 and the appointment of a committee to co-operate with a committee already appointed by the Missouri state board and the churches of St. Louis to provide for a suitable exhibit of our religious movement at the World's Fair in that city in 1903. A motion was made to strike out the resolution selecting St. Louis as the place for a world's convention in 1903, and pending the discussion on this point the time for adjournment came and the resolution was made the special order for 11:45 the next day.

The evening session of Tuesday was devoted chiefly to the addresses by P. Y. Pendleton and President B. A. Jenkins. These, however, were prefaced by the report of the committee on Christian Endeavor, read by F. M. Tinder, which emphasized the importance of the work done by the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses, and the report of the committee on recommendations, read by W. F. Richardson. It was recommended that the acting board employ district secretaries or evangelists in such numbers as may be necessary and practicable, to represent the society in the field and keep the work of home missions before the churches, that greater attention be given to work among the foreign populations, a field whose richness has been sufficiently proven by the success of the work of R. H. Timme among the Germans in Cleveland; that Forefathers' Day, the second Lord's day in October, be made the day for a special collection for ministerial relief and that its general observance in this way be encouraged; that the headquarters of the board of negro education and evangelization be moved from Louisville to Indianapolis, and that this work be given over to the Christian Woman's Board of Missions; that the centennial of the publication of Thomas Campbell's Declaration and Address be appropriately celebrated in 1909, and that a committee be appointed to report at next year's convention and plan for this celebration. These recommendations were adopted and the committee called for by the last one was appointed with J. H. Garrison as chairman.

P. Y. Pendleton's address on "The Potency of a Single Generation" was a plea for more adequate training of the young to an intelligent interest in missionary work in general and in the evangelization of America in particular. The foreign society has already come to an appreciation of the value of educating the children in missions and Children's Day has become one of the most successful departments of its work. In the interest of home missions equal stress must be laid upon Boys' and Girls' Rally Day for America.

J. T. Boone, of Jacksonville, Fla., was introduced to the convention, and made a brief statement of the condition of affairs in that city. Ninety-three members of the First church lost everything in the fire and the church is without a building. An appeal was made for funds to assist the Jacksonville church in building a house of worship and about $800 was raised in cash and pledges. Ten ministers agreed to take up collections in their churches for this purpose and many others will doubtless follow this example.

The address by President Burris A. Jenkins, of Kentucky University, on "The Disciples of Christ and the American Spirit," developed simply and logically out of three points: there is an American spirit; there is a body rightly called Disciples of Christ; and the spirit of the Disciples of Christ is essentially identical with the American spirit. That there is a typically American spirit few can doubt. The people of Europe ascribe to Uncle Sam many faults, of crudity, angularity and precipitancy, but they always know him when they see him and they feel the force, though they may not admire the quality, of his personality. Shocked by our lack of reverence for precedent, indignant at our "shirtsleeve diplomacy" and the more indignant the more effective it shows itself, the peoples of the elder earth know that there is an American spirit—and sometimes, like the devils, believe and tremble. The battle cries of the Disciples of Christ have always been closely akin to those of the confederated colonies and of the United States. Freedom has been first among these battle cries—freedom of speech, of thought and of action, under law. Even anarchy and its attendant crimes cannot shake our faith in freedom and free speech. Similarly, the Disciples of Christ have plead for freedom of speech and thought and have thrown off the bondage of creeds. The spirit of democracy, as exhibited in our form of government and in the old town meeting where all men stood on an equal footing, finds its analogy in the protest of the Disciples of Christ against ranks and orders of clergy enjoying special privileges and exercising authority over the church. As our government, after gaining its liberty, passed through a "critical period" while, through the making of the constitution, it was saving itself from the petty tyrannies which threatened to take the place of the monarchical rule that had been overthrown, so our movement has passed through a similar critical period, from which it has now for the most part safely issued—the period of danger from little popes, perpetual elders and self-appointed guardians of orthodoxy and chastisers of heretics. Finally, the Disciples of Christ, like the federal government, have stood for union—the Church of Christ, now and forever, one and indivisible. We have passed the danger of division on the question of missionary methods in the seventies, we will safely pass the danger of division on the question of biblical criticism, and we shall continue as a united body to plead for unity.

One of the most interesting and helpful sessions of the convention was that of Wednesday morning, when six able men, representing the northwest, California, the foreign populations, Canada, New England and the Atlantic states, presented the claims of their fields in clear, crisp, concrete form in a series of twenty-five minute speeches. There was little of generality in any of these speeches; there was much of pertinent and particular information, eloquent statistics, pointed logic and fervent appeal. The general exhortation that the field at large needs reapers is less forcible to the average mind than a specific statement as to where a man is needed and why. B. F. Clay, formerly of Salt Lake City, and now state secretary for Idaho, spoke of the possibilities and actualities of the great northwest. J. H. Hughes, of California, told of the needs of that state, "the open door to the Orient," where we have at present only one member to 78 of population and one church to 10,000. In the midst of the bounties of nature as lavished upon man in this sub-tropical climate, said the speaker, "God needs only to be known to be highly honored." Yet, for lack of religious teaching, evil is rampant and every variety of sin, indigenous and exotic, flourishes. He ended with a plea for the general convention to come to San Francisco within a few years.

Roland A. Nichols, of Chicago, speaking of "The Stranger Within Our Gates," told of the potency of our foreign citizens for good or ill. They are the soil in which anarchy grows, and corrupt politicians manipulate the foreign vote for their own purposes. Such politicians as "Johnny" Powers of Chicago, spoilsmen and corruptionists though they may be, know how to win these people through kindness, and the church must learn how to reach them with a social ministry which will find them upon the plane where they now are, meet their present and obvious needs, and bring them through love under the influence of the Gospel of Christ. Mr. Nichols's parallel between the methods of the politician in winning the foreign vote and the methods which the church must employ in winning the foreigners themselves, was made the text for a leading editorial in one of the Minneapolis daily papers the next day.

W. J. Lhamon, who was for three years in Toronto, voiced to the convention "the Macedonian cry of Canada." In the Maritime Provinces of Canada we have a few churches; in Quebec, none; in the Northwest Territory, a very few. Most of our Canadian churches are in Ontario, where we have about 70, of which 20 are not in sympathy with our co-operative missionary work. This anti-ism is the bane of our work in Canada. There is a strain of Scotch blood in Ontario which gives a genuine Caledonian steadfastness to the people. When started, either as antis or as true missionary Disciples, it is nearly impossible to turn them. The Scotchman's prayer is appropriate: "Oh Lord, start me right, for Thou knowest that when I once get started even Thou canst not stop me." In Ontario, with 2,000,000 population, we have one member to every 500. Appeals were made for help in Sydney, N. B., Winnipeg, where a young man offers to pay a hundred dollars a year, and Hamilton, Ont.

J. H. Mohorter, pastor of the church in Boston, spoke for New England. In spite of what is often said about the abandoned farms in New England, the increase of population during the last decade was greater than the average increase for the whole country. Here among a population of 6,000,000, we have only 3,000 members, or one in every 2,000 of population—and two-thirds of these have been gained in the last eight years. The congregations in Worcester and Boston have been especially prosperous recently. There is money in New England, and when the people are converted their money is converted too. The field is ripe for primitive Christianity. The Unitarian reaction against Puritan orthodoxy has spent its force and now there is a reaction in the other direction. The fads and superstitions which flourish here, from Christian Science to astrology, show that the religious instinct is not dead and that the people are eagerly seeking for something to believe. Now is our day of opportunity in New England.

W. J. Wright, of Washington, D. C., general evangelist for the northeast, spoke on the proposition that "The People are in the East," but admitted that if this is true we are not the people, for we are not in the east. We must deal with the present centers of population and the present empires, not with those in the distant future. Christ doubtless foresaw the westward course of empire, but he did not try to get ahead of it. He even began in Judea, a point which the star of empire had already passed. He did not send the Twelve to the German marshes, or to the mouth of the Thames, or to Manhattan Island, but to the places where the people were then. Our center of population may be shifting westward, but the people are in the east now.

It is noticeable that the men from the west tell how vast is the territory from which they come, and how many eastern states could be swallowed up in it; and that the men from the east tell how the population of several western states could be contained in a few eastern cities. And both are valid arguments. We must evangelize the east for what it is, the west for what it is and what it is to be.

[Lack of space prevents the completion of this report in the present issue. It will be continued and completed next week.]

Convention Briefs.

It was not strange that Omaha won the next convention although a majority of the delegates went to Minneapolis feeling that the next convention ought to go east. There was no application from any city east of the Mississippi until late in the convention. The Nebraska delegation was on the ground early with a strong invitation and a strong and well-organized force to push its claims. Frequent rallies were held at Nebraska headquarters and converts were made at all these meetings. When Pittsburg did come into the field, the day was practically won for Omaha. A new method of pushing the claims of the cities was introduced. The Nebraskans improvised a song for Omaha, which, when sung by a quartette, seemed to take the audience by storm. Pittsburg met this with a quartette which sang its praises, and seemed equally popular. But Omaha won the vote, and then it was made the unanimous choice for the convention of 1902. We are coming, Bro. Omaha, several thousand strong. Hurry up that new hall.

Pittsburg made a gallant fight, but was handicapped by a late start. When the recommendation of a committee to plan for a centennial celebration in 1909, was passed the Pittsburg delegates at once caught on to the idea of claiming the convention for that centennial year. That is according to the eternal fitness of things. We had that city in mind when urging a centennial celebration in these columns several weeks ago, as the most suitable place for the convention that year. It takes us back to the same state in which our movement had its birth, and near some of the scenes of its early struggles. Yes, it should be in Pittsburg in 1909, but meantime we must go to some of the other eastern cities.

The resolution adopting St. Louis as the place of the convention for 1903, and instructing the officers of the society to co-operate with a local committee to be appointed by the churches of St. Louis, in planning for a world's convention of the Disciples of Christ, in connection with the World's Fair, met with but little opposition after the situation had been explained. There is no constitutional provision preventing the selection of a place two years ahead, when circumstances seem to make it necessary, and there ought not to be. When there is no occasion for so doing then the convention can always be relied upon to follow precedent. If we are to make an exhibit at the World's Fair worthy of our cause, it is not too early to begin, and a committee was appointed to co-operate with a committee appointed by the state board of Missouri and the churches of St. Louis in providing for such an exhibit. A little thought will show that the two enterprises are so related—the exhibit and convention—that the committee planning for the former should know whether the convention is to be a part of the general plan or not, and shape its action accordingly.

The pulpits of the twin cities were thrown open to our preachers on Lord's day and were generally occupied most acceptably to the audiences which gathered. One of the popular St. Paul churches known as "the People's Church" with a seating capacity of not less than 2,000, turned out an audience of 80 persons to hear one of our preachers whose reputation had evidently not penetrated as far north as the head of navigation on the Mississippi. The pastor of the church was absent. It was a cold reception, on a cold day, in a cold church, to a cold preacher, who did his best to warm up the situation by preaching a hot sermon, but we fear with small success. The preacher felt it was a great compliment to him, however, to be assigned to so large a building, and he only regrets that his drawing power was not equal to the expectations of the committee. But he got a new idea about "People's Churches." In the evening this preacher was thawed out entirely by one of the sweetest, tenderest and most beautiful discourses he had heard for a long time. It was by our beloved Jabez Hall, in the Portland Avenue

Church of Christ. This gave him a new impression on the value of atmosphere to a preacher—not the material atmosphere alone or chiefly, but the spiritual atmosphere. The communion service on Lord's day afternoon was what these communion seasons at our conventions are now expected to be—a holy hour of self-examination and re-consecration. Long will the memory of it abide with those who were present and entered into its spirit.

One of the side shows to the convention was a reception tendered by the local prohibition club to some of the prohibitionists of the convention on Wednesday afternoon, 5-7, at the Portland Avenue church. Refreshments were served by the ladies and speeches were made by W. H. Boles, Simpson Ely, W. J. Lhamon, J. H. Garrison, J. A. Lord, Prof. A. M. Haggard and Rev. Mr. Roberts of the Presbyterian church. Dr. Haggard of the Minneapolis church presided. The speeches we heard were all capital, except one, and that was well intended. It proved to be one of the most enthusiastic meetings connected with the convention, though another engagement prevented the writer from remaining to the close. Plans are already being laid for a similar meeting on a much larger scale at Omaha next year. The saloon must go, and the church that does not help to hasten its going must itself go. This is official. See Matt. 5:13.

The convention at Kansas City, Mo., last year, passed a resolution to elect the president and vice-presidents of the American Christian Missionary Society by ballot, so as to permit the freest expression of sentiment on the part of the delegates. There was a little disposition to shrink from this new method for fear it might give rise to electioneering, cause hard feelings on the part of defeated candidates and consume too much time. But it is obvious that any man who electioneers for office has no ground for hard feelings if he is defeated. Others will have no occasion so to feel. The committee on nominations, to save time, also recommended the candidates for the officers to be elected by ballot. A governor of one of the southern states was nominated for president. Immediately H. O. Breeden of Des Moines, Ia., was also put in nomination and urged on the ground that the honor should be conferred on one who attends our conventions and who participates in and is familiar with our various missionary activities. After a brief discussion, in which Bro. Breeden offered to withdraw his name, the committee decided to withdraw the name of the governor, and a motion to instruct the secretary to cast the ballot of the convention for Bro. Breeden was unanimously carried. We should have preferred the ballot vote without the withdrawal. That would draw the lines more sharply between voters and non voters in our conventions and be a more untrammelled expression of the will of the delegates. We congratulate President Breeden on his election. It is a well deserved honor.

College banquets, were held as usual, some of the colleges cleaving to the night, rather than accept the half-day left open for such social functions. Bethany, Kentucky University, Hiram, Drake, Cotner and Eureka, were among the institutions whose alumni gathered about the festal board, to revive the memories of student days and sing the praises of their loved alma mater. Bethany feels that she has come to a new birth, opening a new future, and all the colleges are hopeful, and looking forward to better days. We attended two of the banquets and would have been delighted to have been present at all of them, if it had been possible. Of the boys we heard speak at these banquets one was eighty, and another close on to it, and their speeches were among the best we heard. God bless our colleges and our college men!

President I. J. Spencer worthily filled the presidential chair. His inaugural message, his bearing in the chair and out of it, his decisions, his fairness, were all worthy of the presiding officer of a great national convention. If he erred in one respect it was in the kindness of his heart in permitting too many personal and sometimes trivial announcements to be made from the platform, consuming precious time and detracting from the dignity of a great deliberative body. A stern announcement at the beginning of a convention that such announcements would not be made and need not be presented, would avoid the necessity of denying personal requests of this kind, except in the most hardened cases which could stand the rebuff. What right has Brown if he wishes to see Smith, on purely personal matters, to make the platform of a great missionary convention an advertising medium to gratify his desire? This is not a criticism on the kind-hearted chairman but on the Browns and Smiths who worked him for their private convenience.

The half holiday which the convention gave us was utilized by several hundred people in an excursion to Lake Minnetonka and a boat ride on that lake. Several car loads of singing delegates made the route melodious with their songs, and enjoyed the brilliant scenery along the way. The ride on the lake was marred only by the chilliness of the atmosphere, as the day was cloudy and the wind was from the north. In spite of this drawback, however, it was a delightful outing and gave many an opportunity for the first time of seeing one of the fairest of Minnesota's beautiful lakes. This opportunity for sight-seeing ought to have prevented so large a falling off of the convention on Thursday forenoon when the related interests of benevolence, education and Christian Endeavor were so ably presented. If some genius will invent a scheme by which people may become interested in what they ought to be interested in, he should be canonized as a benefactor of the church.

The convention was favored by the presence of a great many singers of note among us and with some very fine singing. J. Walter Wilson, who led the evening song services, is a master of assemblies in that line and he was ably seconded by several others of the singing brethren. A large chorus choir on the platform added to the musical feature of the convention. The impromptu songs improvised for the benefit of Omaha and Pittsburg were greatly enjoyed, but the former was sung at an inopportune time, coming immediately after the able and scholarly address by Prof. Willett on "Missions as the Vocation of the Church." The transition from the sublime to the humorous was rather sudden to be enjoyed by all.

The feature of having headquarters in the same building and yet outside of the audience room, for various state headquarters and for headquarters of the various publishing companies, colleges, benevolences and other interests, was somewhat unique and seems altogether desirable where the building is so constructed as to permit of it. It afforded rallying points for the delegates, gave them an opportunity of sampling books and periodical literature, of finding friends and of becoming acquainted with the various interests among us. The attractive manner in which these booths were fitted up made them agreeable resorts for delegates who desired to visit them.

It is not our custom in late years to make appeals to our national conventions for money, unless it be to meet some special emergency. Such an emergency is presented by the great fire in Jacksonville, Fla. An appeal was made to the convention in behalf of the impoverished church there, under the pastoral care of J. T. Boone, which had just begun preparation for the building of a suitable church on an elegant site when the fire swept everything away. The response was pledges and cash amounting to nearly $900, besides a number of churches that pledged collections. This amount should be swelled to at least $2,000, and we hope that many churches which have not made an offering for the church at Jacksonville will do so at their earliest convenience and forward same to J. T. Boone or to B. L. Smith, Cincinnati. The church there is the child of the American Christian Missionary Society, as was Galveston, and if we put the Jacksonville church on its feet as we did the Galveston church, the influence of such fraternal assistance will be widespread and lasting. Let us help the Jacksonville brethren.

The following estimate of the character of the delegates assembled in the exposition hall, from the Minneapolis Journal, will be approved by all who were there:

Seldom has the exposition contained a more important assemblage. Men and women prominent in the work of the Church of Christ were present from practically every state in the union, and from the Church's missionary fields as well. They were the thinkers of the Church; the people who have made God's work their work; and the enthusiasm was manifested in everything they did. It is a fine, representative body, this missionary convention of the Church of Christ, and one which Minneapolis deems it a high privilege to entertain.

A Minneapolis paper announced that the delegation from Indiana was the only one which brought a banner, but it was displayed conspicuously over the seats assigned to the Indiana representatives. This is a good example and we hope hereafter all the states may bring their banners, and their delegates sit together. No state will be satisfied to make a poor showing without good reason.

Christianity in Business

By A. B. PHILLIPS

(Long years ago the church invited the world to put more Christianity into its business; now the world invites the church to put more business into its Christianity.) The logical answer to this sensible exhortation is the church extension society. This society comes into existence committed to the King's business. We must not take for granted that home and foreign missions are broad and spiritual; and look upon church extension as being limited and secular. Those who do so remind me of the man who laughed at a German florist for cultivating a narrow garden. "But," said the lover of flowers, "see how high it is; it reaches to the stars." All our societies are many phases of one grand work, just as the rainbow beauty is composed of the harmonious blending of various hues. It would be fatal to neglect either side of our great religion. Upon the natural the spiritual is superinduced. Both ideas are happily blended in our Savior's unique life. He does not only prepare us for a place, but he prepares a place for us. The Author of the world's best sermon is the Architect of the house of many mansions. As the Carpenter of Nazareth came to the aid of the wilderness preacher, so we should send forth the mechanic and evangelist to toil side by side. If it is the glory of the home society to call new congregations into being, it is the peculiar joy of church extension to give them "a local habitation and a name."

What is a congregation without a home? The beasts of the earth are not denied so great a boon. The watch-dog returns to his master's gate; the fierce lion will seek his lair and lay him down in his den; "as for the stork, the fir trees are her house; the high hills are a refuge for the wild goats, and the rocks for the conies." But to-night 2,700 little groups of the feeblest children of the Son of Man have not where to lay their heads. They worship God in private homes, they sing the songs of Zion in rented halls; some dwell in tents like Abraham with Isaac and Jacob. These are our heroes who toil hardest and suffer most for the cause we love. Banks and loan associations, charging high interest and exacting iron-clad securities, seldom look upon the little bands with favor; but in charity we must excuse the oversight because such men and women as these are spiritually discerned.

At this point church extension comes to the rescue with common sense advice and a few indispensable business propositions. First, the missions are asked to decide whether or not they need a building and what in reason should be the cost. Second, they are urged to raise all the money possible on the ground. Third, they are advised to secure a desirable lot with a clear title in a residence portion of the city. Once the people would go to the church but now the church must go to the people. Success or failure will depend in a large degree upon the choice of a location. Promising congregations have been relegated to oblivion on back streets or buried alive in a hole in the ground by trying to make God accept what the devil would not have. It would be better to pay market price for a corner lot in Zion than to receive a whole acre donated in Hinnon. After the lot has been secured they ask the extension society for a loan, to be returned in five equal annual installments at the low rate of four per cent. The loan is to be secured by first mortgage on the church property and must be sufficient to complete the building and cancel all other indebtedness except the mortgage; so, when the mortgage is paid, the property will be free of debt. Without this method hundreds of our congregations can never own a church home: Unless they are anchored to some spot they can call their own they will soon be lost to us forever. To allow such children of promise to go from us by default is to be guilty of the worst form of slothfulness in business.

Manufacturing establishments constantly guard against the least possible loss; they no longer cast material worth millions into the waste pile and the ash-heap. They tell us that our packing houses have learned to utilize every part of the hog except his squeal. And soon, very soon, some inventor may come and convert his harsh tones into music and give him a voice as sweet as the notes of an instrument of ten strings. When Jesus called Peter and Andrew they were casting a net into the sea; this was the primitive home society—catching the fish. When he called James and John they were mending their nets; these were charter members of church extension—keeping the fish from getting away.

Church extension has just completed the lucky thirteenth year of its age and seeks to drive away all superstitious fears by assuring us the last year has been its best year. We now have in the fund $305,342. We will have half a million by 1905. Over five hundred prosperous young churches have received assistance. More than $160,000 has been returned and re-loaned. The money is not buried in one place by giving, but kept in perpetual motion by loaning. Instead of fostering beggars this principle encourages thrift. We know from experience that every church extension roof shelters missionary heads.

Good men used to tell us they would gladly aid our new organizations; if a plan of co-operation could be devised; if concerted action could be assured; if the management could be placed in competent hands. Church extension meets this long felt need. I have in mind a church we lost last year that could have been saved by this society without the exchange of a dollar. All the congregation needed was business direction. The little band is now scattered, those who gave liberally are disgusted, and their donations have vanished forever. Alas! this is not a special case, but the inglorious history of a thousand fields. The indirect influence of church extension is greater than you and I will ever know. Our best house of worship in South Carolina was built by seventeen members. They said: "We will begin and do our best, and if we fail Bro. Muckley will help us out." Bro. Muckley will never help them out because they "owe no man anything, but to love one another." Had it not been for the confidence created by the existence of our church extension fund this mission band would never have had the courage to begin. How often do we read of financial disaster and absconding officials; but let me say to the credit of the Kansas City board, in managing a fund that has reached over $300,000 during thirteen trying years, they have never lost a single loan. Such orthodox financiering ought to admit them to full fellowship and good standing with every organization among the Disciples of Christ; and further, such business honor on the part of the five hundred churches that have received aid, compels respect for the other twenty-seven hundred that need it.

We have the best church extension scheme ever devised. The money helps build a new church every five years. The money more than doubles its working power every five years. Every dollar loaned by the society calls out three dollars on the mission field. Over three hundred thousand dollars in our treasury is the earnest of a round million that we will soon report with pride, and rejoice over in national conventions. If we fail in extension work, the fault will not be with the plan, but the people. This reminds me of the traveling salesman, who presented himself on the sixth floor of a large apartment store, hoping to sell a bill of goods. The impatient overseer, regarding him as an interloper, threw him down on the landing of the fifth floor; the manager on the fifth threw him down to the landing of the fourth. This man was not without descent. Finally, a clerk on the first heaved him into the midst of the street, where he lit on his back with his heels in the air, and his hands extended ad astra. In a moment he bounded to his feet, and after viewing that structure from foundation to exalted roof, he lifted up his voice and exclaimed: "Great lands, what a system!" The church extension plan is not a visionary scheme it is a magnificent system. It appeals to the business sense of the most experienced financiers. The founder and president of the largest cotton mill in the state of Georgia examined this work,—as he is abundantly capable of doing,—then remarked: "No man can foretell what good it will do. Some day it will be another Mutual Life of New York."

About five thousand six hundred of our congregations own their own buildings. We are increasing at the rate of three hundred churches a year. On an average two hundred of these call to us for assistance. Somebody said: "This is organizing too rapidly. It is like the Kentucky pumpkin vine that grew so fast it wore the pumpkin out, dragging it along the ground." But that speaks well for the life of the seed, and is a compliment upon the vigor of the soil. It is well to cry, Halt! Halt! but how can we stop, when the Captain of our salvation is moving on, and the music of the drum beat is heard breaking upon our glad ears? Our marching orders come from another world, and the blood "of the great commission" is in our veins. We are in possession of a secret too good to keep, and that secret is known by five hundred thousand ladies. If religious statistics mean anything; if Dr. Carroll of New York is right, we have been a prolific ic vine since the morning they planted us in the garden of the Lord. To grow is our style. We seem to have caught the whisper of the old Genesis mandate: Multiply and replenish the earth. All denominations have their troubles. While we sit here vexed and worried about a cage, remember our brethren of the sister churches are more embarrassed still over a lack of birds.

Pardon a personal allusion and I will try to make a matter plain by putting it in the concrete. Recently our enterprising and efficient secretary, G. W. Muckley, came south, and induced the Augusta church to take out a named loan fund. A named loan fund when completed is five thousand dollars. It is to be paid in by the individual or church making the subscription, at the rate of five hundred dollars a year, during a period of ten years. This fund earns 4 per cent. interest, which cannot be used for current expenses, but must be added to the principal, and so helps build up the fund. Let us see what money will do when thus compounded. In 1852 John C. Neild, a rich bachelor of Buckinghamshire, died, leaving in his will over three million dollars to Queen Victoria. The money remained in the Bank of England and compounded at 5 per cent. When Victoria breathed her last, it was found the three million had increased to about thirty million. This was not the accumulation of a single lifetime, because the Queen received it in the thirty-second year of her age. If the money had passed into her hands on the morning of her birth that gift alone would have made her the richest woman on this globe. The Augusta named loan fund is now sixteen hundred and fifty dollars. When little Johnny Evans, one of our Sunday-school boys with golden hair, gets to be as old as his grandfather, by whose side he sits in church, this fund will be at least thirty thousand dollars. How many organizations will that aid in a single year? The extension records show that thirty thousand dollars in 1896 assisted forty-seven churches. Because of the personal interest it awakens, we find it easier to raise three hundred dollars annually on a named loan fund than one hundred without it. Already there are ten such funds established, but we ought to have fifty this year of grace, 1901.

Despite our successes, an old gentleman was heard to say: "I am opposed to church extension." When asked what he would do about it, he replied: "I would give it up." Once a backwoods southern farmer appeared at the office of a village editor, and said to the proprietor: "I thought I would come in and see you about a piece you wrote in your paper. You said an alligator would make a nice pet. Well, me and my wife got an alligator, and brought him home; he did nothing but lie around and sleep for the first three months. At last he got hungry and came to his appetite all at once. He ate up our young Jersey calf the first night; the next day he managed to get on the outside of a pair of my new harness; a pickaninnie has been missed ever since he was seen down by the spring one Sunday afternoon; a neighbor's son, that came to see my daughter Lizzy, vanished from the barn lot, just like a candle goes out in the night. The coroner came with a jury to hold an inquest, and they carried on their investigations up in a tree, with the alligator beneath on the ground; at last the limb broke, and they all disappeared, going down in a row." Then shouted the excited editor, looking out of wild eyes, "That's a dangerous monster! Why don't you kill the old thing?" The farmer replied: "We have often thought we would do the same; but it would look like throwing away everything we ever made; you see we've got so much stowed away in him." Give church extension up! When we think of our small churches that have been blessed by receiving; when we think of our large churches that have been more blessed by giving; when we think of over three hundred thousand dollars in shining gold; when we think of the redeemed, who will go up from these congregations, to walk above the stars, and sing the new song, we conclude we have too much stored away in him.

The annuity feature will grow in favor, as it becomes better understood. By this plan a man gives to the society a certain sum of money, for which he receives 6 per cent. interest annually during life. This money is non-taxable. At the death of the annuitant, it will be placed in the general fund, where it will in the future earn 4 per cent. Note carefully the advantages the annuity affords. The donor receives an income during life. He is permitted to see his money doing good while living. He allows the society to become his agent, but for these services pays no commission. He is relieved of the difficulties of managing his property in old age. So far as he is personally concerned, there will be no more repairs, nor salaries, nor taxes; and he is where insurance agents do not come. He fixes the destiny of his money while in full possession of his reasoning powers; so, when he lies down in the quiet of the grave, men in courts will not contest his will, nor sit in legal judgment upon his sanity. Then the investment is entirely safe. Depend upon it, the Christian Church may always bend, but it will never break. The annuity has often been referred to as a private monument, and so it is. When I come down to die, I had rather sleep beneath the shadow of a monument like that than to have my name recorded along the marble streets, or granite aisles of the City of the Silent. Christians should not seek to build monuments to assure their age that they are dead; rather let them build such monuments as will convince the world that they were once alive; and are living still in their gifts to missions, and the grateful children of other years will plant forget-me-nots upon their graves, and keep their memory green.

It is well to know our strength and turn it to good account. It is well to know our weakness and provide for it. The extension collection comes in September, the month when preachers are returning from their vacation, when those who give largely are in the mountains and at the sea. It is also unfortunate in coming last. It is like the impotent man at Bethesda's pool; church extension lifts up its voice, and lo! the cry is heard, "When the angel comes to trouble the water, behold, foreign and home missions step down before me."

In this grand work the time element is most urgent and important. We can buy for hundreds now what will cost us thousands after the lapse of a decade. Manhattan Island once sold for twenty-four dollars, but that was one hundred and seventy-five years ago. For our Brotherhood to aim at half a million dollars by 1905 is a commendable ambition. As the young eagles, in their high mountain home, stretch forth their wings and test their strength, so we, conscious of our growing power, are fast learning to perform deeds worthy of ourselves. Once, it was "our plea," but now it is "our people." Orators may charm us with their gifts of persuasive speech, but great ideas are at their best, when incarnate in the lives of the millions. And now for church extension we bespeak a still more triumphant day. Its history is good, but its prophecy is better. The Lord set the seal of His approval upon a work "so gloriously begun and happily attained." And may it be like "the acorn lost in the wilderness, warmed by genial suns and refreshed by heaven's distilling dews; it grew at last to be an oak; it defied the tempest, and stood a thousand years."

English Topics.

Great pulpit powers are at work in England: Dr. Horton and Mr. Jowett among the Congregationalists; Dr. Monro Gibson and Dr. Hunter among the Presbyterians; Canon Scott Holland, and the Bishop of Ripon, and the new Bishop of London among Anglicans; and Dr. Clifford and Thomas Spurgeon among the Baptists, always preach week after week to immense congregations. But by far the most commanding figure of all is Dr. Parker, who seems, though past 70, to be absolutely juvenile in his physical and intellectual elasticity. He is the great pulpit attraction of London, as Dr. MacLaren of Manchester is in the north of England. When Dr. Parker was asked recently how he manages to draw thousands to his City Temple simply to hear him talk, he said, "You would understand if you read my library." "Is it such a good one?" asked a listener. "Oh, it's good, bad, indifferent, grand, and squalid," answered the Doctor. "It's everything. It's in underground trains, and on 'buses, in aerated tea shops, smart restaurants, at churches, stations, picnics, receptions, meetings, jubilees, and sick beds; you find it in prisons and boudoirs. The fact is you can never get away from it. We call it human nature for want of a better name. I study it—that is what I call my library. Most men do not, you see. But that is the reason why I am listened to."

An Appalling Labor War.

A most appalling blight has fallen on one of the grandest of our British industries. Such things must of course occasionally happen in the history of a nation of 40 millions. Our sociology is far preferable to that of our forefathers, and the establishment of Christianity for many generations has wonderfully softened the friction between the classes of humanity. But much further progress needs to be made before men of different ranks and interests can be brought into relationships of amity and concord. Thus, the great strike at Grimsby has now for several months brought suffering on 30,000 people. Not only are the fishermen, the crews of the trawlers and the engineers of the steam-fishing ships all idle, but their wives and children are in a state of chronic semi-starvation. The origin of the strike is of course simply a dispute about the share of profit claimed by the men and refused by the Federated Owners of the fishing fleet. Grimsby is the largest fishing port in the whole world. Its toilers of the sea are a magnificent race. They are known all over the North Atlantic shores up to the Arctic ice-pack. But, though fairly remunerated, they have been following the example of the working men of America in demanding a greater fraction of the immense income piled up by the masters. The distress in the fine Lincolnshire town is now terrible; and it is aggravated by a lamentable cause. Last week the long suspended Damoclean sword fell. The indignation of the thousands of men at the unbending attitude of the rich masters at last overflowed, and terrible riots broke out in the docks. The offices of the companies were set on fire. Large squads of police dispersed the crowd after hours of fighting in which men, women, and children were knocked down and trampled on by hundreds. This rioting has in a measure stopped the relief fund, which had been augmented from all parts of England. The town is now quiet, but the suffering is great. The root of the trouble is the deep distrust of each side by the other. There is no mutual confidence. Here we have a striking lesson on the precious value of personal faith. Men who have no faith in God are lost. Those who have no faith in each other lose the best advantages of this civilized condition under which we live.

The Great Anglican Congress.

October is a wonderful month in the ecclesiastical camps. It is now that the Christian clans march forth to various chosen centres of denominational concentration. During this month the great Anglican, Baptist, and Congregational Congresses take place each year. The Church Congress is now in session at Brighton. Next week the Baptists assemble in Edinburgh, giving "Bonnie Scotland" a turn. The week after that the Congregational Union will gather in great force. Beautiful Brighton, often styled "London by the Sea," is this week giving a splendid welcome to the Church Congress. "Brighton in Black" is even more attractive than Brighton in its normal loveliness. The immense number of the clergy in their clerical garb will make the city seem to be intensely religious, but everybody who knows Brighton recognizes that it has long been one of the spiritual head-centres of England. It is a place of churches, most of which flourish exceedingly, and they are of all shades of Christian opinion. Many of them are perennially full of zeal, power, light, and love. Robertson of Brighton was the greatest Christian mystic England ever produced. He was a Churchman. Sortain, the Congregationalist, was as popular. The Church Congress is meeting at Brighton after an interval of 27 years. On Sunday nearly 100 special preachers occupied the church pulpits. India is well represented by the Bishop of Calcutta. Dr. Welldon is attracting much attention in England during his welcome visit. A grand meeting of working men has been addressed by that evergreen octogenarian, the Archbishop of Canterbury. Social matters are receiving special attention, the program dealing with such topics as the housing of the poor and hooliganism.

The Coming of the Monks.

A new invasion is threatening this country. Britain is rapidly becoming a headquarters for the Roman Catholic orders and congregations which are quitting France rather than submit to the decree that they must apply for authorization and must come under government inspection and pay taxes. The entire liberty here granted to men and women of all faiths, the freedom from irritating restrictions and the security of tenure present great attractions to the prudent heads of the continental establishments. There are in England, apart from the newcomers, about 50 different religious orders for men, with 235 monasteries. In Wales there are also 12 and in Scotland 11. Several are planted in the very heart of London, one under the shadow of St. Paul's Cathedral. Who are these monks? How do they live? What do they do? Their lives are as varied as that of the outer world. There is the bearded, workaday Franciscan, living in the slums of South London, maintaining hospitals for the sick and caring for the poor, after the manner of the founder at Assisi. There is the rigid Carthusian in the great Sussex monastery at Parkminster—the largest Carthusian convent in the world—living a life of the severest asceticism, confined mostly to his cell, never tasting flesh meat, fasting three times a week. There are Benedictines in Devonshire running a great patent medicine factory. But the various contemplative orders are not dreaded. It is the aggressive orders, the Jesuits and Oratorians, which are a terror in France, and whose advent is looked on with fear in this country. Spain and Italy will not have them, Catholic though those lands are. The Jesuits have all but mastered France. The government has turned upon them. And now they will work for the conversion of England to the Pope. They have already several churches, convents and schools; but their greatest work is done through the press and by personal influence. After all, however, monasticism is an effete institution. It is but a feeble survival of the mighty institution which dominated Christendom when the great apostasy was at its height. In the middle ages the Benedictines alone had in Europe 37,000 monasteries. The Reformation virtually destroyed the power of that order and of all others.

The Sea Vultures.

One great national vice, which is indeed international because it is universal amongst nations, is creating increasing indignation in England. The British people are not, like the Italians, a race of gamblers. The vast majority of the people never indulge in any of the varied sports or recreations which include the chance element. Still, a large minority are given to betting in various forms and to the gambling which can be practiced in so many exciting methods by people of any class, either for amusement or for gain of lucre without industry. Gamblers are regarded by all really good men and women with unspeakable contempt, but they are invariably so callous in conscience as to despise the fact that others despise them. Angry protests are being emphasized against the systematic way in which our troops are swindled of their hard-earned money on the several different transports ferrying between England and South Africa. In my own ocean voyages I have on every occasion been amazed at the amount of gambling practiced from first to last by some of the passengers. The worst and most vicious forms of this ruinous, degrading pursuit are those which may be witnessed on any liner going to America, India, Africa or Australia. Gambling which would be neither tolerated nor indulged in on a racing field flourishes unchecked, the dull monotony of a sea life banishing all thoughts of the future need of money from the minds of the duped soldiers. These sea vultures are composed of the scourings of all nations who, having fought at the front, gambled also, made big piles, traveled at two shillings a day (government indulgence passage) on the supposition that they are returning to reenlist, whereas they are only going out willfully to plunder our soldiers.

Will the Church Keep the Women?

The great question amongst the difficulties of the clergy has hitherto been, "How can we keep the men?" There has never been any trouble about the women. They have always been the soul of the community, the strength of the church and the glory of religion. The women of England are the grandest section of the humanity of the whole earth, and they are likely to remain so for ages. I have seen the men and women of many lands, but the women of the Anglo-Saxon race are incomparable, in saying which I of course refer to both English and American women, who differ in typical development but are rivals in supreme qualities. In England the men are found in much larger proportion in Nonconformist than Anglican sanctuaries. The Dissenters are sturdy thinkers. The "Churchmen" are more given to ceremonialism and to estheticism. Thus, there is something about the atmosphere of Episcopalianism which suits the tastes of the cultured members of the fair sex. Accordingly, the majority of Englishwomen of the upper classes have always thronged the rich and beautiful churches, which are invariably fountains of unlimited sympathy, charity and beneficence. The charitable agencies of the Church of England are simply marvelous to those who take the trouble to make acquaintance with what is going on. But, as in all human institutions complications arise, so a new trouble for the church in its fashionable circles is embarrassing the clergy. A walk around the West End of London will astonish any visitor from the provinces on any Sunday evening during the fashionable season. He will see lines of carriages taking the "upper ten" to the great houses for concerts, dinners and dances. An eminent Roman Catholic divine once said, "Give me the women of a country and my religion is secure." Apparently the church is losing the women of a large section of the aristocracy.

DOWN WITH CIGARETS

A Boys' and Girls' Crusade.

By WILLIS BROWN.

Organizer of the American Anti-Cigaret League.

Twenty-five laborers, employed by the West Superior, Wis., Street Railway Company were discharged one day last week because the superintendent discovered them smoking cigarettes. He told them to take their dinner pails and get out.

Last week a Chicago judge gave a woman a divorce from her husband because he was a cigaret fiend. Her statement to the judge was that her husband would get up two or three times during the night and smoke cigarettes in the room. Not only was he a nervous and physical wreck, but she felt her lungs were affected by inhaling the smoke.

These incidents are not surprising to those who know of the action of the United States Weather Bureau, forbidding the employees in this department of government service from smoking cigarettes.

Public sentiment is growing, and in many places none but those indifferent to their standing in the community will be found with this agency of disgrace between their lips.

For the boy the cigaret affords the opportunity for him to experiment, and the first puff is in imitation of the man who enjoys his good cigar. But the smoke from the cigaret is sweet and mild, and to be popular with the other boys, he must swallow this smoke or inhale it into the lungs and exhale it through the nose. Thus the habit is formed, and no one realizes more than the boy himself what a strong hold this has upon him. There is the craving and the supplying of this unnatural demand. The man who smokes cigarettes inhales the poisonous gases arising from the combustion, and the direct effect is to weaken the nerves and will power.

All people look with horror on one who inhales opium. How terrible! Well may we look with the same feelings upon the inhaler of tobacco. Both are fiends, and both are feeding the whole body with a moral and physical destroyer.

Statements from the world's most prominent medical authority have not been able to stop the growth of this evil. The one practical plan that has been adopted has been the placing of the habit along with the use of morphine and opium.

The president of the Union Pacific Road, in explanation as to why he had issued an order against the use of cigarettes by employees of that great corporation, said, "They are not responsible; weak and sickly. I would just as soon go to a lunatic asylum and hire engineers as to have a cigaret smoker in the engine cab." Many railroads have taken the same action. The Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific R. R. was the first to issue this order. The great business houses and department stores will have no cigaret smokers. Now, when cigaret users understand that those who do not smoke are preferable to those who do, the vice is bound to become unpopular. When business men issue edicts against cigaret smoking, no one but an idiot will ignore the question, and a youth or man seeking work will be ashamed to admit that he is a cigaret user.

The business men responsible for this ban on the cigaret certainly know what they are about when they declare that a man who smokes cigarettes cannot pack beef, cannot guide an engine, and cannot even drive a spike or weld iron. Even some employers have declared that a man or boy addicted to this vice is unfit to draw soda water, sell dry goods or even propagate plants. It is a matter of dollars and cents with them and as such becomes a matter of deep concern. The time is soon at hand when it will be impossible for a cigaret smoker to secure employment anywhere.

The unruly boy at school is usually the cigaret smoker. In some schools fully fifty per cent. of the boys are users of this little white roll of death.

The American Anti-Cigaret League has sought in the past two years to confront the boys and girls with the actual business-like facts in this matter. Success has crowned such efforts, and as the attention of the public is drawn to the question investigations are made and more help secured.

In Buffalo, N. Y., after an address on this subject, a gentleman came forward and taking me by the hand said: "I heard you some time ago, and I immediately began investigating the habits of the men in my employ. I had a few men who were giving very unsatisfactory service, though they had formerly been my best men. They seemed to be going to pieces, and I knew they were not drinkers. Well, do you know, every one of them were smoking cigarettes. I told them they could give up cigarettes or their job. They all quit and have held out but one. I had to let him go."

"What is your business?" I asked.

"I am a drayman," he replied.

Boys and girls have signed the pledge against the use of cigarettes, formed leagues and have been the active agitators of this great movement. Through the co-operation of the pastors, Sunday-school superintendents and leaders of Young People's Societies we have been able to enter the public schools, and by massing the boys and girls, have made as unpopular the habit as it was popular. In many places it takes more courage to smoke than formerly it took for the boy to refuse.

Nearly every state in the union has a stringent anti-cigaret law, and therefore it is in violation of law that the thousands of boys and many girls are using cigarettes. In Tennessee and Oklahoma they have an absolutely prohibitory law. No cigarettes in the state and territory.

The plan of the league is to have this law passed in every state of the union. Every reader of this has a part in this grand effort. You can easily get some boy and girl interested. They will do the rest.

The pledge that has been signed by three hundred thousand boys and girls in the past two years is as follows:

PLEDGE OF THE AMERICAN ANTI-CIGARET LEAGUE.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

From Denver to Minneapolis is 928 miles. This distance between the two cities was traversed in six and twenty hours. Ten years have passed since I was in Minneapolis. On the occasion of my former visit the International Christian Endeavor Convention was in session. A company came out from New York to capture the '92 Convention, and it was done. The convention in Minneapolis swept everything before it. The races were on; but the young people created such a religious enthusiasm that the papers gave small space to the speed of the horses. The journals of Minneapolis and St. Paul were filled with accounts of the young people's convention in the great Exposition Building. Minneapolis has made wonderful progress during these ten years. It is a larger, richer, finer, city than it was a decade ago. Among other improvements worthy of mention is the house of worship on Portland Avenue and Grant Street belonging to the Disciples of Christ—the place in which C. J. Tanner preaches the word.

These western cities are veritable miracles. The village of St. Anthony was the beginning of Minneapolis. The first saw mill was built in 1848. The Minneapolis saw mills now have an annual capacity of 750,000,000 feet. This is the greatest lumber market in the world. In the production of flour it also stands at the head. The population is a little more than 200,000. The wealth of the city is estimated at $300,000,000. There are 192 churches and 58 public school buildings. The annual expense of the common schools is $650,000. Here is also located the University of Minnesota, in which are 3,400 students. This plant is worth nearly $2,000,000. From these statements it will be seen that Minneapolis is not entirely devoted to the worship of Mammon. Some of the largest and strongest churches in the United States are in this city. The Methodists were the first to organize. In 1849 a Methodist preacher was in the village of St. Anthony and organized a congregation of that denomination. There are now 25 Methodist churches. The First Congregational church was organized in 1851. It was the first church of that denomination in the state. There are 26 Congregational churches in the city. The Lutheran Church next to the Roman Catholic is the strongest body in the city. It has 29 congregations and 10,000 members. The Roman Catholic Church claims 25,000 members, or about one eighth of the population. The Presbyterians, Methodists, and Lutherans have each a college in Minneapolis.

But the attraction in this wonderful city at the present time is the annual convention of the Disciples of Christ.

This letter is written in the midst of the great convention. From every point of the compass, from every section of our broad land, and from the regions beyond, Disciples of Christ have come to hear what God has done through them during the past year, and to think and plan for the extension of the kingdom in the immediate future. We have learned that more than $600,000 was raised last year for missions. Judging by what I heard in one of the largest churches yesterday from its pastor concerning the Disciples and their work, and from what I have heard as to the remarks of others, our convention is making a favorable impression on the minds of the people. There is a congregation of Disciples in St. Paul and one in Minneapolis. A. D. Harmon ministers to the first named and C. J. Tanner to the last mentioned. They are, comparatively, young men and seem to me to be admirably suited to work in the twin cities. The people generally know nothing at all about the Disciples—who they are or for what they stand. This meeting will diffuse information concerning them that will produce encouraging results.

That which first and chiefly impresses me in this convention is the deep moral earnestness of those in attendance. Beyond any meeting of this kind that I have attended those present seem to be in earnest as to the Master's business. There is no foolishness in speech or conduct. This is not a mere social gathering. Those who are in Minneapolis from a distance are not in the city merely to see the sights. Their presence is a spiritual tonic. The pulpits of the churches were generally at the service of our preachers yesterday and from the announcements in Saturday's papers the preachers delivered real messages to the people—messages of real present day importance. This spirit of earnestness is more especially characteristic of the meetings of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. There is no noise. There is nothing that so much as suggests, even, excitement. There are no extravagances of speech or of conduct. Everything is done in perfect order, and with a quiet dignity worthy of highest commendation.

The Disciples are growing—growing in character, growing in conscious fellowship with the divine, growing in an appreciation of the scope, significance, and value of their plea, growing in the spirit of their Divine Lord, growing in everything that makes them meet for the Master's use. They are growing out of the spirit of boasting which in the past, it must be confessed, was, to a degree, one of their unfortunate characteristics. They do not seem to be so self-reliant and self-confident as in the past. Their sense of reliance is more and more on him who possesses all authority in heaven and on earth. There never has been a convention of Disciples embracing such a variety of enterprises. There is the regular business of the societies and boards with which we have been familiar for years; but besides these are the educational work and the real benevolences of the congregations, the care of the widows and orphans and the aged. For the first time also our Negro brethren—please print the word Negro with a capital N—are here planning for the salvation, in the largest sense, of their own people who know not God.

The business of education and evangelization is conducted year after year in a more orderly way. Business is coming into our Christianity. This improvement is especially in evidence this year. The business moves on as if in the hands of veterans. And why should not the Lord's work be carried on in harmony with the approved canons of business? At the time of this annual convocation of the Disciples of Christ the Episcopalians are in session in San Francisco and the Congregationalists in Hartford. The keynote of the Episcopal convention is missions. The Congregationalists a few evenings since raised $102,000 to free their mission board from debt. One man gave $25,000. Episcopalians and Congregationalists are supposed to be persons, generally, of superior culture, dignity, and order; but it is safe to say that the Disciples are conducting their business with quite as much dignity and order as do the Episcopalians and Congregationalists.

Let us hold the standard high. The enterprise in which we are engaged is the most majestic on earth. Heaven is interested in it. The angels are in partnership with us. The benediction of the Most High is on us. The head of the body, Jesus Christ our Lord, is with us. The Spirit of the Living God is present to inspire and guide us. The prize for which we strive is the conquest of the world. Do not these things thrill you? This is enough for the present. This is a great convention. I will speak of it again.

To love a thing divinely is to be ready to yield it without a pang, when God wills it.

New York Letter.

By S. T. Willis.

One of the most serious responsibilities resting upon the executors of the law, is their sworn obligation to legally protect the innocent and helpless against the criminal and vicious classes. Perhaps the best work done by the "Committee of Fifteen," in this city, is that of clearing many tenement houses of prostitution. Up to the present they have collected conclusive evidence against 244 separate apartments in 206 different houses, and the tenants of 173 of the apartments have been evicted as transgressors of the law. In 128 of these infected tenement houses, on the east side of the city, they found 2,027 families and 2,681 children. In these same apartments the monthly rental averaged $12.65, and in another group of 20 houses with 376 families and 578 children, the average rental was $9.50 per month. The facts indicate that people in the tenements referred to are poor and are comparatively helpless. Their children are exposed to this pernicious and blasting social evil without redress or protection unless the strong arm of the law be made their defense. If this scurrilous class of lustful, leperous human beasts should flaunt themselves in the wealthy tenements of the west side the whole city would soon ring with denunciation, and justly so. Then is it not a stinging shame that the helpless and hopeless poor and their little children are exposed to and contaminated by this blasting curse of our modern cities?

The Woman's Anti-Vice Committee of New York, which is wrestling with many of the great evils of our metropolis, has just held meetings to discuss the reports of several sub-committees on such questions as municipal affairs, social purity, the labor problem and anarchy. A plan warmly advocated by Mrs. Sarah J. Bird, an experienced friendly worker in the congested districts, was the opening of the public school houses in the evenings for the benefit of the poor living in the crowded quarters. She says profitable and pleasant evenings can be provided for the people, and thus an excellent inspirational and educational work can be done. The committee decided to bring the matter before the school authorities and ask them to designate certain school houses to be so used.

The richest Methodist church in New York city, the Madison Avenue congregation, has extended a call to the Rev. Dr. Wallace McMullen, of Philadelphia, to become their pastor with the beginning of the next annual conference. The call is made subject to the approval of the bishops presiding over the next annual conferences of New York and Philadelphia, but it is a foregone conclusion that the bishops will give their consent in this case, for there are many possible gifts of great magnitude involved with the desires of a congregation like the Madison Avenue M. E. church. A few of the members of that church have given, within the last three or four years, several hundred thousand dollars to Drew Theological Seminary, and have also helped materially the Syracuse University, over which a former pastor, Dr. Day, presides. Dr. McMullen has held important charges in Boston and Philadelphia. He will be a considerable addition to the Methodist ranks of the empire city.

Here is a case of a long pastorate paying in the material sense, at least: The Rev. Dr. Howard Duffield, of the First Presbyterian church, has just received the annual interest of a certain "Manse Fund" which was bequeathed many years ago in perpetuity to the First and the Brick Presbyterian churches. The interest of this fund is to be paid to whichever pastor of these churches has been longest in the city at the time the annual dividend is declared. After having been transferred several times Dr. Henry Van Dyke's turn came and he drew this annuity several years; but when he became professor of literature at Princeton, Dr. Duffield, of the First church, became the legatee, and now he will be entitled to it as long as he remains pastor of that church. Here, brethren, is a solution of the problem: How to maintain long pastorates in our churches.

Dr. R. Heber Newton, of All Souls' Protestant Episcopal church, preached a sermon in this city recently, in which he said socialism and anarchism have the same aim—that of regenerating human society. They labor to bring in an era of communal ownership, but one seeks it by means of evolution and the other by means of revolution; one by a natural development of the present system, the other would break down the existing order and make a fresh start in civilization; one would multiply the functions of government, the other minimize the functions of government; one believes in law, the other does not; one looks to state ownership of the sources of wealth and means of production and exchange, the other to freely formed groups of working people becoming the owners.

Anarchism is the ideal of political and social science, and also the ideal of religion. It is the ideal to which Jesus Christ looked forward. Christ founded no church, established no state, gave practically no laws, organized no government, and set up no external authority; but he did seek to write on the hearts of men God's law and make them self-legislating. But on the other hand there is a revolutionary anarchism which seeks to establish a social and political terrorism, as a means of frightening society into a state of concession, and to paralyze law in order that lawlessness may reign. He says the only remedy for this is in restricting emigration, and in educating our foreign born population into a higher appreciation of the splendid privileges of our republic, and the education also of our plain people to understand the true philosophy of history.

One of the most remarkable instances of Christian liberality this country affords is that of the Christian Missionary Alliance led by Dr. A. B. Simpson of this city. Last year when he made an appeal for the relief of the famine sufferers in India $40,000 was the response. On Lord's day, Oct. 13, he made an impassioned appeal for the cause of foreign missions and those present gave and pledged $57,520. Most, if not all, in the congregation are poor people. Many who from their appearance one would judge to be poor day laborers, pledged from $200 to $400 each. Mrs. Sophia Lichtenfelds, known as "Sophia, the scrub woman," gave Dr. Simpson a $20 bill as her mite toward the offering. If all Christian people would give to the Lord's work in like proportion, we could soon convert the world to Christ our King.

The Old Book In The New Crucible

By J. J. HALEY.

VII. The Crucible of Criticism.

It may be said, and the objection has often been made, that the acceptance of the modern view of the Old Testament involves an insuperable difficulty in the way of honest men. If it be a fact that literary activity in Israel did not begin till the time of the monarchy and that no part of the Pentateuch was committed to writing till after the reign of Saul, then the representation of Mosaic authorship that the books themselves contain is a transparent fraud. If Deuteronomy was written six hundred years after Moses, and Leviticus was put together during the exile, the ascription of these books to the great lawgiver is revelation by imposition. I do not here assume that the critical view of these books in its entirety will have to be accepted, but if it should be forced upon us, the difficulty is not nearly so serious as at first sight appears. The first and most important thing to remember is that the ethics and methods of literary composition were not the same among the ancients as they are with us. The author of a Hebrew history or prophecy did not fuse his material by forging it through his own brain, giving due credit to his sources, and labeling it with his own name, as a modern writer would do. He took everything in sight in line with his purpose, and worked it in without change or acknowledgment, or intimation of its foreign character. He did not throw up his quotation marks, for there were none to throw up, he did not recognize the obligation of acknowledging his sources, for the rights of individual authorship, like criticism itself, is a modern quantity. Plagiarism is old as a practice, but new as a sin. Literary appropriation without acknowledgment was good morals among the ancient Hebrews. The impersonation of great men of the past, to give force and distinction to a message, was a characteristic of both Greek and Hebrew literature. Koheleth impersonates Solomon in the book of Ecclesiastes and writes of human life from the standpoint of the wise man's experience and observation. The author of the Song of Songs did the same. No truth or lesson of this literature is affected by these considerations. If it should turn out that a prophet of the seventh century, burning with enthusiasm for the spiritual worship of Jehovah, on the basis of an element of genuine Mosaic legislation, impersonated Israel's great leader in the construction of Deuteronomy and the Deuteronomic law, I for one would accept this readjustment as satisfactory before I would reject the book as an inspired production. If inspired men in Babylon readjusted and codified the institutions and laws of Leviticus, to suit them to the new conditions of the restored nation in Palestine, a plain dictate of common sense to all appearances, I do not see that this would affect the integrity of the book, or invalidate the claim of Leviticism to a Mosaic origin. The fraud theory will not hold in any event.

In ancient Israel and among other oriental nations vast and intricate bodies of laws and legends, traditions, annals and songs were transmitted from generation to generation verbally, through the memory of a long succession of priests and prophets, before they came to record or found literary expression and codification in documentary forms. This explains the fact that the institutions, traditions and laws of Israel were much older than the written form of them that has come down to us in the Old Testament.

No theory of evolution or inspiration can put God out of the Bible, or efface his footprints from the history of his chosen people. The inspiration of the literature of revelation must be discriminated from the fundamental element of spiritual truth that constitutes the revelation itself. These are the great ideas of the Bible that possess the intrinsic power absolutely upon their own merits to take care of themselves, without reference to gratuitous assumptions of the inerrancy of the literature in which they are found embedded. These great self-evincing ideas of revelation are: the unity and personality of God, his holiness and justice, his wisdom and love, his redemptive relation to man, the gradually unfolding and slowly culminating Messianic hope, supernatural prophecy touching the Messiah and the Messianic kingdom, the historic Christ, Messianic King, the incarnation of God in Christ and the reign of God in man in a redeemed society on earth, consummated and crowned by eternal life in heaven. These ideas may be weakened for a time in the minds of men by extravagant claims and false theories and by confounding things that differ, but legitimate criticism in the interest of the truth of history, and the true order and sequence of religious development, can not in the long run prove otherwise than beneficial to the high claims of revealed religion.

But little space is left for the New Testament in the crucible of criticism, and but little is needed. Critical inquiry has failed to shake the old position in any essential particular, and it is more securely entrenched to-day than it has ever been before. The critics themselves, even the German critics, have largely given up the fight and are coming back one by one substantially to traditional ground. It will be remembered that the Tübingen interpretation of the gospel put the documents of which it is composed much later than the common tradition, it made everything turn on a great cleavage represented by the names of Peter and Paul, and it eliminated with a ruthless pen every word of Jesus which was not characteristic, and ascribed it to a later hand, and its insertion to some party purpose. That was the Tübingen method, so ably followed by Baur. But times change and there are fashions in criticism. To-day the best equipped theologians of Germany, learned and truth seeking as Tübingen itself, are harking back to the old conclusions. New Testament higher criticism is in process of reaction, the Encyclopedia Biblica to the contrary notwithstanding. Two great leaders point the way: Adolf Harnack and the Heidelberg professor, Wendt. Har-

Our Budget.

—We give much space to the Minneapolis convention.

—It is one thing to see and hear a convention, and a very different thing to give the reader who was not there a bird's-eye view of it.

—A convention has an atmosphere, a spirit, which cannot be conveyed through the medium of cold type, but we trust our readers may be enabled to catch some idea of what the Minneapolis convention was in our report of it this week.

—The day when our national conventions could meet in a church is forever in the past. No city asks for the convention now, that does not afford a large hall adapted for such purpose. We gather now in our annual assemblies not by hundreds but by thousands.

—Brothers C. J. Tannar and A. D. Harmon, pastors respectively of the churches at Minneapolis and St. Paul, proved themselves admirable hosts of that type who work effectively and systematically without noise or ostentation. Many sympathized with Bro. Tannar in the illness of his wife, which prevented her from enjoying the convention and gave him additional care and anxiety.

—The Kentucky University Bulletin has been reduced to a neat magazine form and will henceforth be issued as an attractive quarterly, to encourage and inform the old friends of the University and to make new ones. The first number in the new form was Inauguration Number, containing the inaugural sermon by E. L. Powell, the address on behalf of the curators by Judge Hazelrigg, the address by President Thwing and the inaugural address by President Burris A. Jenkins.

—J. H. Stark, corresponding secretary of Wisconsin, calls attention to the fact that the first Lord's day in November is the time for the offering for state missions. He mentions Racine as one of the many doors of opportunity just opening in that state and urges the brethren to push state missions to the front. Wisconsin was well represented at the Minneapolis convention and that fact should tell on the growth of missions in that state. D. N. Wetzel, former corresponding secretary in the state, is to represent the Christian Publishing Co., as its special agent in Illinois. He was at the convention.

—Martin Greve, who for thirteen years has been an employe of the Christian Publishing Company in our Book Department, died at his home in this city on Monday morning, the 21st. Mr. Greve was a young man of an exceptionally fine character, a faithful and trusted employe, and upright and honorable in all his dealings. He was confined to his home only about ten days with typhoid fever which terminated fatally on the date mentioned above. All who are connected with the Christian Publishing Company join with us in our expression of deepest sympathy for the surviving members of his family, as well as of our own great loss in his untimely departure.

—Bro. S. U. Kawai, of Japan, who is the first fruits of the Christian missions in the Island Empire, is on a visit to this country in the interests of a Christian daily paper to be published at Tokyo under the auspices of the Christian people of Japan. Bro. Kawai has letters of recommendation from leading missionaries of all religious bodies and will be glad to visit any of our churches who may invite him. He spoke in our church at Hannibal last Lord's day and Bro. Marshall says he thoroughly interested and delighted his audience. Those who desire to correspond with him may address him in care of this office.

—Bro. Greenwell preached his farewell sermon at Long Beach, Cal., on the 15th inst., and left for San Francisco, where he expects to study medicine.

—E. F. Maham closed the second year of his pastorate at Shelbyville, Ind., Oct. 13 and received a call to remain indefinitely as pastor. Their $20,000 stone building is nearing completion.

—R. W. Woodside, state evangelist of Kansas, would like to secure the service of a singer; steady employment. He is now in a meeting at Halstead. Churches desiring meetings may write him at Augusta, Kan.

—The new church at Mulberry Grove, Ill., was dedicated Oct. 13 by L. L. Carpenter. All debts were provided for and a surplus left in the treasury. The house is a good one and the congregation rejoices in its completion.

—A promising young church in Oklahoma with a good building and out of debt is looking for an energetic young man as pastor. C. E. Millard, singing evangelist, can put the right sort of man in correspondence with the church. Address him at Maysville, Mo., De Kalb county.

—The plans having all been completed on paper for the World's Fair buildings, the work of clearing the ground has now begun and the gigantic enterprise of erecting a forest city will henceforth be pushed forward with unremitting vigor. St. Louis expects to be ready with her Fair May 1, 1903.

—The influx of new subscribers under our special offer is an agreeable indication of the growing favor in which the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is held by the brotherhood, and the prophecy, we trust, of that rapid extension of circulation which we are anticipating and providing for during the coming year.

—As to the "Editor's Easy Chair," in the language of the street urchin, "there ain't no 'Editor's Easy Chair' this week." The editor has not had time to occupy such a chair of late, and besides the space was needed to report the Minneapolis convention, which was altogether too "strenuous" to be reported in an Easy Chair.

—J. N. Jessup has issued an annual statement of the First Christian church at Little Rock, in which he urges that the church be more evangelistic during the coming year. It would be a good motto for all our churches. The church there now numbers 322 and reports two mission schools, Junior and Senior Endeavor and a woman's boarding home.

—J. P. Pinkerton who, as we recently announced, resigned the pastorate at Jefferson City, Mo., to accept that of the Forest Avenue church, Kansas City, has removed to 1324 Harrison Street, Kansas City, and requests preachers who wish to enter into correspondence regarding Jefferson Street church not to address him but to write to W. T. Carrington at Jefferson City, who is chairman of the official board. The board has under consideration the matter of choosing a successor to Bro. Pinkerton.

—Bro. J. B. Graves, of Jacksonville, Ill., who has for a number of years been pastor in some of the prominent churches of the state, has accepted the position of state representative of our National Benevolent Association for the state of Indiana. Bro. Graves is a cousin of Z. T. Sweeney, of Columbus, Ind. He is a man of unblemished character and of fine ability, and will most creditably represent the interests of the Benevolent Association in all those churches to which he is invited. It is beginning to dawn upon our brotherhood that we have greatly neglected this gospel of the Helping Hand, and it is hoped that the Indiana brethren will readily and enthusiastically co-operate with Bro. Graves in enlisting the churches of that state in this helpful, testimony-bearing ministry.

—Olin J. Gary is pastor of the newly organized Christian church at Highview, Mo.

—The C. W. B. M. watchword for 1902 is "Information, Inspiration, Realization, 15,000 Tidings, 50,000 members, $150,000."

—J. Walter Wilson, who led the song service at the evening sessions of the Minneapolis convention, goes to Lexington, Ky., to begin a meeting with I. J. Spencer, Oct. 20.

—A. L. Furguson has been called to remain for a fourth year with the church at Augusta, Ill., at an increase of salary. A special revival meeting will be begun Oct. 23.

—W. T. Adams, who has been pastor at Chanute, Kan., for two years and three months, goes to McPherson, Kan. During his pastorate at Chanute there have been 190 additions to the church.

—C. S. Medbury, pastor of the church at Angola, Ind., brought twenty-one members of his congregation to Minneapolis. This was good for the convention—and also for the Angola church.

—O. D. Maple was at Ligonier a few days before the Minneapolis convention, doing some preliminary work preparatory to a meeting which he will hold there in November and December. He reports that his members at Cameron gave him a surprise party on Oct. 1.

—W. H. Bagby has resigned the work at Salt Lake City after four years of arduous and effective labor and will be open to engagements for pastoral work after Jan. 1. He prefers work with a self-supporting city church.

—T. F. Richardson is the first resident minister that the Christian church at Henning, Ill., has ever had and the work has been prospering since he began Aug. 1. He preached the McKinley memorial sermon at the first union service ever held in the town.

—D. W. Moore, of Springfield, Mo., observed a special day for students on Oct. 6 at the South Street church, and preached a special sermon to students. Springfield is an important educational center and Brother Moore's appeal to the students, backed up, as it is sure to be, by continuous work among them, will not be without its effect.

—In the article by Clayton Keith on "The Grave of Barton W. Stone," in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of Oct. 10, it was stated that Mrs. Bowen had given a description of the phenomenon called the "jerks" which occurred at the Cane Ridge camp-meeting in 1803. Brother Keith calls our attention to the fact that the correct date, as he wrote it, is 1833. There was a great revival at Cane Ridge in 1803 and there were "jerks" at that time, but the occasion referred to was the meeting held in 1833, the year of the great meteoric display.

Itching Skin

Distress by day and night—

That's the complaint of those who are so unfortunate as to be afflicted with Eczema or Salt Rheum—and outward applications do not cure. They can't.

The source of the trouble is in the blood—make that pure and this scaling, burning, itching skin disease will disappear.

"I was taken with an itching on my arms which proved very disagreeable. I concluded it was salt rheum and bought a bottle of Hood's Sarsaparilla. In two days after I began taking it I felt better and it was not long before I was cured. Have never had any skin disease since." Mrs. IDA E. WARD, Cove Point, Md.

Hood's Sarsaparilla and Pills

rid the blood of all impurities and cure all eruptions.

—J. G. M. Luttenberger closed a meeting at Erie, Ill., with fifteen additions in time to attend the Minneapolis convention. He goes from Minneapolis to Litchfield, Minn., for a meeting with W. H. Knotts and will fill other appointments in the state before returning to Illinois.

—The quarterly rally of the Christian Endeavor Societies of the Christian churches of St. Louis and vicinity will be held at the Compton Heights church Oct. 28. The principal address will be delivered by John L. Brandt, pastor of the First church, St. Louis, and the song service will be directed by W. Daviess Pitman.

—Christian University at Canton, Mo., opened with about seventy students. A unique feature is the C. U. L. L., which means Christian University Loyal Legion, an organization of the students to promote the interests of the institution in all possible ways. The students of Christian University have immense faith in their University and show their faith by their works.

—Many successful union evangelistic services have been held this year as parts of the great twentieth century revival. Rev. E. S. Stucker, formerly pastor of the First Baptist church of South Bend, Ind., has resigned his pastorate and will give his time to such work. J. Wilbur Chapman commends him as a thoroughly trustworthy and phenomenally successful evangelist. His present address is La Grange, Ill.

—And now comes the irrepressible Hackleman anent the question of old hymns and enclosing a list of some of the songs sung at Mexico. He believes our criticism to be just, but thinks the illustration is at fault. "I like your sermon," he says, "but the text is not well chosen." Very well; let it go at that. It is the sermon we are interested in, and every man may select his own text for it. We are hearing from others who approve the sermon. Let us stick to the old hymns as well as to the old gospel.

—C. C. Redgrave has dates for his lecture, "In the Footsteps of the Pioneers," at Chicago, Ill., and at Hiram, Columbus, Dayton, Lima, Youngstown and Cincinnati, O. At the general convention he had on exhibition many photographs of historic spots, as well as facsimiles of the hand-bills announcing Alexander Campbell's lectures in Scotland and the famous, or infamous, hand-bill, "Citizens of Edinburgh beware!" which was put forth by his enemies warning the people against him as an advocate of slavery and a dangerous man.

—J. B. Lehman of the Industrial Institute at Edwards, Miss., was at Minneapolis and reported his school in prosperous condition. The institute has a farm of 800 acres, a job printing office and various shops in which the students not only earn their way through school, but acquire the industrial training which is the greatest need of the southern negroes. It is a work deserving of cordial support. The school at Edwards has not yet grown to the proportions of Booker T. Washington's school at Tuskegee, Ala., but it is based upon substantially the same principles.

—W. C. Weeden's lecture on "Hawaii, the Paradise of the Pacific," is highly spoken of. It has been given at some of our largest churches and was delivered on the last night of the Minneapolis convention. He goes to Cleveland, O., and later to Lexington, Ky. He expects to be back in Hawaii by Dec. 15, and will lecture on his way to the coast prior to sailing. It is thirty six years since Bro. Weeden went to Hawaii and he has spent most of that period in those islands. He can tell, if you ask him, some thrilling stories of experiences with the plague a couple of years ago. His position in the army as quartermaster-sergeant gave him an active part in the sanitary and relief work at that time.

—Bro. George C. Ritchey, who recently left Keota, Ia., and became pastor of the church at Salem, Ore., was given a public reception by the church on the evening of Oct. 9. There were numerous addresses representing the different interests of the church and community, but perhaps the best welcome of all came from the Junior Endeavor society in the following verses, which show that Oregon not only has some of the right sort of Juniors but can produce a brand of poetry of which even the literary East would not need to be ashamed:

Here's a greeting and a welcome,
From our little Junior band!
We have been waiting for you;
We are glad that you are here;
And every child among us
Is reaching you a hand—
And each one wants to help you,
In the hard work of the year.

We know we can't do great things,
But we'll do the best we can!
The angels can't do more than that
The love of God to win!
So, in everything you do,
And in all that you may plan,
We'll take it very kindly,
If you count the Juniors in.

We want you to be happy
In your home among us here;
And all good blessings on you,
We pray the Lord to send;
We want to look upon you
As our friends so true and dear;
And will you please remember,
Each Junior is your friend.

—George T. Halbert, secretary of the Minneapolis committee, 502 Guaranty Building, Minneapolis, Minn., says in a note to us that in view of the fact that the Minneapolis daily papers have reported our convention there far better than has been previously done, it would be well that those who were not able to attend and who are interested in knowing all about the wonderful meetings and the incidents of the occasion should send 20 cents to him as above and receive a copy of one of our Minneapolis dailies for ten days covering the convention period. He further suggests that as the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has been very generous with its space in writing up the convention, the Minneapolis committee would be much pleased if all our new subscribers would order their subscriptions to commence with September, 1901. Both suggestions are good, and we hope that many who were not privileged to attend the convention will secure copies of the Minneapolis dailies for the period mentioned. The cartoons of some of the leading brethren which these papers contain are alone worth the price mentioned above as a source of amusement.

—During this year there has been a general evangelistic campaign in the several denominations, and indeed with but little reference to denominations, urged and directed by the National Central Committee of the Twentieth Century National Gospel Campaign. The chairman of this committee, William Phillips Hall, sends out a circular calling attention to the need of prayer for God's blessing upon this campaign in its continuance during the coming winter, and suggests that the week beginning with Sunday, Nov. 10, be chosen as a week of prayer for this purpose. This is already the week of prayer for young men and for the Y. M. C. A., and the joint observance seems both practicable and desirable. The following topics are suggested for the days of this week: Sunday morning, The Responsibility of the Church for the Salvation of the Lost; evening, The Twentieth Century Gospel Campaign; Monday, Humiliation and Prayer for Self-Examination and Intercession for the Church; Tuesday, a Plea for the Restoration of the Home Altar and Religious Conversation in the Home; Wednesday, How to win Sunday-school Scholars and Young People to Christ; Thursday, The Christian's Personal Responsibility to win his Friends and Neighbors to Christ; How may Business and Social Influence be

How To Find Out.

Fill a bottle or common glass with your water and let it stand twenty-four hours; a sediment or settling indicates an unhealthy condition of the kidneys; if it stains the linen it is evidence of kidney trouble; too frequent desire to pass it, or pain in the back is also convincing proof that the kidneys and bladder are out of order.

What To Do.

There is comfort in the knowledge so often expressed that Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney and bladder remedy, fulfills every wish in curing rheumatism, pain in the back, kidneys, liver, bladder and every part of the urinary passage. It corrects inability to hold water and scalding pain in passing it, or bad effects following use of liquor, wine or beer, and overcomes that unpleasant necessity of being compelled to go often during the day, and to get up many times during the night. The mild and extraordinary effect of Swamp-Root is soon realized. It stands the highest for its wonderful cures of the most distressing cases. If you need a medicine you should have the best. Sold by druggists in fifty-cent and one-dollar sizes.

You may have a sample bottle of Swamp-Root and a book that tells more about it, both sent absolutely free by mail. Address Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y. When writing mention that you read this generous offer in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

used for Christ? Friday, How to win those who have no interest in Religion and no Sympathy with the Church. In this same call there are some notes which are gratifying and hopeful, especially the emphasis upon Christ as the central fact, and upon loyalty to the Scriptures. "An authoritative gospel preached on the authority of the word of God cannot fail to reach men with the saving grace of our Lord Jesus Christ; and that is the only kind of preaching that will effectually evangelize mankind."

—"Under the Map of Africa" was a favorite meeting place for committees and state delegations at the convention. The hall was adorned with many maps of our home and foreign fields. Most of them were the work of W. H. Waggoner, who will be glad to make some for your church at reasonable rates. There is no more appropriate, interesting and useful decoration for a church or Sunday-school room.

—Referring to the appeal for aid for the church at Jacksonville, T. A. Gunnell of Ogden, Utah, suggests that the matter should not be left for individual action but should be brought before the churches by the pastors or officers. Such an appeal made directly to the congregation would be more forcible than a general appeal to the papers which does not demand immediate action and can be forgotten when the paper is laid down.

—The following special telegram has been received:

The Chicago Christian Ministers' Association endorses with enthusiasm the Minneapolis movement toward the establishment of a general evangelistic board among our people.

THAD. S. LINSLEY, Sec.

Chicago, Oct. 21.

This refers to the action of the meeting of the pastors' and evangelists' section of the convention at Minneapolis, which unanimously adopted a report of a committee recommending the appointment of a general evangelistic board to have the general superintendence of evangelism among us. Since evangelistic work has been and must continue to be a prominent and characteristic feature of our movement, such a step would seem to be wise, looking to more systematic efforts in that direction and to the correction of some abuses which have served to retard such work. We are sure we voice the sentiment of our St. Louis ministers in saying that St. Louis endorses Chicago's endorsement of the move.

The Pious Unimmersed.

The recent consideration of the above question by Bro. Garrison was timely and also commendable in spirit. The word charity means much, but there are some attitudes of mind now urged, which are not taught by the oft-used word. This truth should be discovered, recognized and acted upon.

Man as a thinker is necessarily restricted to the limit of his thought. If he thinks the earth is round he cannot out of charity to others admit that it is flat. If one by coming into contact with a material object discovers through sensation that the object is hard, he cannot be charitable enough to consider it soft.

Now as knowledge is given to us through sensation so faith is given to us through testimony; the physical or material object being brought into immediate contact with one or more of the five senses produces knowledge: truths or facts being brought into immediate contact with the mind by testimony produce faith.

As one who by sensation learns that a certain material object is hard, cannot know it to be soft, so one who by testimony receives the truth, that the Bible only is the Christian's rule of faith and life, cannot possibly have sufficient charity to believe anything different from this. In matters religious, one not only should not, but positively cannot, conscientiously have a mind broader than one's creed.

When one accepts Jesus as the Christ, the Son of God, one accepts his authority as supreme in both heaven and earth. Jesus taught immersion as a condition of salvation. Before his ascension he promised the apostles the Holy Spirit, saying: "He shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you: He will guide you into all the truth" (John 14:26; 16:13). He also said to the apostles: "Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have said unto you" (Matt. 28:20). On the first Christian Pentecost the Spirit brought immersion, as a condition of salvation previously taught by the Lord, to the mind of the apostle Peter, for he commanded the inquiring believers to be immersed "in the name of Jesus Christ" or by the authority of Jesus Christ. The announcement made by Peter was the announcement of the organic, constitutive law of the kingdom of Christ on earth. Those who complied with the conditions of that law were through it constituted members of the newly-founded kingdom. The number of such persons was about three thousand, and the Lord continued to add such persons to the church. He did not add those who did not receive the word and submit to the ordinance of Christian immersion.

Now if we believe this constitutive law yet to be in force, we cannot be charitable enough to think baptism—the immersion of a penitent believer into the name of the Godhead by the authority of Christ—so unimportant as to be unnecessary to membership in the kingdom of Christ. One cannot be broader minded than one's creed; if one desire to be broader minded than one's present creed the thing to do is to change the creed. If "The Bible and the Bible only is our rule of faith and practice," as taught by the Reformers, be the true creed, then consistency and necessity both say, Receive none but immersed penitent believers into the church. If such be an erroneous plea, then the possibility of the reception of the pious unimmersed into the church may be granted.

As Bro. Garrison says, and well says, "We have had nothing to do with making this foundation. Our mistake, if it be a mistake, is either in our understanding of what that basis is, or in supposing that the foundation laid by Christ and his apostles is a foundation, not for the first century alone but for all succeeding centuries."

Paul, the noble apostle to the Gentiles, certainly was not uncharitable. Yet, because the pious Jews did not understand it to be their duty to submit to the immersion of Christ, he did not remove immersion as a condition of entrance into the kingdom of Christ. Instead, he wrote of these pious unimmersed: "Brethren, my heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is, that they might be saved. For I bear them record that they have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge. For being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness, they have not submitted themselves unto the righteousness of God" (Rom. 10:1-3).

[A clear-cut statement of a clear-cut truth. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST believes in love as well as in loyalty and liberty; but love toward the sinner, not the sin; love toward the man who is in error, not toward the error that the man is in. Consequently we do not believe that any amount of love toward the unimmersed can justify the approval of any substitute for immersion. As a minor point in connection with the above, we suggest that Christ's creed and our creed is not "The Bible and the Bible alone is our rule of faith and practice." We would be unwilling to apply the term "creed" to anything except a confession of faith in Christ as the Son of God.—EDITOR.]

T. E. WINTER.

Texas Letter.

The first Sunday of October was our eleventh anniversary as pastor of the Central church of this city. The News speaking of it says: "Yesterday was the eleventh anniversary of the pastorate of Rev. M. M. Davis of the Central Christian church, and it was a great day in the congregation. At 11 o'clock the beautiful and spacious auditorium, decorated for the occasion, was crowded. Mr. Davis preached a five minute object sermon to the children, which the old people enjoyed as much as the young. His subject was 'Baby Christians,' and he used a cradle as the object lesson. The text for the anniversary sermon was Acts 28:15, 'He thanked God and took courage.' Among other things, Mr. Davis said: 'Eleven years ago this morning our work as pastor and people began. It does not seem long, and but for the records not one of us would believe it. We met first in a little frame building on Commerce Street, not quite so large as our chapel, and some of us will never forget that meeting. We were strangers then. You were wondering whether the new preacher would prove himself the man for your pulpit and he was wondering whether the new people would be as near and dear to him as those he had learned to love at Sedalia, Mo. But all were earnest and desiring only good, and God soon fused our hearts together and bound us in ties of love, tender and strong, and led us at once into a great work.

"But how time flies! Eleven years! Who can realize it? A third of an average life, and just a third of the life of the Savior on earth. These years and months and weeks and days, like a solemn procession, move steadily on. Other processions weary and wait, but this one never stops. Day and night, summer and winter, in shine and in shade, it moves right on. Men may be born and die, earthquakes and tornadoes in fiend like fury may visit the abodes of men, great battles may be fought, and kings and presidents may be martyred, but the procession moves right on. It passes over rough and smooth roads alike; it scales the highest mountains as if they were plains, and the great rivers and broad oceans are crossed without bridge or boat. And on the bosom of this restless procession we have been borne through these years to this holy day and hour. May the Lord bless us in the service to which it brings us."

"Next came a review of all the departments of the church, which showed prosperity everywhere. The pastor has preached 141 sermons, with 165 additions. The finances for all purposes, $10,404 74, more than $10 for each member. The grand summary for eleven years is, 1,506 sermons, 2,029 additions and $142,351 83."

On October 3, in Colorado, Texas, E. E. Faris, our Livingstone to Africa, and Miss Bessie Lee Homan were married by the writer. The groom, because of his heroism for Christ, is well known to the brethren, and this is to introduce the bride. She is the daughter of W. K. Homan, the able editor, preacher, lawyer and temperance lecturer. She worked with us the Central church here for almost ten years, and I know her to be one of the loveliest and most consecrated and useful girls I ever saw. May heaven always bless them.

C. A. Drew, of Van Alstyne, is now in Dallas prosecuting his medical education. He will preach as opportunities open.

Granville Jones has become a terror to the whiskey power. The world has few such men in that work, and if you need such a man send for Jones. Address him at Austin.

The Y. M. C. A. secretaries in their annual conference did the writer the honor of asking him to make them three addresses. One of these, an old-fashioned sermon, such as used to be preached by all our preachers and none others, from the text, "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needest not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth," was received with marked favor by these young men, and it was not set for the popular breeze, but was presented as the fathers used to put it. And I mention the matter for the purpose of saying that the truth in love, the whole truth, is what the world needs and wants to day. Preach it just as the Campbells and their co-laborers preached it, and the same results will follow.

Our Texas lectureship meets at Waco, Nov. 25-28, with H. L. Willett as "chief lecturer." The program is a good one.

A Scientific Breakfast.

Rightly selected food will cure more than half the diseases. Try a scientific and healthy breakfast:—Fruit of some kind, preferably cooked; a dish of Grape-Nuts, with cream; two soft-boiled eggs. Put two eggs in a tin pint cup of boiling water, cover and set off for nine minutes. Whites will then be the consistency of cream and most easily digested. One slice of bread with butter; cup of Postum Cereal Food Coffee.

On that breakfast you can work like a horse and be perfectly nourished until noon. Your nervous troubles, heart palpitation, stomach and bowel troubles, kidney complaints and various other disorders will gradually disappear and firm solid health will set in.

Why? You have probably been living on poorly selected food, that is, food that does not contain the required elements the body needs. That sort of food, and coffee, is the direct or indirect cause of more than half the ills the human body acquires.

Grape-Nuts is a perfectly cooked food and both that and the Postum Food Coffee contain fine microscopic particles of phosphate of potash obtained in a natural way from the grains of the field and by scientific food experts incorporated into food and drink. That element joins with the albumen in food to make gray matter, which is the filling of the brain cells and the nerve centers all over the human body.

A man or woman thus fed is scientifically fed and rapidly grows in vigor and vitality, and becomes capable of conducting successfully the affairs of life. To produce a perfect body and a money making brain, the body must have the right kind of food and the expert food specialist knows how to make it. That is Grape-Nuts and Postum Cereal Food Coffee, produced at the pure food factories of the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., at Battle Creek, Mich.

Bro. Rains at Akita, Japan.

You know that we have read and been told that Japan is almost a Christian nation. It is time we were getting that notion out of our heads. Judging from the little I have seen, it will probably require centuries to make this a Christian nation at the rate missionaries are now being sent to this field. Our trip from Tokyo to Akita, a distance of about six hundred miles, gave us an opportunity to see much of the country and the habits of the people. Buddhist and Shinto temples are seen in every town and shrines are seen in fields, in groves, in gardens, in homes, in caves and in mountains. We passed two temples where snakes are worshiped and saw a shrine where the fox-god is worshiped. Other objects of worship are not to be mentioned in public print. Millions of people are low, very low. We saw hundreds naked. Women pull loaded carts like a horse or an ox: they do the lowest and hardest work. Parents put paper or punk under their children's finger nails, toe nails and on other parts of their bodies and burn it slowly to make them obedient. This is common. People eat cats, dogs, grasshoppers, locusts, snakes, snails and burdock root. At one point R. L. Pruett, our missionary at Osaka, saw thousands of poisonous snakes being dried, with which to make medicine. About one-third of the marriages result in divorces. Wealthy men have concubines. It is said that fully thirty millions of people in Japan never heard of Christ.

It required four days to make a trip of six hundred miles and all of this was by rail except sixty-five miles. You cannot "hustle" the east. Every man takes his own sweet time. You remember Kipling:

"The white man riles
And the brown man smiles.
* * * * *
And the end of the fight;
Is a tombstone white,
With the name of the late deceased.
And the epitaph clear,
'A fool lieth here
Who tried to hustle the east.'"

Everything and everybody is slow. At Yokohama it took me thirty-five minutes to pay my hotel bill. An American hotel would have had my money in one minute. A test was made in Tokyo and one American carpenter did as much work in one day as ten Japanese carpenters. The American, however, received as much as the ten Japanese. There are signs, however, that the east can be "hustled." A hotel man came out two miles from a town to meet us and solicit us to stop at his place. I have never seen it so before, no, not even in America.

We finally reached Akita after a trip of many new experiences. It is a beautiful city of about twenty-five or thirty thousand population. New school buildings, new residences and new business houses are being erected. The railroad will soon be completed to this place. It is in sight of the sea of Japan. The governor of the province is a wide-awake, progressive man and encourages education and general progress. E. S. Stevens and family were just returning from their summer vacation and the home was full of native Christians to greet them. Some thirty or forty Christians met in the home in the evening to tender a formal reception. It was a very delightful occasion. The program embraced Scripture reading and prayers, songs and words of welcome, all in Japanese. All sat on the floor during the exercises which lasted about two hours. There are no chairs in Japanese homes. They also brought the missionaries a number of small presents, not very valuable in themselves, but they indicated something of the love they have for those who have shown them the right way of the Lord. The membership is composed of devout, intelligent people. One member of the church is also a member of the provincial assembly or legislature. He is one of the leading men in the church. Another is a prominent officer in the army and received a medal from the Emperor for bravery and valuable services to the government. The membership is about sixty. Dr. Nina Stevens, the wife of E. S. Stevens, practices medicine and commands a wide influence for good. Her practice opens the hearts and homes of the people for the reception of the gospel. She teaches the women and children, conducts Bible classes and helps in the Sunday-school work. Miss Jessie Asbury has just come to the field and is working away learning the language and in the meantime rendering all the help in her power. These are all of the missionaries in this province, two hundred miles long and fifty miles wide, containing nearly 800,000 people. This is more people than in the whole state of Kansas. Think of only three missionaries for that great state and it will give you some idea of the destitution in this province. Master Henry Stevens, four years old, is a valuable assistant. He is the only white child in the whole province. He is a fine, fat, curly-headed fellow and attracts much attention. People run after him by the hundreds to get a good look at him. There is no white child to be his playmate and companion. One of the most trying experiences we have had on this trip was leaving Henry so far away in the very heart of the heathen world. This is the frontier of the world. For a man to bury himself with his family in such a field is no light matter. He is a hero.

I wish many of our churches could have seen the Wednesday night prayer-meeting at Akita. About half of the membership were present. The members took some part in the meeting promptly. No time was lost. No one had to be urged to speak or pray. Their hearts were full of gratitude and praise, and the meeting was full of life and power. One brother spoke feelingly of the sacrifice and devotion of the missionaries. If the foreign society had no other fruits of its labor than the believers in Akita, it has not labored in vain. These devoted souls carved out of the hard rock of heathenism would justify all that has been done. The gospel has been planted in this province never to be uprooted. Its leavening effect can be seen everywhere. If our churches in America could see and know the great work being done in this land, our receipts for foreign missions would be $500,000 instead of less than $200,000.

Preachers Attention!

Thousands come every winter from the eastern and central states to Phoenix to spend the cold months in this delightful climate where the wind never blows and snow is never seen except on the peaks of distant mountains. Among those that come are many who are members of Christian churches and active workers at home, but here among strangers fail to make themselves known, and as we have no way of finding them out they are frequently lost to the cause. If you know of any one who is coming here to spend the winter or to reside permanently, please notify me at 240 N. 3rd Ave., Phoenix, Ariz., giving names and any particulars that may aid us in finding them.

Young Girls

Are often engaged in doing the work of a home under the most trying conditions. Nature cries out against the stooping and lifting, the running up and down stairs at times when labor should be as light as possible. It is owing to overstrain or self-neglect under these conditions that the foundation is laid for serious womanly disease. Irregularity is the first step to impaired womanly health.

Perfect regularity may be established by the use of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It will heal inflammation and ulceration and cure female weakness. It makes weak women strong and sick women well.

"It gives me much pleasure," writes Miss Ella Sapp, of Jamestown, Guilford County, N. C., "to thank Dr. Pierce for the great good received from the use of his 'Favorite Prescription' and 'Golden Medical Discovery.' I had suffered for three years or more at monthly periods. It seemed as though I would die with pains in my back and stomach. I could not stand at all without fainting. Had given up all hope of ever being cured, when one of my friends insisted upon my trying Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. With but little faith I tried it, and before I had taken half a bottle I felt better. Now I have taken two bottles of 'Favorite Prescription,' and one of 'Golden Medical Discovery,' and I am entirely cured, and in two months' time when all other medicines had failed."

The J. Z. Tyler Testimonial.

Since our last publication of amounts received for the anniversary testimonial to Bro. J. Z. Tyler, the following additional sums have been received:

Leslie W. Morgan, Southampton, Eng.	$ 1.00
Christian Endeavorers, Burgin, Ky.	.50
Leonard G. Thompson, Denver, Col.	2.00
Mrs. Leda F. Toof, Quincy, Ill.	1.00
Endeavor Society, Hopkinsville, Ky.	10.25
	$ 14.75
Previously acknowledged.	175.00
Total	$189.75

We cannot doubt but that there are many others who will desire to have fellowship in this loving testimonial to Bro. Tyler, who, because of his devotion to the work of Christian Endeavor and other interests of the kingdom of God, has become disabled from earning a salary. We are only paying a part of the debt we owe him in giving him this testimonial of our love and appreciation. Other sums have been sent by other brethren, to what amount we do not know, but we are sure that the sum total has not yet reached anything like what it ought to be. We trust, therefore, that we shall hear from others whose hearts prompt them to have some partnership in this message of love. We are forwarding the letters received to Bro. Tyler, which he will be glad to preserve as a legacy to his children in their manifestation of Christian love and sympathy in his affliction.

Kansas City Letter.

We were privileged to welcome quite recently a new departure in church dedications—the dedication of a modest chapel upon which rests no burden of debt. The name of this happy church is "The Budd Park Mission." This tabernacle is modest and satisfying, and the congregation worshipping therein are the children of our city mission work. Instead of the suicidal folly of erecting a building far beyond its means the board decided to erect a tabernacle which would be paid for. It might not satisfy pride, but in its beauty and sufficiency of accommodation it meets the needs of the field. It is entirely out of debt. Our evangelist, F. E. Bowen, and his faithful wife were happy, as well they might be, over this fruition of their self-denying labors. The dedicatory sermon was preached by W. F. Richardson, and needless to say was full of inspiration and cheer. The other pastors of the city were present and assisted in the glad service. A story of heroism not now to be told, but richly worth the telling, was wrought out before the gladness of this dedicatory service; enough now simply to chronicle this day of joy. Look out for this new church; it will be heard from.

The Forest Avenue church is happy again. The occasion is the acceptance of the pastorate of that church by J. P. Pinkerton, of Jefferson City. This church has waited long in its endeavor to find a suitable successor to A. W. Kokendoffer. To say that this pastor has been found is to say all that needs to be said of new co-workers. That this genial gentleman from the capital city will not fail us in our high expectations is our sure confidence. May this union be long and happy. Congratulations. God speed.

That was a thoughtful speech of one of the elders of the Prospect Avenue church on the eve of its pastor's departure for our national convention: "Brethren, all of our churches should send their preachers to our great conventions, for the preacher's sake—for the church's sake. Many of our preachers working on small salaries are unable to bear the expense. Now probably our own pastor is not of this class, but we owe it to others to set an example in this respect. I propose to be responsible for the pastor's expense, those sharing with me in this who will." Was it in truth not a good example? Churches, take notice. Few preachers are making more than a meager support; none are rich; all must feel the financial burden of these convention attendances. Help. So slight is the individual sacrifice in this matter, so great the aggregate good. Let all lend a hand. Send your preachers to the convention. Get ready for Omaha, that Omaha whose proud convention promises we are sure will not go further than her large accomplishments.

Our churches are now getting down to work. Good reports come from our various fields. H. L. Willett is expected soon in a series of lectures. Z. T. Sweeney will probably be with the First church in a meeting. Wilson and Huston will be with the Prospect church in April. Our other churches will no doubt have special meetings to forward the work.

This city by the Kaw is far from Puritanical. In its dread of blue laws it is perilously near the acceptance of the "wide open" devil's gospel. It is not the worst city in the world, but it is had enough. Sunday closing is so ineffective as to be a fit subject for a cartoon float in the carnival parade; gambling and gamblers are not too closely looked into; prize fights are brought off with greatest eclat in the presence of an accommodating and complacent official, and yet no indignant and protesting voices are sounding in our ears. Ah, how quickly we tire of our righteous crusades. Only yesterday and we were declaring that the laws should be enforced at every hazard and at cost, if need be, of life. The passion passes, the impulse does not get itself translated into the unwearying resolve, the crusade closes—and then the devil resumes. Some day in grim earnest we shall enlist not for a hattle but for a campaign, not for a day but for all the years. Then will come the victory so sickeningly long delayed.

GEORGE H. COMBS.

A New Preacher.

Some weeks ago, Bro. T. R. Gray, a minister of the M. E. Church South, residing in this city, and laboring on the Chillicothe circuit, introduced himself to me and requested a conference on various matters, saying that though he had only the kindest feelings for his Methodist brethren, there were some things in Methodist doctrine and church polity which were no longer satisfactory to him, and that from what he knew of the Christian Church he thought he ought, possibly, to cast his lot in with us.

After several interviews, in which I gave him my understanding of the scriptures on various subjects, and tried to show him for what we stand as a Christian body—which if accepted involved a radical change in many respects for him—he said that he and his wife (who by the way, I believe to be a worthy helpmate) were ready to act. They have acted; they have both been baptized and are members of the Christian church in this city.

He went with me to our state missionary convention at Mexico, Mo., last month to get acquainted with our preachers and missionary operations. Outside of those he met there he is almost a stranger to our brotherhood. As he desires to continue in the ministry of the word of God and to find work among us as soon as possible, I desire to introduce him as an affable Christian gentleman, in the prime of life, a pleasant speaker, capable of doing a good work for the Lord both in and out of the pulpit.

He comes well recommended from his last presiding elder and others, and has held some important pastorates in the M. E. Church South. His relations with that body have been so intimate and pleasant that it called for both deep convictions of duty and much moral courage to leave those so long known and loved by him and to cast his lot among a people who knew him not, and among whom he might find it difficult to secure a suitable field in which to exercise his talents. Brethren, put him to work. He needs a field and there is a field somewhere needing him.

The officers of the Christian church at Chillicothe testify to their favorable impression of Bro. Gray and his wife, and join in the wish that he be cordially received as a brother in the Lord, and that his labors as a minister among us may be richly blessed to the conversion of sinners and the edification of the brethren.

On Sept. 15 I began work in this district. In it we have 132 churches and nearly 20,000 members. Last year only 35 churches gave about $400 to state and district work. What about the others? The Springfield church alone gave over $100. Do not forget that the first Lord's day in November is Illinois day. Can we not depend upon the strong churches to help in this work so that we can work among the many churches needing help? I would like every church without a preacher to write me, and any individuals living where there is no congregation may write me. I have something to tell them. I am now in a good meeting at Eldora.

WANTED—A Physician. A good opening awaits a well recommended physician in a small Nebraska town. Address for particulars, J. T. L. Care Christian-Evangelist.

WHY?

Why do you, who live in the Mississippi Valley, send to New York, Boston, Philadelphia, or even to Chicago for a desired volume, when you can secure it much more quickly and just as cheap in St. Louis? This is a question that is very difficult to answer. We can supply you with any book that you wish—any respectable book, that is, French novels and blood-and-thunder-seven-buckets-of-gore-to-the-chapter romances are barred—no matter where or by whom published. Our business is by no means confined to the books we ourselves publish. Our catalogue contains only our own publications, in the main, but we can sell you any book you wish to purchase.

A Practicable Union.

It seems that we are not ready yet to consider with the thoroughness that the subject demands the unification of our varied missionary interests. But in the meantime, while we are learning a little more by experience with antiquated methods, is there not at least one unification that can be brought about? I refer to the publication of monthlies, quarterlies, etc., by the several boards. Probably the C. W. B. M. would prefer to continue "The Missionary Tidings," and that is no doubt well. But why may not the little magazines of Church Extension, the A. C. M. S. and the F. C. M. S. be merged into one reputable and respectable monthly magazine?

It would be possible, then, to make a journal which in size, subject matter, typography and all else would be a credit to our grand missionary work, and a genuine help to the pastors and the churches. Each board could have in this magazine its own department and furnish its own copy. A fair subscription rate could be determined on; the advertising privilege could be carefully and skilfully managed, and it could in time be made to produce a small revenue to the treasuries, instead of remaining a continual tax.

Such a magazine should serve every purpose that is now served by the small ones issued. It would not add any expense. It would bring each month a symmetrical view of all the interests represented. It could bear much church news and so relieve our weeklies. It would appeal to advertisers. It would be indeed a missionary "magazine" full of dynamite. Why not unify our publications of the boards mentioned?

FRANK G. TYRRELL.

[This is a matter we have ventured to suggest more than once and we do not doubt it would prove beneficial to all the interests represented.—EDITOR.]

Awake Thou That Sleepest.

An open letter to pastors and Endeavor presidents and corresponding secretaries of Christian churches in Kansas.

DEAR FELLOW WORKERS:—Having been chosen state C. E. superintendent by the Hutchinson convention, I desire to urge upon you if you are sleeping in regard to any of the following points that you awake to their importance and give them your early, earnest and constant attention:

1. Concerning reports: Give heed to the office secretary's call for quarterly reports. Fill out the blanks and return promptly. Fail not to report to State Secretary G. A. Crise, Manhattan, when he calls on you. The former is necessary that we may know where we are, and the latter that we may take our rightful place in relation to the work of the state union.
2. Give our organized state mission work your support by paying your apportionment regularly. There should be not less than four hundred dollars from the C. E. societies of the state this year for this work. Fail not in your part.
3. Organize societies in those congregations contiguous to you which have none. We have 395 congregations and but 187 C. E. societies in Kansas. There ought to be a clear gain of at least one hundred and thirteen so as to have three hundred societies at the end of this missionary year. Let's have a revival of organization. You help.
4. If not already using them take up the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses. "Give attention to reading." Learn something of our pioneers, what we stand for, what we are doing and what the Lord requires of us.
5. Attend the state Endeavor convention. It is a reproach to our cause that so very few of our pastors and workers attend these union conventions. Help remove this cause

FAMILY OF DOLLS FREE

Of course every little girl loves a doll, but how delighted she would be with a whole family of Dolls with which to "play house." Besides the Boy and Girl Dolls here pictured, there is a Grandpa and a Grandma Doll, Grandpa in full military uniform, and Grandma in the dainty costume of the olden time. The large dolls are nearly two feet high, the small ones 15 inches. They have rosy cheeks, beautiful hair, heads that will not break, eyes that will not fall in, and are handsomely dressed in bright colors that will not fade. Words can never express the delight which any child will feel in possessing this Doll family. We will give these four beautiful dolls absolutely free for selling only five boxes of our Laxative Stomach Tablets at 25 cents a box. Write to-day and we will send the Tablets by mail postpaid. When sold send us the money ($1.25) and we will send you the family of four dolls at once.

An Attractive Book Offer!

During the past few years there has been a rage for the historical romance. This has been a profitable and sensible fashion, for it has given something of a knowledge of secular history to persons who would not have taken the trouble to study, but who enjoyed reading fiction.

Why should not Bible history and knowledge of the characters of the Old Testament be disseminated in the same manner, especially among young people. They will gladly read an interesting story, and what can be more interesting, for example, than the career of Moses, skillfully narrated?

We offer six splendid romances from Bible history in one set. The books are: MOSES, THE MAN OF GOD (Dungan); QUEEN ESTHER (Davis); ELIJAH (Davis); KING SAUL (Ellis); IN THE DAYS OF JEHU (Ellis); and SHEM (Ellis). Five of these are cloth-bound books; SHEM is bound in paper. The regular price of the six volumes is $4.75. For a short time we propose to offer the complete set for $3.50. At this price the books will be sent by express, not prepaid.

The children and young people will be delighted with these books. They will help to pass many a long autumn or winter evening. Better still, they will impart much information about Bible history. It is sometimes difficult to get boys and girls to study the Bible, directly, but there will be no trouble getting them to read these interesting stories.

Six Volumes. Over 1400 Pages. Many Illustrations. $3.50.

of reproach. The next state convention is at Leavenworth, June 24-27, 1902. Don't forget the date and see that your society is represented by your pastor and others. It will do you good.

Finally, feel free to call on me for any information or assistance assured that it will be furnished in so far as my power and the Lord's favor will allow.

A Grateful Message.

DEAR BROTHER GARRISON:—As you know Brother F. M. Rains and Sister Rains are in Japan. The missionaries are now enjoying the fellowship of these chosen ones from the homeland. Their visit is the event of the year. The missionaries here are grateful to the churches in America because we know the churches pray for us, and give some of the money the Lord has entrusted to them to support the work, but we feel grateful to-day not simply because prayers are sent to heaven constantly on our behalf and dollars are sent sometimes to the foreign society, but because you have sent to Japan another of our missionary secretaries, who has already, together with the influence of his true helpmeet, established us in the faith and inspired us with hope.

At our last annual meeting Brother and Sister Rains were present and he extended to us greetings of goodwill and affection from many in the homeland. I cannot tell how grateful we felt for these kindly remembrances. If tears rolled down our cheeks that day it was because our hearts were melted with gratitude. To you especially, Bro. Garrison, I am instructed by our missionaries here to express our sincere thanks for the message of goodwill which Brother Rains read to us from you. We will try to prove worthy of your interest by being more earnest and true in the Lord's service.

In behalf of the mission here,

P. A. DAVEY, Sec.

THE AKRON ROUTE.

Through Passenger Service to Buffalo for Pan-American Exposition.

The opening of the Pan-American Buffalo Line—"Akron Route"—May 5th establishes a new outlet from the West and Southwest to Chautauqua Lake, Buffalo, Niagara Falls and St. Lawrence River and Canada resorts. It also opens a new tourist route via Buffalo and the Niagara frontier to New York and the East.

Schedules for the new route are out, and their arrangement indicates passengers over it are to have enjoyable trips to and from the Pan-American Exposition.

The service from St. Louis for Pan-American Exposition visitors from that gateway and the West and Southwest includes two daily trains in both directions. The Pan-American Express leaves St. Louis Union Station at 8:44 a. m., arrives Buffalo 8:15 next morning. This train has sleeping car on which passengers may go from St. Louis to Chautauqua Lake and Buffalo without change. The Buffalo Express leaves St. Louis at 8:15 p. m. with sleeping car from St. Louis to Columbus and from Columbus through to Chautauqua Lake and Buffalo, arriving at latter point at 12:50 midnight. Passengers occupying sleeping car may remain in their berths until 7:00 a. m. Returning trains leave Buffalo daily at 1:00 p. m., arrive St. Louis at noon next day; leave Buffalo 6:30 p. m., arrive St. Louis 6:40 next evening.

Information about fares to Buffalo, Niagara Falls and beyond, stop-over privileges at Buffalo and other details may be ascertained by communicating with J. M. CHESBROUGH, A. G. P. Agt., St. Louis.

ARKANSAS.

Ft. Smith.—During a recent visit to Kentucky I held a two weeks' meeting at Elizaville in Fleming county. Twenty were added to the church. I held a meeting here 11 years ago. It was pleasant to renew the old friendships. Bro. W. S. Erwin, the pastor, is held in high esteem.—E. T. EDMONDS.

Hope, Oct. 14.—Four additions last night by letter and statement.—W. O. BREEDEN.

ENGLAND.

Southampton, Oct. 10.—Bro. H. S. Earle, who was for many years pastor of the church here, is in Southampton for ten days holding a series of meetings. He was immensely popular during his ministry here and we are hoping that good may be done, especially in getting old members to return. Our English work is moving along nicely. Some aggressive plans were laid at the last conference.—LESLIE W. MORGAN.

ILLINOIS.

Antioch.—Bro. H. C. Patterson held a great meeting here beginning Sept. 9 and closing Oct. 3. There were 53 additions, 43 by confession. At the close of the meeting the people gave $186 in five minutes. It was a grand meeting, remarkable alike for its spirit of love and for the relatively large number of men among the converts. W. H. Kerr has been pastor here for 11 years.—PETER YOUNG-BLOOD.

Bellflower, Oct. 12.—John J. Higgs, of Onarga, exchanged meetings with J. H. Swift, pastor of the church here, which resulted in nine added to the church at this place; three have been added since, making 12 since Sept. 1. The meeting has not been held at Onarga yet. Began a meeting at Oak Grove, near Waverly, for W. H. Kindred, Oct. 6. Prospects good though weather is bad.—J. H. SWIFT.

Blandinsville, Oct. 14.—We commenced a series of meetings at the Old Bedford church yesterday. Two additions by letter on the initial sermon and to-night the good confession was made by a man who has honored this community for 40 years by a moral life but had hitherto refused to accept the gospel. Bro. R. M. Shelton, of Canton, Mo., will come to-morrow to do our preaching.—OSCAR INGOLD.

Bunker Hill, Oct. 15.—This congregation, which was organized Sept. 1, is in a flourishing condition, and a rousing Sunday-school is in progress. Bro. W. H. Groner, of Litchfield, has been engaged to preach for us two Lord's day evenings in each month. One young lady confessed last Lord's day morning on invitation of Bro. J. E. Masters, and was baptized the same day.—H. F. HENRICH.

Carlinville, Oct. 21.—Great day with the church here yesterday, rally day and roll call. Large attendance. $700 debt on the church raised; in all $3,625. W. H. Harding, district evangelist, was a great help.—J. S. SMITH, pastor.

Henning.—Report for September.—Prairie Chapel: One by confession and baptism. Henning: One by confession and 10 by letter.—T. F. RICHARDSON.

Hume.—Never has better and more lasting work been done here than since the first of this year, when Bro. McNutt, with his wife, moved into the new parsonage and began their work. Our church house at the time was badly in need of repair. He has a theory that every member of a congregation, as well as those outside, can be got to give if they are approached in the right way, so he took the subscription paper himself and began the task of raising the money with which to repair. It required three afternoons to see those he wished to give for this purpose and in that time he asked only 32 people, 28 of whom gave, contributing over $200. With this money the needed repairs were made. In addition to this, $15 was contributed for foreign missions, $10 for the Orphans' Home at St. Louis, and $15 for home missions. The congregations have been increased about 50 per cent. The C. E. is flourishing and the S. S. is being built up. Two weeks ago there was a union revival held here and the number taken into the church will increase the congregation 50 per cent., 45 members in all.—MRS. MATTIE DEVER.

INDIANA.

Morocco, Oct. 13.—I offered my resignation here yesterday, at which time one of the wealthiest and most intelligent ladies of the town took her stand with us.—GEORGE W. WATKINS.

Rensselaer, Oct. 14.—I shall close my work here with this month, and take charge of Martinsville, Nov. 1. This is a very nice little church of 225 members. My church work here has moved on very nicely, and we have had in all 37 additions since I came here. Two additions recently.—A. L. WARD

IOWA.

Des Moines, Oct. 16.—I have closed a meeting at Kasson, Ia., with 116 additions, most of them by confession.—O. E. HAMILTON.

Sigourney, Oct. 19.—Bro. Harry Walston, of Knoxville, Ia., and Sister Edith Pelley, of Brandon, Ia., assisted me four weeks in a meeting at Lancaster, Ia., with 19 accessions to the church, 16 by confession and baptism. These two are faithful workers. Sister Pelley is a good soloist and leader.—D. W. CAMPBELL.

The church is in better condition than it has been for years. We had to close the meeting when the interest was the highest. The many friends of Bro. T. M. Myers will rejoice that after two years of confinement he has recovered his health to such an extent that he is able to work again. We begin a meeting in Corbin Sunday, Oct. 13, and will continue for two weeks.—J. J. COLE.

Long Branch, Oct. 15.—Bro. E. F. Trahue, of Seymour, Mo., held an 11 days' meeting at Long Branch with six additions, five by baptism and one by statement. After he left I continued six nights longer with no more success, only the brethren were greatly encouraged. I have been preaching for the brethren at said place since July last. I am teaching the Long Branch school this fall and winter. —TOBIAS PARK.

A Prayer.

The following poem, by Clinton Dangerfield, is reproduced, by permission, from advance sheets of the November Century.

Not for the silent chief whom Death
Gently and sedulously keeps
Within a splendid calm; naught mars
His well-won laurels where he sleeps.

Rather for him who newly stands
Half startled on a slippery height,
Like a strong falcon which some hand
Unhooded rudely, whom the light

Floods unforeseen, but who shall prove

The Legend of Chocorua.

By Minnie E. Hadley.

"Waal, I never! There goes Jim McCrillis tearin' like mad down the hill, leavin' his milk-cans a-settin' on the gate-posts, an' Jinny Marie's a-bouncin' back t' the house livelier'n a skeert rabbit. What on airth?"

Mrs. Grant had hastily drawn her dough-covered hands from the batch of bread, and with both elbows resting upon her hips was gazing eagerly through the half-open door of her vine-covered cottage, almost tucked out of sight in a grassy little interval among the White Mountains of New Hampshire. Marie was a tall brunette of eighteen, whose bright black eyes and firmly set features, as well as every movement of her graceful figure, unconsciously betrayed that shrewdness, strength of character and mental poise so indigenous to the native New Englander.

By the time she had reached the cottage door on this particular morning, her emotion of a few moments before was under complete control, and motioning her mother to silence by placing a forefinger to her lips and casting a warning glance toward the open door of the little bed-chamber, she beckoned her from the room. Since her father's paralytic stroke four years ago, followed by a slight mental derangement, it had been necessary to take this precaution in all matters of unusual excitement. Silently she led the way to an open spring house, also vine-covered, a few rods distant, in which a multitude of brightly scoured milk-pans, scattered about in a wide, open trough, were reflecting all the splendor of the early morning sunshine.

"Let us sit here, mother," she said, pointing to a low stone bench, partly hidden by an overhanging grape-vine. "Jim McCrillis says there's big excitement down at the 'Corner' over our cows having milk-sick, and they've all decided to boycott us. I wonder for how many more generations that old chief's curse will wreak its vengeance?"

She heaved a little sigh as she spoke and gazed off in the direction of the bold, rocky ledge of Old Chocorua, as if, with the brilliancy of her sparkling eyes, she would penetrate the veil of legendary mystery which had hovered over its summit for almost three hundred years, and was so inextricably woven into the history of the neighborhood.

In the days of the early settlement of the state of New Hampshire, according to the legend, an old Indian chief named Chocorua had jumped from this same rocky ledge to escape imprisonment by a band of pursuing whites. In so doing he pronounced a terrible curse upon the people of the interval, to which curse the simple natives were wont to attribute a certain disease peculiar to the cattle of that region. This disease was known as milk-sick and caused large quantities of hair to fall from the animal's back and the milk to become bitter. It meant instant death, they superstitiously believed, to use either the milk or the flesh of any animal that had once been in that terrible condition, and no enemy could wreak greater vengeance upon his neighbors than by circulating a report of this disease among his cattle.

"I tell you, mother, there's no such thing as milk-sick," continued Marie as she dipped the old iron ladle into one of the pans and swallowed its contents at a single draught to demonstrate her belief in what she was saying. "Every summer the milk tastes bitter and the cows' hair falls off, just as much as now, without any complaint too. That long-headed Jim McCrillis is at the bottom of all this!"

"Ransomed saints, child! What difference does it make, who is at the bottom of it, or whether they be such a thing's milk-sick or don't be? There's them twelve cows a-bringin' in nothin' an' us a-starvin', and yer Pap's down with pral'sis an' you're a-plannin' to take music lessons. Jinny Marie Grant, what on airth be we goin' to do?" A sense of such utter helplessness overcame her with this last question that she buried her face in the folds of her checked apron and began to weep silently. The words "music lessons" struck such a tender chord in Marie's troubled heart that her first impulse was to throw herself into her mother's arms and weep along with her. But no—it was a time for strength, courage, action. Their only source of income was gone; her father was a half-deranged paralytic, and her mother, yes, her mother on whom she had always relied so much was growing weaker and more excitable of late years.

Marie's voice was exquisitely beautiful and from the time of her babyhood they had all worked, pinched and planned that she might be given at least one year's training in the Boston Conservatory. This luxury had been almost within her grasp at the age of fourteen, when suddenly her father's affliction came and necessitated a long delay of four years. Now there was enough laid by from the scanty income of the little dairy to take her through the fall term, and already she had begun packing her best things away in her father's old-fashioned trunk.

But her plans must all be changed. Claspings both hands tightly about her forehead, she thought—long and hard. No sound was audible save the low sobs of her weeping mother and the distant roar of Swift River as it hurried about the base of Old Chocorua, seeming to prolong in one solemn dirge the last dying accents of that awful curse. Had the old chief hurled his execratory epithets directly upon her unoffending head, she couldn't have felt their force more keenly.

"Yes, this region is cursed," she thought, "cursed to the uttermost by the superstition and vice of its own ignorant people."

She felt that they had been grossly wronged. There was no more cause for this boycotting now than there had been every summer before. Jim McCrillis was an unprincipled, wily young fellow, who lived on an adjoining farm, and drove a dairy wagon to Skinner's Corner. He had borne a grudge against her ever since the night she had refused his company to Mary Larkins's party, and now she suspected him of being at the bottom of all their trouble.

A great gulf seemed suddenly to have yawned between herself and all that she held dearest in life; during these many years her very soul had been welling with beautiful strains of secret music, which she felt must find expression through the medium of a trained and cultivated voice if she were ever to release her unfortunate parents from their cruel bonds of poverty, and make the world a little better and brighter for her having lived in it.

"No, I can't give up my music! I can't give it up! That would mean giving up life itself!" she said to herself as she arose and paced nervously back and forth across the spring-house floor, still claspings her hands tightly about her forehead as if she would force some clear and helpful thought from the depths of her puzzled brain. There was but one resource—the factories at Lowell, and she gave a frightened little shudder to think what a great change the last ten minutes seemed to have wrought in her whole future outlook.

To save money enough from her scanty earnings in the Lowell shoe-factories to take her even one year to the Boston Conservatory seemed absurd and out of the question, but here rested her only hope, and she felt that God would certainly help her in some mysterious way, if she would only be really brave and try to help herself.

"Come, mother," she said cheerily, placing her hand upon the bowed head, "my plans are all made, I shall go down to Lowell to-morrow and get work in the shoe-factories. There's plenty of music money to keep you and father comfortably for at least two years, and"—she would have said more but a great lump was choking her and tears were beginning to fall in spite of herself.

Mrs. Grant threw up both hands with a look of horror. "You, Jinny, you work in them dirty factories? Never! Never! We'll all starve first—die—anything but that! Hain't I been tuggin' an' toilin' all these years ter keep ye out o' them factories? Look at the McCrillis girls an' the Larkinses"—

"Never mind, mother, they have nothing to do with my case," and Marie brushed away what she secretly vowed would be the last tear, at the same time giving her mother a rapturous kiss.

"Now let's set to work as if nothing had happened. There's no use crying over spilled milk, you know," she said, forcing an empty little laugh as she gazed ruefully at the useless contents of so many rows of well-filled milk-pans. "You keep father company while I pack my trunk. He mustn't know but what I've gone to Boston."

But she found it impossible, try as hard as she might, to adjust herself to this new condition of affairs without undergoing a great inner struggle. Packing her trunk as a pupil of the Boston Conservatory, and packing her trunk as the prospective employee of a Lowell shoe-factory, she found to be two experiences totally unlike. All the fancy little articles of toilette and furbelows which she and her mother had been preparing during the long summer days, with such great care and pleasant anticipations as to when and where she should wear them, now seemed to haunt her with a far-away, ghostly stare, as if they had been made for some one who had suddenly died, without the pleasure of having worn them. In fact, it seemed that her own happy self of a few hours before had suddenly gone from the world forever, leaving only the poor substitute of a lifeless automaton, a piece of mechanism that acted, not because it would but because it must. Thus the miserable day wore away and when night came, she found that she had done a thousand unnecessary things, and left undone about as many that were necessary.

"It's gittin' dark, Jinny, an' the water hain't brung yit from aunt Ruth's spring," said her mother just at nightfall. "Es ye've allus enjoyed fetchin' it, an' this is yer last night at the intervale!"

"Hush! sh! mother," said Marie, choking back a great lump that was rising in her throat, "of course I want to visit the old spring once more. Give me the pail."

This had been her work every evening for years. Aunt Ruth's spring was just across the intervale at the entrance to a little cavern in the side of Old Chocorua, with which it was strangely connected by legendary history. Aunt Ruth was an old Indian "pow-wow," a half-breed, who had tried to bless the country instead of cursing it by laying a bag of sulphur in the spring and thus rendering its waters a remedy for all the ills of life.

It was growing quite dark when Marie reached the spring, and as she stooped down for her pail of water, she could faintly distinguish by the light of the moon beaming above Old Chocorua, the dim reflection of her own figure in the gurgling pool beneath. Just then she heard low voices right at hand. Some men were approaching. She had never experienced fear in all her life before, but something in their tones told her that they were plotting mischief. She felt her heart beating rapidly, and she had barely time to dart behind a rock at the entrance of the little cavern, when the reflection of an old white hat drawn down over an animal-looking face was thrown upon the water which bubbled out from beneath her hiding place.

It was Jim McCrillis, and Marie held her breath lest she should be discovered! A stranger was with him who had come apparently for the purpose of viewing the spring, as immediately upon reaching it, he stooped down with a long stick and measured the depth of the water.

"Geminy crickets!" he exclaimed with a low whistle as he held the stick up in front of him, "four feet o' water there, an' all this drought! I tell ye, Mac, old boy, our fortune's made!" He slapped McCrillis familiarly upon the back and chuckled with unsuppressed delight as he continued. "You're sure the old lady an' the young'n don't know nothin' o' the value o' these medicinal properties?"

"Not a breath," answered Jim, "I've worked the hull business purty slick. Lucky I thought of that milk-sick wrinkle. They's boycotted 'thin an hour after I set the tale a-goin'. Their business's killed deader'n a door nail an' they'll sell us the hull field fer less'n Dr. Ames'll pay us on our first shipment o' the water."

"Yer a reg'lar snide, old boy," chuckled his comrade as he gave him another slap. "We'll drive the bargain with the old lady in the mornin' an' ship a hundred barl o' this water to Boston afore to-morrow night. Of course milk-sick's nothin' but the cows a-drinkin' sulphur water in dry weather. But mum's the word, old boy, till we've druv a bargain for the intervale."

With this they disappeared around a bend of Old Chocorua, and Marie rushed home upon the wings of the wind. The whole matter had dawned upon her like a revelation. Aunt Ruth's spring had been found to possess wonderful medicinal properties, and they were planning to sell the water to Dr. Ames of Boston—she knew him well by reputation. Jim McCrillis had stirred up the excitement over milk-sick that he might get a bargain in their property.

The next day, the boys were informed that the property could not be bought at any price. A few days later, Dr. Ames wrote them that he preferred to buy the water from the true possessors of the soil.

Thus began those enormous shipments of medicinal spring water from this locality into the city of Boston which is to-day such a thriving business, and which enabled the Grants to build upon the slope of Old Chocorua that beautiful little hotel known as the "Half-way House," a resting place for weary tourists from all parts of the world.

Filipino School-Boy's Composition.

The Filipino's brightness and readiness to learn is clearly demonstrated by the following production of a child of Parang Parang, Philippine Islands, who has only had one year's instruction in English. The production, written on foolscap paper, with the vertical penmanship, was brought home by a Bellefontaine, O., soldier:

"The American is a white man that has black the coat and pantaloons the color of chocolate, and wears black and red shoes, and also has a hat the color of ashes, and he drinks whisky and eats bread, meat, and coffee, and knows how to sing and knows how to dance and play the guitar and music, and knows how to write, and parts the hair at the middle. He has the custom very good and they treat the Filipinos very well, and teach also to speak of their language that is very good for to learn the girls and boys, and sometimes some are very large and high and have the hair in curls, and they are very good to shoot guns and not can they deceive the Americans, for they are very smart, and sometimes they have the hair so red, and when the Americans came to the island we had much fear, because said some that they are bad, but now we know the custom that is very good."

One of the churches in a little Western town has a young woman as its pastor. She was called to the door of the parsonage one day, and saw there a much embarrassed young farmer of the German type.

"Dey say der minister lifed in dis house," he said.

"Yes," replied the fair pastor.

"Vell—m—I—I vant to kit merrit!"

"To get married? Very well, I can marry you," said the minister, encouragingly.

"Oh, but I got a girl alreaty," was the disconcerting reply.

Dangerous to Life.

Surgical Operations For Piles Dangerous and Unnecessary.

The failure of ointments, salves and pills to permanently cure piles has led many to believe the only cure to be a surgical operation.

But surgical operations are dangerous to life and moreover, are often unsuccessful and at this time are no longer used by the best physicians nor recommended by them.

The safest and surest way to cure any case of piles, whether itching, bleeding or protruding, is to use the Pyramid Pile Cure, composed of vegetable oils and acids, healing and soothing to the inflamed parts, and containing no opium or other narcotic.

Dr. Williams, a prominent official surgeon, says: "It is the duty of every surgeon to avoid an operation if possible to cure in any other way, and after many trials with the Pyramid Pile Cure I unhesitatingly recommend it in preference to an operation."

The harmless acids and oils contained in it cause the blood vessels to contract to a natural condition and the tumors are absorbed and the cure is made without pain, inconvenience or detention from business.

In bleeding and itching piles the Pyramid is equally valuable."

In some cases a single package of the Pyramid has cured long standing cases; being in suppository form it is always ready for use, can be carried in the pocket when traveling, it is applied at night and does not interfere with the daily occupation.

The Pyramid Pile Cure is not only the safest and surest remedy for piles, but it is the best known and most popular from Maine to California. Every physician and druggist knows what it will do.

The Pyramid Pile Cure can be found at all drug stores at 50c for full sized treatment.

The Runaways.—IV.

There stood Harry with a heavy hatchet in his hand, while the water from the tank trickled down his trousers' legs, and the goldfish gasped at his feet. Two had been killed by their fall. "Oh, Oh, Oh, Me-e!" shouted Harry, catching sight of Zep and Emily. "Hold your apron!" cried Zep to Emily as he gathered up the fish. "Fly to the bathtub with 'em. Oh, Harry, what made you do it?"

"I didn't go to!" wailed Harry. "I was just pretending to hit the glass to see 'em jump back and ever' time I hit at 'em it was fun! They would turn like their tails was an axletree. An' I guess I got excited an' hit harder'n I knew and 'kee-WHACK!' it went through the glass—and—aunt Sarelida—Oh, Oh, Oh! Me-e-e!" He was too frightened to cry.

"No use standin' there sayin', 'Oh, Me!'" cried Zep. "We must sop up this water. Quick!"

"What can we sop with?" demanded the wretched Harry.

"Anything!" cried Zep, rushing into the company-bedroom, the door of which happened to be most convenient. There was something white covering the bed and snatching this off he rushed back and fell to mopping up the Brussels carpet. Harry rejoined him in great excitement. "Will this do to sop with?" he asked.

"I guess not," said Zep. "That's aunt Sarelida's dress, unless I'm mighty mistaken. Emily!" he raised his voice, "how's them fish?"

"You mean those fish," Emily reproved him from the bathroom.

"I don't," said Zep. "This ain't no time to be correct. This carpet looks just awful!"

"Here's another one dead," came the voice of their sister. "And this other one,—it just wiggles a little bit. Now it ain't even wigglin'. I can see it breathe, though."

"Harry," exclaimed Zep as he soaked up the water in the large white bed-cover, "why don't you help get up this water? You're the one did it, anyhow!"

"I can't find anything," moaned Harry, dancing up and down in anguish, still holding aunt Sarelida's silk dress.

"Then sit down on it!" ordered the older brother, "and scrape yourself along; that'll absorb up some moisture, I guess."

The voice of Emily came to them above the roaring of the hydrant; "It's quit a-breathin'!"

"Then all the goldfish are dead but one!" Harry wailed.

"That one's dead, too," said Emily coming into the hall. "Two and two are four, and that's all there were. Oh, Zep, that's aunt Sarelida's beautiful white spread you are gawming up so dreadful! What will she say?"

"If it comes to that," retorted Zep, very red from his exercise, "what will she do, about the whole business? I don't care what she says, no I don't!" he added angrily, as he cut his hand on a piece of the broken glass tank. His finger began to bleed over the beautiful white spread.

"Oh, Oh!" said Emily suddenly in a scared voice, "I clear forgot all about dropping my ring out in the back yard." She ran away while Zep called after her, "Say, just bring in that gold watch I left on the bench, will you?"

When aunt Sarelida returned from visiting, with that pleasant, refined feeling still lingering that comes from being out in society, she did not have to ring the bell, for the front door stood wide open. Her glass tank was heaped in a pretty wreck of sparkling glass, her goldfish seemed to have spread their fins for a distant land, and the carpet had put on a sober look as if beginning to realize that it was growing old. The three children who stood waiting for her looked as miserable as the pictures of our famous men you see so often in newspapers. Aunt Sarelida dropped her parasol with a faint scream and sank into a hall chair.

"We didn't know what to do with the glass," said Zep apologetically, "or we would of throwed it all away to save you the worry."

"I broke it," said Harry. "I had the hatchet hittin' at the fish, jus' to see 'em jump back when, souse! it went through the side and into the water!"

"Here are the goldfish," Emily announced showing them upon a waiter; "all dead, the four of them."

"You see," said Harry, "it was fallin' on the floor, I guess. We turned the hydrant on 'em, but it didn't seem to do no good."

Aunt Sarelida sat quite rigid, unable to speak a word.

"I sopped up the water with your beautiful bed-spread," Zep continued, "but I thought it was just a sheet or tablecloth or something,—I didn't know it was particular till Emily told me and then it was too late."

"And his finger bled all over it," added Emily "till it looks perfec'ly scan'lus! But he didn't complain although the cut hurt him awful; he said it did."

"But that ain't the worst, aunt Sarelida," stammered Zep, who was very pale.

"Oh, no," faltered Emily, "all that goldfish trouble ain't nothin' to what we have to tell you!"

Aunt Sarelida gripped the sides of her chair and glared at them, speechless.

"Your little gold ring is gone," said Emily.

"And grandfather's gold watch that you let me wear to-day," added Zep.

"GONE?" cried aunt Sarelida, finding her voice at last, and springing up.

"Emily and I were in the back yard," explained the wretched Zep, "when we heard the most perfectly terrible noise in here and Harry crying, 'Oh, Me! Oh Me-e-e!' just that way. We thought he was dead, so in we ran—didn't we, Emily? and I left the watch on the bench and she dropped the ring on the ground; and when we'd sopped up all the water—you ought to see it; you wouldn't think from the nice way it looks now how it did look! And the ring and watch had been stole by a young man in a handsome suit with a light cane. We know it was him, 'cause he'd seen us playin' with the ring and watch. So I run and told the police and they'll get him, I expect," he added, in all the hopefulness of youth; "I've did ever' thing that kin be done, aunt Sarelida, and we all three asks your pardon."

"Where was that young man?"

ANEMIA

The face alone is no sure index of health; but headache and dizziness, no ambition, no force, no endurance, short breath, palpitation of the heart on little exertion—these with a pale face, are a clear indication of what is wrong. There is too little red in the blood.

There is too little vital force. It is life that is wanting.

Scott's emulsion of cod-liver oil supplies it.

"He was standin' in the alley before we"—

"How could you see him in the alley?"

"Through the gate. Oh, yes, and we didn't tell you that, did we? Well, we opened the gate—or I opened it, 'cause there was no breeze any other place and I'm sorry about that, too."

"Children," said aunt Sarelida quietly, "get your things together. You go to your Uncle Tom's on this evening's train. He has always said you should be bound out, and he is your guardian. I have nerves; and I can't have children, too!" That was all. She didn't scold or reproach them. She simply packed them safely away on the train for Campton. Can we blame her very much? Think of her goldfish, her watch, and her ring, to say nothing of her spread and carpet. Besides, she had never seen much of her brother Henry since he joined a church she disapproved of and began to preach for it; so she always felt that Emily, Zep and Harry were only half-kin.

At midnight the train stopped at a certain station and the orphans went to the door as if to look at the dark scenery. But when the brakeman called, "All aboard!" they slipped down the steps on the side away from the station. Nobody saw them vanish in the night. Zep and Harry had declared they would not be bound out, and Emily could not be left behind. With no clear notion of where they were going or what they meant to do, they walked all the next day, carrying their shoes and stockings in a bundle and buying what they needed to eat with some of the change aunt Sarelida had given them. Thus they reached the box-car on the switch.

The Unsaved About Us.*

TEXT.—And he suffered him not, but saith unto him, Go to thy house, unto thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee, and how he had mercy on thee.—Mark 5:19.

It was natural and admirable that the demon-dispossessed man should want to follow the Master. It is the first impulse of the forgiven soul. In an eastern slave market, a gentleman was much moved by the distress of a young girl who was about to be sold at auction. He bought her and set her free. As soon as it was made plain that she was delivered from bondage, she ran joyfully after her benefactor, exclaiming to the throngs, "He hath redeemed me! he hath redeemed me!" and then to him she cried, "Let me be your servant!"

Publication.

We all know that the gospel is literally good tidings; and we know, too, that tidings are not tidings at all unless told. Many good people have heard the story of redeeming love, have had their hearts cleansed by the blood of Christ, and then given their lips over to dumbness. They forget that they are to sound out the saving message. Jesus wanted disciples, followers, comrades, but he wanted witnesses also, and he makes a witness of this grateful man "Go! tell!" And is not that the word of the loving Master to us all? We are not to dream happy hours away at His feet, though we are to seek His favor, but, having been blessed ourselves, we are to be a blessing to others.

It is necessary to have a class of men to whom the church commits the special task of preaching the gospel, of publishing the good news. This is according to divine wisdom. But it is not therefore necessary for the rest of the church to remain silent. All should preach, each in his way. "There is either a special call," writes A. Campbell, "a general call, or no call at all, to labor for the conversion of the world. If there be a few specially called, the rest have nothing to do but to mind their own concerns. If none be called, then it is the duty of none, and the Lord has nothing for his people to do—no world to convert, or at least, nothing for them to do in that work. None of us are prepared for the consequences of either of these assumptions. It follows, then, that it is the duty of all to labor according to their respective abilities in this work."

Preaching from Experience.

A merely theoretical knowledge of the gospel may be acquired, and it may be imparted in a mechanical fashion to others. But this is cold and lifeless; it is not what the Master intended. Experience is the best teacher, and experience is needed to make the heart warm, the tongue ready and the lips eloquent. Only he who has felt the degrading power of sin, its galling slavery, can preach effectively the mercy and love of a Redeemer. Indeed, it has been said that no man can preach beyond his personal experience. He can tell of the love of God, as far as he has tasted it, and no farther. In such preaching, the man himself illustrates his story, and his whole emotional nature is engaged in telling it.

Disciples should therefore covet, not familiarity with the demon forces of sin, but familiarity with God's love and mercy. Every disappointment, every pain, every sorrow, brings its deposit of heavenly treasure, making the heart richer, the eye clearer, the testimony stronger.

Beginning at Home.

"To thy house, unto thy friends," go there, and tell them what the Lord has done for thee. It would be idle to traverse the length and breadth of the land, speaking to strangers, if one's own household sat in darkness. The first preachers were instructed to begin at Jerusalem, and so to-day the redeemed soul bears its first testimony to the little group around the fireside. It is in one's own home he is best known. There his former manner of life is a matter of record. And if he has been transformed, it is there the contrast appears clearest and strongest, and therefore most convincing.

*Prayer-meeting topic for Oct. 30.

Not only is this true, but surely God means by ties of blood to endow us with the power of mightily influencing each other. He has set us in families and neighborhoods and established these intimate relationships for a wise purpose. Our loved ones appeal to us. We yearn for them. Let your light shine brightest at home.

Prayer.

O God, Thou hast delivered us from the thralldom of sin. Thou hast forgiven all our iniquities and blotted out as a thick cloud our transgressions. Our hearts leap within us for joy, and we would go forth among men as witnesses to Thy redeeming mercy. Wilt thou bless us, and the testimony we bear, and make it effectual in winning others from darkness to light, through Jesus Christ our Savior. Amen.

Ladies With Superfluous Hair

On face, neck, arms, etc., will find it to their advantage to write for free booklet to the Dermatino Co., 1805 Market street, Room 65, St. Louis, Mo. That company makes the only remedy which permanently removes unsightly hair so that it will never grow again. The remedy is always effective and is absolutely harmless. Its action is marvelous and failure is impossible. It is unlike other preparations which give but temporary relief and do not kill the root of the hair. It will pay you to send for free booklet if afflicted with superfluous hair.

Travel.

A word or two on the subject of travel is not amiss. The facilities for the transportation of passengers at the present time have certainly been brought to perfection. It isn't like in the old days when it was almost a torture to go from one place to another. Now you get aboard a train and live just like you do at home. The entire equipment is built with a view to your comfort.

For instance: When you go East the B. & O. S-W. offers you Three Daily Solid Vestibuled Trains from St. Louis, leaving at 8:20 a. m., 8:05 p. m. and 2:15 a. m.—made up of the finest Pullman sleepers—a dining car service which cannot be excelled (you don't have to pay for what you can't eat, but just for what you order)—first class high back coaches—in fact the trains are palaces on wheels. The track, roadbed and equipment are entirely new.

It's the best line to Cincinnati and Louisville. Only $21 to New York with stop-overs. (Saves you money and gives you the best service.)

Information in regard to trains, etc., can be secured from any representative. It will be a pleasure for them to answer your questions and help you in every way.

The favor of the public is final proof of merit—and we're after it.

Danger In Soda.

Serious Results Sometimes Follow Its Excessive Use.

Common soda is all right in its place, and indispensable in the kitchen and for cooking and washing purposes, but it was never intended for a medicine, and people who use it as such will some day regret it.

We refer to the common use of soda to relieve heartburn or sour stomach, a habit which thousands of people practice almost daily, and one which is fraught with danger; moreover, the soda only gives temporary relief, and in the end the stomach trouble gets worse and worse.

The soda acts as a mechanical irritant to the walls of the stomach and bowels, and cases are on record where it accumulated in the intestines, causing death by inflammation or peritonitis.

Dr. Harlandson recommends as the safest and surest cure for sour stomach (acid dyspepsia) an excellent preparation sold by druggists under the name of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. These tablets are large 20-grain lozenges, very pleasant to taste, and contain the natural acids, peptones and digestive elements essential to good digestion, and when taken after meals they digest the food perfectly and promptly before it has time to ferment, sour and poison the blood and nervous system.

Dr. Wuertth states that he invariably uses Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets in all cases of stomach derangements, and finds them a certain cure, not only for sour stomach, but by promptly digesting the food, they create a healthy appetite, increase flesh and strengthen the action of the heart and liver. They are not a cathartic, but intended only for stomach diseases and weakness, and will be found reliable in any stomach trouble except cancer of the stomach. All druggists sell Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets at 50 cents per package.

A little book describing all forms of stomach weakness and their cure mailed free by addressing the Stuart Co. of Marshall, Mich.

SABBATH OR LORD'S DAY

By D. R. DUNGAN, author of "On the Rock," "Moses, the Man of God," etc. It is a powerful argument against Adventism, and the observance of the Sabbath, or seventh day of the week, as the day of rest and worship. Dr. Dungan is a man well versed in the Scriptures, and gifted with sound sense and good judgment. He is a strong and convincing writer. This work should be placed in the hands of those who have been disturbed by the teachings of Adventists.

Death of Joseph.*

An interval of seventeen years elapsed between the close of the last lesson and the beginning of the present one. Jacob, with his entire household, settled in Goshen, the north-east district of Egypt, a region well fitted for the pastoral life which he and his sons wished to follow. It was more agreeable to the Egyptians for them to locate on the border of the land, rather than in the interior, because of the suspicion with which foreign shepherds were regarded, since the invasion and conquest of the "Shepherd Kings," which preceded this period by possibly but a few decades, or generations at most. Pharaoh loaded them with favors, and their home in Egypt came to be a very pleasant one. Here, after his troubled and unhappy life, the aged Jacob found peace in the prosperity and happiness of his children. He lived to the good old age of a hundred and forty-seven and died with resignation, after having bestowed his blessing upon the children of Joseph, each of whom he honored with the headship of one of the tribes of Israel. In a prophetic rhapsody he briefly portrayed the future of his sons, or rather of the tribes that should spring from them, and with the request that his body be carried into Canaan and buried with those of his fathers, in the Cave of Machpelah, "he gathered up his feet into the bed and yielded up the ghost, and was gathered unto his people." His body was embalmed and a period of mourning observed for seventy days, after the Egyptian fashion. Then, attended by a great concourse of Egyptian nobles, the sons of Jacob, led by Joseph, carried their father's body back to Hebron, and laid it away in the tomb of Abraham.

It is difficult for a base soul to realize the existence of noble and unselfish spirits. Joseph had indeed forgiven his brothers, and for seventeen years had proven himself their benefactor. Yet, they reasoned, this forbearance might have been only out of regard for their aged father, and Joseph might be cherishing the purpose of revenging himself upon them, after Jacob had been laid away. Esau, their father's brother, had once cherished such a purpose against Jacob and they feared that Joseph might follow his example. Before the death of Jacob they told him their fears and received from him the message to Joseph which they now send, as if they would plead by the voice of their dead father for mercy. They call themselves "the servants of the God of thy father," as if they would no longer claim for themselves the name of brothers. They follow the messenger who bears their appeal, and prostrate themselves before Joseph, beseeching his mercy and forgiveness. Did they recall the morning, so many years before, when the artless young lad told his dream, which pictured them in the very act they were now performing, and for which they had hated him and sold him into slavery? The memory doubtless had burned itself into their very souls and made their shame and terror the greater now.

They were again cruelly wronging their noble brother. Their doubt of him cut him to the heart and he wept bitterly. That they could think him capable of living a lie all these years and suspect his words and actions to be only the cover of the hatred he was all the time cherishing, must have been a sore trial to this godly man. And their offer to be no longer his brothers, but his servants, must have sounded to his ears as unwelcome as the request of the prodigal son that his father let him take a like humble place in his home. Joseph's answer was such as we might expect from so grand a character. "Fear not: for am I in the place of God?" Had he not learned, during those long years of bondage in the house of Potiphar, and those longer years in the prison, that it belonged to God alone to revenge an injury? Had he not committed his way unto him and found that God could bring forth his righteousness as the light, and his judgment as the noonday? After such an experience of the divine presence and favor as had been the portion of Joseph, no evil spirit of vengeance could find a resting place within his heart. Again he assures them, as he had when he first revealed himself to them, that he recognized God in all this history of their duplicity and cruelty, and declared his purpose to nourish them and their children, as he had been doing so long.

Of the future of these brethren we are told nothing. Doubtless they were in some measure transformed by the sweet spirit and noble example of Joseph, so that their lives were more unselfish and their faith in and loyalty to God more pronounced in all after years. As for Joseph, we are told that he lived to the good old age of a hundred and ten, and was permitted, before his death, to hold in his arms his grandchildren to the third generation, born of his two sons, Ephraim and Manasseh. With the ending of the family the Hebrews did not return to Canaan, but abode in Goshen. God had a wonderful purpose to fulfill in their abiding here, and they were unconsciously carrying out the will of the God of their fathers, in thus dwelling in a strange land.

As the death of Joseph approached, he remembered the land of his youth and yearned to find his last resting place in its soil. He had never forgotten the promises made by Jehovah to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, which were constantly repeated in the ears of their children. He knew that Canaan was to be the dwelling place of his people, and that here was the glory of God to be revealed to the world through them. It was his desire, therefore, that his grave he made in that promised land. He called around him the leading members of the family, as he felt death approaching, and required of them an oath that they would give him burial in the land of Canaan. "God will surely visit you," he said, "and bring you up out of this land unto the land which he sware to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob. . . . and ye shall carry up my bones from hence." The oath was given, the faithful "Savior of the world," as the Egyptians had called him, died, and his body was embalmed and laid away in a coffin until the promised return to Canaan should transpire. By reading the story of that return, we find, from Exodus 13:19, and Joshua 24:32 that his body at last rested in the soil of Shechem, in the ground which his father Jacob had long ago given him. Here, near the Well of Jacob, under the base of Mount Ebal, is shown to-day the tomb of Joseph. Perhaps, when the Holy Land is delivered from the power of the Turk, we shall be able to look upon the veritable body of this man of God, from whose life we have learned such wonderful and beautiful lessons.

THE OLD BOOK IN THE NEW CRUCIBLE.

nack thinks thirty or forty years sufficient time for the compilation of the gospels. It may have taken longer for our gospels to secure their predominance, but the actual composition may be put much earlier than the higher criticism has hitherto allowed. Harnack supports his view by the consideration that in times of theological ferment ideas differentiate and crystallize quickly, and he gives an apposite illustration from Lutheranism. In 1517 putting out its protest in the Theses, in 1567 itself at the height of intolerance in the University of Zena; in 1517 ethically indignant with Rome, in 1590 bigoted and passionate in defense of transubstantiation. The argument is that when men are astride theology they ride quickly, and that it is not necessary to suppose the gospels took so long to compose as the higher criticism taught a generation ago.

Another great name in German theology sanctions the same opinion. Wendt, in "The Teaching of Jesus," is strongly conservative and retrogressive. His great contribution to the subject is what he believes to be the original stratum of John. He reads the fourth gospel and instead of finding it a document of the data A. D. 130-140, he distinguishes a first draft, an older document, "belonging to the time of the apostles, and reflecting in its account of eternal life, and of the gift of the Holy Spirit, and in the enforcement of the fatherhood of God and the dependence of his kingdom on love in the hearts of men, the very essence of the teaching of Jesus." What this amounts to is, that the original gospel of John was a gospel taken from the lips of Christ; that its object was not to proclaim his own Messiahship, but to reveal to men a heavenly Father and to teach them love at once filial and fraternal. Only the late editor of this original, imbued with the idea of Messiahship, wrote it in all through the document and changed its whole character. The fatherhood of God, not the Messiahship of the Son, was, in Wendt's view, the great original theme. The last was only the sign of the beginning of the end. "As his destiny closed in upon him he became more and more impressed with the need of attachment to his own person; and the old note of a simple call to realize God's fatherhood faded from the forefront of his preaching to give place to that other note, insistent on believing devotion to himself, which makes itself heard at the close of the synoptics." The fatherhood is the subject of Mark and Matthew. The argument runs through, and if rightly interpreted, is also the subject of the original John.

The recent attempt to shift the center of gravity of the Higher Criticism from the Old back to the New Testament, in the publication of Dr. Cheyne's new Bible Dictionary, is not likely to have a prolonged success. A marked tendency, if not the leading characteristic of the work, is an attempt to revamp the exploded theories of the rationalistic criticism of a generation ago. The elimination of the miraculous from the gospel narratives, and the virtual destruction of the historicity and credibility of the evangelic story that failed so signally thirty years ago in the hands of the ablest of critics, is not likely to succeed now, with the whole trend of the best criticism against it. The latest guesses and the wildest hypotheses of destructive criticism do not make up the best subject matter for the contents for an Encyclopedia Biblica.

It is only natural when the higher critics begin to climb down that orthodox critics should make demonstrations of pleasure. To find that old-fashioned views covering the most important part of the field are right after all, to be told it by the best critics, yields satisfaction even to the natural man. Harnack in his last book pushes nearly all of the dates of important New Testament books further towards the beginning, and puts the capstone on the temple of Christian evidence, by assigning the conversion of Saul to the year of the crucifixion. With the New Testament securely entrenched behind the bulwark of rationalistic as well as Christian scholarship, the Old Testament message may be expected to emerge from the crucible of the critical conflict without even the smell of fire upon its garments.

The Idaho Convention.

The second annual convention of the Idaho state missionary society was held in Boise City, Oct. 1, 2 and 3. The attendance and interest were good; better than last year. Every number on the program was carried out, though in two or three instances it was necessary to supply. B. F. Clay presided. G. L. Surber acted as secretary. Some months ago the state board employed S. G. Clay as state evangelist. His report at the convention showed that he has organized one church at Weiser, that he has secured much valuable information and opened up the work in various parts of the state, and that he has the work thoroughly in hand for a strong forward movement in the future. No one unacquainted with the great west in mere extent of territory can understand the full magnitude of the work of a missionary here. The towns are small, the settlements are scattered, the railroads are few; one must go all the way round to get to any place. Idaho is larger than Ohio and Kentucky combined, and the railroads do not form a network, but rather a border round the state. We have scattered brethren, numbering into the thousands, all over this great territory who have not heard a preacher proclaim the primitive gospel for years, yet we have twenty-one churches in the state.

We have about fifteen hundred brethren who cannot hear preaching, yet they have remained loyal to our plea. Here is an example. (How many of the readers of this would be able to make such a record?) Bro. Horatio Swartz and his son-in-law, Elmer Thompson, of Junction, Idaho, drove over mountain roads three hundred and fifty miles (the printer ought to use large caps here) to be present at this convention. These two brothers and their wives have met every Lord's day for three years to study the word and break bread. The example of these brothers and the recommendation of the state evangelist gave the keynote to the convention. It was decided to organize a home department, and to get in touch with all the scattered brethren, so far as possible. We want preachers and others in the East who know of any of our people that come to Idaho to send us word, giving name and address, if possible. Write to B. F. Clay, Cor. Sec., Boise, Idaho.

It was decided to ask the home board for one thousand dollars to carry on the evangelistic work in Idaho.

Some notable addresses at the convention were those of Mrs. C. E. Evans, John C. Rice,

G. W. Surber, B. F. Clay, Eugene Finn, O. M. Pennock and S. G. Clay. The sermon on Wednesday evening, by C. E. Evans, lately come from Iowa, was a masterly discussion of "Our Attitude Toward the Other Religious Bodies."

We are working and praying and paying. Brethren, work and pray and pay with us, and we will accomplish great results.

O. M. PENNOCK.

A Suggestion.

This is not a "therapeutic" or theological suggestion, but evangelistic. In our reports to the papers, whether by pastor or evangelist, why can't we state definitely the number of additions? It is very disappointing to the friends and admirers of a preacher who send a closely every paper to see reports of his work to find only when he has finished a meeting that "it was a great meeting," or that "a great number was added to the saved." It might be a great meeting and not have many additions, but our statistician cannot do justice to such a report. Why not say how many by baptism and how many otherwise? It is no discredit to a preacher not to have 100 or more additions in every meeting. Neither Paul nor Peter could have a great meeting under the same conditions we find sometimes unless they exercised their miraculous power as in the case of Ananias and Elymas, and thus brought fear upon all the church. To report "10 additions last Sunday" may mean 10 subtractions from other local congregations and not a single addition to the church in general. Brethren, let us be specific and state the facts.

Coffee Did It.

Would Have Been Fatal if Kept Up.

"Coffee! Oh how I did want it after the nervous strain of public work. Something warm to brace me up was all the breakfast I craved, but every time I drank it, I suffered the dying sensation that follows it with heart fluttering and throbbing of the throat and ears."

I had no strength to throw away in that way, so decided that hot water must do for me.

One morning I came to breakfast in the home of some friends in Pueblo, Colo., just in time to see the mother pouring some rich deep yellow coffee into mugs for the two little boys. One little chap had thrust his fingers in the mug and was licking them with such approving smacks. This opened the way for me to say, 'Are you not afraid of the effects of coffee on the little folks?' The mother explained that it was Postum Food Coffee made at Battle Creek, Mich., and remarked, 'We think there is nothing like it.' Then she explained how the new coffee had weaned them away from the use of the old-fashioned coffee and tea because 'it is so wholesome.' I drank it there for the first time, and was delighted, not only with the delicious flavor, but the after satisfaction it gives. One day I was speaking with our family physician's wife about Postum, when her daughter remarked, 'Yes, mamma, we are out of Postum, and I have used coffee for the last two mornings and it always brings the tired feeling and troubles my stomach and bowels, but Postum makes me feel all right.'

In one home they served Postum in such a way that it was tasteless. I have found that Postum boiled sometimes five minutes, and sometimes ten, is nothing more than spoiled water, but when it is made with two heaping teaspoonsful for each cup, and boiled fifteen or twenty minutes it becomes a tried and proven breakfast favorite, and for refreshment and wholesome nourishment, has no equal." ELLIS.

After 17 years of patient suffering the tired spirit of Sister Louisa J. Ellis took its homeward flight on the morning of Oct. 4, 1901. Louisa J. Spindler was born in Knox county, O., July 17, 1842, and married to Andrew Ellis in 1870. Their union was blessed with three daughters. One daughter died in childhood and Brother Ellis was called home some seven years ago, leaving two daughters together with the two stepsons whom she reared to mourn her departure. While yet a child she became a Christian and early in life became a member of the Jelloway Christian Church in Knox county, O., of which she was an active worker until the family removed to Marshall county, Ia., in 1884. Together with Bro. Ellis she was large y instrumental in founding the Christian church in Melbourne, both being charter members, and her interest in the welfare of the church has never failed. Especially will she be missed in the C. W. B. M. in which she was an untiring worker. She was a firm friend of missions. During Bro. Ellis's life their home was the preacher's home, as many of the older ministers will remember. Being an invalid and almost helpless for several years, her active service was much hindered, yet by her sympathy and prayers, as well as by her life in the community, she won the respect and love of all and her influence was far-reaching for good. The funeral services were held at the church on the following Sunday conducted by the pastor, after which we laid her gently away to rest beside her husband to await the final summons from on high. We shall meet again.

MAVITY.

Elder Henry Mavity, a pioneer preacher of Kentucky, died Oct. 11, 1901, of general celebrity, at the home of his son, John S. Mavity, at Vanceburg, Ky. Elder Mavity was born Sept. 10, 1810, and was 91 years, 1 month and 1 day old. He was a faithful minister of the word from 1830 to 1890. He was a son of Elder John Mavity and brother of Elder Jesse and Fletcher Mavity, who have long since passed to their reward. He left one sister, Mrs. Eliza Vawtes, of Medaryville, Ind., who is 85 years old.

RANKIN.

Anna Rice Rankin, wife of Fred H Rankin, of Athens, Ill., died at her home Sunday, Sept. 29, 1901. Mrs. Rankin was the daughter of Elder E. G. Rice, one of Illinois' pioneer preachers, and Mary A. Rice, of Jacksonville, Ill., and was born October 16, 1866. Miss Rice was married to Fred H. Rankin, June 20, 1889. Reared in the household which was her home, it was most natural that she should early become a Christian. Her piety, rather than manifesting itself in any pronounced form, was pervasive in character, showing itself in all her thoughts and actions. Passing as she did in the morning of life, the parting from her husband, family and friends was sad, but it is not fitting to speak of such as she as dead but as having passed on to that larger, fuller life, of which her own life was a beautiful forecast. The funeral address was delivered by the writer at Athens, Ill.

Book Notes.

We urge our friends and patrons to remember that the business of the Christian Publishing Company is by no means confined to the books which we ourselves publish, or to the works listed in our catalogues, or to those which we advertise, from time to time, in these columns. We do a general book business, and can supply, at the regular price, any book in print, no matter where or by whom published. We solicit correspondence regarding any desired volume. If you see, anywhere, an advertisement, review or notice of any book, and decide to purchase it, send your order to The Christian Publishing Company.

Two Bibles lie before the writer. Both are what are called "Teachers'" Bibles, containing extensive helps, aids, maps, etc. One of these was purchased in 1888, at a cost of $14. The other was purchased in 1901, for $5. The latter is by far the finer and better book. It is printed on the famous "India" paper, is bound and lined in the very finest, softest leather, is silk-sewed, has the fullest helps and aids and a comprehensive concordance, and the cost is only about one-third of the inferior book. This is told to illustrate how Bible prices have fallen during the past few years. Ten or fifteen years ago the man who wanted a fine Bible had to pay from $8 to $20 for it. Now he pays $3.50 to $5 and gets a better book. If your Bible is showing signs of wear and tear, has lost a few leaves, looks shabby and torn and has earned a right to be put on the retired list, let us sell you a new one. You will be surprised to learn how cheaply you can secure a fine Bible. Write to us about it.

The book of Alexander Procter's sermons, The Witness of Jesus, is having a very gratifying sale. We predicted that this volume would prove an exception to the rule that books of sermons are no longer read, and our prediction is being amply verified. Mr. Procter was an exceptional preacher, a great pulpit orator, and the sermons preserved in this book are his best, reported by competent stenographers and carefully edited and revised by J. H. Garrison. Every preacher will be helped and strengthened by the reading and re-reading of this book. Handsomely bound in cloth; 404 pages, 19 sermons; includes preface by J. H. Garrison and Memorial Address by T. P. Haley; fine full page portrait of Procter. Price, $1.25.

How to Understand and Use the Bible, by J. H. Bryan, is a little book that merits and is destined to have a wide popularity. It is just what its title indicates. It is a small book, but contains more real material than many a ponderous tome the size of an unabridged dictionary. Everything is "boiled down," and all superfluous words left out. The result is a little book that can be slipped in the pocket, which contains a complete guide and outline of Bible study. Cloth, 116 pages, 50 cents.

It is altogether likely that you, who read this paragraph, have some young friend—son, brother, niece, daughter, pupil or neighbor—who has never, apparently at least, taken any serious thought of life and its responsibilities, of duty and destiny, of character and its relation to success in this life and the life to come. If so, you can do nothing better than to give your friend that person a copy of What is Your Life? by W. J. Russell. Every line of this work is pure gold. Best of all, the book is readable. It is so interesting and entertaining, so enlivened with anecdote and illustration, that it will be read by those who most need its help—the young people who scorn the ordinary book of good advice, wherein the wisdom is often neutralized by a lot of foolishness and "rot" that will disgust any sensible person. He who reads the first chapter of What is Your Life? will surely read to the end. Price, $1.

by return mail." For the benefit of all our patrons, permit us to explain that this phrase means absolutely nothing, nowadays. What is the "return mail" at the present day? There is no such thing. Sixty years ago, when mails were few, and were carried on the stage-coach, this phrase had a meaning. The stage from New York, for example, went to Philadelphia, and, on arrival, rested until the next morning, when it started back. The man in New York who wanted a prompt reply from his correspondent in Philadelphia, urged him to answer "by return mail"—that is, to send his reply on the return trip of the same mail-coach that carried the letter to him. Nowadays the phrase means nothing. It is the rule in this office, to fill every order at the earliest possible moment. Nearly always, we are able to fill orders the day when they are received. No amount of reiterated injunctions about "return mail," "rush this order," "as soon as possible," will get your order filled any quicker than the simple—"For the enclosed $1 please send me The Christian System," for the reason that we always fill orders as soon as possible, and no matter how urgent the plea for haste, we cannot expedite an order more than "as soon as possible." See the point?

The Christian S. S. Lesson Commentary for 1902 is ready for delivery. As all our prominent, successful, up-to-date Sunday-school workers testify, this book is in a class all by itself.

There are other good commentaries on the S. S. lessons, and some really excellent ones, but none of them approach the Christian S. S. Lesson Commentary. It is the king of all helps for the superintendent, the teacher and the advanced pupil. It should be used by every Sunday-school teacher and officer and every pupil over sixteen years of age. It is a handsome volume of 391 pages, bound substantially, so that it will stand constant handling for a whole year without falling to pieces. The price ($1 for single copy and 75 cents where six or more are taken) is very cheap for such a book. We could print it on poor paper and bind it in a cheap manner, and so sell it for a few cents less, but it would be a poor policy. The book would fall to pieces before the year was done. We prefer to produce a Commentary that is first-class as to contents and cover, inside and outside. Remember, this book is now ready, and orders may be sent at any time.

LET us not think that God is limited to the church in carrying forward the interests of his kingdom. It is no doubt the principal agency, working directly to that end. But the family and the State are also agencies of God working for the moral welfare of mankind. The power not ourselves which makes for righteousness operates through channels of which we little dream. The resources of the Almighty are infinite. Science, art, invention, discovery, commerce, politics, social life, peace, war,—all these are laid under contribution, and are made to advance the domain of that kingdom which is to be a universal kingdom and to endure forever. The stars in their courses are arrayed on the side of those who stand for truth and righteousness. "All things work together for good to those who love God." None of God's earthly agencies are perfect. Men, organizations, institutions, methods, all are imperfect. But God knows how to use imperfect agents and agencies for bringing in His perfect reign. "When that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away."

Important Notice!

After much experience and careful deliberation we deem it necessary to announce a change of policy in regard to subscriptions to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Heretofore we have followed the general custom of publishers of religious journals by continuing the paper to the subscriber unless orders to the contrary were received. This has been done by us because it was the generally accepted way, and because we hoped to accommodate our subscribers by so doing. It has resulted not only in considerable financial loss to us, but, what is more regretted by us, our purpose has sometimes been misunderstood. What we intended as a kind consideration towards our patrons has not infrequently been regarded as an attempt to impose upon them.

We have given the subject much thought, and have, we believe, devised a method by which those who need a little time for payment of the subscription price may be indulged, and those who prefer the strictly cash in advance or discontinue policy may also be pleased.

Beginning with the new year, we will notify, some weeks in advance, those whose subscriptions expire with the month in which the notice is sent, to either remit the amount necessary for another year's subscription, or, if it is not convenient at that time, to fill out and sign an order for the continuance of the paper, with a promise to pay at some definite date within the year.

Suitable blanks for using either of these ways of renewing subscriptions will be inclosed with the notice. If neither is returned before the date of expiration, the paper will be promptly discontinued. We ask the hearty co-operation of all friends of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST in this effort to place subscription matters upon a mutually satisfactory basis.

Subscribers who are at present in arrears should, if possible, arrange to pay before January 1, 1902, or, if that is not convenient, let them write to us, and we will send one of the blanks referred to, which they may fill, sign and return. When these promissory orders are received subscription will be credited on our mailing list, and the orders filed for collection at the time they fall due.

Under this plan subscribers will have the privilege of paying at the time of the year most suited to their circumstances, arrearages will not swell to burdensome proportions, no one will receive the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST unless it has been definitely ordered, and the publishers, because of prompt payment, will be enabled to furnish a better paper to the readers. Some confusion may result during the time of transition from the one policy to the other. We shall exercise care to avoid mistakes, but if any should occur we ask our patrons to promptly call our attention to them, that we may make correction.

The Christian Lesson Commentary

— FOR 1902 —

ON THE INTERNATIONAL BIBLE STUDIES.

By W. W. DOWLING,

AUTHOR OF

The Bible Hand-Book, The Normal Instructor, The Guide Book, The Helping Hand, Editor of Our Young Folks, Etc.

THE CHRISTIAN LESSON COMMENTARY has for many years been the favorite help of the great majority of the leading Bible teachers and students among the Disciples of Christ, and is used more or less by the foremost instructors of all denominations. The Leading Publishing House of another well-known and influential Religious Body for the year 1901 used over 2,000 copies of the work, and they have already contracted for a still larger number for the year 1902.

THE VOLUME FOR 1902 has preserved all the distinctive features that made former issues so helpful and popular, and has added others equally valuable. There is a new classification of the material that will make the helps and suggestions more easily available.

1. The Exegetical Notes, which have always been a principal feature, are thorough and concise, and deal with the difficult points in the Scripture Text in a plain and practical way.

2. The Illustrative Notes are fuller than will be found in any other lesson help, and serve as side-lights to illuminate and reveal the inner meaning.

3. The Applicatory Notes are really Sermonic Outlines, and many ministers find them invaluable in the preparation of their discourses when they desire to preach on themes along the line of the International Bible Studies.

4. The Practical Notes, appended to each subdivision of every lesson, are a summing up of the teaching and a practical application, all ready for the use of both teacher and student.

5. The Suggestive Notes for teachers on each lesson are more complete than those found in any other Lesson Annual extant.

6. The Other Points of Excellence are Lesson Outlines, Chronological Tables, Maps, Diagrams, Blackboard Designs, Orders of Service, Engravings and Vocabularies.

THE STYLE AND PRICE are the same as heretofore. The volume is larger and fuller than any of its contemporaries, and, when size and quality are considered, much cheaper. It is printed on fine paper and substantially bound in cloth and sold at $1.00 per copy, prepaid. Per dozen, not prepaid, $9.00.

Orders for THE CHRISTIAN LESSON COMMENTARY should be sent as soon as possible, that teachers and students may have the book in time to prepare for the first Sunday of the New Year.

The New Lord Mayor of London.

As a decorative official, there are few dignitaries in England or anywhere else—royalty excepted—who can compete with the Lord Mayor of London for Solomonian splendor of raiment and lily-like freedom from serious business. On Nov. 9, Sir Joseph Dimsdale will become the five hundred and nineteenth occupant of this honorable office. The Lord Mayor receives in compensation for his services five times the salary of the President of the United States, and he can no more live within that income and perform the functions which are expected of him, than a congressman can live in Washington in the style which is conceived to be essential to his dignity without an independent income to supplement his five thousand a year. Fortunately Sir Joseph is rich and will be able to do things up as they ought to be done without going into the hands of a receiver. As representative of the dignity and prerogatives of the ancient city of London—not the whole vast modern city, with its widespread suburbs, but just the original square mile—it will be incumbent upon Sir Joseph to shine with great glory on the occasion of King Edward's coronation next year. Whenever the Lord Mayor appears, it is his duty to suggest, by his very presence if not by speech, the ancient burgher rights as limiting the royal prerogative, and so his very person becomes a sort of epitome of English constitutional history—the process by which those rights of the plebeian but prosperous town-dwellers were slowly won in the old days, and were set up as a bulwark against the caprice or tyranny of kings and nobles. Considering that he has thus to act as an important historic symbol, as well as to serve as a piece of bright-color decoration at official dinners and corner stone layings, we ought not to begrudge the Lord Mayor his large but insufficient salary, or point discourteous jests at the antique pageantry of his equipment.

The Schley Court of Inquiry.

The interest in the proceedings of the naval court, examining into the conduct of Admiral Schley, reached its culmination in the testimony of the Admiral himself on the 24th inst. He gave a very clear and graphic narration of the events leading up to and culminating in the destruction of Admiral Cervera's fleet at Santiago. In doing so his testimony conflicted, in a few particulars, with previous witnesses, such as Capts. Sigsbee, McCalla and others, whom he generously exonerated, however, from any intention of misrepresenting the facts. He claimed their memory was at fault in the particulars in which he was compelled to testify contrary to their statements. He disclaimed any disobedience to orders which he had received, and insisted that a proper translation of the dispatch would free him from such imputation. Other witnesses had previously placed the Admiral's conduct in much better light, and as it appears to laymen in naval science, the charges against the Admiral are in the main without adequate foundation. We will have to wait, however, until the court weighs all the conflicting testimony, considers all the facts bearing on the case impartially, and renders its verdict, to understand fully the merits of the case. There is the fullest confidence both in the capacity and integrity of the court over which Admiral Dewey presides, and its decision will no doubt be received by the great mass of American citizens whose judgments are unbiased by personal or party considerations. One thing is clear from all the evidence, and that is that the Spanish fleet was destroyed with neatness and dispatch, and it is to be profoundly regretted that there was any necessity for a court of inquiry to investigate the conduct of any of the gallant seamen who had a part in this great naval victory.

Theodore Roosevelt, LL. D.

The bi-centennial of Yale University held last week was the occasion of conferring a number of honorary degrees upon distinguished Americans and some foreigners. Among the former was the President of the United States. When the long list of distinguished names had been read with their honors, President Hadley, after an impressive pause, said: "There yet remains one name." Instantly the great audience arose. President Roosevelt also arose and the building rang with cheers. President Hadley explained that Yale had chosen Theodore Roosevelt for this honor before he became President, and that "all Yale men were now doubly honored by greeting the man and the President as a son of Yale." He further said: "Theodore Roosevelt, while you were yet a private citizen, we offered you most worthily the degree of LL. D. Since in His providence it has pleased God to give Theodore Roosevelt another title, we give him on that account a double portion of welcome. He is a Harvard man by nurture, but we are proud to think that in his democratic spirit, his broad national sympathies and above all his cleanness and purity and truth, he will be glad to be an adopted son of Yale." When the cheering permitted, President Roosevelt advanced and, bowing profoundly, said: "President Hadley, I have never yet worked at a task worth doing that I did not find myself working shoulder to shoulder with some son of Yale. I have never yet been in a struggle for righteousness and decency that there were not men of Yale to aid me and give me strength and courage." The exercises closed with the singing of "America" and the great audience dispersed.

General Miles' Report.

In his annual report Lieut.-Gen. Miles gives the total strength of the army at the present time as 84,513, of which number 33,874 are in the United States, 43,239 in the Philippines, 4,914 in Cuba, the remainder, in small detachments, being in Porto Rico, Hawaii, China and Alaska. He expects that the force in Cuba will be very much reduced and hopes the same will be true of the force in the Philippines. He believes that the army is governed too much from Washington, and that the various commanders are not given the authority which the law confers upon them, and recommends that decentralization be effected as far as possible. Referring to the army canteen, which was abolished by the army reorganization law, Gen. Miles says that no injury has resulted, and that the law in the main has been beneficial. The General has either failed to read the testimony of the daily papers on this question, or else he has discounted the value of such testimony and speaks from personal knowledge. The unanimity with which the daily press has sought to prejudice the public against this anti-canteen law is a phenomenon that needs investigation. Can it be true that these papers are so generally under the control of the liquor power? The people generally will accept Gen. Miles' judgment on this subject as against the prejudiced reports of the daily papers.

The Fall Elections.

Some of the elections, which will occur in several of the states within a few days, involve questions which make them objects of national interest. The municipal campaigns in New York and Philadelphia have already been freely commented upon. In both cities there is a fusion of reform elements to drive out of power a corrupt party ring—a Democratic ring in New York, a Republican ring in Philadelphia. Iowa, Ohio, Virginia and New Jersey will elect governors. In all of these states there is enough uncertainty about the outcome to make it interesting. Of greater general interest, however, are those campaigns which will issue in the election of legislatures that will have the choice of United States senators, viz.: Maryland, Ohio, Kentucky, Iowa and Arkansas. In Maryland the fight is virtually for and against Gorman. His recent enforced retirement was announced prematurely as his political funeral. He is trying to come to. In addition to a large amount of natural vitality, he is favored by the new election law which, while entirely impartial in principle, will inevitably tend for the present toward a reduction of the Republican majority, if not its annihilation. Mr. Gorman's resurrection and return to the senate would be regretted by most people who prefer clean politics to dirty politics. The re-election of Senator Foraker is dependent upon the election of a Republican legislature in Ohio. Iowa is having a more than usually interesting contest, owing partly to the bringing up of the liquor question again as an issue. A legislature and a full ticket of state officers are to be elected. Senator Dolliver, who was appointed by the governor to fill the vacancy left by the death of Senator Gear, will probably be elected if the Republicans win. In Kentucky not only is there a seat in the senate at stake, but the new legislature will have the task of redistricting the state. At special elections four congressmen will be chosen to fill the vacancies occasioned by the death of Marshall Brosius, of Pennsylvania, A. D. Shaw, of New York, J. W. Stokes, of South Carolina, and R. E. Burke, of Texas.

Facts About the Louisiana Purchase. In view of the coming centennial celebration of the Louisiana Purchase the government Bureau of Statistics has compiled some facts and figures regarding that territory which are of more general interest than most of its statistical bulletins. To begin with, the territory secured at this purchase more than doubled the area of the United States, being larger by forty-four thousand square miles than the original thirteen states. Fourteen states and territories, in whole or in part, have been carved out of this vast domain and its population has grown from less than 100,000 to 14,708,616. It is largely owing to the growth of population in the Louisiana Purchase that the center of population of the country has during the past century moved from the longitude of Washington, D. C., to central Indiana. The agricultural products of this territory are rich in variety and stupendous in quantity. Of its greatest crops, wheat and corn, it produced last year respectively two hundred and sixty-four million bushels and over one billion bushels, with an aggregate value of nearly five hundred million dollars. Adding to this the value of the hay, oats, potatoes, barley, rye and cotton, the rapidly increasing output of wool from the ranges of the northwest, the beet sugar from the middle west, the livestock and the dairy products, the total value of the agricultural products of the Louisiana Purchase easily amounts to a billion and a half dollars a year. There were those who thought that the purchase price paid to Napoleon, $15,000,000, was extravagant. But a one per cent. tax on the agricultural products of the territory—not the property, but only the products—for a single year would pay back the amount invested. And no mention has yet been made of its mineral output. If there is any event in our national history worthy of commemoration by an international exposition, surely this has a fair claim. Only eighteen months from now the gates of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition are expected to swing open. It will be the biggest rush-job of building ever done in this country, if it is finished on time. Within the past two weeks the grounds have begun to reflect the activity which has been for a year in the minds of the planners and designers. Lagoons are being drained, commanding hilltops destined to be the sites of the finest buildings are being denuded of their forest trees, and valley and plain are bristling with surveyors' stakes. Within a few days the diggers will begin their work. The process of building an exposition of such magnificent proportions in a year and a half will itself be as good an exhibit of the skill and speed of American artisanship as the Louisiana Purchase can give.

United States Exports. According to the comparative figures prepared each month by the Treasury Bureau of Statistics, exhibiting the imports and exports of each of the principal countries of the world and the average per month during a given period, the United States continues at the head of the list of the world's exporting nations. These figures show that the domestic exports from the United States are greater than those of any other country, and that the monthly average during the year 1901 has been higher than that of any other country. Not only do these totals of the exports of various countries during the latest years show that the United States is clearly in the lead as an exporter, but they show that the growth in her exports has been more rapid than that of any other great exporting nation. In the year 1900 the figures for the United States were $1,453,013,659 of exports of domestic products against $497,263,737 in 1875, an increase of nearly two hundred per cent. during that period, while the increase in Germany and in the United Kingdom was only about forty per cent. It is this growth of our export trade, not only of products of the soil but of manufactures, that has produced the uneasiness which is now manifested, on the continent of Europe, particularly, about American trade competition.

The New St. Louis. It is not the Greater St. Louis so much as the New St. Louis that is just now agitating the citizens of this great metropolis of the Mississippi Valley. The preliminary step to the New St. Louis was the election held last week for the adoption of certain charter amendments, five in number, giving enlarged powers of taxation to the city and providing for a distribution of expense in street improvements and for enlarged facilities in the way of hospitals and other public institutions. The amendments were adopted by overwhelming majorities, showing that the sentiment of the people is practically unanimous that the city has outgrown the limitations of the charter of 1875 and must have enlarged powers for dealing with the problems of growth and improvement which now confront it. Not only does the Louisiana Purchase Exposition of 1903 act as a mighty incentive to hurry up these improvements, but the growth of the city imperatively demands the legislation which has been passed and the improvements to which it looks. Already steps are being taken by the city authorities to plan the needed street improvements and the requisite buildings for city institutions, and the next few years are likely to witness unwonted activity in this city, to which the eyes of the world are now turning.

Brevities.

The assassin of President McKinley was electrocuted according to the sentence placed upon him, in the prison at Auburn, N. Y., Tuesday morning, the 29th, at 7:30, in the presence of the officers of the Auburn prison and a few other persons especially invited. He seems to have come to his death without penitence, without confession of sin or without any appreciation of the enormity of his crime.

Cecil Rhodes has a great brain for schemes. When he and Barney Barnato were rivals in diamond selling in South Africa he suggested to Barnato, who had an immense quantity of precious stones ready to sell, that he have his picture taken with a big bucket of diamonds of all sizes at his side. Barnato fell into the trap. It took six weeks to separate and classify the diamonds. In the meanwhile Rhodes had quietly forestalled him by putting his own diamonds on the market.

The Evangelical Alliance of St. Louis passed a resolution at its last meeting requesting the World's Fair officials to erect a building for religious purposes within the grounds of the Fair. Catholics, Protestants and Jews all unite in this request. A religious parliament is not contemplated, but such exhibits as the various religious bodies may wish to make and such conventions as they may wish to hold.

A cable dispatch has been received at Washington announcing the election of President Castro, of Venezuela, who has been provisional president for one year. The term for president is six years and the election of President Castro at the present time is evidence of the popular endorsement of his administration. It is believed by the Venezuelan Consulate in New York that the revolution, so far as Venezuela is concerned, is quashed.

The latest word from Miss Stone, the kidnapped missionary, is a cablegram to the effect that the Bulgarian government has formally assured the United States Diplomatic Agent, Dickinson, that Miss Ellen M. Stone will be restored in safety to the American mission at Samakov. Mr. Dickinson says he has entirely satisfactory proof that she is alive and in good health. The proof comes from one of the brigands who hold her in captivity. No money is to be paid for her ransom until she is returned as the Bulgarian government promises that she shall be.

One of the bloodiest battles in the race war at the south for many years occurred on Sunday night, the 27th, at Balltown, Washington Parish, La. The result of the conflict has been 34 persons killed, including four or five white persons. The trouble began at a negro camp-meeting which was in progress at Live Oak church, three miles from Balltown. A pitched battle took place between them and a posse of white men gathered by the constable of the district to investigate the report that a restaurant was being operated without a license at the church. The battle was begun by the blacks themselves. The governor was telegraphed for troops to quell the riot and quiet has at last been restored. The inflamed condition of the colored population is said to be due to the recent burning in Balltown of a negro for assaulting and almost murdering the wife of a prominent store-keeper.

A composite photograph of a group of individuals, as our readers understand, is one which combines, in a single picture, the principal features of the individuals of the group, so as to produce a picture, not of any one individual, but a representative picture containing the essential features of all. Is it not possible to produce a composite mental and spiritual photograph of the convention, embracing the essential teaching and spirit of the whole body? In looking at the convention in retrospect it has occurred to us that some such picture is possible, and we here attempt it.

The difficulty of the task is lessened somewhat by the fact that the men who attend our national conventions, and who are heard upon its platform, and who speak and vote upon the different measures presented for consideration, are entitled to be regarded as fairly representative men. Extremists, as a rule, whether they be of the rear extreme, or of the front extreme, or of the right or left extreme, do not find themselves in a congenial atmosphere in our national conventions. And yet, it was not difficult to detect shades of thought which, while they differ in tone and color, nevertheless blend into one harmonious picture. Some speakers, for instance, would emphasize one class of truths and some another, while neither would deny the truths which the other stressed. It was a difference of emphasis, or, if you please, of color. This has always existed and will always exist, even when our Savior's prayer for unity among his disciples shall have been fulfilled. It is as noticeable among the apostles as it is among an equal number of our representative men. This grows out of the fact that truth, to be vital, must come through a man, being modified by personality. It is the truth which fits into our personal experience, and which has passed through the alembic of our own life, that we preach or present with power, and no other.

This composite picture of the convention receives as much tone or color from what was universally assumed as from what was categorically stated. There was no address that specifically argued the necessity of the new birth, the Pauline doctrine of justification by faith, or that Christianity is pre-eminently a spiritual religion rather than a religion of forms and ceremonies; and yet no one who attended the convention was in doubt as to its position on any of these fundamental truths. They constituted the atmosphere of the convention, so to speak. It is no longer deemed necessary to argue matters universally recognized to be true. There were, of course, many passages in many of the addresses, and doubtless many more in the sermons preached on the Lord's day, which either referred to or implied all these truths. But, as we have said, these things were assumed rather than argued. It would not be out of place, however, even in a missionary convention, to have an occasional sermon which would lay special stress upon these great vital truths of our common Christianity.

The divinity, the Lordship, the supreme authority of Jesus Christ, stands out as a prominent feature of this composite picture. Scarcely any speaker, no matter what his theme, failed to exalt Christ as the one to whom every knee, yea, and every intellect and every conscience and every will, must bow. If we can only be as faithful in living this vital truth as we are in proclaiming it, we have nothing to fear as to the future.

The necessity of bringing about that unity among believers for which Christ prayed, in order to the carrying out of Christ's plan in the conversion of the world, was another noticeable feature of this composite picture. There was due recognition of whatever progress has been made in this direction, but no note of satisfaction with present attainments was sounded. We have not yet attained, or have not yet apprehended that for which we have been apprehended by Christ, but this one thing we do, we press on steadily toward the goal of a reunited christendom. Any one wholly unacquainted with our position and teaching, attending this convention, would have been convinced that we are a people devoted to the plea for unity among Christians.

But along with this plea for unity there was never absent the essential corollary, namely, the return to the original foundation of the church and to the Christianity of Christ and of his apostles, in order to the realization of such unity. No thought was expressed that a divine unity might be realized on a human platform made up of compromises. Charity there must be and forbearance in things not essential, and the largest freedom consistent with loyalty to Christ. But on matters fundamental there must be unity. In a word, we must unite on the things on which we agree, and not divide on the things on which we differ.

Still another feature of the mental and spiritual picture which the convention presented was that of liberty. Christ is an emancipator, and we are to "stand fast in the liberty wherewith He hath made us free." We are to call no man Master but Christ, and owning allegiance to Him we are free from bondage to all human authority. Within the limits of loyalty to Christ, there is vast room for progress in the knowledge of truth, and no man may seek to hinder this progress.

And then there was that crowning feature of all grace and beauty, the element of love, without which there can be no unity among ourselves or with others and no motive adequate for Christian service and sacrifice. This feature did not lack clear and forcible statement from several of the speakers, but its finest illustration was in the spirit which prevailed in the convention. The kindness and fraternity with which differing views were received, the spirit manifested towards our brethren of other names who sent fraternal greetings, showed that the heart of the convention was beating steadily and strongly in unison with that of the Master with love for all men.

In a former article we have already referred to the characteristic optimism or spirit of hopefulness that was so manifest throughout the convention. Nothing could be more significant than this confident expectation of victory on every battle-field where the right and the wrong grapple with each other in decisive conflict. The world will be evangelized. Christians will be united. Christ's kingdom must prevail over all. The saloon must go, and with it all the sad train of evils that follow in its wake. And all this because God lives, because Christ has risen from the dead, and is leading on His gathering hosts to certain victory.

As one looks upon that composite picture it seems to take on the lineaments of the Master's face, and we cannot doubt that He was with us, and that His spirit was the controlling force and factor in all its proceedings. To His blessed name be glory and dominion now and evermore!

Business in Religious Journalism.

On the second page of this number of the paper will be found a statement by the Christian Publishing Company under the title "Important Notice," to which we invite the careful attention of all our readers. The course outlined in that notice is the result of long experience in religious journalism. It is designed to remove an objection which is often raised against subscribing for a religious journal, namely: That the paper is not likely to stop at the time when the order expires, and subscribers are forced often to receive and pay for a paper sent to them after the time for which they subscribed and paid has expired. The law provides that persons receiving the paper from the post office are under obligations to pay for it even after the time for which they originally subscribed has expired, the receiving of the paper being regarded as prima facie evidence of the purpose on the part of the subscriber to continue his subscription. We do not care to take advantage of this provision of the law to increase our circulation. We prefer that all our patrons shall be voluntary subscribers, receiving the paper for the time for which they have ordered it and no longer. There has been altogether too little business in the business side of religious journalism, and this has resulted in a good deal of dissatisfaction among patrons of religious journals. The objection seems to us well founded and our purpose is to remove it, as far as the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is concerned.

It will be seen that the arrangement outlined in the statement from the publishers does not contemplate the discontinuance of the paper at the end of the time paid for, provided the subscriber wishes to continue to receive it, whether he is able to pay at the time or not. If unable to remit the cash with his order for renewal, promptly at the expiration of his time, he is to at least order the paper continued to his address on a blank enclosed to him for that purpose, stating at what time during the year it will be convenient for him to remit. The theory is that those who are able to pay for a paper at all will be able to do so at some time within the circle of a year. No paper, therefore, will be continued a longer time than one year beyond the expiration of the time paid for, unless special arrangements be made to that effect. It seems to us that this plan will serve the interests of both subscribers and publishers. It is substituting business methods for the loose, haphazard way of continuing subscriptions which prevails in too many newspaper offices.

As we have adopted this method with a view to accommodating our subscribers and removing a source of objection and dissatisfaction on their part, we should be glad to have an expression from them of their approval of the plan elsewhere outlined. We believe that business has its place in religion as well as religion in business, and that the best way to keep on good terms with all our patrons is to deal with them on fair business principles.

The Closing Sessions of the Convention.

Our space was exhausted last week before we could give a report of the Wednesday night and Thursday sessions of the Minneapolis convention and it seemed better to postpone than to unduly condense that report.

The Wednesday night session was occupied by addresses by A. B. Phillips, of Augusta, Ga., and F. D. Power, of Washington, D. C. The former was printed in full in our columns last week. Bro. Power's address was probably the most adequate all-round presentation of the position of the Disciples of Christ that was given at the convention. It was an exposition of the spirit of our movement as well as of its doctrines. Three points were made to stand out in bold relief as the characteristics of our plea: loyalty to Christ and the full recognition of his authority, as the fundamental principle of our movement and of universal human duty; liberty to think and act for ourselves in all matters of method and expediency, so that, while walking in the old paths and holding fast to the truth once for all delivered, there shall still be progress and growth and the readiness to welcome all new truth; love as the spirit of Christ and the spirit in which we must both maintain our loyalty and exercise our liberty. The plea for union requires all three of these elements and the plea is lost if it is pressed in a sectarian and unloving spirit. As the plea for union is the supreme embodiment of love toward all our fellow Christians, so the plea for missions is the highest expression of love for sinful men. Now abide, as the basal principles of our religious movement, these three: loyalty, liberty and love—but the greatest of these is love.

The Benevolent Association.

The Thursday morning session was devoted to the related interests: the National Benevolent Association, the Education Society and the Christian Endeavor. The convention did itself slight credit by the comparatively small attendance during the presentation of these important matters. Mrs. H. M. Meier, of St. Louis, president of the National Benevolent Association of the Christian Church, made an address on the work of the association. True greatness in our day, she said, is recognized as being neither of the muscles nor of the intellect, but of the heart, and the highest phase of human endeavor is found in the struggle for the life of others. The benevolent work of our churches represents a plea for everybody that is homeless and friendless. The National Benevolent Association now supports three homes: The Orphans' Home in St. Louis with over one hundred children, the Mothers' and Babies' Home with fifty babies under two years old, and the Old People's Home in Jacksonville, Ill. It owns property valued at $46,500 upon which there is a debt of only $8,000. The association was organized in 1886 at a meeting in the office of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Since the establishment of the Orphans' Home, 1,163 children have been cared for, about 500 have been sent into Christian homes and more than 20 who are now grown have become honorably self-supporting. This year 106 have been sent into Christian homes and the demand for children is greater than the supply. The managers of the association believe that the proper place for a child is in a home and not in an orphanage, and they aim, therefore, not to keep the children indefinitely but to find for them homes where they will be sure of considerate treatment and proper training. Since the establishment of the Orphans' Home 139 of the children have intelligently confessed Christ. Last year the total receipts were $23,000, including $3,000 in annuities and $1,800 in bequests, in addition to which nine persons have notified the board that they have remembered the association in their wills. It was suggested, and the applause of the audience approved the suggestion, that there should be a unification of our various benevolent enterprises under a single board, to have charge not only of these homes but of the Louisville Orphans' Home and of the work of Ministerial Relief. Such a sensible suggestion, to apply to our benevolent work the same principle which we have already applied to our missionary work, is sure to be adopted in time.

G. L. Snively, general secretary of the Benevolent Association, followed in an address, setting forth the place of benevolence in the church's work and the need for increased emphasis upon it. The church can win its way against the lodge only by doing its duty toward the poor. The popularity of the lodge springs chiefly from its benevolence and the church ought not to allow the impression to get abroad that any organization is a more effective exponent of Christ's great principle of brotherly love than the church of Christ. The problem of the unequal distribution of wealth is recognized by statesmen as being among the most serious problems growing out of our modern civilization. It can be solved by the church and by the church alone. But to solve it the church must restore the apostolic emphasis upon this feature of its work.

Christian Endeavor.

C. S. Medbury, of Angola, Ind., spoke in behalf of Christian Endeavor. His address was marked by the fervid earnestness and clear-cut statement which all who know him recognize as characteristic of the man. The chief end of Christian Endeavor, he said, is equipment for intelligent service in the kingdom of God. An emotional thrill is not enough, though we recognize the value of zeal. There is a need of the zeal that is according to knowledge and that is chastened by the burden of the world's redemption. What sort of training is necessary for intelligent service? Training in at least three special lines: 1. Instruction in the Word of God. The light that streams into the deepest recesses of the soul should be light from above, as the light that came into Campbell's study came through sky-lights and not through windows. Our young people should be sent to the sources for a knowledge of our plea. 2. Instruction in the world's needs, or in missions. An occasional missionary sermon, racking men's nerves by an emotional presentation of the pathos of missionary work, is not enough. There must be an acquaintance with the facts so that the people can think intelligently about missions, for only by thinking intelligently can they be led to feel continuously. 3. Instruction in the history of our people. We need to learn what our fathers have done, both for its examples and for its warnings, and we need to learn to unite courage and courtesy in our presentation of truth as they united them.

The Education Society.

The remainder of the morning session was devoted to the American Christian Education Society, with its president, F. D. Power, in the chair. After an introductory statement by the president, the secretary's report was read with some comments by W. E. Garrison in the absence of H. L. Willett. Brief addresses were made by A. B. Philpott, W. F. Richardson and A. McLean. The latter spoke of the beginnings of educational work among the Disciples of Christ. At first Alexander Campbell thought we had no need of colleges and said that college-trained preachers could be understood only by college-trained audiences. Later he changed his mind on this point, founded Bethany College and in his later years laid great stress on the necessity of education. But he died a rich man and left but little to the college which he had founded. From that day to this our colleges have never been adequately endowed and their equipment has been meager even as compared with that of other insufficiently endowed schools.

The Education Society is designed to occupy something of the same relation toward our educational work that the home and foreign societies occupy toward our missionary work. The charters of the colleges amply protect them against undue encroachments and assumptions of authority, but there is much that the society can do toward the unification of our educational enterprises and toward increasing the efficiency of all of them. This is our newest co-operative work and we shall give our readers further information concerning it from time to time. A life membership in this society costs $10 a year for five years and an annual membership $5 a year. Enrollment cards were passed and seventeen life members and four annual members were enrolled.

The Section Meetings.

The lack of time to give all of these related interests such a representation upon the general program of the convention as they desired and deserved made it necessary to have three simultaneous meetings Thursday afternoon for the discussion of benevolences, education and the work of pastors and evangelists.

Benevolences.

The benevolent section of the session was called to order at 2 P. M. by J. H. Garrison, who after calling upon Bro. E. B. Redd to lead in prayer, and a song, made a few introductory remarks and introduced Mrs. H. M. Meier, who gave a brief address and, taking charge of the meeting, called upon the various officers of the Benevolent Association for their reports. These included reports from the National Christian Orphans' Home, St. Louis, Mrs. Rowena Mason, president; New York Home for the Aged, East Aurora, N. Y., Mrs. William K. Tabor, corresponding secretary; National Old People's Home, Jacksonville, Ill., Mrs. O. L. Hill, secretary; Mothers' and Babies' Home, St. Louis, Mo., Mrs. O. C. Shedd, corresponding secretary; Christian Home, Hot Springs, Ark., T. Nelson Kincaid, president. These were all of a gratifying character. W. J. Hastie, of Iowa, moved that a committee be appointed by the advisory board at St. Louis to confer with other branches of benevolent work being carried on among us, with a view to bringing them all under one general management in order to economy and efficiency of administration. This motion unanimously prevailed. W. F. Richardson, of Kansas City, was then introduced and made a very strong appeal for benevolent work, which carried deep conviction as to its necessity and importance to every one present. It lifted this great department of our work up into its proper place and some of the sisters tried in broken speech to thank him for the service he had rendered the cause so near to their hearts, but their words failed them. George L. Snively pronounced the benediction and thus brought to a close one of the most deeply religious and spiritual meetings which we have ever attended in connection with one of our national conventions—a meeting which we venture to predict will have far-reaching results for good.

Education.

W. B. Craig, chancellor of Drake University, was chosen as chairman and an address was delivered by A. B. Philputt on "College Endowment" which appears in full elsewhere in this paper. Following this there was a general discussion of the paper and of the question, "How can the society best serve the colleges?" The discussion was participated in by W. P. Aylesworth of Cotner University, who referred to Chancellor Samuel as founder of the school of prophets and organizer of the first education society in Israel; Prof. Hull, of Oskaloosa, who taught at Hiram with Garfield and roomed with him when they each received $400 a year for their services; Errett Gates, W. B. Craig, W. E. Garrison, W. S. Hoye, Prof. Youngblood, of Canton, B. B. Tyler and F. D. Power. There was unanimity in the opinion that our colleges ought to co-operate more than they do and that they would all be benefited by the existence of an Education Society with a general secretary in the field to arouse a practical interest in education, disseminate information in regard to our schools and encourage gifts for educational purposes, as the missionary secretaries do for the cause of missions.

Pastors and Evangelists.

This, despite the fact that a large number of delegates had returned home, was one of the most largely attended and spirited sessions of the convention, and showed unmistakably the large place evangelism occupies in the hearts of the disciples. The chairman, Geo. F. Hall, of Chicago, proved a most capable presiding officer, and though the meeting, through its great abundance of material, went far beyond the time limit, so practical was the session and of such richness of contribution, that the interest was unabated at the very close. The addresses were characteristic. There is a long distance between Updike and

Wilson, between Hall and Scoville, in manner and matter—individualistic these to the very core—yet all effective and through rich variety of methods advancing the cause of Christ.

J. V. Updike spoke on "What Must I Preach to be Saved?" and though perchance his blade has not the scimitar smoothness of Wilson's, it hews and cleaves its way through mighty oppositions.

Mrs. Clara Hazelrigg, of Topeka, Kan., furnished not simply novelty as the woman evangelist, but pertinent, pithy comment, as well as things weighty, and whatever may be thought of her exegesis, of her attractiveness as a speaker there can be no doubt. Her subject: "Help Those Men."

The address following, by H. O. Breeden, of Des Moines, was informing and inspirational, the speaker declaring his firm belief in evangelism and evangelistic methods.

C. R. Scoville, coming after with his impassioned speech on "The Evangelistic Spirit of the Apostolic Church," laid a yet stronger emphasis on Dr. Breeden's plea for the recognition of present-day evangelism by the churches of Christ. Bro. Scoville, instead of a peroration, gave his concluding minutes to a helpful discussion of evangelistic problems through his novel printed list of questions handled in "query box" manner.

One of the most practical papers of the session was then read by I. J. Cahill, of Dayton, O., on "Holding the New Converts." The paper was illustrated by the author's personal experience in his own great home-meeting. It was fitting that Allen Wilson, whose first phenomenal meeting was with Bro. Cahill, should have followed, and a worthy climax of a great convention was his masterful address on "The Christ for the People."

After a solo by Frank C. Houston, J. H. O. Smith read the report of the committee appointed at the conference of evangelists on the preceding afternoon, recommending that the evangelistic session become a permanent feature of the convention, and that a committee be appointed to inquire into the feasibility of creating an evangelistic board, whose duty should be the general superintendence of evangelism among our people. The report was enthusiastically and unanimously adopted.

After the presentation of Bro. Holman, of Iowa, a cultured preacher who has just come into our ranks from the Congregational Church, by the president-elect of the convention, the session was adjourned.

Editor's Easy Chair.

Once more the shadow of the death-angel's wing has fallen upon our company, and one of the faithfulest of our number has been called away. His sun went down ere it was yet noon. Oh the mystery and majesty of death! With what different eyes men look upon it! With the pagan it is the passing into the land of gloom and shadows. It is the end of all human joy and happiness. No ray of hope, no note of gladness, ever enters that dismal abode. To the materialist death is an eternal sleep. With the dissolution of the body comes the end of all power to think, or love, or hate, or desire. It is the end of all human hopes and aspirations. Human life hath these two boundaries—the cradle and the grave.

Beyond death there is nothingness, absolute vacancy. Those whom we have loved and followed to the grave are lost, not gone before. So of the vast multitudes who have lived and died, and whose lives have made this world luminous. Abraham, Moses, Isaiah, Jesus, Paul, John, not to mention the martyrs and reformers of all the ages, and the master spirits in other spheres of life—all these were, but are not! They are as nonexistent as if they had never been! Jesus and Pilate, Paul and Nero, are all the same now, and one has no advantage over the other! Such a view is sanctioned as little by reason as by faith.

What is the Christian view of death? That it is transition from the material to the spiritual, and not cessation of conscious being. It is not the end, but a new beginning of life. It is the spirit breaking away from fleshly limitations and entering upon a broader career of activity. It is the caged eagle escaping from its prison, and soaring through the vast empyrean. It is the weary mariner, reaching the desired haven and finding shelter from the pitiless storm. It is the homesick wanderer returning to the parental roof. It is the slave, leaving behind him his chains and breathing the sweet air of liberty. It is moving out of the old tent, worn and weather-beaten, into the new house with its many mansions; from the dissolving tabernacle of clay into "the house of God, not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." It is closing one's eyes on mortal scenes to open them upon visions of wondrous beauty and glory. It is passing from the sad farewells of earth to the joyous welcome of loved ones waiting on the heavenly shore. It is the soul saying "Good-night" on earth to hear the "Good-morning" of heaven.

In his posthumous work entitled "Everlasting Life," John Fiske has left his view of death, as seen from the point of view of a scientist who believes in God and immortality:

"That solemn moment in which, for those who have gone before and for us who are to follow, the eye of sense beholds naught save the ending of the world, the entrance upon a black and silent eternity, the eye of faith declares to be the supreme moment of a new birth for the disenthralled soul, the introduction to a new era of life compared with which the present one is not worthy of the name. Who can tell but that this which we call life is really death, from which what we call death is an awakening? From this vantage ground of thought the human soul comes to look without dread upon the termination of this terrestrial existence. The failure of the bodily powers, the stoppage of the fluttering pulse, the cold stillness upon the features so lately wreathed in smiles of merriment, the corruption of the tomb, the breaking of the ties of love, the loss of all that has given value to existence, the dull blankness of irremediable sorrow, the knell of everlasting farewells—all this is seized upon by the sovereign imagination of man and transformed into a scene of transcending glory, such as in all the vast career of the universe is reserved for humanity alone. In the highest of creatures the divine immanence has acquired sufficient concentration and steadiness to survive the dissolution of the flesh and assert an individuality untrammelled by the limitations which in the present life everywhere persistently surround it. Upon this view death is not a calamity but a boon, not a punishment inflicted upon man, but the supreme manifestation of his exceptional prerogative as chief among God's creatures."

The Fountains of Life: Instincts*

By EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES

At the present time there is great interest in the beginnings of things. When and how did our earth, its seas and continents, plants and animals, races and nations, arise? Psychology has done much to explain the first stages of human life in the individual and society. The fountains from which the stream flows and by which it is everywhere sustained are the native impulses and instincts. These hidden springs lie in the depths of nature and of man, and constitute the inner, impelling force which drives the race on from savagery to civilization, from helpless infancy to ripened age.

The creative forces which determine the truly human aspect of our lives lie within us, "not in our stars." A dog reared as a human child would still remain a dog, while the child under the same environment becomes a rational, social being. The most essential elements for the attainment of manhood are wrapped up in the organization and inherent constitution of the individual. External conditions may free these energies and give them direction, but never could supply them. Education, the social atmosphere, all the agencies of the world, simply wait and serve the powers which unfold from within. The fountains of life determine what the stream shall be.

Differences in Instincts.

Each species of beings is marked by certain characteristic ways. When a kitten and puppy confront each other even for the first time, they display radical traits. The one bows its back, fluffs its fur, spits out its wrath and strikes with its paw. The other lowers on all fours, spreads its feet, wags its tail, yelps out its threats, and jumps about to inspire terror. Again, the robins choose worms; the squirrels, nuts; the cows, grass for food. The child likewise has his own ways of "re-acting" to things about him. But he differs from all the lower animals in that he develops more slowly and through a much longer period than they.

The child alone has any considerable period of infancy—that is, a period of helplessness and training. The calf and colt can walk the first day of life, while the baby accomplishes the art at the age of a year or more. The lower animals have little to do in the world and their machinery is about as well adapted to their tasks during the first weeks of life as it ever can be. But man has much to do and each generation has new lessons to learn, so that it is impossible for the human being to be ready for all his duties until a long education has given form and efficiency to his numerous impulses and instincts. The meaning of infancy, which is peculiar to man is, therefore, twofold. It signifies the complexity of human life and the possibility of new developments in each generation. The condition of growth, of the enrichment and cumulative value of life, is that the nervous system, as the carrier of character, shall remain plastic and impenetrable through many years. The inherited structure must be pliable and permeable, so that the manifold currents from all directions may combine in ever increasing freedom and variety in each human child.

The Number of Instincts.

Instincts are the experiences of the race, registered in the structure of the individual. Consequently, the higher the race, the more numerous the instincts. Man, therefore, is blessed with more than any other being. The old saying that the animals are ruled by instinct but man by reason, is only half true. Man's reason is in its heart instinctive, and no other creature carries in himself such numerous and complex springs of action. Many of these are most definite and, therefore, easily recognized in the child, but they operate through life. "Sneezing, snuffing, snoring, coughing, sighing, sobbing, gagging, vomiting, hiccoughing, starting, moving the limbs when touched, hanging by the hands, biting, clasping objects, carrying them to the mouth, sitting up, standing, creeping and walking" are early manifest. Later come imitation, emulation, pugnacity, fear of definite objects, sympathy, shyness and sociability, play, curiosity, acquisitiveness, the hunting instinct, modesty, love, parental instinct, until at the age of fifteen the list is complete, though they continue to well up through the whole life as the sources of vitality and achievement. If man seems to have few instincts, it is because they have become embedded in habits. It is a mistake to suppose that the instincts do not exist or have been lost. The constructive instinct lives in the mechanical engineer, pugnacity in the soldier, love in the parent, curiosity in the scholar, acquisitiveness in the merchant, and sociability in all.

Order and Transiency.

Casual observation reveals the fact that there is a fairly fixed order in which the instincts assert themselves. Creeping, walking, climbing, constitute successive uses of the limbs. Cooing, significant vocalizations, individual words, sentences, form a progressive series. Infancy is largely occupied with appetitive and motor impulses; the second three years with the growth of language, imitative play, the refinements of sense perception and motor control, and the vivid creations and projections of the imagination. From six to twelve interest develops with reference to natural objects, personal histories, elementary social conditions, and consequently in the means for understanding these, such as language, numbers and experimentation. Music, drawing, modeling, manual training and gymnastics are proving themselves vitally adapted to the interests of this period.

After the age of fourteen a profound revolution occurs in the whole nature of the individual. He enters upon the period of adolescence, the sexual instinct matures, social and altruistic motives arise, the restraints of home and school become irksome, intellectual doubt appears, adventuresome exploits attract and the perspective of manhood's vision unfolds. Fortunate indeed is he whose environment furnishes the proper nourishment for each appetite as it develops. Such an one may become a perfectly rounded nature, symmetrical, poised and efficient. Without the proper incentives and materials to work upon, the nature may be dwarfed and perverted, for there are certain seasons when the fountains of life are opened. If they are polluted the stream remains impure; if they are obstructed, the stream recedes.

The transiency and flexibility of instincts may be best illustrated in the lower orders. The instinct to follow moving objects is ripe in the chick as it emerges from the shell. If separated from the mother hen it will easily follow another hen, a duck, or anything which will pay it the slightest attention. Even a man can in this way become the leader of a brood. But on the other hand, if the chick is blindfolded for three days it will then ignore the mother hen and be a wanderer from the fold to the end of its days. In the same way instincts are man's opportunities. If taken at their best, they lead to power; if neglected, weakness ensues; if perverted, disaster supervenes.

Here is a child always eager to draw, using every paper and pencil obtainable to satisfy his craving. But it is all merely bother to his elders, and at last the paper and pencil are reluctantly laid aside, and the art instinct is atrophied and lost forever. Through life sketches and paintings stir pangs of regret, and the memory of defeated ambition. The iron must be shaped while it is hot. In intellectual, social and moral culture the same great law operates. The poverty of many a puritanical home has not only robbed childhood of legitimate joys, but has deprived manhood of appreciation, if not skill, in the arts and in the harmless "ways of the world." "Compare the accomplished gentleman with the poor artisan or tradesman of a city: during the adolescence of the former, objects appropriate to his growing interests, bodily and mental, were offered as fast as the interests awoke, and as a consequence, he is armed and equipped at every angle to meet the world. Over the city poor boy's youth no such golden opportunities were hung, and in his manhood no desires for most of them exist. Fortunate it is for him if gaps are the only anomalies his instinctive life presents; perversions are too often the fruit of his unnatural bringing-up."

Practical Points.

A study of instinct is modifying the whole conception of child life and introducing new methods of training into the home, the school and the church. An acquaintance with the saner child-study of to-day affords parents better means of control and more sympathy with the difficul-

*This is the first of a brief series of articles in which Dr. Ames will present, in popular and untechnical form, some of the contributions of modern psychology toward the interpretation of life. Anyone who reads even this first article will be convinced that psychology is not an abstract science, but a most concrete and vital study, throbbing with human interest. Subsequent articles in this series will be as follows:

The Floodtide of Life: Adolescence.
The Channels of Life: Habit.
The Inner Light of Life: Imagination.
The Workman of Life: Will.
The Warmth of Life: Emotion.

ties, pleasures and moods of children. It is rapidly abolishing the mechanical routine and formal studies from the class room and introducing the kindergarten, nature studies, manual training, conversational discussions, and "correlating" all subjects with some regard for the interests and real capacities of the pupils.

In the church there is a dawning appreciation of the nature of the child. He is neither a demon nor an angel, only a candidate for manhood. His nature is not constitutionally perverse and it is not positively good. It is a complex of tendencies and impulses, needing light, air and food to grow by. The old time religious training by the catechism and Scripture memorizing has been followed by an era of songs and sentimental nothings. Both represent extremes. There are present indications of a movement in the Sunday-school like that in the public school by which the formative and expansive forces of religion will be brought home to the growing mind in a natural and effective way.

There is thus increasing confidence on every hand with regard to the sources and successive stages of human life. The result is the healthy and vigorous enjoyment of better bodies and better minds—the reproduction in modern life of the ancient Greek love of nature, together with the Hebrew reverence for spiritual ideals and achievements.

Office Seekers and Office Holders

By EDWARD B. BAGBY.

General Lewis Cass said, "Office seeking in men, women and children has become our national malady. God only knows how it is to be cured or in what direction the cure lies."

After half a century there are signs that the nation is recovering from this malady and if the cure is not complete, we have at least discovered in what direction it lies.

For many years the conditions were growing worse until Benj. Harrison's administration, when there occurred a change for the better. It was of Pierce's administration that Mr. Rhodes, the historian, wrote: "The importunate begging for official positions in a republic where it was so easy to earn a living was nothing less than disgraceful. Office seekers crowded the public receptions of the President, and while greeting him in the usual way attempted at the same time to urge their claims, actually thrusting their petitions into his hands."

Congdon, in the New York Tribune, writing of the inauguration of President Buchanan, said: "We do not think that the diplomatic corps ever witnessed at home anything like this scramble for place . . . swarms of adult mendicants from all quarters bawling for more cold pieces of patronage than any president ever had or ever will have to bestow."

President Lincoln declared that the importunities of the office seekers were a heavier burden to him than the conduct of the civil war.

It was probably a knowledge of what Grant had to endure that caused General Sherman to say, "Flesh and blood can not long stand the strain to which we subject our presidents." Garfield, himself a victim of the spoils system, spoke of the "agony of the presidents under this unconstitutional, crushing and irresistible pressure." He said to his pastor, F. D. Power, that he would like to hide away in the loft of some barn where no one could find him and lie down for a few hours and rest.

Our presidents were victims of the theory that public office is plunder to be fought for at the polls and distributed among the victors. An illustration is that of a lean, leathery man who entered the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States and said he, "had called to see 'bout a 'pintment, 'nef Cattarauqus hed her puppoh-shin; 'nef she hedn't, he'd like to make applicashin fur her sheer."

Said an aspirant for a situation to a vender of mutton pies, "Do you want a clerk?"

"Why do you want to tend my stand?"

"Because," was the frank reply, "I'm awfully hungry."

This aptly expresses the condition of a vast number who sought positions at the public counter.

In the early days of my ministry here, I had some experience with the class who come to the inauguration, put up at the best hotels, file their applications for foreign consulates and are introduced at the White House by some senator; later secure rooms in boarding houses and seek the endorsement of their congressmen for clerical positions in the departments; afterwards importune the preachers to try to get them places as messengers or watchmen, and finally, apply to the police department for free transportation to their homes.

The improvement of the public service began in 1883 with the enforcement of the rules of the civil service which had long been upon the statute books. At first there were 14,000 places in the classified service. Now the classified positions are not far from 80,000. Of the 102,000 unclassified positions, 71,000 are occupied by fourth class postmasters.

Year before last 288 different kinds of examinations were held to fill vacancies in the classified service. Seventy-two per cent. of these positions are subject to general examinations for which a good common school education is a sufficient training, such as the position of clerk in the departmental service, railway mail clerk and carrier in the post office service. Six per cent. are subject to technical examinations, which demand in addition to a general education, special or technical knowledge, such as the positions of fourth assistant examiner in the patent office, stenographer and typewriter, draftsman and nautical expert in the naval observatory. Twenty-two per cent. are subject to registration tests including no educational examination, but requiring applicants to furnish evidence as to their ability as workmen, their experience, their physical qualifications and their age. Among the positions filled in this manner are those of firemen, watchmen and janitors. During the last ten years of 17,843 persons appointed, 1,663 or 9.3 per cent. were women.

The regular semi-annual schedule examinations have just been held. In many of the cities of the country an opportunity will be afforded those who desire to enter the departmental service to try the examination next spring. As an illustration of the special examinations there are scheduled the following for November: Assistant microscopist, Omaha, the 19th; watchmen, firemen, Des Moines, the 16th; messenger boy, Huron, S. Dak., Helena, Mont., Pensacola, Fla., Wichita, Kan., the 19th; farmer and superintendent of transportation in any city where postal free delivery has been established, the 12th; also public document cataloguer, interpreter Ute language, disciplinarian, India service and copperplate engraver. Full information in regard to all examinations can be had upon application to the civil service commission at Washington.

I shall reserve for a later article the discussion of the advisability of entering the government service.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

The Minneapolis Convention made apparent to me, as I never saw it before, that the Disciples are pre-eminently and essentially an evangelistic people. Whatever subject came up for discussion, in the formal addresses, in impromptu speeches from the floor, in the sectional meetings, Thursday afternoon, always and in every place, there was a distinct evangelistic tone. It was heard from the beginning to the close of the convention. Thursday afternoon was given up to special meetings. A meeting in the interest of the Benevolent Association was held in the Portland Avenue Church of Christ. A meeting in the interest of education was held in the Plymouth Congregational church. A meeting was held in the exposition building, of pastors and evangelists, in the interest of evangelism. This meeting was more largely attended than was either of the other meetings. At the meeting in the morning, of the Benevolent Association, in the exposition building, a special point was made of the number of children who had been brought to Christ through the efforts of this organization. In the meeting of the educational section much was made of the work of persuading men to live the Christian life. These incidents show that the Disciples are essentially and pre-eminently an evangelistic people.

H. O. Breeden delivered an address before the meeting of pastors and evangelists in which he proposed an organization for systematic prosecution of this character of work. His idea seems to be, in part, to dignify, ennoble, and improve the work of evangelism among us. With the details of the scheme I am not now especially interested. It is sufficient, in this place, to call attention to the suggestion, and to express sympathy with it. Argument is not needed to convince intelligent Disciples that our evangelistic work ought to move on a higher plane. It ought to be more didactic in character. At present too this part of our work is carried on, frequently, in a haphazard, hit-or-miss manner. Sometimes protracted meetings are inaugurated as are strikes in the industrial world.

The boss sees that his organization of laboring men is disintegrating. Times are good. Work is constant. Hours are reasonable. Wages are satisfactory. The surroundings are wholesome and pleasant. The wage earner, the working man, is satisfied. He has, in large measure, lost interest in his lodge. He neglects its meetings. He does not pay his dues. The boss sees that something must be done or he will lose his occupation and income. He talks privately to a few men. He succeeds in showing them that they ought to have this or that or the other thing. A semi-public meeting is called. Speeches are delivered. Dissatisfaction increases. Deputations wait on the owners or managers of the business. The deputations are treated with scant respect. More meetings are held and more speeches are delivered. The men are wrought up to a high pitch of excitement. A strike is ordered. The lodge meetings are largely attended. Back dues are paid up. Converts are made to the cause of organized labor. Numbers are added to the lodges. The revival is a success. The manipulator of the honest, unsuspecting, working man, having made all he can out of his dupes, accepts a tip from the capitalist, and once more there is peace, and business moves on in a normal way.

This is the inside and true history of more than one labor strike. And who does not know that, with the exception of the tip, this is a veracious account of the inception and progress of more than one religious, so-called, revival? Dr. Breeden's suggestion is that evangelism shall be a part of the regular work of the church. That it shall be determined upon, planned for, and prosecuted as is every other phase of the work in a wide-awake, up-to-date church. We plan to gather in dollars for the prosecution of mission work at home and abroad. Why not set apart a portion of each year for special effort in winning men and women to the Christ? Why not? Why wait until the congregation has so run down that something must be done to stir up an interest that will bring in money to pay current expenses? Breeden is right in his contention. Let this work be taken up and prosecuted in a dignified, intelligent, systematic way. The history of the Central church, and the University Place church, in Des Moines, and the Mason City congregation in Iowa, furnishes illustrations of what can be done all over the land, and in almost every city, by the proposed method.

One result will be, probably, that men of gifts for this character of work will especially prepare themselves for it. Everybody knows, or ought to know, that the evangelist is, in many quarters, in disrepute. Men are deterred from giving themselves to this work because of this fact. The work of the evangelist in the apostolic age was most important. The evangelist in New Testament times was a dignified and an important person. He had a recognized place and function. He was not a guerrilla. He was one of the functionaries of the Church of Christ. As such he was respected and his influence was weighty. This ought to be the case now. Has not the time come, in our effort to reproduce the New Testament Church, to restore the work of evangelism and to give the evangelist, as near as we can do so, the place that he certainly occupied in the church of the first century?

In the remarks made in the preceding paragraph in disparagement of the evangelism with which we are acquainted and the evangelist who is abroad in the land the reference is not especially to those who are doing evangelistic work among the Disciples of Christ. My eyes are on a larger field than we occupy. To be perfectly frank I do not hesitate to say that our evangelists with all their faults are superior intellectually and morally to the average peripatetic, irresponsible nondescript known by the name evangelist. But we have not attained perfection, neither in the office of pastor nor in that of evangelist. Dr. Breeden's proposition, as I understand him, is to lift higher the standard, secure better men and do better work.

The Disciples occupy a position that will enable them to render a service of unspeakable value to the Church Catholic in this matter. It was I. J. Spencer, I believe, who said in his address in the Minneapolis convention that our peculiarity is found in the fact that we have no peculiarities!

The Disciples aim to hold and preach and make emphatic the fundamental facts and truths of the gospel of the Son of God. The time is not far in the future, believe me, when the Disciples will be in demand in union evangelistic work. Their familiarity with the New Testament, their supreme loyalty to Jesus Christ, their democratic simplicity and sympathy, and their strong common sense, will, as they come to a better understanding of their position, and as others come to know them, and to understand them better, cause them to be in demand for work that is undenominational, nonsectarian, and thoroughly evangelical.

A committee was appointed by the meeting of pastors and evangelists in Minneapolis to report on this whole subject to a similar meeting in Omaha at the time of the next General Convention.

A Higher Lesson In Love

By N. J. AYLSWORTH.

The injunction to love others as we love ourselves does not reach the highest level of Christ's teaching on the subject of love. This, as he truly says, lies at the basis of the Jewish law (Matt. 6:12), and it lies properly at the basis of all law—all justice and equity. The proper expression of this equal love is equal dealing, or equity, justice. Such a love will lead us to treat others as well as ourselves, but no better. This is good so far as it goes, but Christ gave a "new commandment," which requires much more than this. The new commandment was that his disciples should love others as he had loved them. This he said in immediate view of his approaching death for them; and he proceeds to say that "greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." Paul exhibits Christ's love in even a stronger light when he says that "peradventure for the good man some would even dare to die. But God commendeth his own love toward us in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us."

Now, the one who lays down his life for another treats that other better than himself and does so because he loves him more. Equal love will result in equal treatment; greater love in better treatment. Loving others as we love ourselves will give equity, justice and fair dealing; loving others better than ourselves will result in sacrifice. And this is the keynote of the entire gospel—the giving of self for others. It is the mighty thought of the cross. Justice, equity, is law; sacrifice is gospel. Christ's new contribution to the moral teaching of the world is that men shall love each other better than themselves. This does not imply that they shall have no love for self, for a high and noble self-love lies at the foundation of all noble character, and is often appealed to in the gospel; but the balance of our loving is always to preponderate on the side of others, and lead us to sacrifice in their behalf. Paul reached this spirit in sublime degree when he could wish himself "accursed from Christ" (deprived of his salvation) if by that means his brethren, the people of Israel, might be saved. Some have stumbled at this passage. Carried into execution, no doubt, the thought would involve various difficulties, but as an outburst of noble feeling it was perfectly natural, and one of the sublimest utterances ever penned. It was not John who loved most. No man trod the heights nearer Christ than the mighty-hearted Paul. The psalm of 1 Cor. 13, was heart history. No other apostle could have written it. John's love was sweet; Paul's was mighty.

Let us say, then, that while Christ began his ministry by calling men back to the law of love as embodied in the Jewish system, and insisted first on the lower lesson that they should love others as themselves, he did not stop here, but gave as his final and highest lesson to his disciples that they should love others more than themselves. Not dwelling longer on this, let us ask two important questions: First, is it really our duty to love others better than ourselves? Second, is it practicable?

A distinguished preacher in a book of sermons published not long ago advocated that men ought not to love others better than themselves—that self-love and the love for others should be equal, and he seemed to think that this was the embodiment of Christ's teaching. No doubt there are many who take this view; but this is law, not gospel, and ignores wholly Christ's "new commandment." But is there not much to be said in favor of such a view? Is my neighbor any better than I? And, if not, is there any reason why I should love him more and treat him better than myself? Am I just to myself in so doing? If the question be simply one of equity, undoubtedly the higher love must stand condemned, but over against this it remains to be said that the duty of loving others better than ourselves is indelibly written on the heart of man. It was graven in our very nature long before Christ gave it expression in words.

A ship has encountered a collision at sea, and is fast sinking. The captain, cool, calm, intrepid, walks the deck and directs the rescue of the passengers and crew. All are saved, but he himself goes down. All hearts thrill at his deed. We call it noble, sublime, and write his name among heroes. What has he done? Treated others better than himself—forgotten self and thought only of them; and we say he “did his duty.” But if he had not done this, we should have execrated him.

John Maynard held the helm of a burning vessel, guiding it into safety. “John Maynard,” cries the captain, “can you hold on a little longer?” “Aye, aye, sir!” came back through the flames. All others were saved, but John Maynard was seen a charred corpse, with hands still clutching the helm. Our hearts beat and our eyes grow moist at the recital. Why? Because in that splendid hour there burned in John Maynard a love above self.

Christ’s new commandment, then, is instinctively felt to be duty by all mankind. All nations teach that a man should be willing to lay down his life for his country. What is this but placing the love of country—our countrymen—above self? Christ did but give this law a wider application and a more spiritual interpretation.

Evidence of this recognition comes to us from another direction. It has been well said that “manners are the minor morals.” But the fundamental law of all good manners is preferring others before self. The best room and best bed for guests, are universal. The language of politeness always honors others above self. It is so among all nations. Two Mexicans meeting at a cab door will keep the cab waiting while they engage in an amiable quarrel, each insisting that the other shall have the honor of entering first. A Chinaman inviting another to be his guest exhausts his vocabulary in deprecating self and exalting the other. Of course, this is largely insincere, but it is an extravagant way of showing what is felt to be due to others. The charm of politeness is the beauty of love issuing in little sacrifices. Even when not sincere it is practiced in deference to the recognition of what should be.

The moral sense of mankind does not draw the line of duty at an equal love of self and others, but demands a balance in favor of the neighbor. It requires what Christ embodied in his new commandment—a love issuing in sacrifice. It is in sacrifice that love grows beautiful. Sacrifice is the blossom of love, fragrant with sweetness and resplendent in moral beauty. Love in sacrifice is mighty; it is the moral quickener, the transformer of men, the regenerator of the world. And it is so because all men instinctively feel that sacrifice is not a foolish expenditure of self, but morally sublime.

Out in the world the name for Christ’s new commandment has often been heroism. The very essence of heroism is the sinking of self in daring deeds for others. It is splendid sacrifice. It is a brave, virile love, overtopping self, and it is because of this that it thrills us and lifts us off our feet. Christ’s new commandment is but a finer and more far-reaching heroism—heroism so high that its crown is bathed in heavenly light.

That there is no great love that does not transcend self, and that morality is not perfect until it reaches that bound, has been the instinctive sense of all mankind; and Christ but coined into words a truth that had long lain unmined in the human soul.

In another article we shall inquire whether this love is practicable.

Auburn, N. Y.

The entire property of the colleges and universities of the United States is about $225,000,000. This is very largely the result of gifts and the unearned increment of real estate. After more than two hundred and fifty years the sum total of money devoted to education does not equal certain private fortunes. Of this sum more than one-fourth belongs to five or six universities. This seems indeed a meager showing for a nation of eighty millions of people who have regarded education as the flower and glory of democracy. It must, therefore, be a great support to our appeal for the increased endowment of our church colleges that we are making a contribution at the same time to the larger need of the nation. It is not like the question of planting a church in some small town where there are already too many; nor is it even on a par with propagating another religious body in an age of diversified sects and creeds, certain as we are of the propriety of our doing so. Here is a general need which will not likely ever be over-supplied and which at this time is very inadequately supplied. It is first of all a contribution to general culture which the church makes and which lays the whole community under obligation to her. Indeed, it has been the history of most institutions of learning founded for particular ends that they have in the long run served the purposes of general education even more conspicuously than the particular interests that prompted their foundation. Harvard and Yale are notable examples. In urging larger foundations for our colleges, then, we may be said to appeal to a patriotic motive, or at all events to a benevolence that is of the most general application.

A second motive, and one more immediate in its influence upon us in providing schools under the control and influence of the church, is to secure for our young people an atmosphere congenial to religious faith, and even to the religious faith in which they have been reared. There is, of course, no thought of exclusiveness cherished in this particular, for our schools are open to all of whatever creed, and no restriction is or should be made, except as to moral conduct. But so far as the indirect influence of college life on Christian faith is of value, it is believed that it will be secured by schools managed by our own church and for the most part manned by those who are in sympathy with our religious ideals. It is not here contended that institutions not so founded are essentially irreligious, or that those having ecclesiastical oversight have always been above criticism. But the general rule is not invalidated by particular exceptions, and it may be safely affirmed that, if education in a distinctly religious atmosphere is desired, it can be had only in church schools.

Even so important an advantage as this might be subject to some modification if the presence of the religious factor should in any way impair the character and extent of the academic work. But it will hardly be contended to-day that learning and faith are incompatible. There is not a chair of science, literature, art, or criticism, or any department of human thought in any university in the world, that may not be, and indeed has not been, filled somewhere, at some time, by a Christian scholar.

But a third and still more immediate motive urging us to the better endowment of our colleges is their relation to our ministry. It stands to reason that a church should train its own ministry. Nothing else is to be thought of under present conditions. Not that absolutely every one shall be so trained or that many of them may not be expected to avail themselves of the great universities of this country or Europe for special and advanced work. But the foundations of scholarship, as of ministerial training, should be laid in our own schools and by our own men. The advantages of this are obvious. They become grounded in the faith and are made familiar with the true spirit of our movement. The injury suffered by our churches from a chance man now and then going astray because he has been to some great university and imbibed views alien to our plea, is not underrated. But it is as nothing compared to the handicap we are under from the other extreme of men who, from lack of training and association, are by their narrowness and literalism closing against us for a long time to come the intelligent appreciation of those who need our message.

The church confers sanctity upon institutions of learning, and in turn these give dignity and stability to the ministry of the church. Religion and education go hand in hand. What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder. It is of great value to a preacher to have all his associations during the most delightful and formative period of his religious life congenial to him in faith and aims. He will come, of course, to need contact of a different sort that he may know what manner of man he is and what manner of faith he holds. He may well covet at the proper time a different atmosphere, a mingling with men of different points of view, in order to get that wholeness and sanity of faith that comes from such contact. But many will be unable to go further than the college, so it behooves us to afford schools of the completest equipment possible, up to the standard in every way, and accessible to all.

It is a common remark that we have too many colleges. Instead of a number of small and weak institutions it is urged that we should have two or three great centers. This overlooks the central purpose of educational institutions, which is not to impart high scholarly finish to a comparative few, but to diffuse the greatest possible amount of intelligence among the greatest number. It is of slight importance comparatively that our institutions should produce a few great scholars, but it is important that a knowledge of general culture should be widely diffused.

The United States has now, it is said, on an average one college for every one hundred miles square of territory. Many of these are weak, but they are none too numerous. A college is, first of all, a matter of local interest; only less so than a high school. A glance at any college catalogue will reveal the fact that the students are mostly drawn from the vicinity. Many of these boys and girls would never have attempted to get an education otherwise. Out of two hundred in a college that I know, not a half dozen, perhaps not one, would have found their way to one of the distant universities. That these two hundred should be tolerably well educated is of vastly more importance than that a few should have the facility for the highest scholarship.

We have not too many church colleges. We need even more than we have. Nothing would be gained and much lost by combining them if such a thing were possible—which, of course, it is not. We should thank God for every vine that has been planted. Let us nourish and cherish them every one until they grow into strength and beauty and fruitfulness. What do we not owe to them already, meager as have been their resources, for men and inspiration and guidance? Each one of them is like the burning bush, inspiring us with wonder that it has not long ago been consumed. They stand on holy ground. Men have wrought in them without adequate pay in dollars and cents. They have received no special worldly honor. The teacher buries himself from popular applause. His reward is in the sense of duty done and the appreciation of the individuals here and there who have been the recipients of his instruction.

I believe that in the best of our colleges the professors' salaries run no higher than from twelve to fifteen hundred dollars. How men support a family, entertain, buy the books they need, maintain that serenity of mind necessary to keep up their studies and lay by something for old age on such a sum, surpasses my comprehension. The institution among us with which I happen to be most familiar has a faculty of men of the highest grade of scholarship, not one but holds a degree from some renowned university, a number of them having received and declined calls to larger institutions at increased salaries, not one of whom would not compare favorably in teaching ability and scholarship with men in state and other institutions where choice is made solely on grounds of scholarship, some of whom are already known in the world of text-book authorship—a body of men imbued with the truest and best ideals of academic life, working year in and year out on a salary of $1,250. If this isn't devotion, I know not where to find it. No corporation in the United States is able to command so great talents for so little money as the college corporation. Hardly a newspaper but tells of some man or woman endowing a chair, building a telescope, or a memorial chapel. What our colleges stand in need of is funds for general use; not to add one or two more poorly paid professors or expensive buildings to maintain.

The first thing I would do if I had the management of the added funds would be to increase the salaries of the six or eight professors who are the real strength of the institution, spending their lives and their brains for a fraction of the pay given to a skillful salesman or a head cook in a first-class hotel. Instead of multiplying chairs I would magnify professors. Would it not be better for an institution to have instructors with pay enough to have such libraries as they need, with something for travel and freedom from care, than to have twice the number crippled in resources and dwarfed in development?

A reasonable addition to our endowments as they stand to-day would not only enable them to provide adequate remuneration to under-paid men, but would also furnish additional chairs, apparatus, libraries and buildings. The time is ripe for a movement all along the line to better equip our colleges. The church should be awakened to it. Men of means should be apprised more fully than they are of the needs of our colleges. A campaign such as the Education Society would be glad to inaugurate would bring large returns. Look at the income of some of the well-endowed institutions of our land. There is Harvard, with $12,500,000 of active endowment and an income of $1,376,600 annually; Columbia University, New York, with $10,400,000 and an income of $929,834; Cornell, with $6,750,000 and an income of $810,500; Yale, with $5,000,000 and an income of $770,000; the University of Chicago, with $5,896,800 and an income of $750,000; Northwestern University, with $3,041,000 and an income of $336,300. These are universities, to be sure, but it is good for us to become familiar with these great sums in connection with education.

A list of well-known colleges will show a proportionate liberality. Dartmouth, with $2,300,000 endowment, has an annual income of $105,000; Oberlin, with $1,028,345, has $138,490; Amherst, with $1,600,000, has $104,000; Wesleyan College, with $1,100,000, has $114,000; Lake Forrest, with $535,000, has $118,000; Haverford, with $820,000, has $93,000; Lafayette, with $430,000, has $41,300. Our own institutions ought to come in this class. Not one of them is reported as having over $30,000 a year from all sources for distinctly college and Bible college work.

Endowment is absolutely necessary to the carrying on of higher education. The revenue from fees is entirely inadequate. Tuition is small now and it ought to be still less.

Endowments may be raised by popular subscription or by an appeal to men of means. Both methods should be combined. The main reliance is of course on men of money. But there is an immense advantage in the popular appeal. Love will go with the gift, whether large or small, from the few dollars saved by the good housewife from the sale of butter and cheese to the thousands given by the rich. Every one of our colleges ought to begin now, if they have not already done so, to bring their claims before the people. The thing is in the air. The Methodist Church is raising large sums for education. The Congregational Church raises through its regular channels about $130,000 and the Presbyterian Church $150,000 for education. But individual gifts swell these amounts to hundreds of thousands. The Baptists are also doing much. Shall we fail to seize the opportunity?

The first thing our fathers did was to found colleges, that the plea we make might be committed to the hands of trained men, who should be able to teach others also. Without education our cause is doomed.

Let us urge then far and wide the claims of Christian education. Let us set our schools of learning in a wide place, giving them the support and honor they deserve. Let us propose large things, things commensurate with the wealth and liberality of our age. We have not yet learned to ask enough. The church should be brought closer to its schools of learning, made more sensitive to their limitations, more alive to their possibilities. To accomplish this result will require time and agitation. In this noble and far-reaching work it remains for our Education Society to lead the way.

State Missions.

By B. S. Denny.

Cor. Sec. of Iowa Christian Missionary Society.

In no small degree missions is the business of the church and it has been demonstrated over and over that the church that does not engage in missions soon goes out of business altogether. It is not enough for us to be loyal to the local congregation, our duty leads us into the far beyond.

Our churches should be symmetrically developed so that they would have a like interest in all lines of missionary work.

State missions should have the full right of way at this time. The first Sunday in November is the time selected by the national convention to take the offering for state missions. Iowa Disciples will take the offering the fourth Sunday in November. Other states have different times to take the offering. The large majority of the states observe the November day, and the tendency is to make it uniform.

State missions should have a large place in our hearts and should be second to no other missionary society in our offerings. At least one-third of our churches owe their existence to the work of our state missionary societies. Our general secretaries say, strengthen the state work, and unless that is done the foreign and American missions will soon reach their limit.

Experience teaches us that it takes organized effort to establish churches and put them on a permanent footing. Even after churches are organized a certain amount of missionary work is required to keep them going. Without assistance many of our churches would fail to keep up the work and not a few would cease to exist altogether. A little assistance, financial or otherwise, often saves a congregation from serious embarrassment.

State missions means more churches, more members, more preachers and more helpers to sound out the word beyond the state. It means better churches and better equipment for work in all departments of church life, and it means more money for missions. In proportion as our state work succeeds will our churches increase in numbers and missionary activities, and each church will prosper in proportion as it participates in the work, but let them neglect the state work and they will reap what they sow—they will find themselves neglected and pauperized.

Notwithstanding the paramount importance of state missions, the fact remains that it does not receive the consideration from the brethren that it should. It seems difficult for some to realize that we can do missionary work in our own states, yet it would be difficult to find missionaries who display more heroism than those employed by our state boards.

To say nothing of soul winning and the benefit to be derived by our own people, state missions pay as a missionary investment. Our general boards may invest their money in bonds, in land and buildings, or loan it at the current rate of interest, but nowhere will it bring forth so abundant an income as if invested in state missions.

Let me illustrate: In 1891 the Iowa missionary society organized two churches. Lots were purchased, buildings were erected and quarterage paid until the congregations were self-supporting, at a total cost of about $700 to our society. The two congregations to-day have property worth $30,000 and 1,200 resident members. These congregations have been fairly loyal to all of our missionary interests, and have not been found wanting in good works.

Last year these two congregations gave $246.46 into the F. C. M. S. treasury, the ladies of the C. W. B. M. gave $337.14 into their national treasury, and the Juniors gave $132.87 into the C. W. B. M. treasury; a total of $716.47 in the one year and that the ninth year of their existence. $16.47 more was given by the two churches in one year than the total cost of organizing and maintaining them until they were self-supporting. Last year was not an exception, the same record has been maintained for the last five years, and we have every reason to believe that it will be continued.

What is true of these two congregations is true of the average congregation that is organized by our state missionary societies; we teach them to be so.

It should not be necessary to urge the cause of state missions. No preacher can afford to omit taking the offering, for if the state work is prosperous it directly or indirectly helps the preacher. If we expect the church to prosper in all lines of church work, we must put state missions up to where it belongs and keep it there.

The Old Book In The New Crucible

By J. J. HALEY.

VIII. The Crucible of Archeology.

From very remote times men have been writing books. Even in Solomon's day there was a profusion of literature; Koheleth declared that there was no end to the making of books. These books, however, differed vastly, in their appearance as well as their contents, from the books of to-day. Literature, like every other product of man's brain, has been a development. Just as the geologist can, from the fragmentary fossil remains found in the crust of the earth, tell of the gradual introduction of living forms on our planet, so can the historian, from the various relics of literature, which have been providentially preserved, trace the growth of letters. Paper being but a comparatively recent invention, men in times past wrote on the best material they could obtain. Thus Moses wrote on tables of stone, Ezekiel on clay tiles, and Mahomet on blades of bone. Kings in their vanity told the story of their victories on costly monuments, on the walls of their palaces and their tombs, and sometimes on almost inaccessible rocky eminences. Scholars and thinkers, desiring to send down their thought and knowledge to succeeding generations, stored it up on such materials as brick tiles, papyrus and parchment rolls. From these and like sources have the histories of mankind been compiled. In recent times the prophet has breathed on these relics of ancient days, and there has been a rustling among the dry bones and a resurrection of forgotten records. Explorers have opened to the light of day the ruins of old cities which for ages lay buried in the sands of Africa and Asia. They have burst open the vaults of the dead and stolen from the icy grasp of the mummy the rolls of picture writing which have been hidden away for millenniums; peered into subterranean palaces and read the mysterious handwriting on the wall; dug up brick libraries and turned over the brittle pages of old dictionaries which may not have been handled since the days of Hezekiah.

Following on the track of the explorer came the decipherer. Like a passionate musician seeking for a lost chord, he sought for the key to ancient oriental languages, and finding it he made the old minstrel sing once again, and a sweet song it is. We are prone to ask, what new light has this research shed upon religion? Has it vindicated or otherwise the historic truthfulness of the Bible? You say this intellectual awakening, this trumpet blast of historical resurrection, this glorious renaissance, must either confirm or cripple our faith. From time to time the nations which have been the most advanced in letters have been providentially brought by war or commerce in contact with the chosen people of God. Thus Israel was in bondage in Egypt, in captivity in Babylon, and tributary to Greece and Rome. Therefore it is justly contended that as we read the story of these nations in their own monuments, we should find statements that either directly or indirectly corroborate the word of God. I agree that this is a fair contention, and I shall endeavor to show how this evidence confirms in all its fundamental outlines the historical accuracy of the old book. To do this in a systematic and comprehensive form I will commence with the creation story and gradually make my way down to New Testament times.

By the banks of the Euphrates and the Tigris, folded together in each other's arms like two affectionate sisters, lie buried the ancient civilizations of Babylonia and Assyria. Until recently all we knew of these ancient empires, apart from the Bible, were the doubtful statements of Greek literature. The site of their cities was unknown and nothing remained of their ancient glory. We had some vague notion where Babylon, the capital of Babylonia, was, and knew from the uniform testimony of the traveler that the prophetic words of the Jewish seer had been fulfilled—that God had “made of a city a heap and of a defenced city a ruin.” But where was Nineveh, the chief city of Assyria? Was it not as Nahum predicted, “made an utter end of,” “empty, void and waste”? In truth it was. Over it roamed the wild Asiatic hordes, never dreaming that “their tread was on an empire's dust,” or that “an earthquake's spoil lies sepulchred below.” For the discovery of the site of this marvelous city we are indebted to Sir Austin Henry Layard, who, mainly through the liberality of Sir Stratford Canning, went forth to prospect for treasures of knowledge in the valleys of Mesopotamia. While Layard was engaged in collecting relics of old Assyria for that vast curiosity shop, the British Museum, a young military officer, Henry Rawlinson, in the employment of the East India Company, was spending his leisure time trying to untie the gordian knot of ancient eastern languages, a task he successfully accomplished. The hand of God was visibly manifest in these discoveries. Just as Layard opens up Nineveh and the site of the cradle of our race is being eagerly explored, Rawlinson comes on the scene with the key to the ancient languages of these newly explored lands, and that at the very time when the rationalistic critics, by their relentless persecution, might shake the faith of mankind in the historical accuracy of the Bible.

The work of Rawlinson was followed up by other orientalist, notably by Prof. Sayce, to whose works we English speaking people are indebted for the most of our information on this subject. He takes us back to the dawn of creation and informs us that the name Adam is a Babylonian term for man. The term Eden denotes the field or plain of Babylonia. Thus those biblical scholars are apparently right who suppose that the home of our first parents was somewhere in the regions of Chaldea. Among the rivers which irrigated it were undoubtedly the Euphrates and the Tigris, for the term Hiddekel employed in Genesis is their ancient name. We feel, therefore, as we grope among these records, that we are getting near to the beginning of the historic line. This should not surprise us, for the book of Genesis records that Ur of the Chaldees, one of the important towns of Chaldea, was the original home of Abraham. The Chaldeans and Babylonians would therefore have among them a knowledge of man's earliest history. Fragmentary records have been found of a Babylon story of creation which, in its language, strikingly resembles that of Genesis, although in some other respects there are vital differences, the narrative evidently having been corrupted in transmission, or, as some suppose, it was the original document purified by the Hebrews by the elimination of its errors. A picture frequently met with, sometimes on the embroidered garments of the kings, is the picture of the sacred tree guarded and cared for by celestial beings. This would seem to be the Babylonian version of our account of the tree of life being guarded by the angels with flaming swords. In the sacred history of the Jewish nation we have several accounts of the people of Israel and Judah falling into idolatry and selecting heathen groves as sanctuaries for the performance of superstitious rites, a development probably from an early belief in the sacred character of the tree of life. Most false systems have a basis of truth. The

A Bible student and literary friend of mine handed me an essay on Archeology and the Bible for such use as I might desire to make of it. Much of it is inserted in the articles to follow on this question along with such other material as I have seen fit to add to bring it up to date.—J. J. H.

scientists tell us that a microbe has been known to exist in a dewdrop, and the purest thing in the world by misuse becomes a curse. The Israelites, after being saved from the bites of the fiery serpents through obedience to God in looking on the brazen serpent, preserved it, and in time it became to them an object of idolatry, until King Hezekiah cleansed them of this sin by the destruction of the idol. So in a somewhat similiar manner may the idolatries of the heathen groves have arisen from an ancient reverence for the tree of life. Not the least interesting discovery yet made is the find of a Babylonian gem, on which is a rude picture of Adam and Eve seated on either side of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, holding out their hands to the fruit. Behind Eve is a serpent, apparently the old serpent, the devil; he is pouring into her ear the seductive poison that caused the ruin of our race. The pictures are but poorly executed, but their very crudeness demonstrates their antiquity, showing that they were produced at a period when art was in its infancy. An interesting feature in these early records is the fact that the old Babylonians observed the seventh day of the week as a Sabbath.

From the story of creation let us pass over a period of history to the story of the flood. Against this biblical narrative infidelity has brought all its guns into action. It is said that the ark could not contain all the animals then in existence, nor could the atmosphere provide sufficient water to cover the earth to the height of a mountain like Ararat. Here at the outset is a patent error in this hostile criticism—the Bible uses the plural term, and not the singular. The ark rested not on Mt. Ararat, but on “the mountains of Ararat,” and the Babylonian and Assyrian literature reveals the fact, which is also mentioned in the writings of Isaiah, that Ararat is the ancient name of the entire district of Armenia. The difficulty concerning the gathering together and housing securely in the ark of all the animals in the world, arises from the supposition that the flood was universal, a notion which no one now entertains. God could have no purpose in flooding the entire world, for at that time it was but partially peopled. The Hebrew term haaretz, which in this narrative is translated earth, in other places in scripture is translated district. Looking out over the great expanse of water that girt his floating home, Noah would discern that the entire earth, as far as the eye could see, was covered with water. And so we would use such expressions as “all the earth under the whole heaven [sky] was covered.” Terms of a universal character are frequently thus used in scripture, and are not to be interpreted literally, but by the design of the author. We readily grant that a rainfall might be insufficient to flood even the then inhabited world, but the cataclysm was not confined to a rainfall; the book says, “the fountains of the great deep were broken up.” There were volcanic forces at work—the earth might subside and the ocean rush in over the land. A geological examination of the country shows that subterranean forces have been at work there in the past; Mt. Ararat itself is an extinct volcano. Here scripture is wonderfully confirmed by the deluge tablet, a terra cotta tablet taken from a library in Nineveh, which belonged to one of the ancient kings. It records that the rainfall was accompanied by a great earthquake, and in many other details the story corresponds with the Bible. The world was, it states, flooded because of man's sins, and the Babylonian Noah, like the biblical one, sent forth birds to ascertain whether the waters had subsided.

Through the labors of the illustrious Frenchman, Champollion, who deciphered the picture writing of the Egyptians, we are able to show how the Egyptian monuments also confirm scripture. Rawlinson, by deciphering the cuneiform, the wedge-shaped letters in which many old eastern languages were written, and Champollion, by doing the same for Egyptian hieroglyphics, have opened these to us at a time when scholarly skepticism seemed likely to rob the world of its religious convictions. By these discoveries the student is now able to read the records in the tombs and on the papyrus rolls. For instance, an Egyptologist, while reading one of the old books, came on a passage which stated that “the wife and children of a foreigner are by right the lawful property of the king.” This furnishes us with a reason for the strange fear which came over Abraham while he was in Egypt, which led him to pass his wife off as his sister. By this literature fresh light is thrown on the action of Joseph, in shaving his head before going into the presence of Pharaoh; we learn from it that only very dirty and slovenly people allowed their hair to grow to any length, except during periods of mourning, when it was allowed to grow. On the tomb is a picture of an Egyptian barber at work, and in the British Museum are some of the razors used by those ancient hair-dressers. Another striking evidence of the accuracy of the writers of the Pentateuch is the correct use of names; Potiphar, Potipherah, Asenath, also the new name of Joseph and many others, are all exact renderings of Egyptian terms. The description of the embalming and burying of Jacob is in keeping with the Egyptian narratives of similar funerals.

If It Be Clear at Sunset.

By Laurene Highfield.

When shining bright 'mid gold and purple splendor,

The sun in regal beauty sinks to rest,
And tints of rose and richest crimson render

Their aid to make sublime the glowing west,
The storms that made the day so dark and dreary,

The howling winds, the rain that fiercely fell,
Are all forgotten in the scene so cheery.

If it be clear at sunset, all is well.

Life's transient day is full of care and sorrow,
The skies are often dark and overcast,

But hoping, longing for a bright to-morrow,
We know that it will clearer grow at last;

Clouds oftentimes shut out the blue of heaven,
But 'neath God's hand we still securely dwell,

And trusting Him, wait patiently for even.

If it be clear at sunset, all is well.

'Tis growing late; life's day so quickly passes,

Yet in the west celestial glories shine,
Reflecting in their golden, radiant masses

The glow of light unfading and divine.

The sun is sinking, but it sets in gladness;

A glorious morrow its bright beams foretell.

Death's night draws near, yet brings no fear or sadness—

If it be clear at sunset, all is well.

Whose Jugs Hold the Cream?

Some of my dearest friends have experienced a disappointment. It is mingled with some gratifying compensations. When I returned from my tour in the United States I did a foolish thing. I gave a few public talks about your wonderful country in the west, and so extolled America that some of my own congregation straightway adopted the view that such a land must be the right place to go to live in. A valuable couple soon sold out and emigrated. They were two of my very choicest people, are still young, are full of ability, and write month after month during this year that they enjoy their new location, not far from the Rocky Mountains, more and more. The good brother is a lawyer, and he has already become an American barrister. But their disappointment is that they find themselves out of gear theologically. Our churches in their district are few and feeble, and are invariably known to all outsiders as “Campbellites.” They write that the Methodists and Presbyterians “hold all the social cream in their jugs,” and our people have scarcely any power or influence. So they themselves belong to no church again as yet, but often go a distance to attend one of our churches. I hope that they will in time flourish and be able to do something to help to promote a strong interest in their own neighborhood. Why, it may be asked, do I mention this little personal matter? Because it is of great relative importance. Because we in Old England are expected by many of our American brethren to work marvelous miracles. I am one of those who hold that our preachers, American and English, in this English field, have succeeded amazingly. We have this cluster of churches which twenty years ago had no existence. Some of them have fine buildings, worth thousands of pounds, representing generosity and sacrifice little thought of. But many of you, my American brethren and sisters, instead of taking the only consistent view of the most difficult work that man could undertake, rush to the conclusion that all is failure, because we are not pulling down cathedrals that have been idolized for a thousand years; that we do not constrain a conservative population to dance a new ecclesiastical minuet to the tune we play on one string; and that Dr. Parker, Dr. Maclaren, the Bishop of London and the Archbishop of Canterbury do not rush into the arms of W. T. Moore, E. M. Todd, or some other representative of the New Reformation! I humbly ask those who demand of us quick progress how it is that I get this graphic account, from intelligent emigrants, of the very slow progress in many parts of America also? I know it sounds a little impertinent, but Americans like fair play and will give even a “no good Britisher” a hearing. How is it that in New England, as I saw it, you have so few miracles to show? How, oh, how is it about those ecclesiastical cream-jugs? As you are Christians, I pray you have patience with us. We are only pioneering. The results will be splendid after a time, but not in your time or mine. Why should you expect more?

Hunger and Thirst After Unity.

I am going to tell you something which none of you know unless you have lived on this side. It is just this, that more and more persistently the most earnest religious people in Britain are seeking the very thing we offer them, but they are frantically endeavoring on all sides to secure it in some way of their own. I am anxious that you all in America should comprehend this. Don't think we are producing no effect simply because we have not persuaded thousands upon thousands of sectarians to execute a strategic movement of evacuation from their big camps in order to recruit our little force. We have created a current of opinion which can never subside, can never be dammed up, but is being diverted round curious channels and tortuous ways, and will be long before it joins our own "stream of tendency." It is impossible to attend any conference of religious people in these days without finding this subject of Christian unity pushed to the forefront. The Baptists met last week at Edinburg; the Congregationalists are in session at Manchester while I write these lines. Well, Dr. Parker, as Congregationalist chairman, gave a great address on "The United Congregational Church." He has added to the sensation which he created in the spring meeting, when he adumbrated his new scheme. He poured withering sarcasm on the present condition of Congregationalism for its utter lack of unity, organization and co-operation. But one effect of his tremendous onslaughts during the last year has been to make the Baptists as miserable and restless as the other body. Each is a great rope of sand. Each pays princely salaries to a number of pulpit stars and nalf starves the rank and file of the ministry. On every side we find these agitations and commotions because of a consciousness of the weakness of religious division and of the need for reunion. Again I say, no miracle of celerity will be witnessed, but slowly and surely advances will be made in the direction of the consolidation of Christian forces. And at last, when many empirical experiments have been made, first one leading spirit and then another will point to the beacon fires which are kindled by a few apostolic churches. The day will come when a simple Christian church will be esteemed as worth a thousand denominational conventicles; but for that consummation we must wait and work. Truth can afford to wait, though I am aware that some Christians forget this. I sometimes for a time forget it myself.

Political Passion Among Christians.

Strange incidents are happening which are entirely the result of intense feeling, the feeling being brought about by a mixture of conviction and prejudice. I every day hear some squabbling about the South African war. Not only amongst Englishmen in London, but also amongst Americans in London. If two Americans meet and allude to the matter they are almost certain to disagree. And if any religious assembly is held and a speaker hints at some view of this stupendous topic there are instant mutterings which threaten to wrap the chairman of the meeting in a cyclone of passion. I am certain that there is some strange, mysterious, unaccountable destiny concerned in this fearful history. We have to go on through it, but not a soul ought to pretend that he can understand either the original causes or the ultimate prospects. Good will be evolved at last in some way according to the arbitration of Providence. Here is an instance of the chaotic public temperament. It is for the sake of narrating this that I this once more mention the vexed question of the war, about which I want generally to say but little. At the great Manchester meeting, which I have already mentioned, one of the speakers was J. R. Campbell, of Brighton, who is by far the most popular Congregationalist in England outside London. This eloquent provincial was giving a singularly able discourse on the religious situation generally, when a most dramatic interlude occurred. He had been denouncing militarism amidst general applause, when, as a concession to his own desire to tell the whole truth, he said in an aside that he was one of those who believed the present war was forced upon us. 'The effect was electrical. The crowded house rang with hoarse cheers and counter-cheers, with epithets and recriminations. The chairman, Mr. J. W. Crossley, requested the speaker to confine himself to his topic, but considering that minister's marvelous popularity, the manner in which his words raised a storm was an eloquent indication of the uncontrollable passions which are being aroused among Christian men by the political situation.

Henry George Out of Fashion.

One of the American reformers whom I learned to esteem and admire when he was with us in England was the late Henry George. At one time I believed that his economic theory would take root. It never did. Nobody now seems to think any more of the wonderful book, "Progress and Poverty," which excited opinion all over the land. A new agrarian seer has arisen. Mr. Rider Haggard, the famous novelist, has been traveling about England for several months, surveying the rural districts and writing an extraordinary series of articles in the Daily Express, entitled "Back to the Land." He repeats the warnings of all our land reformers, and urges land law reform as the first duty of the friends of England. But this kind of reform is no more thought of by the people than the Evangelicalism of Newton or the Calvinism of Toplady. The working classes are hankering after shorter hours and larger wages. The middle classes are bent on making rapid fortunes and on achieving social distinction. The landed class is on the horns of a dilemma, twisting and groaning, and panting after a miracle, yet never attempting to master the problem. The soil is steadily passing out of cultivation. The English agricultural laborers are flocking to the already congested towns. The laborer is more prosperous than ever he was, and more discontented. With better wages, cheap food, with free schools, cheap newspapers, and frequent holidays, his main ambition is to escape from the country and try his fortune in the cities. To the woman this appears absolutely necessary. Then through the fatal migration follows the depravation of the blood and sinews of the race. At present the social outlook is depressing, and so also is the moral. Sir Thomas Lipton's outlay of 100,000 pounds on the yacht race is only a portion of the million pounds spent in yachting contests between England and America from first to last since that kind of sport began. The nation is more interested in a sporting cup than in its own welfare. At present gambling is the great fashion—gambling for empire, for pleasure, for success, for life itself. Only a great revival of spiritual power can turn the national soul back from its backsliding.

Falling With the Leaves.

By L. H. Stine.

For seventy and seven years she had witnessed the coming and the going of the seasons. From the fragrant flower of childhood she had passed through every change of human life to the falling leaves of her golden autumn time. All ages, all experiences had contributed their part for the enrichment of her life.

Hers was a beautiful life, beautiful as an unfolding rose in June or a crimson leaf in autumn. So long had she been looking upon the stainless image of Jesus that she found it reproduced in her character. Her life had been adorned with so many of the virtues of a spotless life, that she was beautiful as the Son of Man, when the day of her resting came.

Not more useful in its sphere is the ripening fruit of summer or the coronel of corn, than this life that was lived far into its misty autumn. From her genial face she reflected the sweetness and light of the Son of Man. Whether sitting in her house or walking in the streets she wore his name that shone with a luster richer far than the ruby's glow. The delicate charm of her own life seemed to add a gleam to the light of his name. She adorned the gospel of grace. Her example of pious living was her best interpretation of her quiet profession, and gave meaning and emphasis to her faith. Her fragrant life made her an attractive person and people welcomed her into their presence. She did not live in vain. One was made better by coming into personal contact with her consistent example of faith. One's spirit was refined, one's heart was made purer, one's purpose was ennobled. Flowers of innocence grew in her path. Gems of morning dew caught a new tint from the delicate charm of her presence. The trembling star far in the sky beheld the bright and morning star shimmering in her luminous life.

It was fitting that this perfect saint should fold her hands across her peaceful breast for her last sleep when the winds were low, when the air was mild and balmy, when the light was soft and the sky was hazy, and when shrub and tree were arrayed in their rich regalia of autumnal color. Her summer's work was done. Her harvest time was ended. Her waiting time was passing. Orion was appearing in the evening sky. A strange and mystical glory floated on the river and crowned the bluffs with wreaths of surpassing beauty. The migratory bird, dreaming of the magnolia and the orange blossom, had ceased its singing, and had unfolded its wing for its southern flight, when this charming spirit started for the frostless land.

Her soul was young, and fresh and full of hope as flowers of spring, though her body bore kinship to the falling leaves of autumn. Her life, immortal with the spirit of spring, will clothe itself with perpetual green. Why then should not her immortal part lay aside its decaying garment, as the oak its robe of colored leaves? When winter changes to spring again the oak will put forth its tender bud and will mantle itself with living green. Likewise will this saint clothe her spirit with an outer garment that will not fade.

Our Budget.

—The melancholy days will soon be due.

—But the glorious days we have had for the past two weeks have been characteristic of St. Louis weather in October.

—They indicate the kind of weather which will prevail during the world's convention of the Disciples of Christ, in 1903.

—By the way, a stroll through the World's Fair section of Forest Park yesterday afternoon, revealed to us something of the magnificent scale on which that gigantic enterprise is being planned. The thousands of people in the park, filling the aisles of the woods with continuous streams of humanity, gave the appearance of a World's Fair in actual operation.

—It was a loss in one sense to our mission work in Porto Rico for J. A. Erwin, our missionary there, to be appointed district judge by the governor, but it is a gain in another sense, that it gives Christianity a representation in the civil courts. W. H. Taylor and wife, late of Chattanooga, Tenn., who are to succeed Bro. and Sister Erwin, will no doubt prove worthy successors, and see that the work goes right forward in that island.

—A debate was held at Latona, Ill., beginning Sept. 30, between William Weatherford, of Wheeler, Ill., representing the Disciples of Christ, and D. B. Turney, of Effingham, Ill., representing the Methodist Protestant Church. T. H. Wilson, of Wheeler, reports that both men are strong debaters, that the debate was a grand success for our people, and that a friendly feeling exists between the two churches after the debate.

—The recent dedication of the enlarged Christian Church building at Mason City, Ia., by H. O. Breeden, of Des Moines, was a most successful affair. The improvements had cost about $13,000, but the call for funds resulted in pledges amounting to over $15,000 and the determination to build a parsonage. The brief history of that church has been a most remarkable one, in its strides forward to a front rank among our Iowa churches. Bro. Sargent is the present successful pastor.

—The saints at Omaha are already, no doubt, casting about for means and methods by which the next national convention may be a great success. For particulars we refer them to the local committee at Minneapolis. What that committee does not know about organizing success in the convention line is not worth bothering about. If we may judge from the energy and wisdom displayed by the Nebraska delegation in winning the convention, they will not be found wanting in preparing for it.

—Read the inaugural message of the new state president of the C. W. B. M. of Missouri, Mrs. M. M. Goode. It should be esteemed a great honor by the sisterhood of Missouri to support such a representative in the foreign field as Miss Burgess. That is a capital idea of having the C. W. B. M. in each state, as far as possible, have their own missionary in the foreign field, in addition to the regular offerings. The Missouri sisterhood should make a special effort this year to forge a little nearer to the front.

—An eastern pastor writes: "Next to being at Minneapolis is to read your write-up of it in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. It is the best and most satisfactory of any report I have seen. It is multum in parvo. Here is a second to your suggestion for a prohibition meeting in connection with the Omaha convention." It is the purpose of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to hold a mirror up to life—such life at least as is worthy of being seen by our readers—and to give our readers a much-in-little account of the same. The suggestion for a prohibition rally at Omaha was made by the prohibition meeting at Minneapolis and we hope will be carried out.

—And this is from a busy merchant who takes time to say: "There is scarcely a secular paper published anywhere which furnishes so much news sifted down and fitted to the comprehension of the common reader." We thoroughly appreciate this high compliment from our old and valued friend and patron, T. L. Fox, of Quincy, Ill. We do not take up much space with these complimentary notices, but occasionally it is well, perhaps, to let all our readers know what some of the others think of our efforts to publish a worthy religious journal.

—Charles M. Fillmore, of Cartbage, O., who, as all will admit, is a well qualified judge of sermons, writes as follows: "I have a number of books of sermons in my library by Bushnell, Swing, Franklin, Peters, McNeill, Spurgeon, Hillis, Bruce, MacLaren, Gregg, Dixon, Hughes, Drummond and others, but to my mind none of them are better, and few equal in power and helpfulness to the Witness of Jesus by Alexander Procter. May it have an immense sale."

—George P. Rutledge, pastor of the Third Christian church, Philadelphia, recently read a paper before the ministerial union of that city on the Preacher and the Pulpit, in which he criticised the use of manuscript in the pulpit, and protested against crude wit and sensationalism, maintaining that such things serve only to hoodwink the people for a time, and that the only way in which the minister could fulfill his function in the pulpit is by supplying the spiritual needs of all classes in his congregation.

—Missouri Valley College of Marshall, Mo., opened the autumn quarter with an increased attendance of about 20 per cent. above that of last year. The summer quarter's work was of such quality that the trustees have approved the continuous sessions plan for next year. The work of the summer quarter is especially adapted to the needs of teachers. The library, which last year received more than two thousand volumes of new books, has recently received $2,500 for the purchase of books for the current year. Everything points to a most satisfactory year's work. T. W. Galloway, dean.

—Mr. John W. Hannon, who has been an employe of the Christian Publishing Company for more than thirteen years, has begun the practice of law. He was admitted to the bar after completing his law course at the St. Louis Law School, and the same diligence which enabled him to do this without decreasing the efficiency of his work for this company, ought to win for him success in his profession. Persons having bad debts to collect or other legal business to transact will be sure of receiving courteous and honorable treatment by addressing John W. Hannon, Attorney at Law, 814 Wainwright Building, St. Louis.

—That was an impressive scene in the assembly room of the Christian Publishing Co., this week, when at noon all the officers and employes of the company were assembled by order of the president of the company and were briefly addressed by him on the death of their comrade, Martin H. Greve, who was greatly esteemed and respected by all. At the close of his remarks he read a series of resolutions of respect for the deceased and of sympathy for the bereaved family, which were on motion unanimously endorsed by the uplifted hands of the 45 or 50 men and women on whose faces was written the deep regret which all felt for the loss of their comrade. At 2 P. M. the funeral services were conducted at the residence of Mr. Greve by two German pastors in the German language. Brief remarks were made by G. A. Hoffmann and J. H. Garrison in English. Several representatives of the company were present. The large company of people present and the profusion of flowers attested the esteem in which he was held.

Pains in the Back

Are symptoms of a weak, torpid or stagnant condition of the kidneys or liver, and are a warning it is extremely hazardous to neglect, so important is a healthy action of these organs.

They are commonly attended by loss of energy, lack of courage, and sometimes by gloomy foreboding and despondency.

"I had pains in my back, could not sleep and when I got up in the morning felt worse than the night before. I began taking Hood's Sarsaparilla and now I can sleep and get up feeling rested and able to do my work. I attribute my cure entirely to Hood's Sarsaparilla." Mrs. J. N. PERRY, care H. S. Copeland, Pike Road, Ala.

Hood's Sarsaparilla and Pills

Cure kidney and liver troubles, relieve the back, and build up the whole system.

—J. C. Williams, of Greenville, Mo., writes that there is plenty of work for an enterprising young evangelist in southeast Missouri. After four months of work there, Brother Williams had to decline an offer for continued work because of a previous engagement with the church at Poseyville, Ind.

—We call attention to the very generous offer made by J. S. Hughes, elsewhere in this number, for his newly revised and greatly improved book on Revelation. It would be a good idea to get the book and make it a winter's study in connection with the inspired book it treats of. He has given the Christian world something worth thinking about.

—James W. Zackery, on his return from Oklahoma, preached at Gillespie and Cairo, Ill. The church at the latter place will soon begin repairs on its house. Brother Zackery has entered the College of the Bible at Lexington for a year's study and would like to make engagements with some church within reasonable distance of Lexington to preach once or twice a month.

—Paul H. Castle has been compelled on account of impaired health to resign his work at the West End Christian church and has arranged to assist Bro. Tyrrell for the time being in his pastoral work at the Mt. Cabanne church. It is hoped by Bro. Castle's friends that a little vacation from pulpit work will enable him to recuperate and be ready soon for another pastorate.

—The reception and social tendered by the Central Christian church of this city to their new pastor, Howard T. Cree and his wife, on Friday evening of last week, was perhaps the largest, and in every way one of the most successful functions of the kind ever held in the church. At 9 o'clock the company was called to order by J. H. Garrison, who introduced the new pastor in a few remarks. The response by Bro. Cree was exceedingly happy. Many strangers were present, and all were made to feel at home. Refreshments were served by the ladies in abundance, and all felt the occasion was auspicious for the success of Bro. Cree's ministry among us.

—The new Christian church at Georgetown, Ill., was dedicated by W. W. Weeden on Sunday, Oct. 20. The house is well located in this thriving town and is a building of which both the town and the church may be justly proud. The congregation is less than a year old and its origin and growth are due chiefly to the labors of S. S. Jones, of Danville, Ill. Many from surrounding places attended the dedication. The building cost $7,400, all of which was provided for before the house was dedicated. S. S. Jones was present in the morning. W. W. Weeden remains to conduct a meeting. There have been four additions already.

Special to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

—CHILLICOTHE, Mo., Oct. 28, 1901.—The great-minded, great-hearted preacher, Alexander Ellett, passed into the great beyond at midnight last night. A suitable notice of him later. Hastily and fraternally,
FRANK W. ALLEN.

The foregoing comes just as we close this week's paper. We fully endorse Bro. Allen's characterization of Bro. E. and extend our sympathy to his family.

—P. H. Duncan, of Ludlow, Ky., desires a new field of work the coming year. He labored nine years at Ludlow and built up a strong and successful church at this point.

—Lawrence Wright, of Jefferson, Ia., has closed his work as state evangelist after two years under the board and is ready to make dates for meetings anywhere.

—The church at Jackson, Tenn., will hold the opening services in its new building Nov. 3, and the sermon on that occasion will be preached by A. I. Myhr, of Nashville.

—Miss Effie Wright, of Hillsboro, O., has been engaged as pastoral helper and leader of the choir in the church at Jackson, O. She will sing in a meeting soon to be held there.

—J. W. Monser has changed his residence from Columbia to 2315 E. 14th St., Kansas City, Mo., and wishes to take work as a preacher in churches convenient to that city by railroad.

—H. A. Easton, singing evangelist, is assisting J. E. Davis in a meeting at Rossville, Ill., where A. N. Hale is pastor. Brother Easton's permanent address is 6430 Parnell Ave., Chicago. Note the change.

—J. H. Stotler, of Centralia, Ill., has prepared a leaflet giving by diagram a graphic presentation of the elements of New Testament conversion. It ought to help many to a clearer understanding of the subject.

—R. H. Ingram will close his pastorate at Albia, Ia. before the first of the year and has not yet decided upon his next location. While he has been at Albia the church has built one of the finest churches in southern Iowa.

—A. R. Adams has been called to labor indefinitely for the church at Clarksville, Ia. A reception was tendered by the church, at which the pastor of the M. E. church delivered an address of welcome. The outlook is bright.

—John T. Brown, of Louisville, Ky., is preparing an "Encyclopedia of the Churches of Christ at the Beginning of the Twentieth Century," which will consist chiefly of pictures of preachers and churches and a short sketch of each, together with a brief history of our movement.

—The week from Nov. 10 to Nov. 16 will be observed as usual as the week of prayer for young men. This movement was organized by the Y. M. C. A. and has proven beneficial in past years. All pastors and Christians generally are invited to participate in making this week of prayer a success.

—The convention of the churches of Audubon and Shelby counties, Ia., was held at Audubon, Oct. 2-4. All the preachers of the two counties were present, besides B. S. Denny, corresponding secretary for the state. Mrs. Garst gave an illustrated lecture on Japan.

—The School of Pastoral Helpers at Cincinnati has already enrolled three more students than last year. The students represent three religious bodies and eight states, and several of them are college graduates. Pastors desiring helpers should address A. M. Harvot, 617 Richmond street.

—F. M. Rogers has succeeded R. F. Thrapp at Pittsfield, Ill., and George W. Watkins, of Morocco, Ind., will succeed Brother Rogers at Barry, Ill. The church at Barry gave more than a dollar per member for missions this year and increased its offering more than $200 over last year. There were nine additions during September.

Are Your Kidneys Weak?

Thousands Have Kidney Trouble and Never Suspect it.

To Prove What the Great Kidney Remedy, Swamp-Root Will Do for YOU, Every Reader of the "Christian-Evangelist" May Have a Sample Bottle Sent Absolutely Free by Mail.

It used to be considered that only urinary and bladder troubles were to be traced to the kidneys, but now modern science proves that nearly all diseases have their beginning in the disorder of these most important organs.

The kidneys filter and purify the blood—that is their work.

Therefore, when your kidneys are weak or out of order, you can understand how quickly your entire body is affected, and how every organ seems to fail to do its duty.

If you are sick or "feel badly," begin taking the famous new discovery, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, because as soon as your kidneys are well they will help all the other organs to health. A trial will convince any one.

Weak and unhealthy kidneys are responsible for many kinds of diseases, and if permitted to continue much suffering with fatal results are sure to follow. Kidney trouble irritates the nerves, makes you dizzy, restless, sleepless and irritable. Makes you pass water often during the day and obliges you to get up many times during the night. Unhealthy kidneys cause rheumatism, gravel, catarrh of the bladder, pain or dull ache in the back, joints and muscles; makes your head ache and back ache, causes indigestion, stomach and liver trouble, you get a sallow, yellow complexion, makes you feel as though you had heart trouble, you may have plenty of ambition but no strength; get weak and waste away.

The cure for these troubles is Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the world-famous kidney remedy. In taking Swamp-Root you afford natural help to Nature, for Swamp-Root is the most perfect healer and gentle aid to the kidneys that is known to medical science.

If there is any doubt in your mind as to your condition, take from your urine on rising about four ounces, place it in a glass or bottle and let it stand twenty-four hours. If on examination it is milky or cloudy, if there is a brick-dust settling, or if small particles float about in it, your kidneys are in need of immediate attention.

Swamp-Root is pleasant to take and is used in the leading hospitals, recommended by physicians in their private practice, and is taken by doctors themselves who have kidney ailments, because they recognize in it the greatest and most successful remedy for kidney, liver and bladder troubles.

SPECIAL NOTICE—If you have the slightest symptoms of kidney or bladder troubles, or if there is a trace of it in your family history, send at once to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., who will gladly send you by mail, immediately, without cost to you, a sample bottle of Swamp Root and a book containing many of the thousands upon thousands of testimonial letters received from men and women cured. In writing, be sure to say that you read this generous offer in the St. Louis CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

—The Brooklyn Daily Eagle contains in its sermon department of the 14th inst., an able sermon on "Temperance" by M. E. Harlan. He takes occasion to deny the stale charge that prohibitionists believe that legislation would transform men's character. On this point he says:

"Law is a wall around the citadel of rights, but is not a creator of righteousness. Temperance laws are formed not so much to reform the individual as they are to protect society and give reformation a fair chance in the race. Instead of incarcerating the diseased drunkard they would muzzle the drunkard maker in the name of liberty for the protection of the community and the family from the man who for mercenary ends forces poverty and disgrace upon them. People who are loud in their advocacy of the prohibition of 'the landing of paupers,' the importation and use of opium, the circulation of obscene literature, become sentimental on the question of liberty when it relates to the saloon-keeper. Yet he has no more right to consideration than has the vender of opium, and surely his traffic has ruined more homes than has the traffic of the opium vender."

—T. R. Gray, who has no regular pastorate at present, wishes to supply vacant pulpits in north Missouri towns or will preach once or more a month if desired. He can be addressed at 415 E. Jackson street, Chillicothe, Mo.

—The church at Oskaloosa, Ia., celebrated the eighth anniversary of its dedication on Oct. 27. The former pastors of the congregation, A. M. Haggard, D. A. Wickizer and G. A. Ragan, were invited to be present.

—J. P. Graves, of Jacksonville, Ill., is now in Indiana in the interest of the National Benevolent Association and will canvass the churches throughout the state. We hope he will have a cordial reception. T. J. Freed, of Remington, Ind., reports that the church there gave liberal pledges to this worthy cause.

(Swamp-Root is pleasant to take.)

If you are already convinced that Swamp-Root is what you need, you can purchase the regular fifty-cent and one-dollar size bottles at the drug stores everywhere.

Ohio Letter.

Help save Ohio! This is the cry just now of S. H. Bartlett, corresponding secretary of the Ohio Christian Missionary Society. It is a worthy cry. Fifty years ago there were 124 churches of Christ in Ohio. Now there are 540. Then there were 7,691 communicants. Now there are 75,000. This is the year of jubilee, $25,000 is the mark set for Ohio missions this year. The time to offer this money to the Lord is November 3. But if for any reason it cannot be done then, any Sunday in November will do. Never has there been better and more thorough preparation on the part of a state secretary for an offering. Many churches that did not take the offering last year have asked for literature for preparation to take it this year. The preachers are enthusiastic. Hear them:

We will try to make $200, and try hard. J. R. Ewers, Bowling Green.

We are with you for large things. John P. Sala, Gallion.

We will increase our offering. J. W. Kerns, Steubenville.

We will try to go beyond our apportionment. W. S. Goode, Youngstown.

Will canvass the entire congregation. Expect a fine offering. M. L. Buckley, Harrison.

Our motto adopted is "Plan, pray, pull, for a large offering." E. J. Mecham, Wilmington.

And so they go by the scores. But beloved, hear me, 150 churches that took the Ohio offering last year have expressed no such purpose for this year up to this date. Why this thinsness? Awake, brethren, and give ear to this wonderful call. Send for the literature, scatter it well, let the people read and then give them an opportunity and they will do the rest. Any preacher who wilfully neglects the offering for Buckeye missions this year ought to resign and leave Ohio at once. So much for Ohio missions.

There is another way to help save Ohio this fall. This opportunity comes Nov. 5. On that date we elect a governor and state officers and a legislature. The temperance issue is at stake. The battle is on. Will the voting Disciples of Christ in Ohio be sure that they vote for men for the legislature who will stand by the Clark bill? Brethren, the honor of the church is at stake. In Franklin county things wax hot. Thos. H. Clark is a candidate for re-election to the house of representatives. He is the father of the above named bill. Two years ago Gov. Nash appointed Carl Hoster as a member of his staff. At that time said Hoster was president of the state brewers' association. Now he is leading the brewing and saloon element of this county against two of the Republican candidates for representative, Mr. Clark and Mr. Tuller. The governor is in hot water. He fears to call the brewer president off from his fight for fear they will bolt the whole ticket and if he doesn't, the temperance people may bolt Gov. Nash. Verily, the way of the transgressor is hard. What the harvest will be is, at this time, doubtful.

Vernon Stauffer, of Richmond St., Cincinnati, has had a relapse and been very low. But at last account was a little better. He has had typhoid fever.

Wesley Hatcher has changed his program and will remain with New Holland and Derby another year.

S. H. Bartlett preached at the Central church, Columbus, Oct. 20.

H. L. Atkinson has taken the church at Cedar Avenue, Cleveland.

C. W. Huffer began a meeting Monday, Oct. 21, at the Franklin Avenue church, Columbus.

Wm. Harris is in a meeting at Mill Creek in Union county. Rumor has it that he has resigned at Paulding. C. A. FREER.

Sport: A Criticism.

In the issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for Oct. 10, in the section headed Current Events, I was much surprised to find a paragraph devoted to the recent international sporting event—the yacht race between the Columbia and Lipton's Shamrock II., and I was led to ask myself, is it necessary, judicious or consistent with the Christianity of Christ, for a religious paper, advocating a return to apostolic faith and practice, to notice and favorably comment upon anything in the line of sport? If it seem the proper thing to some, with the New Testament before me, I cannot see any propriety or consistency in Christians being interested in great sporting events which involve gambling and betting on a large scale, and which are always productive of evil in the long run to all that are therein concerned. We all surely know that Sir Thomas Lipton is not a Christian hero, nor is he a hero to Christians, because Christians know that he is not putting his great wealth to a humane or philanthropic use, not to mention the Christian use thereof. I question if any religious paper in England would devote a sentence, let alone a paragraph, to such a worldly affair as a yacht race. For a religious paper to notice approvingly such an event, is, to say the least, very inconsistent with its religious or Christian aims and principles. I do not think that Christ and his apostles, or a George Fox, or a Wesley, or Campbell would have paid any attention to such events whatsoever.

A. JOBERNS.

North Braddock, Pa.

[We welcome this, as we do every kindly and courteous criticism. It raises an important question: What should be the attitude of a Christian toward sports? In our own opinion the Christian attitude consists not in ignoring them; it is scarcely possible to do that; even our correspondent seems familiar with the names of the boats and the main facts regarding the race. Does not the Christian attitude toward sport consist rather in taking from it the pre-eminence which the frivolous mind gives to it; reducing it to its proper place as a matter of mere momentary interest; and rebuking those phases of it which may be immoral? If this should be the attitude of a Christian man toward sport, should it not also be the attitude of a Christian paper? We think so. Accordingly, instead of devoting page after page to the yacht race, as the secular papers did, the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST devoted two paragraphs; and recognizing the great evil of the gambling feature, we condemned it editorially under the heading "A Perversion of Sport." (See our issue of Sept. 5.) Sir Thomas Lipton, according to all reports, never gambles. He did not wager a shilling on his Shamrock II., and for that reason, among others, we felt like commending him as a fine type of sportsman. That Sir Thomas spends a larger proportion of his wealth on sport than, in our judgment, a Christian man ought, is quite true. But by his generous and considerate treatment of the army of employees who have helped him to make his fortune, he has perhaps exhibited a truer benevolence than some of the philanthropists who grind the poor and endow colleges.—EDITOR.]

Death of J. W. Ingram.

The news of the death of J. W. Ingram will bring sadness to very many hearts. His death occurred Thursday morning, Oct. 10, at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Dr. Newkirk, 313 Soto St., Los Angeles. Another daughter, Mrs. Cain, of Nebraska, arrived a few days before her father's death. The funeral services were held in the Broadway Christian church, Sunday, Oct. 13, at 3 P. M. The services were conducted by the writer, assisted by Brethren T. D. Garvin, B. F. Coulter and J. W. Utter. Mrs. Princess C. Long sang Bro. Ingram's favorite song, "The Sowers and the Reapers." A quartet from the choir of the First Christian church of Pasadena sang two most beautiful and appropriate selections. The singers were Mr. and Mrs. Parmly, Miss Clarice Hall and Dr. Chas. Rice. Bro. Ingram was born at Unionville, O., Aug. 31, 1839. His first pastorate was at Fairview, Ia. He occupied some of the most important pulpits of the brotherhood, such as at Nashville, Chicago, Omaha, Denver, San Jose, Pasadena, Alameda. He stood in the front rank of our preachers, and was identified with our missionary, educational, and benevolent enterprises. As a preacher he was natural, direct, fearless, tender and loving. He preached the word. He was a man of great faith. Multitudes will recall blessings that came through his believing prayers. Surely there is a prince and a great man fallen in Israel. In his death the brotherhood will feel that they have suffered a great loss. How greatly he will be missed out here on the Pacific Coast, can be realized only by those who know how well adapted just such a type of man is to the needs and conditions here. No one can fill his place; yet his removal will inspire those who remain to greater activity in the cause he loved with an all-consuming love. Sister Ingram bears her grief with true Christian fortitude and resignation. She knows that they who die in the Lord are blessed forever, and that to be absent from the body is to be present with the Lord.

FRANK M. DOWLING.

Pasadena, Cal., Oct. 24, 1901.

[We add our sincerest tribute of love and esteem for our departed friend and brother. While he was pastor at Pasadena, Cal., it was our privilege to preach in his church, as we had previously done at Nashville and Chicago where he was pastor. He was the soul of courtesy and kindness—a lovable man, an able preacher, a true pastor, a faithful husband. Our sympathy goes out to his bereaved wife and daughters.—EDITOR.]

The Gospel Of The Helping Hand.

The National Benevolent Association of the Churches of Christ has just been presented with $1,500 by Champion Ferguson, of Eureka Springs, Ark., who reserves the right to a life annuity in the same.

This is becoming a very popular method of investing money by Disciples of philanthropic inclinations. By the terms of our annuity bonds, the investor is guaranteed a good interest payable semi-annually, has the advantage of administering on his own estate and the joy of seeing his money make comfortable the last days of old saints of the Lord, and give to helpless orphans a fair start in life's race for the goals of learning, usefulness, honor and heaven.

Let those wishing fellowship with Bro. Ferguson and other noble Disciples in this wise and beautiful ministry, write,

GEO. L. SNIVELY, General Secretary.

If Your Brain is Tired Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

Dr. T. D. CROTHERS, Supt. Walnut Lodge Asylum, Hartford, Conn., says: "It is a remedy of great value in building up functional energy and brain force." Invigorates the entire system.

Popular Hymns No. 2

THE ruling purpose of the author has been to give to the public a worthy successor of Popular Hymns. He has not sought to duplicate it, but to make a book as well adapted to the new methods of Church, Sunday-school and C. E. work as the first was to the conditions twenty years ago when Popular Hymns was launched upon its long and useful career. Popular Hymns No. 2 is better than its predecessor, not because it contains better music, but because the music is better adapted to the present wants of all the working forces of the army of the Lord.

EVANGELISTS will find the Gospel Proclamation in Song a department of the book eminently suited to every phase of a successfully conducted revival.

CHORISTERS will find the average choir supplied with a rich selection of beautiful and impressive solos with choruses, duets, quartettes, invocations and doxologies specially selected for the distinctive part a choir is expected to take in the service.

PASTORS who are responsible for the kind of pasture upon which the sheep and lambs are fed, will NOT find a sentiment out of harmony with New Testament Christianity. He will find it a companion vade mecum for his pocket Testament, containing gems for public worship, for the prayer-meeting, for funeral occasions, for Baptismal, Thanksgiving and Convention services. He will find that an expensive hymnal will not be needed unless it be to keep in the style.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVORERS will find in Popular Hymns No. 2 all that they can wish, because it is full from back to back with soul-stirring sentiment set to soul-inspiring music, the only kind C. E.'s care to sing. The Solos, Duets, and Quartettes may be impressively used to enrich every session of the Society.

S. S. SUPERINTENDENTS who believe the Sunday-school should be the nursery of the church, the church at work saving the young, will find Popular Hymns No. 2 richly supplied with music within the voice compass and heart reach of the children, giving them a desire to remain and participate in the song service of the church. Like its predecessor, Missouri Bible-School Notes.

Tuxedo is to make a fall campaign for new pupils and M. I. Payne has the promise of the Endeavor Bible-school committee that they will do the work. The church work is also doing nicely under Pastor Bennett.

The reports from the rallies are all good, the audiences were fine, the program most acceptable, the offering generous, the visitors pleased and the school membership, where seen to, was increased.

Carondelet, one of our struggling missions, made its first offering to state Bible-school work on rally day, and I personally thank them for it.

It means much to our schools in Morgan that E. B. Woods is one of the men selected to take the oversight of four of the Morgan county churches and a much better report will be made next June of that region.

Let some of the Missouri schools carry off the honors proffered by the Sunday-School Times to one hundred schools showing the best per cent. of increase from Dec. 1, 1901, to Feb. 28, 1902. It is on the per cent. basis, so that the size of the school cuts no figure. Write the Times, Philadelphia, Pa., for entry blank, free, and compete for this worthy honor and $25 in gold.

The second honor, by same paper, is to the one hundred schools showing the greatest percentage of increase in their average attendance from the first Sunday in December, 1901, to the last Sunday in February 1902, and many of our schools should be in this list.

John Giddens is pushing his work in southwest Missouri, his last work being at Arnica, Hazel Dell, Montevallo and Urbana, with one school and one congregation organized, and thirty-three additions in all. Write him for help at Eldorado Springs, Bro. Havener at Windsor.

I am to give the month of November, except second Sunday, to southwest Missouri, and if I can help any point in that region by a visit, write me here.

The month of December is to be given to southeast Missouri and to any community in that region my services are proffered. No stipulations as to compensation, but we do the work and take what you can give to help us on.

Let all our schools remember their promises and that the third quarter will soon be due. Have you paid the first and second? Your tardiness is to our hinderance.

News from Drake.

Drake University is now an institution of twenty years. One member of her present faculty, Bruce E. Shepperd, dean of the college of Letters and Science, has been with her from the first.

Up to date, more students have enrolled this year than at a corresponding time last year. The Bible college enjoys a healthy growth. The present enrollment in this department is 120, against 110 for entire time last year. This school has been materially strengthened within the past two years, by the coming of Dr. Lockhart, Profs. Veatch and Stairs.

The Iowa School of Law is this year under the complete management of the university, Ex-Chief Justice Cole has been retained as dean, together with Ex-Chief Justice L. G. Kinne and Hon. C. P. Holmes as instructors, while to the faculty have been added Prof. V. H. Roberts and others. Dr. Roberts has just completed three years of post-graduate work at Heidelberg, Germany, where he graduated with highest honors and received the degree of LL.D.

The Medical School has been strengthened by the coming of Prof. Hoffman, who has a Ph.D. from Heidelberg and Munich Universities.

An interesting and profitable feature of school life at "Drake" is the chapel hour. Chancellor Craig makes a special effort to have a good speaker for the students every day or two. Recently we have had speeches from Col. Hull, Dr. I. N. McCash, R. H. Fife, of Weston, Mo., Simpson Ely, Des Moines, H. B. Marshall, pastor of Central Presbyterian church, Des Moines, Mr. Sidney Foster, a prominent citizen and politician of Iowa. Wednesday morning Dr. W. E. Garrison, of St. Louis, led devotional exercises, and in the evening made an address at a students' missionary rally. After the address a subscription was made for the Wyrick mission in Japan which is supported by University Place church and Drake students, which amounted to $239.

Missouri C. W. B. M.

DEAR SISTERS:—At our state convention, held in Mexico, Sept. 16-17, I was made president of Missouri C. W. B. M. While I am sensible of the honor bestowed upon me and thank you for the love and kindness which prompted it, still I feel that a great responsibility has been laid upon me. You will hold me responsible, in a measure, for the success or failure of our work for this year. I assure you that to me this is no small matter, and my heart is burdened with the weight of it. But, sisters, I, in turn, shall hold you responsible—and I want you to make this personal and say, "She means me." Having bestowed upon me this high honor it is your duty to support my efforts to forward the cause we so love, and upon the rank and file of the workers depends, at last, the success of the work. But a far graver thought is this, that God will hold us all responsible. It is his work and we are his handmaidens; and as "not a sparrow falleth but our Lord doth know" so, not the least and humblest of us is forgotten of him. He sees every effort we put forth in behalf of his kingdom, hears every smallest prayer we breathe, and knows of every neglect of duty.

Our board has decided to attempt this year a special work which seems to me very fitting and beautiful. It is the support of our own Mattie Burgess in India. We hope and believe that this work will meet with the heartiest approval of our workers, as Miss Burgess is greatly beloved by those of us so fortunate as to know her. But to make this the success it should be will require the consecrated work and prayers of a united sisterhood. Let every sister and every auxiliary have some part in the work.

for ten or twelve successive weeks will be occupied by reviews by prominent brethren of THE PRAISE HYMNAL. Don't fail to read them. They will interest you.

THE PRAISE HYMNAL is a church music book embodying the newer ideas and later good music, at the same time retaining the best of the old. In short, it is designed to meet, on the one hand, the demands of those leading churches who have grown musically, and, on the other, to insure the musical development of all our churches.

We send samples, on approval, to those who wish to examine it.

The Historical Society.

A meeting of persons interested in the formation of an historical society was held at Minneapolis, Tuesday, Oct. 15, at 1 P. M., at the West Hotel. A company of twenty-five representative men and women were present, while many others expressed an interest in the movement, but could not be present on account of other duties at the same hour. A temporary organization was formed, with Errett Gates, chairman, C. C. Morrison, secretary. After a brief discussion of the desirability and place of such a society, a committee of five, consisting of C. B. Newnan, A. B. Philpott, Burris A. Jenkins, F. D. Power and Errett Gates, was appointed to draw up a constitution and form of organization, and report at the next congress at Cleveland.

The following persons gave in their names to form a charter membership: A. McLean, A. C. Smithers, C. C. Smith, E. L. Powell, David E. Motley, F. P. Arthur, S. S. Jones, John T. Brown, W. C. Payne, Mrs. G. W. Moore, Mrs. W. S. Moffett, W. J. Lhamon, Errett Gates, C. C. Morrison, B. B. Tyler, A. B. Philpott.

This membership list will be kept open until the adoption of the constitution in March. During this time those who desire to be enrolled as charter members, and have a voice in the adoption of a constitution, may do so by sending their names to the undersigned.

While the conditions of membership have not been fixed yet, it is safe to say that they will be within the reach of all.

ERRETT GATES,

Evangelistic.

Special dispatch to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

CAMDEN POINT, Mo., Oct. 29.—Forty-six here at close of first two weeks.—J. N. P. JESSE.

ARKANSAS.

Eureka Springs, Oct. 24.—Baptized five last night and one was received by letter. I leave in a few days for Athens, Tex. This is a congregation of most splendid people in a delightful town and somebody is wanted to take up the work where I leave it. Correspond with Dr. J. D. Jordan.—J. H. FULLER.

COLORADO.

Fort Collins, Oct. 21.—It gives me unusual pleasure to report the greatest meeting ever held in northern Colorado. Bro. Wm. J. Lockhart, who had just graduated from Drake University, and full of the Drake spirit, came to us four months ago. Almost from the first men and women began to make the good confession. The second week after the college opening, Bro. Lockhart began his series of meetings, ably assisted by Bro. Garmong as singing evangelist, also from Drake. One hundred and nine were added to the church, 77 by confession, 22 reclaimed, and 10 by letter. Of these, 28 are students at the college. A struggling, fearful, semi mission church has become strong and hopeful. Five made the confession after the meeting closed. Altogether the number of additions is 130.—BARTON O. AYLESWORTH.

Salida, Oct. 21.—One addition last night by statement. This makes eight since our coming to this work. Last week I visited Villa Grove and preached for four evenings. This is a village of 100 people, mostly miners and cattle men in the San Luis valley, 35 miles from here. They have no religious services and seemed greatly to enjoy our work with them. Every one who was at all able to attend did so, even the saloon-keeper and family. I hope to go over the range frequently and do a little of such work.—F. F. WALTERS.

IDAHO.

Grangeville.—The meeting at Grangeville, Idaho, resulted in the organization of a church with 50 members, a Sunday school with an enrollment of 60, a Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor with 32 members. A lot was purchased and a beautiful church building erected which was dedicated Oct. 6. Bro. W. F. Cowden, of Tacoma, Wash., preached the dedicatory sermon, after which the writer raised enough money and pledges to provide for all the indebtedness. Bro. C. T. McDonald will lead the forces. We are in a meeting here with seven added to date.—L. F. STEPHENS AND WIFE, Moscow, Idaho, Oct. 22.

ILLINOIS.

Ashley, Oct. 23.—Closed the meeting at Gaston Grove, Oct. 20, with three baptisms and two taking membership. Eld. J. H. G. Brinkerhuff is in a meeting at Mulkingtown, Ill., where I preached for two years.—F. M. MORGAN.

Blandinsville, Oct. 21.—Meeting at Old Bedford church eight days old with 11 additions to date, 9 by confession and two by letter. R. M. Shelton, who was expected to assist us in this meeting, has not been able to come.—OSCAR INGOLD, pastor.

Carlinville, Oct. 21.—Yesterday was rally day and roll call. Evangelist W. H. Harding was present and helped very much. The work here now is on solid basis and the outlook is very bright. Walnut, Oct. 28.—Am here assisting Bro. J. R. Golden in a meeting. Our meeting at Bellamy, Mo., ended up grandly, with 34 additions, 24 by confession and baptism. The last night of the meeting there were 125 rigs—buggies, carriages and wagons, besides those who came afoot and horseback.—MORGAN MORGANS.

Washington, Oct. 20.—Prof. James Kirk, of Carbondale, recently spent Sunday in Washington and occupied the pulpit. This is the home of his boyhood and the people heard him gladly.—H. H. PETERS.

Watseka, Oct. 28.—Another baptism yesterday, a lady from Toledo, O., 77 years old. Had been a Methodist over half a century. Our quartette furnished music for the state Endeavor convention at Danville, Ill. Church rally, Nov. 3; great things expected.—B. S. FERRALL.

INDIANA.

Fort Wayne, Oct. 21.—Four accessions last Lord's day, two by primary obedience and two from the Christian Connection.—Z. A. HARRIS, minister W. Creighton Ave. Church of Christ.

Indianapolis, Oct. 24.—There were 10 additions in the meeting in Macy.—J. M. CANFIELD.

Rushville, Oct. 27.—Meeting 8 days old, 53 to date; 38 to-day, 34 by confession; 1,400 present to-night. Russell is a royal yokefellow. The church is hard at work.—WILSON AND HUSTON, evangelists.

IOWA.

Clearfield, Oct. 21.—One addition by letter at Diagonal, a Sunday afternoon mission point, yesterday. This makes 9 accessions at Diagonal and 14 at this place since July 1.—FRANK L. VAN VOORHIS.

Council Bluffs, Oct. 21.—We are now making some repairs on our church, with money all raised before we began. We are to have a church rally Nov. 3 in both Sunday-school and church. Had fine audience to-day, with 2 additions. I am asked to speak at the Nebraska state C. E. convention Oct. 26, in Omaha, and at the Mills county Church of Christ convention.—W. B. CREWDSON.

Des Moines, Oct. 27.—R. L. McHatton has been with the Highland Park church eight days. Eighteen have been added to the church. Audiences good, preaching clear, clean and kind. We expect a good meeting every way.—CLARK BOWER, pastor.

Panora, Oct. 22.—Began here just two weeks ago; 16 additions to date and splendid audiences. The outlook is hopeful for good.—W. A. MOORE.

Panora.—Third week. Five additions; total additions during the meeting, thus far, 24. W. A. Moore, of St. Louis, doing the preaching.

KANSAS.

Caldwell, Oct. 21.—Had four additions Lord's day morning. The church is in a very flourishing condition.—B. A. CHANNER.

Horton, Oct. 28.—Meeting closed last night after running for four weeks, with 30 added, 18 by confession, five by letter and statement, one from Dunkers, one Presbyterian, one Baptist, one Catholic, one Episcopalian, two from M. E's. We had a good meeting by home forces. The church is again united and a more aggressive work will be done.—L. H. BARNUM.

HOLE IN THE LUNGS

There are thousands of men and women, as well as ever, with holes in their lungs: consumption stopped.

What did it?

Some change in way of life and Scott's emulsion of cod-liver oil.

A hole in the lungs, once healed, is no worse than a too-tight waist or waistcoat. Take the emulsion and give it a chance to heal the wound.

We'll send you a little to try, if you like.
SCOTT & BOWNE, 409 Pearl street, New York.

Kansas City, Oct. 19.—There have been 22 additions to the North Side church at regular services since August first.—J. O. DAVIS, some weeks.—E. L. POSTON.

Kansas City, Oct. 21.—I have just completed the first year of my pastorate with the Central Christian church. This is a mission field of the Kansas state convention. We began last October with about 50 members meeting in a store room. Soon outgrew those quarters and rented Central Christian church building, formerly owned by our people but lost through dissension and debt. In one year we have had a net gain in membership of 84 without any special and protracted evangelist effort. Within the last three weeks, which fall within my second year's pastorate, Bro. H. A. Northcutt has been holding us a meeting. Result, accessions 40 and the church encouraged greatly. Present membership 183. We now look toward the acquisition of a church home. Bro. Northcutt did us great good.—C. M. SHARPE, pastor.

Leavenworth, Oct. 23.—In a meeting here with home forces. Meeting three days old with one confession.—S. W. NAY.

Leavenworth, Oct. 25.—Three additions last evening.—S. W. NAY.

Leavenworth, Oct. 28.—Six additions yesterday. Meeting with home forces one week old with ten additions.—S. W. NAY.

McPherson, Oct. 21.—Began my work at McPherson last Sunday. Had good audiences both morning and evening. There was one addition at the evening service, five confessions there recently not reported. I find the church in fairly good shape, hopeful of the future and anxious to get to work.—W. T. ADAMS.

Morrill, Oct. 28.—Three additions at our regular services yesterday, two by statement and one by baptism. I held a short meeting at Powhattan the first of the month where the church had been dormant for some time. We left them united and working, with Bro. John L. Lewis as pastor for half time. The brethren there have a debt of four hundred dollars on their building, but have adopted a plan which I think will soon remove that burden. They intend sowing thirty acres of wheat next fall and planting about forty acres of corn in the spring. The ground and seed will be donated and the labor also, and the price of the harvests will be applied on the church debt. I think this plan could be successfully employed by many of our congregations in like circumstances.—I. A. WILSON.

Pleasanton, Oct. 20.—We had four additions to-day. Eleven have been added by letter and baptism since June. I delivered the address "McKinley as a Statesman," to about 1,000 people in the opera house, also the address to the union Sunday-school convention of Linn county at Blue Mound. We had a good convention. I assist Bro. Gilbert Park, of Buffalo, Kan., in the dedication of their new church and help in a meeting of Winchester, Oct. 23.—Nine baptized here since last report.—H. E. BALLOU.

South Side Church, Kansas City, Oct. 28.—Four added yesterday and two the Sunday before, making about 80 during my work here. I passed the state medical examination last July. Hence, am a registered physician and surgeon. Besides my preaching and practice, I teach in the medical college and am also taking the senior work. Am too busy to report often.—T. L. NOBLITT, M. A.

KENTUCKY.

Corbin, Oct. 21.—We have just had nine more confessions and we hope to be able to pay our indebtedness and finish our large new house.—J. J. COLE.

Corbin, Oct. 27.—I have spent the last month in holding meetings for Bro. Cole at Barbourville and Corbin. We have just had 12 more additions, making between 30 and 40 in all.—T. M. MYERS.

Milton, Oct. 21.—Our very successful meeting at Mt. Byrd closed last Friday night with fifty-two additions, 41 of whom confessed their faith in Christ. J. B. Yager led our forces.—HUBERT S. SNYDER.

MISSOURI.

Albany, Oct. 18.—Twelve days' meeting at the Honey Creek church. Eight young ladies and three young men baptized and one young man reclaimed. Left a good interest to come here. Commenced a meeting at the Old Log church Wednesday evening, near Plattsburg, Mo.—I. D. McCLEURE.

Bigelow.—I am helping Bro. Gill, of this place, in a meeting. Two have made the good confession and one reclaimed. The church is in good condition through Bro. Gill's efforts; he is a good preacher and an earnest worker, well informed in doctrine and pleasing in delivery. He can be secured for one-half time.—J. A. MCKENZIE, St. Joseph, Mo.

Buffalo, Oct. 22.—I have just returned from Antioch church in Hickory county, where I have been helping Bro. J. D. Babb, the pastor, in a two weeks' meeting. There were 56 additions to the church, 46 confessions, seven from the Baptists, two restored, one by statement. One interesting feature of the meeting is that 24 of these were young men and heads of families.—S. E. HENDRICKSON.

Chillicothe, Oct. 28.—Just closed a three weeks' meeting at Unionville, Putnam county, Mo., with 20 additions, 17 by baptism; one by letter, one from Baptists, one reclaimed. I was ably assisted by Bro. Frank A. Wilkerson, of Yale, Ia., as singer, and Sister Gertrude Ammons, of Seymour, as organist.—O. L. SUMNER, pastor.

Clinton, Oct. 24.—One added last night at prayer-meeting by confession.—ERNEST H. WILLIAMSON.

Fayette.—Bro. A. N. Lindsay and Bro. Furnish, our pastor, closed a very interesting and successful gospel meeting at Mt. Moriah church, near Fayette, Mo., with 27 additions. The meeting has been very beneficial to the church and community.—S. J. W.

Fayette, Oct. 21.—The meeting held for the church here by the pastor, E. M. Richmond, closed with 39 additions. Altogether there have been 45 since the beginning of Bro. Richmond's pastorate, June 1. At the close of the lectureship held here in the spring, Creighton Brooks preached a few sermons with four additions and A. N. Lindsay continued three weeks and added 20 more; total for the year so far 69. Bro. Richmond has much endeared himself to the church as pastor.—F. H. QUINN.

Frankford, Oct. 28.—Am having a revival with home church. Crowded houses and great interest. Five additions to date. F. M. Brashears leader in song. The church has called me for all my time for next year, with increased salary.—W. P. DORSEY.

Galena, Oct. 22.—Closed a meeting at Liberal, Barton county, with 29 additions, 15 baptisms. Bro. J. P. Adcock, of Pilot Point, doing the preaching.—O. W. JONES.

Kearney, Oct. 27.—The meeting here continues with unabated interest. Two weeks old last night with 29 added.—KING STARK.

Kirkville, Oct. 25.—There were four additions to the church here last Sunday.—H. A. NORTHCUTT.

La Belle, Oct. 22.—Just closed a two weeks' meeting with the church at Newark, where J. T. McGarvey ministers, with 10 additions, eight by confession, two by statement.—J. H. COIL.

Macon.—Our meeting has begun to yield what has been sown. Bro. Coombs is a powerful preacher of God's word. Twenty have been added, nearly all confessions. Church greatly aroused and working hard.—W. S. LOCKHART.

Mokane, Oct. 23.—To-morrow night we close a few days' meeting at Mokane, Mo.; two confessions to date. Elder J. M. Blalock assisted us in a two weeks' meeting, which closed the first Sunday of October, at Friendship, Mo. It resulted in 15 confessions, three otherwise, to which two confessions and one otherwise were added at our last regular appointment.—J. W. STRAWN.

Paris, Oct. 25.—I closed a 12 days' meeting at Ash, Mo., last night, resulting in 16 additions, 12 by baptism and four by statement.—C. H. STRAWN.

Princeton, Oct. 18.—Our meeting here is not yet three weeks old, but we have 27 added. Prospects for a grand meeting are very fine. Mr. and Mrs. Williamson are doing excellent service as song leaders. Mrs. Williamson preached to women only last Sunday afternoon. It was an excellent service. We had two or three members who danced, but so reasonable and convincing was her sermon that they became the most radical converts. Her sermon was extolled by every one there. We were kept from Minneapolis because of this meeting.—J. E. DAVIS.

St. Louis, Oct. 28.—Two by letter, one by confession yesterday.—J. N. CRUTCHER.

Springfield, Oct. 26.—W. E. Harlow and Miss Murphy are in a meeting with the First church; 11 added to date. Large audiences and good interest. The meeting will continue.—E. W. BOWERS.

Stanberry, Oct. 22.—I have just closed a three weeks' meeting at Isadora, Mo., with 60 additions. A very fine meeting because of the quality as well as quantity. A good number of men ranging from 25 to 73 years; 34 of the number of additions were by confession.—W. H. HARRIS.

Tindall, Oct. 18.—About one year ago three or four sisters conceived the idea of having a few days' meeting, for which the Methodist brethren very kindly offered their building. With the few additions at this time the membership amounted to about 15. With this nucleus they undertook to build a church. The building that was completed Monday, Sept. 23, cost about $1,200. C. F. Stevens, of Trenton, began a meeting that evening. On Sept. 25, 26, the County Christian Co-operation held its sessions here and on the following Lord's day the house was dedicated. The indebtedness was all provided for. With the assistance of our Trenton brethren the meetings were continued until Oct. 15. The song service was in charge of Bro. Luther Collier. There were 13 additions one evening, 17 another and 22 another, and often as many as seven and eight. The total number was 115, of whom 20 came from the Baptist, Presbyterian, Methodist and Christian Union, eight by statement and the remainder by confession. At one baptismal service 34 were baptized, 10 of whom are men over 40 years of age. Two-thirds of the entire number were men.—E. D. HENDRICKSON, county president.

Vandalia, Oct. 21.—Six additions here recently.—W. H. KERNS.

Warrensburg, Oct. 28.—Forty-four accessions up to date in meeting here. Pastor Denton had everything in fine shape for a meeting. He is one of our most successful pastors. Our next meeting will be at Waukegan, Ill.—R. A. OMER AND SPRAGUE.

NEW YORK.

Syracuse, Oct. 21.—Increasing audiences and interest here. Two confessions at our regular services last night and more to follow. My seventh year in this pastorate is drawing to its close.—E. RICHARD EDWARDS.

Troy.—The annual report of the River St. church of Christ shows the number of additions for the year to be 29, of which 17 were by baptism. A good spirit is manifest in all the work of the church and there are many signs of promise. There has been an increase in the average attendance at all services.—G. B. TOWNSEND, pastor.

OHIO.

Columbus, Oct. 21.—A grand flag rally was held by the Bible-school, with 319 present and an offering of $11.22. At the close of the morning service a conference of men was held in the interest of more regular attendance at all the services. The officers have adopted plans for our new auditorium. Two baptisms at the evening service.—M. E. CHATLEY, pastor.

Massillon, Oct. 21.—Commenced a meeting here yesterday. I have declined the call to become pastor of the First Christian church at Canton, O., and am in the evangelistic field. Am in good health.—J. V. UPDIKE.

OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Norman, Oct. 21.—Two additions to the church here last night, one by letter, one by statement. One baptism at prayer-meeting last Wednesday night.—J. G. CREASON.

Stroud, Oct. 21.—My work of three weeks with this church closed last night. I came to dedicate the new church, effect an organization, locate a pastor and hold a meeting; a Sunday-school organized of 69 members and money raised for the pastor's salary and A. M. Harral given a call. He will begin here the first Sunday in November. There were 25 added to the church during our meeting. The church now has about 40 members. I go next to the new town of Hobart.—C. H. HILTON.

Houston, Oct. 21.—Five accessions last week; 13 since our coming on Oct. 6.—E. W. BRICKERT.

Sulphur Springs, Oct. 26.—We have just closed a meeting here with 52 additions. J. W. Marshall, evangelist.—M. M. SMITH, pastor.

WASHINGTON.

Waitsburg, Oct. 15.—I began work here Sept 1. Since then improvements have been made on the building and a parsonage is under way; two confessions.—A. A. BEERY.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Parkersburg, Oct. 25.—The Yeuell and White meeting at Parkersburg, W. Va., continues with great interest; 56 added in less than three weeks, and about $500 in cash raised, which was deemed impossible. Crowds fill and overflow the house all through. No small audiences, not even Monday and Saturday. C. G. White came here about two years ago, and I found comparatively nothing, but if there be no division I predict that in five years this will be one of the big churches of this town of 20,000 inhabitants. Continue until Tuesday next.—HERBERT YEUELL, evangelist.

DUNGAN, author of "On the Rock," "Moses, the Man of God," etc. It is a powerful argument against Adventism, and the observance of the Sabbath, or seventh day of the week, as the day of rest and worship. Dr. Dungan is a man well versed in the Scriptures, and gifted with sound sense and good judgment. He is a strong and convincing writer. This work should be placed in the hands of those who have been disturbed by the teachings of Adventists.

Family Circle

October.

By W. S. Whitacre.

The changing seasons bring October days,
The most delightful time of all the year.
The sun no longer sheds his burning rays
And wintry winds have not yet wandered near.

October days invite us to the fields
And lure us to the woods whose gorgeous tints

Are overflowing with a wealth that yields
A greater pleasure to us than the mints.
The genial smile of Nature spreads o'er all
The landscape, and a dreamy stillness fills
The air, while Nature's voices rise and fall
In that sweet cadence which both charms and thrills.

Too weak the pen to paint October scenes
That rival all the masters, so profuse
In color, yellows, browns and reds and greens,
And all the shades between that painters use.

Why should one try its beauties to portray
When all this gorgeous panoramic view
Is just as free to all as light of day?

And Nature's hand has drawn the outlines true

And, too, October sees the garners filled
With fruits from Mother Nature's choicest stores.

'Tis then the songster's parting note is trilled

To us before he to the southland soars.

Mt. Vernon, Ill.

Story of the Stringtown School-teacher.

(From Warwick of the Knobs, by John Uri Lloyd.
Published by permission of Dodd, Mead & Co.)

"A penny for your thoughts, professor," said a bystander.

"I am thinking of a child. What leads my mind from these scenes and your trivial stories to him? They have nothing in common. I am thinking of a dirty face, a dirty face," he repeated, and lapsed into silence."

"Tell us about the dirty face."

"You are acquainted with the little house, just above the mouth of the Mt. Carmel Pike, the house in which old black Ephraim lived, and which since his disappearance, has been deserted; windowless it has stood these many days."

Professor Drake rested his voice a second and then continued. "It is empty again." Following this short sentence came another interlude, when, as though by an effort, he added, "A very dirty face."

What could be troubling our village teacher? Never before had we heard him speak in so desultory a manner. Then he proceeded:

"Shortly after the beginning of the last school session a gentle tap came on the school-room door. I opened it and ushered in a boy about ten years of age, leading a younger boy by the hand. They stopped and looked about in a frightened manner and seemed inclined to retreat, when I said in a pleasant tone, 'Don't be afraid, children. Do you wish to attend school?'"

"'We do, do we, Jim and me,' spoke the older one in a drawling monotone. He held out his hand, and in its palm rested a bright silver quarter."

"'Mam sed fer us ter come ter schule 'til the wuth ov this war taken out in larnin'."

"Dirty and ragged were these boys, dirtier and more ragged than ever children before were seen in the Stringtown school. I returned the money and seated them on the end of a bench, away from the other children, with whom it was questionable whether they should come into personal contact. That night they were detained after school and I got their history. They came from Grassy Creek, and with a sot of a father (as I learned afterward) and a mother little, if any, better than he, lived now in the house deserted by black Ephraim.

"'Be sure you wash your faces before coming to school to-morrow morning,' I said as they were dismissed. Next morning they came with clean faces, but in a few days were as dirty as before. This time I spoke more positively.

"'You must wash your hands and faces before starting to school.' Again the faces were clean, but within a week they were as dirty as when first I saw them. Gentlemen, I pleaded with, scolded, threatened those children. I exhausted every power of persuasion and vainly exerted every possible influence. Had they seemed at all provoked, or had they resented my attempts to reform their slovenly habits, I should have been delighted, but their disposition was amiable and their deportment exceptionally good.

"'Yes, sir,' they would answer, when I gave them my customary order concerning clean faces. 'We'll be clean ter-morrer,' and for that once they would be clean, but not clean again until I gave the next positive order.

"'Friends,' and the professor now spoke to us directly, 'men should weigh carefully their words. Who can tell when a hasty word will turn to plague one's self? 'Jimmy,' I said one day to the younger boy, 'you provoke me beyond endurance. Do you intend to go through life with a dirty face? Do you intend to be a dirty-faced man?'"

"The child had been languid all that day. I can see now what I did not observe then, languid, spiritless, dirty. He looked up at me quickly; his black eyes peer at me yet. Ignoring my reference to the dirty-faced man, he asked:

"'Kin a dirty boy git inter heaven, teachah?'"

"'No, only clean children can go to heaven.'"

"'I wants ter go ter heaven, fer I'm tired ov livin'. Mam, she's in her cups ag'in and pap's in jail. Guess these clean children in schule hain't got my mam and pap, else they wouldn't always be clean.' He looked at his little brown fingers.

"'We hain't no soap in the house, teachah, an' we hain't no stove ter heat water on. We fry our bacon and hominy in a skillet, when we have any bacon, and bakes our corn pone in the ashes. Guess ef some ov these other children hadn't no soap and no hot water and had a drunk mother, their faces wouldn't be so clean frosty mornin's. I breaks the ice in a pan when I washes. It's awful cold, teachah, and the dirt sticks mighty bad.

"'Does God keep children out of heaven fer havin' dirty faces, ef—' the child hesitated, did not complete the sentence, but abruptly added, 'I'll have a clean face, teachah, when you see me ag'in. I'm awful tired now, an' I didn't have no breakfast.'"

"The two children turned to go, and go they did, without a word from me. My heart was in my throat, remorse was in my soul. 'I will apologize to-morrow in some way,' I said to myself; but no dirty children came on the morrow, nor yet the next day, nor the next. Never again did those little ones, dirty or clean, come to school, hand in hand, as was their wont, never." A tear glistened in the teacher's eye.

"One morning a gentle knock sounded on the school room door, just such a knock as ushered in the children that first day, and, strangely enough, I thought of Jimmy and his brother before opening the door. In stepped the brother alone. He stood before me with clean face, but his countenance was peaked and thin, very thin. 'Teachah,' he said, 'Jimmy wants yer ter come an' see him.'"

"'Why did he not come with you?'"

"'He can't come. He's dead.'"

"'Could any blow have crushed more directly on my heart? I stood stupefied. 'Tell me about it, child.'"

"'Jim took the fever the nex' day after you told him 'bout heaven. He died this mornin'. But he knowed he war goin' ter die, an' he said ter me, 'Brothah, I wants ter go ter heaven, whar thar ain't no dirt, ner fights, ner whiskey. Take the quartah the teachah giv us back, an' buy soap with it an' scrub the shanty floah an' my duds, an' wash me clean, fer I may die sudden.' An' I did, teachah, an' the good doctor brought Jim some fruit and some goodies, but 'twant no use.

"'He war awful hungry all his life, but when the goodies come, it war too late, and he couldn't eat. He jest laid still an' fingered the orange an' then handed et to me. 'Eat et, Johnny an' let me see yer eat et.' I did, teachah. Thar warn't no one in the room but Jim'n me, an' he laid still an' smiled es pleasant like es ef he had eaten et himself. This mornin' Jim sed, sed he, 'Brothah, wash me clean an' put the sheet on the bed.' We hain't but one sheet, teachah. An' then he said, 'I wants a clean face, fer I'm goin' ter try an' git inter heaven, brothah, an' when I'm dead, tuck the clean sheet close 'bout me, an' comb my hair, an' then go fer the teachah. Tell him ter come an' see how clean I am in the new clean sheet, an' ax him ef he thinks I'll git inter heaven.'"

"The child stopped. I could not speak. He mistook my emotion for a denial of his request.

"'Please, teachah. You told Jimmy how ter get ter heaven, an' he war clean when he died. Won't you come an' see him?'"

Professor Drake covered his face with his hands. More than one rough face about that Stringtown grocery stove was tear-streaked.

Tammany Charity.

A writer in Leslie's Monthly lays stress upon one bulwark of Tammany that reformers often lose sight of.

Annually it has been the custom for the present Chief to arise at a meeting of the executive committee and ask Treasurer John McQuade: "How much money remains from the last campaign?"

"Oh, about $50,000, I guess," may be the reply.

"Well, then, I move that $20,000 be donated to the poor of the city, and a similar sum for the Cuban war sufferers," says the Chief. "I guess we can worry along on the other $10,000."

Nor are folks permitted to forget such gifts as this. Workers have been repeatedly subjected to rebuffs from recipients of Tammany bounty. Stepping into a "double-decker" tenement one day, the Republican women started to argue with a number of the female occupants about the virtues of the candidates whose cause they espoused, and the good government they would be sure to give, were they elected.

A strapping mother of twelve children—four of them voters—listened respectfully to the eloquence of the visitors. When they had finished, she placed her hands on her hips and retorted: "Sure and phwat you say about Ginerall Tracy being a good man may be true. I dunno. But will he give me four boys jobs? Will he take care of the old man when he is sick? Will he give me and the brats an excoorsion every summer and a turkey dinner every winter? That's what Tammany does fer me, and that's why the old man and me boys vote the ticket straight."

A Critic Disarmed.

How often it is that the acrimony disappears from literary and theological discussions when the parties see each other face to face. A writer in the Era cites a case which illustrates the principle. He says:

Let me tell an anecdote in point. It concerns a friend of mine own—now with God. We will call him Smithers. He was a lawyer by profession, with literary aspirations and some literary abilities. He possessed a nice little vein of satire. He wrote "slashing" reviews of books for a critical paper. They were readable and, being published in a journal of some circulation, they were read. Suddenly he ceased writing. One day I met him and chaffed him about the presumptive increase of legal practice which had snatched a Jeffrey from literature to bestow him on the bar.

"Nay," said Smithers, "you are mistaken. My leisure is still, alas! not brief but briefless. I am doing little in the way of law and less in the way of literature. As to the latter, I made an irreparable mistake. I was beginning to be known, authors and publishers respected and feared my opinions. Then, in an evil hour, I accepted an introduction that landed me into literary society."

"I should have thought you would find that helpful," said I.

"Ah, little you know about it! Why, man, I got to know authors personally. I liked many of them. I was invited to their houses. I invited them to mine. How could I go on abusing their works in print, even if their works deserved abuse? If Jones' last novel was poor, how could I say so when I knew that Jones was poor, too, and saw the trembling eagerness with which he looked forward to the notices of the press, the hopes he had built upon their favorable verdict? I put myself in his place. I sympathized with him, I began to scan the notices myself, and to thrill with joy when I found them favorable. Then there's poor little Miss Smith. Her books are beneath contempt, but she is worthy of all admiration. She supports her mother by her pen. I remember I once wrote what I thought was a very brilliant criticism of one of her poor little books. How it must have stung her! I can see all her sensitive little frame writhing under those brutal gibes. It makes me feel like a cur. I would rather cut off my right hand than inflict any more pain of this sort upon the feeblest creature that holds a pen."

Smithers was unduly sensitive, perhaps. But I fancy that all newspaper or magazine critics know this feeling in some degree. They shrink from meeting their victims face to face even if the victim, in the eye of law and equity, deserved his sentence.

Making a Bad Matter Worse.

To those women—presumably few in these advanced days—who find it difficult during certain elections to detect an appreciable difference between the views and promises on either side, we offer the guidance of "Mrs. Green," an imaginary Englishwoman of considerable shrewdness.

On one memorable occasion she was approached by a canvasser for the Liberals, to whom she gave her reason for remaining staunch to the Conservative party. Said she:

"It's safer on the face of it—an' I speaks for Green, as thinks wi' me in sech things—for to let 'em stop as 'as made their mistakes an' sees 'em."

Here the canvasser attempted to speak, but Mrs. Green raised her hand with a terminative flourish.

"You needn't tell me as 'ow you won't make the same mistakes!" said she. "I knows you won't. You'll make new ones, an' probably wuss."

Words of greater American significance may be substituted for Conservative and Liberal without destroying the force of Mrs. Green's piquant reasoning.

Just one thing: prejudice, keeps some women from using PEARLINE. They think, if it acts on dirt so strongly, it must hurt the clothes. Soap and rubbing act on dirt, and the fabric is rubbed away. PEARLINE loosens the dirt better than any soap and bundles it out with little or no rubbing, and no injury.

The Author to the Editor.

(A printed circular to be sent on the return of a manuscript.)

The author regrets the editor's inability to appreciate a Truly Good Thing.

The rejection of a manuscript, however, does not necessarily imply that the editor is lacking in merit, but merely that he is lacking in judgment.

As many thousand manuscripts are returned to him annually, the author cannot enter into correspondence with each editor personally concerning the deficiencies of his taste. Nor can the author give his reasons for considering the editor blind to the best interests of the magazine.

Because, as an editor, he does not meet the present requirements of the author, does not argue that he would not be successful elsewhere in some other position. He might make an excellent dry-goods clerk, or an entirely satisfactory coal stoker.

What He Wanted, After All.

"Kind hearts are more than coronets." The visit of the Duke and Duchess of York to Australia has furnished a touching incident, an account of which we find in The Presbyterian.

The duchess called at the Sydney hospital incognita, and went through the wards. On one of the beds lay a little boy. The duchess halted there and asked the patient what was wrong. The reply came, "I've broke my leg." Her royal highness wished to know how the accident came about. It was all very simple and boylike. "I fell off a fence trying to see the duchess, and I never saw her, after all!"

A pretty little situation truly! The Duchess of York immediately told the boy who she was, and said, "You can see me now all to yourself." That boy wasn't sorry he fell off the fence.

Gardening Under Colored Glass.

Radiculture is the name which the astronomer, M. Camille Flammarion, has given to the branch of physical research suggested by his experiments with plant-growing in colored light, says a writer in Pearson's Magazine. The astronomer erected four small green-houses in the grounds of the Observatory of Juvisy, glazed red, green, blue, white, respectively. In these he put seedlings of uniform age and development of the sensitive plant (mimosa), and left them to grow for three months, with these results: The plants in the ordinary conservatory had grown in a normal manner, and had attained a height of nearly four inches.

Those in the blue glass house had not made the slightest improvement; they were precisely as they had been planted three months before; in fact, they can best be described as plants in a trance. They were alive and seemingly quite healthy, but absolutely undeveloped; as they had been planted so they all remained; to all appearance they might have fallen asleep on the day of their entry into blueness, and never have awakened to set about growing.

In the green glass house the plants had shown a large amount of energy and had pushed up to a height half as great again as that attained by those in the ordinary conservatory. There was no doubt that the atmosphere of green had stimulated their growth upward, though they were not so well developed or so bushy as the others.

But it was in the red glass house that the most striking results were apparent. In this the seedlings had simply leaped into stature; they were four times as tall as their contemporaries of normal growth, and they were actually more than fifteen times the size of the little plants which had slept in the blue light. Moreover, they alone of all the seedlings had flowered.

When he faced the magistrate in the central police court the other day morning, it didn't require a rich brogue to indicate his ancestry. The remnants of a fighting Sunday jag had left him very loquacious.

"What is your name?" asked the magistrate.

"Michael O'Halloran," was the reply.

"What is your occupation?"

"Oi'm a sailor."

The magistrate looked incredulous.

"I don't believe you ever saw a ship," he said.

"Didn't Oi, thin," said the prisoner. "An' phwat do yiz t'ink Oi cum over in, a hach?"

The Value Of Charcoal.

Few People Know How Useful it Is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better; it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines, and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking, or after eating onions or other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion; it whitens the teeth; and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics, in tablet form, or rather in the form of large, pleasant-tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood; and the beauty of it is that no harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician, in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

With the Children.

J. Breckenridge Ellis.

Advance Society Stories.

GAINING BY LOSING, by Blanche Greer, Akron, O.—One summer morning a cry went up from Nathan Avenue, New York, "Run from the street for your lives!" Down the street tore a pair of white horses covered with sweat. In the road was a little child not four years old, too frightened to move. A young girl cried, "Will no man in the crowd save her?" No answer. "Then I will save the child!" Then this heroine of fifteen years rushed forward. She stumbled and fell, breaking her right arm. A moment she lay, then crawled to the baby and dragged her with her well arm out of danger. Then she fell to the ground and the horses were almost upon her. But a man suddenly rushed from the crowd and carried her out of danger. As he placed her insensible form upon the curbing, his eyes fell upon the rescued baby and he cried, "Ruth!" It was his daughter whom he had left in charge of his coachman while he was making purchases in the store. As he explained this to the crowd, the heroine of fifteen had been carried to a hospital. Five weeks she lay a victim of brain fever. When she recovered, she found the father of the little one standing beside her bed. He took her hand and said, "May I know the name of the girl who saved my daughter's life?" "My name is Elsie Bryan." "What! Elsie Bryan? Where do you live? Where is your father and mother?" "I stay at Madame La Rue's sewing establishment. My father, mother and sister were all drowned when the Maid o' the Mist went down." The man looked at her intently and cried, "Thank God! The child you saved is your sister; I am your father! The Maid o' the Mist did go down and your mother was drowned." And with that he put his head beside hers on the pillow, sobbing and thanking God. When Elsie recovered, she went with her father and sister back to Bryan Manor, England, and as some stories end, they lived happily ever after.

A FABLE, by Katherine Keith.—One day a fox and a wolf went walking. By noon they were quite hungry. "What can we get to eat?" said the wolf; "I am ravenous!" "We will see if we can find anything," answered the fox. When they had gone a little farther they came to a fat sheep, apparently just killed. The wolf immediately pounced upon it. The fox attempted to eat with him, but was driven off. So Reynard left, and running down a rabbit, made a nice meal of him. When the fox went home, he had gone about half way when he saw his friend the wolf lying, as he supposed, asleep. On going up, he saw that the wolf was dead! In a minute the crafty fox understood. The sheep which the wolf had eaten had been poisoned by some men, then put out, to get rid of the coyotes which were very troublesome. When at last the fox reached home, he related all to his wife and children, giving them some good advice. He ended with, "Never be greedy, or you will surely rue it."

Maude Seelinger, Butler, Mo.; "Please, please don't stop your stories for the stories of us members. I'm sure we have enough compositions to contend with in school,—and just to think of filling our one wee page with them! I wish 'Pete' had just gone on all my life, but no further, for I would want to know how it ended."

Mary Emily Day, Sparta, Mo.; "We walk about 3 miles to school. On our way we pass a large spring; then an Angora goat ranch, where we often see 500 out grazing,—they have long, curly white fleece, they are a beautiful sight; then we cross the railroad to a little store and post office where we mail our letters; on down a hill to a cave about half a mile long. Last week the school went to the cave at noon, and the bravest of us went through three small halls into large rooms and other round rooms with large columns and stalactites. I, too, am preparing for the fun in store for us girls who are preparing to be teachers. My father, mother, grandmother, great-great-grandmother Johnson, taught school back in Nova Scotia. Many of my aunts and cousins have taught school, also." (This is certainly a very instructive family!)

Norah Boyer, Morrellton, Mo.; "Isn't it queer that so many join this society and so few ever reach the honor list! I wish all would write to me Nov. 15 and tell me about their homes and send me their pictures. I think it absurd for any one to think you an old bachelor. You know too much about children for that. Old bachelors don't like children, and I'm sure you do."

Margaret E. Sturges, Chillicothe, Mo.; "Well, here is another letter from the little girl in the lonely plains of northwest Missouri (quoting you). It is rather lonely here, sometimes, but not very plain. Your new story is going to be very good, but I don't like it near so well as I did 'Pete.'" (Thank you for dropping out this little encouragement in the course of your remarks.) "I correspond with Madge Masters, Ozark, Ark.; her letters are splendid. I am glad you had a good time last summer, but you know I am rather surprised that you did not break anything." (Well, I was, myself; but I got home with a little change left.) "Some one said they do not believe you are a bachelor because you like children. I know plenty of bachelors who like children but they are not at an advanced stage of bachelordom. I think you are among the class, but of course we may all be mistaken." (I wonder if this would not make a good guessing contest, a gold medal for the best guess, namely: Am I Married? If Not, WHY Not?) "I am not going to send you a stamp this time." (And I am very sorry of it.) Lelia R. Tiede, Sedalia, Mo.; "I would like to join the Av. I am reading the Bible through for the third time. Who is your favorite apostle? John is mine and the 14th chapter of John, my favorite chapter. We have a Sunshine Society here of about 25 members." (I believe John is my favorite apostle, too, but I consider it pretty hard to get ahead of Peter. Peter was always making mistakes, you know, and another good thing about him was his being always ready to go into new enterprises. He was even willing to try to walk on the sea when the others just sat in the boat afraid to say anything.) Suffering and Glorification.*

TEXT:—And if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with Him, that we may be also glorified with Him. For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed to us ward.—Rom. 8:17, 18.

This lesson is hard. We shrink from pain, even when we know and are assured, by the Word of God, and the experience of all ages, that it brings purity and peace. We look longingly into the land of light, but start back from the portals of suffering which alone lead thither. And yet we must accept the declaration of Tennyson, when he says,

"Life is not like idle ore,
But iron dug from central gloom,
And heated now with burning fears,
And dipt in baths of hissing tears,
And battered with the shocks of doom,
To shape and use."

A Necessary Condition.

Suffering is not arbitrarily imposed; it is natural and necessary, in order to glorification. The proverbial wisdom of this world teaches us that out of nothing, nothing comes. We must sow, if we would reap; we must risk, if we would gain; we must venture, if we would have. Both Old and New Testament writers teach the same great truth, and the experience of God's children in all ages corroborates it.

It follows, therefore, that the soul should not shrink from pain and sorrow; nor look upon affliction as the fore-runner of disaster and loss, but the hand-maid of everlasting gain. It is unwise and unwholesome to macerate the body, to inflict self-tortures, hoping thus to gain the divine favor; but when suffering is divinely sent, when it comes from the chastening hand of our Heavenly Father, then it is to be borne not simply in a spirit of resignation, but of gratitude, for it is preparing the triumphant sufferer for greater glory. Deep furrows promise an abundant harvest.

Many Tribulations.

The apostle Paul, himself an illustrious example of patient suffering, goes forth to confirm the disciples, and advise them that "through many tribulations we must enter into the kingdom of God." Only a short time before, he had been stoned, and left for dead. There is a picture in the word "tribulations," it reminds us of the old tribulum or threshing instrument, with which the grain was beaten, and shelled out. In a similar manner the soul must be beaten and buffeted. The vexations, cares, griefs, persecutions, misrepresentations and betrayals from which the saints suffer to-day, are parts of these "many tribulations." The wheat cannot lie forever in the sheaf; the only way to separate it is to beat it.

We shall gain in patience and self-possession when we learn that while belief in Christ is indispensable, that is not all. As Paul tells the Philippians, it is for us "not only to believe on Him, but also to suffer in His behalf." That last phrase takes the sting out of our pain: "in His behalf." If we have anything like an adequate conception of the debt we owe to Christ, then suffering in His behalf will not only be borne, it will be borne gladly. Then let us hail sorrow as a friend. Let us no longer try to comfort ourselves or others by saying that grief soon passes away.

No Comparison.

The apostle says, "I reckon." Evidently he has made a close mathematical calculation. He has cast up accounts, and struck a balance. And his inspired verdict is, "The sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed to us-ward." They are not to be compared, in point of duration. These light afflictions are but for a moment. Beyond them, beyond the grave, there stretches eternity, like a sea of glass, laving isles of light and continents of blessedness. Neither are they to be compared in intensity. A sensitive physical organization may seem to be easily subject to the empire of pain, but the sharpest pain dulls mercifully the throbbing sense. Physical anguish may be and often is lightly borne. Many a martyr stood wrapped in flame as if in a garment. Even the anguish of mind which sometimes assails the saints of earth cannot long assert itself; thoughts of God, His mercy, compassion and power, soon take off its keen edge.

The glory yet to be revealed is a subject upon which we can think but feebly. It eludes the slow methods of logic. Imagination cannot picture it. John on rocky Patmos tries to limn it. Let us be content with its inspired description, and seek to inherit it.

Prayer.

For perennial hope. O God, we thank Thee. Life is a hard journey through dreary wilds, and our feet are cut by jagged rocks; our garments are torn; our strength is exhausted. Again and again troubles assail us, and afflictions environ us; yet Thou art our Deliverer! Help us, help all who suffer, to be brave, for Christ's sake, in the sure and certain hope of everlasting blessedness. Amen.

Travel.

A word or two on the subject of travel is not amiss. The facilities for the transportation of passengers at the present time have certainly been brought to perfection. It isn't like in the old days when it was almost a torture to go from one place to another. Now you get aboard a train and live just like you do at home. The entire equipment is built with a view to your comfort.

For instance: When you go East the B. & O. S-W. offers you Three Daily Solid Vestibuled Trains from St. Louis, leaving at 8:20 a. m., 8:05 p. m. and 2:15 a. m.—made up of the finest Pullman sleepers—a dining car service which cannot be excelled (you don't have to pay for what you can't eat, but just for what you order)—first class high back coaches—in fact the trains are palaces on wheels. The track, roadbed and equipment are entirely new.

It's the best line to Cincinnati and Louisville. Only $21 to New York with stop-overs. (Saves you money and gives you the best service.)

Information in regard to trains, etc., can be secured from any representative. It will be a pleasure for them to answer your questions and help you in every way.

The favor of the public is final proof of merit—and we're after it.

Its True Character.

Catarrh is Not a Local Disease.

Although physicians have known for years that catarrh was not a local disease, but a constitutional or blood disorder, yet the mass of the people still continue to believe it is simply a local trouble, and try to cure it with purely local remedies, like powders, snuffs, ointments and inhalers.

These local remedies, if they accomplish anything at all, simply give a very temporary relief, and it is doubtful if a permanent cure of catarrh has ever been accomplished by local sprays, washes and inhalers. They may clear the mucous membrane from the excessive secretion, but it returns in a few hours as bad as ever, and the result can hardly be otherwise because the blood is loaded with catarrhal poison, and it requires no argument to convince anyone that local washes and sprays have absolutely no effect on the blood.

Dr. Ainsworth says, "I have long since discontinued the use of sprays and washes for catarrh of head and throat, because they simply relieve and do not cure."

"For some time past I have used only one treatment for all forms of catarrh, and the results have been uniformly good; the remedy I use and recommend is Stuart's Catarrh Tablets, a pleasant and harmless preparation sold by druggists at 50c., but my experience has proven one package of Stuart's Catarrh Tablets to be worth a dozen local treatments."

"The tablets are composed of Hydrastin, Sanguinaria, Red Gum, Guaiacal and other safe antiseptics, and any catarrh sufferer can use them with full assurance that they contain no poisonous opiates, and that they are the most reasonable and successful treatment for radical cure of catarrh at present known to the profession."

Stuart's Catarrh Tablets are large, pleasant-tasting 20-grain lozenges, to be dissolved in the mouth and reach the delicate membranes of throat and trachea, and immediately relieve any irritation, while their final action on the blood removes the catarrhal poison from the whole system. All druggists sell them at 50c. for complete treatment.

Israel Oppressed in Egypt.*

How many years had elapsed since Jacob came with his household into the land of Egypt we do not know. The common opinion is that it was not far from two hundred years, though it may have been considerably longer. Jacob's family numbered seventy, besides the family of Joseph. Settled in the fruitful district of Goshen, in the northeastern corner of Egypt, along one of the branches of the Nile which formed the Delta, the conditions of life were favorable to the health and vigor of the people. Following the shepherd life, they escaped in large measure the ills which affected the crowded populations of the cities and villages. They rapidly grew, therefore, into a great people, their increase being set forth by the sacred writer in a series of expressions which approach a climax. "The children of Israel were fruitful, and increased abundantly, and multiplied, and waxed exceeding mighty; and the land was filled with them."

Meanwhile, Joseph and his generation had died, and the children of Israel were gradually losing their peculiar religious faith, and possibly their racial identity. A few more centuries might have merged them into the Egyptian nation, and their special mission to the world been lost. Material prosperity and comfort are sometimes hurtful to the spiritual life, and God may have suffered hardships to be imposed upon his chosen people, as the only way to revive them in the holy ambitions which had animated their fathers. At any rate, the children of Israel began to find their home in Goshen far from the place of ease and plenty it had proven in the time of Joseph. Now there arose a new king over Egypt, which knew not Joseph." This was probably Seti I., under whose reign the "Hyksos," or "shepherd kings," had been finally expelled from Egypt, and a native dynasty again established. These "shepherd kings" were Syrians, who had subjugated Egypt many centuries before, and were reigning at the time of Joseph's entrance into Egypt. This would account for the favor which Joseph and his father's family experienced at the hands of the ruling Pharaoh, who would have much in common with the Hebrews. When the native race again gained the supreme power, and these usurpers were driven from the land, it was natural that the Hebrews should feel the weight of their displeasure.

Seti I., at his death, left the kingdom to his son, Rameses II., whose long reign of sixty-seven years covered much of the time of the oppression of the Hebrew people. His death occurred about the time of Moses' return to Egypt from the wilderness of Midian, or a little sooner. His son, Menephtah, was the Pharaoh of the Exodus, whose hardening heart brought upon his people such fearful plagues. Under Seti and Rameses the Hebrews endured hardships such as would naturally tend to destroy the vigor, crush the spirits and banish the hopes of the whole nation. It is probable that, after the banishment of the "shepherd kings," there was some movement started among the Hebrews looking toward a return to their own country. Such seems to have been the fear expressed by the king, as recorded in the 10th verse of our lesson. Nor did he dare to permit their continued rapid growth in his own land, lest their strength should be given in aid of some foreign enemy, such as was ever threatening Egypt from the east. He must contrive some way by which, while they should remain in the land to serve his ambitious purposes as slaves, they should cease to grow in numbers as they had been doing. Like Satan in his treatment of sinners, he will not consent to liberate them, yet makes his service so laborious as to crush, if possible, their very lives.

Human life was of little account to ancient rulers. Their subjects were but slaves, and to wear out and kill in sorest toil uncounted thousands was a mere incident in their royal lives. The kings of Egypt were perhaps sinners above all others in this regard. Vast palaces, huge pyramids, gigantic images and obelisks covered the face of the whole land. Laboring in the quarries, dragging the huge sleds on which rested massive stones, drawing them up the inclined planes by means of which they were set in place—such were some of the hard tasks set the unfortunate people by their royal taskmaster. Many buildings were made of sun-dried brick, and the manufacture of these entailed great hardships upon the workmen. Pictures are frequent upon the monuments of Egypt of the poor slaves at work under the lash of the overseer. The food given the laborers was poor in quality and little in quantity, and thousands starved, or sank under their burdens, to be beaten to death by their cruel masters.

It was under such conditions the Hebrews now found themselves. The merciless Rameses built by their toil the store cities of Pithom and Raamses, one of which has been recently unearthed, and the very bricks found marked with his name. Some of these bricks are made with straw, and some without, seeming to indicate that they are the very ones made by the hands of the unfortunate Israelites. "But the more they afflicted them, the more they multiplied and grew." God had not forgotten his people, nor broken his covenant. Persecution never yet defeated the cause of truth. "The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church," and not seldom is scourge and fire and sword the surest and swiftest path to the victory of righteousness. Seti and Rameses thought to kill all hope in the hearts of their Hebrew slaves, and doom them to perpetual bondage. They served only to quicken the national spirit within them, and make their deliverance more glorious. This subject race became the focus of the world's spiritual aspirations, and the most glorious of its sons the world's Redeemer, while the race that oppressed them has sunk into the lowest degradation, and the names of their kings are forgotten. Men gaze upon the mutilated forms of those two haughty kings, as they lie in the museum at Bulak, and muse upon the vanity of earthly ambition and power; but the history of the race they once held in bondage is the story of human redemption and of the ever increasing glory and virtue of humanity.

TOPIC FOR NOVEMBER 10.

Our National Bondage.

(Heb. 1:13-17. Amos 6:1-6.)

Temperance Meeting.

We are bound in youthfulness, and youth is nearly always intemperate. We are not yet one hundred and fifty years old as a people, and that is infancy in the age of nations. A hundred years are but as yesterday and as a watch in the night. Nobody can yet foretell what we shall be when we are grown. Much depends, almost everything depends, upon what habits we form in early life. We are intemperate in judgment, too quick in speech, sudden in action, unguarded in attitude. Our president is murdered and we cry out in wild cries like children that are hurt. We want to burn and kill. Later on we become sober and realize our intemperance and haste.

It is quite in keeping with this national immaturity that we should be guilty of intemperance in our living in other regards. We swear too much, drink too much and are guilty of other excesses just as harmful—some of them more harmful than either of these others. It is a mark of youthfulness.

Ah, but you say, old civilizations have been guilty of these same excesses. They exist in aged nations as well as young. Still, they are the mark of immaturity. Nations given to them are still children in growth. They have not yet come to manhood and womanhood.

It is a fact of striking character in looking over the statistics of pauperism and crime and insanity to find that intemperance in the use of liquor has caused a great amount of these various sorts of misery. Some think that intemperance has caused more of these than it really has. But to the unbiased observer there is some surprise in finding how many feeble minded children have one or both parents intemperate, how many applicants for almshouse relief and charity organization aid are intemperate in the use of liquor.

There are other vices, dark and terrible, which cause more misery than drink. Sometimes in our advocacy of temperance we are led to state that 90 per cent. of pauperism, crime and insanity is caused by drink, which is not true. If one studies the history of charities and correction, one finds that we are bound in other fetters just as terrible as those of the one special "intemperance" of which our topic treats. There are other sufferers, many of them, from the results of other excesses.

Many a poor creature is doomed to a life of bondage in a home for the feeble-minded, or in a madhouse because of his own or his parent's sin. If you don't believe it visit a school for the feeble minded, or an insane hospital, or read a modern treatise on up-to-date charity, such as Amos G. Warner's "American Charities," published by Crowell. The honest facing of facts will never do us harm. It may make us more temperate in our statements and wiser in our efforts at reform.

While we are shaking off fetters, let us shake off all our fetters. There are drug habits that are increasing among us. The negroes of Kentucky are, in large numbers, snuffing a drug which they call "dope," but which is a powder of cocaine. It is sold in drug stores, can be obtained without a prescription, is advertised in big, bold type. It produces an intoxication that is like madness, a sort of frenzy. Nor is its use limited to negroes. Many whites take it. Physicians are becoming slaves to it.

What is to cure us of these intemperances? Our manhood and our womanhood and our Christianity. We ought, first of all, clearly to see the dangers, educate ourselves against them and rise up in our might and conquer them.

An Attractive Book Offer!

During the past few years there has been a rage for the historical romance. This has been a profitable and sensible fashion, for it has given something of a knowledge of secular history to persons who would not have taken the trouble to study, but who enjoyed reading fiction.

Why should not Bible history and knowledge of the characters of the Old Testament be disseminated in the same manner, especially among young people. They will gladly read an interesting story, and what can be more interesting, for example, than the career of Moses, skillfully narrated?

We offer six splendid romances from Bible history in one set. The books are: MOSES THE MAN OF GOD (Duggan); QUEEN ESTHER (Davis); ELIJAH (Davis); KING SAUL (Ellis); IN THE DAYS OF JEHU (Ellis); and SHEM (Ellis). Five of these are cloth-bound books; SHEM is bound in paper. The regular price of the six volumes is $4.75. For a short time we propose to offer the complete set for $3.50. At this price the books will be sent by express, not prepaid.

The children and young people will be delighted with these books. They will help to pass many a long autumn or winter evening. Better still, they will impart much information about Bible history. It is sometimes difficult to get boys and girls to study the Bible directly, but there will be no trouble getting them to read these interesting stories.

Six Volumes. Over 1400 Pages. Many Illustrations. $3.50.

BAKEWELL.

Edwin Wells Bakewell, the son of Samuel R. and Ann Maria Bakewell, was born in Wellsburg, Va., now West Virginia, July 20, 1812, and died in Carbondale, Ill., July 17, 1901, lacking but three days of completing 89 years. In his eighteenth year he made the good confession and was baptized in the Ohio river by Thomas Campbell. From that time he contended earnestly for the faith. He endured the persecution to which the advocates of divine simplicity and guidance in faith and practice were subjected in his earlier life, and hence he had special satisfaction in observing the rapid spread of the gospel. He felt the obligation of using every talent in the service of the Master. Toward the last his mind was sometimes oblivious to temporal surroundings, and then the aspirations of earlier days for Christian usefulness and his expectations of heavenly joys found constantly repeated expression. He lived soberly, righteously and godly, and died in the blessed hope "of the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ."

When he was seventeen years of age his only sister was married to Alexander Campbell, and he then made his with them at Bethany, learning the printer's trade and working on the Millennial Harbinger and other publications of Mr. Campbell. In March, 1836, he was married to Miss Julia A. Parshall in Royal Oaks, Mich. They began married life in Bethany, and many of the older students of Bethany College remember them gratefully as the first keepers of the "Stewards' Inn." In 1845 they followed their inclination to make a home in the "west," and they settled on a farm near Bloomington, now Normal, Ill. This place continued to be their home and a home for the preacher who passed that way until advanced age and the solicitations of children led them to make their home with a daughter and her husband, Elder W. S. Errett, of Carbondale, Ill.

In establishing a home in the new country they had passed through the privations and labors of a pioneer life, helping to work out for another generation the comforts of a fruitful heritage. To them were born six children, four of whom survive with Sister Bakewell to contemplate the virtues of a loving husband and an affectionate father. The surviving children are: Campbell N., of Roodhouse, Ill.; Irving H., of Bloomington, Ill.; Selena H., wife of W. S. Errett, of Carbondale, Ill.; and Lutie B., wife of James M. Dawson, of Chicago. Funeral services were conducted at Carbondale by the writer, and at Bloomington, to which his body was taken for burial, short services were conducted at the cemetery by Elder G. M. Goode, of Normal. He has gone to be forever with the Savior he had so long loved and served. JAMES KIRK.

BRANCH.

Robert Henry Branch was born in Johnson county, Indiana, April 7, 1852, and died in Carthage, Mo., Oct. 7, 1901. A successful and prosperous business man in Martinsville and Muncie, Ind., he removed to Carthage, Mo., in 1898, partly in search of a more congenial climate, where he was engaged in mining at the time of his death. His affairs were in order and his family is provided for. He was a tower of strength to the cause wherever his home was. Largely through him the cause at Martinsville and Muncie is to the fore, and he was the most liberal giver to the Carthage church. He was one of the few business men whose all was consecrated to the service of the Master. As a husband, a neighbor, a friend, a father, a Christian, he had few superiors. He is at rest now, but leaves a vacancy hard to fill. God's will be done.

W. A. OLDHAM.

DUNN.

Died at Delta, Iowa, Aug. 17, 1901, aged 33 years, 1 month and 14 days. Georgia Clubb Dunn, wife of W. C. Dunn. She leaves a husband and one little daughter to mourn her loss. Sister Dunn united with the Christian church in August, 1883, under the pastorate of Bro. S. B. Ross. She lived a consistent Christian life, patient in suffering. She was a sufferer for years with consumption; she had a cheerful word for all; she made life sweeter for all who came within the radius of her influence. D. W. CAMPBELL.

FURGUSON.

Died at her home in Council Bluffs, Iowa, on Oct. 11, 1901, Sister Hannah Malissa (Miller) Furguson, wife of an elder, J. S. Furguson, aged 59 years. Sister Furguson was born Oct. 11, 1842, in Carlton, Carroll county, O., removed to Iowa in 1854, was married to J. S. Furguson in 1865; confessed her faith in Christ in 1866. She removed with her family to Council Bluffs in 1890, and closed her eyes to earthly scenes Oct. 11, 1901. Sister Furguson leaves a husband, 5 sons, 3 daughters, 6 brothers and 2 sisters, besides a host of friends to mourn her death. W. B. CREWDSON.

MASON.

Priscilla Mason was born in Stark county, Ohio, June 7, 1825. Married to J. M. Saylor May 13, 1844. She united with the old Christian church in 1852, and six years later took membership with the Christian church, of which she has been a devoted member since. About a fortnight before her death she grew weary and weak and took to her bed. Suffering no pain she drifted away from us, each morning rallying back for a moment to give us a smile of recognition, till at last, weary, she slept. But we thank God for this noble woman, loving wife and mother, and friend of all who, having lived so Christ-like is now translated without the sting of death to an immortal day, where we believe she lives again. LEE FURGESON.

Hopkins, Mo.

RICHARDS.

Adrian Richards died suddenly of heart failure at his home in Newton, Iowa, Oct. 1. He was born in Stark county, Ohio, in 1847, and was 54 years of age at the time of his death. In July, 1869, he came to Newton with his parents, and for many years has been associated in business with his father, Mr. Samuel Richards. On June 1, 1893, he was married to Miss Mattie Frary, who died on the 23rd of last February. Since the death of his wife he has made his home with his father and sister. He was honorable and upright in all his dealings and enjoyed the strictest confidence of everybody. The funeral services were conducted by E. F. Leake, pastor of the Christian church, and J. C. Willits, of the M. E. church.

Barclay Meador, Adv. Mgr.

Farwell & Rhines, Watertown, N. Y., devote the entire capacity of their great mills to the production of health foods in great variety. Gluten Flour for dyspepsia, Special Diabetic food for Diabetes, and K. C. Whole Wheat Flour for constipation, are among the most popular of their flour products, while their Gluten Grits and Barley Crystals are their cereal foods for breakfast, tea and dessert. Upon the subject which interests them most as manufacturers, and all people in common as consumers, they say that, "Care in eating is becoming more universal every day. Experiment proved exercise alone, inadequate. Something more was needed to vitalize the system, throw off its irregularities and fortify it against the attacks of disease. The superiority of diet over medicine as a preventive and cure is daily evidenced by the call, from intelligent classes, for really hygienic foods. The popularity of the idea spread when the public began to understand that they could diet, and still eat palatable food, and that it was not at all necessary to shut down on most of their accustomed delicacies." They treat the subject of proper foods in a pamphlet which is sent on application.

It is exceedingly interesting to note how cleverly the merits of some of the best known articles for household use are advertised nowadays. For instance in the Brooklyn Times the following appeared under the caption, "The King of Washing Powders":

"It is an old saying, and one well worthy of every one's attention, that 'Cleanliness is next to godliness.' A number of years ago a washing powder was put upon the market with a view to making cleanliness more easily attainable than it then was. This powder was called Pyle's Pearlina. It is the pioneer of all washing powders, and now, although it has many imitators, there is not one of them that can come within speaking distance of it.

"There is always one make in every line of goods that stands head and shoulders above the rest, and in washing powders this make is Pyle's Pearlina. It can be used where soap cannot, and cleans thoroughly wherever used, saving an immense deal of labor. Praising it, however, is not necessary, as the public fully realize its merits, and a grocer who tries to palm off something else as just as good, succeeds only in lowering his reputation for truth-telling."

As long ago as 1882 the Michigan Stove Company of Detroit, Chicago and Buffalo placed upon the market a complete line of cooking and heating apparatus for all kinds of fuel and of the highest possible degree of merit—which they marketed under the name of "Garland" Stoves and Ranges. This name was applied to but the highest grade or quality of each type of stove or range and the name "Garland" has always stood as the symbol of goods of first grade only, and today only goods of one quality are sold under this trade name. Other stovemakers commenced to apply a trade name to lines of goods varying in quality from very good down to the cheapest and most inferior grades, imitating the shape and style of the "Garland" trade mark, even to the shape and arrangement of the lettering. The result has been that third and fourth grade imitations of "Garlands" have been sold as "just as good." Garlands are all superior stoves and those who want them should be cautious and see that dealers do not substitute other makes for them.

The Fillmore Bros., of Cincinnati, so well known throughout the brotherhood as song writers and music composers as well as publishers, have in their Praise Hymnal an excellent book for the purpose for which it was

National Convention Echoes.

Minneapolis is a city of about 200,000 population, and is specially noted as the great flour and lumber city of the northwest.

About 3,000 delegates were enrolled, and possibly as many as 4,000 Disciples were in attendance during the convention.

The Disciples of Christ in Minneapolis number about 600, who worship in a fine church building with Bro. C. J. Tannar as their most excellent pastor.

Many fathers and mothers in Israel graced the convention with their attendance, as well as a host of cultured and consecrated young men and women who constitute a formidable host to carry forward the blessed work of restoration of primitive Christianity and the unity of Christian people on the Bible basis.

There too were in attendance a number of foreign missionaries and others under appointment to go, who graced the convention with their presence and cheering words.

The songs during the convention were soul-inspiring, prayers fervent, addresses, as a rule, well prepared and ably delivered, and all in all, the exercises were most inspiring and soul uplifting.

The convention delegates were pleased with the convention building and its conveniences, and with the arrangements made for their comfort, pleasure, accommodation and entertainment during the convention.

Excellent addresses were delivered on Bible-school, Endeavor, ministerial relief, benevolent and educational work.

Geo. L. Snively, formerly of Jacksonville, Ill., secretary of the benevolent association, made a strong plea in favor of said association.

The report of John Pounds, national superintendent of Christian Endeavor work, and addresses of John Willis Baer, of Boston, Mass., and J. H. Garrison, of St. Louis, Mo., on the same subject, were ably delivered and produced a favorable impression.

L. H. Timme, of Cleveland, O., a German evangelist, made an earnest plea in favor of the establishment of a special board to consider the evangelization of the 15,000,000 German people of the United States.

A. M. Growden of Findlay, O., presented A. McLean, president of the foreign board, with a gavel made from olive wood from the Mount of Olives, and two young ladies presented I. J. Spencer, president of the American home board, with a gavel made from the wood of a cherry tree.

An historical society of the Church of Christ was organized, with Errett Gates as chairman and C. C. Morrison as secretary.

The opening address of the president, I. J. Spencer, was ordered to be printed in tract form for distribution.

Mission work was introduced into the Philippine Islands by aid of the gift of $5,000 from Bro. Lathrop Cooley, the special friend of evangelism.

After one week's session of a most interesting and enjoyable convention, it adjourned to reassemble in 1902 at Omaha, Neb., and also provided to meet in 1903 at St. Louis, Mo.

THE DEATH OF THE FLOWERS.

WHERE are the flowers, the fair young flowers, that lately sprang and stood In brighter light and softer airs, a beauteous sisterhood?
Alas! they all are in their graves; the gentle race of flowers
Are lying in their lowly beds, with the fair and good of ours.
The rain is falling where they lie, but the cold
November rain
Calls not from out the gloomy earth the lovely ones again.

And now [when comes the calm mild day, as still such days will come,
To call the [squirrel and the bee from out their winter home;
When the sound of dropping nuts is heard, though all the trees are still,
And twinkle in the smoky light the waters of the [rill,
The Southwind searches for the flowers whose fragrance late he bore,
And sighs to find them in the wood and by the stream no more.

Important Notice!

After much experience and careful deliberation we deem it necessary to announce a change of policy in regard to subscriptions to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Heretofore we have followed the general custom of publishers of religious journals by continuing the paper to the subscriber unless orders to the contrary were received. This has been done by us because it was the generally accepted way, and because we hoped to accommodate our subscribers by so doing. It has resulted not only in considerable financial loss to us, but, what is more regretted by us, our purpose has sometimes been misunderstood. What we intended as a kind consideration towards our patrons has not infrequently been regarded as an attempt to impose upon them.

We have given the subject much thought, and have, we believe, devised a method by which those who need a little time for payment of the subscription price may be indulged, and those who prefer the strictly cash in advance or discontinue policy may also be pleased.

Beginning with the new year, we will notify, some weeks in advance, those whose subscriptions expire with the month in which the notice is sent, to either remit the amount necessary for another year's subscription, or, if it is not convenient at that time, to fill out and sign an order for the continuance of the paper, with a promise to pay at some definite date within the year.

Suitable blanks for using either of these ways of renewing subscriptions will be inclosed with the notice. If neither is returned before the date of expiration, the paper will be promptly discontinued. We ask the hearty co-operation of all friends of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST in this effort to place subscription matters upon a mutually satisfactory basis.

Subscribers who are at present in arrears should, if possible, arrange to pay before January 1, 1902, or, if that is not convenient, let them write to us, and we will send one of the blanks referred to, which they may fill, sign and return. When these promissory orders are received subscription will be credited on our mailing list, and the orders filed for collection at the time they fall due.

Under this plan subscribers will have the privilege of paying at the time of the year most suited to their circumstances, arrearages will not swell to burdensome proportions, no one will receive the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST unless it has been definitely ordered, and the publishers, because of prompt payment, will be enabled to furnish a better paper to the readers. Some confusion may result during the time of transition from the one policy to the other. We shall exercise care to avoid mistakes, but if any should occur we ask our patrons to promptly call our attention to them, that we may make correction.

France and the Sultan.

The trouble between France and Turkey has become acute. A French squadron has seized the port of Smyrna and will hold its customs as security for the settlement of the claims against the Sultan's government. Since the French minister left Constantinople a few weeks ago and the Turkish minister was requested to leave Paris, thus breaking off diplomatic relations between the two governments, the fires of French official indignation have been smoldering. The Sultan promises everything and concedes the justice of the French claims, but he does nothing. The words of his mouth are smoother than butter, but he neglects to show the color of his coin. Most governments would be embarrassed by being cut off from diplomatic intercourse for reasons the justice of which it is obliged to admit, and would be shamed into a settlement. Not so Turkey. The Sultan does not blush when the finger of scorn is pointed at him. He knows no embarrassment except financial, and the equanimity with which he can leave his debts unpaid and let his creditors cool their heels in his ante-room perhaps turns even his impecuniousness into a source of amusement. He is diplomatically naked, and not ashamed. Tired of waiting for a settlement of her claims, France has sent her Mediterranean squadron under Admiral Gaillard with orders, it is believed, to seize Smyrna and hold the customs receipts of that port as surety for the debt. International complications as the result of this threatening measure are less probable than they would be if Great Britain were in a condition to take a hand. Russia, with her long-standing desire for Turkish territory, will doubtless look with favor upon the attitude of her ally in backing her demands with a show of force, and it would be historically consistent for Great Britain, as the hereditary enemy of both France and Russia, to exert herself to maintain the status quo in Turkey. But England is not at present looking for trouble in the East. Besides, the whole matter may blow over. The Sultan knows many ways of putting off importunate creditors without paying them.

A Day of Battle.

Tuesday of this week is a day of political battle in eleven states. So far as the mere politics of the matter is concerned, the contests are interesting but not vitally important. There is no party the defeat of whose candidates, under certain conditions, we cannot contemplate with entire composure. But there are matters of morals involved, especially in New York and Philadelphia. Never was there a clearer cut issue between honesty and dishonesty than is presented by the campaign in New York city. There should be blazoned upon every ballot-box in that city the legend, "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve." The question is whether a majority of New York's 600,000 voters will choose to serve Croker. The Fusion ticket headed by Seth Low, who resigned the presidency of Columbia University to accept this nomination, is backed by ten organizations, including the regular Republicans. The ticket as a whole is above criticism. The Tammany ticket, with the exception of Mr. Shepard, is beneath criticism. One of the most prominent figures in the campaign has been Justice Jerome who was the leader in uncovering the scandals in the police department and is now candidate for district attorney. Whether the reformers win or lose on Tuesday, great credit will be due to him for the work which he has done. It was, to say the least, an impolitic utterance which he made at a recent campaign meeting when he accused Whitney and Platt of plotting his defeat. He has since recalled this statement, but the feeling which it aroused makes an unfortunate break in the harmony of the Fusionists. In Philadelphia the issue is a similar one, but unfortunately the fusion of the reformers did not fuse as completely as in New York. At the last presidential election Pennsylvania was Republican by 288,000, an immense margin to be wiped out before the corrupt Republican ring in the state and its metropolis can be put out of power.

Social Equality.

The entertainment of Booker T. Washington at the White House is still furnishing food for some thought and, unfortunately, for much talk without thought. Will it injure the President in the estimation of the South? Will it injure Booker Washington or interfere with his work of industrial education? Will it injure the negroes themselves, by turning their thoughts from the work which lies before them to the vision of social equality? If the episode is turned to the President's disadvantage, it will be only through the most strenuous efforts of those who have political axes to grind and look to race prejudice to turn the grind-stone. The sober public knows that social equality for negroes is no more an issue in President Roosevelt's administration than it was in President McKinley's. The event ought not to injure Mr. Washington, because all who know his work and his character know how little he cares for social recognition, and how strenuous is his insistence that the negro can fulfill his destiny only by buckling down to work and letting the matter of recognition take care of itself. It would be a genuine misfortune if the episode should serve to magnify in the eyes of the southern negroes the importance of social equality. If it does, the criticism should light not upon the President, but upon those whose clamor over the incident has tended to make a mountain out of a very moderate-sized mole hill. How can one expect the ignorant negroes of the South to feel that social equality is not an important thing when the intelligent whites constantly speak of it as the thing of supreme importance. The need is for constructive work, and not for denunciatory talk. The application of Mr. Roosevelt's strenuous-life principle to the negro race, by means of Booker Washington's system of industrial education, is exactly what the situation calls for, and the South will make a great mistake if it wars upon these two men even if, for the furtherance of their work, they find it convenient to hold a conference over the tea-table.

The Canal Treaty.

Since the return of Lord Pauncefoot to the United States after his vacation in England, the public has felt even greater interest in the new treaty which he is authorized to sign regarding the construction of an isthmian canal. This treaty, as already announced, abrogates the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and concedes to the United States the right to build, protect and control the canal, subject only to an agreement to keep it neutral in time of peace. The suggestion has come from Canada that Great Britain ought to demand a concession in regard to the Alaskan boundary as the price of this surrender of her rights under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but the suggestion has not been well received. It is best to let each question stand on its own merits. The Nicaraguan government notified the state department a few days ago that the treaties between that country and the United States in regard to the construction of the canal and for the extradition of criminals would expire by limitation next year. The notification is somewhat unusual but indicates no unfriendliness. Nicaragua has expressed her desire to make new treaties in place of the old.

The Close of the Pan-American.

At midnight, Nov. 1, President Milburn pressed a button and the lights in the electric tower died for the last time. A corps of buglers sounded "taps" and the Buffalo Pan-American Exposition was ended. In many respects the exposition will be accounted a great success and especially in the department of electricity it has made a record which it will not be easy for future expositions to surpass. Financially, however, it was a failure. It is estimated that the loss will be between three and four million dollars. The capital stock will be a total loss. This, however, was for the most part subscribed in small blocks so that the loss will not be felt heavily by any one. In addition the second mortgage bonds will probably go unpaid. The total attendance during the six months of the exposition was about 8,000,000. It was estimated in advance that the attendance would be not less than 12,000,000. Several factors worked to the disadvantage of the Pan-American: it was not ready for opening on schedule time and many of the early visitors carried away a bad impression from its incompleteness; the spring was stormy and interfered with both work and attendance; the heat and drought of the summer upset the plans of many persons who would otherwise have attended; and the assassination of President McKinley cast a gloom over the closing weeks of the exposition. Most of these events were in no way chargeable to the management, but there are at least two lessons which the managers of future expositions can learn from this; first, the necessity of completing all work so that the fair may be opened on schedule time; and second, that the recompense for the great investment of capital and labor must be found in the advancement of human knowledge and in the incidental advantages to the community, rather than in gate-receipts and dividends.

British Reverses. Gen. Botha's latest exploit, a sudden attack on the rear of a British column, is characterized by the military critics as the most serious British reverse of the year. The English lost fifty-eight men killed, one hundred sixty wounded, and two guns were captured. A few days later DeWet is reported to have raided a British supply station where extra horses were kept and to have captured 6,000 horses. The only offset to these disasters is the news that Gen. Botha a few days ago escaped capture so narrowly that his hat and revolver fell into the hands of his pursuers. One would think that the wardrobe of Botha and DeWet would be sadly depleted by this time, so often have they narrowly escaped from the hands of the British, abandoning in their haste hat, coat or shoes. It is a subject of perennial wonder how the Boers keep themselves supplied with ammunition, but even more marvelous is this unfailing supply of garments for the Boer leaders. If the British would declare all wearing apparel contraband of war and cut off the supply, the war would soon be over, for after a few such almost-captures the leaders would be unable to go out of doors with propriety. Until such measures are taken, however, British sympathizers will find little joy in the news that once a week or so a British detachment gets close enough to one of the Boer leaders to secure his boots or his pocket-handkerchief and see him escape.

Events in the Philippines. The surrender of five hundred insurgents in the island of Cebu is believed to end the trouble in that part of the Philippines. Recent operations in Samar have been successful and have overcome the loss of prestige occasioned by the disaster there a few weeks ago. As the result of a surgical operation, Judge Taft will be unable to perform the functions of his office for at least three weeks, during which time the vice-governor, Judge Wright, will take his place. The expiration of the term of enlistment of most of the American soldiers at present in the Philippines necessitates many change; and much transportation of troops back and forth, but there is no reason to believe that there will be any increase in the force in the Philippines, as was stated in some quarters at the time of the American losses in Samar.

Thanksgiving Proclamation. The following proclamation was issued by President Roosevelt, Nov. 2:

"The season is nigh when, according to the time-hallowed custom of our people, the President appoints a day as the especial occasion for praise and thanksgiving to God.

"This Thanksgiving finds the people still bowed with sorrow for the death of a great and good President. We mourn President McKinley; we so loved and honored him; and the manner of his death should awaken in the breasts of our people a keen anxiety for the country, and, at the same time, a resolute purpose not to be driven by any calamity from the path of strong, orderly, popular liberty, which as a nation we have thus far safely trod.

"Yet, in spite of this great disaster, it is nevertheless true that no people on earth have such abundant cause for thanksgiving as we have. The past year in particular has been one of peace and plenty. We have prospered in things material and have been able to work for our own uplifting in things intellectual and spiritual. Let us remember that, as much has been given us, much will be expected from us; and that true homage comes from the heart as well as from the lips, and shows itself in deeds. We can best prove our thankfulness to the Almighty by the way in which on this earth and at this time each of us does his duty to his fellow men.

"Now, therefore, I, Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States, do hereby designate as a day of general thanksgiving, Thursday, the 28th day of this present November, and do recommend that throughout the land the people cease from their wonted occupations, and that at their several homes and places of worship reverently thank the Giver of all good for the countless blessings of our national life.

"In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

"Done at the city of Washington, this second day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and one, and of the independence of the United States the one hundred and twenty-sixth.

(Seal) "THEODORE ROOSEVELT.
"By the President: John Hay, Secretary of State."

Beer and Government. For a clear, dispassionate statement of the influence of campaign funds upon legislation—and especially the influence of the money contributed by the liquor interests—read the following. It will be recalled, by Missourians at least, that a law imposing a tax on beer, called the Ryder law, was enacted at the last session of the legislature of this state. A state senator who voted against the bill tells why, and thereby throws light upon the connection between contributions to campaign funds and subsequent legislation which touches the interests of the contributors. He says:

"Mr. Seibert [St. Louis excise commissioner] asked me how I intended to vote on the measure, and I told him I should vote for it. He said that the brewers had contributed a considerable sum of money to the state committee on an agreement that if the Ryder bill made its appearance at that session of the legislature it should be taken care of, as it had been in the past, and it would be an act of bad faith to pass the bill. On this statement I promised to vote against the measure, as I thought that the agreement made by the state committee should be carried out, though I thought it bad business to pledge the party to protect any interest to raise campaign funds, but feared that if the bill passed the brewers would thereafter antagonize the party."

Note the senator's ready acquiescence in the program of his party's state committee, right or wrong. Note his naive expression of the virtuous sentiment, that on the whole, it is "bad business to pledge the party to protect any interest to raise campaign funds." Note, too, the argument which finally outweighed all others with the virtuous senator, the fear that "if the bill passed the brewers would thereafter antagonize the party." Here is food for reflection. Verily there is no impractical idealism in Missouri politics.

Brevities. The Yaqui Indians in Mexico are on the warpath again, after being successively subdued and annihilated several times in the past three years. There must be Boer blood in the tribe. Or perhaps the Boers have Yaqui blood.

It has been definitely announced that the Pope will appoint no new cardinal in the United States. There is already one American cardinal out of about seventy. What do the American Catholics want? About half of the cardinals are Italians! Why not? It is a Roman Church.

Washington University now has an endowment of $5,575,261 and an annual income of $400,000. The rapid increase of its resources during the past few years has given it a high rank among educational institutions, and its removal to its new buildings and campus about Jan. 1, will mark a new epoch.

Mark Twain has been a popular speaker in the New York campaign, and has wisely refrained from trying to be too serious, however serious the subject may be. He compares the Tammany ticket to a banana with one little white end (Shepard) and all the rest rotten and black. You wouldn't eat the whole banana for the sake of the sound end.

One of the attractions of the St. Louis World's Fair will be the Blanke-Friede Aerial Globe, a vast steel structure consisting of a globe 350 feet in diameter, mounted upon a lofty pedestal. It will contain all manner of shops, restaurants and amusements, and will be over 700 feet in height. A tract of land immediately adjoining the fair grounds has been purchased as a site for the globe.

The murderer of President McKinley was executed by electricity, according to the laws of the state of New York, Oct. 29. Let him not have even the infamous renown of a great criminal. There are men who pervert great talents to do great wrongs. The assassin's crime was not great, though the nation's loss and sorrow were great. The crime itself was despicable and mean. Let his name and face and the place of his burial be forgotten.

King Edward's physical condition is exciting much apprehension. It is known that he has for some time suffered from throat trouble, but the public can never be sure that it knows just how serious or how trivial the trouble may be. A rumor is periodically revived that he suffers, as did his sister, the late Empress Frederick, from cancer of the throat. This rumor is always denied. It is said that the king, who is a heavy smoker, was recently advised by his physicians to give up tobacco.

Is it a Case of Heresy?

Is it possible that our great twentieth century convention at Minneapolis is, after all, to give rise to a number of heresy trials? The Standard of Chicago, our sturdy Baptist contemporary, contains a letter from "The Twin Cities" by Rev. W. W. Dawley, in which, referring to the Baptist ministers' conference held on Monday during our convention week, he says:

Oct. 14 Dr. Tyler, of Denver, Col., who was attending the Christian convention in the city, addressed the conference on "Emphasis in Preaching." The points to be emphasized, in his mind, were the lordship of Jesus, personal regeneration, the social teachings of Jesus, and the unity of the church. He represented trenchantly and strongly the Baptist position.

This is our own B. B. Tyler, author of our weekly "B. B. Tyler's Letter" in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, presenting "trenchantly and strongly the Baptist position"! Was there ever a clearer case of heresy? But there are others. The Twin Cities letter continues:

"Forty-five millions of our people have never heard the plea for Christian union by a return to the New Testament faith," says the report of their board of managers. Strange language this is to Baptists, who have been bleeding and pleading for just that thing all these centuries! Most of the Protestant pulpits were occupied by their pastors on Sunday, Oct. 13, both in Minneapolis and St. Paul. As far as your correspondent heard, these preachers came out squarely on Baptist ground, and rung the changes on arguments that have been preached in Baptist pulpits all these years.

And yet most of these preachers supposed, no doubt, they were telling the people of the Twin Cities something new, whereas they were only rehashing arguments which have become stale in Baptist pulpits! One of two things is true; either these preachers of Christian union based on a return to New Testament faith, who filled the pulpits of Minneapolis and St. Paul, took a day off and went over to the Baptist camp, leaving their own ground, which, of course, would be heresy, pure and simple, or else the Baptists of that region have made more progress than they have received credit for, and are much nearer the ground we occupy than we have supposed. Of these two alternatives we have no hesitation in choosing the latter. Perhaps it would be more accurate to say that both bodies have made such progress in their understanding of the New Testament ideals, and in their manner of presenting them, as to be much closer together than they formerly were, or than they now imagine themselves to be. We are not willing to give the Baptists all the credit for progress, while we have been standing still. That our own horizon has been enlarged, that some of the crudeness which attaches to beginnings of great movements has been sloughed off, and that we have a clearer perspective of Christian history and of Christian doctrine than formerly, are facts which few of us would call in question. We have always felt that our Baptist brethren and ourselves were so committed to Christ as our only Leader, and to the New Testament as our only rule of faith and practice, that our mutual progress could but bring us into closer union. It would seem from the foregoing report that in the latitude of the Twin Cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul, they are occupying very much the same ground.

The Standard correspondent strangely enough says nothing about the interchange of fraternal greetings between the Baptist state missionary convention which met in St. Paul and our National Convention, which was a very pleasant episode in our convention and, so far as we heard, was none the less so in that of the Baptists. If Baptists and Disciples, who are also called Christians, are indeed pleading for the same things, they ought to know each other better and get closer together, cease their ecclesiastical sparring and present a united front to the world under the banner of "one Lord, one faith and one baptism." How would it do for our next congress to have a representative Baptist discuss the question, "What are Essential Baptist Principles?" Perhaps the Baptist congress, in return, would permit one of our representative men to discuss a similar question in their congress, namely: "What are the Essential Principles of what is known as the Current Reformation Advocated by the Disciples of Christ?" Such an exchange of thought would, no doubt, hasten the process of our becoming acquainted with each other, and would avoid the danger of heresy trials arising from trespassing on each other's ground.

It Will Not Down.

The question, What shall be done with our unemployed preachers who have passed the limit of fifty years of age, and for that reason are not acceptable to the churches as pastors, is one that refuses to be silenced. It is a problem that needs to be solved. There lies before us a letter from a preacher of good ability and of blameless life and character, the contents of which would touch any heart which has not turned to stone. He had previously ordered his paper to be discontinued. The business department in sending his bill appended to it the question, "Are you displeased with the paper?" Replying to this question, in the letter referred to, he says: "No! a thousand times, no! I have read it for years with approval and personal satisfaction." He states, then, the reasons why he loves the paper, which need not be quoted here, and adds: "But why, then, part with it? you ask. Well, I am guilty of the crime of having silver in my hair. I am fifty-five years old, and the churches don't want preachers who are not young men."

We are aware of the fact that a complaint of this kind often comes from men who are out of employment because they have ceased to study, and to keep in touch with the great questions of the age in which they live. The result in such cases is inevitable and unavoidable. The man who ceases studying at fifty or sixty years of age, and relies on the capital which he has previously acquired to carry him through, will soon find himself out of demand. But this reason does not apply to the brother whose letter we have quoted, and to others who, like him, are guilty only of the crime of having silver in their hair. This brother is studious, capable, up-to-date in his thought, and is in the very prime of his life. There is something radically wrong in our conception of the pastoral relation, and of the office of a minister of the gospel when we regard such a man as having passed his usefulness at the very time when he is capable of being most useful.

Does this craze for young men in the pastorate arise out of a failure to appreciate those qualities of Christian character and of Christian service which come with age and experience, and an overestimate, perhaps, of other qualities that are peculiar to younger men? We think it probable that such is the case. If so there needs to be some teaching of the churches on this subject. This question is one in which young ministers are even more interested than the old. If a man is to reach the limit of his usefulness, and of his power to earn a livelihood in his chosen calling, at the age of fifty, surely the outlook for the young men in the ministry to-day is not very inspiring. These young preachers do not expect to always remain young, and the thought of retiring from active work at fifty, with silver in the hair but none in the pocket to meet the demands of old age, has a decidedly depressing effect upon them.

True, there are some old men beyond sixty who will not be laid on the shelf, but these are the exceptions rather than the rule. There are three classes of unemployed preachers, as we see the situation. The first is that just mentioned—those who have the virility and power to keep up with the procession and who cannot be laid on the shelf because of any age-limit. The second class are those who, because of failure to read and study and to keep their thought and sympathies fresh, are no longer in demand. The first of these need no help and the second cannot be helped, perhaps, as they must help themselves. But there is a third class, and it is not a small one, made up of men ranging all the way from fifty to seventy years of age, who are capable of efficient service in the church and who are qualified to give the very kind of instruction, advice and example which many churches most need, but who, for lack of the power to push themselves forward and press their own claims, have fallen out of the line of active ministers, and their hearts and lives are saddened by reason of this fact. It seems to us that churches ought to be discriminating, and the men who are capable of rendering efficient service at and beyond the age of fifty should have an opportunity of doing so.

Some one has suggested that the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor generally dictates who the preacher is to be, and that they invariably select a young man. We are not inclined to credit this, at least as a general rule. We have not found that men with gray hairs but with young minds and hearts, who are in active sympathy with the young, have been unacceptable to young people. But there is a fault somewhere in the church that needs to be corrected. We cannot please God and receive His blessing while we treat our elderly men with neglect and disrespect. We are sure the noble class of young preachers among us will heartily endorse this sentiment. There is not sufficient respect for age in this country, and this spirit has infected the church. In so far as this is the case the remedy is to exorcise this spirit by fostering that respect and reverence for age which the scriptures everywhere inculcate.

Notes and Comments.

That is a very vital question raised by Dr. Cadman, of New York, before the Y. M. C. A. of that city recently, when he asked: "Can we, in this great country, cultivate the character necessary to run it?" It is evident that on our ability to answer this question affirmatively depends the future of our great republic. Dr. Cadman adds: "The religious revivals of the past have been conducted along purely spiritual lines, but mark me, the next revival will be ethical and must tend toward conduct. In other words men must be shown that profession alone is nothing. Live the life. Practice is everything." We must, indeed, have a revival of ethics if this government is to be saved and perpetuated for those who are to come after us. But we must not suppose that this ethical revival is to have no connection with those revivals which are conducted on spiritual lines. We must come to understand that pure ethics are the flower and fruit of religion. The divorce between religion and morals is the curse of the country. No religion is acceptable to God that does not produce a moral life. It is by the emphasis of this truth, and by beginning and carrying on more earnestly the religious and moral training of the young, that we are to cultivate the character necessary to run this country on to a glorious future.

The Free Methodist church at Taylorville, Ill., has requested the resignation of its new pastor because he "strongly objected from the beginning to the gymnastic gyrations, as he termed them, of his congregation." His resignation was forthcoming, and one of the deacons, in explaining the cause of the untimely separation of church and pastor, said, "We rate him as a very intellectual man, but he has not got the old-time religion, and we desire to have at the head of our church a man who does not object to the methods which are practiced throughout the universe in the Free Methodist Church." There is an expansiveness about this deacon's phraseology that is truly refreshing. We knew the theory had been broached by some venturesome scientists that the various planets were inhabited by intelligent beings, but we had never dreamed that the Free Methodist Church had extended its missionary operations into those far-away worlds that glimmer above us in the midnight sky. If these "gymnastic gyrations" to which the pastor objected are indeed carried on in those far-off shining spheres, what right has an inhabitant of the earth to raise his voice against a custom that holds sway, like the law of gravitation, "throughout the universe"? The deacon is right. The law of gravitation and of "gymnastic gyrations" in the Free Methodist Church should not be tampered with.

Much has been said on the art of living together peaceably with one's fellow men. If this is not among the fine arts it is at least among the great arts. In our reading recently we ran across some wise words by C. A. Bartol, the venerable white-haired pastor in Boston who but a few years ago received his discharge and went home to rest. He says:

"Forbear; give up a little; take less than belongs to you; endure more than should be put upon you. Make allowance for another's judgment of the case: differing in constitution, circumstances and interests, we shall often decide differently about the justice and integrity of things; and mutual concessions alone can heal the breaches and bridge over the chasms between us, while quick resentment and stiff maintenance of our position will breed endless dispute and bitterness."

Some will say this is not human nature. Perhaps not, but it is the divine nature of which Christians are supposed to be part-takers.

The national gathering of the Priests' Eucharistic League has recently been in session in St. Louis. It is an organization which originated but a few years ago, having for its object to encourage the worship of the bread and wine of the communion as the body and blood of the Lord, according to the Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation. The perpetuate adoration of the elements by relays of priests or monks is a form which they especially approve. Among the eminent prelates who were present was Archbishop Elder of Cincinnati, the senior Catholic prelate in the United States and the successor of Archbishop Purcell with whom Alexander Campbell held his famous debate.

Dr. Parkhurst once called certain declarations in the Westminster Confession of Faith a "libel on the infinite grace of God." There are many of our theories that are equally a libel on the grace or wisdom or power of God. When men tell us that a certain thing is right, but is impossible of accomplishment, what is that but a libel on the almightiness and the goodness of God? When men sanction, in the name of religion, false standards of judgment and arbitrary walls of separation between the children of a common Father, what is that but a libel on the justice of God? When men live impure lives and engage in unholy practices, claiming to be in fellowship with God, what is that but a libel upon the holiness of the infinite One? When we, by our industrial rules and customs, deprive any class of men of the just reward of their wages in order to enhance the profits of the business, claiming meanwhile to be Christians, are we not publishing a libel on the character of Christ? Thus every doctrine, every theory, every practice, must be subjected at last to the crucial test of the character of God. Whatever fails to stand that test must not receive the sanction of those who would honor God.

J. M. Rudy, pastor of the church at Cedar Rapids, Ia., has made a novel suggestion bearing on our propaganda for Christian union. Returning home from the convention at Minneapolis, in his sermon on that convention he expressed the wish that we might have some way by which we could pick out every man and every woman who is pleading and praying for Christian union, so that when we gather in great conventions, such as that we propose to hold in St. Louis in 1903, we might be able to know who of the vast throng are seeking to unite God's people. This, he remarked, would give rise to many conversations on this subject, which would result in the dissemination of much light. He suggested a small simple button of uniform design bearing the letters C. U., for Christian union. Bro. H. E. Witwer, who is foremost in every good work and word of the church, was so deeply impressed with the idea that he proposed not only to wear such a button himself if it should be prepared, but to pay for all that would be worn in Cedar Rapids. Bro. Rudy says we have the C. E. button, the G. A. R. button, the three links, and why not a Christian union button? There is the germinal idea, and it is not a bad one. Now let the geniuses go to work on the best design for carrying out the thought. As the letters C. U. stand for several things besides Christian union, why not spell out the words in a circle? When Bro. Rudy gets his design completed we will present a cut of it to our readers. If the wearing of such a button will have a tendency not only to advertise our plea for unity, but to make those who wear it practice unity, it will be a great invention.

The Minneapolis Tribune in an editorial on "Science and the Future Life," refers to the writings of the late Prof. John Fiske in upholding the doctrine of immortality as well as of evolution. He quotes the Watchman of Boston and the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to show that "both the orthodox and liberal press commend his work." Unfortunately for the present use of the word "liberal" the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST would not be accorded a place among the "liberal press," seeing that we accentuate the divinity of Christ, the authority of the Holy Scriptures, the doctrine of regeneration and a holy life. Nevertheless, we are glad to give Prof. Fiske credit for his clear and strong testimony to the doctrine of a personal God and of a personal immortality, and in favor of theistic, as against atheistic, evolution. The Tribune adds that the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is associated with "the sect which, according to James Lane Allen's 'Reign of Law,' three decades ago virtually expelled from its membership David, the hero of that story, because he had become a convert to the Darwinian theory of evolution." That is all right, except that the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is the organ of no "sect," that there was no such man as "David" save in the fertile imagination of the author of "The Reign of Law," and that nobody was ever "virtually expelled" from membership in any of the churches of this reformation for accepting the Darwinian or any other theory of evolution that leaves room for God and his revelation through his Son, Jesus Christ our Lord.

Editor's Easy Chair.

The fall of the year! How expressive the phrase! It was impressed on me this morning as I saw the leaves falling in a shower from the great oaks at Rose Hill. The air was full of them, whirling like snowflakes and settling down at last, making a brown carpet on the green lawn. There is something in the rustle of these withered leaves, as one walks over them, that acts as a soothing balm to the weary, care-burdened heart. The music of these rustling leaves is of a melancholy type, it must be confessed, but it is a kind of melancholy which steals into the soul and finds a welcome, because its minor chords fall into sympathy with our spirits, in our more thoughtful moods. Can anyone walk alone or with a congenial companion, through the autumn woods, where, "heaped in the hollows and the groves the withered leaves lie dead," and not fall into a thoughtful mood? If the soul be devout, it is a worshipful mood, also, which comes upon us. Who can analyze the feeling or trace it to its true cause? But whether we can understand it or not, no one can doubt that it is good medicine for the soul to commune with Nature when the leaves are falling, when the nuts are dropping, and when all the sights and sounds remind us of the transitoriness of all earthly things.

What is the message of this brown, withered leaf that has flitted down through the air and lies beneath my feet on the earth? Stooping to pick up one of them lying under one of the oaks, I heard it speaking, and this was its message: "A few brief months ago, I was a fresh young leaf, green and beautiful, fluttering in the gentle breeze on a lofty oak, and surrounded by gay companions. The life of the great tree ran out into my veins, and I grew into my present size, and rejoiced in my position and prosperity. I looked down with some disdain upon the grass that covered the earth, and congratulated myself that I was born to a higher station in life. Little did I dream that my relation to the tree which gave me birth and position was only a temporary one. I had never seen a leafless tree, and it was contrary to all my experience that I should lose my connection with it and drop to the ground, a helpless thing. But one day it turned cold, and that night there was a chilling, biting frost. Immediately the sap of the tree, which had been my life-blood, ran back into the trunk of the tree, leaving me and my companions high and dry. The first effect of this retreat of the sap was to impart to us greater beauty of color, and we blushed in scarlet, crimson and gold. But one day when the wind was blowing, I felt my hold on the tree loosen, and I found myself whirled about in the air until I came to the ground. And here I lie, and what is to become of me, I do not know. But the same Power that gave me birth and being will care for me still."

So saying, the leaf heaved a gentle sigh and paused in its plaint. Startled by this pathetic story of a fallen leaf, I listened, wondering if this faded messenger of decay would point its plaintive story with a moral for my benefit. But it was silent with a wisdom which few preachers can imitate. After waiting a sufficient length of time for the leaf to resume, I determined not to be discourteous to so effective a preacher as it had proved to be, even though it were a fallen one, and said in reply: "Little preacher, I thank you for your sermon. I have heard many preachers make far more noise and say far less to my heart. You mean to make me wiser by your whispered message, though you did not point your story with a moral. The facts in your brief life carry their own moral with them. 'We all do fade as a leaf.' To-day we flourish with our veins full of the sap of life, and sometimes we look down condescendingly upon those less fortunate than ourselves. We are vain of our beauty, our position, our social pre-eminence, our wealth, our influence, unmindful of the fact that these things are gifts to us, and are only temporary. In a little while the winds of adversity blow upon us, and beauty, position, social prestige, wealth, influence—all are gone, and we are brought low in our humiliation. The lessons you teach me, my little brown preacher, from your lowly pulpit, are humility, love for my fellow men, and trust in God. When the juice of life runs from my veins and the winds of the oncoming winter of death shall loosen my earthly ties, may I have the faith that finds repose in the thought that He who gave me birth and being will care for me still." A grey squirrel ran up the side of an oak and paused to look down upon me, and brought to a close this Rose Hill colloquy.

I have observed along the ocean shore for many miles back from the water, the trees are bent landward, or away from the ocean. Why is this? The prevailing winds are from over the sea. There are land breezes, but these are more than counterbalanced by the prevailing sea breezes. "As the twig is bent the tree is inclined." And the twig bends to the prevailing influence. Suppose a family be religious in its habits one day in seven, and worldly the other six days of the week; which way will the little human twigs be inclined? It is not by spasmodic efforts to make ourselves good, or to get God to make us good, that the soul progresses in virtue, but by the daily habit of restraining the evil and of cultivating the good within us, and by keeping ourselves constantly in fellowship with God and with good people. Patient continuance in well-doing, rather than occasional efforts to storm the battlements of heaven, builds character and determines destiny.

"Heaven is not reached by a single bound,
But we build the ladder by which we rise
From the lowly earth to the vaulted skies,
And we mount to its summit round by round."

Questions and Answers.

Do you think the doctrine of divine immutability and the following statement of the scientific skeptics reconcilable? Why? "Die Wunder durchbrechen die klaren und bekannten Naturgesetze. Das kann und darf aber nicht geschehen. Wenn die Natur an einem einzigen Punkte aus ihren Angeln gehoben wird, so muss die ganze Schoepfung in sich zusammenstuerzen." Theo. A. Johnson.

Poplar Hill, Ontario.

This, being interpreted, means that, "miracles overthrow the clear and known laws of nature. But that can not and is not permitted to happen. If nature is at a single point drawn from its course, then the whole universe must be thrown into confusion."

This conception of miracles is outgrown and discredited. No intelligent believer in miracles to-day regards them as overthrowing the clear and known laws of nature. They are not even regarded as the suspension of the laws of nature, but rather as the bringing in of an added force which transcends the ordinary laws and forces of nature. So far from this view of miracles being inconsistent with the doctrine of the divine immanence, it seems rather to imply such doctrine. If God is present in His world, in all of its ordinary operations, why should it be thought a thing incredible, when occasion demands, for a new force to be added to the ordinary forces in order to the accomplishment of some divine purpose? Who shall say that this new force, which is not ordinarily demanded, is in violation or contradiction of the ordinary forces which are at work? If the fact that such force is not always operative within the scope of human observation proves it to be hostile to or violative of the laws of nature, then we would have to rule out of the category of natural forces a great many other causes which do not operate continuously. If we concede, as we must if we believe in the Bible and in the revelation of Jesus Christ, that the divine Being who is immanent in His universe is a Person, and not a mere force, then there ought to be no difficulty in conceiving of Him as working in and through nature to carry out His divine purposes in the redemption of the world.

If the teaching in our late Sunday-school lesson be true, that we should not even look on the wine, how is it that Jesus would turn water into wine and thereby sanction its use? I. S. Hanna

The passage quoted from Proverbs is a warning against intemperance. It is a particular kind of wine, or wine in a certain stage of development, that he admonishes the people, and particularly those, no doubt, who would be subject to temptation, not to look upon. To look upon it would be to create a desire for it in one who was given to excessive drinking. We need not suppose that the wine which Jesus created at the marriage festival was of this kind. Nor are we compelled to infer from the fact that Jesus created wine that he thereby approved its use indiscriminately, or relieved those present of their personal responsibility in the matter of drinking it. We are not shut up to any particular text or incident to learn what Jesus thought of drunkenness and all that train of evils which flow from it. His whole life and character and all his teaching are against intemperance and in perfect harmony with the warning in the passage referred to.

Is unleavened bread necessary to the Lord's Supper? Mrs. E. A. Orr.

We do not think the scriptures give us any law or rule as to the kind of bread to be used in the Lord's Supper. Our Savior used the bread and the fruit of the vine which were on the table. The bread, in this case, was probably unleavened, but we are not justified in inferring from this fact that no other kind of bread would be permissible in this memorial feast. If this were so, we would have to investigate carefully and find out just what particular kind of wine our Lord used on that occasion, and then use no other. We prefer, and always advise, the use of unfermented wine in the communion service, not because we know that this was the kind used by our Lord, but on the ground that the fermented wine might be an occasion of stumbling to some weak brother.

1. When is Christ to sit on David's throne, as spoken of in Acts 2:30?

2. Is it correct to speak of our eating the Lord's Supper when we partake of the bread and wine? Does the apostle Paul in 1 Cor. 11:20 say it is not?

1. In the sense meant in the passage cited, Christ is now sitting on the throne of David, and has been since his ascension and coronation; that is, he is ruler over spiritual Israel as David was over fleshly Israel.

2. Yes, it is correct, and the passage in 1 Cor. does not teach otherwise, but asserts that the Lord's Supper cannot be partaken of in the manner in which it was being attempted at Corinth.

England's Greatest King

By F. W. COLLINS

Behold a pupil of the monkish gown,
The pious Alfred, king to justice dear!
Lord of the harp and liberating spear;
Merror of princes! Indigent renown
Might range the starry ether for a crown
Equal to his deserts.

—Wordsworth.

The Alfred Millenary is an occurrence of striking interest because of the charm that clings to the name of that illustrious king. The unveiling, of the statue at Winchester on September 20 did not mark the exact anniversary of Alfred's death, which occurred on October 28, or 27, according to some authorities. The event is one in which America's interest is second only to that of England herself. Our institutions have their roots in English soil. England's history is in a very true sense our history. It was eminently fitting, therefore, that one of the most prominent of the younger of American historians, the late John Fiske, should have been chosen to represent America in the commemorative services. His address on that occasion, had he lived, would have been of very great interest.

Alfred is one of the few characters in history to whom posterity has freely accorded the title of "great." This he was, not alone by virtue of his great and varied achievements, but even more by the native characteristics of the man. Warrior and saint, statesman and minstrel, scholar and man of affairs, it was the marvelous blending of apparently opposite qualities, and the moderation and perfect equipoise in which these traits were held, that produced what Edward A. Freeman has called "the most perfect character in history." To quote the words of this historian, "in no other man on record were so many virtues disfigured by so little alloy. A saint without superstition, a scholar without ostentation, a warrior all whose wars were fought in defense of his country, a conqueror whose laurels were never stained by cruelty, a prince never cast down by adversity, never lifted up to insolence in the day of triumph—there is no other name in history to compare with his."

In the compact phrase of Prof. Green, "Alfred was the noblest as he was the most complete embodiment of all that is great, all that is lovable in the English temper. He combined as no other man ever has combined its practical energy, its patient and enduring force, its profound sense of duty, the reserve and self-control that steadies it in a wide outlook and a restless daring, its temperance and fairness, its frank geniality, its sensitiveness to affection, its poetic tenderness, its deep and passionate religion."

Alfred came to the throne in A. D. 872. The circumstances of his reign were peculiarly difficult. The invasion of England by the Northmen was then approaching its culmination. The brief supremacy which, under Alfred's grandfather, Egbert, Wessex had acquired over Mercia, East Anglia and Northumbria, was lost by the very influence that had made it possible. Dread of the invader had made submission to the West Saxon desirable for the sake of the common defense, but the increasing numbers and power of the Northmen had resulted in a gradual transfer of allegiance until, when Alfred came to the throne, his kingdom of Wessex was shorn of its dependencies and stood face to face with the invader, to fight not for its possessions but for its existence.

A victory just won by his predecessor gave Alfred an advantage which he used to purchase an interval of peace for a period of rest and preparation. The restless energy and dauntless courage of Alfred infused new hope into the terrified Saxons, who rallied to the standard of their king as he marched to meet the returning Northmen. The peace of Wedmore in 878 secured Wessex from farther invasion for many years, and confined the Northmen within definite boundaries. The prowess of Alfred could not prevent the final settlement of the Northmen in England, but it did insure a gradual instead of a sudden occupancy, and thus secured the amalgamation of the two peoples instead of a displacement of the old by the new, such as had occurred in the Anglo-Saxon invasion of Britain three centuries before.

The kingdom being now temporarily secured from attack, Alfred gave himself to matters of internal administration. His genius was here displayed to best advantage. All phases of the life of his people received careful and efficient consideration. The unsubstantial wooden dwellings that had been as tinder to the torch of the Northmen, were replaced with structures of stone or other enduring material. Skilled artisans were brought over from the continent and the people instructed in the best methods of working in wood and metal. The military organization was reconstructed, the service being placed upon a different basis, so as to increase both the size and the efficiency of the army. The collection of boats that had already done good service was expanded to a considerable fleet and formed for that day a respectable navy. It may be said that England owes to Alfred the beginning of that naval power for which she has since been so famous, and which has given her in war and in commerce the title of "Mistress of the Seas."

Alfred's service to education is incalculable. At his accession culture was in a very low state. It was to the king a keen reproach that "we who formerly sent teachers to other people must now bring in strangers to teach us." There was hardly a priest in the kingdom that could render the service in the language of the people, and few among the people understood the Latin ritual. Alfred established schools in various parts of the kingdom. (Oxford was one of these, Alfred's connection with this school, though a common belief, being probably wholly legendary.) Competent teachers were brought over from the continent. Books were prepared, by his personal work, both for the schools and for popular use. Bede's "Ecclesiastical History," the "Universal History" of Orosius, Boethius's "Consolations of Philosophy," the Institutes and the Code of West Saxon Laws, are among the works that came from Alfred either by translation, compilation or original production. The Anglo-Saxon chronicle for this period also shows the influence of the scholarly king.

Alfred's greatest service to education, however, was not in matters that can be tabulated. He produced an intellectual awakening by his own scholarly spirit and by his interest in affairs outside of his own kingdom. His eagerness for knowledge pertaining to exploration and discovery and to contemporary history was contagious, and by his own writing he brought the knowledge he acquired within reach of the people. The interest in history and geography thus stimulated led in the most direct way possible to a liberalizing of popular ideas.

But religion was the dominant characteristic of Alfred's life. In all his work he was ruled by the religious spirit. One chief purpose of the schools he established was the education of priests. The books that he placed in the hands of the people, both original and translated, were such as tended to quicken their religious life. For the benefit of the priests he translated Gregory's "Pastoral Care," and provided each one with a copy. His benefactions extended not only to all parts of his own kingdom, but also to Rome and even to Jerusalem. His inner spiritual life was in perfect harmony with this outward religious activity. Profound reverence and genuine enthusiasm for God's service were manifested in all that he did. In the character of saint equally with that of statesman and king, the name of Alfred has been revered by posterity.

Alfred was ambitious, but in the best and truest sense. He wished to be remembered, but in no merely showy way. "I desire," said he, "to leave to the men that come after me a remembrance of me in good works." "So long as I have lived I have striven to live worthily." That is the secret of Alfred's greatness. As a king he ruled solely for the good of his people, and the love and admiration that his people had for him have been extended to him by posterity. Though his kingdom included but a fraction of the English territory, he is claimed to-day by all England, and indeed by English-speaking people everywhere. In the quaint language of the chronicler, he "received Christ's quiet" October 28, A. D. 901. The splendor of his character is the glory of England, and is the heritage of the race.

Far and Near.

O love, I look across the sea,
The sails go by,
From vastness into vastness fade,
Lost in the sky.

O the great world! so wide and cold,
And you so far!
If only you could come as near
As yonder star.

Aloft, alone, I vex it not
With me or mine,
So far—yet am I near enough
To see it shine.

The Individuality of Christ's Love

By JAMES SMALL

"Who loved me and gave himself for me."

If there is a sweeter verse in the New Testament than this I do not know where to find it. A Savior who has power and authority to pardon my sins; a Savior who has power to cleanse me from sin and keep me clean; a Savior who has a heart large enough to take in all my sorrows and burdens and fears; a Savior whom I can find at any time or at any place, or in any circumstance; a Savior who will always hear me and respond to my call; a Savior who will not change—be one thing to-day and another to-morrow; a Savior who will charm the grave and the dark valley for me; a Savior who will welcome me on the other side; a Savior who loves me separately, personally and individually, and prays for me, is the Savior I need, and, I think, the Savior the world needs.

The poets have caught the thought of this individuality.

"I am so glad that our Father in heaven
Tells of his love in the book he has given;
Wonderful things in the Bible I see,
This is the dearest—that Jesus loves me," was the first hymn I ever learned to sing, and I learned it in an Irish school that was taught by a Methodist.

"Jesus loves me, this I know."

"I saw him hanging on the tree, in agonies and blood,
Who fixed his eyes on me."

The text in John 3:16 is precious, but this is a wide, wide world, and it is hard for me to realize that God loves me individually, for I am merged in the mass. But herein is God's tenderness and God's greatness. He loves each of us as if there were but one. Even in the mass God never loses sight of the individual. The dewdrop and flowers and birds preach the same sweet sermon. Thousands of birds fly in the firmament, and they are all individually fed and remembered by God. Millions of flowers bloom in the gardens, yet not one escapes God's notice. The mother love caresses the hair upon her child, but the Father love numbers the hairs on our head.

"I heard the robin singing its happy morning song,

I saw the helpmate bringing food unto its helpless young,

And to me there came a whisper that softly fanned the tree—

"If God for these so careth, will he not care for thee?"

"I saw the lilies growing in beauty day by day,

No queen in all her glory so gorgeous in array;

And on their leaves were written sweet words of love to me—

If God for these so careth, will he not care
for me?"

"I thank thee, O, my father, that 'mid life's toil and dust

The birds and flowers can bring me such words of love and trust;

Then walk by faith and hear the Master's words of love to thee—

If God for these so careth, will he not care
for me?"

He calleth his own sheep by name. Here is the thought again. Another jewel from God's casket. In oriental countries this is what the kind shepherds can do. And, it is said, they know them by their defects. And the Lord knows us, I have no doubt, by our defects, and in most of us he has a great many such marks to recognize us by. God grant that his love may yet be like a great tidal wave in our hearts, to drive them all out before we see him face to face.

The high priest, when he entered the holy place, wore a breastplate on which precious stones were set, and on each stone was engraved a name. On the heart of our eternal High Priest is borne the name, I believe, of all his disciples.

There is another gem of individuality in Christ's treatment of Peter. When our Lord rose from the dead, the angel conveying the message to the woman said, "Go tell my disciples and Peter." Why "and Peter"? Ah, Peter had been through the depths of a great temptation, and our Lord's individual love followed that disciple in a very tender and considerate way. He had voluntarily cut himself off from the disciples, and if Jesus had sent a general message, it would not have covered poor, weak, sinning Peter. Poor Peter might have said, "Well, that does not mean me, for I have said that I am not his disciple and cursed and swore to confirm my awful lie." Jesus needed not that any should teach him what was in Peter. He knew how he felt, and he sent him this special message. And if one will compare the narrative they will see that the enthusiasm and impatience of Peter knew no bounds. He ran with all his might to the tomb where Jesus had lain. Personal love had brought him back.

A last gem from the divine casket: Jesus loved Mary and Martha and Lazarus. He loved each with a particular love. He loved them separately. It would have been easy for the evangelist to have said, "He loved this family." No, there is a sweeter touch, there is a sweeter love shown. "He loved Mary and Martha and their brother Lazarus."

He called, "Mary." She thought it was the gardener. Nay, it was her best lover calling her by name. "A friend in need is a friend indeed." She did so need a cheerful word just then. Oh, what joy swelled in her heart when she knew it was the Lord! It is one thing to read, "Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth." It is another thing to hear, "Mary, look unto me." It is one thing to see and hear a sainted mother pray by the old arm-chair for all in the old home; it is another thing to hear my name in mother's prayers.

And is this individual love nothing to me? Has it no lesson for the weary and sad? Does it teach nothing to the sinner? Has it no suggestion for the Christian? Several.

1. To the unsaved it has a precious message. "God has laid on him the iniquity of us all." What meaning there is in Paul's words: "For the love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead; and that he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them, and rose again" (2 Cor. 5:14, 15). "If one died for all then were all dead," That's Roman law, that's English law, that's divine law. If the law should accept a man to die for a friend, that friend in the person of his benefactor would die too. And if Jesus did not suffer the exact penalty due to sin and which the sinner ought to have borne, he suffered an equivalent, something that God could accept as a substitute and equivalent for the sinner's punishment. Blessed be God, there's gospel here, there's good news here, there's power here, there's salvation for every man who will accept that death as his death. And when we accept it as our own, God refuses to impute one sin to us.

2. But there is holy living here too. This is another purpose in his death. "And that he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves but unto him which died for them and rose again." It is not enough to hear, it is not enough to believe, it is not enough to repent, it is not enough to be baptized, we must take the new life too. We must take his death, we accept the life as well. Each saved and rejoicing convert is to repeat the life of Christ, by God's help, in the earth again. The Christian is Christ continued in the world. To accept his death without the life is not sufficient. We must take both. That's what baptism means and what it teaches. That's what the form of doctrine requires. I take the death as if it were mine, he offers me his life, I accept that too. It is his life. The grace is his, the power is his, the redemption is his. He is able, he is willing to forgive and keep and aid.

"Oh, bliss of the purified, bliss of the pure,
No wound hath the soul that his blood cannot cure;
No sorrow bowed head but may sweetly find rest,
No tears but may dry them on Jesus' breast."

3. I can have all of Jesus for my portion. That's the silent sermon of the dewdrop. "Christ,"—the whole Christ—says Paul, "liveth in me." Jesus is not Paul's Savior any more than he is mine. We need to take him as he is for our joy and life and redemption and salvation. Every drop of rain or drop of dew, it has been shown, gets the whole sun. All the colors of the rainbow are in it. And they are all there because the whole sun is there. The rainbow is in the drop as well as in the cloud. Each soul, no matter how few may be his talents, whether he be a preacher in the pulpit, a teacher in the Sunday-school, a Christian in business, a humble disciple, can be filled with all the fullness of God, and—"If we can not sing like angels,

If we cannot preach like Paul,
We can tell the love of Jesus,
We can say he died for all.

"If we cannot give our thousands,
We can give the widow's mite,
And the least we do for Jesus
Will be precious in his sight."

Bedford, Ind.

A little boy heard the church bell ring one Sunday morning and saw the people hurrying along to church. Catching the religious impulse he knelt down to pray, but he knew no prayer except "Now I lay me," which seemed scarcely appropriate at ten o'clock in the morning. Presently he was heard repeating the alphabet. When asked why, he said: "I don't know a prayer, so I thought I would give God the letters and let him spell out the words for himself."

The Old Book In The New Crucible

By J. J. HALEY.

IX. The Crucible of Archeology.

The land of Egypt is a fertile tract of land bounded on either side by limestone hills, which in the north die away into a grassy plain, but in the south blend with granite rocks that come together and form a pass through which the Nile boisterously bounds into the valley. Travelers tell us that this marvelous and historic stream modestly rolls in winter through a dry and dusty plain, but in summer, when the tropical rains pour down their tribute of waters on the highlands of Abyssinia, then it is fed by innumerable rivulets. Growing in wealth it becomes, like most beings, proud and swollen, puts on sometimes a blood-red, and sometimes a green mantle, and at last, intoxicated with success, it overleaps its banks and floods the surrounding country. Exhausting its fortune by such dissipation, it repents, and, like the prodigal in the parable, returns to its old life. It, however, leaves behind it a rich and unctuous mud, which is both meat and medicine to the hungry land. Into this the Egyptian puts his seed and soon there follows a plenteous harvest. This island of the desert, veneered with a foreign soil, watered by a natural system of irrigation and invigorated by eternal sunshine, naturally became the granary of the ancient world, and from all parts people came into Egypt to buy corn. Among those who went on this errand, we read in the scriptures of the brethren of Joseph. Pictures of these caravans are to-day to be seen on the walls of the Egyptian tombs. The Nile, however, was not always extravagant. Sometimes the tropical rains failed, and then she could not nourish the thirsty land. Vegetation died, and famine hung its black pall over the nation. Necessity—the terrible mother of invention—taught the Egyptians in the days of plenty to store for the years of famine, and so we see on their tombs the pictures of granaries and men storing the wheat. This leads us to believe that the story of Joseph's ruling over Egypt and making the people gather in the years of plenty for the years of famine, is not at all improbable. The whole story of Joseph is beautifully illustrated by recent discoveries. We are told that Pharaoh invested him with full authority, and gave him his signet ring, that he might stamp all his orders with the royal assent. A number of these rings have been found and are now preserved in the British Museum, which show that at least the writer of the story was familiar with Egyptian customs. Joseph, we are told, married the daughter of Potipherah, a priest of On, the city called by the Greeks Heliopolis, because it was devoted to the worship of the sun. The Egyptian in his idolatry worshiped both the sun and the Nile. In his blindness he saw only secondary causes. He knew that the Nile fertilized the earth, and that old Sol with his golden radiance ripened the fruit, and what was more natural than to thank them for their beneficence? Later on we will see how the Egyptian received evidence that there was a greater Being than the sun or the Nile.

The scriptures tell us that after a lapse of time there arose "a new king who knew not Joseph." Dr. Kinns affirms that this was Seti II. In this he differs from some authorities, but is in practical agreement with others; and as his contention seems plausible, we may follow his lead. Seti was the man who ordered the destruction of the Jewish children. This is compatible with his character as represented on the monuments. He is there depicted as brave but excessively cruel. His conduct towards the children impresses us as being fiendish, but it would not appear so to the people of his time, for infanticide was not regarded as a serious crime by the ancients. The Greeks by this experience sought to keep the Helots, a slave population, from increasing on them; and even among the Greeks themselves, undesirable children were destroyed. One of the most interesting discoveries of modern times was the finding of Seti's tomb by that ill-fated explorer, Belzoni, in 1817. It contained, among other interesting relics, the magnificent sarcophagus of Seti, but not his body, that had evidently been removed during a time of social disorder to a more secure place near to Thebes. It was found along with that of his son Rameses II, and we can now look into the faces of the very men who oppressed the Israelites with a bitter bondage.

We read in scripture that the Hebrews were set to work to build two treasure cities, Raamses and Pithom. For a long time skeptics challenged this statement, till M. Naville put all doubts at rest by finding one of these cities, which in a most remarkable manner confirms the statements of scripture that the Hebrews experienced a difficulty in finding the necessary straw to make bricks. On examining the walls of the city it was observed that the lower strata of bricks were well made, with straw carefully selected and regularly cut, but in the higher tiers the bricks were poorer and not well supplied with straw, and on the highest tier were bricks without a straw at all, showing that as the work proceeded the brickmakers were not able to get sufficient straw to make the bricks properly. On Egyptian monuments are pictures of Egyptian brickmakers, and in their records the Semitic race are spoken of as only fit for that kind of work. Some conception of the labors of Israel while in Egypt may be formed by the contemplation of the ruins of the edifices erected in the times of Seti and Rameses. The building of such colossal piles as the Hall of Columns at Karnak must have necessitated the employment of much slave labor. Had these stones a voice, they could tell of the sufferings of Israel in bondage. Lenormant, a celebrated Egyptologist, says: "It is only with a veritable sentiment of horror that one can think of the thousands of captives who died under the stick of the taskmaster, or the many victims of excessive fatigue and privation of every kind who, in the position of convicts, raised gigantic constructions to gratify the insatiable pride of the Egyptian monarch. In the monuments in the reign of Rameses, there is not a stone, so to speak, that has not cost a human life." During the latter part of Seti's reign he associated his son Rameses II with him in the government of the country, and it would be during the reign of Rameses II. that Moses in a moment of extreme indignation slew the Egyptian who was maltreating the Hebrew, and thus became exiled from the court of Pharaoh. That period of forty years of quiet life in the land of Midian was not without its uses in the education of Moses for his great life work. During that time he would study the topography of the wilderness and acquaint himself with the resources of the land in which, under his rule, Israel was to wander for so many years.

Rameses was succeeded by Meneptah II. who is identified as the Pharaoh of the Exodus. He is depicted on the monuments as the mean spirited, vacillating and cruel prince that the Bible represents him as having been. He conducted no wars in person—sent his generals out to fight while he reclined at ease at home. Unlike his predecessors he built no costly edifices nor designed any great enterprises but he satisfied his vanity by carving his name and his statue on the works of the great kings who had ruled before him. It was to this monarch that Moses went and pleaded for the rights of his brethren. Skeptics have ridiculed the whole story of the Exodus. They have never been able to see how the story of the plagues manifests either the wisdom or the goodness of God, yet a study of the idolatries of the Egyptians can not fail to impress us with the belief that these marvels were wrought, as the Bible states, to show the contemptible nature of the gods of the heathen, and the glorious majesty of Jehovah. "The Egyptians shall know that I am the Lord when I stretch forth my hand over Egypt." Thus, for instance, the Egyptians worshiped the sun, but God withheld its light and covered Egypt with a darkness that could be felt, thus proving in a very emphatic way that he was greater than the sun. They worshiped the serpent, and Moses brought that worship into contempt by turning one into a stick. They worshiped the cow, and the cattle were destroyed. They worshiped the Nile, which to them was a source of life, and it was made to run with blood, and became the symbol of death. Thus did Jehovah execute "vengeance against all the gods of Egypt," and proved that he was the Lord of heaven and earth. It was also a lesson to the Israelites, for they too had become contaminated by association with those Egyptians. This was shown by their readiness to fall down and worship the golden calf, a form of idolatry practiced by the people of Egypt.

The significance of the fact has been pointed out by skeptics that there are no references in contemporaneous monumental records to Israel in Egypt, or anywhere else. The most important discovery of Prof. Petrie, in 1896, at Thebes is that of a stela or tablet of Merneptah, in which the name of Israel distinctly occurs. Petrie renders the passage: "The people of Israel is spoiled, it hath no seed; Syria is widowed." It is thus translated by Prof. W. Max Muller, of Philadelphia, "Israel has been torn out without offshoot, Palestine has become a widow for Egypt." If this last rendering is the correct one it is probably a reference to Israel in Canaan; but there is an ambiguity in the expression that makes it a little difficult either way. If there is a fact in Bible history that needs no confirmation from outside sources, it is the sojourn of Israel in Egypt. This fact was so deeply embedded in the national consciousness, and came out in so many ways and from so many different sources, that to doubt it, is to invalidate all human testimony. The monuments will yet testify on that question.

Leaving Egypt and the wilderness behind us, let us now look at Israel in the land of promise. Renan, the famous French critic, in his history of Israel, discredits the Bible story by contending that the art of writing was not well enough known, or sufficiently developed, to allow of the production in that period of such clear and intelligible narratives as we have in the books of Joshua and Judges. These doubts have, however, been set at rest by the discovery of such antique correspondence as that recently found in the Mound of Amarna in Egypt. Representations of these clay tablets, as also of many other similar discoveries, are to be seen in the "Helps to the Study of the Bible" issued by the Oxford press. These clay letters strengthen our faith by showing us that people could write with facility in that ancient world. If Moses did not write the Pentateuch, it was not for lack of skill or ability to write. Prof. Sayce has made this abundantly clear in all his later books. In this collection of state letters found at Amarna are some sent from Palestine to the King of Egypt in the time of Joshua, and they mention cities and kings whose names are given in the Bible, showing that the events related in Joshua, if not written by an eyewitness, were written by some one who had access to the facts.

Modern discoveries show that there is a genuine historic element in the book of Judges. The scenes depicted by the sacred writers in this work are also mirrored forth in secular literature. For instance, it is revealed that when Samson was captured by the Gazites, after he had foolishly revealed the secret of his strength to the deceitful and treacherous Delilah, they put out his eyes and sent him to grind in their prisons. We have pictures which have been handed down to us representing eastern monarchs putting out the eyes of their political prisoners, and treating their captive enemies with the most diabolical cruelty. These Gazites who imprisoned Samson worshiped a god called Dagon, and at a festival to the deity they brought Samson out to make fun of him—a dear bit of fun for them; his strength returning, he pulled down the temple and perished along with his enemies in its ruins. This Dagon was also worshiped by the Assyrians, and a picture of him is to be seen among the Assyrian curiosities in the British Museum. He is known as the fish god, and is believed to have been worshiped as the god of productiveness.

The monuments illustrate in only a very fragmentary way the history of Israel as a kingdom. A mummy has been found of Pinetem, who is supposed to have been one of the fathers-in-law of Solomon. We are informed in the book of Kings of Solomon's marriage to the daughter of Pharaoh, and now the parent of the bride turns up after a long absence. After the death of Solomon, the Jewish nation was rent in twain by the rival claims of Rehoboam and Jeroboam. R. took up his residence at Jerusalem. J., the son of Nebat, headed the revolt, and took up his residence at Samaria. Ten of the tribes followed him, and he ruled as king of Israel. Two, Judah and Benjamin, remained loyal to R., and he ruled over them. Thus arose the two kingdoms of Judah and Israel, whose history, interwoven together, so confuses the uninformed reader of the later period of Jewish history. Disunited, and weakened by dissension, these two nations suffer from the constant interference of surrounding nations. Civil contentions in nations furnish a reason for powerful neighboring enemies, bent upon aggression, coming in to apparently lend their help to settle internal troubles, but really determined to increase their own wealth and territory. The first to do so was the hereditary foe of Israel, Egypt. The story given in the Bible of Shishak's campaign and his sacking of Jerusalem is corroborated by a picture cut on the walls of the temple at Karnak. There Shishak is represented as dragging home his Jewish prisoners, striking them with a heavy club as they follow him. Champollion deciphered some of the hieroglyphics on this wall, and found among them were the names of Jewish leaders mentioned in the scriptures. Not only did the larger nations avail themselves of their weakened condition to oppress them, but smaller ones, which had been tributary to them, rebelled. For instance, it is stated in the book of Kings that Moab rebelled, and we did not know whether the rebellion was successful until the Moabite stone was discovered, which contains an account of that rebellion from the Moabite standpoint. Jehovah and other biblical names are in the account, and indirectly it corroborates the account in the book of Kings. In 1869 Dr. Klein, a German missionary, was traveling in the land of Moab, and found among some ruins this remarkable stone. He endeavored to secure it for the Berlin Museum, but was frustrated by the indiscreet action of a member of the French consulate at Jerusalem. He also had taken a fancy to it, and wanted it for a museum in Paris. He took some rough copies of it, and outbid the German for it. The anxiety of these two men to possess it aroused the interest of the natives, and they, thinking it possessed some sacred charm, broke it in pieces and scattered it among themselves. The Frenchman, however, tried to atone for his folly by going among them and buying the pieces. By the aid of his rough copies he was able to cement them together, and the cracked stone is now in the Louvre museum in Paris. It is invaluable to the student of biblical literature, for it is written in the old Moabite language, which was almost the same as the ancient Hebrew. Prof. Sayce says that there is more difference between the English dialects than between the Moabite and Hebrew. The characters in which it is written are almost identical with those in which the early prophets wrote. Our Old Testament to-day is written in square letters, Hebrew written with a foreign system of writing. The Jews, when they were in captivity, seem to have adopted the system then in vogue among the Babylonians, and thus, while using Hebrew words, they wrote them in Chaldaic characters. This stone, however, furnishes us with the ancient system of writing. The Hebrews, during the process of their settlement in Canaan, adopted the language of the Canaanites, which accounts for the resemblance of their language to the tongue of Moab.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

I am spending a few days in Omaha on my return trip to Denver from the Minneapolis convention.

The Disciples in this city are jubilant over the fact that the 1902 convention will be held in Omaha. Nor are the Disciples alone in their joy. The people, without regard to party or creed, are happy. A hearty welcome awaits us one year hence. A jubilation meeting was held Friday evening, after the convention, in Minneapolis, in the First Christian church—the church of which Sumner T. Martin is pastor. An account of the fight, in Minneapolis, for the convention, was recited, stories were told, incidents were recalled, songs were sung, things to be done to make the coming convention the greatest in our history were suggested, there were general hand shakings and congratulations, with a manifest appreciation of the fact that much hard work must be done. But the good people are ready for it. Omaha will redeem her promises. Do not fear, Omaha will not be found wanting in the time of trial. Not only is Omaha glad, but all Nebraska is interested in this matter. The papers in this city are manifesting a remarkable readiness to aid in the work of preparation. This is especially true of The Daily World-Herald. It has already given a number of editorials to the subject.

W. T. Hilton, of the North Side Christian church, is in a series of meetings. This church is on the corner of Twenty-sixth and Grant streets. It is in the midst of the people. The house is comfortably filled every evening. Some have been moved to confess Christ. The interest is increasing. I never saw a meeting better advertised. Bro. Hilton is determined to let the people know that he is engaged in the Master's work. No one suspects him of trifling. He is not in it for what he can make out of it. If the work in the North Side church is not successful neither the pastor nor his devoted wife will be to blame. They are doing their best.

Bro. and Sister Hilton are natives of Louisville, Kentucky. Bro. Hilton was educated in Lexington. He is a young man—about thirty-five years old. The people believe in and love him, for his work's sake. May these young people live to a good old age to serve Him to whom they have given themselves with an enthusiastic devotion.

The First Christian church in Omaha was organized in 1878. I happened to be in the town at the time. The event I remember well. The congregation numbers now about six hundred communicants. The house of worship is on Capitol avenue and Twentieth street. It seems to be well located. A new building, a better structure and a larger, is needed. The Christian Endeavor meeting last Lord's day evening was largely attended and had the old-time Endeavor ring. It was a privilege to be in the meeting. Sumner T. Martin came to this church less than two years ago from an unusually successful pastorate in Mason City, Iowa. He is already a recognized influence in Omaha in behalf of righteousness. His Endeavor Society, which has one hundred and twenty-five members, holds meetings in the slums. Souls have been won from sin to holiness. This is recognized as the best Society of Christian Endeavor in Omaha.

The Nebraska Christian Endeavor convention is in session. There are six hundred Endeavorers living in Omaha, and it is said that there are, in attendance, five hundred visitors and delegates. This makes a large state convention. President Clark, of Boston, is in attendance; also the Rev. Dr. W. S. Ament, of China. I heard Dr. Ament recite the story of the siege of Peking in 1900. It is a thrillingly interesting narrative. He is desperately in love with the Chinese people. Almost a quarter of a century ago he and his wife went out as missionaries in the employ of the American Board. He says there are "three men of destiny"—the Anglo-Saxon, the Slav, and the Chinese—and the latter is not the least. In any broad and rational consideration of the future of the race these three must be taken into the account. He calls attention to the fact that those who were "rattled" during the siege of Peking were agnostics, not those who believed in God and his anointed. Major Conger, on his way home across the Pacific ocean, in conversation with Dr. Ament, called attention to this fact; and while Major Conger is a high-toned gentleman, a man of real merit, and a worthy representative in that distant land of the United States government, he is not what is usually called an orthodox Christian. This makes his testimony the more significant and important. Dr. Ament is eloquent in his testimony concerning the self-forgetfulness, self-possession and courage of the Christian women under the unspeakably awful trials of the historic siege of Peking in 1900.

The Disciples have their full share of time and space in this union Christian Endeavor convention.

Bro. Hilton, in planning for his evangelistic meetings, mentioned above, arranged to conduct a meeting at noon every day in the Young Men's Christian Association rooms. These meetings are well attended. More than sixty men were present in the meeting yesterday. Besides this he arranged for a meeting to be held Saturday afternoon, a union meeting, for a study of the Sunday-school lesson.

Sumner T. Martin and W. T. Hilton have what F. D. Power, in his great address in the Minneapolis convention, called "The Spirit of Our Plea." Some of us, I fear, have the letter, the logic, the argument, of the plea, without the spirit. The spirit is quite as important, believe me, as is the letter, the logic, the argument. This statement, in this place, will not be made more radical.

There is, besides the churches already named, a congregation of Disciples of Christ in South Omaha. It owns a small house. At present it has no pastor. There are easily a thousand Disciples in Omaha, with three houses of worship, where three and twenty years ago we were at the beginning of our work. The progress has been quite encouraging; the future is radiant.

America and the Boys and Girls

By STEPHEN J. COREY

The devil is afraid of little children. The chief priests and scribes were not entirely frightened until they heard the boys and girls of Jerusalem in the temple shouting, "Hosannah to the Son of David!" Their patriotism was of the right sort. What a mighty power are the boys and girls when really enlisted for the cause of Christ!

There were three great discoveries in the nineteenth century—steam, electricity and the child. Steam was discovered as a motive force and converted into power; electricity was discovered and converted into power; and it remains for the twentieth century to take the little child which the nineteenth century revealed and convert his little life into power. The child has been discovered, now the child needs to be recovered for Christ and his church. The nation which does not recognize the children is a dying commonwealth, and the church which does not make the children the basis of its work will be a lifeless church in this twentieth century. If we are to be a missionary people the children must be taught of the missionary spirit. It is the essence of true patriotism as well as true Christianity. Christian men or women who will let their boys and girls grow up in perfect ignorance of the great needs of their native land ought to be locked up on the Fourth of July and decoration day. They lack the first elements of true patriotism.

We have a great abundance of everything in America except good, Christian manhood and womanhood. Wealth, resources, education, law, we have until all the world is jealous of us; but good, loyal, Christian men and women we have not in abundance, and never will have until more attention is paid to the children. If our Protestant boys and girls were captured for Christ as the Catholic boys and girls are captured for Catholicism the evangelization of the world in this generation would be an accomplished fact. We have been sadly deficient in getting the missionary plea before the children often enough. Rally day for boys and girls is a splendid opportunity to do this; let us not neglect it.

The future of the Church of Christ is in the hands of the little ones. If we are going to have missionary men and women in the next generation, whose souls are on fire for service, the fire must be kindled now in the hearts of God's little soldiers. Get a boy or a girl to believe in missions with all the heart and that boy or girl will never get over it. Perhaps you have heard the story of the two cross-eyed bicyclists who ran into each other. "Why don't you look where you are going?" growled one. "Why don't you go where you are looking?" growled the other. A boy does not always look where he is going, but he goes where he is looking, and does not quibble and fuss about it. Once get his heart filled with missionary zeal, and he will go with his heart. He will ask you more questions about missionary fields in one minute than you can answer in an hour.

Foreign missionary day in the Sunday-schools has been a great blessing to our church. Boys and girls' rally day can be made just as much of a blessing.

But some one will say: "Oh, you are getting in too many offerings!" Now for the life of me I cannot see why people are so afraid of offerings! We ought to take twice as many offerings as we do. There is not a Church in America that takes the small number we do. It is not right to go about these offerings as though they were a sort of intrusion and imposition. Offerings are right. We ought to be proud of them and not ashamed. We as ministers of the gospel ought to make the sinners as well as the saints understand that everything good they have comes from God, and it is time they were giving some of it back for the advancement of his kingdom. Get the boys and girls into the habit of giving, and they will always give and feel disappointed when there is no opportunity. Rally day for America will not make too many offerings. It is a necessity.

A doctor once put up a prescription and wrote directions as follows: "This is to be well shaken and then taken internally, externally and eternally." Every church ought to have that sort of a missionary prescription for that "tired feeling"—that sleepy indifference to missions—and the pastor ought to see to it that the tonic is given regularly.

The pennies are the missionary barometer of the church. Teach the children to give. They need to know the meanness of a stingy life and the blessing of a life of giving. They ought to understand that stingy, close-fisted, penurious people in the Church of Christ are dead people that you can't bury. There is one habit far worse for a boy than keeping his hands in his pockets, and that is keeping his heart there. Now, what better means is there to start the boys and girls to giving than these rallies?

We ought to observe boys' and girls' rally day for America because it will give to the children a true missionary patriotism. Not the patriotism that howls and blusters, but the patriotism that loves and gives. Such a day will be worth ten times as much to the children in the way of love of country as the Fourth of July. Our "Glorious Fourth" has become almost a farce as far as teaching true patriotism is concerned. Imagine a boy with his pockets stuffed with pyrotechnics thinking of his country! Surfeiting the children with firecrackers is not going to make them love their native land. They need to be taught of their country's need and the remedy, Jesus Christ. Nine-tenths of the children in America, the children of Christian parents, I mean, give more for firecrackers than they give for missions each year. Brethren, this ought not so to be. Rally day will teach them a true patriotism—and we need it.

The man who does not love his own country is only fit to be a man without a country. It's wrong, and the children need to be taught so. It is a part of our religion as well as our patriotism. It was love of his people and his native land that caused Jesus to burst into tears over Jerusalem; he was a true patriot. We need that sort

Of patriotism, the kind that yearns for native land. What more beautiful thing is there than Christianity touched with true patriotism? Christian patriotism alone will redeem our country. Get the children enlisted for God and home and America, and the millennium is near.

This is a materialistic age; people talk of the prosperity of our country as though money meant millennium. It is get, get, get. Oh, that the boys and girls might learn that it is not getting but giving which God demands of us. Mrs. Browning was right when she said: "In all things we are too materialistic, eating clay instead of Adam's fruit and Noah's wine—clay by the handful, clay by the lump, until we are filled to the throat with clay; until we become the very color of that on which we are feeding."

God save us and our land from selfishness! Let us save the children for missions and America will be redeemed. Let us overturn materialism with missions, selfishness with salvation. Let us give Christ his throne on his own soil. He made it, he died for it, he hungers for it. Let us resolve together it shall be his. From Atlantic to Pacific, from the Gulf of Mexico to the Lakes, it shall be forever his. Burn it into the hearts of the boys and girls: America for Christ—all from sea to sea for Christ.

New York Letter.

By S. T. Willis.

The Rev. L. W. Batten of St. Mark's Episcopal church in this city took occasion in a recent discourse to review the work of the general Episcopal convention at San Francisco in which he commended much and criticised some of its features. He severely arraigns the convention for attempting to adopt the name "The Church of America" for the Protestant Episcopal sect in this country because, he says, "the mere change of name would not make it the Catholic Church of America." But why not change the name to anything that would suit the Episcopalians, for it is their church and therefore they have the right to call it what they please? If it were Christ's Church, simple honesty would impel them to designate his Church by the name or names given it in the New Testament. The New Testament does not know any such institution as "The Church of America" any more than it knows "The Protestant Episcopal Church."

Dr. Batten also says if the proposed "divorce canons" had been adopted he would have refused to obey them even at the risk of a church trial and dismissal from the ministry. The first section of this canon reads as follows:

No person divorced for causes arising after marriage, and marrying again during the lifetime of the other party to the divorce, shall be admitted to baptism or confirmation or received to Holy Communion, except when penitent and separated from the other party of the subsequent marriage, or when penitent and in immediate danger of death; but this canon shall not apply to the innocent party in a divorce for the cause of adultery.

He said, "I would not obey a church law like that. I am truly glad that it was lost in the House of Lay Delegates. Suppose men are leading lives of shame, has the Church any right to cast them out?" (Yes, Dr., see 1 Cor. 5:1-5.) "If so then the church should ferret out all who lead sinful lives and punish them in the same manner and not single out any special class." So, there are men in the Episcopal Church who would even dare to disobey the order of bishops!

The Fifth Avenue Baptist church, the wealthiest congregation of that faith in the city, has just dedicated the "West Side Neighborhood House," comprising the social settlement buildings at No. 501 W. 50th St., and the Armitage Chapel at 743 and 745 Tenth Ave. The outlay for this institution was more than $100,000 and was given by John D. Rockefeller, Jr., which he did in commemoration of his marriage on the 9th of October, 1901. For several years this church conducted services at the Armitage House in West 47th St. It began as a Sunday-school, then a day nursery was added, afterward a kindergarten was opened, still later clubs for boys and girls, for young women and men were found necessary. These quarters became inadequate and a committee of the church was appointed to suggest a plan of relief. Settlement workers were secured to live in that neighborhood and report a remedy. The West Side Neighborhood House is the outgrowth of these investigations. Its work will be conducted along the lines of other well known neighborhood houses, under Mr. A. A. Hill, the head worker, and the Rev. W. S. Richardson, assistant pastor of the Fifth Avenue Church. The chief difficulty with all such work is it is too educational and social along secular lines, to the exclusion of the distinctively religious.

The following is the novel temperance card adopted by a society of five hundred working girls of Trenton, N. J. The card reads:

TOTAL ABSTINENCE OR NO HUSBANDS!

I promise that I will not associate with, nor marry a man who drinks, and I will also be a total abstainer myself.

Name.....

Don't Marry a Man to Save Him.

This Business Girls' Club whose members are employed mainly in the potteries, box factories and other industrial occupations of Trenton, were induced to sign this card through the work of the W. C. T. U. They were not urged for their signatures, but were shown what good they might accomplish through such a total abstinence promise. These girls are being taught history, singing and the domestic arts. Young women can do much toward creating and maintaining true, healthful temperance sentiments among young men. They should not fail to exercise their influence on behalf of sobriety, honesty and the Christian religion.

Christian Science for cats is the latest development of this curious latter-day religious craze. A Mrs. Hinsdale, a wealthy society woman of New Rochelle, near New York, says Christian Science has not only cured her of grievous stomach trouble, but has also cured several of her pet Angora cats by the mental process of "absent treatment." She receives most of the treatment for herself and her cats by telephone. A few months ago Pittysing, one of her pet cats, was taken ill, he was very sick, nigh unto death's door. Mrs. Hinsdale rushed to the telephone and called up one of the healers in New York. He asked, "What is your belief?" She replied, "I am a believer in Christian Science." He said, "Wait a minute." He then called up the healer from "the absent treatment room." The healer told her that Pittysing would be all right. He told Mrs. Hinsdale that he would give her absent treatment for "fear," because the cat would not get well as long as she feared it would be sick. She took his treatment for "fear," and also treated herself for "fear" and then went out in the yard and behold! What a wonder had been wrought! Pittysing was walking about and mewing for his dinner!

After that wonderful healing whenever any one of Mrs. Hinsdale's cats got sick she always took absent treatment by telephone from New York, and also gave it to herself for "fear" and they invariably got well. For she says: "Although cats cannot speak and we cannot converse with them in their language, yet they have sense through which we can transmit to them the 'soul spark'." But this is not the only stupendous miracle the Christian Science healers have wrought on behalf of the cat persuasion. Mrs. Hinsdale's dear little kitten, Lalla Rookh, was lost once for three weeks in Mt. Vernon. "All the good little boys in the neighborhood had searched for him in vain. She offered a liberal reward for his return to her but the promise of cash could not bring poor little wandering Lalla Rookh back, nothing short of a miracle could do it. So Mrs. Hinsdale took absent treatment from New York by telephone for "fear." The healer said over the telephone, "Don't you fear; Lalla Rookh is God's kitten, he'll come home." So she went at once to Mount Vernon saying over and over to herself, "Lalla Rookh, you are God's little kitten, you are not lost." And when she got off the car in Mount Vernon, she felt something brush against her skirts and behold, there at her feet was that dear little prodigal, Lalla Rookh! Where now is the hardened sinner that cannot believe in Christian Science, since by absent treatment such wonders are wrought on behalf of suffering or wandering and wayward cats?

The Bible and the University Student.

By Mrs. David Owen Thomas.

In a recent article in the Popular Science Monthly stress was laid upon certain things which it was said various universities stand for. Some institutions, Oxford for example, are eminent for the thoroughness of their instruction in the classics. Princeton leads in theology. Stanford is wholly scientific. While the University of Chicago has already learned the scientific method and is not confining it to scientific subjects, but is applying it to all branches of learning. The University of Chicago aspires to be, also, the center of investigation and plans to keep men at work, not in teaching, but in studying for the world's benefit. This is a very noble idea.

But while all institutions may or may not stand for something in particular, every university worthy the name must stand for a few things in general. All universities furnish a fund of knowledge and offer a degree of culture to their students. They also make it a great point to supply means of development for the entire man, mental, physical, spiritual. In state institutions the two former are in the ascendancy, and the latter has a respectable recognition. This is inevitable, since it is not well for too rigid instruction to be given upon "things upon which we differ."

In entering the university each student seeks a certain thing; all students expect to receive other general advantages. These general advantages sought by all are the same as those which the university offers; knowledge, culture, development of the entire man. The student knows that knowledge is one thing, culture another, and all around development another. He depends upon his memory for gaining knowledge, upon his tact and observation for acquiring culture, and upon his diligence for securing a well-rounded development. And if he is truly seeking what the university truly gives, the student spends profitably and happily his college years.

But above and beyond all this is the thought of future years. At no time—except the hour in which he is born—is a man more helpless than on the day of his graduation. He has knowledge and culture and he is reasonably developed, but there is something lacking. He may be even able to apply his knowledge, to fit it into his experience, and to say, "My work is ready for me and I am ready for my work," but is he? That depends upon the principal influence of his life. Has there been running through it all, from the cradle to his coming of age, a single thread, like the line in a dollar bill? The mother alone cannot give it, the university alone cannot give it, even the boy's own ideals cannot give it. But it must come from all these, or rather these continued from birth to manhood.

A lad starts out well. His home has this prevailing influence God-ward. He sees in his "moments" the man he may be, and off he goes to college full of high hopes and ambitions. Often here comes the little rift within the lute. He hears that Providence is recognized, and there is never a day that chapel does not hold. But where is the prevailing influence in the school? How many bruised reeds are broken, how much smoking flax is quenched at the college door!

The moral tone of the university is all right; but we must put the Bible in our colleges, even as Henley insisted should be done in England's schools as the only hold on righteousness. And the men doing the work must not be figure-heads, but leaders by the divine right of clear brains and honest convictions. They must be specialists and they must be scholars, and they must be able reverently and gladly to apply the scientific method to the study of the Scriptures as it is now applied to every subject worth considering. These things we must have in our universities if we would even hold our own as Christian men and women, much less lead in the world's thought. If we want to have any influence over those who read and those who think, we will have to make a big advance in educational matters. And this advance cannot be made by a few men, it must be made by the whole church. It means the arousing and awakening by the church to the great thought of the new century—a Christian education for every man.

Can I Love Others Better Than Myself?

By N. J. AYLSWORTH

Several years ago a series of articles, by the writer, appeared in this paper, on the subject, "Can I Love My Enemies?" The effort was to show that it is not only possible to love our enemies, but natural to the nobler self; that many are actually doing it; and that the world is gradually moving, in its growth of sympathy, to that goal. It was also shown how, by the exercise of our well-known faculties, we may reach a love so large and strong as to overcome the obstacle interposed by personal enmity. It is to be regretted, in view of the wide discussion of this subject in the secular press during the last year, occasioned by Minister Wu's criticisms of Christ's moral teachings, that those articles could not have had a wider reading.

The substance of those articles cannot now be repeated, but it lies in the range of our last article to inquire whether it is possible to love others more than ourselves. To this we are able to answer that it is both possible and natural, and that it is actually being done by very many people.

Not long ago the writer listened to a sermon by an eloquent preacher of this city, in which he said, "My son is a man of middle age; but if I saw any great harm coming to him I would step between and take the blow." He loved his son better than himself; and, no doubt, every parent in his audience said silently, "Yes; that is what I would do." And many a child would do the same for father or mother. Such love is not only possible, but natural. God has so framed the human heart.

Were our country assailed by a foreign foe, millions would spring to the rescue. Some of these, no doubt, would be moved by the love of glory, or of adventure; but many others would leave their chosen occupations with reluctance, and moved only by a sense of duty—because they loved their country more than self. True, an element of selfishness might lurk even in this, since the country despoiled for others would also be despoiled for them; but it is believed that there are multitudes who would lay down their lives for their country, apart from any such motive.

Some years ago, a young physician, brilliantly educated, in time of plague entered a death chamber, dissected the corpse of a victim, wrote carefully his findings and placed them outside and then—himself already smitten—died alone with the dead. He loved his fellows better than himself. A talented and highly educated young Catholic priest went to a distant land not long ago to live and die with lepers. He requested the appointment. Missionaries turn from life's comforts and pleasures to spend and be spent in peril and privation for barbarians and savages. There are heroes in every neighborhood, who, at some peril of another, would forget self and spring to the rescue. Not inconsistent with this is the fact that these very persons may have been living lives of self-seeking that gave no suspicion of their nobility.

The fact is, noble men are not always noble, and ordinary men are sometimes sublime. The barometer of feeling varies. We are sometimes greater than at other times. A tragic peril appeals to our nobler nature, and we rise to the heroic. But this shows that such splendid feeling is both possible and natural, and that by proper effort we may live in it to some large extent. Not only is this so, but this nobler feeling is peculiarly inflammable in a very large part of mankind. The preaching of rewards and punishments, while sometimes necessary, is not the best way to reach men. Tell them of sacrifice, of pain and toil, and heroic endeavor for the rescue of the lost, and they are at your side. Be yourself a large lover, heroically giving yourself for others, and men shall be as tinder to your words. Ask little of men and they will deny you; ask much, and they will give you all. The human heart is made for sacrifice and for the love that inspires it. Be a great lover and you shall kindle men mightily.

To those not surrounded by the inspirers of noble feeling, there remain the treasured heroisms of all the past, in literature, and we can be great with the mighty of old. Loftiest of these is the Master himself, with whom to live is to be great of heart.

Apart from these external sources of inspiration in reaching the larger love, is the use of "the golden rule." Look out of yourself into others' lives and needs, and put yourself in their place and they shall be other selves to you. To put one's self in another's place is, in a way, to merge one's self into another, so that selfishness takes in the other. This may be a mystery, but experience it and you will know. Mr. Depew has said that one of the Vanderbilts, who was very generous, seemed to feel that any one that he had helped had done him a favor. The noble life is full of such illusions—nay, not illusions, they are the music of the harp within, struck by divine fingers. Put yourself in another's place, and you will do as you would be done by; but the heart was made for larger love and you will not stop there. The lower passions are not the only ones that get away from us when we let them kindle. There have been conflagrations of love, and we shall see more of them in the future. He that loves his neighbor as himself will do more. The plant that grows an inch will grow more, and for the same reason. Live in others' lives and you shall have a hundred selves, for which you shall toil and be glad. Men marry and form families that they may have a multiple selfhood—in wife and children—through love; but the principle does not stop here. Put yourself in another's life, thus multiplying yourself by two; then add others, increasing your acreage of personality by degrees, and ere long you shall find yourself very rich and very glad; for the sublimest joy of which we are capable is found in the love of others.

Be kind and be patient, my brother,
For others must bear with you;
And please don't censure another
For the very same things you do.

We've all got sorrows and burdens.
We've all got faults to confess,
'Tis not so much clothes and professions
As conduct and spirit that bless.

The tendency in our modern Christianity is decidedly in the direction of a social Christianity or Christianity as a social force. The church, its ordinances, the Bible, creeds and confessions of faith, all these are now thought of in their bearings not upon the individual alone, but upon society as a whole. One of the latest and best expressions of this modern view of Christianity is that of Dean Fremantle in his work, Christian Ordinances and Social Progress. The book embraces six lectures, being the William Belden Noble Lectures of Harvard. The lectures deal with The Church System; The Bible; The Sacraments; Creeds and Confessions of Faith; Common Prayer and Preaching; Pastoral Work.

In these lectures one gets a view of Christianity from the point of view of the Established Church or, in other words, of a state church. The author's views are quite revolutionary from the standpoint of our American Christianity. "The idea," says the author, "of a church system of any kind having been imposed by authority appears to be giving way to historical investigation; and there is, therefore, some danger that men may go by reaction to the opposite extreme, and may think that the whole apparatus of religious ordinances is valueless for moral and social purposes." We do not understand the author to mean simply that there is no special form of church organization prescribed in the New Testament, but that the church itself as an institution cannot lay claim to divine authority. It has been found to be useful and as such should be preserved. The same is true, of course, according to his thought of what he calls the sacraments. The church may be said to be divine in a sense, but the civil ruler is as much a shepherd of the people as is a pastor of a church, and when we think of the ministers of God we are to take in "all who have the care of the young, the ignorant and the poor and all who as rulers or men of influence are in the biblical sense shepherds of the people." All these are included in the pastorate.

The work treats quite largely on social questions and those who are interested in sociology will find here much that is suggestive. But one who looks into the book for theological guidance or for divine support for established institutions of the church will be likely to be disappointed. Concerning baptism the author says: "There is no form presented; baptism may be by immersion, by sprinkling, of children or adults, by specially chosen ministers or by any member of the community, with prayer or by the simple act. For baptism is the witness of a universal obligation. It is the witness that men are coming to recognize what they ought to be." How it can witness to that in case of infants the author does not explain; but consistency is not a strong feature of the work.

And yet, in spite of much to dissent from, one will find much that is suggestive of a broader and of a more comprehensive Christianity, in the work, and what is even more important, he will be able to understand better those who look at Christianity and its ordinances from the point of view which the author occupies.

The following description of the pastor's work is quoted from Chaucer, who is supposed to have had Wicliffe in mind as his model:

"A good man there was of religion,
That was a poore persoun of a town;
But rich he was of holy thought and work,
He was also a learned man, a clerk.
That Christes Gospel trewly wolde preache;
His parishens devoutly would he teache.

"Benigne he was, and wonder diligent;
And in adversity fail patient.
Wide was his parish, and houses far asunder;
But he ne left nought for no rain nor thunder,
In sickness, and in mischief to visite
The furthest in his parish, much or lite,
Upon his feet, and in his hand a staff.
This noble example to his sheep he gave
That first he wrought, and afterwards he taught."

"The Witness of Jesus."

The following review of the volume of Alexander Procter's sermons, entitled The Witness of Jesus, appeared in the Christian Century of Oct. 17:

It was the pleasure of the writer of this review to listen to these splendid sermons more than twenty years ago. They made a profound impression on him at the time, giving him an intellectual and spiritual uplift, and the reading of them has been a great delight. Alexander Procter was a great preacher. He was a giant intellectually and a little child in the sweetness and teachableness of his spirit. He had the mind of the Master. His great love for Christ and his appreciation of him thrilled through all his sermons. To have listened to his sermons through a protracted meeting and to have been associated with him and heard him talk at the fireside was almost an education.

No review can do these sermons justice. They must be read, and reread. They must be studied. Alexander Procter was a thinker. His sermons were not made, they grew. He was not a firstly, secondly, and thirdly preacher. He took a great thought and opened it up. You could see it grow, expand. It crowded out other things from the mind and took possession of you. Your horizon was pushed back, the heavens above you were lifted up and you seemed to be living in a larger world than you had ever dreamed of before. He dealt with great themes. The small had no place in his mind. The nineteen sermons in this volume are all on great subjects—The Witness of Jesus, Creation—Old and New, The Coming One, The Transfiguration of Man, Salvation and Retribution, The Three Rivers of Revelation, etc. They are modern sermons, and are alive with the brightest, freshest thought of the day. Alexander Procter delighted in life, and these sermons pulse with life.

I have said that I listened to them twenty years ago. But they are not old sermons. Alexander Procter never preached an old sermon. He couldn't. Every sermon was "born again." The best, the newest, he had in him. He was not a man of one book, but of two. The Bible and nature were the two books he studied and loved. He never feared any conflict between them. The author of one was the author of the other. To him the Darwins, Tyndalls and Huxleys were God's prophets and interpreters, and he welcomed every new truth they brought from nature's storehouse. He was in love with truth and he never discarded a truth because it was old or feared one because it was new.

The charm of these sermons is the Christ they hold. They are not theological, but Christological. It will be found that in every sermon Christ is central. All his lines of thought converge in Christ. This is the thread of gold on which all these pearls of thought are strung. No man was ever more fearless in presence of assaults against the Bible, or criticisms of it, than was Mr. Procter. The secret of it was his boundless trust in the Christ. Upon this Rock he stood, and all the waves that rolled in from the stormy sea broke harmless at his feet. His was the confidence of the Psalmist when he said, "I will not fear, though the earth do change and though the mountains be moved in the heart of the seas, though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof."

It was a happy thought that put into this volume the "Remarks at the Communion Table." How tender and beautiful are these "Table Talks"! Mr. Procter was not only a great thinker, but a boundless lover of the Christ, and in these "Remarks at the Communion Table" we see the great thinker aglow with love. Take this at the close of the sermon on "The Witness of Jesus." He had just been speaking of "the new creation, the new heaven and the new earth," and then at the Table he says:

"The greatest power of which we can have any knowledge in this world in the making of things new is love. It is the vast, infinite renewer, like the sunlight, which is a symbol of love, renewing the heavens and the earth, as the old Psalmist, looking upon the earth, said, 'All nature changes and becomes new.' Now, all the new homes in the world, and the new lives, and the new joys that spring out of them, come from love; and when God wants to give us a taste of the new home, the new heaven, the new Jerusalem, he shows us his love. When he wants to fill the human heart with some anticipation of that which overflows, that new inspiration, he shows us his infinite love in Christ. And that is what this ordinance means. It comes to us once more, always in harmony with God's greatest thoughts toward us, renewing the soul from week to week, making it diviner, stronger, filling it with hope and light. And this is the effect of love, by which his own great heart comes into ours, his thought into our thought, as it is shown to us in Christ. This renewing is going on always, and this is what this institution means, that looking at this great, divine, infinite force in God's heart, this is to make you new in your hopes, joys, religious life, aspirations, energies, from week to week, through the pilgrimage here, with regard to a life to come."

The volume of sermons concludes with an admirable biographical sketch of the great preacher by T. P. Haley, who knew, appreciated and loved him as a brother. The editor, J. H. Garrison, has done his work well. He is entitled to our gratitude. He has given us an invaluable treasure. The book is more than a gem. It is a seed. It is destined to bear much fruit. Here Alexander Procter, though dead, yet speaketh, and his speech shall be a fruitful seed.

Our Budget.

—Our news columns for the past few weeks indicate great activity in evangelistic work.

—Let us seek for hotb a wider and deeper interest in New Testament evangelism. The Acts of the Apostles should be continued until John's vision in Revelation is realized on earth.

—But while we are lengthening our cords, let us see to it that we strengthen our stakes as well, so that, as the borders of our habitation are enlarged, the shelter that we may offer to those seeking refuge from sin and temptation, may be secure.

—Wherever it is possible to join in union evangelistic efforts, or in union efforts of any kind for the promotion of the welfare of the community, let such opportunity be not neglected. The moral influence on a community of a united effort will be far greater than separate and independent meetings which have no bond of spiritual unity.

—An intelligent reader says: "After reading the contributed articles in last week's CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, I feel like urging every one of your readers to give them a thoughtful reading." We feel so ourselves, and are glad to urge such reading upon any who may have neglected them. We are aiming to give our readers each week, the very best things, and we hope they will do us the credit, and themselves the benefit, of reading carefully what we publish from week to week.

—Robert E. Rosenstein of Manhattan, Kan., is our new correspondent for that state. We feel grateful to the brethren everywhere who send us news of what is going on in their own churches and in adjoining regions. And we have a double portion of gratitude for those correspondents who will note these two injunctions: First, be prompt; we want the news while it is still hot. Second, be brief; otherwise we will not have space for all the interesting news that comes to us.

—The Preacher's Helper for October reprints in full five articles from the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, aggregating twenty columns of that magazine. We are glad to note in our contemporary such a discriminating taste for good religious literature. There are some papers, we notice, which from time to time make almost as copious extracts from our columns, but without giving credit—a form of literary piracy which religious papers at least ought to be far beyond.

—The Nebraska Christian Endeavor Convention was held in Omaha last week, and Bro. Tyler conducted the quiet hour service in St. Mary's Ave. Congregational church, where the Rev. C. S. Sargent, formerly of St. Louis, is pastor. He spoke on John 17, and his address met with cordial approval. In the evening he gave an address in the First Presbyterian Church on "Our Pledge." Bro. Tyler has closed his work at Omaha and returns to Denver where his work in the South Broadway Church has been so signally blessed. Have we any use for preachers of the age of B. B. Tyler?

—Who can tell us the name of the first preacher who proclaimed the primitive gospel as urged by the Disciples of Christ in the region covered by the Louisiana Purchase? Some memorial to his name should constitute a part of our exhibit at the World's Fair in St. Louis in 1903. When St. Louis was only a trading post on the frontier of civilization, it is said some infidels, in a meeting, declared that Christ should never cross the Mississippi river. It appears, however, from history, that he did escape the vigilance of this infidel junto and has carried his empire far toward the setting sun. Who can tell us when the reformation of the nineteenth century crossed the Mississippi, in following Christianity and the star of empire in their westward way?

—At York, Neb., the new church was dedicated Oct. 27, by Z. T. Sweeney of Columbus, Ind. G. J. Chapman has been pastor at York for three years. More money was raised on dedication day than was asked for, and the $4,500 building was dedicated free from debt. Bro. Sweeney's lecture on Monday evening was received with enthusiasm.

The receipts for foreign missions during October showed a slight decrease as compared with the same month of last year. The total amount received was $2,095.05, a loss of $49.29. The regular receipts from churches, Sunday-schools, C. E. societies and individuals show a decrease of $298.74; in annuities there was a decrease of $100; in bequests a gain of $349.45.

—C. C. Redgrave, of Ferris, Ill., delivered his illustrated lecture, "In the Footsteps of the Pioneers," at Canton, Ill., Oct. 21, as a part of the celebration of Forefathers' Day. The lecture was attended by an audience of about 600 and as usual was highly appreciated. It is especially appropriate in connection with Forefathers' Day and Endeavor societies would do well to have it at any time. It is missionary work with Bro. Redgrave, whose charges are so small that almost any church which wants the lecture can have it.

—The Fort Madison (Ia.) Christian church dedicated its new building Oct. 20. The congregation was organized in 1872, and has been a sojourner without a home of its own until now. For seven years it met in the court house. E. E. Lowe became pastor in July, 1900, and found the church with a lot and a debt but no house. A few months ago building plans were agreed upon and a neat tabernacle has been erected at a cost of about $1,000. It was dedicated by W. S. Lowe of Topeka, Kan., brother of the pastor, with all indebtedness provided for.

—Rolla G. Sears, who is in the third year of his pastorate at Ridgeway, Mo., has been granted a scholarship at Princeton Theological Seminary and wishes to begin his studies there as soon as he can make the necessary arrangements. He wishes to preach for some church or churches within reach of Princeton, N. J., or would serve as assistant pastor for some of our churches in New York or Philadelphia. Unfortunately our churches are not numerous in that region, but if any of them can find an opening for Bro. Sears they will find him a worthy and capable young man.

—Joe Jefferson has been playing in St. Louis this week. On being called before the curtain he made a speech in which he is reported as saying that he made his first appearance on the St. Louis stage in 1840, sixty-one years ago! He said he had no thought of retiring from the stage yet, although he must be an octogenarian. But preachers are often shelved at fifty years! Perhaps there is something in this fact for both preachers and churches to think about. Nothing can be more absurd than the idea that a man has passed the period of his greatest power and usefulness at fifty or at sixty years of age, if he be in normal physical and mental health.

—B. B. Tyler went from Minneapolis to Omaha, from which place he writes us under date of Oct. 31, saying, "I am closing in Omaha one of the happiest experiences of my happy life. Have conducted three meetings a day; now and again four. Daily at noon in Y. M. C. A., I have given a Bible study. My work has been chiefly in the North Side church. W. T. Hilton, the pastor, is a fine young man. The brethren are beginning to prepare for the convention. They will be assisted by the papers and business men of the city without regard to sect or party. I cannot commend too highly the spirit of Sumner T. Martin and W. T. Hilton. They have "The Spirit of Our Plea," as F. D. Power put it, in his Minneapolis address. That is saying a good deal of these brethren, but not too much.

An Ancient Foe

To health and happiness is Scrofula—as ugly as ever since time immemorial.

It causes bunches in the neck, disfigures the skin, inflames the mucous membrane, wastes the muscles, weakens the bones, reduces the power of resistance to disease and the capacity for recovery, and develops into consumption.

"A hunch appeared on the left side of my neck. It caused great pain, was lanced, and became a running sore. I went into a general decline. I was persuaded to try Hood's Sarsaparilla, and when I had taken six bottles my neck was healed, and I have never had any trouble of the kind since." Mrs. K. T. SNYDER, Troy, Ohio.

Hood's Sarsaparilla and Pills will rid you of it, radically and permanently, as they have rid thousands.

—George W. Watkins has closed his work at Morocco, Ind., and has begun as pastor of the church at Barry, Ill.

—S. R. Cassius, the colored evangelist of Tohee, Okla., acknowledges the receipt of $8 from various brethren for the support of his work.

—M. E. Harlan, pastor of the First church of Disciples, New York city, is taking a prominent part in the prohibition campaign in that city.

—W. W. Burks has accepted a hearty call to the pastorate of the church at Quincy, Ill. The date of his departure from Creston, Ia., has not yet been announced.

—V. E. Ridenour is assisting the state temperance union in a fall campaign with Prof. Wilcox of Topeka. They stay one week in a place and have been having large audiences, about 500 at Harper, Kan. 150 signed the pledge one night.

—H. F. Burns, formerly of Holden, Mo., and now at Drake University, will act as Drake correspondent for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. The Drake boys can either hand their news items to Bro. Burns or send them directly to us—but don't forget to send them some way.

—We are glad to report the following additional sums for the J. Z. Tyler testimonial fund: Mrs. W. T. Moore, Columbia, Mo., $5; George L. Snively, St. Louis, $5. These have been forwarded with the letters accompanying them to Bro. Tyler. We trust there are still others who wish to have fellowship in this ministry of love.

—J. H. Stotler of Centralia, Ill., reports that a union tent meeting has just closed at that place with Milford H. Lyon of Chicago as evangelist. Bro. Stotler wishes to say that Mr. Lyon, although in many ways an able man, does not hold a legitimate union meeting, but runs a "one sided old-fashioned mourner's-bench Methodist revival."

—The following incident clipped from an exchange has its moral which is too plain to need pointing out:

Rev. Mr. Roszell, a Methodist preacher, having on a certain Lord's day no service at his own church, decided to attend the Baptist church. It was communion day for the Baptists. Rev. Mr. Gilmore, the Baptist preacher, with great care spread the communion table and when all was ready, said in his powerful and impressive way: "Bro. Roszell, if this were my table, I should invite you to partake, but being my Father's I dare not." Mr. Roszell calmly replied: "Bro. Gilmore, if this were your table I should await your invitation; but being my Father's I shall help myself;" and, suiting the action to the word, he reached over and with great seriousness and solemnity took the bread and the wine without molestation, to the intense amusement of the congregation.

—George F. Hall is holding a meeting with the Third Christian church at Akron, O.

—Frank W. Allen, of Chillicothe, Mo., has tendered his resignation to take effect at the end of ninety days.

—W. W. Wharton has been unanimously called to remain indefinitely with the church at Murray, Ia., at an increased salary.

—R. D. Osborn is now preaching for the churches at Riverton, Barclay and Dawson, Ill. They have been without preaching for two years, but he will soon get them in good shape.

—We regret to learn of the death of Mrs. J. W. Newland, of Bedford, Ind., and extend fraternal sympathy to Bro. Newland, who will sorely miss the companion of 53 years of married life.

—Louis S. Cupp, of Huntsville, Mo., and C. P. Smith, of Richmond, Mo., exchanged pulpits last Sunday. Bro. Smith announced it as a possibility that Bro. Cupp would succeed him at Richmond.

—J. H. Bryan, of Missouri, has been called to serve as Sunday-school evangelist in Iowa, with headquarters in Des Moines. Bro. B. has large acquaintance with Sunday-school work, and will no doubt do a good work for the Iowa brethren.

—The Missouri Historical Society recently received from Mr. F. A. Sampson, of Sedalia, Mo., his valuable library of Missouriiana, which embraces more than 7 000 titles. It will be of great value to future historians of this state. The society receives, preserves and binds the issues of 500 Missouri newspapers.

—Oliver M. Olds, of Ellendale, N. D., recently of Sheldon, Ia., reports that he has been kindly received on beginning his new pastorate and requests scattered brethren in all parts of North Dakota to send him their address and the number of disciples in the vicinity where preaching might be desired.

—Thomas J. Shuey began his pastorate at the Memorial Christian church, Rock Island, Ill., Nov. 3. He was called to this work some months ago and his relation to the Rock Island church formally began at that time, but previous engagements in the evangelistic field prevented him from settling down to the pastorate until now.

—Every minister in western Pennsylvania is requested to announce the thank offering to be taken for state missions on western Pennsylvania day, Nov. 24. There should be a stirring appeal in every church in the district. This request comes from J. A. Joyce, corresponding and financial secretary, McKeesport.

—The University Place (Des Moines) Sunday school recently entertained what it calls its Pink Toe Brigade. All the mothers in that section of the city were invited to bring their babies to the Sunday-school, and 65 infants under three years old were present. There are 120 names on the cradle roll of this school.

—Robert Graham Frank, pastor of the First Christian church, Philadelphia, announces a series of sermons on the Disciples of Christ for the Sunday nights of November. The topics are: "Who are the Disciples of Christ?" "What is their Chief Aim?" "How do they Propose to Accomplish the Same?" "Is their Position Practicable?"

—Charles Lloyd Garrison has resigned his pastorate at Eminence, Ky., and will spend the year in study at the University of Chicago. His last service at Eminence was attended by all the Masons and Odd Fellows in the community and the Presbyterian church adjourned its morning service that its congregation might attend in a body. There was genuine regret at his leaving both in and out of the church. As an occasional contributor to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST he is known to our readers as a thoughtful, scholarly and forcible writer.

—T. S. Tinsley finished his year's work with the North Side Christian church, Chicago, last Lord's day. During the year 86 have been added to the membership, the organization of the congregation perfected by ordination of elders and deacons, $2,350 paid on church debt, and the church building painted and decorated. It has been a happy, fruitful year of service in many ways. He begins a revival meeting in Sterling, Ill., Nov. 7, and later is to conduct meetings in Mackinaw, Ill., and Buffalo, Mo. The latter place is where he was reared. He is open for any kind of work after January.

—A brother from Berkeley, Cal., who signs himself F. M. S., refers to Bro. Durban's English Topics for Oct. 31, and suggests that in his community the "jugs that contain the cream are ours." Why, he says, the Christian Church is from every point of view a conspicuous success and people who are in the habit of being connected with successful enterprises need feel no shame by reason of their membership in it. The church in Berkeley is peculiar in having a woman for pastor. Mrs. Pettit succeeded her husband, Frank D. Pettit, who died there in April, 1899, and the work has been successful under her ministry.

—Attention is called to the following correction. In an evangelistic report from Parkersburg, W. Va., in last week's CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, Herbert Yeuell's name was signed to this statement: "O. G. White came here about two years ago and I found comparatively nothing." The "I" should be eliminated. The man who found comparatively nothing was not Yeuell when he went to hold the meeting, but White when he took the church two years ago. Bro. White has done a great work at Parkersburg, has built up a solid congregation of 122 and has gotten them housed in a first-class building. The meeting held by Bro. Yeuell continued 24 days and resulted in 86 additions, making a total membership of over 200. We call especial attention to the correction of the former mistake, which was purely typographical, for we would not care to be responsible for the statement that any one could find comparatively nothing in a place where O. G. White had been for two years.

Take Them Out.

Or Feed Them on Food They can Study on.

When a student begins to break down from lack of the right kind of food, there are only two things to do; either take him out of school or feed him properly on food that will rebuild the brain and nerve cells. That food is Grape Nuts.

A boy writes from Jamestown, N. Y., saying: "A short time ago I got into a bad condition from overstudy, but mother having heard about Grape-Nuts Food began to feed me on it. It satisfied my hunger better than any other food, and the results were marvelous. I got fleshy like a good fellow. My usual morning headaches disappeared, and I found I could study for a long period without feeling the effects of it."

After I had been using Grape-Nuts Food for about two months I felt like a new boy altogether. My face had been pale and thin, but is now round and has considerable color.

I have gained greatly in strength as well as flesh, and it is a pleasure to study now that I am not bothered with my head. I passed all of my examinations with a reasonably good percentage, extra good in some of them, and it was Grape-Nuts that saved me from a year's delay in entering college.

Father and mother have both been improved by the use of Grape-Nuts Food. Mother was troubled with sleepless nights, and got very thin, and looked careworn. She has gained her normal strength and looks and sleeps well nights." Don E. Cooper.

Is It An Epidemic?

Vital Statistics Show an Alarming Increase in an Already Prevailing Disease—Are Any Exempt?

At no time in the history of disease has there been such an alarming increase in the number of cases of any particular malady as in that of kidney and bladder troubles now preying upon the people of this country.

To day we see a relative, a friend or an acquaintance apparently well, and in a few days we may be grieved to learn of their serious illness or sudden death, caused by that fatal type of kidney trouble—Bright's Disease.

Kidney trouble often becomes advanced into acute stages before the afflicted is aware of its presence; that is why we read of so many sudden deaths of prominent business and professional men, physicians and others. They have neglected to stop the leak in time.

While scientists are puzzling their brains to find out the cause, each individual can, by a little precaution, avoid the chances of contracting dreaded and dangerous kidney trouble, or eradicate it completely from their system if already afflicted. Many precious lives might have been, and many more can yet be, saved, by paying attention to the kidneys.

All readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST who have any symptoms of kidney or bladder trouble should write to-day to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., for a free sample bottle of Swamp-Root, the celebrated specific which is having such a great demand and remarkable success in the cure of the most distressing kidney and bladder troubles. With the sample bottle of Swamp-Root will also be sent free a pamphlet and treatise of valuable information.

Kansas Items.

According to the report made at our recent state convention there are in Kansas in round numbers 50,000 members of Christian churches, and 240 preachers giving all or a part of their time to the ministry. This gives us one preacher to each 208 of the membership. The salaries of these preachers will not average above $450 a year, so that if their support were equally divided each member would pay $2.15 annually for the support of the Kansas ministry.

The population of the state is just about one and one half millions, giving us one member to each 30 and one preacher to each 6,250. There is room for more preachers and more churches and our membership is well able to support the former and thereby plant the latter, if we would cease treating the Lord's work as though we were still in the grass-hopper year.

We have 395 congregations and 318 Bible-schools. Yet while reporting 50,000 church members we have but 16,500 in these schools—less than one-third as many as church members. These figures are appalling and bode ill for the future. It does seem that with our children, ourselves and others we ought at least to have as many in our Bible-schools as members in our churches.

The congregation at Westmoreland wants an active, progressive young preacher to locate there. Address the elders.

W. S. Lowe, our superintendent of mission, is assisting Bro. Matchett at Harmony this week.

L. S. Ridnour is in an interesting meeting at Irving.

J. W. Garner, of Perkins, Okla., is soon to help C. E. F. Smith in a meeting at Glasco.

Mrs. Nation seems to have disappeared from public view but the "joint" and the "joint" fight is still with us and in many places it waxes exceeding warm.

Belief the Only Condition of Church Membership.

If I understand the teaching of the New Testament, it amounts to about this: That Jesus was so highly endowed spiritually—"the spirit having been given him without measure"—that this spiritual endowment enabled him to commune with the Great Spirit, his Father, and thereby learn the value of all moral or spiritual truth. It is this spiritual endowment that constitutes that near relationship between God and Jesus that gives him the title of God's "only begotten Son." The spirit having been given him in its fullness is what constitutes the divinity, or makes him a divine being.

Then, to believe that Jesus is the Son of God, includes the idea that the relationship between him and his Father was so close as to enable him to reveal to the world all truth of a moral or spiritual nature, the revelation of such truth being necessary for man's greatest welfare and happiness while in the flesh. Then, to convince man that what he taught was practicable, he came into the world and carried out his teaching by his practice.

Now, in view of this teaching of the New Testament, the idea that "Jesus the Christ is the Son of God," naturally, in the fewest words, becomes the fundamental proposition of the Christian system. Man is required to believe this proposition because such belief naturally produces in himself the same moral qualities that exist in the thing he believes; for as a rule every man's belief, or the things he believes, becomes the leader of his life and the prompter of his actions. If a man did not believe there was a chance to reap, he would never sow; neither would he sow bad seed if he intensely believed that whatsoever he sowed that he shall surely reap. Belief is required for the purpose of exerting an influence over the believer, for it is by or through his belief that his character becomes assimilated to the nature of the things he believes in. Hence, every true believer is gradually brought into the Christ type of righteousness, and in this way becomes really and not nominally a Christian, or Christlike in his character.

Now, in view of this fact, that thousands in all the denominations have believed this proposition so intensely as to absorb its import into their characters, and have thus been brought into the Christ type of righteousness, and in this way become real Christians, the problem comes up, is it a matter of consistency to plead for the union of Christians and at the same time refuse church membership to those who are already Christians? I must confess that such practice seems to me to be inconsistent.

As the Disciples do not refuse church membership on the ground that those who believe are not Christians, but because they have not been baptized, they thereby claim the necessity of baptism on some other ground than that of a moral one.

What these grounds are that justify such refusal they should by all means make plain if they ever expect to bring about the union for which they plead. It will not satisfy thinking people to tell them they should submit to water baptism merely because it was a command given to the apostles; for the further inquiry naturally comes up, why were the apostles commanded to baptize, and do the same conditions now exist that made water baptism necessary then? As the editor seems to take it for granted that water baptism was intended to be a perpetual institution, will he please give the evidence on which he bases this conclusion? I know it is generally thought that the terms of the commission to the apostles justify this conclusion, as Jesus said he would be with these apostles, "always, even unto the end of the world." But as the word "always" could only mean "continually" while carrying out their commission, and the "end of the world" the consummation of the law-age, I cannot see that this language gives any more evidence of the perpetuity of baptism than the power and practice of casting out devils, speaking with new tongues, etc., that was given the apostles at the same time. Then, what was the purpose of baptism during the time of the apostles?

Fulton, Mo.

A FRIEND.

[We give place with pleasure to the foregoing criticism because it has the merit of placing the objection to our practice concerning immersion on the true ground. The writer, who while not associated with the Disciples, is a reader of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, truly says that as we do not refuse church membership on the ground that those who truly believe are not Christians in character and disposition, we should by all means make plain on what ground we refuse formal membership to the unbaptized. We had supposed that this had been made plain. Anticipating that this practice might be based on the commission, our "friend" attempts to break the force of this argument by claiming that "the end of the world," to which Jesus refers in the commission, meant simply "the consummation of the law-age." This strangely overlooks the fact that the language of the commission, which he quotes, was uttered after "the consummation of the law age." The death of Christ was the end of the legal dispensation, and the preparation for the introduction of the spiritual dispensation which began with Pentecost following the resurrection. The "end of the world," therefore, refers to the end of that age in which the gospel was to be preached, namely, the Christian dispensation.

Perfect Health

Is within the reach of almost every woman. The weakness, nervousness and irritability from which so many women suffer is in general due to disease of the delicate womanly organism. When the disease is cured the general health is re-established.

Doctor Pierce's Favorite Prescription makes weak women strong and sick women well. It promotes regularity, dries disagreeable and enfeebling drains, heals inflammation and ulceration and cures female weakness. When these diseases are cured, headache, backache, nervousness and weakness are cured also.

"I was very weak and nervous when I commenced taking Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription and 'Golden Medical Discovery,' about a year ago," writes Mrs. M. E. Everetts, of 89 Oxford Street, Woodstock, Ont. "I had been suffering for seven long months, and had taken medicine from a physician all the time, but it seemed to make me feel much worse. My stomach was so bad (so my doctor told me), and my nerves were in such a state that I would start at the least noise. I felt irritable at all times; was not able to do any of my own housework; had to keep help all the time. How I suffered God and myself alone know. I was greatly discouraged when I commenced taking your medicines, but the first bottle seemed to help me. I took five bottles of 'Favorite Prescription,' two of 'Golden Medical Discovery,' also two vials of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets. I can highly recommend these medicines to all who suffer as I did. I never had better health than I now enjoy, and it is all owing to Dr. Pierce's medicines."

Dr. Pierce's Common Sense Medical Adviser, in paper covers, is sent free on receipt of 21 one-cent stamps to pay expense of mailing only. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

This commission enjoins baptism for believers and therefore makes it perpetual during that age. Nor is there anything about "casting out devils," etc., in this record of the commission.

If further proof were needed of the perpetuity of baptism through the present dispensation, it may be found in the practice and in the teaching of the apostles and of the first church. The Acts of the Apostles, which is the oldest church history, shows that this commission was carried out, as respects baptism, during the lifetime of the apostles, and subsequent church history shows that it has been continued since then. The apostles gave no intimation that it was a temporary ordinance, as Paul does, for instance, in reference to special miraculous gifts.

In addition to the foregoing arguments, it may be further stated that the very same reasons which made baptism an ordinance of Christianity in the first century continue in operation to-day. Evidently some significant act was necessary as an expression of the soul's faith, and of its purpose to surrender to Christ, and nothing more appropriate has ever been suggested than the solemn and symbolic act of baptism, wherein we are buried with Christ and rise again to walk in newness of life. If baptism were discontinued something would have to be substituted in its place to serve the purpose which it was designed to serve. Faith, the desire to be a Christian, the purpose to turn away from evil, must have embodiment in some concrete act which means all that, and such is the meaning of baptism.

If, then, as our friend's argument implies, our practice in insisting on compliance with this original ordinance of initiation finds "Incurable" Heart Disease Cured.

During the last two or three years very great improvement has been made in the treatment of the different kinds of disease of the heart. Cases formerly considered incurable now rapidly recover. The well-known specialist, Franklin Miles, M. D., LL. B., of Chicago, will send his New Special Treatment free to any of our afflicted readers who will mention this paper.

This liberal offer is for the purpose of demonstrating the great superiority of his new system of Treatments for heart troubles, such as short breath, pain in the side, oppression in the chest, irregular pulse, palpitation, smothering spells, puffing of the ankles or dropsy.

They are the result of twenty-five years of careful study, extensive research, and remarkable experience in treating weak, dilated, hypertrophied, rheumatic, fatty or neuralgic hearts, as each one requires different treatment.

The treatments are carefully selected for each patient, as regards their age, weight and stage of each kind of heart disease. All afflicted persons should avail themselves of this liberal offer. No death comes more unexpectedly than that from heart disease.

Rev. J. W. Stokesbury, of Fallsport, Mo., had head, heart, stomach troubles, and nervous prostration. Three physicians failed to help him. He writes: "I regard myself cured."

The eminent Rev. W. Bell, D. D., of Dayton, Ohio, General Secretary of Foreign Missions, writes editorially in The State Sunday-School Union: "We desire to state that from personal acquaintance we know Dr. Miles to be a most skillful specialist, a man who has spared neither labor nor money to keep himself abreast of the great advancement in medical science."

A thousand references to, and testimonials from, Bishops, Clergymen, Bankers, Farmers, and their wives will be sent free on request. These include many who have been cured after from five to fifteen physicians and professors had pronounced them "incurable." Among them are H. A. Groce, 504 Mountain St., Elgin, Ill.; Mrs. Sophia Snowberg, No. 282 21st Ave., S. Minneapolis, Minn.; Mrs. A. P. Colburn, Blessing, Ia.; Mrs. M. B. Morelan, Rogers, Ohio, and the presidents of two medical colleges, etc.

justification in the perpetuity of the ordinance, such practice would seem to find ample justification. We are glad to see the argument taking this turn. The only possible argument that will convince those who now insist upon baptism in its original place and for its original purpose, that their practice should be changed, is to show them that neither Christ nor his apostles intended the ordinance to be perpetual; that it was to serve a temporary purpose, like the miraculous gifts, and then to pass away. If this can be shown, then, of course, our practice must be modified accordingly. Not otherwise, as it seems to us.—EDITOR.]

A Voice of Protest.

Poverty is incompatible with Christianity. This may seem an agnostical assertion to some, but it is true, as Christianity is taught and practiced in most of our churches.

The average poor man—and I speak from the poor man side of the question—has not time to practice Christianity if he has any love for his family. This should not be so, but this state of affairs is brought about by every one who participates in the struggle for wealth.

The laboring man is employed, perhaps, by a Christian who exacts all his time early and late. Other Christians secure the greatest part of his hire for rent, food, clothing—things which are necessary to his being. They would like to see him at church on a back seat, he is not good enough to be seated near these others of God's creatures.

But Sunday comes, this poor man is thoroughly tired from his week's labor. He cannot dress as he would like and on account of lack of moral courage and awe and hate of his wealthy employer he stays away. This is natural under the circumstances. But should he go he would not, perhaps, know anything of the theory which some of our preachers propound to their flock, and as far as that is concerned his employer does not either, as he is most likely as illiterate as his servant.

The greeting of some of these men to their laborers and the greeting of their pastor to these laborers is very much the same, and this is disgusting to most poor men. With outstretched hand and a smile which seems to say, "Why, hello, you poor devil. Did you ever see as fine an edifice as this, or such a choir and singing? And wasn't my sermon fine?"

So it goes. Both the rich and poor go to perdition, the former of their own volition, and the latter driven by the tyranny and hypocrisy of the rich professed Christian.

Paralysis and Coffee.

Symptoms Disappear when Drug is Abandoned.

"Tea and coffee were forbidden by my physician, for I had symptoms of paralysis and it was plain that the coffee was the cause of the trouble. I began using Postum Food Coffee and am now a steady advertisement for Postum. The old symptoms of paralysis disappeared in a very brief time after I began the use of Postum and quit the use of coffee. Do not use my name publicly, if you please." —, Morrow, O. The above name can be given by the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

Coffee is such a direct poison to the nerve centers of many highly organized people that it produces all sorts of disorders, from stomach and bowel troubles, palpitation of the heart, kidney troubles, etc., etc., up to more intricate nervous diseases, such as paralysis. The way to keep well is to leave off coffee or any nerve destroyer of that sort, and use Postum Food Coffee, which is a direct builder of the nerve centers. Sure and well defined improvement in health will follow this course, as can be proven by any person who will make the trial.

Texas Letter.

J. C. Mason has finished his first year at Palestine, and his additions to the church are larger than the number added to all the other churches in the city for the year.

Septimus Crow, on account of poor health, has resigned at Vashti and Mt. Pleasant. We hope this young man will soon be well again. Write R. A. Mallory, Vashti.

W. W. Warrea, of Golden City, Mo., has located at Troy, and Texas will give him a hearty welcome. He is of good stock.

Abner is about finishing a new house. This is a rural point, that portion of Texas now most neglected by our people.

M. F. Harmon locates at Terrell, beginning in November, and thus our preaching force is strongly reinforced.

The Austin church recently gave a reception to the faculty and students of the State University. The parlors were crowded and good was accomplished. The Lowbers know their business.

J. W. Campbell's health has again given way, and he has resigned at El Paso. This is very sad indeed. Volney Johnson succeeds him and Amarillo wants a preacher. Write W. E. Gee.

Eugene Holmes has been to Pilot Point. One result is a lot and the promise of a church building soon.

R. E. Grobel and Rev. S. C. Lockett are publishing The Texas Patriot, a red-hot temperance paper. It is a semi-monthly, with the prospect of becoming a weekly soon. It is published from Dallas and Honey Grove.

The Martin-Brower meeting with the First church of Ft. Worth, Chalmers McPherson pastor, has closed with 137 additions, 23 the last day. This was a great meeting, but from my view point it might have been much greater. Why close a meeting with such victories on the last day? Why cease firing when the enemy is flying before you? Napoleon would not have done it. But the evangelist had an engagement somewhere else. Admit it, but the bird was in the bush there and in his hands at Ft. Worth. Our meetings, like our giving, ought to be according as the Lord prospers us. Seven weeks is a long time, but it was not long enough in this case.

Evangelist L. W. Munhall is in our city with eighteen of our churches assisting him. The meeting is half over and it is too soon to give results. Will report in next letter.

The Roosevelt-Washington dinner is creating considerable commotion in the south, and many foolish and hurtful things are being said about it. To a man on the ground who tries to be reasonable, it seems to be an unfortunate affair. I cannot see how the President and his party, viewing it simply as a political move, can be benefited. And if it was not political, but only the recognition of genius and worth by the warm-hearted and impulsive young ruler, there are thousands of people who will never so accept it. But if it was meant to lend the influence of the administration to social equality, it was a capital mistake, to say the least of it. That question can never be settled in that way. But whatever may be true of it as regards the President, the chief damage is to Booker T. Washington and his race. Washington has constantly taught them not to bother about the question of social equality, but to give themselves up to the development of character and the creation of a better social atmosphere among themselves. In this act he seems to contradict his own teaching, and thus loses influence over those he has taught. But perhaps the worst result of all will be that certain negroes, encouraged by this incident, will attempt to press the question of social equality, than which few things could be more unfortunate for both whites and blacks.

Southern Indiana Notes.

Two additions last Sunday. One young man made the confession. We are on a high tide of spiritual feeling and prosperity. It does seem that all are at work these days. A new church with a moderate amount of indebtedness is a splendid thing for a congregation. There are good people who dream of a church with no debts to pay, no money to raise, no calls to provide for current expenses and nothing to keep the membership working at. Nothing worse could happen to any congregation. "It is the living organism that makes demands," says A. McLean. "Dead institutions do not need money and do not make demands." God blesses churches that are enterprising. We "must use or lose."

A few hours ago God took our beloved Sister Newland home. She has been a member of the congregation here for 48 years. At the time of her death she was over 69 years of age. She was among the noblest of the noble and the purest of the pure. Everybody praised her. She had a wealth of intelligence, a wealth of affection, and a wealth that belongs to all the saints. She has been a reader of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST ever since it was published. Our tears are mixed with holy joy. It was a pleasure for her to die and be with her Savior that she loved and adored. Her husband, Dr. J. W. Newland, is the senior elder of the congregation here and preaches in the absence of the pastor. He is over 80 years of age and has been a grand example of cheerful, godly living in the county for over 60 years. No man in the county is loved and respected as he is. Through his generosity we were enabled largely to build our magnificent new church. His is the Timotby Coop spirit. "As the Lord shovels it in, he shovels it out." He is "only waiting till the shadows are a little longer drawn." He is living daily in full view of the river of life. He knows too, where the good pastures are "in the book." He has the sympathy of all. A shadow has fallen on the home, but there is a glory around it too, the memory of one who, though tender as a flower, will never be forgotten. "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord."

A Good Investment.

Two days after the close of our recent general convention in Minneapolis, the Minneapolis Journal published the following statement of the results of the convention considered as a business investment for the city:

"The city of Minneapolis and her business men have never made a more profitable investment than the money spent on the recent twentieth century convention of the Christian Church. As an all-around advertising and business venture it is considered most satisfactory. It has created a new ambition among Minneapolis business men to make Minneapolis one of the prominent convention cities of America.

"In actual cash outlay the convention cost not to exceed $5,000. It brought people to Minneapolis whose expenditures in various ways in the city can be safely estimated at $100,000. Every visitor was pleased with the city, its prospects and the way the delegates were taken care of. That is advertising and Minneapolis is sure to realize a big profit on it.

"About 5,000 people were brought here by the convention. The gathering was in session eight days and an average of 3,000 people remained during that time. This represents delegates and friends who came with them from comparatively distant points to see Minneapolis. The hotel bills of these 3,000 people amounted to at least $45,000. All of the leading hotels were comfortably filled and some crowded, while apartment houses and hotels not in the down-town district did a good business. One remarkable fact about this convention was that the delegates arrived early. Nearly all were on hand Thursday, the first day, while at least 500 arrived here Wednesday.

"The visitors spent as much money in the stores as in the hotels. There have been few gatherings in the history of Minneapolis which have produced such pleasing results to the retail merchants as this one. All of the big stores made special arrangements for their entertainment and were well repaid. About half the visitors were women. Their purchases of dry goods were large. Instances were numerous where lady visitors from Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas and even Missouri did shopping not only for themselves but for their neighbors as well. Goods sold by Minneapolis merchants will be carried to nearly every section of the country as a result of this convention. This does not include the people who came here from nearer points in Minnesota and Wisconsin to attend the gathering and the large number of shoppers attracted to the city by the low rate. When all is taken into consideration $100,000 is a low estimate for the amount of money left here by the visitors.

"Part of the expense of the convention was assumed by the membership of the Christian Church in Minneapolis and the remainder by the Commercial Club. The major portion of this expense was realized by contributions from the business men. The vast amount of detail connected with the arrangements for the gathering was taken care of by the efficient organization of the local Christian church.

"While the weather was not satisfactory, the delegates visited nearly every point of interest. They spent much money in camera and kodak supplies and also in photographs of Minneapolis' beauty spots and other souvenirs. Their high opinion of Minneapolis will add to the reputation of the city for investment purposes. Hundreds were heard to express the wish that they could so arrange their affairs as to live in Minneapolis. This sentiment is bound to have a beneficial effect upon Minneapolis real estate. The visitors carry opinions to every part of the United States.

"The Christian Church convention has multiplied the interest among Minneapolis usi-

Three Good Reasons Why The Praise Hymnal Should Be Used in Our Churches.

"I have been deeply interested for many years in the hymnology of our churches, and have at different times examined with some care nearly all the song books of any pretensions that have come from the presses of our own brotherhood. Some of these have been good, a few bad, and many of them indifferent. Desiring new song books for the congregation for which I am now preaching, I made a new examination, and found myself compelled to acknowledge the superiority of THE PRAISE HYMNAL over all its competitors. Among its many points of excellence I note the following:

"First. The happy choice of songs, combining most of the old and best-loved hymns of the Church of God, which can never die, with the choicest of the new songs which have sprung into deserved favor during the last years of evangelistic development in our churches. The gleanings in the latter field has been exceedingly judicious, I think.

"Second. The beautiful, clear and large print, both of words and notes, makes it a delight to the eyes.

"Third. The arrangement of songs and tunes, by which, with few exceptions, each tune has but one hymn written to it. There are so many waste hymns in some of our books, where four or five are on the same page, but scarcely ever more than one used. Then, too, the words are written immediately under the music, which is very gratifying to all singers. The binding is neat, strong, and beautiful. It is a splendid book, worthy of comparison with the best compilations of sacred music of our day.

AS TO PRICES.—The contents of THE PRAISE HYMNAL are of a permanent quality. It is false economy to ask for cheap binding. We make a cloth bound book with leather back that will last ten years with any sort of care. The price is as low as can be made on its superior material and workmanship, $75.00 per 100 copies. ness men over the efforts of the Commercial Club to secure the next convention of the National Educational Association for Minneapolis. The N. E. A. convention, from a purely business standpoint, represents about the same proportion of profit to expense as the convention just closed. In addition to that it is one of the greatest advertisements a first-class city like Minneapolis can invest in."

"Sacred" and "Secular."

Touching the criticism of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for reporting the international yacht contest, I feel moved to say a word. (The separating of human actions into things sacred and things secular is an arbitrary, unnatural and hurtful superstition. Who is qualified to make the distinction between human acts and pronounce all conduct of a certain likeness as sacred and all other conduct as secular? All human conduct is the product of human nature—good, bad or indifferent—it has its roots in human nature. It is a false theory of human life that conduct revolves in separate circles and that religion is a distinct circle into which a life must pass and at least theoretically dissociate itself from all other phases of conduct, and as a corollary, that religious journalism must assume a hostile attitude to every human act that is not arbitrarily classed as religious.

Prayer is a human act, loving one's wife is a human act, yachting is a human act—and these acts are alike the product of a life that is a unit in itself, a marvelous combination of correlated functions. Who has any right to enter into this forest of human faculties and hew it into halves or any other proportion of parts and say, this is sacred and that is secular? The man who divorces his sympathies from every human act except that which he arbitrarily classifies as "religious" or "sacred" is only less in error than he who fails to distinguish the moral quality of different phases of life.

All manifestations of human life are of interest and fall within the legitimate sphere of religious journalism. I think the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is entirely right in its contention.

The Gospel of the Helping Hand.

Our National Benevolent Association has been very fortunate in securing the services of J. E. Deihl, of Ipava, Ill., as its general representative for that state. Bro. Deihl is one of the most popular ministers in the state, and his popularity is based on real merit and abounding works rather than on any mere graciousness of manner. Bro. Deihl has been greatly blessed in raising money for church purposes and doubtless his labors will be abundantly blest in behalf of this holy ministry.

It is hoped that the pastors of the various congregations of the state will invite Bro. Deihl to present this Gospel of the Helping Hand to their congregations. Let us all, in all the states, rally to the support of this national enterprise and give to Christian philanthropy its ancient prominence in the Church of Christ.

INDIANA.

Franklin, Oct. 28.—On a visit with the Union church, Morgan Co., four made the good confession; and on Oct. 20, three were added at North Vernon.—WILLIS M. CUNNINGHAM.

Ft. Wayne, Oct. 28.—Our meeting at the West Jefferson St. church continues with 40 additions to date.—E. W. ALLEN.

Indianapolis, Nov. 1.—One addition at Houghville last Lord's day. This makes 13 additions to this church not reported.—J. M. CANFIELD.

Madison, Nov. 4.—One addition yesterday from the Baptists, two others by letter not yet reported, making sixty since January at regular services. Geo. H. Farley, of N. Pleasureville, Ky., begins a protracted meeting with us to-night. Our tenth district convention which met here last week was in every way a success; fifty delegates from outside of the city being present, including fifteen ministers. The writer was elected president for the ensuing year. Reached our apportionment for state missions yesterday.—J. MURRAY TAYLOR.

Mt. Vernon, Oct. 28.—Seven added at regular services.—WM. A. WARD, minister.

Terre Haute, Nov. 4.—One was added to the church at Indianola, Ill., yesterday by statement.—LEONARD V. BARBRE.

IOWA.

Bethlehem, Oct. 27.—B. F. Hall has just closed a successful four weeks' meeting at Bethlehem. This is a new field for our people. With a little band of 14 workers this meeting was begun and the result is an organized body of 35 members, and efforts are being made to erect a church building which we think will be a success. Bro. Hall rendered effective service.—MRS. CORA E. PARSONS.

Cedar Rapids, Oct. 22.—Have seen no mention in your paper of the meeting held by Wilson and Huston for the Second Church of Christ at Cedar Rapids. No meeting ever held here by our church has had such glorious results. Bros. Wilson and Huston have given the people a better understanding of our plea than they have ever had before. They have left a kindlier feeling for our people, and with the proper efforts made and the same kindly feeling maintained there will be a steady and healthy growth of our cause. There were 120 additions to the church.—D.

Clarksville, Oct. 28.—Our large church was filled to overflowing at both the morning and evening services last Sunday. In the evening we organized a Y. P. S. C. E., with 26 members. Bro. A. Campmier, a prominent minister who recently came to us from the German Lutherans, is of great assistance to us. Bro. C. is desirous of securing a place to preach.—A. R. ADAMS.

Davenport, Nov. 4.—We had our annual rally and roll call yesterday. There were seven added by letter and statement during the day and one confession at night. W. A. Moore, of the Beulah church, St. Louis, will help us in a meeting January and February. Our general outlook in Davenport is as good as, if not better than, for 20 years. The congregation is in harmony. Our missionary gifts for the year will reach at least $250. We are acquiring a fund to purchase a mission lot in west Davenport. In the three years of our pastorate here, closing Aug. 31, the net increase was something above 100.—C. C. DAVIS.

Des Moines, Oct. 29.—I notice in last week's CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST a report of 116 additions in our meeting at Kasson, Ia. This is a mistake. There were 37 at Kasson, including three in rally meeting at Lorimor. One hundred and sixteen added is the result of both the Barney and Kasson effort. Six more by letter at Lorimor the last trip and one from M. E.'s at Barney Saturday night.—O. E. HAMILTON.

Estherville, Oct. 22.—Two more additions last Lord's day. Midweek prayer-meeting is as popular as regular church services. A good audience at the morning service and a crowded house in the evening. These things are becoming more like they should be.—DEFOREST AUSTIN, pastor.

Galva, Nov. 4.—Twenty-eight to date, 25 baptisms. Some splendid brethren here, though few in number.—C. C. ATWOOD AND WIFE.

Pleasantville, Nov. 1.—I want to close my work here about Dec. 1, and would like to correspond with some live preacher to take up this excellent field. We now have 410 members; 163 added by letter, statement and baptism during the recent pastorate of three years. We have an excellent new brick church, which cost about $8,000. Of this amount over $5,000 has been paid in cash. The balance of a little over $2,000 is covered by pledges, payable semi-annually. Some of the best people I ever labored with live here, and they deserve the highest success because of their many sacrifices in the past. The field I believe presents a fine opening to the right man. Address, F. D. FERRALL.

KANSAS.

Coffeyville, Oct. 30.—We have just closed a three weeks' meeting, with 15 added; seven confessions, three from the denominations, five by letter and statement. My brother, Chas. D. Purlee, of Litchfield, Ill., did the preaching.—ELLIS PURLEE.

Douglas, Nov. 2.—Began a meeting here one week ago. We have a fine interest, large attendance; one confession. Bro. C. W. Yard is the pastor.—J. D. FORSYTH.

Lyndon, Oct. 28.—We had three additions yesterday, two from the United Brethren and one by letter. I have been pastor here for eight months; membership about 55 when I came. We have had 15 additions during regular service. Work is progressing nicely; future outlook very encouraging. I would like to exchange meetings with some other pastor. Write to me for further information.—FRANK JALAGEAS.

Medicine Lodge, Oct. 28.—Twelve added since last report, nine by baptism, two by letter, one from the Methodists. This makes 49 added in the last four months. We begin meeting with home forces next Sunday.—W. T. McLAIN.

Topeka, Oct. 31.—Cowgill, Mo., meeting closed Oct. 27; four additions to congregation. Difficulties partially adjusted. The meeting was not a great success, but some good was accomplished. Meeting at Severance, Kan., to have began Nov. 3, deferred on account of smallpox.—C. C. BENTLEY.

KENTUCKY.

Walton, Nov. 1.—We have just closed a splendid meeting at Campbellsburg, Ky. There were 11 additions, 6 by baptism, 3 by letter, 2 by statement. Bro. W. T. Brooks, of Ladoga, Ind., preached eight nights and quit on account of sickness. The writer continued a few nights longer.—J. W. ROGERS.

MISSOURI.

Altamont, Oct. 31.—I have lately held a meeting at Madison Square church in Daviess county, Mo., with 12 confessions and baptisms.—G. W. LEONARD.

Appleton City, Oct. 28.—Received two more by confession and baptism at my regular meeting yesterday at Center S. H., and closed with an overflow meeting last night with splendid interest. This is a young and growing church with excellent promise. I begin a series of meetings at Ladue next Wednesday evening.—J. N. MURPHY.

Berlin, Oct. 28.—Closed a meeting Oct. 23 at Christian chapel, De Kalh county, Mo., assisted by Robert Adams, of Pattonsburg, Mo., who did the preaching. Seventeen additions. Brethren were highly pleased with the preaching.—H. F. CAMPBELL.

Bigelow, Oct. 28.—Meeting three weeks old. Twenty-three added to date; 16 baptisms; one from M. E.'s, one from Baptists; five reclaimed. J. A. McKenzie is holding the meeting.—W. R. GILL, pastor.

Bonner Springs, Oct. 29.—Two added by letter last Sunday, five in all since Sept. 1. Begin our meeting Nov. 10. Want a singer; write quick and give terms. Ladies Aid will soon pay another hundred dollars on church debt.—R. H. TANKSLEY.

Chillicothe, Oct. 28.—I have just closed a three weeks' meeting at Union, Putnam county, Mo., with 20 additions; 17 by baptism. Was ably assisted by Bro. Frank A. Wilkerson, of Yale, Ia., as singer and Sister Gertrude Ammons, of Seymour, Ia., as organist. They are both valuable evangelists. We commence at Sewal, Ia., to-night.—O. L. SUMNER, pastor.

Clinton, Nov. 4.—After a one month's visit the church here gave me a unanimous call for full time. We are well pleased with our new field.—E. H. WILLIAMSON.

Farmington, Nov. 4.—Mark Collis, of Lexington, Ky., has been with us during the past two weeks. We believe in dignified evangelistic preaching as discussed at Minneapolis, so we asked Bro. Collis to preach during our protracted meeting; 24 were added to the church. Yesterday we had a very impressive ordination service, when one elder and three deacons were set apart to fill vacancies in those offices, and the writer was ordained to be an evangelist. The work here and all over southeast Missouri is making marked strides of growth. We expect to have a southeast Missouri convention in December.—R. M. TALBERT.

Harrisonville, Nov. 2.—Our meeting just closed resulted in 29 additions, 21 by obedience. Dr. B. E. Dawson, of Belton, assisted me in the meeting and our people were delighted with his able efforts. His engagement with the Belton church ends with this month, after which he expects to practice (medicine) and preach—rather than preach and practice. It was a great joy to me to have my twin brother, W. L. Crutcher, from Richmond, Ky., spend a week with us during the meeting, assisting in song and prayer. We have "by consent" entered our second year's work at Harrisonville, with no friction or opposition, so far as I know. Since Oct. 1, 1900, we have had added to the church 49 persons. Before this reaches the printer I will be in a meeting at Blairtown.—S. W. CRUTCHER

Higdon, Nov. 4.—I have preached for this Higdon church for 10 years and held them eight protracted meetings. Closed a two weeks' meeting last night which resulted in 19 being added to the saved.—J. B. DONSON.

Gilman City, Nov. 1.—Meeting three weeks old with great interest. Seven additions to date. Will continue over Lord's day. Go next to Ravenna, Mo., and on Dec. 1 to Eagleville, Mo. We need a leader of song. We hope the churches of the Grand River district will respond to the call of Sec. J. B. Mayfield, of Gallatin, Mo.—M. L. ANTHONY, district evangelist.

Joplin, Nov. 4.—We have just held the best convention in Jasper county for many years. It convened in Webb City. Over 125 delegates and visitors outside of Webb City attended and over $50 was raised to push the work in the county the coming year. We have 13 congregations with about 1,800 members and three missions. Two of these churches were organized last year. There are 84,000 people in the county.—W. F. TURNER.

Kearney, Nov. 3.—Closed meeting here last night with 41 additions. Kearney is one of the cleanest towns in Missouri. Bro. Saxby, the pastor of the church here, has the confidence and esteem of all classes. My next meeting will be at Lee's Summit.—KING STARK.

Liberty, Nov. 1.—Have held two meetings recently with my home churches. One at Mt. Olivet resulted in 24 additions, the other at Smithville in 34. Both were of two weeks' duration. I begin at Mt. Gilead Nov. 10. Will begin my fifth year with these churches Jan. 1.—FRED V. LOOS.

Moberly, Nov. 4.—Nine young people were baptized here yesterday, three more made the good confession and one was added by letter. Large audiences at all services. We hope to have some good pastor assist us in a meeting soon.—SAMUEL B. MOORE.

Mt. Zion, Nov. 1.—We are in a series of meetings and enjoying interesting and inspiring sermons by Dr. W. T. Moore. Two confessions. The church and community will be greatly revived and edified by his scholarly teaching and faithful preaching.—H. CLAY WHALEY.

New London, Nov. 4.—Our meeting continues. Two confessions.—CRAYTON S. BROOKS.

Pickering, Oct. 29.—A five weeks' meeting conducted by the pastor, F. E. Blanchard, assisted by G. A. Butler, singing evangelist, closed last Lord's day. There were 27 baptisms; eight from other religious bodies, five of whom had been formerly baptized, two reclaimed and eight by letter and statement, making 52 in all added to the church. Of the 52 additions, 30 were heads of families, among whom were 10 husbands with their wives. Bro. Blanchard will remain with this church another year, which insures its prosperity.—C. G. McMILLEN.

Plattsburg, Oct. 31.—I closed a meeting of two weeks at Rushville, Mo., one of my regular preaching points, with 11 additions; six confessions and baptisms and five restored. I begin my sixth annual protracted meeting at Agency, Mo., next Tuesday. H. F. Davis will be with me to hold a Bible school institute.—JAMES C. CREEL.

Princeton, Oct. 30.—A glorious meeting is in progress at this place, the town being thoroughly stirred. J. E. Davis, pastor, is doing the preaching. He is a young preacher but preaches the pure gospel in such love and power that already 48 have been added to the Church of Christ. All are of the best families in the town and this meeting will give the church the greatest prestige in the community.—GUY B. WILLIAMSON AND WIFE, song evangelists.

St. Louis, Nov. 4.—The Second church, under the leadership of W. Daviess Pitman, has entirely paid off its debt of long standing. This is an occasion for great rejoicing, but the celebration will be postponed until the close of the protracted meeting which the pastor is now beginning; one addition. Fourth church, meeting continues with six additions. Ellendale, meeting of one week, one addition. Carondelet, five by letter and statement. Travel.

A word or two on the subject of travel is not amiss. The facilities for the transportation of passengers at the present time have certainly been brought to perfection. It isn't like in the old days when it was almost a torture to go from one place to another. Now you get aboard a train and live just like you do at home. The entire equipment is built with a view to your comfort.

For instance: When you go East the B. & O. S-W. offers you Three Daily Solid Vestibuled Trains from St. Louis, leaving at 8:20 a. m., 8:05 p. m. and 2:15 a. m.—made up of the finest Pullman sleepers—a dining car service which cannot be excelled (you don't have to pay for what you can't eat, but just for what you order)—first class high back coaches—in fact the trains are palaces on wheels. The track, roadbed and equipment are entirely new.

It's the best line to Cincinnati and Louisville. Only $21 to New York with stop-overs. (Saves you money and gives you the best service.)

Information in regard to trains, etc., can be secured from any representative. It will be a pleasure for them to answer your questions and help you in every way.

The favor of the public is final proof of merit—and we're after it.

Fremont, Oct. 28.—We closed a very successful meeting at Beulah, Neb, Oct. 6. It was not so successful as to numbers; but because the whole neighborhood came. The heroic efforts of Bro. W. O. Swartwood deserve mention. The Methodist people dismissed services to attend. There were four confessions and one by letter. Beulah is the only organization of Disciples in Polk Co., Neb One of theelders, Josiah Moody, a grand man, was very low with typhoid fever during the meeting. COMMUNION WINE

We are glad to be able to announce to our readers that we have just closed a contract with one of the largest grape-juice establishments in the United States, which will enable us to supply our patrons with a much better quality of unfermented grape-juice than we have hitherto sold, at a much lower price than has been asked.

This grape-juice is bottled especially for us and bears our label. It is intended for use in the Communion Service, and also for medicinal use. Pure grape-juice, such as this that we offer, is a most excellent drink for invalids, for convalescing fever patients, for children, etc., etc. Care should be taken, however, to avoid the many impure and adulterated brands of grape-juice now on the market.

PRICES. The prices we quote are for goods sent by express, not prepaid. We have put the prices as low as possible, that every church may be able to secure this non-intoxicating wine—the only wine that should be used in the celebration of the Lord's death. We especially urge patrons to buy in dozen lots. The price is less, the cost of transportation is proportionately less, and the trouble of frequent ordering is avoided. This grape-juice will keep in perfect condition for ten years.

The Father's House.

The Father's house has many rooms,
And each is fair;
And some are reached through gathered gloom,
By silent stair;
But he keeps house and makes it home
Whichever way the children come.
Plenty and peace are everywhere
His house within:
The rooms are eloquent with prayer,
The songs begin,
And dear hearts, filled with love, are glad,
Forgetting that they once were sad.
The Father's house is surely thine,
Therefore, why wait?
His lights of love through darkness shine,
The hour grows late.
Push back the curtain of thy doubt
And enter—none will cast thee out!

The Decline and Fall of Open Fireplaces.

Hawthorne, in his beautiful essay on "Fire Worship," gives evidence of his distress and discomfort at the substitution of stoves for open fireplaces, and portrays so vividly the delights of the latter one would imagine that scores of those who read the essay would dispense at once with "the abomination" as he terms it, and open up again their old fireplaces.

Possibly some quotations from his words may yet do good work in many homes, and bring back the bright face of an ancient friend.

"It is a great revolution," he wrote, "in social and domestic life, this almost universal exchange of the open fireplace for the cheerless and ungenial stove. It is sad to turn from the cloudy sky and sombre landscape; from yonder hill with its crown of rusty, black pines, the foliage of which is so dismal in the absence of the sun, that bleak pasture-land, and the broken surface of the potato-field, the swollen and sluggish river, dragging its bluish-gray stream along the verge of our orchard like a snake half torpid with the cold—it is sad to turn from an outward scene of so little comfort and find the same sullen influences brooding within the precincts of my study. Where is that brilliant guest, that quick and subtle spirit, whom Prometheus lured from heaven to civilize mankind and cheer them in their wintry desolation; that comfortable inmate, whose smile, during eight months of the year, was our sufficient consolation for summer's lingering advance and early flight? Alas! blindly inhospitable, grudging the food that kept him cheery and mercurial, we have thrust him into an iron prison, and compel him to smoulder away his life on a daily pittance which once would have been too scanty for his breakfast.

"I never shall be reconciled to this enormity. Truly may it be said that the world looks darker for it. In one way or another, here and there and all around us the inventions of mankind are fast blotting the picturesque, the poetic, and the beautiful out of human life. The domestic fire was a type of all these attributes, and seemed to bring might, and majesty, and wild nature and a spiritual essence into our inmost home, and yet to dwell with us in such friendliness that its mysteries and marvels excited no dismay. . . .

"How kindly he was! and, though the tremendous agent of change, yet bearing himself with such gentleness, so rendering himself a part of all lifelong and age-coeval associations, that it seemed as if he were the great conservative of nature. While a man was true to the fireside, so long would he be true to country and law, to the God whom his fathers worshiped, to the wife of his youth and to all things else which instinct or religion has taught us to consider sacred. . . . That good old clergyman, my predecessor in this mansion, was well acquainted with the comforts of the fireside. His yearly allowance of wood, according to the terms of his settlement, was no less than sixty cords. Almost an annual forest was converted from sound oak logs into ashes, in the kitchen, the parlor, and this little study, where now an unworthy successor, not in the pastoral office, but merely in his earthly abode, sits scribbling beside an air-tight stove. I love to fancy one of those fireside days while the good man, a contemporary of the revolution, was in his early prime, some five-and-sixty years ago. Before sunrise, doubtless, the blaze hovered upon the gray skirts of night and dissolved the frostwork that had gathered like a curtain over the small window panes. There is something peculiar in the aspect of the morning fireside; a fresher, brisker glare; the absence of that mellowness which can be produced only by half-consumed logs, and shapeless brands with the white ashes on them, and mighty coals, the remnant of tree-trunks that the hungry elements have gnawed for hours. The morning hearth, too, is newly swept and the brazen andirons well brightened so that the cheerful fire may see its face in them. Surely it was happiness, when the pastor, fortified with a substantial breakfast, sat down in his armchair and slippers and opened the Whole Body of Divinity, or the commentary on Job, or whichever of his old folios or quartos might fall within the range of his weekly sermons. . . . Beautiful it is to see the strengthening gleam, the deepening light that gradually casts distinct shadows of the human figure, the table, and the high-backed chairs upon the opposite wall, and at length, as twilight comes on, replenishes the room with living radiance and makes life all rose-color. Afar the wayfarer discerns the flickering flame as it dances upon the windows, and hails it as a beacon-light of humanity, reminding him, in his cold and lonely path, that the world is not all snow, and solitude, and desolation. At eventide, probably, the study was peopled with the clergyman's wife and family, and children tumbled themselves upon the hearth-rug, and grave puss sat with her back to the fire, or gazed with a semblance of human meditation into its lurid depths. . . .

"Heaven forgive the old clergyman! In his later life, when for almost ninety winters he had been gladdened by the firelight—when it had gleamed upon him from infancy to extreme age, and never without brightening his spirits as well as his visage, and perhaps keeping him alive so long—he had the heart to brick up his chimney-place and bid farewell to the face of his old friend forever. Why did he not take an eternal leave of the sunshine too? Alas! is this world so very bright that we can afford to choke up such a domestic fountain of gladness, and sit down by its darkened source without being conscious of a gloom?

"It is my belief that social intercourse cannot long continue what it has been, now that we have subtracted from it so important and vivifying an element as firelight. The effects will be more perceptible on our children and the generations that shall succeed them than on ourselves, the mechanism of whose life may remain unchanged, though its spirit be far other than it was. The sacred trust of the household fire has been transmitted in unbroken succession from the earliest ages, and faithfully cherished in spite of every discouragement, such as the curfew law of the Norman conquerors, until in these evil days physical science has nearly succeeded in extinguishing it. But we at least have our youthful recollections tinged with the glow of the hearth, and our lifelong habits and associations arranged on the principle of a mutual bond in the domestic fire. A warmth from the past—from the ashes of bygone years and the raked-up embers of long ago—will sometimes thaw the ice about our hearts; but it must be otherwise with our successors. There will be nothing to attract these poor children to one center. They will never behold one another through that peculiar medium of vision—the ruddy gleam of blazing wood or bituminous coal—which gives the human spirit so deep an insight into its fellows and melts all humanity into one cordial heart of hearts. . . .

"In classic times, the exhortation to 'fight pro aris et focis,' for the altars and hearths, was considered the strongest appeal that could be made to patriotism. And it seemed an immortal utterance; for all subsequent ages and people have acknowledged its force and responded to it with the full portion of manhood that nature has assigned to each. Wisely were the altar and the hearth conjoined in one mighty sentence; for the hearth, too, had its kindred sanctity. Religion sat down beside it, not in the priestly robes which decorated and perhaps disguised her at the altar, but arrayed in a simple matron's garb and uttering her lessons with the tenderness of a mother's voice and heart. The holy hearth! . . . It has been our task to uproot the hearth. What further reform is left for our children to achieve, unless they overthrow the altar, too? And by what appeal hereafter, when the breath of hostile armies may mingle with the pure cold breezes of our country, shall we attempt to rouse up native valor? Fight for our hearths? There will be none throughout the land. Fight for your stoves! Not I, in faith. If in such a cause I strike a blow, it shall be on the invader's part, and heaven grant that it may shatter the abomination all to pieces!"—The Standard.

Heart Trouble.

By Alice Curtice Moyer.

The Rev. Mr. Singletery sat in his study, preparing his Sunday sermon. Books and papers and references were piled about him. His brow was contracted into many a frown as he pored over a passage here and chose a theory there. He was a good man, was the Rev. Mr. Singletery, but his sermons were composed largely of scientific affairs; religion had little part in them. In fact, his discourses were learned lectures rather than sermons. He felt disappointed and dissatisfied with himself at times, but he had fallen into the snare into which so many had preceded him, and he had come to even think of God simply as an "infinite brain, an eternal logic engine, cold as steel, weaving endless ideas about life and art, about nature and man."

His head dropped upon his hand. His ideas became dim and confused for a moment. Then presently he saw himself a changed man—the sort of man he had at times desired to be—with a love of great tenderness toward his flock and a yearning over them, because of their backslidings and indifference.

An elder of his church stepped in.

"Good-morning, Bro. Singletery," he said, "you look sick or discouraged, which is it?"

"The latter, which amounts almost to the former."

"What's the trouble?" asked the kindly elder. Between himself and the pastor there was perfect sympathy. And this also seemed something out of the ordinary state of affairs. But Rev. Singletery liked the way things were going, and as his friend laid his arm about his shoulders, he felt constrained to confide in him:

"It is this, Bro. Temple. The members of our congregation are threatened with a serious malady."

"What! Has smallpox broken out?"

"Worse. A very serious form of heart trouble is brewing. The symptoms are strong, and I fear that there are already several well-developed cases."

"Explain yourself," said Elder Temple. "I see now that you are speaking figuratively, but explain."

"I will, beginning with the symptoms. I trust the indications I have seen are only symptoms, still it cannot be denied that symptoms are an evidence of something deeper. So, after all, it is the inward condition that brings about the symptoms—that furnishes the cause. A 'high pulse' in fever indicates something wrong within. A cough, however annoying in itself, is simply an evidence of some deeper-seated ailment. Certain amusements may be sufficiently injurious of themselves, yet they are only symptoms of something deeper and deadlier.

"Now to return to our own congregation and the symptoms shown by them. Last Wednesday evening, when 8 o'clock came, and there was only one faithful brother who cared to come to God's house for the one hour of prayer that we ask of our members once each week, I saw great and deep symptoms of heart trouble. On Lord's day morning (though I concede the weather was unfavorable), the empty seats spoke loudly of heart trouble. The day before had also been a day of inclement weather, yet I saw at least a score of our members out on business or pleasure. But when the Lord's day came, they suddenly felt that they were unable to go out into the storm—grievous symptoms of heart trouble! You are aware, Bro. Temple—I would not speak of it to anyone else—that it is a hard, a very hard, matter for our financial board to raise sufficient funds to pay our church expenses. The members suddenly remember their poverty when a subscription paper is placed before them. You know how the janitor has to wait and hope and hope and wait, for the pittance that is paid to him. You know how the church roof leaks, and how much the church building needs a new coat of paint, but to mention these needs to our members and to ask their help, brings up such a display of symptoms that I dread to hear the matter mentioned lest there be fatalities immediately in our midst. Now what do all these symptoms mean? Do they not tell of a fearful state within? A body that is in a normal condition does not show evidence of disease; neither does a heart that is filled with love for God and man give evidence of disease. There are other symptoms, also, which are not new, because we hear them every day—evil speaking about each other, the repeating of scandalous tales against some brother or sister, fault finding, lack of charity—all these are blemishes of the heart and speak of a terrible underlying condition. 'For from within, out of the heart of man, evil thoughts proceed.'

"The remedy? This is what one writer says: 'The time was when men talked about being clothed in righteousness and character, as if God was a wholesale dry goods merchant, and kept great bales of integrity and cut off a new character suit for each poor sinner. But righteousness and character are not made for man on the outside. Love, joy, justice represent something done with man on the inside.' 'Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me,' cried the psalmist.

"The only way to get at this disease is to get at the reason for it and take it away. When a physician is called in to see a patient with a fever, he treats the cause of the fever, and when the cause is taken away the symptoms disappear.

"The water is made clear by purging the fountain itself. The symptoms of this dread disease that is shaking the foundation of the church here and elsewhere can be eliminated only by purging and purifying the heart. The life is made sweet and clean by making the heart sweet and clean. The trouble is, my brother, the heart is belittled by too many people; it is not thought to be good taste to have a heart. Its cultivation is neglected. An eminent minister says: 'Brain counts for a good deal more to-day than heart does. It will win more applause and earn a larger salary. Thought is driven with a curb bit lest it quicken into a pace and widen out into a swing that transcends the dictates of good form. Exuberance is in bad odor. Appeals to the heart are not thought to be quite in good taste. The current demand is for ideas—not taste.' Continuing he says: 'I asked a member of my church the other day whether he thought a certain friend of his who attends a certain church and is exceptionally brainy was really entering into sympathy with religious things. 'Oh no,' he said. 'He likes to hear preaching because he has an active mind, and he likes the way that things are spread out before him. In the old days of the church, a sermon used to convert three thousand; now it takes three thousand sermons to convert one man.'

"I tell you, Bro. Temple, we are too much afraid of showing the best feelings of the heart. I have known men and women who, lest they might not say the very best thing in the very best way, would sit through prayer-meeting week after week without a word. These people put intellect above the heart. They make the prayer-meeting icy when they do take part, for it is plain to be seen that everything they say has been 'cut and dried and measured' beforehand. But when we by chance hear a few words spoken that come from the heart, faltering and poorly said though it may be, we cannot but feel that God is speaking through this heart, calling for men to come up higher; and the faltering tongue and unpolished language is forgotten.

"Oh, that we might learn that depth of mind begins with depth of heart.

"But what a sermon I am preaching to you, Bro. Temple! I did not mean to do so when I began."

"I suggest that you preach it also to the others of your congregation, Bro. Singletery, for you are a little too reserved yourself. Your people like you, they respect you, but you are almost as icy as they. Now, if you have a heart, let it be known. Thaw it out. Suggest to us by your own actions that heart is the center of life. Preach it, teach it, talk it, act it. Throw off that reserve that enfolds you like a cloak and see what the result will be. Let your heart shine through your intellect. 'For out of the heart man believeth unto righteousness.' Preach Jesus Christ, for he is love, and the greatest heart that the world has ever known."

The slamming of a door and the chatter of childish voices brought the Rev. Dr. Singletery back to earth. His study clock told him that it was 4:20 p. m., and that just three minutes ago he had left off at a point in the sermon he was so laboriously preparing where he was trying to tell something about the great thinkers of the world and to prove that science is the salvation of the future.

Bro. Temple had vanished, but his words in the dream, so real, remained. The "high and mighty" manuscript, to which he had intended to treat his Sunday morning hearers, went into the waste basket; and while the dream was still upon him, he wrote it down in sum and substance, and not only did he preach it, but many others along the same lines. If any pastor is in doubt as to the effect of the change from that day on in the influence and the power of the sermons of Bro. Singletery, let him go and do likewise, and he will be convinced that while there is evidence on every hand of heart disease, yet the poison can be eliminated, the weeds rooted out and the barriers broken down by the right sort of planting. Much of this planting must come from the pulpit.

Homemade Playthings.

Indestructible, paintless, cornerless toys are not to be had, in great variety at any price, but the best toys for a baby are easily made at home. Among the toys one can buy, the very best is a little rubber chicken or duck, with a voice. Next in permanent interest and indestructibility are the six-colored kindergarten balls. The other rubber animals and dolls are good in their place, but not first in choice. The chicken goes regularly into the morning bath, and will never grow old. Then among homemade toys there are things to make a noise, like rattles or hoops with bells. For this there is nothing better than big colored beads or buttons well corked in a bottle. A homemade linen doll with long arms and legs, no clothes, is a great comfort to a little child and better than the printed rag dolls. Simple, good pictures pasted on twelve-inch squares of cardboard are in some respects better than picture books for small babies.

A stoutly made bean bag is a comfortable plaything for a child under a year, and a small looking-glass is suitable if the baby is not inclined to bang and throw things. A simple little bag to put things in and out of will often delight even a very small baby.

As a child begins to walk it is well if the mother has patience to teach water plays. Under presupposed good health conditions, water dabbling, at least once a day, ought to be part of the programme from fifteen months on. A child easily learns not to tip over the water dish, and the dripping around must of course be allowed, and the place of the water feast planned accordingly. There are floating toys of various kinds to be had at small cost, but hardly better than paper boats, nutshells, small boxes and the like, easily found at home. And things to wash! There is joy! Cloth things and tin things, and bubbles to blow. Scrubbing also is part of the water feast. Let the small dabbler scrub something, hard, for as long time as she likes, and wash the windows, ever so badly.—Selected.

President McKinley's Baptism.

Rev. A. D. Morton, a retired minister, now living in Canton, Ohio, was the one who baptized the President and received him into the church of which he was a member. Speaking of those early experiences, the venerable clergyman said:

"Yes, I received William McKinley into the church and baptized him. That was at Poland, Mahoning county, in 1856, when McKinley was a boy fourteen years of age. McKinley's father had moved to that place, I think, to get the benefit of the school there. McKinley was a student at the college. The first year I was at Poland I held quite a successful series of meetings and although William McKinley attended regularly he did not join the church.

"He was always an attentive listener, giving reverent attention to the word of God. However, at one of the meetings held during the second year I was at Poland, young McKinley arose in his place and declared his determination to be a Christian, stating that there would be no going back as long as God spared his life. He professed conversion at that time.

"McKinley had never been baptized; and when the question of his baptism came up before he was taken into full membership with the church it was discovered that he had imbibed the idea that the only true mode of baptism was by immersion. His mother, being a Methodist, favored sprinkling, and she tried to persuade her son to give up the idea of immersion.

"But arguments were of no avail, so one Sunday in the following summer, in company with a number of others, McKinley repaired to the borders of the stream near Poland and I immersed him."—Will Carleton's Magazine.

Lord, let me never tag a moral to a story nor tell a story without a meaning. Make me respect my material so much that I dare not slight my work. Help me to deal very honestly with words and with people, because they are both alive. Show me that, as in a river, so in writing, clearness is the best quality, and a little that is pure is worth more than much that is mixed. Teach me to see the local color without being blind to the inner light. Give me an ideal that will stand the strain of weaving into human stuff on the loom of the real. Keep me from caring more for books than for folks, for art than for life. Steady me to do my full stint of work as well as I can, and when that is done stop me, pay what wages thou wilt, and help me to say from a quiet heart a grateful Amen.—Henry Van Dykes's introduction to his new volume of stories.

WHAT SHALL WE EAT

To Keep Healthy and Strong?

A healthy appetite and common sense are excellent guides to follow in matters of diet, and a mixed diet of grains, fruits and meats is undoubtedly the best, in spite of the claims made by vegetarians and food cranks generally.

As compared with grains and vegetables, meat furnishes the most nutriment in a highly concentrated form and is digested and assimilated more quickly than vegetables or grains.

Dr. Julius Remusson on this subject says: Nervous persons, people run down in health and of low vitality should eat plenty of meat. If the digestion is too feeble at first it may be easily strengthened by the regular use of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets after each meal. Two of these excellent tablets taken after dinner will digest several thousand grains of meat, eggs or other animal food in three or four hours, while the malt diastase also contained in Stuart's Tablets cause the perfect digestion of starchy foods, like potatoes, bread, etc., and no matter how weak the stomach may be, no trouble will be experienced if a regular practice is made of using Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets because they supply the pepsin and diastase so necessary to perfect digestion, and any form of indigestion and stomach trouble except cancer of the stomach will be overcome by their daily use.

That large class of people who come under the head of nervous dyspeptics, should eat plenty of meat and insure its complete digestion by the systematic use of a safe, harmless digestive medicine like Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, composed of the natural digestive principles, peptones and diastase, which actually perform the work of digestion and give the abused stomach a chance to rest and to furnish the body and brain with the necessary nutriment. Cheap cathartic medicines masquerading under the name of dyspepsia cures are useless for relief or cure of indigestion, because they have absolutely no effect upon the actual digestion of food.

Dyspepsia in all its forms is simply a failure of the stomach to digest food and the sensible way to solve the riddle and cure the indigestion is to make a daily use at meal time of a safe preparation which is endorsed by the medical profession and known to contain active digestive principles, and all this can truly be said of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets.

All druggists throughout the United States, Canada and Great Britain sell them at the uniform price of fifty cents for full treatment.

The late Bishop Whipple, known as the friend and counselor of the Indians in Minnesota for nearly half a century, was once passing the night with an Indian chief at his lodge in the forest. On leaving the camp for a short time, he inquired whether his belongings scattered about the tent would be safe from theft. "Perfectly safe," said the Indian. "There is not a white man within a hundred miles." This fable teaches that the white man's rule that there are no good Indians except dead Indians, is a good rule. It will work both ways.

The Runaways.—V.

"Em's going to sleep," said Harry suddenly, bending over his sister whose head rested upon his knee.

"Nome not," answered Emily drowsily, "I ain't sleepy, I'm jus' tired."

"Well, it's time to go to bed, anyway," said Zep. "Come down, ladies and gentlemen, and select yourselves a bedroom in the Great American Hotel!"

They climbed down the iron ladder, and scrambled up into the box-car. Zep and Harry pushed to the great iron door, and now, it was not too warm. They lay down on the grass, Emily unconsciously hunting a place close to Harry. Their bundles had been placed in a corner. Emily and Zep were soon fast asleep; you could tell that by the way they breathed. Harry lay a long time staring at the boxes and stoves at the other end of the car. The moonlight peeped in just enough to make the furniture assume strange shapes like a dream-menagerie. At last he also fell asleep. When he awoke, his brother and sister still slumbered. It was morning, and from a distance came the crowing of happy cocks who get up so extremely early every morning that they are too tired to do much more than stand around on one leg a great part of the day. At first Harry thought he would wake up Zep and tell him the sun was shining. But he didn't, because he remembered that Zep liked to do his own waking up.

Suddenly Harry heard a sound outside the box-car. He sat up quickly. Had some one come to get a load of furniture? No, there was no sound of wheels. "Say, Gregg," said a rough voice near at hand, "look a-here, will you? This here door's unfastened!"

"Somethin' in there, too, Jake," said another. "Stand back here and you'll see; furniture. Le's go to housekeepin', ole man!"

The first speaker laughed loudly. "I'll tell you what, Gregg, they're movin' these here things, an' this here's Sunday, you know, an' they're waitin' a day out of religion, you know. Heaps of folks does things out of religion,—the beatenest things you ever heard of!"

"Well, le's help 'em move," suggested the man called Jake. "I ain't got nothin' partic'lar to do this mornin', have you, Gregg?"

Gregg gave his coarse laugh, which sounded as if it might be a personal discomfort, it was so rasping. By this time Zep was awake. "What's that?" he whispered.

"Tramps!" whispered Harry.

"Here, lend a hand at this door!" said one of the tramps.

Emily grasped Harry's arm in terror.

Harry now called out in as deep a voice as he could assume: "You leave that door alone!"

"Moses!" muttered Jake. The children could not tell if there was a third tramp out there named Moses, but they thought not.

"What's going on out there, anyway?" shouted Zep, making a great noise by striking a plank against the floor.

"They must think they's nobody at home!" thundered Harry—at least, as well

Every little girl loves a doll. How delighted she would be with a whole family of big dolls with which to "play house." These dolls are nearly two feet high, have rosy cheeks, beautiful hair, heads that will not break, eyes that will not fall in, nor suffer any of the mishaps that dollies are likely to encounter. They are the 20th Century model of the old fashioned doll that Grandma used to make, and would make Grandma open her eyes in wonder. They are made of extra heavy satteen that will not tear, and are dressed in bright colors that will not fade. They are very durable and will give a child more real pleasure than any doll made. We will give these four beautiful dolls absolutely free for selling only five boxes of our Laxative Stomach Tablets at 25 cents a box. Write to-day and we will send the Tablets by mail postpaid. When sold send us the money ($1.25) and we will send you the four dolls same day money is received. Address, as he could get his voice, which had a decided tenor tendency, to thunder.

"Wait till I get my gun!" roared Zep.

Emily felt she ought to do her part.

"They'd better not fool with me, that's all!" she piped in a voice trembling from fear. They heard the tramps running away. "Thank goodness! they're afraid of us!" exclaimed Emily at last, still trembling. "But you told a s'ory, Zep. You said you had a gun!"

"No I didn't, I said for them to wait till I got my gun. They would of waited pretty long if they had, but that was their business."

"Aunt Sarelde would call it a story," Emily maintained, "and she says if we tell 'em,—even that kind,—nobody will respect us."

"We kin make 'em afred of us, anyhow," declared Zep. Then he added, "Em, you're right and I won't do it again, —unless tramps come. Well, le's get up and open the hotel. We can't lay in here all day, and I guess Jake and Gregg won't visit us again."

At first Emily did not want the door opened, but after awhile it began to be too warm to be comfortable in the car. "I tell you what," said Harry, "le's stand guard over this box-car all day, 'cause it stands to reason the owner forgot to lock it up. He'll come for a load to-morrow, and we'll tell him how we saved his things for him and maybe we kin get a job on his place!" They thought this a good plan, and decided to spend the day in the wood, whence they could keep an eye on the car. If tramps came to molest it, they would skirt the road and run toward the barn whose roof they had seen the night before, from the top of the box-car. Thus they could give warning without the tramps knowing of their existence.

Having carefully pushed to the door behind them, they traversed the open space toward the wood, carrying their bundles. One contained their shoes and stockings, and the other, two loaves of bread and a box of sardines which they had bought at the last small town through which they had passed. They found a pleasant nook near the edge of the wood which gave a direct view of the box-car and the broad country road which ran for some distance parallel with the main track. The children sat under a great oak which seemed to have pushed back the other trees as it grew up, for there was an open circle about it, carpeted with moss and grass. There was a big hollow log to sit on, which might have a snake in it, but as you can seldom accomplish anything without some risk, they ignored this possibility. The best thing of all was a little brook not far away.

"I'm going to fish," said Zep. "Those sardines won't make us three full meals and besides I want to make a camp fire, anyhow!"

"Oh Zep!" cried Emily. "On Sunday?"

"Well, I'll just fish with a pin-hook," said Zep. "I guess pin-hooks ain't very wrong. Give us a pin, Em, and I'll get you some breakfast. Besides 'tain't wrong, it ain't just for fun. Bible says to get your ox out of the ditch, if it is Sunday. Well, our ox is in the brook, and I don't see no differ'nce."

Emily would not give the pin, but Zep took it away from her. Having made up his mind to commit this wrong, he was not to be stopped by subtle distinctions. He bent the pin with that hopefulness and good humor which we have so often lavished upon pin-hooks when deprived of store-hooks. Around the head he fastened one of those dirty, thin, inevitable cotton strings that a boy stows away in his pocket against the day of having something to tie. He fastened the other end to a long, strong weed, and sat himself down upon the margin of the brook.

The Heavenly Shepherd.*

Text:—He shall feed his flock like a shepherd, he shall gather the lambs in his arm, and carry them in his bosom, and shall gently lead those that give suck.—Isa. 40: 11.

The Hebrews were familiar with flocks and herds, and language like this must have been very beautiful to them. To the many who live in towns and cities, in the smoke and noise of factories, this beauty is measurably lost; yet even they can feel something of the tenderness implied, and catch a glimpse of its rural simplicity and pastoral beauty. When for millions life is a weary battle for bread, it is refreshing to read, "He shall feed his flock like a shepherd."

Watchful and Tender.

This prophecy is applied to and fulfilled in Christ. He declares: "I am the good shepherd" (John 10:11). He is vigilant; he never slumbers; he gives his flock that watchful care which saves them from imminent dangers.

"He guides our feet, he guards our way,
His morning smiles bless all the day;
He spreads the evening veil, and keeps
The silent hours while Israel sleeps."

No enemy can attack him whom the Shepherd defends. No ambush can surprise him. Snares and pitfalls cannot entrap him. But the watchfulness of the heavenly Shepherd is not more wonderful than his tenderness. "He gathers the lambs in his arm, and carries them in his bosom." Who would not ride in such a chariot? The timid, the faint, the discouraged and the very young are thus kept and guarded. Would it not be well for members of the flock to abide more often quietly in the fold? And then all the qualities in the flock which respond to these in the Shepherd, should they not be carefully cultivated? He is watchful; then we can be trustful. He is tender; then we must be confiding and obedient.

The Young.

The growing church is always filled with young people, and has a strong recruiting station in the shape of a well organized Sunday-school. Young people's societies have multiplied, and yet there are few churches that show the same loving care of the young that Christ shows. They are always found among his listeners. They seem to have been irresistibly attracted to him. And when fond mothers brought them to him, craving his notice, he gently took them up in his arms and blessed them. He has forever sanctified infancy and childhood by passing through these periods of human life. Bethlehem is a name sacred in song and story, because he was born there.

The critical years, the years determinative of all the future, are the years of infancy and childhood. This is a strategic fact, and as such Jesus recognized it. The young are easily led astray; they are prone to wander; therefore they are in need of extra care. In many homes there is no teaching of either morals or religion, and children are neglected and abused. So the church must "gather them in her arm, and carry them in her bosom."

One Flock.

"And other sheep I have, which are not of this fold." If we stop there the passage might be made to justify sectarianism in the Church; but read on: "them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and they shall become one flock, one shepherd" (John 10: 16). Was the Master thinking of the souls of that generation, in lands far away, that were feeling after him? Or did he think of the coming generations, of the days when his flock should be divided and scattered?

*Prayer-meeting topic for Nov. 13.

Whatever may have been his thought we can comfort ourselves with the assurance that he is bringing together the divided hosts. And as the church hears his voice and follows him, yielding itself in loving obedience to the great Shepherd, divisions will disappear, strife will cease, and all discordant voices will be hushed. And why not? The good Shepherd has laid down his life for the sheep. He has succored them forever. Death cannot snatch them away. Wolfish passions cannot tear them. Is it not passing strange that people who are one in their devotion to so great a Savior should be many in their attempts to serve him; and not only so but, while friends of the Master, enemies one of another?

Under-Shepherds.

It has pleased God to appoint under-shepherds of his flock. Their duties are like those of the chief Shepherd, though their resources are not likewise limitless. Theirs is a service highly honorable, but charged with great responsibility. Elders, preachers and teachers are to-day performing this task. May it be with the fidelity that shall at last win "the crown of glory that fadeth not away."

Prayer.

"All we like sheep have gone astray." We have been lost, but Thou hast sought us and saved us, O God. When faint and weary Thou hast carried us, and many a rough place we have not known. For thy tender shepherding we bless Thee. Wilt Thou make us docile, willing and obedient, and with an innumerable company, bring us at last into the heavenly sheepfold, through Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Childhood of Moses.*

It must have seemed to many in Israel that Jehovah had forgotten his covenant people, who were now suffering in bitter bondage beside the Nile. Though their cry went daily up to heaven, yet their burdens grew heavier, and their taskmasters more cruel. They might have seen in their unprecedented increase of numbers a token of the gracious providence of God, but doubtless they were slow to see aught of divine favor amidst the hardships of their earthly lot. The worst was yet to come, and only when the nation had reached the point where their agony should voice itself in united petition to the God of their fathers, and their experience be such as to render them willing to undertake and complete the weary journey back to the land of promise, would the arm of Jehovah be bared for their deliverance. That time was rapidly approaching. Finding that his Hebrew slaves were multiplying beyond all precedent, despite the cruelties under which they groaned, the ruling Pharaoh issued an edict that every male child born in a Hebrew household should be put to death, and made it the duty of every one of his native subjects to see that this order was obeyed.

It was a short time after this command was given that the child was born who was to break the arm of Pharaoh, and deliver the subject race from bondage. The names of his parents, Amram, "Kindred of the Lofty One," and Jochebed, "She whose glory is Jehovah," seem to indicate that, at least in the tribe of Levi, to which they belonged, a strong faith in God yet lingered, and the hope of deliverance had not died out. Already two children had been born to them, Miriam, a girl of perhaps twelve or thirteen, and Aaron, now three years old. With what anxious hearts must these godly parents have awaited the birth of another child, and with what sorrow did they learn that it was a son, and therefore subject to the cruel edict of the king. But there was that in the aspect of the little babe which gave them courage to attempt his rescue. The writer of Exodus tells us that "they saw he was a goodly child." Stephen, in his address before the Jewish council, as recorded in the seventh chapter of Acts, says that Moses was "exceeding fair," or, literally, "fair unto God." Tradition tells how beautiful he was in form and feature, to an extent that attracted universal attention and admiration. Whether merely his unusual beauty, magnified by the affection of fond parents, or the feeling that his remarkable loveliness argued for him some divine mission for his oppressed people, we may not know. What is certain is that his parents determined to save his life if possible, and that they asked the help of God in this effort. Conscious that death would probably be their reward, if discovered, they "through faith," as the writer of the Hebrew epistle informs us, braved the king's anger, and concealed their darling child.

Three months went by, when Jochebed realized that her babe could not much longer be kept from the sight or hearing of the enemies about her. His discovery would result in his certain death, if not that of the entire family. In her despair, she found refuge in God. She determined to commit the babe to the Lord, and trust that some way of safety might be found in that providence which she still believed to hover over her people. She took the reeds, or papyrus stalks that grew along the Nile and its many canals, and wove of them a basket, or "ark," which she made water tight by smearing it with a mixture of bitumen and pitch, or tar. In this, with loving hands she laid her sweet babe, and with many a tear and ardent kiss fastened securely the cover, and stealing in the early morn to the brink of one of the canals flowing from the Nile, laid her precious charge amid the rushes along the bank. Only a mother can enter in imagination into the feelings of this Hebrew mother, as she turned away from her innocent babe, to wait the uncertain future. But she omitted no precaution that loving forethought could provide, and Moses' young sister, Miriam, lurked about, in sight of the spot, hoping that she might in some way serve the life or fortunes of her baby brother.

Some suppose that the mother of Moses was aware of the fact that the Egyptian princess was wont to bathe in the place where she had laid her child. However that may be. God directed her steps hither on this very morning. It was perhaps in the near vicinity of the ancient capital of Lower Egypt, Memphis, situated nearly where the Cairo of today is built. "Pharaoh's daughter" is said by some ancient writers to have been Thermuthis, the daughter of the preceding, and sister of the then reigning Pharaoh, and the wife of the latter, in accordance with the prevailing custom of the Egypt of that period. It is also said that she was childless, and greatly desirous of offspring. If these are facts, and not mere conjectures, they would explain the instant favor with which she looked upon the beautiful Hebrew babe, and the affection which she lavished upon him. When she had seen the ark lying amid the reeds, and had it brought to her and opened, the lovely babe, whose weeping alone would appeal to the heart of any true woman, found entrance at once into this childless woman's heart, and she loved it as her own. Mingled with admiration for the beautiful child was pity for its cruel lot, and perhaps for the unknown Hebrew mother whose evident despair had led to the committal of her babe to the mercy of the river.

Miriam, standing afar off, beheld the evident pity and admiration with which the royal princess was fondling her little brother, and was emboldened to draw near and ask if she would not have a Hebrew nurse to care for the tiny outcast. Bidden to bring such an one, she hastened on flying feet to bring her mother, who was given charge of her own child, with promise of wages for his care. How could she have concealed the rapture of her heart, when again permitted to clasp to her bosom the babe for whose life she had hardly dared, an hour before, to hope? What rejoicing must have filled the humble home of these righteous children of Levi, when they found their family circle again unbroken. And how their faith in the purpose of God to bring some great blessing to his people, through this marvelous child of theirs, must have been strengthened by this signal proof of his overruling providence. Henceforth they could not doubt that Moses was a "child of destiny." This conviction doubtless made it easier for Jochebed to surrender him to his foster mother, the royal princess, when he arrived at an age suitable for his appearance at the royal court. She could wait God's time for the fulfillment of the mission of her wonderfully preserved son.

*Lesson for Nov. 17. Exodus 2:1-10.

One Dollar League.

We have sent out 2,500 copies of the following letter:

Kansas City, Mo., Oct. 24, 1901.

DEAR FRIEND OF JESUS:—Have patience with us and read this, it is for you. Last year was one of the most successful in our state mission work. Sixty new churches and 110 Bible schools were organized, 3,596 souls were turned to the Lord by our faithful workers in the field. This is by far the largest year's work for some time past. To accomplish this great work our field force had to be greatly increased. Our collections were $1,500 more than last year, but it took every cent of this increased income to pay our men, and we find ourselves at the beginning of a new year with an empty treasury.

Something must be done immediately to ward off the calamity of a reduction of our field force. Truly this would be a calamity, especially in our drought-stricken districts. There it means the utter withdrawal of every religious privilege, for it is only when the preacher comes that there are any religious services at all. If we only had space to insert some of the many letters from these places that we are receiving, you would excuse us for being urgent, yet unless we can at once secure these funds, we will be compelled to call these men in.

In this emergency the board has determined to make a direct appeal to the brotherhood of the state. There ought to be thousands of our brothers and sisters throughout the state who would contribute at least to meet this great crisis. This appeal comes not from a far away land, but from our own beloved state. It is not made in behalf of the heathen, but for those who are our brethren and sisters in Jesus. Will you not join this ONE DOLLAR LEAGUE for the immediate relief of our hard pressed work? Please do not refuse, but send immediately and God will surely bless the deed. Every contributor's name will appear in the columns of the Missouri Christian Message, and that paper will be sent one year to each contributor of one dollar or more. Send to-day.

Yours in His name,

T. A. ABBOTT, Cor. Sec. for the board.
420 East Ninth St., Kansas City, Mo.

P. S.—Of course you are not limited to the one dollar in your sending. If you can send five or ten, or even more, we shall thank you and the dear Lord for it. But we want this offering to be within reach of all.

If you have not received a copy of the above letter, will you not immediately upon reading this article, send us this small sum to help us in our work? If you have received one and have not yet responded, will you not do so immediately? I assure you that but for the fact that the need is an imperative one, this call would not go out in this way. It seems to be our only hope of redemption at this time, and we beg of you, we pray in the name of the Master, that you will give it your immediate attention.

Yours in His name,

T. A. ABBOTT.

Southwestern Wisconsin.

State Evangelist J. H. Stark recently visited the churches of this section, much to the encouragement and edification of the brethren. At Lynxville a missionary rally was held and Bro. Stark preached a good sermon on "Fellowship," and presented the state work. Sunday the pledges will be taken for Wisconsin missions.

Ferryville, seven miles north of here, has no church of any description. We are planning to take possession of the town in the name of the King. Wisconsin has many an open door for the pure, simple gospel, and this is a day of great opportunity for the Christian churches.

A hundred missionaries are needed in the state and yet there are only five preachers giving their entire time to the work of the ministry. Viroqua, Sugar Grove, Sylvan and Richland Center are all without preachers. And yet the work prospers throughout the state.

The Sugar Grove brethren are building a new house of worship.

Viroqua hopes to have Geo. F. Hall for a meeting this fall.

Richland Center has a preacher in view.

If you have the gospel and know how to preach it you can find an audience in Wisconsin.

An Attractive Book Offer!

During the past few years there has been a rage for the historical romance. This has been a profitable and sensible fashion, for it has given something of a knowledge of secular history to persons who would not have taken the trouble to study, but who enjoyed reading fiction.

Why should not Bible history and knowledge of the characters of the Old Testament be disseminated in the same manner, especially among young people. They will gladly read an interesting story, and what can be more interesting, for example, than the career of Moses, skillfully narrated?

We offer six splendid romances from Bible history in one set. The books are: MOSES, THE MAN OF GOD (Dungan); QUEEN ESTHER (Davis); ELLIAH (Davis); KING SAUL (Ellis); IN THE DAYS OF JERU (Ellis); and SHEM (Ellis). Five of these are cloth-bound books; SHEM is bound in paper. The regular price of the six volumes is $4.75. For a short time we propose to offer the complete set for $3.50. At this price the books will be sent by express, not prepaid.

The children and young people will be delighted with these books. They will help to pass many a long autumn or winter evening. Better still, they will impart much information about Bible history. It is sometimes difficult to get boys and girls to study the Bible, directly, but there will be no trouble getting them to read these interesting stories.

Six Volumes. Over 1400 Pages. Many Illustrations. $3.50.

BAILEY.

Phoebe Ann Bailey died at the home of her daughter, Mrs. C. W. Yard, in Augusta, Kan., Oct. 15, 1901, in her 80th year. Phoebe Ann Davidson was born in Perry county, Ky., Sept. 2, 1822; was married in Montgomery county, Ind., to John L. Bailey, Nov. 15, 1840; confessed Christ and was baptized near Adel, Ia., by J. M. Dodge, in 1867. For 15 years, since her husband's death, she has lived among her children. She was a faithful Christian and her cheerful disposition brought sunshine into every home she entered. She was a dear mother to us all. She fell asleep in Jesus painlessly, after a long and tedious illness. Funeral services were conducted by W. E. Reeves. Five daughters and three sons remain to sorrow, but not as those who have no hope.

DIVERS.

Another beautiful, peaceful home is made void by the touch of the icy hand of death. Mrs. Martha C. Divers, wife of our much esteemed and highly respected citizen, S. A. Divers, died Oct. 19, 1901, of stomach trouble, aged 47 years, 7 months and 9 days. She was married Oct. 11, 1876; was a member of the Christian church, having united with the Boydsville church under the preaching of Rev. John Smith, at the early age of twelve years, and remained a consistent member at that place the remainder of her life. Her maiden name was Martha C. Wilkerson. There were 25 years and 8 days of her married life, and to this marriage were given two sons, Carl and Curtis, two noble young men just stepping into the prime of manhood and usefulness. They are now called to bind the bleeding bosom of a bereaved and lonely father, with an innumerable host of relatives and friends that yet remain to mourn her death. There are three brothers and one sister and an aged, widowed mother of whom it may be truly said, A true mother in Israel, as she has loved, cheered and soothed the sufferings of seven daughters, and saw them pass over the turbid sea. And yet the mother is left, "who meekly waits and murmurs not." This sad event though not unexpected has awakened in these bereaved hearts the profoundest feelings of sorrow. It seemed so hard to bow in submission and say, "Thy will, not mine, be done." And when we saw in death her eyelids close, O, grave, not yet, not to-day! a little while longer let her stay. No family was ever blessed with a mother whose whole life seemed more ablaze with constant watch-care and untiring effort to lavish that mother's love and promote the happiness of her family. Her remarkable executive talent and well directed energy made her home a model of order and neatness. After a grand and impressive discourse by Rev. J. B. Jones the beloved remains were interred in the Carrington cemetery and there, enfolded in the arms of eternity, she lieth asleep, enjoying the sweet blissful repose of everlasting peace. Around that newly made mound, covered with love's token, will ever sweetly linger a halo of deep and undying love mingled with unquenchable affection.

LOONEY.

After an illness of over a year A. Looney, or "Uncle Ap" as he was familiarly known, passed from earthly to heavenly life, near Farmer, Young county, Tex., age 79 years and 5 months. He was born Oct. 17, 1822; died June 22, 1901. He was a faithful member of the Christian church nearly 50 years and a reader of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST since its publication at Kansas City. He leaves an aged wife, three sons and four daughters. He was a constant reader of the Bible and ever ready to give a reason for his faith. The writer has known him since 1847. He was a true friend, a kind husband and indulgent parent.

NICHOLS.

Died, in Sherman, Tex., Oct. 21, 1901, E. S. Nichols, at the home of his youngest daughter, Mrs. R. R. Hall. Bro. Nichols was near 80 years of age and for over 50 years an earnest follower of the Christ. Born in North Carolina, he came to Illinois in early life and settled near Coysen, Adams county. He for many years was a most efficient elder of the Christian church in that place. He moved to Texas in 1877. After the death of his beloved wife some years ago, he made his home with his youngest child, Mrs. R. R. Hall, where he fell asleep trustfully in Christ. His funeral was conducted by his pastor, Bro. Holsapple, of Sherman, and his body was laid to rest in the cemetery at Pilot Point, Tex. He leaves three sons and six daughters to mourn his departure. Truly has a good and pure man gone to his reward.

Book Notes.

We urge our friends and patrons to remember that the business of the Christian Publishing Company is by no means confined to the books which we ourselves publish, or to the works listed in our catalogues, or to those which we advertise, from time to time, in these columns. We do a general book business, and can supply, at the regular price, any book in print, no matter where or by whom published. We solicit correspondence regarding any desired volume. If you see, anywhere, an advertisement, review or notice of any book, and decide to purchase it, send your order to The Christian Publishing Company.

Elsewhere in this issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will be found an advertisement announcing a new departure in the way of communion wine. We have been selling unfermented grape juice for some years, but have been buying it in small quantities, and consequently paying a price that made it necessary for us to charge our patrons more than grape juice should cost. But we have changed all this. We have closed a contract with a large eastern house for a large quantity. It will be hotted expressly for us, and will bear our label. It is of the finest quality, and is guaranteed to keep sweet for ten years if corks are not drawn. Buying a large quantity, we secured a low price, so that we may now offer it to our patrons at a very low figure. This new wine comes in quarts, pints and half-pints, and may be purchased by the single bottle, by the half-dozen or the dozen, in either of the three sizes. We especially recommend the purchase of a dozen bottles at once. Each dozen is specially packed in a separate case. At our new price, it is better to buy communion wine from us than to make it at home. Prices will be found in our advertisement on another page.

We are already preparing to print the second edition of the Witness of Jesus, the first edition being almost exhausted. There has been a gratifying demand for this book. The book has sold both because of the intrinsic merits of its contents, and because of the widespread esteem and regard felt for the author, the late Alexander Procter. From all sides come words of high praise from those who have read the work. The low price of $1.25 puts this truly great volume within the reach of every one.

Less than two months until Christmas! It is high time your Sunday-school was beginning to prepare whatever celebration or program it purposes to give. We strongly urge upon the attention of our patrons a splendid new Christmas concert exercise, the very latest addition to our list—The Dear Christ Child, by H. P. Danks. It is just what you want if you are looking for something good and something new. Price, five cents per copy, fifty cents per dozen, $3 per hundred. Send five cents for a sample copy.

Do you wish to prepare a program for a Thanksgiving service for the Sunday school? If so, send for The Harvest Home, by W. W. Dowling. It is a Thanksgiving service, without music. Price, five cents per copy, fifty cents per dozen, three dollars per hundred.

Although the Christian Publishing Company has now one of the largest press rooms in St. Louis, we realize that we must soon enlarge our space and secure additional presses. We now have seven cylinder presses at work and these are so crowded that it is a serious problem how to get all our work done. We do no outside work. Our presses print only our own publications. The people are ordering books almost faster than we can print them.

There is a healthy demand now for Christian Endeavor supplies, and this indicates that the societies are properly equipping themselves for aggressive work. We have all C. E. supplies in stock. We have a fine assortment of pins and badges, in silver and gold. Every Christian Endeavorer who is not ashamed of his connection with the society should wear the badge.

The sale of The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century is increasing in a most gratifying manner. This is a book that will steadily increase in popularity as its real worth comes to be known. As the only real history of the Disciples of Christ, it should be in every home among us, and should be carefully read and studied by every Disciple who loves the cause of which he is—presumably, at least—an advocate. Price, $2.

There is one branch of our book business which has always been disappointing, and that is the sale of tracts. We do not sell one-tenth of what we ought to sell. The Disciples of Christ have an excellent list of tracts and pamphlets, of which we publish by far the greater part. These tracts (costing from 25 cents per hundred to 25 cents each) should be scattered broadcast. Every church should buy tracts as regularly and certainly as it buys hymn books. See the price list on pages 60, 61 and 62 of our catalogue.

We beg our patrons to exercise the greatest care in ordering song books. Do not, for example, write simply: "Send one dozen Gospel Calls, with bill, and I will remit." We get that kind of an order every day, and we always have to send it back. Why? Because there are six different editions of the Gospel Call, and we cannot know which is desired unless we are informed by the purchaser. There are three editions of Popular Hymns No. 2, and the same number of Silver and Gold. Always state just what you want, and we will get it to you as soon as possible.

FREE!

That prospective purchasers may know, before sending their order, just what they are buying, we have prepared, for free distribution, an eight-page folder telling all about that magnificent work—The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century. This folder contains a great deal of information. Even if you do not intend to buy the book at the present time, send for this folder. It will interest you, we promise, and all that it will cost you is the one cent that you pay for a postal card on which to write your request.

LITERATURE AND LIFE.

LIFE comes before literature, as the material always comes before the work. The hills are full of marble before the world blooms with statues. The forests are full of trees before the sea is thick with ships. So the world abounds in life before men begin to reason and describe and analyze and sing, and literature is born. The fact and the action must come first. This is true of every kind of literature. The mind and its workings are before the metaphysician. Beauty and romance antedate the poet. The nations rise and fall before the historian tells their story. Nature's profusion exists before the first scientific book is written. Even the facts of mathematics must be true before the first diagram is drawn for their demonstration. To own and recognize this priority of life is the first need of literature. Literature grows feeble and conceited unless it ever recognizes the priority and superiority of life, and stands in genuine awe before the greatness of the men and of the ages which have simply lived.

Important Notice!

After much experience and careful deliberation we deem it necessary to announce a change of policy in regard to subscriptions to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Heretofore we have followed the general custom of publishers of religious journals by continuing the paper to the subscriber unless orders to the contrary were received. This has been done by us because it was the generally accepted way, and because we hoped to accommodate our subscribers by so doing. It has resulted not only in considerable financial loss to us, but, what is more regretted by us, our purpose has sometimes been misunderstood. What we intended as a kind consideration towards our patrons has not infrequently been regarded as an attempt to impose upon them

We have given the subject much thought, and have, we believe, devised a method by which those who need a little time for payment of the subscription price may be indulged, and those who prefer the strictly cash in advance or discontinue policy may also be pleased.

Beginning with the new year, we will notify, some weeks in advance, those whose subscriptions expire with the month in which the notice is sent, to either remit the amount necessary for another year's subscription, or, if it is not convenient at that time, to fill out and sign an order for the continuance of the paper, with a promise to pay at some definite date within the year.

Suitable blanks for using either of these ways of renewing subscriptions will be inclosed with the notice. If neither is returned before the date of expiration, the paper will be promptly discontinued. We ask the hearty co-operation of all friends of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST in this effort to place subscription matters upon a mutually satisfactory basis.

Subscribers who are at present in arrears should, if possible, arrange to pay before January 1, 1902, or, if that is not convenient, let them write to us, and we will send one of the blanks referred to, which they may fill, sign and return. When these promissory orders are received subscription will be credited on our mailing list, and the orders filed for collection at the time they fall due.

Under this plan subscribers will have the privilege of paying at the time of the year most suited to their circumstances, arrearages will not swell to burdensome proportions, no one will receive the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST unless it has been definitely ordered, and the publishers, because of prompt payment, will be enabled to furnish a better paper to the readers. Some confusion may result during the time of transition from the one policy to the other. We shall exercise care to avoid mistakes, but if any should occur we ask our patrons to promptly call our attention to them, that we may make correction.

CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING COMPANY.

A SERMON OUTLINE

THEME

OUR SPECIAL RATE OF ONE DOLLAR.

WE WILL TREAT THE SUBJECT UNDER THREE HEADS AS FOLLOWS:

FIRST—New Subscribers may secure THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for one year by remitting ONLY ONE DOLLAR.

SECOND—Old Subscribers with subscription PAID TO JAN. 1, 1902, OR BEYOND may have subscription extended one year by paying ONLY ONE DOLLAR.

THIRD—Those in Arrears may pay to Jan. 1, 1902, at regular rates and send ONLY ONE DOLLAR for the year 1902.

(A) The first division of our subject may be explained and emphasized by means of sample copies, exhibits of what THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for 1902 is to be (we will furnish printed folders on application), and by impressing upon the prospective subscribers the necessity of a Christian paper in the home. It should be further urged that the paper be the very best obtainable, which is another way of indicating THE CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST.

(B) Such homely admonitions as "A word to the wise is sufficient," "Make hay while the sun shines," "Now is the accepted time," "Opportunity has a forelock but no back hair," etc., may be used to illustrate and fix the importance of the second division.

(C) The third division naturally suggests a reference to the Twentieth Century and the awfulness of lingering in a century from whence one's friends and associates have departed. The Scripture admonition to "owe no man anything" may be used effectively.

CONCLUSION—Sin not away the day of grace. Accept the present opportunity. Now is THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE.

The children and young people will be delighted with these books. They will help to pass many a long autumn or winter evening. Better still, they will impart much information about Bible history. It is sometimes difficult to get boys and girls to study the Bible, directly, but there will be no trouble getting them to read these interesting stories.

COMMUNION WINE

We are glad to be able to announce to our readers that we have just closed a contract with one of the largest grape-juice establishments in the United States, which will enable us to supply our patrons with a much better quality of unfermented grape-juice than we have hitherto sold, at a much lower price than has been asked.

This grape-juice is bottled especially for us and bears our label. It is intended for use in the Communion Service, and also for medicinal use. Pure grape-juice, such as this that we offer, is a most excellent drink for invalids, for convalescing fever patients, for children, etc., etc. Care should be taken, however, to avoid the many impure and adulterated brands of grape-juice now on the market.

PRICES. The prices we quote are for goods sent by express, not prepaid. We have put the prices as low as possible, that every church may be able to secure this non-intoxicating wine—the only wine that should be used in the celebration of the Lord's death. We especially urge patrons to buy in dozen lots. The price is less, the cost of transportation is proportionately less, and the trouble of frequent ordering is avoided. This grape-juice will keep in perfect condition for ten years.

Current Events.

Salisbury's Apologia. At the Lord Mayor's banquet on Nov. 9, the Prime Minister, according to ancient custom, made a speech surveying the condition of the country and outlining the future policy of the administration. All other topics are of minor importance, he said, in comparison with the "sad and lamentable" conflict in South Africa. But sad and lamentable as that conflict is, Lord Salisbury fails to see in it any reason for alarm or any occasion for criticism of the government. He congratulates England that the European powers have all maintained a "correct attitude" of neutrality and non-interference, as they could not have been trusted to do fifty years ago. He tried to be cheerful in his comments on the present state of the conflict with the Boers, and held that the continuance of guerrilla warfare was neither a strange nor a discouraging fact. He showed that a war is always lengthy when one of the combatants refuses to come to terms after its seat of government has been captured. This obstinacy on the part of the Boers seems to strike the Prime Minister as an unjustifiable violation of the rules of the game, as if a chess-player should refuse to allow a piece to be taken from the board after his opponent had properly captured it. Unfortunately, this parallel does not hold in the minds of the Boers, who consider war not as a game but as a means of maintaining those conditions which they consider essential to an honorable political existence. Lord Salisbury says there is no ground for supposing that the British army is not making satisfactory progress against its guerrilla adversaries. In view of the dispatches from South Africa during the last few weeks, it is evident that the Premier is more easily satisfied than the general mass of the British public.

The New Prince of Wales. King Edward, who has a reputation among his admirers for doing everything exactly at the psychological moment when it will be most effective, waited until his own birthday to confer upon the heir apparent, the Duke of York, the title of Prince of Wales. Now it has been done, and the title which belonged to Albert Edward so long that it can scarcely be dissociated from him in the minds of the present generation, is now worn by his eldest son. Beginning with Edward II., who was made Prince of Wales in infancy by his crafty father in response to the demand of the Welsh people for a prince who could not speak a word of English, for six centuries the heir apparent to the British throne has borne this title. It is, by the way, exactly six hundred years since the title was formally conferred for the first time, that event occurring in 1301. King Edward VII.

is now sixty years old and, with no desire to bring up against him the sins of his youth, for which he may be penitent, it may be said that he has not led a life conducive to longevity. The new prince, who has just completed a seven-months' tour around the world, will not have to wait as long for the regal and imperial position to which he is heir as his father did before him.

The Schley Inquiry. The patient public will be glad to know that the naval court of inquiry has finished its hearings in the Schley case. The evidence is all in, the attorneys have made their final speeches and the case is in the hands of the court. In his closing speech Judge Advocate Lemly, representing the navy department, stated that the charge against Admiral Schley is not cowardice but disobedience to orders and unnecessary delay in action—in short, "unsteadiness in purpose and in push." The battle of Santiago, says Lemly, was a captains' fight; Schley's vessel did its good share of the work, but there was such a lack of prearranged plan and of what in foot-ball would be called "team play" that the credit for the victory belongs to the individual captains rather than to the commander of the squadron. The trial lasted forty days and its printed record will fill 2,000 pages. It is not to be expected that Admiral Dewey and Rear-Admirals Ramsey and Benson will be able to formulate a judicial opinion in a hurry on this mass of evidence. They will hold a two-and-a-half-hour session every day and can take all the time they want. The country can wait.

The Death of Li Hung Chang, the greatest Chinese statesman of the past century and one of the ablest men that the Orient has ever produced, died Nov. 7. In spite of increasing feebleness, he continued to take a leading part in the negotiations with the Powers, and it is even said that his death was hastened by a quarrel with the Russian Minister, which threw him into a violent passion and brought him to his deathbed. This may or may not be true. There was such a quarrel, however, the day before Earl Li's death over the publication of the terms of the treaty regarding Manchuria. The aged statesman's fellow-countrymen—from the Emperor, whose chief counselor he was, down to the common people, from whose ranks he rose—have faithfully observed toward him all the post mortem courtesies which Chinese ingenuity can devise and which Chinese etiquette approves. Whole herds of paper horses have been burned to convey his spirit to its blest abode, and tons of choice food have been provided to furnish it refreshments upon the journey. He will be buried in the lacquered teakwood coffin which he carried with him around the world and has since kept ready in a convenient place. He will be succeeded as Viceroy of Chili province by Yuan Shi Kai, who has been keeping the peace in the unruly province of Shan-tung and whom the foreign ministers regard as a man of great ability and high character. We publish elsewhere in this paper an article on Li Hung Chang by a writer whose long residence in China renders his opinion on all Chinese questions valuable. The article was written before the death of Li Hung Chang and is not a eulogy. Perhaps it will be found the more accurate on that account. Whatever may have been the quality of Li Hung Chang's patriotism, there is no question of his ability or of his scholarship according to Chinese standards. It is questionable, however, whether the acquisition of his immense fortune could be accounted for creditably. It is significant that one of his maxims was: "With money you can move the gods; without money you cannot even move a man."

The Next Pope. Although Pope Leo has been so often reported dying that rumors to that effect are now seldom taken seriously, yet one must remember that he is ninety-one years old and, in the course of nature, the end is to be expected at almost any time. A well authenticated report that Cardinal Svempa, archbishop of Bologna, is on his deathbed, arouses renewed speculation as to the next incumbent of the papacy, for Mgr. Svempa was one of the most promising candidates for the office. The youngest of the cardinals who are considered eligible, he was far enough removed from liberalism to be an acceptable candidate to the dominant wing of the Catholic Church—the reactionaries who still clamor for temporal sovereignty and will not make friends with the house of Savoy because it has usurped "the patrimony of Peter"—and was at the same time less intolerant in spirit than some who still remain in the race with a brighter prospect of victory for his taking off. It is, of course, certain that the next pope will be an Italian. The present college of cardinals, by whom the pope will be elected, contains a clear majority of Italians. It is not reasonable to suppose that the foreign members, whose interests are diverse, many of whom are not even acquainted with each other and some of whom will be too far away to attend the conclave, will be able to unite and win enough Italian cardinals to raise their minority to the requisite two-thirds. Moreover, the college of cardinals is marked by a reactionary spirit—a sort of old-school torism—which, while it is rather conventional and collective than sincere and individual, is never so strong as when sitting in conclave for the election of a pope. That reactionary spirit finds its most important expression in an undying hatred and scorn of the present Italian government, built as it is upon the ruins of the papal state. While this feeling is uppermost, it is scarcely conceivable that a non-Italian can be trusted to fulfill the functions of pope, the chief of which is to cherish this grudge against the house of Savoy. How well Leo fills the bill in this particular may be appreciated by remembering that, when King Humbert was assassinated sixteen months ago, no word of sympathy or regret escaped his lips, and that the aged pontiff, himself tottering upon death's threshold, even took pains to condemn the widowed queen's funeral prayer as "contrary to the liturgy."

The Fall of Tammany. Of all possible events in the field of American politics, none could have caused such unanimous satisfaction to all the decent people in the country as the defeat of Tammany and Croker in New York. The union of the Fusionists was complete. With Seth Low at the head of their ticket and both Democrats and Republicans represented upon it, there could be no question of partisanship in the campaign. It was a plain case of decency versus indecency—and decency won. Tammany got absolutely nothing—not even coroner. It is reported that Croker has resigned his leadership of the Tammany forces and will spend the remainder of his days at his English estate at Wantage, where his villa defiles the very spot where King Alfred's palace stood a thousand years ago. The late King Alfred is not more politically dead than Mr. Croker, whose erstwhile allies have now turned against him as the cause of their defeat, and the foundation of all their woes. With Seth Low as mayor and Justice Jerome as district attorney, New York has every prospect of enjoying a municipal regeneration which for suddenness and completeness will be almost without a parallel. Mr. Low is pre-eminently a business man. After being graduated from Columbia University in 1870 at the age of 20, he entered his father's large business house. As mayor of Brooklyn he put the city government on a business basis and managed it as carefully and economically as if it had been a stock company and he himself the chief stockholder. When called to the presidency of Columbia University about fifteen years ago, it was not on his reputation as a scholar or a pedagogical specialist, but as an administrator, and the prosperity of Columbia in his hands has vindicated the choice. He will give New York what it has not had for many years—a business administration.

An Unpopular Candidate. One of the most interesting and least admirable characters in Rome at the present time is Cardinal Rampolla, papal secretary of state and the constant attendant and adviser of the Pope. He is perhaps the only Italian prelate whose name is generally known in this country, and while there are few who desire to see him succeed Leo XIII., there are many who think of him in that connection. No better description of this precious prelate can be given than that which Signor R. de Cesare, a member of the Italian Chamber of Deputies, puts into these frank words in the North American Review: "He is a skillful flatterer of the Pope. For fourteen years he has watched the increasing senility of Leo XIII. and the decay of his will, and has gradually attained his present position, above all maintaining the Pope in sentiments of hostility toward Italy. But the supreme power of Cardinal Rampolla, in which he may be said to be unsurpassed, lies in dissimulation. He simulates modesty, and he is haughty; he simulates gentleness, and nobody can move him; he simulates charity, and it is useless to have recourse to him for charitable objects. He receives about 100,000 lire ($20,000) yearly from various sources, holding the most lucrative post in the ecclesiastical hierarchy. He is a man without friendships, emotions or impulses of generosity or affection." The same writer assures us that this cardinal has no chance of election to the papacy, for, while some fear and flatter him, most hate him and all factions would unite to oppose him as a candidate. Leo XIII. is now older than any pope has ever been, and older than any living cardinal, bishop or prelate—perhaps older than any living priest. The length of his pontificate now exceeds that of any of his predecessors, with three exceptions, and two of these will be surpassed if he lives a year longer. The cardinals elect the pope, and the pope fills vacancies in the ranks of the cardinals as they occur. In view of the fact that there remain but three who participated in the conclave which elected him twenty-three years ago, the others being all his own appointees, it may soon be in order for Leo to issue a commemorative medal, as Urban VIII. did under similar circumstances, with the inscription: "You have not chosen me, but I have chosen you."

Elections Elsewhere. The elections of last Tuesday held in eleven states resulted in few surprises. In Pennsylvania the Fusionists paid the penalty for their failure to unite more thoroughly, and the Quay-Ashbridge Republican machine did not receive the full weight of the censure which it deserved. Maryland went Democratic by a narrow margin, which probably means the return of Gorman, an astute but discredited politician, to the United States senate. Virginia and Mississippi were, of course, easily Democratic. Kentucky elected a legislature which will choose a Democratic United States senator. The chief Democratic disappointment was the loss of Nebraska, which went Republican by about 10,000. Massachusetts gave Crane (Rep.) 70,000 majority, a slight decrease over the presidential year; Iowa gave Cummins (Rep.) about 89,000; and Ohio re-elected Gov. Nash (Rep.) by 60,000, and a legislature which will return Foraker to the senate.

The President on Trusts. It has come to be generally believed that in his message to Congress next month President Roosevelt will make some specific recommendations for anti-trust legislation. His letter accepting the nomination as governor of New York, his message to the New York legislature and his speech at Minneapolis a few days before the assassination of President McKinley, all indicate that, while there is no danger that he will advocate radical anti-capitalist measures, he realizes the gravity of the situation which industrial combinations have brought about. He has more than once recommended the publicity cure as being the simplest and most effective means of curbing those trusts which grow rich on watered stock. At any rate it will be seen that he does not share Senator Hanna's famous opinion that "there are no trusts." It is just possible that he may not be able to see eye to eye with the Republican leaders regarding this matter, but no one doubts that he will in any case proceed without hesitation or embarrassment to recommend such anti-trust legislation as seems to him expedient, whatever the party leaders may think about it.

A Natural Wonder. This country of ours is rich in natural wonders and curiosities already, and if recent reports from Alaska be true, their number has been added to by the discovery of a buried forest. This natural wonder is located at the mouth of Turner's Creek in the Kaugarok district. Great trees one hundred feet long have been uncovered, some in an excellent state of preservation, and others badly decayed. The most of the trees resemble the famous redwood of California, and are very large. There are many evidences that Alaska once enjoyed a tropical or semi-tropical climate. In the buried forest have been found elephant tusks, mammoth bones and traces of many tropical animals. Alaska, during the past few years, has become the land of wonders. Not one-tenth of its area has yet been at all thoroughly explored, and there is no prophesying what may yet be found within its borders.

The Fog in London. London had a fog last week that was like the Egyptian plague of darkness. Business and society both stopped and waited for a change in the wind. People were lost within a square of their own homes, unable to see far enough to recognize the most familiar landmarks. Policemen wandered vaguely about, seeking in vain for their beats and unable to do anything when they found them. Pedestrians were trodden upon by horses which were invisible alike to their victims and their drivers.

Turkey Pays. Turkey has paid up. Shortly after the French fleet arrived at Mitylene and it became evident that the admiral meant business, a draft was sent to the proper party for the amount of the French claims. Diplomatic relations have now been resumed and the flag is again flying over the French embassy in Constantinople. The methods of American "shirtsleeve diplomacy" are the only sort that can take effect on the wily Sultan.

The census report for the past decade in some respects has been quite full. A recent bulletin contains some very valuable information. It shows that there are 39,059,242 males in the United States and 37,244,145 females. This gives 512 males and 488 females to each 1,000 of the population. There are 1,815,097 more males in this country than females.

"Our Plea for Union and the Present Crisis."

Eternal vigilance is said to be the price of liberty. It is no less the price of every great undertaking that proposes to benefit mankind. Every contribution, whether from a friendly or unfriendly source, which points out certain wrong tendencies in our movement for the restoration of the catholicity and unity of the New Testament Church deserves our candid consideration. This is especially true if the contribution emanates from one within the movement itself, who is in thorough sympathy with its aims and principles.

The work, the title page of which is above given, may be said to be timely, in that it deals with one of the most pressing problems before the religious world to-day. That it is thoughtful, that its literary style is admirable and its spirit commendable, are qualities that would be expected in a work from the pen of its accomplished author. From what we have said above it is not to be inferred that the book is devoted wholly or mainly to pointing out weak spots in our ecclesiastical or theological armor. Its main object is quite different. It aims to point out the true pathway to the success of our movement, but in doing so the author is compelled to point out certain dangerous tendencies which are to be guarded against. With almost everything that is said of this character we are in hearty accord. The last chapter in the "Old Faith Restated," published ten years ago, covers much of the same ground gone over in the present work. That there have been and are manifestations of the sectarian spirit among us, even as among others, no one will deny. That there has been a failure, in many cases, in local communities, to emphasize and to give credence and power to our plea for Christian union, by abstaining from co-operation in united efforts for evangelistic purposes and for the promotion of civic righteousness, is also true. It must be confessed that we have preached Christian union more faithfully than we have practiced it. This is only saying, however, that it is easier to preach than to practice. We have suffered, too, from a sort of provincialism, not uncommon in other religious bodies, growing out of our inevitable separation from other religionists under our present system of denominationalism. Many among us have failed to take note of the progress which has been made in other religious bodies and to give them credit for teaching and practicing many things which we have felt in the past to be peculiar to ourselves. There is far greater unity of thought, even, to say nothing of faith, among religious people in this country to-day, than is imagined by the average member of any religious body. One of the most important steps, and one of the most essential, too, in the direction of Christian union, is the frank recognition of the unity which already exists, and the utilization of such unity to the fullest extent possible.

Prof. Willett believes that as a religious movement we are at a crisis in our history. "There are three periods in the history of any movement that comes to prominence as a promoter of an idea. There is first, the period of its inception and early growth, when it first takes form as a statement of truth, and makes its appeal for support. . . During this period the influence of the original idea is strong and those who enter the circle are likely to be attracted by the dominant principle. The mere matter of forming an organization is secondary." Later on the necessity of organization becomes apparent, and "then comes most naturally the passion for growth. The development of the organism is the prevailing concern. This is accomplished by the uplifting of the watchwords with which the movement started, but in the conduct of the most active and zealous representatives there may be detected a growing zeal for the organization, as such, and a lessening of emphasis upon the first purposes of the enterprise." The third period, which the author thinks now confronts us, and which is a moment of critical importance, is when the movement chooses between supreme devotion to the organization, as such, and a revival of its zeal for its original purposes and directing the power of the organization to their accomplishment. "We stand, therefore, at the opening of the third period of our history. Before us open two paths. The one is the way of true success. It can only be entered by taking earnest heed to the things which we have heard from the fathers lest we drift away from them." The two paths, as we understand the author, are, first, the effort to build up a strong organization, animated by the usual party spirit and party pride, and using the watchwords of the fathers, without their spirit, to accomplish that end. The other path is making the organization subordinate to the great purposes for which we came into existence, namely: the promotion of union on the apostolic basis.

We cannot agree with the author, that we have not yet passed this crisis. There may have been a time in our history when that was an open question, and when there was danger of our crystallizing into a mere sect, but we believe that we have passed that critical period where was the parting of the ways, and that we have already entered upon the true path which the author indicates. We do not mean by this that all of us have done so, but that the leading, representative and controlling minds of the brotherhood, backed up by the sympathy and support of the best churches, are thoroughly committed to the program outlined by the fathers, of bringing about Christian unity on the New Testament basis. They are also committed to the policy and principle of recognizing the Christian character and worth of the various Christian bodies about us, and of co-operating with them in all practicable ways in efforts for the conversion of men and for the promotion of social righteousness.

As we see it the danger-point was passed when there came to be among our men of "light and leading" the spiritual breadth and insight to recognize as Christian churches, with greater or less degree of error in teaching and practice, the great evangelical bodies about us, and to see that the Christian Church includes millions of consecrated workers who do not follow with us, nor with each other, but who, to the best of their knowledge and ability, are seeking to follow Christ and to do His will. With this conception of the religious world and of our relation to it, our plea for Christian union on the broad New Testament basis has a meaning and significance which it could not otherwise possess. With the contrary idea—that we alone constitute the Church of Christ—the plea for Christian union has no meaning.

Touching the relation of the ordinances to the question of Christian union, we are glad to note the following statement: "We cannot disregard them, nor change them, nor empty them of their significance without being wiser than our Master and thus failing to catch His spirit, which is the essence of the Christian life." To this, however, the following sentence is added, which admits of an interpretation which we can most heartily endorse whatever may be its intended significance: "But that very spirit will lead us to speak concerning them the truth in love, and to believe that every man must be fully persuaded in his own mind regarding these as other elements of Christian teaching, that we are not the keepers of our brothers' consciences," etc. This of course, but we must be "keepers" of our own consciences, and must not act in disregard of the consciences of our brethren when our action affects their religious position. No one enters an organization, human or divine, on his own terms, but on the terms prescribed by the organization itself, if it be human, or if it be divine, by divine authority. We must carefully discriminate between the question of personal liberty, on the one hand, to which every one has a right, and the liberty of an organization to be loyal, in its organic capacity, to its organic law. It is not, as the author states in another place, that those who insist on maintaining the ordinances as they were delivered unto us "feel that they themselves are responsible for the conduct of their brethren in the matter of baptism," but it is a question of feeling themselves responsible for maintaining the conditions of membership imposed by inspired authority, as the basis on which the brethren of any congregation have come into mutual fellowship with each other, and with Jesus Christ. That is the reason why "we cannot discard them, nor change them, nor empty them of their significance without being wiser than our Master."

What we need to-day is patience, not only with our religious neighbors, but with ourselves. We must not undertake to hasten Christian union by artificial methods. It must come as the result of growth. All of us who name the name of Christ must walk in the light as He gives us to see the light. Nothing is gained by compromises which surrender any doctrine, duty or ordinance that has divine sanction. We must be magnanimous enough, and large enough, to co-operate with each other while permitting each other to be loyal to the truth, as God has enabled each to see the truth. In no other way can that larger and closer unity come, which we believe to be a possibility of the future. When that unity comes, then, of course, our separate existence will cease. Our separate existence, we say, but not our existence, for we shall be a part of the united church and shall have our work to do, with the rest of our brethren, in bringing the world to the feet of Christ.

*By Herbert L. Willett, Christian Century Co., Chicago, 1901.

Practical Christianity.

It is a fact worth thinking about that the emphasis which we ordinarily lay upon the various phases of the religious life is not at all accurately adjusted to their relative importance. It is a natural tendency of the human mind to magnify the institutional and formal, and to minimize the spiritual and essential. This often amounts to an exaltation of what should be merely a means to an end, and the neglect of the end itself. A similar perversion is seen in politics in that party loyalty which forgets that parties are at best but instruments to secure just government and comes to consider the success of the party as the ultimate desideratum. Of the same type is that denominational or congregational loyalty which is so full of zeal for the prosperity of "our church" that it forgets that even a church is not an end in itself, but a means to an end—the saving of human souls, the blessing and enrichment of human life and the glorification of our heavenly Father through the more perfect performance of His will by His children upon earth.

During his earthly ministry, our Savior taught that love toward God and man and the expression of that love through deeds of benevolence to the needy, were of the very essence of true religion. These things are not means to an end, but are themselves an end, the value of which is recognized by all right-minded men. We are not in danger of thinking too much of increasing the numerical strength of the church or of the maintenance of public worship or of those forms of "church work" which consist merely in keeping the plant in good working order. But we think far too little of those other matters which constitute the real work for which the church was instituted. (A congregation which merely keeps up its organization, pays its debts, maintains agreeable public services and has the usual number of committees looking after matters of internal administration, may pass for a live church; but its condition is like that of a mill which keeps up a ceaseless clatter of machinery, with whirling of wheels and creaking of belts, but grinds no grist. A church is no more an end in itself than a mill is. Neither exists for the purpose of self-perpetuation. Both must find their justification in their product.) The products of the church are men and women who have been turned from the love and pursuit of evil things to the love and pursuit of good things, who have developed into robust, cultured and unselfish Christian characters, which find expression in deeds of benevolence.

Benevolence, then, in its largest sense, is what the church exists for. It is not an after-thought or an elective, but the main point. In its broadest sense such benevolence includes all efforts to benefit others by preaching the gospel, by Christian education and otherwise. In its more ordinary sense, it includes practical loving-kindness toward those who have been unfortunate in worldly estate.)

It will not be questioned that the Disciples of Christ have fallen short of their duty as regards benevolence in the narrower sense. Our Board of Ministerial Relief and the Benevolent Association of the Christian Church are our two principal agencies in this field. Both are comparatively new and neither has more than a small fraction of the support which it should receive. The sixth annual report of the Board of Ministerial Relief shows that the relief furnished by it last year amounted to only $4,873. The receipts for the year were nearly $12,000, but a large part of this goes into the permanent fund and only the interest is immediately available.

The Benevolent Association is only now struggling into the general recognition which it deserves. The various departments of its work have often been set forth in these columns. These benevolent enterprises should be unified under a common management and should assume their place by the side of the missionary societies as a co-ordinate feature of our co-operative work.

There can be no more appropriate season than that upon which we are now entering for the consideration of this work. From Thanksgiving day until Christmas, the spirit of these two days ought to dominate the season and make Christians especially delight to minister to the necessities of the saints. President Roosevelt in his Thanksgiving proclamation reminds us that "true homage comes from the heart as well as from the lips and shows itself in deeds," and that "we can best prove our thankfulness to the Almighty by the way in which, on this earth and at this time, each of us does his duty to his fellow man." We suggest that this is an especially appropriate season at which to remember the orphans and the aged, and we are sure that donations of supplies suitable for Thanksgiving dinners (or of cash, which never comes amiss) would be gratefully received at the Christian Orphans' Home, 915 Aubert Ave., St. Louis.

The special day for Ministerial Relief is the third Lord's day in December of which we shall again take occasion to remind our readers.

Notes and Comments.

In his memorial sermon on Dr. Gray, editor of the Interior, whose death has been announced in these columns, Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis said:

Many of us have marveled that through these thirty years he could continue his work without discouragement and with such boundless hope and tireless enthusiasm. For the editor's reward is not like the reward of the pastor. The preacher's recompense comes daily. Often while he interprets the Truth Divine, he beholds the transformation of that truth, sees the good seed accomplishing that for which God sent it, beholds bad men become good, good men become better, and the best men in their pews come up to the stature of heroes and saints. But the work of the religious editor is done largely in silence. He speaks the truth and no response returns. He opens his hand and sows the seed and then journeys on, leaving the seed behind. He must trust God's angels to water it with their influence, to put in the sickle, and count the ripe bundles.

Little did Dr. Gray know of the high esteem in which he was held as an editor, as that esteem is expressed by all schools of thought in this memorial number of the Interior. Speaking of Dr. Gray's capacity for continuous growth Dr. Hillis said:

All these gifts had their consummation in the something that made him grow like a boy intellectually and morally until the very day of his death. When Christ was on earth he set a child in the midst of his disciples, and in the teachableness of the child, in its trustfulness and in its capacity for growth, he discovered the three characteristics of the sons of God. Dr. Gray remained until threescore years and ten, teachable—most teachable, trusting both his fellows and nature and God, and growing—growing by leaps and bounds to the very end. After all, this capacity for late growth is the evidence of the first sign of greatness. Small men never change their opinions. Nature makes them stubborn, too, as a compensation for their littleness. But for this stubbornness through their slender intellectual equipment they would perish.

It is impossible to tell a one or two talent man any new truth, impossible to give him any new inspiration. Not understanding, he calls his incapacity for change, stability, yet this stubbornness is a means of protection. But a great man is confident of his resources. He can change. Gladstone can afford to be a Tory one year and a Liberal the next. He knows that fresh light is breaking forth from God's word and world. He understands that it is the statesman's duty to simply keep step with the forward march of God and translate each new great truth into new laws that register the progress of Providence.

Once I said to Dr. Gray, "You held different views last year." "Certainly I did last year. And I believed that last year. But you don't suppose that an apple in August tastes the same that it did in June. The reason I don't repeat that statement to-day is because I don't believe it to-day."

It is pleasant to believe that his growth will go on, unimpeded, forever.

The Lake Mohonk Indian Conference which for nineteen successive years has considered the Indian problem this year took on a somewhat larger scope. In a speech by Dr. Lyman Abbott he stated that "our problem is essentially the same for the Indian, the African, the immigrant, the Porto Rican, the Hawaiian and the Filipino, and our duties are (1) so long as we govern an inferior people to govern them in their interest not ours; (2) to give these people law and not hold them outside of law; (3) to secure them their proper right in lands; (4) to provide for the education at public expense of all the children of these dependent people; (5) to carry to these people the pure gospel and to teach them who God really is." This seemed to be the keynote of the conference. There were about 200 invited guests from every part of the land and the hosts were the two brothers, A. K. and Daniel Smiley, to whose philanthropy and generosity this conference owes its existence and success. There is talk that the name of this conference will be changed from the "Indian Conference" to a "Conference on the Race Problems of the United States."

The American Missionary Association of the Congregational Church was held at Oak Park, Ill., recently. In spite of other important gatherings of that body, such as the American Board, The National Council, etc., in the east, the attendance was good, and the interest seems to have been very deep. The first meeting of this association was held in the fall of 1846, fifty-five years ago. Its principal work has been among the colored people in the south, but it has also carried on work among the Indians, the Chinese, the Highlanders and in Alaska and Porto Rico. The association during the first quarter of its existence received a half million dollars. In the second, $2,690,000, in the third, $3,170,000 and in the last,

$4,740,000, and these receipts do not include the $1,400,000 received and set apart as the Daniel Band Fund. Congregationalists have been among the most active and generous in their work among the colored people of the south, and other dependent peoples. The association certainly has not only a wide but a Christlike mission, and the liberal support which it has received in this work is highly creditable to the body which it represents.

It is easy to underestimate the value and force of what is sometimes called "formal membership" in the church. It is sometimes asked, why withhold "formal membership" from certain persons, who are admitted to the communion and to the other parts of the public worship? As Isaac Errett once said, because it is the formal part of their obedience that is lacking. Dr. Pentecost found the high caste natives of India ready enough to attend his meetings and even to confess their belief in Christ, but they drew back from baptism, as it was that decisive act that caused them to lose their caste. This was burning the bridges behind them, and they were not ready for that. Dr. Pentecost argued that for this reason baptism should not be insisted on, in such cases. Was he right in this? Not if the apostles were guided by the spirit of Christ in their ministry. They offered no compromises to those who desired to be Christians without taking up their cross daily and following Him. "Formal membership" without the spirit, is, indeed, a poor, worthless thing; but as a consummation of the soul's desire and purpose, it is not to be lightly considered or treated.

Referring to Dr. Parker's effort to bring about in England what he would call "The United Congregational Church," the Standard, of Chicago, says that "the time may come when even we shall demand, not a 'United Baptist Church,' but a 'Baptist Union of the United States,' or even of the north and west, which shall have advisory, though not compulsory power, in certain matters affecting the common interests of us all." It thinks that the name "Baptist Congress" might have been suitable enough for such a body, but for the fact that it had been adopted by "a very respectable and useful free debating society whose annual sessions call together some of our more scholarly pastors and professors." The Standard anticipates that there might be some objection to such a scheme because of the fear of ecclesiasticism, but thinks that if there was any gain from such a federation of the churches technical quibbles might be overcome. "Talk of danger to our liberty, imposition of creeds, interference with local affairs, is shallow and unworthy of thoughtful leaders, even though it wins the applause of the galleries." It is this "applause of the galleries," however, that will probably delay such a consummation among our Baptist brethren for some time. It seems to us, however, that such a national gathering of representatives of Baptist churches throughout the country having only advisory power would be a desirable consummation. Our national conventions, aside from the missionary interests which call them together, serve to give a visible expression to our unity, and added emphasis to the work which we are seeking unitedly to accomplish. The Baptists have no one gathering which represents the entire Baptist brotherhood of the United States.

It is significant as indicating the trend in the direction of closer unity within the various religious bodies themselves, that the late meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions—the society through which the Congregational churches carry forward their world-wide evangelism—was characterized, not only by the wiping out of the indebtedness which had been an incubus upon it for some time, but by the feeling and purpose of that body to bring about a closer co-operation among its missionary organizations. We are not surprised to learn that it was recommended that the five home societies among the Congregationalists join in one annual meeting. This is certainly in the interest of economy and effectiveness. The feeling is growing among our own churches that there should be a closer co-operation between all our missionary organizations. Our national societies are working together harmoniously and hold their conventions together, but it remains to bring the various state missionary societies into closer relationship with, and probably to become parts of, the American Christian Missionary Society, so that state societies shall be auxiliary to the national society.

Editor's Easy Chair.

Who that has felt the storm and stress of life's fierce battles has not looked back wistfully to those quiet years before the din of the conflict disturbed the serenity of that earlier period? Has any one ever grown to real greatness without a time for quiet, thoughtful brooding on the mystery of life, and for severe self-questioning as to his deepest motives and purposes? Abraham found solitudes in Canaan, Moses in Horeb, Paul in Arabia, Jesus in Nazareth, and in the mountain fastnesses. The foundation of greatness is laid in the years of obscurity and quiet, and it is a great mistake for one to rush too early into the blazing light of publicity, to grapple with problems and temptations for which he may be ill prepared. Suppose fame never comes, and we toil on unknown to the world, doing our work humbly and faithfully. Is life a failure in that event? By no means. It is best so. Let a Puritan poet of the 17th century, who himself is unknown in our day, except to a very few, instruct us on this point:

"Then bless thy secret growth, nor catch
At noise, but thrive unseen and dumb.
Keep clean, bear fruit, earn life, and watch
Till the white-winged reapers come."

There is something in the sentiment of the foregoing lines of Henry Vaughan, the Puritan poet, that reminds one of those pathetic, and yet heroic, words of Louis Stevenson. Smitten with fatal disease, an exile from home in one of the small islands of the far Pacific, seeking to finish his task ere his summons should come, watching day by day the splendor of rising and setting suns, emblem of his brief day of life, he wrote:

"The morning drum-beat on my eager ear
Thrills unforgotten yet; the morning dew

Lies yet undried along my field of noon.
But now I pause, at whiles, in what I do,
And count the bell, and tremble lest I hear,
My work untrimmed, the sunset gun too soon."

Ah, how many of us there are who listen tremblingly for the sunset gun! Not that we are afraid of the night, for there is morning beyond the night, but we are afraid lest the sun go down before our task is finished. So we feel. And yet who has set our task for us? And does not He know when it is done, and when the sunset gun should signal our retirement to rest? Let us, then, only be concerned that when "the white-winged reapers come," at the sounding of the "sunset gun," they will find us with some sheaves gathered for the Master's garner.

It is one of the misfortunes of life that we fail, with our dull and prosaic eyes, to see God except in some of the far-distant and far-past events of history; or at most in only the remarkable manifestations of power in our own time. We miss much, not only of the poetry of life, but of its real significance, in thus failing to see the divine wisdom and goodness in the daily occurrences, in the common scenes and ordinary experiences of life. God would be much more in our thought, and in our hearts, too, were we to recognize Him in all we see about us. We all have reason to pray with the poet:

"Teach me, my God and King,
In all things Thee to see,
And what I do in anything,
To do it as for Thee"

When we come to see God in all things it will be much easier for us to do whatever we do as unto Him and for Him. This makes all the duties of life noble, and clothes each humble task with glory and dignity. Indeed there are no little things in this view of life, for who can tell what may be the outcome of a word fitly spoken, or a kindly deed done in His name and for His glory? A cup of cold water, given in charity, will receive its reward, as well as the great deed which challenges the admiration of our fellow men. It is not what we do so much as the spirit in which we do it, that gives our act value in the sight of God. Let us see God at work not only in nature, but in providence and in the history of our own time, and it will be easier for us to work with Him, and so work out a noble destiny.

Two things we need to run life's race successfully, and to finish our course with joy: Light, to see the way in the midst of the all-encompassing darkness, and life—the life of God in the human soul—to enable us to press on, surmounting every difficulty, and to reach the true goal. For both these precious gifts we are dependent upon God, who gives us both light and life, through Jesus Christ, His Son. He is "the way, the truth, and the life." In Him we are complete.

"Keen and intense life's race,
Sharp and severe its strife;
Lest I grow faint and slack my pace,
O Christ, be Thou my Life!"

"Dark and perplexed the way,
Hard and involved the right;
The smoke of passion clouds the day,
O Christ, be Thou my Light!"

The Floodtide of Life: Adolescence

By EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES

Human life is divided in common parlance into childhood, youth and age. The instincts characteristic of the first have been set forth, and the period of youth may be characterized as an enlargement of all the powers and talents of the individual. The period of adolescence marks the transition from childhood to manhood and extends over a period of about ten years, beginning about the age of twelve or fourteen. It varies in different races and climates and with the sexes, being earlier in the southern races and in warm climates. The importance of this period has been recognized in various ways in all nations and times. It has been celebrated by feasts and ceremonies of mystic rites. The savages give pain as a test of manhood, subjecting the youth to physical suffering, which he is expected to bear unflinchingly when at the threshold of man's estate. The Romans gave a feast, called the Liberalia, in honor of the youth's having attained his sixteenth year. In the history of the church the transition has been marked by the ceremony of confirmation, indicating the individual responsibility and new obligations which the individual assumes on his own account. In Protestant churches where confirmation is not observed, the experience of conversion is called forth by various agencies, and it is a well known fact that the majority who enter the church do so in their teens. New light has been thrown upon the phenomena of adolescence by recent studies, particularly in genetic psychology.

Characteristic Changes.

The interdependence of physical and psychological life is greatly emphasized by the investigations of this period of youth. Physiological changes may be seen in every feature and fiber. The whole form suddenly enlarges, shoulders are broadened, the height increases, in some instances as much as seven and a half inches in a single year. The larynx increases in size, the vocal organs lengthen, producing the change in the voice. The volume of the heart is correspondingly increased to supply blood for the larger body. The brain actually increases in size. New centers within it are developed and called into play in response to the new intellectual and physical demands.

The mental life becomes more active and alert. Just as the brain has developed, so the capacity for thought and for imagination is increased. The youth is possessed by new hopes and dreams and passions; his fancy and aspiration play about new ideals and conceptions of life; his social interests are aroused in an unselfish way, in striking contrast to the selfishness which usually characterizes the years of childhood. It was this new social sense which led Rousseau to remark that "Man is born twice:

once as a child of nature and once as a member of society." Not only does the youth fall in love and aspire to maintain other lives and interests than his own, but he is easily inspired by the thought of some world-wide ambition or some ideal life. It is the period at which political zeal and patriotism are most easily engendered. Soldiers who enlist in the volunteer armies are young men; not simply because older men are involved in family affairs and business, but because they are not responsive in the same measure to the ideals represented by the fortunes of war.

The Period of Doubt.

On the side of religion, the period of youth is not only the time of opportunity, but it is also the time of danger. It is characteristic of the individual to question the teaching of his childhood, and to view in an independent way the traditions and the customs which he has inherited. He seeks to satisfy his intellectual nature and to gain an answer to the profoundest questions of life. It is at this period also that philosophical interests arise and the questions concerning the nature and the value of life press in with the dawning consciousness of a larger world. In a practical way this demand for independence shows itself in the casting aside of all authority, whether in the home or the church or the school. It has been shown by actual statistics that those who leave the public schools leave them at about the age of fourteen, and the tendency is, at the same age, for the youth to begin to think of an independent career. He becomes secretive, makes confidants of his playmates, but withdraws more and more from his elders. Secret societies of various kinds allure him and unquestionably the high school and college fraternities gain their re-enforcements through his instinct for special companionship free from the restraints of supervision. It is a period at which the parents' control is tested to the extreme, and it often occurs that children who have before been amenable to parents and teachers become less communicative, and even rebellious.

The Direction of Energy.

The period of adolescence may therefore be characterized as the period of increased energy, and the future of the individual depends directly upon the turn which this energy receives at this critical point. If the youth's interest centers in physical sports, his physique may be remarkably developed, but to the neglect of the intellectual and social interests. Or, if intellectual problems possess him, the physical nature and altruistic interests may be set aside. The tendency is for special interests to absorb and carry the whole energy of this new era. It is the period at which heredity manifests itself most powerfully. Just as the individual sees the future opening before him in bright and attractive ways, so he is impelled forward from the past by ancestral traits which now assert themselves, either for the first time or with unaccustomed power. As the youth sets out to take his place in the world of social life and duties, he is unconsciously directed by forces that lie far behind him and deep within his unconscious nature. He is indeed fortunate if this revolution and new direction of interests does not carry him aside from the true ways of manhood and success. Records of crime show in a striking way how the greatest perversions of morals often arise at this turning point in life. The youthful incendiary or murderer or political fanatic takes his cue from some abnormal statement of life's ideals. It may be the extreme development of the idea of liberty, as in youthful socialists and anarchists, who recruit their numbers in the thought of some ideal condition of life which is to be attained by violence and destruction rather than through the slow processes of law.

Safeguards.

There are two ways in which the abnormal developments of adolescence may be avoided: through previous training, and through pre-occupation of the individual's interests. It is a poor policy to organize a fire department when one's house is burning down, and it is poor policy to wait until the temptations and dangers of youth reach their climax before any precautions are taken to avoid them. In the main, those who have had a childhood training in the simple and rugged virtues of honesty, industry and morality may be relied upon to pass safely the time of testing. The thoughts and feelings which have been cultivated gradually through childhood come out in larger proportions and in more strenuous moods, but, on the whole, with the same direction, so that the one who has learned to admire the best types in history and in personal relationships as a child, will be fashioned by these in the hours of storm and stress in his period of adolescence.

In order to aid the forces of right thinking and high achievement, the young man or young woman should be safeguarded by various means from the baser temptations. The home should be made attractive by social life and sports and a rich environment. The old Puritan conception of a home made it a barren place in which to grow the best type of well appointed manhood.

The Tragedy of Youth.

Many characters in literature express the aspirations or despair, the bloom of youth's hopes or the savage force of misdirected power. In the "Story of an African Farm" one sees the tragedy of a young life left to its solitude and oppressive reflections. The boy Waldo, in the dreary life of the lonely farm, broods over the Bible and the ill fate which has overtaken him, but without the insight to get comfort or encouragement either from the book or from the face of nature. Rousseau's "Confessions" reveal the turmoil and conflict of a sensitive soul under the pangs of the soul's second birth. George Eliot's Maggie Tulliver and Gwendolen Harleth represent in a more typical way the unconscious, but powerful, force of a younglover's moods.

LI HUNG CHANG

The death of Li Hung Chang, on Nov. 7, removed a man who was undoubtedly one of the ablest statesmen of the past century. In his capacity for controlling men and for carrying out his plans, Earl Li exhibited real political genius. Although he has done but little toward the introduction of modern civilization into China, his accessibility to foreigners and his unfailing interest in all their affairs, have caused him to be considered as the leader of the progressives, and as the especial friend of the foreigners.

In view of the interest aroused by his death, and the discussion which is sure to be precipitated in regard to his character, we reprint an article on Li Hung Chang which was written for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST about a year ago by F. E. Meigs, President of Christian College, Nankin, China. If its estimate of the deceased statesman's character is more critical than complimentary, it is published with no desire to revile the dead, but as a help toward the formation of a correct judgment of a character who is sure to be much talked of and much praised for some of his elements of strength.

About forty years ago there came to a close in China one of the many great rebellions which have taken place in the history of that country. Among the prominent generals of the imperial Chinese army at that time was Li Hung Chang. He was intimately associated with Gen. Charles Gordon (Chinese Gordon) during the campaign which resulted in the crushing of the rebellion. Because of the ability which he exhibited as a commander, and because the termination of the trouble was favorable to the imperial government, this man suddenly became great. He had honors showered upon him and positions of influence and power conferred while he was yet young. He was made prime minister of China while yet a comparatively young man. In China the prime minister usually has more real power than the emperor. He is the adviser of His Majesty, and his will is practically the law of the land. The emperor is an individual to be adored rather than obeyed, and the prime minister is supposed to stand between His Majesty and the common people, representing to him the conditions and needs of the people whose welfare His Majesty is supposed always to seek. It will be seen from this that the good or ill of the people is to no small degree in the hands of the prime minister.

The same was true in Japan before the adoption of constitutional government a few years ago. The power of one man to do great things for the good of his country is clearly seen in the work of Count Ito, Japan's greatest statesman. Less than forty years ago (at about the same time as the promotion of Li in China) Count Ito undertook the reconstruction, so to speak, of Japan. He is a patriot and a philanthropist. He gave himself to his country rather than to the enriching of himself and his family. How well he has succeeded, modern Japan in her rapid strides toward modern civilization, speaks in no uncertain terms. The Sunrise Kingdom must now be reckoned with, in these days, in all matters that affect the general welfare of the family of nations. To Count Ito, more than to any other internal influence, is due modern Japan. The question is frequently asked, Why is it that Japan has come to the front in such a way as to astonish the world, while China has remained in the embrace of the dark ages? I wish to answer this by saying that China has had no Count Ito.

I think that no one who will take the trouble to inform himself can doubt that at the close of the Tai Ping Rebellion just as great things were possible to China in the line of progress as to Japan at the time of the restoration. Nor do I think that such an one can doubt that anything at all possible to China could have been attained had Mr. Li been prompted by such patriotism and philanthropy as that of Count Ito. But, instead of doing as Japan's great statesman did, he evidently sought rather to enrich himself. No one doubts the ability of Mr. Li. He has been spoken of as the "Bismarck of the Orient." Gen. Grant spoke of him as "one of the three greatest statesmen of the age," classing him with Gladstone and Bismarck. He is yet spoken of by some as the "grand old man of China." At the time of his promotion to power Mr. Li, no doubt, was well informed as to the needs of China. He must have learned from his association with Gen. Gordon and the ever victorious army, that the antiquated tactics of the Chinese army must necessarily give way to modern drill. He must have been convinced that the ancient junks of the Chinese navy must give place to modern men-of-war manned with a well drilled and disciplined marine army. He must have seen that old-fashioned arms must be laid aside and modern weapons substituted therefor. He must have had impressed upon him the necessity of educational reform, of commercial expansion and of an open door. There is no doubt that he comprehended the great pretensions which he made to foreign representatives, and realized in some good degree the comprehensiveness of his promises.

Yet, what he has done or even attempted to do, has come so far short of the expectations of the civilized Powers as to cause serious doubt of the sincerity of the old man in the promises of his younger days. Since the death of Marquis Tseng, Li Hung Chang has been practically the only man in China in command of any influence abroad and, as first adviser of the Dowager Empress, almost absolute ruler at home. That he has succeeded in enriching himself is evident from the fact that he is confessedly the wealthiest man in China, and is said to be one of the wealthiest men in the world. The question as to how he could acquire such great wealth will be answered satisfactorily, if you consider that really the only means of accumulating great wealth in China is by becoming an official. The man who succeeds in getting to be an official of any considerable rank is sure of at least a competency. What, then, would be the expectations of the head of all the officials? That Li has made the best of his advantages is plain from several facts.

He had the making of China's army and navy. Millions of money was appropriated for these purposes. At the breaking out of the Chinese war with Japan it was believed by the Chinese that they had an army and navy, but in the modern sense they had neither. Japan went anywhere she pleased with very little effective resistance on the part of China. Why? Because of inferior guns and poor ammunition. The supposedly formidable fortifications proved but fragile affairs and the miserable tactics of the so-called army were an utter failure in the face of modern drill. Formidable ships of war, poorly manned, melted away before the less formidable vessels of the Japs, with modern equipment and maneuvers. What had become of the immense supplies of money which the officials had handled? It would be attributing a great deal of ignorance to Li to accuse him of not knowing the inferior character of the armament. Bismarck or Gladstone or Grant would have known. The most ignorant Chinaman knows the difference between a modern breech-loading rifle and an old-fashioned muzzle-loading iron-ramrod musket, with which the Chinese infantry was equipped in those days. It is said that these guns were bought of dealers for $2 apiece and reported at $9 apiece. That the real condition of the Chinese army was known to Li Hung Chang needs no argument in face of the numerous personal inspections he made, reports of which (now known to have been incorrect) appeared in the periodicals not only of China but of Europe and America. What became of the money appropriated for better equipment?

The fact that the emperor himself was not able to dispose of Li Hung Chang when the true state of affairs came to light, is another evidence of the firm hold he had upon the purse-strings of the country. From time immemorial it has been the custom of the Chinese government to decapitate generals who flee before the enemy or who prove recreant to their trust. All that was attempted in Mr. Li's case was the removal of his "yellow jacket." He lost very little of his real power or authority. When the time came for treating with the Japanese, Li was the only man whom the Chinese emperor could find to send on that mission. How Japan was cheated and China sold to Russia is familiar to all who know the sequel. That he now holds so prominent a position in the face of all the facts, of which the Chinese people and emperor are well aware, shows how nearly he owns China and the Chinese people. The Powers, even, suspect him now.

It will be seen that my opinion of the great statesman is that he has been a great hindrance when he might have made his country a nation among the nations of the earth. Of course, I recognize other causes of China's backwardness, but this one I believe to be the greatest of all. Nations as nations are not to be credited with an overweight of conscience in dealing with their neighbors. Their aggressions in China have been due in no small measure to China's want of push, and this want of the spirit of push is due in no small degree to the spirit of greed on the part of her officials—of whom Li Hung Chang has been chief for forty years—which has oppressed the common people. Such a career would scarcely have been possible in any civilized country.

The Coming and the Going.

I heard a mother croon to her child

A song as I wandered by,
A song that would sing the stars to sleep
In the cradle of the sky.

I saw an old man close his eyes
In restful sleep—God send
As sweet a rest for my weary frame
When I come to my journey's end.

And I thought of the years that lay between—
Of the darkness and the doubt;
But God is good—there is peace at the gate,
When a soul goes in or out.

A House to House Visitation on Saturday, Nov. 23.

By C. L. Thurgood.

A most excellent opportunity presents itself to our Endeavor societies and Bible-schools to hit the nail on the head of the world's temperance lesson of Nov. 24, by arranging for a visit to every home by the Bible-school children, backed up by the Endeavor society. There is also a movement on foot on the same day by the American Anti-Cigarette League to enlist every boy and girl to sign the A. C. L. pledge. It is also Boys and Girls' Rally Day among us as a people for state and national missions. All these movements ought to have the hearty sympathy of every Christian worker, and can be so arranged as to supplement each other, whether a temperance lesson is taught or the home missions rally exercises are given. In thousands of our schools the rally exercises will be given, and nothing should interfere to make the saving of our country from all its ills of life or errors of doctrine, most prominent.

But on Saturday, November 23, a most splendid object lesson can be given to every child over eight years of age in the school, by getting them to be little home missionaries. This can be done by enlisting them to distribute temperance pledge cards in every home in one or two blocks or squares of the town on the afternoon of that day. On the other side of this pledge card may be printed an invitation to attend church on the morrow; with a request to deposit the cards in the collection basket to be afterwards attended to by the minister and his auxiliary, the Endeavor society. Now, as many of these cards will not be returned to the church, let the little missionary patriots visit these homes again, say on the following Monday after school hours, or on the next Saturday afternoon, and gather up the delinquent cards. What a fund of information will be at the hand of a wide-awake minister in these delinquent cards. If he has graduated in the College of Soleleather and Door Knob in the University of Human Experience, he will find that these cards will prove an "Open Sesame" to many a home of sorrow or abode of need.

This plan is automatic. Any local printer can print these cards for you at the rate of say a little over a dollar a thousand, and this amount could surely be raised by the temperance committee of the Endeavor society or by the teachers of the Bible-school or the local Women's Christian Temperance Union or Alliance. There is no time to be lost, the King's business requires haste, and it behooves the Bible-school and Endeavor society at once, upon the reading of this article, to call a meeting to take steps for a simple organization to carry out the plan. Should there be a local Endeavor union this will help matters much.

At that called meeting, provision should be made for blocking out the town and printing the cards and other et ceteras that will suggest themselves. Then on Saturday afternoon the little patriots should be gathered at some central place, have their block or square of houses assigned them, then given some five or six pledge cards for every home and sent off with a prayer that in their plea for the pledge to be signed, their beautiful simplicity and earnestness may reach and touch many a heart. A pledge like the following might be printed:

PLEDGE.

I solemnly promise that I will abstain from the use of all intoxicating liquors as a beverage as long as I live, and will strive to induce others to do so.

Name.....

Address.....

Church.....

Minister.....

On the other side of the card the following might be printed:

WORLD'S TEMPERANCE SUNDAY,
Nov. 24, 1901.

YOU ARE INVITED

TO ATTEND

THE CHURCH OF YOUR CHOICE

ON TO-MORROW.

Please fill in blanks on other side, and give it to the usher or place in collection basket.

If you cannot get to church have each member of your household fill out one of these cards, and the person who left them will call for them next Saturday.

Pittsburg, Pa.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

There is a congregation of Disciples of Christ in Council Bluffs, Ia., just over the river from Omaha, served in the pastorate by W. B. Crewdson. I heard only good of Brother and Sister Crewdson and their work. There is a comfortable building in Council Bluffs, belonging to the Christian Church, that will easily accommodate, I would say, 500 persons. A debt of fifteen hundred dollars is on the property, but this the congregation, with comparative ease, cares for. Recent improvements have been made in this place of worship which make it quite comfortable and more than usually attractive. The federation of societies auxiliary to the Christian Woman's Board of Missions in Council Bluffs, Omaha and South Omaha, met with the auxiliary in Council Bluffs a few days ago. Such a meeting is held once in three months. There were between seventy-five and a hundred persons present. The program was excellent. There was missionary fire and enthusiasm in the meeting. It seemed to me that it was the best meeting of the kind I ever attended. I know that it was both pleasant and profitable to be there. A resolution was passed unanimously to take up a systematic study of world-wide missions. This was a most important step in the right direction. The missionary fire glows where the people are acquainted with missionary facts. One of the most pleasant features of this interesting meeting was the singing of Bro. and Sister Vernon C. Harrington, who are engaged in evangelistic work in Iowa.

Would it not be a good thing if the brethren would, in the congregations, organize for a systematic study of missions, meeting stately for conference concerning the spread of the gospel? Our work in this department is not as systematic and steady as it should be. The women are giving us an example in these respects that we ought not to hesitate to imitate.

As Omaha is the 1902 convention city I am sure you desire to know all that it is possible to know concerning the place and the work of the disciples in this part of the world.

The work moves on steadily and sufficiently rapidly. I chanced to hear Brother Sumner T. Martin, of the First Christian church, say that four persons united with his congregation by letter Sunday, Oct. 20. The morning of that day he asked for $75, with which to purchase hymnals and received $85. The next Lord's day four united with the church by letter and two were baptized. This congregation gave last year $700 to missions—this includes the contributions of all departments of the church. In my last letter I spoke of W. T. Hilton and his successful work in the Grant Street or North Side church. From these notes you will see that the disciples in Omaha, South Omaha and Council Bluffs, are neither dead nor dying. In fact they impressed me as being very much alive.

A union prayer-meeting is arranged for, to be held in the First church in Omaha, at which special prayers will be offered for divine guidance in preparing for the 1902 convention. All the congregations named in this letter will participate. The talks will be about the approaching convention. An executive committee will be appointed by this meeting. Before you read this letter this meeting will have been held.

A banquet was given by the Commercial Club in Omaha, in honor of the brethren who, in Minneapolis, secured the convention for Omaha next year. The daily press was fully represented at this banquet and promised to do everything possible to make the convention a success. No man in Omaha is more widely known than is the Hon. Edward Rosewater. I heard it said that it is of prime importance, in order to make any public enterprise in Omaha a success, that Mr. Rosewater should favor it. His influence is openly and enthusiastically on the side of our convention. He expressed himself clearly and eloquently on this subject in a speech during the banquet. Mr. Rosewater is not a member of the Christian Church, nor in any way that I know of connected with it. He expressed himself, however, as ready to serve on a committee and work in the interest of the convention. The president of the Auditorium Company was present and said that the auditorium will be finished in ample time for the convention. The building and grounds will cost $225,000. Ground will be broken the eighteenth day of November, and the work will be pushed to completion as rapidly as possible. This will be the finest place of meeting we have had.

The auditorium will be on Howard street between Fourteenth and Fifteenth streets, convenient to the railway stations and not far from such hotels as the Iler Grand, the Paxton, the Murray, the Millard, the Del-lone, the Merchants, the Henshaw and the Thurston.

I heard the suggestion made in Omaha that arrangements will probably be made or seating state delegations together, with appropriate banners. This is a good suggestion. Some one said: "Why not meet the delegations as they arrive at the railway stations and conduct them to the place of meeting with music and banners? Why not?" Letters are already on their way to foreign missionaries asking for seed from which flowers will be grown with which to decorate the hall and booths.

These items are sufficient to show that the Disciples of Christ, and the people generally, in Omaha, South Omaha and Council Bluffs, are preparing a royal welcome and entertainment for us next October.

Omaha is a city of churches. There are 15 congregations of Presbyterians, 15 of Methodists, 12 of Congregationalists, 9 Roman Catholic, 8 Baptist, 7 Protestant Episcopal, 2 Christian.

The city is unusually well supplied with public and semi-public libraries. There is a fine Young Men's Christian Association. There are a number of educational institutions of college grade. Much attention is given to, and pride is felt in, the public schools. Omaha, by reason of its railway and river connections, is the distributing center of a large and productive area of country. It is said that the federal government receives in internal revenue taxes annually more than $7,000,000. The population of the city at the time of the last census was more than 102,000. In 1890 it was claimed that Omaha had a population of above 140,000. I said to an old citizen of the town: "How do you explain the fact that in 1890 you had a population of 140,000 and in 1900 your population was only a little more than 102,000?" "How do I explain it?" he said, "We lied about our population in 1890 and were caught!" was his prompt reply.

The Old Book In The New Crucible

By J. J. HALEY.

X. The Crucible of Archeology.

The likeness of the Moabite to the old Hebrew was distinctly proven by an interesting discovery made in Jerusalem in 1881. It was made by some native lads who were playing in an underground canal that opened into the famous pool of Siloam, the pool where Jesus sent the blind man to wash the clay from his eyes. One of the boys while walking accidentally slipped down, and as he sought to rise to his feet again he saw on the walls some strange letters cut in the rock. He went out and reported what he had seen to his master, who seems to have been interested in Jewish antiquities. He made a copy of the inscription and sent it to England. It was, however, such an unmeaning scrawl that the scholars were unable to make anything out of it. Prof. Sayce shortly afterwards found leisure to visit Palestine, and while there he tried to clear away the deposit that had grown around the inscription, and succeeded in making a more intelligible copy of it. It was, however, left to Dr. Guthe to complete this part of the work by a chemical process. He removed the deposit of lime and revealed the clear outline of the original inscription. It was written in the purest of old biblical Hebrew, the very characters in which Isaiah wrote his prophetic pictures. It is also interesting to us because it indicates the nature of the civilization of those times. It states how this channel was cut: the workmen commenced from both ends and met together in the center; they pierced this underground canal in the same way as the modern engineers did the Mont Cenis tunnel, showing that the engineering skill of Hezekiah's time—the period when the tunnel is supposed to have been made—was of a very high order. In the tenth report of his excavations in Jerusalem, in 1896, Dr. F. J. Bliss describes his discovery of a stone stairway, which forms part of a road leading down to the city from the pool of Siloam. The steps, 34 in number, are made of well jointed stones, polished by the wearing of feet. The discovery is of interest in connection with the statement in Nehemiah 3:15, that Shallun repaired the gate of the fountain, the wall of the pool of Siloam, by the king's garden, "and unto the stairs that go down from the city of David," a scripture reference verified twenty-two centuries after it was written.

After the disruption of the kingdom came a host of other calamities—bad kings, idolatry and civic discord. In one revolution we read in the book of Kings of Jehu's being placed on the throne of Israel. Contemporary with Jehu, Shalmaneser II. ruled over Assyria, and one of the most interesting discoveries of Layard while delving in the east was a slab of black marble, commonly called "the Black Obelisk," on which is a representation of Jehu kneeling at the feet of the Assyrian monarch paying tribute. On the obelisk is also a cuneiform record stating that Shalmaneser successfully attacked Benhadad, and afterwards his successor Hazael; these men are also mentioned in the Bible as kings of Damascus, and the reference to them on the Black Obelisk, in an inscription written contemporary with them, is evidence of the historical accuracy of the book.

Layard contends that the most valuable discoveries made by him when in the east were those that record among other things the wars between Hezekiah and Sennacherib. These alone, he asserts, are ample repayment to the British nation for all that she has spent on the exploration of the site of ancient Nineveh. In the British Museum is a bas-relief, found amid the ruins of this old Assyrian capital, representing the siege of Lachish by Sennacherib. We read of this in the second book of Kings: "Now in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah did Sennacherib, King of Assyria, came up against all the fenced cities of Judah and took them." One of these was the ancient stronghold of Lachish which Joshua captured from the Amorites, and it is related in the 18th chapter that Hezekiah sent to this city to Sennacherib acknowledging his supremacy and his willingness to pay tribute to him. And just as the English have adorned Westminster Abbey with the trophies of British battles, and the French have painted on their monuments the pictures of their memorable victories, so did the Assyrian king on his return home have represented on the walls of his palace a picture of this celebrated victory. In it he is depicted sitting in his chair and receiving from the conquered Jews their tribute. Thus in a very remarkable way is the record of sacred history corroborated. There is also in the British Museum a six-sided cylinder on which are written the annals of Sennacherib. These shed a flood of light on the times of Isaiah.

Nebuchadnezzar came up against Jerusalem and carried away the Jews into captivity. Some interesting episodes in the life of this monarch are given in the book of Daniel, and in one of them it is incidentally stated that Nebuchadnezzar claimed to have built Babylon. Formerly the accuracy of this statement was challenged on the grounds that it was unconfirmed by secular history, but now all doubts are set at rest, for we have not only the clay books containing accounts of some of the great works of Nebuchadnezzar, but thousands of bricks have been dug up with the name of this Babylonian king stamped on them. Numbers of these have within the last few years been utilized in the making of a great canal. They are still good, and can be profitably used in this work. After Judah had been in captivity seventy years, the conquering forces of Cyrus swept over Assyria and Babylonia, and in accordance with the sure word of prophecy, this clement prince displaced the Babylonian dynasty and liberated the Jews. His annals are also preserved on a cylinder now in the British Museum, and in them we are told of his respect for the religious convictions of his subjects, how he rebuilt the temple of Mardeck and restored the worship of Bel. This is quite in keeping with his character as portrayed in scripture. In the book of Ezra we read he granted permission to the Jews to return to their own land and rebuild their temple, and how he generously aided them in the work. Like some restless gold seeker, flitting from field to field, merely picking up specimens of the rich ore beneath, so we have gone from land to land, glimpsing but for a brief time at some of the valuable discoveries which explorers have made.

Possibly the most remarkable of them all is the discovery of the forgotten empire of the Hittites, or, as they are sometimes called in scripture, "the children of Heth." Secular history was silent concerning the deeds of this warlike nation, but the Bible recorded that they existed in Palestine before the Jews. From one of them Abraham purchased the famous cavern of Machpelah in which to bury his dead. Among them the wild Esau sought and found a wife, and when Joshua invaded the land of Canaan the Hittites sought with their chariots of iron to oppose his progress, but were signally defeated. For centuries numbers of them dwelt side by side with the Hebrews. Uriah the Hittite was one of the trusted generals of King David, and perhaps the blackest stain in the life of that great king was his ignoble treatment of this soldier. When the Israelite nation was divided the Hittites still existed as a powerful people, for in the second book of Kings we read that while the Syrian army encompassed Samaria, the capital of Israel, they heard a great noise and imagined it to be the sound of the army of the Hittites coming forth to help the Israelites and, panic-stricken, they fled in the greatest disorder. A striking picture of this disorderly retreat has been painted for us by that great biblical artist, Dore. Francis Newman, the brother of John Henry Newman, the cardinal, challenged the accuracy of this story, for classical history was silent on the Hittites. It knew nothing of such a powerful people whose forces the Syrians might dread to meet. He, however, has been proved to be wrong, and we now know that the Hittites constituted a great nation. The site of their capital city has, it is believed, been identified, and it is found that in their palmy days their territory stretched from the Euphrates to Lebanon. The story of the Hittites has been brought out from various sources. The Assyrians told of their dealings with the Khatti, and the Egyptians detailed their wars with the Kheta. Philologists tell us that these names are the equivalent names for the Hittite. In addition to this, special explorations have been conducted on the sites of Hittite centers, and specimens of their art and workmanship have been found, also some of their own inscriptions in a peculiar picture writing, which Orientalists have not been able to fully decipher. They are still busy at work, and Prof. Sayce and others hope yet to succeed in reading Hittite inscriptions.

But these articles would be incomplete without a brief reference to the latest and perhaps most important of all the archeological discoveries, the great find at Nippur in the territory of ancient Babylon. The oldest city and the most ancient civilization of the world has been unearthed. The exploring party sent out by the University of Pennsylvania, conducted by Dr. Peters and Prof. Hilprecht, the distinguished Assyriologist, brought up a great heap of antique relics consisting of more than 26,000 tablets, and many inscribed fragments of vases and stela, and far below sun-dried bricks were found inscribed with the name of Sargon I., who reigned about 3800 B. C. Far below this, in a still more ancient Nippur, monumental records were found dating, according to Prof. Hilprecht, three or four thousand years before the time of Sargon, which would make them at least 7000 before Christ and 3000 before the world was made or Adam created, according to Archbishop Usher. The first notice I saw of the Nippur find was from a Sunday issue of the New York Herald, with a flaming head line like this: "History is Upset. Records Unearthed which Disturb Estimate of the World's Age. The Oldest Ever Found. Will Change Completely the Chronology of the Old Testament and Astound Orthodox Believers." Well, the scholars have already concluded that Hilprecht has overshot the mark in his interpretation of these records by about 2000 years. If there was a civilization in Babylonia 8000 B. C., and there probably was, it does overthrow the Usher chronology, but not a line in the Bible is contradicted by it nor will a syllable have to be changed as a result of this discovery. Like science and criticism, chronology is left an open question, and when the truth is discovered the Bible falls in line because there is nothing to adjust but human errors, like Usher's chronology.

I must now close my case of the Bible as tried and tested by the monuments. I have only written a brief introduction to this great study. It is a branch of Christian evidence not often dealt with, but which is gaining more prominence each day. In addition to Assyrian, Egyptian, Babylonian, Palestinian and Hittite monuments, much light has also been shed on scripture by Roman and Grecian antiquities. For instance, the Arch of Titus, with the representations on it of the furniture taken from the Jewish temple, is wonderful evidence of the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus and the fulfillment of Christ's prophecy. Ancient coins, too, help us in ascertaining the names of forgotten provinces and cities. It is interesting to take in your hand a Roman penny, such as Jesus took when he gave expression to that memorable saying: "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's." The skeptic will, of course, remark that he may admit the general historic veracity of scripture in ordinary things, but at the one point where he desires corroboration from outside sources, in favor of the supernatural, there is none. The whole book from beginning to end is a testimony to the supernatural, and when a book tells me the truth 99 times in ordinary matters that I can put to the test, I decline to believe it is lying in the hundredth statement that may transcend my comprehension. One more article, giving the present status of archeology and the Bible, from the point of view of critical science, will close this series.

Violent Spirituality.

Reactions make up the half of life's phenomena. Always there is some eddying backwash after any rush forward. For many a year the evangelist has been to the front. I noticed last year in an American religious paper, I think a Congregationalist organ, a striking article on "The Passing of the Evangelist." The writer claimed that the age of sensationalist revival campaigns was over. I do not yet know how to judge of the accuracy of this judgment, but I do perceive that with the end of the Moody-Sankey era it seems impossible to stir the masses in the same way. The people no longer regard as a novel attraction the Salvation Army demonstrations with big brass orchestras and the dithyrambs and dancing backwards down the streets of the female captains and lieutenants. The Salvation Army had to take to slum work to secure its own salvation, and but for General Booth's Farm Colonies and Social Wings for the "Submerged Tenth," his spiritual organization would have collapsed. We are entering a new era. Its developments will be curious. Much abler men are in the field as evangelists than Moody and Sankey, such as that wonderful man, Gipsy Smith, and Charles Inglis, but they produce no very great popular upheaval, though of course they can draw considerable audiences. I can detect the germ of a new idea in certain expressions of opinion just now being ventilated. Leading Presbyterians and Congregationalists are propagating in their conclaves and in the press the proposal that existing churches should do their own evangelistic work, first hand, instead of delegating this kind of enterprise to outside "mission centers." This is a fresh suggestion, but it is one which, if not pressed too pugnaciously, will win ready assent. There has never been a time when the free churches, as a whole, have been more desirous of acting for the best. In this connection there come to my mind some recent sentences of Tolstoy, which seem to me to bear unconsciously on this subject. "We are so accustomed in worldly life to attain our objects by the club of violence, of authority, or even by the club of logical argument, that in the work of God we wish also to do the same. But a club is met by a club; while the work of God is met only by the finest of feelers, which penetrate all obstacles."

The Evolution of Religious Fiction.

One of the most extraordinary developments in the literary world of our time is surely the religious novel. Few of us who have not given special consideration to such a subject realize the position of spiritual fiction as a factor in modern intellectual life. The novel of any kind is of course an upstart innovation, commencing properly with Richardson, Sterne, Fielding and Smollett. Goldsmith and Johnson respectively wrote the two first religious fictions—"Rasselas" and "The Vicar of Wakefield." Boccaccio, the Italian, and Defoe with his "Robinson Crusoe," were before their time, for they did not bring in the new era. Richardson did that with "Clarissa Harlowe" and "Pamela, or Virtue Rewarded." They were the first actual novels, recognized as such. From that time the stream of fiction has increased in volume till now it is a roaring and overwhelming deluge. What amazes me is the power in society of the new religious novel. It is with almost incredible eagerness that the reading multitudes rush to welcome any newly announced fiction by Hall Caine, by Madam Sarah Grand, by Olive Schreiner, by Marie Corelli, or by Mrs. Humphrey Ward, if only it be of a spiritual character. Thus, Miss Schreiner's "Robert Halkett, Trooper," being a parody on Christ and Christians, written in a fit of passionate hysteria by that violent South African authoress, excited quite a furor for a month. Miss Corelli cut it out with her "Master Christian," which has for its hero another fantastic, mythical Christ, a little boy found on a cathedral doorstep. It is marvelous that these unutterable absurdities should catch on with the public fancy. I could understand how that Corellian extravaganza, "The Sorrows of Satan," should create the rage that it did. It was a jeu d'esprit with a real touch of genius to commend it to favor. There are three parties who seem to be the only subjects of Miss Marie Corelli's admiration. These are King Edward VII., the devil and Miss Marie Corelli. These three are most extravagantly adulated in several of her novels, under a thin veneer. But the point is that she now writes only religious stories. Mr. Hall Caine is doing the same. Both writers began on very secular lines. Mrs. Ward and her imitators are evermore writing religious novels, but they are all anti-Christian fictions. The notable thing is that these, though on account of their power and the genius of the authoress, welcomed by a great initial circulation, quickly subside out of view. I saw lately an advertisement by a great firm of soap merchants that their fragrant fancy oleaginous wares for the toilet would be accompanied by a free gift to purchasers of "Robert Elsmere." There was something unconsciously and cruelly sardonic in this treatment by sordid hucksters of a story about a skeptical clergyman. "Robert Elsmere" is anything but a soft-soapy novel. It is bitterly caustic. There are two tributaries to the main stream of religious fiction. They are the orthodox and the unorthodox stories. Hall Caine in "The Christian" attacked the Church of England in a terrific manner. In the "Eternal City" he pours his shots all into the Roman Catholic hierarchy. People are roused by this kind of thing.

The Militant Novelist.

I do not presume to make any lengthy allusion to your American literature of religious fiction. But it is also monopolizing the market, is it not, or at any rate tending to do so? Sheldonism swept the board for six months. Now, Mr. Sheldon is one of the literary Philistines of the time. He went on the warpath on behalf of sociological ecclesiasticism. His weapon was the religious novel. I read his "What would Jesus Do?" and was interested just as I had been when I read Bellamy's "Looking Backward." But in the same way I felt tired. The picture of the millennium in advance strained my faculties. I cannot spend all my attention on the Apocalypse, even though the divine Johannine glories and terrors open the real heaven and the real hell to my gaze. I can only endure occasional glimpses of the new heavens and the new earth. Mr. Sheldon's religious fiction would have sent Peter, James and John to sleep again, as did the bright eloud that overshadowed them, and also the gloom of Gethsemane. Do you note that Sheldonism is not a Stromboli, or a Vesuvius, nor a pyrenial Hecla geyser, but that it is already an extinct volcano? That kind of fiction cheats people into thinking that somebody has actually shown us all how to take off our coats and shovel mountains out of the way. Alas, we find too quickly that we are being fooled with fallacy! The real living volcano does not burn itself out so soon. This time last year I was gazing for a succession of mornings and evenings at the tremendous upheavals of signs and tokens of the furnace that rages under the Bay of Naples. An eruption of Vesuvius was apprehended. It did not come off then, but it is to come off sooner or later. When it does it will perhaps destroy Naples itself. Seismologists declare that such a climax is possible. But the literary field is strewn with the ashes of dead fires that have burnt nothing down which they threatened to consume.

My Bishop.

I was brought up in the Church of England. I was a member of it till my adult age had commenced. The Bible led me out of it. But I am glad that I know it as I do, that I have many dear friends in it, and also that I can never go back to it. For it does not improve as an ecclesiastical institution. Say what some may, it is a danger to the nation, for it is a preserve of carnal pride under the guise of religion, and it tends to Romanize the national soul by the specious method of propagating a professedly innocent and ornate ceremonialism fascinating to refined souls, and easily accepted by simple people who lean naturally on the evidence which appeals to the sensuous faculties. There are some men, even among the High Church party, whom I am bound to respect because of their unbounded and sincere self-abnegation. I have seen the Bishop of London again. This week I had another private conversation with him on matters pertaining to the state of London. He is one of the great and true Christian socialists of the time. He is far more than a mere churchman, though he is rather fond of telling people in public, "Why I am a Churchman." He has as much right to tell that as I have to say, "Why I am a Disciple of Christ." At this moment Bishop Winnington Ingram seems more concerned about the temperance problem than about any other question. I believe he is destined to be a great living power against the drink traffic, and that is specially why I believe in him. Personally this prelate is one of the most ingratiating of Englishmen. He loves the common people and they flock after him everywhere. He lately had a party of 100 factory girls at his Fulham palace. I formerly, when minister of Tasso tabernacle, Fulham, used to see hundreds of carriages on a Saturday afternoon entering the bishop's park. But the fashionable crowd at the great garden parties of former bishops were never varied by a factory girls' garden party. This new Bishop of London is bringing in a new era. He will make it hard for the Nonconformists to keep the people unless they also wake up to do something more than preach polished sermons to respectable congregations which almost all degenerate into religious drawing-room clubs. A stupendous struggle is shortly coming on in England. It will be of mixed issues. When the war is over, then the Tory power will once more wane after long innings. The Liberals will come in with a great program of progress. It will include disestablishment of the church and also of the brewers. Some of the bishops will be against the brewers, and yet these bloated beer plutocrats are all on the side of the church, which has been the stronghold of all selfish vested interests. The bishops have stormy times before them. I believe that if this youngest and finest of them all lives he will be the foremost champion in the church of moral right and humanitarian aggressiveness.

WILLIAM DURBAN.

43 Park Road, South Tottenham,

London, Nov. 2, 1901.

Little Duties.

Only the light of a smile, dear,
Will pencil the clouds with gold,
And fill a dark day with sunshine
To some one lonely and old.

Only a tender word, dear,
Just whispered to one in love,
Will summon the presence of angels
Swift-winged from heaven above.

Only the touch of your hand, dear,
By the love in your heart beguiled,
Will mold into wondrous beauty
The mind of a little child.

Only the sound of your voice,
Just at the close of day,
Singing some sweet, simple ballad,
Will drive all my cares away.

If these are the things to do, dear,
Then why should we leave them undone,
And suffer that "bit of heartache
At the setting of the sun"?

The Immortality of the Unseen

By GEORGE H. COMBS

The age is sick, the spiritual doctors say, Of what? The answers are not concordant. "Unitarianism," says one. "Agnosticism," says another. "Pseudo-Science," says a third. "The decay of imagination," volunteers the fourth. Let another guess be hazarded: "Materialism."

This is the age of "things." We do not, with some of the nations of antiquity, worship war; with the Romans, strength; with the Greeks, beauty; we have fallen upon baser times; we worship things. Our lives are spent in getting and in holding things. Success or failure is determined by materialistic standards.

How much is a man worth? We examine forthwith his bank account for intelligent answer. Yet, etymologically, worth and worship are close kin.

Consequently this is the millennium of the "practical" man. Only such is in demand. We want men who can deal with things. We want the doer, not the dreamer. Everything must be material.

Education must be practical, must be able to give a bread and butter account of itself.

Literature, if it would command respect, must be practical, must teach men to cease dreaming, praying, longing, aspiring, and go to work.

Religion, too, must be practical, must turn its eyes from heaven to earth and "do something"—get a man a new coat, build soup houses, etc. To make men healthy, happy animals and leave them in bovine contentment is the summum bonum!

Is it not time that we should face about? In the rebound from seventeenth century mysticism have we not gone too far in the opposite direction? In wisely recognizing that it is the mission of the church to deal with physical conditions are we not in danger of losing sight of spiritual verities? Is there not too little—to use a lumbering word of Mr. Lowell's coining—of "other-worldliness" in our religion? Will the millennium be ushered in when we have given every man his supper? Now, it is the mission of the church to stay this wave of materialism sweeping ever on. It should be true to its high mission, and to a world bent only on the gratification of its senses say, "Man shall not live by bread alone." There is that which is nobler, more worth your having, than things—high ideals, visions, dreams, hope, faith, God. Let us have done with the idolatry of the material. Let us do homage to the spiritual—to that outlying world, unseen, unheard, yet very real, canopied by mystery, yet instinct with immortality, palpitating with resistless energies, pulsing with God.

The Unseen Things are Pre-existent to All the Seen Things. The unseen things never had a beginning. Eternity includes not only the future, but the present and the past. Eternity is not something towards which we are journeying, but a something in which we have ever been immersed. We commonly speak of time and eternity as if they were two different things, and as if after time came eternity, whereas time is a segment of eternity. You walk by the ocean side and a drop of salt water glistens on your ulster. What is it? Something of which the ocean is made. So eternity's ocean is made of these drops of time. Eternity then stretches backward, and these unseen things are eternal in that they never began to be.

There are but two realities in the universe—matter and mind, the seen and the unseen. Which was pre-existent? Which created the other? Was matter pre-existent? Could matter have created mind? Dull, inert matter, could it have created the mind of man? Can a Shakespeare say to the clod, "Thou art my mother"? This being, so fearfully and wonderfully made, "carrying in his bosom the darkness and the dawn and the unfathomable galaxy, in his brain the geometry of the city of God, in his heart the powers of love and the realms of right and wrong," is he the child of the senseless atom? Perish the thought. Not matter, but mind, is the creator; not the worlds, but God. Sometimes we are alarmed at the progress of science, and fancy that its future revelations may destroy our faith in God—may show us how the universe could have come into being without God. Foolish fancy. The primitive granite can never be blown up. The scientists of to-day, though they may boast, as did Ferdinand Lasalle, of "being armed with all the culture of his age," cannot account for the origin of life, and must needs bow their heads and speak in bated breath of God. We may still repeat the words of the creed, "I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth." "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." Before matter, mind "Before the mountains were brought forth or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting thou art God."

Mind is pre-existent to matter—creates matter. Look about you. What are man's palaces and temples, his books and his museums, his manufactures, his works of art, but children of thought? First comes the unseen.

Further, nothing exists in the realms of the seen until it has had first a very real existence in the world of the unseen.

St. Paul's! Before this glorious cathedral, anthem, prayer, hallelujah, in stone, looked down upon old London, it first existed in the brain of men.

Before, long before, the booming of the Pinta's guns announced that land was in sight and Christopher Columbus flung the banner of Castile to the breezes of the new world, that memorable voyage and discovery had existed in thought.

The Unseen Lives on after the Death of the Seen. The unseen not only comes before, but survives the seen. The seen is but a leaf floating for a moment upon the ocean of the unseen and then sinking into its depths forever. The seen grows old with the years and is buried from our sight, the unseen is not touched by time and is ever radiant with the dews of the first morning.

Interrogate nature: She is dual. There are the seen and the unseen, the visible and the invisible, the material and the immaterial. Which is immortal?

The question is already answered. How mortal the seen. The leaves are now falling, the flowers are fading, summer with all its wealth of buds and bloom and fruit is dying and spectral winter will bury her. Death rules over all. We speak of the everlasting hills, but they, too, crumble away, no more eternal than the flower but yesterday picked into pieces by the child. Of all visible nature, modest city and towering oak, singing bird and stately Alps, it has been written, "Dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return." Of every visible thing the singer's words are true: "In the morning it flourisheth and groweth up; in the evening it is cut down and withereth." Thus too, of all the works of man. On none the stamp of immortality. "The inscription molds from the tablet, the statue falls from the pedestal. Columns, arches, pyramids, what are they but heaps of sand; and their epitaphs but characters written in the dust?" Thus passes away the seen.

But "the things which are not seen are eternal." Consider. Here is an unseen thing. Gravitation—unseen, yet how real, how potent, and how eternal! It pervades all things. In the sun yonder at work pulling the boy's marble to itself; at work in the marble, leaping up in a gleesome, frolicsome way to pull down the sun; at work in every star, at work in every atom, bounding over unthinkable distances, never ceasing to do. Has it any of the marks of mortality? Ever busy, does it tire? Is it any the less energetic than when it reached up and pulled down the hands of Moses, the walls of Jericho, the water-walls on the ill-starred Egyptian host? Is it decrepit? Is it growing old?

Take another unseen thing. Electricity. What is it? Nobody knows. Was there ever such another worker? Since that time when, an untamed giant, it was harnessed by Franklin, it has been man's faithful Ariel, uncomplainingly doing his work. Have we messages to deliver? We know on whom to call. It comes and goes at our slightest wish. Not only will it carry the news, but is perfectly willing to cook our bread, pull our cars, light our streets, and, if we can only rightly harness him, take us a journey through the air. Tired? Aged? Mortal? Nay, though present at the first rehearsal of the morning stars, and time has been already long, upon its glorious youth the shadow of the mortal has not fallen.

Take yet one other—Life. A universal presence, putting the green in the tree, the red in the rose, the color in the child's face—the mystery of mysteries. Can this unseen force die? Sometimes we loosely talk as if it were true. We speak of life as coming to an end—as if death were an active principle, and at death's thrust life ended. Most unphilosophical! Death is simply a negative something, is not a force but a state. Death is simply the absence of life, as cold is the absence of heat. Death cannot come, only life departs. In dying we only loose. Life withdraws from us and goes elsewhere. For a little while life works in the tree, in the flower, in the man, until the mission of the tree, the flower, the man, has been fulfilled, and the life goes elsewhere. But life cannot age. The eternal years of God are hers.

Current Literature.

The November Magazines.

The political history of the Mississippi valley from the colonial days down to the present time is surveyed in an article in the Atlantic Monthly. The prospective statehood of Oklahoma, which will probably soon become actual, will mark the point at which the seal of civilization will be officially set upon the entire Mississippi valley, for when Oklahoma is admitted the whole valley, the most wonderful and resourceful valley in the world, will have been organized into states and the process of reclaiming the wilderness may, in a sense, be considered complete. In view of the fact that the Louisiana Purchase and the Mississippi valley are in a large part of their extent identical, the article is appropriate also as a contribution to the Louisiana Purchase literature which will be increasingly copious from now until 1903. The writer of this article almost makes Napoleon one of our national fathers. His first real autocratic act, against unanimous opposition in his own country, was the sale of Louisiana, and he "increased twofold by his first imperial nod the area of the United States." The centennial of Daniel Webster's graduation from Dartmouth College has stimulated a revival of interest in the great orator, and Samuel W. McCall has an article on Webster's character and services. An article on "Modern Murder Trials and Newspapers" takes a view of the matter rather more favorable to the newspapers than that ordinarily expressed. The writer thinks that there is not a little sensational criticism of newspapers for alleged sensationalism. "Allee Same" is a story which will be read with interest by those interested in missionary work among the Chinese. It exhibits certain phases of it from the Chinaman's standpoint.

The North American Review opens with a study of "Conquered Territory of the Constitution," by Hannis Taylor, U.S. Minister to Spain, who defends the position that Congress can hold and govern conquered territory by such methods as may be expedient in each particular case, and suggests that the United States should maintain towards the Philippines an attitude analogous to a protectorate, with actual occupation only of certain coast cities and without interfering with local self-government. A member of the Italian Chamber of Deputies, who is intimately acquainted with the ecclesiastical situation in Italy, describes the conditions which will govern the election of the next pope and sketches some of the leading candidates for the papacy. M. Gohier, of the Paris "Aurore," appeals for American intervention in Turkey. President Thwing, of Western Reserve University, defends college football as performing a valuable function in the ethical development of manhood. Hamilton W. Mabie writes of "American Opportunities and Education," with special reference to the enlargement of national ideas and political education. In reply to the argument of the Chinese Consul General at San Francisco against the continuance of the Chinese exclusion act, the mayor of San Francisco presents the reasons why the law should be re-enacted by the next Congress. Senator McLaurin of South Carolina writes on "The Commercial Democracy of the South."

Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly celebrates its quarter centennial with the present issue. Its leading article is by the explorer Nansen on "The Race for the Poles." The writer gives a summary of what has been done in Arctic and Antarctic exploration and what yet remains to be done. As a scientist he dwells upon the importance of scientific work in the determination of air, water and magnetic currents, contours of coasts, and flora and fauna, as being more significant than the mere act of reaching the pole. He still believes in his own former method of taking a strong ship, allowing it to be frozen in and drifting slowly with the ice across the polar region, because with such a basis scientific work can be done which is impossible with the meager supplies that can be carried on sledges. He discusses the present plans of the explorers who are now in the Arctics and believes that Baldwin has the best chance of reaching the pole, because he has the best equipment, including four hundred dogs—and reaching the pole is largely a matter of having enough sledge dogs. There is a diverting dissertation on the Blue Laws of Connecticut, and an enlightening article entitled "How Tammany Wins," which we can read with some equanimity now that Tammany has lost. On the whole, Leslie's anniversary number is easily the best of the ten-centers this month.

Ainslee's begins with an article, appropriate to the season, on college foot-ball, which will not in the least abate the shudder of horror or the thrill of enthusiasm, whichever the thought of that game arouses in your mind. "Our Farming Industry" is a successful attempt to make the reader grasp the bigness of American agriculture. "The Inaccessible Valleys" is a short story of the Philippines which suggests Janvier's "Aztec Treasure House," though involving fewer plausible impossibilities.

No magazine this month is complete without an article on Aeronautics up to date since Santos-Dumont's recent successes, and the Cosmopolitan has a very good one. John Brisben Walker writes of Mr. Roosevelt as "A Working Man in the Presidency." A sketch by Carolyn Wells about the woman who tried to elevate the tone of her husband's dinner-table conversation to the Bostonian level, and he a New Yorker, is the funniest thing of the month. The dramatic critic writes of "The Drama's Tendency toward the Unintellectual." "Tendency" did he say? Look at the billboards. We are in a dispensation of rag-time drama. There can be no more tendency where the degenerating process is as complete as it is in this case—with a few notable exceptions. As a sequel to the discussion of this "tendency," let us have a serious and enlightened disquisition on the tendency of coon-songs to depart from the dignity of oratorio.

The Century having completed its "year of romance" is now inaugurating a "year of American humor." The volume which begins with the November number will contain many new articles and stories by the foremost living American humorists, and not a little historical matter dealing with the development of this most characteristic department of our national literature. The question is often raised whether or not we have any distinctively American literature, whether the writings of our best authors are distinguished by any essential national characteristics from the works of British authors. Perhaps our serious literature is for the most part simply Anglo-Saxon, but that our humor is distinctively American admits no doubt. Prof. Trent's "Retrospect of American Humor," in this number of the Century, is useful for reference but rather too encyclopedic to be readable. Mark Twain contributes a tale of a man who wanted to reach the king's ear—and did. "Mr. Appleby's Vote," with a picture by Frost, is uncommonly clever. Seton-Thompson has a Norwegian legend, and there is an article, said to be authoritative, on Santos-Dumont's balloon with pictures by Castaigne. The thing will have to go now that it has secured Castaigne as its illustrator. Secretary Long writes on the personal characteristics of President McKinley, and Dr. J. M. Buckley discusses "The Assassination of Kings and Presidents." A medieval historical dramatic sketch entitled "Barbarossa" is begun by Cyrus Townsend Brady.

The Youth's Companion puts out an attractive prospectus for 1902, including in its list of contributors about two hundred story writers, besides many men eminent in various callings and professions, who will write of the things they know best—and things they know better than anyone else knows them. For example, Hon. John D. Long, secretary of the navy, will furnish a series of articles on military and naval topics. It is pleasing to note also that the prospectus contains the names of many new writers—which shows that the Youth's Companion keeps its lists open to those who have yet to win their spurs in the literary tournament. Those who subscribe now receive the paper free the rest of the year. ($1.75 a year. 195 Columbus Ave., Boston, Mass.)

Keen College Men.

The Food of Harvard Brain-Workers and Athletes.

Memorial Hall at Harvard, where some twelve hundred of the men eat, is particularly interesting. The dining room is an enormous gothic hall finished in old English oak with wide, stained-glass windows on the sides. The walls are hung with portraits of illustrious graduates and benefactors of past generations.

The students have good food to eat and plenty of it. The hall is run on a co-operative plan so that it costs something less than four dollars a week for board. To this place three times a day come men, whose lives for the time being are given to serious intellectual work, and to accomplish this, they are keen enough to realize that proper food is absolutely necessary.

One is particularly struck by the yellow packages of Grape Nuts standing on nearly every table, which the men purchase at grocery stores and bring in for their personal use. They quickly find out by practical demonstration that brain work exhausts the phosphates, and that nature demands that this loss be made up, and made up from food.

Grape-Nuts is ready to be used without cooking, it is a scientific food which nourishes and builds up the brain, and is particularly suited to the needs of students.

The Varsity athletes also eat it to keep their digestive organs in perfect working order so that they can stand the great strain of both body and head-work when important contests shall come.

Our Budget.

—J. A. McKenzie has resigned at Mitchell Park, Mo., to take effect Nov. 10.

—T. A. Reynolds has been called from Union City, Tenn., to Muncie, Ind., and will begin work at the latter place at once.

—Melancthon Moore has been unanimously called to remain another year with the church at Reserve, Kan., at an increased salary.

—George W. Watkins began his pastorate at Berry, Ill., Nov. 3, succeeding F. M. Rogers, who in turn succeeded Russell F. Thrapp at Pittsfield.

—Mrs. E. W. Brickert gave a vocal and piano recital in Houston, Tex., recently which is reported as both an artistic and a financial success. About $65 was cleared for the woman's aid society.

—C. A. Hill, who resigned at Canton, O., a month ago, preached his farewell sermon Nov. 10. He has accepted a call to Huntington, Ind., and has already moved into his new field, but will hold a meeting at Monroeville, Ind., before taking up the pastorate.

—The receipts for foreign missions for the first seven days of November amounted to $2,036.75. This is a gain as compared with the corresponding time last year, of $1,835.51. This is a good beginning. Let us keep it up, not only all the month, but the whole year.

—Harold E. Monser, who has been doing good work in central Missouri, has decided with his wife to enter the evangelistic field after January 1. Bro. Monser has been remarkably successful in this field and we wish him abundant success in his labors in the future.

—The Christian churches at Hunnewell, Emden, Mountjoy, Mo., and perhaps another church adjacent, desire to co-operate for the employment of a minister for all of his time. They wish the preacher to locate in the midst of these churches. For further particulars address Dr. L. W. Dallas, Hunnewell, Mo.

—We wish to remind friends of the foreign work that the receipts at this time of the year are exceedingly light and generally continue so until after the March offering. If you can send an offering at this time, it will be doubly appreciated. The missionaries must be paid every month, whether any money is received or not.

—The quarter centennial convention of the Missouri Y. M. C. A. will be held at Columbia, Mo. The intention is to make it an important event in the history of Y. M. C. A. work in this state. For particulars address State Executive Committee, Missouri Y. M. C. A., Grand and Franklin Aves., St. Louis.

—A. P. Cobb and J. Walter Wilson will begin a meeting Nov. 17, with the church at Frankfort, Ind., of which L. E. Brown is pastor. The church has for some time been busy with its preparatory services for the meeting and a series of preparatory services are being held during the present week.

—The county meeting of Scotland county, Missouri, was held at Gorin, Oct. 30-31. We have twelve churches in the county and four of them have built new houses within the last three years. A. J. Williams is county evangelist and the meeting re-elected the old officers, J. M. Jayne, president and G. Snell, secretary.

—A couple of years ago there appeared in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST a paragraph consisting of a letter written by Col. Ingersoll to a judge in Cleveland with the gift of a bottle of whisky and the clever reply of the judge who turned Ingersoll's eulogy of the bottle into an arraignment. Jay A. Egbert, of Elyria, O., wishes to know in what issue it appeared. We are unable to locate it. Any reader who can tell in what issue it appeared will confer a favor by informing Bro. Egbert or us.

—H. James Crockett writes that the church at New Sharon, Ia., expects to dedicate its new building in January. There have been 35 additions at New Sharon this year. Brother Crockett will close his work there when the church is dedicated and will take work elsewhere. The church wishes to secure a pastor to begin with the new year.

—G. F. Assiter, of Troy, Mo., called at this office Tuesday morning, returning from a meeting he has been holding at Elsberry, Mo. The meeting closed last night with six additions. Bro. Assiter is hurrying home to greet a young lady who has just arrived at his house and who will call him papa when she learns how.

—T. M. Myers writes from Middleboro, Ky., "We have stopped for a few days on our way to our next meeting. Our brethren here have an elegant little house and also a debt on it. They seem much discouraged. There are several millions of dollars in operation here in these mines and iron plants. Our church needs a month's meeting and a regular preacher."

—The annual report of the foreign society is now ready. Are you a friend of foreign missions? If so, then you need it. If you are not a firm believer in the cause, you need it all the more. Send for a copy and read it thoroughly and religiously and you will be converted. It will be sent free of charge to anyone applying for it. Send a card to Box 584, Cincinnati, Ohio.

—As a monument to Bro. J. B. Sweeney, recently deceased, the Texas brethren are raising a preachers' fund for Add Ran University. This is but carrying out a plan which he himself had advocated, and it is fitting that it should be done as a memorial to him. A thousand dollars has already been pledged toward the $1,500 which it is desired to raise. In pushing this plan the brethren have made only one mistake—they have asked too little.

—H. C. Patterson, who has been in a meeting at Auburn, N. Y., as reported elsewhere, writes of his work on Nov. 3: "At 9 A. M. I addressed the prisoners in the now famous prison. The applause, laughter and tears were testimonials of their appreciation. At its close I called upon all who would take Christ as their Savior and follow him to stand. Sixty-three stood. Evidently the message awakened new purposes in their hearts."

—H. C. Kendrick writes of his church at Hagerstown, Md., where he succeeded P. A. Cave, July 1: "This is a good church. Here are instances of its goodness: Within four months it has given $325 to assist the church in Martinsburg, W. Va., $55 for state missions and last Lord's day pledged $142 for state missions." Brother Kendrick was succeeded at Logansport, Ind., by A. M. Hooten and the work at that point is prosperous and promising.

—H. P. Williams, formerly a United States army chaplain stationed in the Philippines and now under appointment of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society to return to the Philippines as a missionary, was in St. Louis Monday. He will be remembered by all who were at the Minneapolis convention when he was introduced and spoke a few words. He goes as the special representative of the Mt. Cabanne church, St. Louis. He will sail from San Francisco Nov. 23.

—J. B. Graves, field agent in Indiana for the Benevolent Association of the Christian Church, writes that he has begun work in that state and has, as a rule, been warmly received by the churches. Some preachers and elders, however, show indifference and need to be taught the duty of the church in the matter of benevolences. We must restore this element of the "ancient order of things." Bro. Graves will go and come among the churches of Indiana during the winter, and ought to be received warmly by all.

Get the Most Out of Your Food

You don't and can't if your stomach is weak. A weak stomach does not digest all that is ordinarily taken into it. It gets tired easily, and what it fails to digest is wasted.

Among the signs of a weak stomach are uneasiness after eating, fits of nervous headache, and disagreeable belching.

"I have taken Hood's Sarsaparilla at different times for stomach troubles, and a run down condition of the system, and have been greatly benefited by its use. I would not be without it in my family. I am troubled especially in summer with weak stomach and nausea and find Hood's Sarsaparilla invaluable." E. B. HICKMAN, W. Chester, Pa.

Hood's Sarsaparilla and Pills

Strengthen and tone the stomach and the whole digestive system.

—A. R. Adams writes: "Brother A. Kampmier, who recently came to us from the German Lutheran Church, desires a place to preach and would be willing to begin at a salary of $400 or $500 a year. He is a ripe scholar, a fluent speaker and has taught Greek, Latin and Hebrew for a number of years. His address is Clarksville, Ia."

—The American Anti-saloon League will hold its sixth annual convention in Washington, D. C., Dec. 3-5. It invites to affiliation all bodies that are hostile to the saloons. The object of the league, as stated in its constitution, is "the suppression of the saloon" and an alliance is sought among all who are in sympathy with that purpose. Dr. Luther B. Wilson has been acting president of the league since the death of Hon. Hiram Price and Dr. H. H. Russell is national superintendent.

—A brother in Maryland writes: "I have taken the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for fourteen years and hope to take it for the next fourteen, unless I die, get too poor, or the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST falls from grace—and I trust that none of these things will befall me or it." We share in the hope. The reading of a good, religious paper—lively, cheerful, stimulating and hopeful—tends to longevity; the dollar rate makes even poverty a flimsy excuse for not taking a good paper; and as for "falling from grace," we could scarcely do that even if we wanted to, with so many brethren rallying around to hold up our hands and so many critics only too willing to lash us into line if we should depart a hair's breadth from it. We are yours, my brother from Maryland, for the next fourteen years.

—The following facts and figures are from the thirteenth annual report of the board of church extension: The total amount of new receipts for the past year was $465,846.21 and the amount in the church extension fund at Sept. 30, was $305,342.29. The gain in receipts for the year was $48,734.38 over last year. Including returned loans the whole amount received for the uses of the church extension work for the year is $103,651.11. The sources of these receipts are as follows: From churches, $12,695; from individuals, $7,409; from Sunday-schools, $695; from Endeavor societies, $169; from Business in Christianity, $179 (but the cost of publishing Business in Christianity was $700 in excess of the receipts). Annuities, $22,733; bequests, $11,391; interest, $10,572; returned loans, $35,510; from sale of Crockett, $2,250. Since the beginning 585 churches have been aided and 204 of these have returned their loans in full. A new catalogue of fifty modern designs for churches was issued this year. It is supplementary to the former catalogue and contains more designs for churches of moderate cost. The two will be sent to any address for 25 cents.

—The Peoria (Ill.) church held its annual meeting Oct. 30. The receipts for the year were $4,474.14, of which $744.18 was for missions, an increase of about 20 per cent. over last year. There were 75 additions during the year and the present membership is 448. The pastor, G. B. Van Arsdall, who has been with the church two years and has rendered highly satisfactory service, announced his determination to leave April 1, to resume work at the University of Chicago with a view to making further preparation for Bible lectures and institutes and Bible-chair work in connection with state universities.

—Hiram College dedicated its new library building on Oct. 25. This building was presented to the college by Bro. Teachout, one of the liberal patrons of the institution. C. B. Lockwood and H. R. Newcomb of Cleveland, each gave $500 for the purchase of new books for the library on dedication day. This is another indication of the substantial progress which this noble institution is making. In a note from O. G. Hertzog, the financial secretary of the college, from which we glean these facts, he states that Prof. Paul of that institution conducts a missionary class of 175 every week. This fact is full of promise. Hiram is making a splendid record in the mission field.

—At the great Congregational convention recently held in Portland, Me., the following statistics were reported of the work of the American Board of Foreign Missions. The board has 97 mission stations and 1,209 outstations in which 544 missionaries and 3,483 native helpers preach in 27 different languages. There are 505 churches and 929 Sunday-schools with 66,000 pupils. During the year there were 4,551 additions to the churches by confession of faith. Two hundred and twenty-eight students in the foreign field are in training for the ministry. The board has 13 colleges with 2,132 students, 103 boarding and high schools and 1,135 day schools with nearly 50,000 pupils. In some of the fields the educational work done under the auspices of the American board has been of conspicuous value, as at Constantinople, where Roberts College is by far the most potent of all the forces for Christian civilization within the Sultan's domain.

—EDITOR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST—Dear Bro: I write to correct an error in your report of the National Convention. It was in regard to the inopportune of a song said to have been sung by the Omaha quartette at the close of the session devoted to the splendid addresses by brethren Ellis and Willett. I too was pained by the inappropriateness of the second song—it was an encore by a quartette of national singing evangelists, and was a toast to Minneapolis instead of a campaign song for Omaha. The Nebraska quartette sang next morning, during the business session, a midst reports of committees. Especially was the jar noticeable to one who sat near Sister Faris who was in tears at the close of the first song that night.

HARRY C. HOLMES.

Fairbury, Neb.

We believe Bro. Holmes is right. It was a lapse in our memory as to the song which was sung and the singers, but the impression of inappropriateness of the song, at the particular time it was sung, is vivid. It was just an impulse of the moment, acted upon without time for thinking, but it jarred upon the feelings of many.

—Omaha has already begun to make preparations for the convention to be held there next October. A preliminary meeting has been held of representatives of the church and citizens who were notified to confer with them regarding preparations for the entertainment of the convention. Mayor Moores pledges his active co-operation. It is recalled that 12 years ago the Methodist international conference was held at Omaha and that the results of that gathering were entirely satisfactory to the city. The citizens will be on that account more ready to co-operate to make this convention a success. Plans are already

WOMAN'S KIDNEYS.

Thousands of Women Have Kidney Trouble and Never Suspect It.

To Prove What the Great Kidney Remedy, SWAMP-ROOT, Will do for YOU, Every Reader of the Christian-Evangelist May Have a Sample Bottle Sent Free by Mail.

Among the many famous cures of Swamp-Root none seem to speak higher of the wonderful curative properties of this great kidney remedy than the one published this week in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

Mrs. H. N. Wheeler, of 117 High Rock St., Lynn, Mass., writes on Nov. 2, 1900: "About 18 months ago I had a very severe spell of sickness. I was extremely sick for three weeks, and when I finally was able to leave my bed I was left with excruciating pains in my back. My water at times looked very like coffee. I could pass but little at a time, and then only after suffering great pain. My physical condition was such that I had no strength and was all run down. The doctors said my kidneys were not affected, and while I

Did Not Know I Had Kidney Trouble,

I somehow felt certain that my kidneys were the cause of my trouble. My sister, Mrs. C. E. Littlefield, of Lynn, advised me to give Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root a trial. I procured a bottle and inside of three days commenced to get relief. I followed up that bottle with another, and at the completion of this one found I was completely cured. My strength returned, and to-day I am as well as ever. My business is that of canvasser, I am on my feet a great deal of the time, and have to use much energy in getting around. My cure is therefore all the more remarkable, and is exceedingly gratifying to me."

MRS. H. N. WHEELER.

How to Find Out If You Need Swamp-Root.

It used to be considered that only urinary and bladder troubles were to be traced to the kidneys, but now modern science proves that nearly all diseases have their beginning in the disorder of these most important organs.

The kidneys filter and purify the blood—that is their work. So when your kidneys are weak or out of order you can understand how quickly your entire body is affected, and how every organ fails to do its duty.

If you are sick or "feel badly," begin taking the famous new discovery, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, because as soon as your kidneys are well they will help all the other organs to health. A trial will convince anyone.

Many women suffer untold misery because the nature of their disease is not correctly understood; in most cases they are led to believe that womb trouble or female weakness of some sort is responsible for their many ills, when in fact disordered kidneys are the chief cause of their distressing troubles.

Neuralgia, nervousness, headache, puffy or dark circles under the eyes, rheumatism, a dragging pain or dull ache in the back, weakness or bearing down sensation, profuse or scanty supply of urine, with strong odor, frequent desire to pass it night or day, with scalding or burning sensation,—these are all unmistakable signs of kidney and bladder trouble.

If there is any doubt in your mind as to your condition, take from your urine on rising about four ounces, place it in a glass or bottle and let it stand twenty-four hours. If on examination it is milky or cloudy, if there is a brick-dust settling, or if small particles float about in it, your kidneys are in need of immediate attention.

Other symptoms showing that you need Swamp-Root are sleeplessness, dizziness, irregular heart, breathlessness, sallow, unhealthy complexion, plenty of ambition but no strength.

Swamp-Root is pleasant to take and is used in the leading hospitals, recommended by physicians in their private practice, and is taken by doctors themselves, because they recognize in it the greatest and most successful remedy that science has ever been able to compound.

If you are already convinced that Swamp-Root is what you need, you can purchase the regular fifty-cent and one-dollar bottles at the drug stores everywhere.

SPECIAL NOTICE. Swamp-Root, the great kidney, liver and bladder remedy, is so remarkably successful that a special arrangement has been made by which all of our readers who have not already tried it may have a sample bottle sent absolutely free by mail. Also a book telling all about kidney and bladder troubles and containing many of the thousands upon thousands of testimonial letters received from men and women cured by Swamp-Root. In writing, be sure and mention reading this generous offer in the St. Louis CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, when sending your address to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y.

on foot for securing railway rates and enlisting the co-operation of the press. Work on the new auditorium will be begun Nov. 18 and the company hopes to have the building completed in July or August so that there will be an ample margin to insure its being ready for the convention in October. The Minneapolis committee set a high mark for enterprise and ingenuity in preparing for the convention and the Omaha brethren are starting out as if they meant to come up to that mark and if possible pass it.

At Sendai, Japan.

Sendai, the capital of Miyagi Province, is a city of 85,000 souls. This is one of our mission stations. M. B. Madden and wife and Miss Carme Hostetter are our missionaries. I have known the Maddens since they were children. They were members of the church at Topeka, Kan., where B. L. Smith baptized Brother Madden. He and his wife attended Bethany College. He is an industrious missionary and she is the poet laureate of the Japan mission. Miss Hostetter is a studious, hard working missionary among the women and children.

Sendai is well supplied with missionaries. There are ten different religious bodies at work in this city. A missionary told me there was a congestion of missionaries. There are thirty-five missionaries besides a large force of native helpers. The number of Sunday-schools is between thirty and forty. A missionary told me any child five years of age could walk to a Sunday-school if it desired to do so. It is to be regretted that the whole empire is not as well supplied with missionaries. There are two cities of over 40,000 each and 93 of between 10 and 40,000 without a missionary. The Reformed Presbyterians have a large boys' school here with 150 bright young men and boys in attendance. They also have a girls' school with 85 in attendance. Their schools are a great power. Here is where Dr. J. H. DeForest lives, who has been a missionary for 26 years, and is one of the most influential men in Japan. The missionaries have a union service in English every Sunday afternoon and they take turns in preaching. I spoke the Sunday I was there. It was an earnest, appreciative audience. In the morning I spoke to our brethren and Bro. Madden interpreted for me.

We have a number of out-stations around about Sendai. The number of preaching points is 18. At 13 of these points we have believers, and at three of them the brethren meet every Lord's day to observe the Lord's Supper. In this district we have six Sunday-schools. There have been 30 additions during the past year and twice that number are expected during the current missionary year.

A reception was tendered us at the Madden home one evening. Many believers and their friends were present. A Japanese brother made an address of welcome in his own tongue and Bro. Madden told me what he said, and I responded, telling them how glad I was to see them and to visit their beautiful country. A distinguished Japanese lawyer was present with his family and his accomplished daughter played the koto, a musical instrument. I had never seen or heard of this instrument before.

Mrs. Rains and I were requested to sing an American song and Mrs. Madden kindly assisted us. We sang "There is Sunshine in My Soul To-day." They cheered us heartily. My musical gifts have never been appreciated in America. I have been attending state and national conventions for more than thirty years and never yet been asked to sing a solo. My Japanese brethren are quicker to recognize and appreciate my talents than my American brethren.

We visited Sanuma, one of the out-stations, where a special meeting had been arranged by Kawamura, one of the native evangelists. The meeting was an interesting one. Some Japanese brethren came twelve miles to be present. In front of the place of meeting an American flag and a Japanese flag were hoisted. A number of brethren were present but no sisters except the organist. It is much harder to reach Japanese women with the gospel than Japanese men. They sang "Blest Be the Tie That Binds." I do not think that Bro. David Lipscomb would object to this organ. It was about three feet long and one foot square. A brother carried it to a place of meeting under his arm. It was borrowed from a neighbor. I could see nothing about it to object to but the sound. It would leap and jump and then balk; but I was singing in Japanese. That helped it along.

I wish the American brethren could see Kawamura, the John the Baptist of Japan. He is one of the largest Japanese I have ever seen; tall, straight, with coal black hair and long silken beard. He is kind and gentle, loves the Bible, devoted to his work and commands the love and confidence of all who know him. He was educated by G. F. Verbeck, the great missionary. He would remind you of the lamented F. G. Allen, the founder of the Christian Guide. Here again we had an address of welcome and most cordial greetings. There were a dozen or more of fine, bright looking young men present who had given their hearts and lives to the Lord. They look different from those who do not believe. They are new-born babes in Christ looking up to God. The light of life is shining in their faces. There were a great number present and it was a delightful meeting. Harvey Madden, Bro. Madden's little boy, handed picture cards around to the children. Sister Madden sang to the people. There were no chairs or seats in the room; we all sat on the matting. There were three clocks in the room. The Japanese are great on clocks.

We had a great meeting at Fukushima, another out-station. This is a city of over 20,000 and the capital of the province, with many fine public buildings. Our meeting was held in the town hall which would accommodate 500 or 600 people. It was filled and a hundred or more stood up. I spoke forty minutes on "The Faith that Saves." The people were quiet and respectful and gave most earnest attention. If I could speak the language I would want no greater work than to come to Japan and preach to these great crowds of earnest, intelligent people. Many present were preachers. When I began the people cheered and also when I closed. This is a way of cordial greeting and approval. After the services many lingered to speak to

SUCH A CHANGE.

Not only in feelings but in looks. The skin is clear, the eyes are bright, the cheeks are plump. No more pain and misery, no more sick headache, no more jaundice. What worked the change? Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, which cured the disease of the stomach that prevented proper nutrition, and also cleansed the clogged and sluggish liver.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery cures diseases of the stomach and other organs of digestion and nutrition. It cures diseases of lungs, heart, liver, and other organs which seem remote from the stomach because many of these diseases have their cause in a diseased condition of the stomach involving the allied organs of digestion and nutrition.

"I sent you a letter about a year ago," writes Mrs. J. Ellis Hamilton, of Farmington, Marion Co., West Va. "I stated my case as plainly as I could, and received a letter from you in a few days, telling me to use Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery and 'Favorite Prescription'—a bottle of each. I used three of each, and feel like a new woman. Don't suffer any pain or misery any more. Before using your medicines I suffered all the time—had jaundice, caused from food not digesting properly. I would have sick headache three and four times in a week. Could not do the work myself. I commenced using your medicines as recommended for liver complaint, and think I am cured now. I asked our doctor if he couldn't cure me, and he said he could give me medicine to help me but the trouble might return any time. I doctored three years without any relief. Haven't had sick headache since I took the first bottle of your medicine."

me, or rather bow to me and welcome me to Japan. A number expressed the hope of visiting America at some time.

The name of our preacher at Fukushima is Yontaka Hasegawa. He was educated in a college at Tokyo. He has been a Christian for 15 years. His family consists of a wife and eight children. He is a good, earnest man, with a good honest eye. His salary is $15 per month. He has baptized about 150. The prospects in his field are very encouraging. He says many are almost ready to turn to the Lord. No member of this church drinks or smokes. Very few Christians in Japan do. His great need at this place is a chapel. The little church, very poor, agrees to buy and pay for a lot if we can build a chapel to cost $300. Will not some one send all or part of this amount to us at Cincinnati for the chapel? The rent for a place to meet now costs $40 per year. It would be a great encouragement to this little band to grant this modest request. They are liberal themselves. A Japanese Christian gives ten times as much to the church as he gave to the heathen temple before he heard and believed the gospel. I was at a little church last Sunday and there were about 30 believers and every one of them gave something in the morning offering.

The work in Japan is most prosperous in every way, more encouraging than I expected to find it. There is nothing to prevent our taking this empire for Christ but our lack of faith and zeal and liberality. There is no field in America or in the whole wide world so promising as Japan. Things are moving rapidly here and a large missionary force will increase the speed.

October 3, we will sail from Kobe for Shanghai, China. We hope to be at Nankin in time for the annual meeting of the missionaries, Oct. 9.

Won't You Write a Postal To Get Well?

Send me no money, but simply write me a postal if you are not well. Pay when you get well.

I will send you a book that tells how a lifetime of study has enabled me to strengthen the inside nerves. Those are the nerves that operate the stomach, kidneys, heart, womanly organism, etc. Weakness of these organs means weakness of those nerves. Nerve strength alone makes any organ do its duty.

I will send you, too, an order on your nearest druggist for six bottles of Dr. Shoop's Restorative. Use it for a month, and if it succeeds pay him $5.50 for it. If not, I will pay him myself.

No matter how difficult your case; no matter what you have tried. If my book shows you that your trouble is nerve weakness—and most sickness is—I will warrant my Restorative to cure you.

I fail sometimes, but not often. My records show that 39 out of 40 who get those six bottles pay, and pay gladly. I have learned that most people are honest with a physician who cures them. That is all I ask. If I fail I don't expect a penny from you.

Mine is the only way to restore vital nerve power. Other treatments bring but fleeting results at best. If you want to be well, let me send you an order for the medicine. If it cures pay $5.50. I leave the decision to you.

Simply state which book you want, and address Dr. Shoop, Box 582, Racine, Wis.

Book No. 1 on Dyspepsia,
Book No. 2 on the Heart,
Book No. 3 on the Kidneys,

Mild cases, not chronic, are often cured by one or two bottles. At all druggists.

Texas Letter.

Add-Ran University, Waco, has matriculated 284 students this session, which is by far the best record in her history, but not the best record in store for her. Thanksgiving day is to be observed as her "Emancipation Day." Then, thanks to T. E. Shirley, her debt will have been paid and she will be free to launch forth, untrammelled, on a glorious voyage. This result is one of the finest illustrations I have ever seen of the famous three P's: Patience, Perseverance and Pluck.

C R Scoville succeeds the lamented J. B. Sweeny as pastor at Gainesville, and thus we gain another strong preacher for Texas.

S. J. Vance is also a new man. He comes to Rockwall, a fine field.

Evangelist Needham is in a union meeting at Austin. Bro. Lowber and his people are at work with him.

The First Unitarian church of this city was dedicated Nov. 3. The pastor, Rev. D. C. Limbaugh, after the sermon, read an "original production" setting forth the teachings of his people. Let me name a specimen or two. 1. Speaking of man, he said, "We do not believe that he is morally depraved." 2. Speaking of heaven, he said, "We believe in that state we shall still have our work to accomplish, our problem to solve, our difficulties to overcome, our disappointments to meet, our intricacies to unravel." 3. Scouting the idea of all supernatural revelation, he concludes by saying, "The universal knowledge of universal man is our Bible." And speaking of the Old Book he said, "It has various and contradictory conceptions of nature, God, man and human destiny." 4. Referring to the Savior, he said, "We believe that Jesus was a man, begotten and born as other men." 5. Speaking of Christianity he characterized it as "a great historic movement in the evolution of religion." He compared it with other religions and concluded that in some respects they "are superior." And yet there are men and women ready to espouse his teachings and call it Christianity. Africa and Asia are not the only fields needing missionaries.

Evangelist L. W. Munhall, of Philadelphia, closed a meeting of three weeks in this city Nov. 5. Eighteen churches, with a membership of 6,000, co-operated with him. A large tent with a capacity of 2,500 was filled every night, and an audience of 400 heard him in the day. The music by a large chorus choir was fine. The weather, except three days, was ideal. The preaching was strong and intensely biblical. The cost of the meeting was $2,000. The converts signing cards numbered 532. Just how many of these will come out bravely and take a stand for the Lord in the church remains to be seen. I like Munhall. Our people ought to co-operate with him. He is a Methodist but you would not infer it from his sermons. You would rather think from these, as an old gentleman said of him here, that "he is an old Campbellite." He is genial, kind and lovely. And Mrs. Munhall, "wifey" as he calls her, is perfectly lovely. He will preach more Bible in one sermon than Sam Jones will in a whole series, but he does not seem to stir the conscience like Sam does. More than half of the converts were males. He is pre-eminently a man's preacher. Let me urge our people to work with him at every opportunity. Of course he will teach some things we do not like, but in the main this will not be true. He sang in the choir and heard O. A. Burgess in Indianapolis and he knows our position.

Tom Smith, one of our state evangelists, has had a splendid meeting at Myrtle Springs. There were 60 additions. But good as this is, it is not the best result. The church, which had suffered much from internal trouble, was harmonized and put to work again. A Sunday-school was organized and money raised to employ a pastor.

Edwin C. Boynton is succeeding at Huntsville. All the debt on their house has been paid except $1,000, and this is now in the hands of the church extension board.

The Gainesville church has done some beautiful and tender things in memory of her pastor, the beloved J. B. Sweeny. She paid the funeral expenses, and his pledge of $100 to the Add-Ran debt, and will place a handsome memorial window in the church for him.

Edwin D. Hamner, on account of declining health, gives up his work in Beaumont and will go to a higher altitude.

M. M. DAVIS.

The Virginia Convention.

When a few prominent brethren of Richmond came forward two years ago and offered to provide the salary of a state secretary and this secretary proposed the raising of $8,000 and the winning of 1,000 converts, we on this side of the line said, "Old Virginia is waking up."

When Wm. Jackson Shelburne, the secretary, stood up this year and reported nearly $9,000 raised, 1,004 conversions, 11 preachers employed, five new churches organized and a balance of $2,000 in the treasury, we said, "Old Virginia is awake."

The twenty-sixth annual convention of the Virginia Christian Missionary Society was a decided improvement upon some of the conventions held in other years, when a few delegates, mostly from the tidewater section, would gather and spend three days very largely in the discussion of how to provide for a deficiency in the treasury and how to frame a temperance resolution that would induce the recalcitrant brethren "to vote as they pray."

October 29, more than two hundred and sixty delegates came together from all sections of the state, transacted their business with wisdom and dispatch, were profited by the instruction of their ablest men, and heard such inspiring speakers from abroad as A. McLean, B. L. Smith, A. I. Myhr, B. A. Jenkins, B. A. Abbott and Miss Rebel Withers, and adjourned to go home to make the next year the best in the history of co-operative work in the state. The successful convention was due in part to the excellent program of the ministerial association upon the opening day.

After the opening address by B. P. Smith, president of the association, the following was the order: "Our Relation to Other Religious Bodies," J. A. Spencer; "Our Relation to Social and Civil Reforms," L. A. Cutler; "Our Relation to the Problem of Christian Unity," P. A. Cave; "Should the Pastor Hold His Own Protracted Meetings?" C. P. Williamson; and a sermon, "Fishers of Men," F. F. Bullard. W. J. Cocke was elected president of the association for the ensuing year.

The convention decided to continue the plan which has yielded such gratifying results, the salary of the financial agent to be guaranteed by personal pledges, and the churches he asked to take the offering for state work the first Sunday in October, and the Sunday-schools the first Sunday in April.

A committee was appointed to co-operate with a committee of the Maryland, Delaware and District of Columbia convention in the establishment of a weekly religious journal. It is probable that the Christian Monthly of Richmond will be bought and made the official organ for this section.

Reports at the C. W. B. M. sessions show that the 1,466 women in the 75 auxiliaries gave last year $3,081. Mrs. L. C. Daniel, treasurer of the endowment fund of the Bible chair at the University of Virginia, reported $777.75 receipts for the past year. Of the $28,000 received for this chair, the disciples of Virginia have given $14,251. Henry Pearce Atkins, pastor of the West End church of Richmond, brought in a report that was novel, but worthy of imitation. His church had managed to pay all its bills, and so had turned over the unused appropriation of the C. W. B. M. to the Tidewater board for its mission work.

Mrs. F. F. Bullard, superintendent of young people's work, reported 81 mission bands, 1,000 members and the apportionment for the state exceeded. Bluefield won the banner with $79 raised and 14 conversions.

An interesting Christian Endeavor session was held, with H. E. Miley presiding.

W. F. Fox was re-elected president of the society, which will meet again in Richmond, Nov. 11-14, 1902.

Coffee Being Replaced by Postum Food Coffee.

"I am the wife of a minister. About three years ago a warm friend, an exemplary mother and the conscientious wife of a minister, asked me if I had ever tried giving up coffee and using the Postum Food Coffee. I had been telling her of my excessive nervousness and ill health. She said: 'We drink nothing else for breakfast but Postum Food Coffee, and it is a delight and a comfort to have something that we do not have to refuse the children when they ask for it.'

"I was surprised that she would permit the children to drink any kind of coffee, but she explained that it was a most healthful beverage and that the children thrived on it. A very little thought convinced me that for brainwork, one should not rely upon a stimulant such as coffee is, but should have food and the very best of food.

"My first trial of Postum was a failure. The maid of all work brought it to the table lukewarm, weak, and altogether lacking in character. We were in despair, but decided on one more trial. At the second trial, we faithfully followed the directions, used four teaspoonsful to the pint of water, let it boil full fifteen minutes after the real boiling began, and served it with rich cream. It was delicious and we were all won.

"I have since sung the praises of Postum Food Coffee on many, many occasions and have induced numbers of friends to abandon coffee and use Postum, with remarkable results. The wife of a college professor said to me a short time ago that nothing had ever produced so marked a change in her husband's health as the leaving off of coffee and the use of Postum Food Coffee." Chicago Letter.

Sunday, Nov. 3, the Monroe Street church dedicated its new house of worship. In the morning the pastor, C. C. Morrison, preached the dedicatory sermon, and despite unfavorable weather succeeded in raising $6,800. In the afternoon a fellowship service was held, at which Bro. Allen and Bro. Amer, representing our brethren, and several pastors representing neighboring churches, spoke. The evening audience was privileged in hearing a characteristically brilliant sermon by the gifted Dr. Gunsaulus. All the services were happily planned and successfully carried out. The church cost $20,000. The plan is admirable and the effect far more pleasing than that of the ordinary church. Great credit is due the pastor, who has been ceaseless in his efforts to bring about this consummation. Monroe Street church is composed of numbers of characters who are beautiful in their steady persistence. The former pastors, J. W. Ingram, Bro. Edson and George T. Swift, will rejoice with the church in the completion of its house, two have passed beyond, nevertheless they will rejoice.

The annual meeting of the Chicago missionary society was held at the Great Northern hotel the evening of Nov. 4. The reports for the past year showed that $4,000 had been received for missionary work, as against $2,250 the previous year; that the efforts of the past year had been expended in getting the missions housed rather than in evangelistic work, and that the year's work was encouraging. The society re-elected the same board, except that Roland A. Nichols was elected as an additional member, making the new board eight in number. Marion Stevens was made president of the society.

The board was instructed to continue Bro. Taylor as superintendent of missions and Bro. A. Larrahee as the assistant.

The state C. W. B. M. offered to pay the salary of an evangelist for Chicago. This offer was received with great enthusiasm, and the board instructed to engage Bro. Taylor as the evangelist, so that there would be more money left for supplementary missions in their current expenses. It was decided to make an effort to raise $8,000 for missions the coming year. The outlook is hopeful.

Dr. E. S. Ames has been made an instructor in the University of Chicago.

Dr. H. L. Willett is giving a course of lectures on Prophecy at the Central Y. M. C. A. Auditorium, Mondays at noon.

J. H. O. Smith has spoken several times for the Union church since the division. The church has not yet reported a pastor called. The audiences are large.

T. S. Tinsley closed his work with the North Side church Sunday last.

The missionary society will hold its quarterly rally Sunday, Nov. 10. Bro. Stevens will make the chief address.

E. E. Faris, of Africa, addressed the ministerial association Monday.

W. A. Bartlett has been installed as pastor of the First Congregational church. This church is a monument of the lamented Dr. Goodwin. For a quarter of a century he went in and out before this people with no sensational heraldings but with the message of the kindly Christ whose spirit seemed thoroughly to possess him. By his first sermon Mr. Bartlett promises to be a worthy successor. His text was, "I am not ashamed of the gospel." After lamenting the fact that men give every other imaginable reason for inviting men to church but their need of the gospel—he said:

"There is nothing else worth preaching than the gospel. There is not time to preach anything else but the gospel. If Augustine had been preaching from his day to this on nothing but the gospel he could hardly have touched the hem of its garment.

"I have heard men intimate that we need something broader than the gospel in these days. They would have us narrow down to the petty affairs of this life and the more petty

George Darsie and The Praise Hymnal

"I regard THE PRAISE HYMNAL, just issued by the Fillmore Bros., of Cincinnati, an admirable song book for our churches:

1. "It seems just right in size and shape.
2. "Its type is large, clear and beautiful.
3. "It has many of the old classic hymns and tunes which have stood the test of time.

4. "It has a large number of new and fresh hymns and tunes, representing the most popular that have come into recent use, and others which now see the light for the first time—a considerable proportion of which, in my judgment, are destined to become favorites.

5. "Some of its hymns that are inferior, and the rushing "hippety-hop" tunes coupled with them, I should have omitted, but then I am a little "cranky" on that point, and besides the blemish is small, for there are not many of them.

6. "I am struck by the absence of "useless lumber," so common in hymnals, and believe a larger percentage of these hymns are singable than is usual.

7. "The 60 odd pages of Psalms and other Scriptures at the beginning, designed to promote responsive readings in the worship of our churches, is one of the best features of the book.

opinions of men. They would actually have us preach the irrelevant and half-conceived ideas of men like ourselves, and presume to call that broad."

Standing together as to the importance of the gospel, it is not a far step to unity of conception as to its essential truth.

Dr. H. W. Thomas, long the pastor of the People's church, meeting in McVickar's theater, has closed his pastorate to undertake the general oversight of the People's Church of America. Dr. Thomas will have at his command a great deal of money as one friend alone has given a million dollars. Frank Crane, of the Methodist Church, succeeds to the pastorate of the People's church. It is a surprise to some that an orthodox Methodist should be chosen, remembering the exclusion of Dr. Thomas from that communion. But both Methodism and Dr. Thomas have changed in the years intervening since the trial. Methodism has been greatly liberalized and Dr. Thomas's faith has been greatly steadied and deepened. He does not now "faintly trust the larger hope" but—

"He faced the specters of the mind
And laid them; thus he came at length
To find a stronger faith his own"

Then again, the author of "The Religion of To-morrow" has been for years an independent spirit in the Methodist Church. Undoubtedly he will be glad to have a pulpit around which there will be no limitations other than his own choosing. He is not an orator, but he says bright unconventional and unexpected things. He has not drawn as large audiences as several other Methodist ministers.

The following reason, which Mr. Crane gave for his acceptance of the People's church, is worthy of much pondering:

"The tendency of modern denominational church management is to move away from the masses. Our best churches and most able preachers follow in the exodus of the wealthier class of people from the center of the city to the suburb. Meanwhile the heart of the city has a population growing ever more dense; boarding houses, hotels and apartment buildings are filled with young men and women coming fresh from the country into the maelstrom of civic temptation. It does not seem practical for any one denomination to maintain down town preaching places except as 'missions,' and the idea of 'mission' for the poor and a fine church and service for the well to do does not seem to me to be in harmony with the spirit of Jesus."

The Methodist is the only evangelical denomination that has "down-town" preaching in Chicago, and they are about to discontinue it; yet there are a dozen "liberal" orators with large audiences. It seems as if the churches in the cities are located where they are least needed. If the People's church is to become a denomination, as it now seems it will, it is well that Frank Crane, with a firm grasp of the great doctrines of Christianity, is to be one of its leaders.

I have made $560.00 in 80 days selling Dish-washers. I did my housework at the same time. I don't canvass. People come or send for the Dish-washers. I handle the Mound City Dish-washer. It is the best on the market. It is lovely to sell. It washes and dries the dishes perfectly in two minutes. Every lady who sees it wants one. I will devote all my future time to the business, and expect to clear $4,000.00 this year. Any intelligent person can do as well as I have done. The Gospel of the Helping Hand.

In a recent conversation with a great leader in Israel, he remarked that "before our National Benevolent Association can enter upon a career of greatest usefulness, three things are necessary: First, the people must be informed concerning the needs and purposes of the association; second, the people must be patiently and earnestly exhorted to give it money with which to prosecute its ministry of love; third, the people must be convinced that men of sanctified business sagacity are interested in the association and are official factors in the judicious investment and distribution of the money they give."

As rapidly as possible, we are informing the church of its need for such a ministry and of the association's needs. Wherever opportunity permits, we exhort people to have fellowship with those who are trying to lighten the world's great burden of woe. The consecrated women, in whose hearts our National Benevolent Association had birth, and who have contributed so much to its present power and usefulness, are widely known.

I wish briefly to introduce to the brotherhood some of the brethren vitally interested in the work of the association, and to give assurance that if our receipts were to amount to millions annually, our board of managers is fully capable of correctly solving all the problems the distribution of such great wealth would present.

Among the brethren constituting this board, I wish to name W. D. Harrison, merchant; R. D. Patterson, dept. manager, Buxton & Skinner; W. H. McClain, sec'y Provident Association; O. C. Shedd, of the firm of Creve Coeur Lake Ice Co.; F. M. Wright, firm of Sam'l Cupples Wooden Ware Co.; W. D. Pittman, sec'y Drummond Realty Co.; A. H. Duncan, firm Mayfield Woolen Co.; W. J. Morley, of Morley Bros. Medicine Co.; F. E. Udell, pres. Provident Chemical Co.; F. M. Call, pres. Standard Adding Machine Co.; J. H. Allen, of Allen-West Commission Co.; Robt. H. Stockton, pres. Majestic Range Co.; H. M. Meier, vice-pres. Missouri Trust Co., and J. H. Garrison, pres. Christian Publishing Co.

Some of these are known to men of affairs as merchant princes and molders of public opinion. To us they are all known as princely Christian men, who delight in honoring God and in His name to help alleviate the sorrows of earth. They are broad minded men, wide in their sympathies, and yet sufficiently conservative to safeguard every dollar given us from waste or poor investment.

Those considering the advisability of loaning us money on the annuity plan need have no uneasiness about the security of their loans, when such men have helped devise our financial system. Indeed we believe, did our brethren of means know the personnel of our board, many thousands of dollars would seek investment in our annuity bonds.

Hoping the church will yet supplant the lodge in popular favor as the almoner of God's good gifts, and that the orphan and worn out, world-forsaken veteran of the cross may have a warm place in every heart and receive substantial proof of the love of Christ's disciples, I am

Upper Ohio Valley Notes.

R. F. Strickler has been called for all his time at Quaker City. He was recently ordained by Chester Sprague at Centerville, O., W. Stiff, of Brilliant, and H. Tilock, of Hope-dale, assisting.

At the regular monthly meeting of the upper Ohio Valley ministerial association held at Brilliant recently, A. L. Streater, of West Liberty, read an excellent paper on "The History of Philosophy."

J. H. Bristor, of Bethesda recently held a meeting at Chestnut Level, with 38 additions. Until last year no co-operative pastor had preached there for a quarter of a century.

J. W. Kerns, of Steubenville, O., and N. C. Wells, of New Cumberland, W. Va., were the only preachers from the vicinity that were privileged to attend the Minneapolis convention.

The C. E. society of the Bellaire church celebrated Forefathers' day Tuesday evening, Nov. 5. J. B. Smith, pastor at Moundville, W. Va., spoke on "Walter Scott," and C. M. Watson, of Bellaire, on "The Current Restoration." The latter speech was illustrated by 44 stereopticon views of places and persons of importance in connection with our movement.

Wheeling seems to believe that "variety is the spice of life." Each Lord's day brings a new preacher before the congregation at that place. No pastor has as yet been settled upon.

Good reports come from Bethany. The writer was delighted with the excellent prospects as he saw them in a visit made recently to the old college. C. C. Redgrave, of "In the Footsteps of the Pioneers" lecture fame, has been employed as an agent for the college.

A Letter of Thanks from Bro. J. Z. Tyler.

Under date of November 5, Bro. J. Z. Tyler in a letter to the editor, says:

"The postman has just brought me a letter containing another enclosure through you. How can I adequately thank you and all others who have been so kind and generous? It is no exaggeration to say that I am utterly unable to fittingly form my feelings into speech. So far as possible I have written personal notes to all who have sent in offerings and to most of them I have sent copies of my 'Recollections.' You will be glad to know that the total amount sent in has reached the sum of $513.00. How much this means to us as we think of the love that prompted it!

"And how shall I respond to the affectionate letter of remembrance sent from the Minneapolis convention through you! There are some revelations being made to me, and not least among them all is the loving esteem of my brethren. I have always loved the brotherhood, but it is dearer to me to-day than ever before. I wish they all knew how deeply we appreciate their loving words and generous deeds to us.

"I am sorry I cannot report improvement in my health; but it seems to remain just about as it was when you last saw me. I am able to be up and about and to attend church every Lord's day. But I am utterly unable to do any work. I am devoutly thankful that my affliction has in no way affected my mind or darkened my spirit. I have never had a more intense desire than now to preach the gospel of the grace of God. I think the experience through which I am passing would enable me to give a richer and more helpful message. What a joy it would be to me if my health should be so far restored as to enable me to enter the active ministry again! Whether I ever will or not I know not, but the Master will do that which is best. I am glad for the years in which I have been per-

Bright's Disease and Diabetes Cured.

Harvard University Acting as Judges.

Irvine K. Mott, M. D., of Cincinnati, O., demonstrated before the editorial board of the Evening Post, one of the leading daily papers of Cincinnati, the power of his remedy to cure the worst forms of kidney diseases. Later a public test was instituted under the auspices of the Post, and five cases of Bright's Disease and Diabetes were selected by them and placed under DR. MOTT'S care. In three months' time all were pronounced cured. Harvard University having been chosen by the board to make examination of the cases before and after the treatment.

Any one desiring to read the details of this public test can obtain copies of the papers by writing to Dr. Mott for them.

This public demonstration gave Dr. Mott an international reputation that has brought him into correspondence with people all over the world and several noted Europeans are numbered among those who have taken his treatment and been cured.

The Doctor will correspond with those who are suffering with Bright's Disease, Diabetes or any kidney trouble, either in the first, intermediate or last stages, and will be pleased to give his expert opinion free to those who will send him a description of their symptoms. An essay which the doctor has prepared about kidney troubles and describing his new method of treatment will also be mailed by him. Correspondence for this purpose should be addressed to IRVINE K. Christian Lesson Commentary for 1902.

Among the "helps" in the study of the current Bible-school lessons produced from year to year the Christian Lesson Commentary has come into and maintained itself in the first rank.

Sunday-school workers and students have come to realize that when the name of W. W. Dowling is signed to the promise made it means careful and painstaking study and investigation of all the themes presented in the year which it covers.

The volume for 1902 is the climax of seven-teen successive years. Fault has sometimes been found with the international series of Sunday-school lessons; but if this fact is considered, that the entire Bible has been studied verse by verse and chapter by chapter as it probably would not have been studied if it had not been for the introduction of this series, their value cannot be estimated.

The present volume is a delight to the eye, a Thesaurus of information, and an easily followed analysis of the lessons for 1902.

God bless the work and its author, and all who study the word with its help.

the nature and effects of alcoholic drinks and other narcotics, began to be a legal requirement for all pupils in the public schools of this country. During the past ten or fifteen years the children have been carrying from the schools to the homes of the 75,000,000 people of the United States, the story of the evil nature and bad effects of alcoholic drinks and other narcotics. As a result of the diffusion of this knowledge the railroads of the United States now almost universally refuse employment to men who drink whether on or off duty.

Hon. Carroll D. Wright's Labor Bureau investigations show that more than 75 per cent. of the employers of skilled labor in the United States require total abstinence of their employes and 50 per cent. of the employers of unskilled labor demand the same. These requirements, the cordial acquiescence in them by the employed, and the commercial supremacy which this knowledge helped to secure to the United States, have been promoted by the truth taught by the school that alcoholic drinks injure working ability.

The different reception given by workmen to the employers' demand for abstinence where scientific temperance is not taught in the public schools is well illustrated by the following incident: The manager of the Borsig factory in Germany recently posted an order forbidding the workmen to bring into the factory beer or spirituous liquors or to drink the same during working hours. The workmen, numbering over a thousand, held a meeting and objected to the order. The next day they conspicuously carried in their beer. During the excitement caused by the order a pamphlet appeared by an old factory official who affirmed that the use of alcoholic drinks was detrimental to the laborer's own interest. He referred to the cleverness and sobriety of the American workmen which makes them able to do very exact and precise work, which he says is not possible in German industry because of the drinking habits of the laboring classes.

The American workman does not resent the employer's demand for abstinence because he has learned, often from his child in the public schools, that alcohol not only dulls the brain but weakens that nerve control of muscle that is necessary to the precision essential for fine work.

The nomination for knighthood of Sir Hiram Maxim, the American born inventor, for his work in England, was one of the last official acts of Queen Victoria. In an article in the June number of The World's Work, Sir Hiram furnishes indirect testimony to the same point. While describing the results of the English trades union, he adds: "The English workman spends a great part of his earnings in beer, tobacco and betting; he has no ambition." Of course not, for beer in dulling the brain dulls ambition. "The American workman," he says, "wishes to get on; he accomplishes a great deal more work in a day than any other workman in the world." "He does not drink," says another English writer.

England is beginning to see the difference in results between occasional talks by temperance advocates to school children and the systematic graded public school study of this topic required by law in the United States. At a recent meeting in

A Factor in Industrial Competition.

The following article which has appeared in papers in Belgium, France and England was sent from this country for publication in Europe by M. Rudolph Meyhoffer, who came from Brussels as an international delegate to the Young Men's Christian Association Jubilee in Boston last June. He stayed long enough to study industrial and educational conditions in our leading states, including the burning question of American trade supremacy. The conclusions of this article, presenting a glimpse of how others see us, cannot fail to be of interest to all American readers.

England and other European countries are anxiously asking for the causes of the commercial supremacy of the United States. A recent number of the English edition of the Review of Reviews says:

"Cassier's Magazine [an English periodical] contains an interesting series of short articles by some of the most prominent engineers and business men in the United States upon the question of American competition. Most of the writers agree in saying that the American workman is the chief agent in enabling American manufacturers to take first place in the world. Mr. Walter MacFarland, of Pittsburg, gives one important reason for this. He says, 'It appears that the American workmen are much better time-keepers and far less given to dissipation than those in Great Britain. One of the best firms of British shipbuilders, which has had no trouble with its men for years, recently stated that there is a loss of time, amounting to nearly 20 per cent., due largely to drunkenness. If anything approaching these figures is true generally, there can be no surprise that [English] firms open to competition from well managed American works should have a hard time.'"

In inquiring as to the cause of this greater sobriety of the American, the fact appears that twenty years ago business interests in the United States paid no attention to the effect of the beverage use of alcohol or of tobacco on working ability. About that time, the now almost universal study of physiology, which includes with other laws of health those which relate to Birmingham, addressed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the presiding officer, Mr. Edwin Smith, said: "We are being beaten in skill by America. She has been lavish in spending money in educating the brains of her people while we have been lavish in poisoning them. If we spent per head on alcohol the same as America, our drink bill would be about sixty-six millions [pounds] less than it now is. We cannot succeed commercially while we are handicapped in this way to the extent of 48 per cent. The great mass of the working people of this country are totally ignorant of the effect of drink." He said that England ought not to leave the education on this subject merely to the temperance societies, but that it "should be undertaken by the state. Surely if the state must encourage the traffic for revenue it should in fairness educate every child in government schools as to the nature and danger of alcohol, and the benefits of total abstinence." He added in closing: "If the state will only educate the children against strong drink, England commercially may even yet be saved."

It has been wisely said that, "industrial supremacy belongs to that country which enjoys the cheapest materials, the most improved machinery and the most efficient labor." As clear brains and steady nerves are needed for the preparation of both material and machinery, as well as for their use in production, that nation, other things being equal, whose brains are not dulled by alcohol and other narcotics, will win in the world's competitions.

Farmer Stackpole: "How many stops has that 'ere new organ that ye bought for your daughter got?"

Farmer Hawbuck (grimly): "Three—breakfast, dinner and supper."

"Yes, sir," remarked the pompous individual in the noisy clothes, "I'm a self-made man, sir—and the architect of my own fortune."

"Well," rejoined the matter-of-fact person addressed, "it's a lucky thing for you that the building inspector didn't happen along at the time."

Modern Farming.

It was a fitting reply when some one defended the first "billion-dollar Congress" a few years ago by remarking that this is a billion-dollar country. It is a much bigger and richer country than even we can easily realize, and it is not to be wondered at that our European cousins do not realize it. As to wheat, for instance. Frank M. Todd, in Ainslee's, says:

Joseph, the son of Jacob, had to warehouse a good deal of wheat in the seven fat years to carry the Egyptians through the seven lean ones. The American farmers produced enough in 1898 to make Joseph's little stock look like a pea in a tub. If it had all been piled in form on the plain of Gizeh it would have made nine pyramids the size of the pyramids of Cheops, and with the surplus another could have been reared four-fifths as large. That was the biggest American wheat crop ever recorded. It amounted to 675,148,705 bushels, grown on 44,045,278 acres of land. Next year the yield was lighter, and the Americans only turned off seven and nine-tenths pyramids of wheat. In 1900 they even fell short of that, producing only a paltry seven and a half pyramids. Still, that would have been a comfortable addition to Joseph's stock, and considering that it was grown on a smaller acreage than the crop of 1899 was a rather creditable performance. The deficiency was made up with a 2,000,000,000-bushel corn crop, and 210,000,000 bushels of potatoes.

There was considerable ado over the increase of the standing army to 100,000 men. If every man in such an army were a good fast milker, and worked at it ten hours a day, the whole force couldn't milk more than one-third of the cows that are now being milked in this country—not to speak of the goats. And if they could milk them all, and if they did, and if they milked them into the Chicago drainage canal, beginning with it entirely empty, they could milk it bankful in about two weeks.

The acreage of American farms in 1890 was greater than the combined acres of France, Germany, Austria, Italy and the British Isles. The value of their realty was $13,279,252,649, and the tools and implements on them represented an outlay of nearly half a billion more. They produced over $3,500,000,000 worth of food and raw material. The value of their exports in 1899 was $792,811,733, or more than half the value of the entire exports of the country by $42,000,000. The growth of this industry had the most primitive beginnings, and has gone forward in the face of the most discouraging vicissitudes.

The American of the revolutionary period was an extremely poor farmer. Looking back on his methods and his work, it is hard to say which were the more crude, his implements or his ideas.

He used a wooden plow; he was afraid an iron one would "poison the soil." He had not yet learned that glanders was contagious, and would work and stable healthy stock alongside stock affected by it, and wonder what there was in the soil, air or climate that carried them off. He didn't understand the use of fertilizers, and instead of spreading his barnyard manure on his fields, he let it accumulate around his barn until the approaches were impassable. Then he dug the barn out and moved it. Instead of rotating crops to save his soil, he planted according to the phases of the moon. There were few sheep in the country, and other like stock was poor and scanty. In Virginia the belief prevailed that it would kill cows to house and milk them in the winter.

Transportation was poor, and continued so for a long time. The roads could not have been worse. Markets were scattered and far between. Each farm attempted to be self-sustaining in as large a degree as possible. What the farmer couldn't grow or his wife make they went without. Wasteful methods of tillage eventually exhausted a soil originally rich, and in the reign of Andrew Jackson agriculture had fallen into such an alarming state of neglect and inefficiency that the government had to come to its relief. Through the efforts of Henry L. Ellsworth, Commissioner of Patents, a bureau was established in the Patent Office which developed into the Department of Agriculture. By aid of that department principally farming has been made a science.

The Presidents' Verses.

It has been customary at inaugurations, says the Washington correspondent of the Chicago Record-Herald, for the President or some friend to select the chapter at which the book shall be opened, and the verse upon which he shall press his lips, passages that are particularly appropriate being chosen. That selected by Mr. McKinley to kiss, when he took the inaugural oath in 1897, was unusually appropriate. It read: "Give me new wisdom and knowledge, that I may go out and come in before this people; for who can judge this, thy people, that is so great."

President McKinley not only selected this passage from the holy scriptures because of its remarkable appropriateness, but in his inaugural address twice, at the beginning and at the end, acknowledged divine sovereignty, and invoked the guidance of omnipotent power.

The verse that General Grant kissed was equally appropriate, and is found in the eleventh chapter of Isaiah, as follows: "And the spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him; the spirit of wisdom and understanding; the spirit of counsel and might; the spirit of knowledge and the fear of the Lord. And shall make him of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord, and he shall not judge after the sight of his eyes, nor reprove after the hearing of his ears."

The verse that President Hayes kissed was accidental, and proved to be prophetic: "His enemies encompassed him like bees, but he would not destroy them."

President Arthur and President Cleveland did not make any selection, and the passages they kissed are unknown. Mr. Cleveland took the oath, at both inaugurations, upon a little red Bible, which was given him by his mother when he was a boy.

"When——"

The following choice bit of literary criticism is from the pen of the anonymous funny man who writes the "Echoes of the Streets" in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat:

Readers of periodical literature will have noticed that certain forms of stories, poems, etc., appear epidemically, and after raging with more or less severity for a time, disappear to make way for new forms. At present we are suffering from a virulent attack of dialect rhymes, which might be classified under the head "When Verses," since they all begin with the word "when," and can be traced back to Riley's really meritorious "When the Frost Is on the Punkin" rhymes. Not a day passes but we have a case of "when"—"When Cindy Sweeps the Floor," "When Dad Blows Out the Gas," and all the remarkable things that be or occur "when——." This school of poetry threatens to become as distinct as the "Limerick," with its "There was an old," etc., or the "Oh, Come-Yes" ballads of forty years ago. And this is but the beginning, perhaps, of a long line of similar schools for—

When the why is on the wherefore,
And the which is with the whence,
And the what has lost the wherewith,
And the whoso hath gone hence,

Then the how will woo the whichness,
And the whom shall swat the then,
And the wheres and hows and whoses
Take the burden of the when.

Long Hair and Pianism.

The Musical Messenger quotes from a musical contemporary the following story of the sorrows of a pianist who was not blessed with the abundant locks which the popular virtuoso is expected to possess:

"Among my professional acquaintances is one who, in his own opinion, deserves sympathy more than any other one in the world. He is very short and very thin, his eyes are weak, and his head very bald. He earns a poor living by giving piano lessons and by playing at a cheap dancing school.

"When Paderewski first came to this country and created such a furor, my friend was extremely anxious to hear him play. He saved from his scanty income enough to get a good seat near the stage, and being somewhat timid, asked me to go with him. I consented, as I was anxious to note the effect on my friend, whom I knew to be impressionable. The minute Paderewski appeared on the stage my companion turned his gaze on him as if forgetting all else in the world. As soon as the first sounds rang through the hall he trembled from head to foot, and sinking his head, slowly laid his hand on his bald spot.

"Thus he sat during the whole concert. When that was over he was still so absorbed that I had to attract his attention. When he turned to me I saw that his eyes were filled with tears. In order to cheer him up a little I went to his home with him, trying to interest him by talking about the concert and the great player we had heard.

"As soon as we entered his room, small and dingy, my friend went to the only ornament he had, a small mirror, and made a careful inspection of his bald head. Then he turned to me, and in a voice choking as with incipient madness, grief and despair, exclaimed: 'O injustice! Horrible injustice! One is endowed with a great talent and a head covered with splendid hair, while another is denied both.'

"Then he threw himself on his bed and wept. Despite the pathos and tragedy of the affair to my friend it was with difficulty that I could refrain from laughing. Presently, when he had partly recovered himself, I asked what there was in common between hair and talent.

"Ah, my friend, had I the hair of Paderewski I would be considered a far better pianist than I really am, and, as for him, he would not suffer if he had my bald head, for he has a great talent."

The Lonely Grandparents.

Do you younger people always think of the loneliness of the aged? They are provided with a pleasant room, with the necessities, and even the luxuries of life, but many of their friends have passed onward into the other life, and their circle of acquaintances has narrowed, too. Also they have fewer interests, and occasionally they are dependent. When this is the unfortunate case, every possible pains should be taken to show them that the reasons for gratitude are on the side of their children and grandchildren, who are only paying a just debt when scrupulously caring for their parents.

With the return of each anniversary there is the opportunity to draw them into the good cheer, to give them unobtrusive attention. Is the old lady a little deaf, the old gentleman perhaps almost blind? Some younger ears must hear, some younger eyes see, for both. Please them by gifts which convey some sentiment, not by those which are too strictly utilitarian.—Margaret E. Sangster, in Good Housekeeping.

A New Departure.

A New, Effectual and Convenient Cure for Catarrh.

Of catarrh remedies there is no end, but of catarrh cures, there has always been a great scarcity. There are many remedies to relieve, but very few that really cure.

The old practice of snuffing salt water through the nose would often relieve and the washes, douches, powders and inhalers in common use are very little, if any, better than the old fashioned salt water douche.

The use of inhalers and the application of salves, washes and powders to the nose and throat to cure catarrh is no more reasonable than to rub the back to cure kidney disease. Catarrh is just as much a blood disease as kidney trouble or rheumatism and it cannot be cured by local treatment any more than they can be.

To cure catarrh, whether in the head, throat or stomach, an internal antiseptic treatment is necessary to drive the catarrhal poison out of the blood and system, and the new catarrh cure is designed on this plan and the remarkable success of Stuart's Catarrh Tablets is because being used internally, it drives out catarrhal infection through action upon stomach, liver and bowels.

Wm. Zimmerman, of St. Joseph, relates an experience with catarrh which is of value to millions of catarrh sufferers everywhere. He says: "I neglected a slight nasal catarrh until it gradually extended to my throat and bronchial tubes and finally even my stomach and liver became affected, but as I was able to keep up and do a day's work I let it run along until my hearing began to fail me and then I realized that I must get rid of catarrh or lose my position, as I was clerk and my hearing was absolutely necessary.

"Some of my friends recommended an inhaler, another a catarrh salve, but they were no good in my case, nor was anything else until I heard of Stuart's Catarrh Tablets, and bought a package at my drug store. They benefited me from the start and in less than four months I was completely cured of catarrh although I had suffered nearly all my life from it.

They are pleasant to take and so much more convenient to use than other catarrh remedies that I feel I cannot say enough in favor of Stuart's Catarrh Tablets."

A little book on cause and cure of catarrh will be mailed free by addressing F. A. Stuart Co., Marshall Mich., and the tablets are sold by all druggists in the United States and Canada.

As the steamer pitched and rolled in the waves, the traveler heard, through the thin partition, a wailing voice in the next state-room, exclaiming:

"Oh, mamma, it's coming on again, worse than ever!"

Then he heard a sleepy voice in reply:

"Marie, why don't you follow the directions you told me about before we came on board?"

"Because I've forgotten whether I ought to breathe in as the vessel rises, and let the breath out as it moves downward, or whether it ought to be the other way, and oh! oh! I wish I was dead!"

With the Children.

The Runaways.—VI.

Harry and Emily perched themselves on the bank to see what would happen. For a long time nothing happened. Zep had fastened a rock a little way above his pin-hook, and farther up, still, he had tied a piece of wood as a cork. The rock was his "lead." On the pin-hook was a very small worm which had been found with infinite patience. No wonder it had been hard to find, for it was so small it was fairly yellow. At last Zep "got a bite." The piece of wood fastened to his string began to shake and dip just as if it had been on a week-day. Zep braced his knees and suddenly jerked up his line while the children held their breath to look. All they saw was the pin-hook. They had seen it before, so they felt rather disappointed. Emily did not wish her brother to fish on Sunday; she knew it was wrong, but if he did fish, there was no use in not catching anything.

"Zep," whispered Harry presently, "I wouldn't fish, if I was you!" This was his way of stating his moral scruples.

"Maybe you wouldn't but I would," was the impatient and natural retort.

"Harry," whispered Emily, "get him to stop. It looks so wicked! Don't you know the boy we read about that fished on Sunday, and it was a deep, deep river and he fell in—"

"Keep still!" whispered Zep. "I've got a whale, here!"

"I'm going to see that whale," whispered Harry, creeping to the very edge of a high bank that looked directly down into the stream.

"Some I," whispered Emily, keeping close behind him. They paused on one of those dangerous looking projections that older people warn you to keep off, for fear of its caving in—the only spot you really care to stand upon. Zep's piece of wood was darting here and there.

"I believe it's a minnow," said Harry.

"If you can't believe any better than that," returned Zep, "'sno use to believe a-tall. Look out!"

At that moment his "cork" disappeared with such violence that his "pole" bent.

"Pull 'er out! Pull 'er out!" shouted Harry, beginning, as was his custom when greatly excited, to jump up and down. "Pull her, Zep, she's a whale!"

The next moment two whales were to be seen in the stream, but neither was fastened upon Zep's pin-hook. When they were on land, these whales went by the name of Harry and Emily Lamont. This is what had happened: Harry and his sister had taken up their position on a point of the high bank which was already separated from the mainland by a deep crevice. When Harry jumped up and down there was a land-slide; everything went one way—and that way was toward the deepest part of the branch. When they felt the earth dissolving under their feet, the children had enough presence of mind to jump. The water came up to Harry's shoulders and to Emily's neck—of course I do not speak of the water that splashed, for it came as high as the top of the bank. Emily was so frightened by the suddenness of her leap, and by the coldness of the tide which threatened to roll over her, that she uttered scream after scream and tried to clutch her inseparable brother for support. But it happened that Harry had leaped farther than, in her half-blinded condition, she supposed. She stretched out her hands, clutched for Harry and caught only two handfuls of air. Then she stumbled and fell. The next moment all that was to be seen of poor Emily were two little bare feet some distance apart, with their soles turned up toward the treetops.

Wild with alarm, Harry waded toward her, when the feet disappeared and something struck him in the stomach, sending him backwards in the water. It was Emily's head that struck him, as she was returning to her natural position. In the meantime Zep had quit fishing. His first impulse had been to become angry on account of the noise and splashing—one would not wish to catch the kind of fish that would bite in the midst of all that tumult. But in a moment he saw there was great danger of his sister's being drowned. He leaped into the water, and came up to Emily just as her head rose above the water. He caught her and with Harry's help the girl was dragged out upon the shore. She was coughing, crying, choking, and in other ways manifesting unmistakable but painful evidences of still being alive. When they had recovered a little from their fright, Zep said, "What did you want to get on the edge for, anyhow?" He was ashamed to let them know how his heart was rejoicing over the rescue, so he tried to hide his feelings by brusque speech. But there were tears in his eyes.

"It all come from your fishin' on Sunday," sobbed Emily.

"Did you catch that fish?" asked Harry, suddenly. "It all come from Harry dancin' up and down like he always does," said Zep, scorning to answer the last question. "I do know Harry is the most unfortunate person, always getting us into trouble!"

"It was fishin' on Sunday," cried Emily. "Oh, it is so co-o-old!"

"I believe it was the fishin', myself," said Harry, who was not disposed to take the blame. "But what can we do about our clothes?" They decided upon the following plan: Emily would retire to the box-car, undress therein, and "poke her things out the door." The boys would spread them in the sun, and, in the privacy of the woods, divest themselves of their own garments and dry them in the same manner. The plan was carried out. Presently Emily was sitting dismally alone in her car through a crevice of which she could see her clothes spread out in the sun. The boys were whiling away their waiting-time by swimming in the branch. It was pretty cold, but they "stayed in" as long as they could because neither wished to "come out first." As they drew on their half-dried clothes with much shivering and chattering of teeth, Zep said suddenly,

"Listen!"

"Yes," said Harry, "I heard it first, though. Horses coming!"

"'Tain't but one horse," said Zep, dressing in such haste that he missed the leg of his trousers. The sound galloped nearer and nearer.

"Let 'em come," said Harry boldly, "who keers? They can't see us!"

"It's a-stoppin' up!" said Zep suddenly. "Harry, you're more dressed than I am; sneak out and see what's up." Harry crept to the edge of the wood, buttoning things as he went.

He was in time to see a horseman bring his steed down to a walk. "Whoa!" said the man. The horse stopped and the man leaped to the ground and began to tie the animal to a small tree near the railroad. Harry ran toward him as fast as he could. When the horse was tied, its master started toward the box-car. "Hi! Hi!" shouted Harry. "Don't you go in there!"

It is said that a young preacher once, desiring to get the opinion of Professor Jewett as to a sermon he had preached, asked him what he thought of it. The professor looked at him a moment and then slowly said: "Edward, if you would pluck a few of the feathers from the wings of your imagination and stick them in the tail of your judgment, you would make better sermons." That is a criticism not likely to be forgotten.

The Old Paths.*

TEXT:—Thus saith the Lord, Stand ye in the ways and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls: but they said, we will not walk therein.—Jer. 16:16.

In many sections of Palestine paths were the only thoroughfares. When through neglect they became obliterated, then travel was exceedingly slow and difficult. But as long as they were used, they offered far easier means of travel than the unopened wilds. There is a sense in which we may speak of moral and religious avenues as paths. The way along which men's thoughts travel, the way they permit their emotions and desires to go, the way they conduct their religious exercises—these are paths; and the prophet is calling the wanderers of his day back to the old paths, the good way.

Timely Advice.

What could be more timely for this beginning of the twentieth century? There is a veritable rage for novelty abroad. Material progress is extraordinary. There is no checking of the march of invention; indeed, it is so swift as to be almost dizzying. In some minds this forward movement in industry, this desertion of old machinery and old methods, calls for a similar movement in religion. And so Dowleism and Eddyism and all manner of fake religions are invented, and sweep some sections like a contagion.

But the fact is, that the wonderful march of industry and commerce is possible not because of the new, chiefly, but because of the old. Our boasted inventions are mere mechanical devices, which enable us to take advantage of powers and principles that are as old as the law of gravitation. Man has not created an ounce of energy or an atom of matter since time began. He has simply changed its form. And so in the higher things, the beneficent forces are old; the ways that have proved themselves are the old ways. It is always safe to walk in the way over which generations have passed with songs of triumph to the New Jerusalem.

How Construed.

But how are we to understand this? To cling to the old is not always wise. The old way may be an old rut. This advice might be made a defense for extreme conservatism, and a barrier to progress. But consider the circumstances that called it forth. The Hebrews had forsaken the living God to serve idols. They had wandered into pernicious error. This was not progress; it was retrogression. Progress could be found only in a return to the pathway of the fathers. And it is thus we are to interpret this passage. It is not the cry of conservatism, but the clarion call for advance. If a train is ditched, it can go forward only by going back to the track.

And so it is well, even when a new way seems to open up which promises safe and rapid transit, to recall the wise couplet,

"Be not the first by whom the new is tried, Nor yet the last to lay the old aside."

But in all questions of religious faith and life, the world will agree that the best way is the old way; the trouble is, men do not get the oldest of the old ways. The prophet calls the nation back to the law of Jehovah; and the conquering cry, the winning plea to-day, after so many defections, must be a repetition of this cry of Jeremiah, summoning the people "to the law and to the testimony;" to the living oracles; to him in whom both law and prophet find their fulfillment.

This has been the work of the reformers in all ages. It was the work of Wickliffe, and Huss, and Luther, and Knox. It was par excellence the work of the Campbells and Stone and Scott, of Pendleton and Errett and Rogers. And it is the unique distinction of the Disciples of Christ to-day that they carry on this work.

The Good Way.

The way is good. It is good for feet that have grown weary wandering in sectarian labyrinths. It is good because it is plain; because it leads to Jerusalem the golden; because over it passed the apostles and martyrs, all the early church, and indeed, the whole company of the redeemed. If you would know this way, hear the Master saying, "I am the way." Peace is promised to all who traverse it. The old way of becoming a Christian is not only a good way, it is the best. It is the way pointed out by Peter on Pentecost; the simple, unmistakable way of repentance and obedience, of confession and baptism. It is the way along which Philip guided the Ethiopian and Paul, the jailer. It is therefore better far than the way of priest or bishop or even mitred cardinal or pope. The old way of serving Christ is the best way; it is a way of sacrifice, of toil, of heroism. The old way of ordering life is the best way. "As Thou wilt" is its keynote.

Prayer.

We seek with eagerness. O God, the way of life. We seek to summon a world, tired of sin and bewildered with jangling voices, forward to Christ. Bless the work of restoration; send us valiant, wise, godly leaders. Crown the veterans whose arduous toils have whitened their heads and furrowed their cheeks. Make an end of sectarian strife and confusion and bring us to see eye to eye, in the freedom and joy of the truth, as it is in Christ the Lord. Amen.

World's Temperance Lesson.*

For the lesson of "Temperance Sunday," the lesson committee has selected a striking passage from the early prophecies of Isaiah, wherein the evangelical prophet sounds the trumpet of warning to his people, in language that applies perfectly to the conditions confronting our own nation. It would be well if the American people could be persuaded to unite in a candid study of this scripture, as a commentary upon their own life, and the possible fruit of their national and individual sins.

Isaiah was born during the latter half of the reign of Uzziah, king of Judah, whose rule extended over more than half a century of time. His son, Jotham, followed in his footsteps, and gave to the kingdom of Judah sixteen years more of comparative prosperity. At his death the throne was ascended by his son Ahaz, who turned away from the examples of his grandfather and father, to plunge into all the excesses of the idolatry of his day. The downward tendency of the nation, which had been in some degree checked by the efforts of his predecessors, now was accelerated, and it seemed about plunging over the very abyss of ruin. Indeed the day of its calamity was near at hand, and Isaiah becomes the herald of the approaching storm. God was about to abandon sinful Judah, and let her enemies triumph over her, until she should learn the lesson she had refused to read from the pages of his kindly providence, that righteousness alone can give to a nation permanent prosperity and peace.

The message of the prophet was of course unwelcome. It doubtless seemed rank heresy to many that he should foretell the abasement and distress of his people; and above all, that he should declare this to be their rightful heritage from the hand of God. It angered them that he cared more for their sins than their sufferings. "Other prophets have wept to sing their country's woes; Isaiah's burden is his people's guilt." He would have them know that God cares little for a people's material power or prosperity, but everything for its virtue and lofty ideals. Where tears would have dropped over their afflictions, suffered for righteousness' sake, burning words of rebuke fell like coals of fire upon their wayward hearts and hardened consciences. All true patriots have been censors of their people. Cromwell faced the victorious English Parliament, and instead of feeding their vanity with praises of their victory over the tyrant, exhorted them to address themselves to the matter of repentance and reformation. Such was the spirit of the great prophet of Jerusalem, Isaiah. He spared not to denounce the sins of his nation, and warn them of the impending ruin. And when hope of repentance and deliverance was past, he kept not still, but portrayed the coming calamity in colors that were fairly lurid with the flame of retribution.

Our lesson is selected from such a passage of his prophecy. Under the figure of a vineyard which had, despite the care and labor of the owner, brought forth only wild grapes, and was therefore abandoned to the wild beasts, he tells Israel that the Lord has despaired of them, and is about to withdraw his protecting hand, and suffer them to be destroyed. The causes of this abandonment are then set forth in graphic language. Injustice, greed, intemperance are the three prominent sins which had brought the nation to this low estate. The last named is emphasized in our lesson. The drunken feasts of the rich and mighty, with their accompaniments of music and dancing, had stultified their minds and hearts till "they regarded not the work of the Lord, neither considered the operation of his hands." Even the multitude had become depraved, until the whole nation were in bondage to ignorance, and consumed with never satisfied thirst. Amusement palled upon their taste, and life was but a daily effort to devise some new and gratifying diversion.

Does this not afford us a faithful picture of the present condition of society? Luxury abounds among the rich, and the wanton display of wealth in the service of sensual pleasure fills the soul of the poor with envy and unholy desire. The world seems bent on a carnival of pleasure seeking, and men are becoming amusement mad. Gambling is permeating social life to an alarming degree, and the home circle is invaded by the pleasure-monger till the quiet of the family hour about the evening lamp gives place to successive nights of revel. In all this work of demoralization, the saloon is easily leader. In its work Satan finds his chief delight, and society its supreme danger. The insatiable appetite of the liquor traffic calls for more young men and women, year by year, whose money enriches its treasury, and whose honor and promise are wantonly sacrificed upon its bloody altar. When our judges tell us that nine-tenths of our crime and pauperism are from drink; our physicians, that total abstinence would banish half our sickness; our statesmen, that intemperance numbers more victims than war, pestilence and famine combined, we do not wonder that the prophet says, "Hell hath enlarged her desire, and opened her mouth without measure," to receive the multitudes who are overcome by this arch foe of our race. "The mean man is bowed down, and the great man is humbled," for all classes are alike the objects of rum's deadly power. Except this enemy is speedily faced and fought unto victory, our nation has darker days before her than we have ever yet seen. This is not pessimism, it is simple and awful truth, which God is seeking to burn into the consciousness of a nation whose history has shown so large a measure of divine providence as to make her people fatally confident of her future.

In this emergency we look in vain to many of the great and mighty of our nation, to lead in the work of reform. Many of them are themselves "mighty to drink wine, and men of strength to mingle strong drink." They are blind to their own danger, and indifferent to that of others. The interests of party or policy shut their lips against the utterance of any protest, when they do see the evils, and in some cases they become so subservient to the giant evil as to even "justify the wicked for reward, and take away the righteousness of the righteous from him." The people need to be aroused, until their leaders shall be forced to take a stand for or against the saloon. Many good men are waiting only for opportunity to strike the blow which shall free us from this curse. Let no man or woman keep silence, until the victory is won.

Ladies With Superfluous Hair

On face, neck, arms, etc., will find it to their advantage to write for free booklet to the Dermatine Co., 1805 Market street, Room 65, St. Louis, Mo. That company makes the only remedy which permanently removes unsightly hair so that it will never grow again. The remedy is always effective and is absolutely harmless. Its action is marvelous and failure is impossible. It is unlike other preparations which give but temporary relief and do not kill the root of the hair. It will pay you to send for free booklet if afflicted with superfluous hair.

The Value Of Charcoal.

Few People Know How Useful it Is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better; it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines, and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking, or after eating onions or other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion; it whitens the teeth; and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics, in tablet form, or rather in the form of large, pleasant-tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood; and the beauty of it is that no harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician, in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

WHY?

Why do you, who live in the Mississippi Valley, send to New York, Boston, Philadelphia, or even to Chicago for a desired volume, when you can secure it much more quickly and just as cheap in St. Louis? This is a question that is very difficult to answer. We can supply you with any book that you wish—any respectable book, that is, French novels and blood-and-thunder-seven-buckets-of-gore-to-the-chapter romances are barred—no matter where or by whom published. Our business is by no means confined to the books we ourselves publish. Our catalogue contains only our own publications, in the main, but we can sell you any book you wish to purchase.

Concerning New Books.

We are unable, because of lack of space, to publish one-twentieth of all the complimentary notices and reviews of our later publications which we have received. The most we can do is to select a few that seem to fairly express the average appreciation of these new volumes.

The Spiritual Side of Our Plea. W. B. Harter, of Wilbur, Neb., writes: "It has been a pleasure to me to read this book. It is timely and should be widely read. You should be proud to be the publishers of such a book."

Elijah. J. W. Lowber says: "Queen Esther (by the same author) was good, but Elijah is better. One reason, doubtless, is the fact that Elijah is one of the most interesting characters to be found in the Old Testament, and I am glad to see that the author enters so fully into the spirit of Elijah. Practical lessons in Elijah are interesting and valuable."

J. B. Sweeney said, in the Christian Courier: "I have just finished reading Elijah, by M. M. Davis. To say that I was instructed and greatly pleased, expresses it very mildly. It is a better book than 'Queen Esther,' by the same author, and that is a very high commendation. It is a good volume for every Christian home, interesting and profitable for young and old alike. Secure a copy. It will more than repay you."

The Witness of Jesus. Following a short description of this work, the Christian Index says: "It is a book in neat and attractive form of 400 pages. Price $1.25. It is a book that will arouse thought. You may not always agree with the preacher, but you remember he was a kind, good man, and you may be greatly benefited by reading these stirring sermons. We are especially interested in the 'Remarks at the Communion Table,' together with the thanksgiving offered. It is evident that the observance was not, with Bro. Procter, a mere form; he thought of this beautiful Lord's Supper and expressed these thoughts with beauty and power when the moment came to give thanks for the emblems."

What Is Your Life? From the Young People's Paper we clip the following: "This is a book that one dare say to every young man and woman, read it. It will help you to be better men and women in every way. It is neither too heavy nor too light, but strikes the medium that good literature should. It deals with the physical, intellectual and moral sides of life—and from each view point makes a logical and substantial stand. The multiplication of such books cannot be too fast."

The American Revised Bible.

Since receiving a copy of the American Revised Bible, I have been thinking how pleased I would be if I could only do or say something that would be helpful toward increasing its popularity. For that the Revised Version is still unpopular cannot be denied, and it is a fact greatly to be deplored.

Possibly I may be wrong, but I have the best of reasons for believing that there is no one thing that will begin to do so much toward hastening the popularity of the American Revised Bible as its publication in our Sunday-school quarterlies; especially if it be printed in large type, and in what is called the "interwoven" text, a combination of the King James and Revised Versions. When printed in this manner, it is almost impossible to read the lesson from one version without at the same time noticing the different renderings of the other; and in this way it will be read by many who would not, if printed by itself, give it so much as a glance.

To ignore the Revised Version in Sunday-school quarterlies and lesson papers, seems to me all wrong, for as in the day school we are anxious that our children have the best text books possible, so it is just as necessary that they study the scriptures from the best version of the Bible. Why should they be obliged to study their lessons each Lord's day and memorize passages of scripture from a version which will soon be numbered with those of the past? If we pick up a quarterly in which the King James Version only is published, we will not read far in the notes on the lessons before coming to the words, "Better in the R. V." Now, what puzzles me is, if they think it so much better, why is it not published?

Why should a version be used of which nothing can be said in its favor except that it is more familiar? But for all its familiarity now the King James Bible twenty-one years after its publication was even less popular than is the Revised of to-day. There are those who talk as though the King James Bible existed from the creation; they do not seem to know or realize that the first edition was published in 1611, only 290 years ago, and that during the 229 years prior to its publication, we had no less than ten translations and revisions.

Again, I may be wrong, but I believe the words of Paul, when he says, "Prove all things, hold fast that which is good," are just as applicable to a study of the different versions of the Bible as to anything else; and it is my belief that, if people will lay aside their prejudices and with unbiased minds will commence to read and compare these versions, the vast majority will soon be ready to accept the American Revised Bible.

When studied in this way they cannot help seeing that owing to incorrect translations and the use of words that have so changed as in some cases to mean the exact opposite (as "by and by," Luke 21:9, for immediately); the King James Bible contains many passages which are offensive to many; others, like Gal. 1:10, that are ambiguous; some, like Luke 3:13, that are meaningless; and a few, like John 5:39, that are untrue.

And may God hasten the coming of the day when Christ's farewell prayer will finally be answered—when there will again be but the one church with its one article of faith, and when from the pulpit of this church with its divine creed, will ring out the glorious gospel of Jesus Christ, preached from the one version, the American Standard Edition of the Revised Bible.

OWSLEY.

Dr. Henry Owsley, of this city, passed over the river Oct. 31, 1901, aged 84 years and 27 days. He had been a disciple of our Lord more than half a century, having joined the Baptist church in Johnson county, Mo., in 1847. He heard Alexander Campbell in a series of sermons while attending medical lectures at Jacksonville, Ill., and was ever after a firm believer in the principles of the reformation. In 1865 he united with the Christian church in Lake county, Cal. He was born in Kentucky in 1817. His father removed to Boone county, Mo., in 1819, and to Johnson county a few years later where he was reared to manhood. He was married to Miss Louisiana Mansfield, in Caldwell county, Ky., March 11, 1847, who survives him. To them were born four children, three of whom are living. The eldest son lives in Idaho, while two, Hon. Alvin C. Owsley and Sister McGintie, are members of this church. There are 19 grandchildren and one great-grandchild—death never having entered any of the homes of his family, except as mentioned, until it claimed the aged father. His was a long and eventful life. He crossed the plains in an ox wagon in 1849, and again with horses in 1863.

WALLACE.

Died, in Carthage, Mo., Oct. 17, Victor A. Wallace, a prominent banker and citizen of Carthage. Mr. Wallace was a man of great force of character, yet so far as known to the writer, without an enemy. He was a constant attendant upon the services of the Christian church, gave freely to support it, was a man of prayer, "continuing instant in prayer"—a Christian in all things save in name. His character was evidently the product of Christianity. For some reason, however, Mr. Wallace never connected himself with the church. We have always supposed this was because of early religious impressions. We hope for the best for so good and so noble a man. His wife is widely known and loved and will have the sympathy of many hearts. The family so broken now will soon be reunited to be broken no more forever.

WILLIAMS.

Miss Maud Lucile Williams, daughter of T. A. and Amanda J. Williams, was born at Golden, Col., Oct. 4 1883, and died at Albany, Mo., Oct. 26, 1901. She was baptized while in her tenth year by her father, during his pastorate at Roseville, Ill. During the last two years she was a student in Central Christian College. As a musician she possessed more than ordinary ability. Miss Maud was the oldest of three children, the pride of her home and a favorite with all who knew her. She loved the church and lived a beautiful Christian life. It is now the fond hope of all who knew her that she is now well and at home with her God. May the promises of God and the hope of meeting again, comfort the heart-broken family.

WOODY.

Mrs. A. P. Woody was born in Hanover Co., Virginia, in 1834, and died at San Antonio, Tex., Aug. 24, 1901. She moved with her parents to Barren Co., Ky., in 1835, and united with the Christian Church at the age of fifteen. Moved to Milton, Ill., in 1852, and to Texas in 1878. She was a good and faithful Christian wife and mother. Our home is lonely without her. She suffered so much and wanted to go home. She was a widow for more than thirty years. She leaves three children; Mrs. G. A. Lynch and Mrs. M. Johnson, of San Antonio, and J. S. Allen, of Lytton Springs, Texas. Funeral was conducted by Bro. Geary Ranshaw.

The Spiritual Side of Our Plea

By A. B. JONES

This new volume is a notable contribution to a better understanding of the spiritual significance and value of our Reformatory Movement. It accentuates a side of our plea which has been too much neglected by many. It deals, in a profound manner, characteristic of its author, with such questions as "The Letter and the Spirit," "The Real and the Formal," "Alexander Campbell on Remission of Sins," "The Word and the Spirit," and "Righteousness and Law." The views herein expressed are the result of long and mature deliberation by one of the clearest thinkers and writers in our ranks.

THE DEAR CHRIST-CHILD is a neat pamphlet of 16 pages, containing nine songs, several recitations, responsive readings, etc. It is just what you want, if you are looking for "something good and something new."

PRICE is five cents for single copy, fifty cents for one dozen and three dollars for one hundred. Send five cents for a sample. It is about time you were beginning preparations for Christmas. See our catalogue for complete list of Christmas services, cantatas, etc.

Book Notes.

We urge our friends and patrons to remember that the business of the Christian Publishing Company is by no means confined to the books which we ourselves publish, or to the works listed in our catalogues, or to those which we advertise, from time to time, in these columns. We do a general book business, and can supply, at the regular price, any book in print, no matter where or by whom published. We solicit correspondence regarding any desired volume. If you see, anywhere, an advertisement, review or notice of any book, and decide to purchase it, send your order to The Christian Publishing Company.

Send us ten cents in stamps, and you will receive, by mail, a small bottle of our unfermented Communion Wine, bearing a label showing prices we charge for this pure, delicious grape-juice. We have sampled a great many varieties and brands of Communion Wine, and have selected the very best to offer our customers. Remember, prices have been much reduced, and those quoted in our current catalogue are no longer correct. The new price-list is:

	Single	Half-Dozen	Dozen
Quarts	$.65	$3.50	$6.00
Pints	.40	2.00	3.50
Half-Pints	.30	1.50	2.25

At these prices the wine is sent, securely packed, by express, not prepaid. We recommend our patrons to purchase by the dozen bottles. Each dozen is packed in a separate case.

Our trade in song books is very lively, a wagon-load of packages of Gospel Call, Silver and Gold, Popular Hymns No. 2, Christian Hymnal, etc., leaving our establishment every day, in lots of from a single copy to six hundred copies. The church's seem to be equipping themselves for good work during the fall and winter months. Books for use in revival meetings are often ordered by telegraph. In this way an order can be sent one day, from nearly any town within 500 miles of St. Louis, and the books received the next.

One reason for our present immense trade in song books is the fact that we have put prices down just as low as possible, so that no church is so poor it cannot afford to purchase good books. Tidings of Salvation, for example, can be bought at $10 per hundred or $5 for fifty. This book has 117 songs. Either Gospel Call, Part I, Gospel Call, Part II, Silver and Gold or Popular Hymns No. 2, each containing far over 200 hymns, can be had in the flexible, limp cloth binding, known as "evangelists' edition," for $15 per hundred. At such prices there is no excuse for any church to fail to supply the people with books, that they may "make a joyful noise unto the Lord."

The Origin of the Disciples of Christ, by G. W. Longan, is a book that altogether too few of our people are familiar with. It is a clear,

DR. PRICE'S Cream Baking Powder

The difference of cost between a good and a poor baking powder would not amount for a family's supply to one dollar a year. The poor powder would cause doctors' bills many times this.

Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is the most economical in the end, because it goes further in leavening and insures perfect, wholesome food.

Used always in making the biscuit and cake it saves both health and money. Made from pure, grape cream of tartar, most healthful of fruit acids.

able, distinct setting forth of the causes leading to the inauguration of "our movement," and the origin of the Disciples of Christ. The book was reduced in price some time ago, and now sells for fifty cents.

Prof. Clinton Lockhart, of Drake University, writing of How to Understand and Use the Bible, by J. H. Bryan, says: "I have seen no better help to the study of the Bible than this, for the busy worker IT IS A GEM." From such a source, this is indeed a high testimonial to the value of this work. One splendid thing about the book is its cheapness. At fifty cents per copy, it is within the reach of every one. It is a little book—only 116 pages—that can be carried in the pocket, but it contains more matter of real value than many a larger book. It is handsome in appearance, bound in cloth. Price, postpaid, only 50 cents.

Speaking of Prof. Clinton Lockhart reminds us that not for some time have we called attention to his latest book—Principles of Interpretation. This is a work for every student of the Bible—for every person who desires to rightly interpret and understand the scriptures. Those who have secured and read the book speak of it in words of highest praise. Price, $1.25.

We are just mailing to the several divisions of Australasia—Australia, New Zealand and Tasmania—over four hundred copies of our Sunday-school Lesson Commentaries for 1902. Therein is a first-class testimonial to the superiority of our Sunday-school helps. Our antipodean brethren have carefully canvassed the several commentaries published among us and have chosen the best. No wonder that our cause is prospering in Australia, if the brethren there show the same excellent judgment in other matters that they do in the selection of S. S. helps.

Have you ordered your Christian Sunday-school Lesson Commentary for 1902? You may as well get it now, and be enjoying it in advance. Always conspicuously the best of aids for teachers and advanced pupils, it is better than ever this year. We have told in the preceding paragraph of the heavy orders from the other side of the world. Here is another large fact: One publishing and book-selling firm has already ordered 2,100 copies for 1902! These facts prove the truth of our claim that the Christian S. S. Lesson Commentary is best of all, but the chief endorsement of it comes from the great mass of our best S. S. workers, who unite in declaring that our commentary is in a class all by itself.

IF THIS WERE FAITH

IF to feel, in the ink of the slough
And the sink of the mire,
Veins of glory and fire
Run through and transpierce and transpire,
And a secret purpose of glory in every part,
And the answering joy of battle fill my heart;
To thrill with the joy of girded men,
To go on forever and fail and go on again,
And be mauled to the earth and arise,
And contend for the shade of a word and a thing not seen with the eyes:
With the half of a broken hope for a pillow at night
That somehow the right is the right,
And the smooth shall bloom through the rough:
Lord, if that were enough.

A SERMON OUTLINE

THEME

OUR SPECIAL RATE OF ONE DOLLAR.

WE WILL TREAT THE SUBJECT UNDER THREE HEADS AS FOLLOWS:

FIRST—New Subscribers may secure THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for one year by remitting ONLY ONE DOLLAR.

SECOND—Old Subscribers with subscription PAID TO JAN. 1, 1902, OR BEYOND may have subscription extended one year by paying ONLY ONE DOLLAR.

THIRD—Those in Arrears may pay to Jan. 1, 1902, at regular rates and send ONLY ONE DOLLAR for the year 1902.

(A) The first division of our subject may be explained and emphasized by means of sample copies, exhibits of what THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for 1902 is to be (we will furnish printed folders on application), and by impressing upon the prospective subscribers the necessity of a Christian paper in the home. It should be further urged that the paper be the very best obtainable, which is another way of indicating THE CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST.

(B) Such homely admonitions as "A word to the wise is sufficient," "Make hay while the sun shines," "Now is the accepted time," "Opportunity has a forelock but no back hair," etc., may be used to illustrate and fix the importance of the second division.

(C) The third division naturally suggests a reference to the Twentieth Century and the awfulness of lingering in a century from whence one's friends and associates have departed. The Scripture admonition to "owe no man anything" may be used effectively.

CONCLUSION—Sin not away the day of grace. Accept the present opportunity. Now is THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE.

Current Events.

Nicaraguan Vs. Panama Route. The Isthmian Canal Commission has completed its report which will be presented to the President within a few days and to Congress when it convenes. The main facts of the report have already been given out. After considering the two possible routes, the Nicaraguan and the Panama, the commission concluded that only the former was practicable. It is true that the Panama route is so much shorter that a vessel could pass through it in perhaps twenty-one hours less than the time required to pass through the Nicaraguan Canal. But its greater distance from the ports of the United States more than counterbalances this advantage. A very large proportion of the ships which will pass through the Isthmian Canal, wherever it may be constructed, will go south to enter it and go north on leaving it, so it is important to have it as far north as possible. Millions of dollars have already been spent by the Panama Canal company and, although most of it was swallowed up by the famous frauds, there has been an immense amount of actual work done toward the digging of the ditch. The company which owns this route is naturally desirous of selling out to the United States. No definite proposition has been made but from what has been said it is apparent that the company intends to ask about $109,000,000. This, in addition to what it would cost to complete the canal, would make the total cost by the Panama route $253,000,000. The commission estimates that the Nicaragua Canal can be built for $189,000,000, a saving of $11,000,000 over the former estimate and $64,000,000 less than the cost of the Panama route. This estimate is for a canal 35 feet deep and 150 feet wide at the bottom. The most potent objection to the Nicaragua route is the necessity of constructing artificial harbors at the ends under conditions which render such work particularly difficult. The Panama people will bring their case before Congress and will use every artifice to secure delay in action upon the report of the Commission, in which effort they will, of course, be joined by the anti-canal element in this country. It is a desperate case with the owners of the Panama ditch. Their property represents an investment of millions which will be absolutely valueless if the United States government constructs a canal through Nicaragua and Costa Rico.

Privileges of Naturalization. While the old motto, "America for Americans," would be a hopeless anachronism if taken in the narrower sense, to exclude foreigners from the privilege of acquiring citizenship in this country, it seems evident, nevertheless, that a judicious application of the principle might be fruitful of good results. The privileges of American citizenship, including the right to demand protection in any just cause in any part of the world, even at the cost of calling out the entire army and navy, ought to be enjoyed only by those who are Americans, either by birth or by sincere and loyal adoption. The naturalization of the un-American rabble, which finds entrance at our ports only by grace of our too lax immigration laws, is a menace to our domestic security. But these at least intend to live here; they have cast in their lot among us and are entitled to protection. But what shall be said of the many who seek American naturalization only that they may return to their native lands or to other foreign countries and demand protection by our government from all their real or fancied grievances? Great Britain has recently, to avoid a quarrel, paid an indemnity for losses to American citizens in South Africa. These so-called "American citizens" were, without exception, foreigners who had taken out naturalization papers after a minimum of residence, for the sole purpose of being able to go abroad again and demand the protection of our government. Citizenship was, for them, only a sort of accident insurance, and their loyalty to our government was of about the same quality as one's loyalty to his insurance company—a purely commercial relation. The same is true of many of those whom we are called upon to protect in Turkey. If we wish to protect the oppressed of all nations against the injustice of their own governments, well enough. But we might, by some alteration of our naturalization laws, have done with this fiction of American citizenship as applied to cases which are practically nothing but the protection of British subjects against Great Britain, Turkish subjects against Turkey, Russian subjects against Russia, and so on. Great Britain knew enough two centuries ago to avoid such complications. Political, social and commercial disabilities were removed from the Jews in England earlier than in any other country in western Europe. But England long refused to naturalize Jews, because all the Jews of Spain, Portugal and France threatened to rush to England to secure naturalization and then rush back to flaunt the protection of their British citizenship in the faces of their tormentors.

Business Men in Government. Lord Rosebery enjoys nothing so much as to issue from the semi-retirement in which he waits the summons of a Liberal majority, and to drop a thunder-bolt into the midst of the present administration. And he is very good at dropping thunder-bolts. He can say such bitter things in such a pleasant tone, and can utter revolutionary sentiments with such an air of innocence. The other day he remarked that for an experiment he would like to see the British government run for awhile by business men like Andrew Carnegie and Sir Thomas Lipton, and raised the query, "are we getting our money's worth," for the enormous sums that the government is now expending? The remark and the query both suggest that Lord Rosebery, like the rest of England, is weary of a regime which puts lineage above competence as a condition of holding office, and spends money lavishly without knowing how to get the worth of it. It cannot be said that this system pervades the whole British government, but it has recently been officially admitted that there is a great deal of it and that some very important places in the army and navy are controlled by favoritism. The fact is that any aristocratic system is more decorative than practical, these days. In the old times when a king and a few nobles ruled a nation it was not so very expensive, but the growth of the British constitution has diminished the royal prerogative and has made it necessary to maintain a double system—the king and the lords for decorative purposes and to preserve historic continuity unbroken, and the commoners for practical service in effective government. Taking them together they are too expensive. No wonder there is a complaint that the British people are not getting their money's worth. It may be remarked that the aristocratic favoritism which vitiates the British system of government, is paralleled by the political favoritism of our own. It is not easy to say which is worse.

A New Trust. An immense combination of railway interests is said to be nearly completed. According to reports, it will involve the Union Pacific, the Great Northern, the Northern Pacific, the Southern Pacific, and the C., B. & Q. These roads together own 34,231 miles of track, and the combined value of their stock and bonds is over one and a half billion dollars. The financiers most deeply interested are J. Pierpont Morgan, James J. Hill, Harriman and the Vanderbilts. The Northern Securities Company was incorporated a few days ago in New Jersey, with James J. Hill as President, to serve as the instrument of this consolidation. The "community of interests" plan already in operation has brought all the important railroads of the country into five or six groups, each of which is a unit so far as all matters of general interest are concerned. The new consolidation will be a long step toward that general railroad trust which has been anticipated ever since the full significance of the "community of interests" idea began to dawn upon the public mind. The governors of the northern tier of states, especially Van Sant of Minnesota, are much agitated over this combination, which will put their entire railway system in the hands of a single group of men. It is not improbable that the governors of the states from Minnesota to Washington will call special sessions of their legislatures to enact new anti-trust legislation if the present laws are deemed insufficient.

The Alabama Constitution. The amendments to the Alabama Constitution are reported as adopted at the recent election by a majority of about 20,000, but the methods by which this majority was made to appear in the count are worse than doubtful. The most important feature of the amendments was that disfranchising illiterate negroes. Gen. Shelley, who was chairman of the Anti-ratification Campaign Committee, says that forty white counties voted against the amendments, but that the wholesale frauds in the black counties make it appear that the negroes voted in favor of their own disfranchisement. Those who opposed the amendments have not yet given up the fight, but will continue their organization, not as a separate political party, but as an organization within the Democratic party, and will attempt to control the next Democratic state convention. Ex-Gov. J. F. Johnston believes they can do it. The negro disfranchisement amendment is practically identical with the famous "grandfather clause" already adopted by several states. Those who are interested in the preservation of the Solid South as a dependable Democratic asset in every election should certainly oppose the amendments which, by taking the negro out of politics, will put an end to the issue upon which the best people of the south have been by a vast majority Democratic. New issues will take first place, and the result can never be the same old certainty that has prevailed unbroken ever since the civil war.

A New Era of Reform. With Theodore Roosevelt in the presidential chair and Seth Low as mayor of New York, the coming winter promises to be a hard one for the needy politicians who have borne the heat and burden of many campaigns, and are looking for payment from the spoils of office. The two gentlemen named are both conspicuous advocates of the curious opinion that there are no spoils of office. Mr. Roosevelt, not having been elected to his present office, entered upon it with no campaign debts whatever to pay; he would have had none in any case. Mr. Low's first public utterance after his election was an assertion that the merit system would be rigorously applied and that political services would not be taken into consideration in making city appointments. This is what Mr. Low was elected for. The victory over Tammany was a non-partisan victory, and a campaign which rises above partisanship must find its complement and justification in an equally non-partisan administration. Mr. Low has before him a glorious opportunity. The corrupt government of New York has always had its stronghold in the police department and the local courts. Fortunately the New York police department is under the control of the city and not, as in the iniquitous system in vogue in St. Louis, managed by the state politicians independently of the city. The new reform administration will, therefore, have an opportunity to reform the police. Justice Jerome as district attorney can be relied upon to see that all criminals are prosecuted. President Roosevelt's devotion to the principles of civil service reform is well known. He has been a member of the civil service commission and is fully committed to it. There have been indications lately that he intends to apply the principle also to military and naval promotions. Senators have been warned that in making promotions only the records of the men will be considered and that recommendations will be useless.

Disputed Axioms.

Mr. Breckenridge, of Kentucky, who never seems in the least embarrassed or cast down by the richly deserved disapprobation of all the moral people in the state, made an address of welcome last week to the State Federation of Labor meeting in Lexington. He criticised the management of last summer's steel strike, said that the day of successful strikes is over and that the unions must hereafter discard force and use reason. He stated that the unions gain nothing by trying to force employers to hire only union labor or to compel workmen to join the organizations. The whole thing must be voluntary. Such talk in the very camp of the labor unions was not welcome and almost precipitated a riot. And yet it was only a statement of the most commonplace truths. The labor unions do much good, but they will not be an unmixed blessing until they learn some truths that everybody else knows to be axiomatic.

A Unique Exhibit.

The new campus of Washington University, St. Louis, immediately adjoining the site of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, is to be used as a part of the Exposition grounds. The campus contains 110 acres of beautifully rolling ground, and buildings to the value of several hundred thousand dollars are now being erected. It was expected that the university would be ready to move from its down-town location to its new buildings about Jan. 1, 1902, but it was found impossible to have the buildings ready in time and it has been decided not to move until after the Exposition in 1903. The main university building will serve as an exposition administration building, and other permanent buildings will be erected with the money paid by the Exposition company for the use of the grounds. It has already been determined that the educational exhibits will be housed here. This is something both unique and fortunate. It is a rare combination of circumstances which permits a modern university plant to become at once a feature of a world's fair and a place for displaying the other educational exhibits.

Stateship for Oklahoma and Indian Territory.

A convention was held at Muskogee, I. T., last week in the interest of the campaign for securing the admission of these two territories as a single state. The sentiment of the delegates was practically unanimous in favor of single statehood. A permanent executive committee of thirty members, fifteen from each territory, was appointed to raise funds to maintain a delegation of six members at Washington during the approaching session of Congress. The request of these territories for statehood is entirely reasonable and just. The two together have perhaps as ample qualifications as any state ever had at the time of its admission. Their united population is now but little under 900,000. There are sixteen states now in the Union, each of which contains fewer people. The assessed valuation of property is more than $100,000,000 and the actual value is probably three times that amount. No other territory ever had so many people or so much property before applying for admission. The people of this region are capable of self-government. The Indians of Indian Territory are not numerous enough to be a dominant element in the situation and they would certainly be as competent by this time to participate in local politics as are the ignorant negroes in the south and the illiterate foreigners in our large cities. The convention adopted a resolution recommending the division of all the remaining Indian lands into individual holdings with permission to sell all except a homestead. Gov. Jenkins, of Oklahoma, in his annual report to the secretary of the interior, recites the arguments for admission. There is no politics in the matter, but simply justice to a wonderful new section of our country which has already made marvelous strides of development and needs the privileges of statehood to enable it to develop its possibilities.

Brevities.

During the past week the English coast has been visited by one of the most severe storms of recent years. Many wrecks are reported and large loss of life.

The common jest aimed at inventors of flying machines, that they can do everything with them but make them fly, will not hold against Santos-Dumont. The Deutsch prize of $20,000 has been awarded to him for his success in circumnavigating the Eiffel Tower, and now the Brazilian government has voted him $25,000 in compensation for the lustre which his exploits have shed upon his native country.

The man who would rather be right than President occupied high moral ground, but President Roosevelt occupies still higher. He would rather be both—and so he is, especially on such matters as trusts and civil service reform. His interpretation of the strenuous life is that the best thing to do with virtue is to use it, not to retire with it to a cloister and save it from contamination. The really heroic soul refuses to believe that there is any necessary incompatibility between being right and being President.

The Sultan's prompt acquiescence in the demands of France when backed up by a naval demonstration has established a dangerous precedent for him. England at once demanded $80,000 on an old account, and got it, and Austria-Hungary's demand for 90,000 francs has been granted. The Powers of Europe gave their consent to France's method of pushing her claims. Now we see why. When Admiral Gaillard loses his present position in the French navy, he ought to establish a collection agency. A man who can put the Sultan in such a debt-paying mood could collect back subscriptions on a religious paper.

A Groundless Fear.

The suggestion of co-operative effort on the part of our churches always arouses in the minds of some a fear of "ecclesiasticism." It was so when organization for missionary work was proposed, and it is so whenever co-operation is suggested for the discharge of any function which the churches can perform more effectively through a common agent than by individual effort.

The most recent instance is in connection with a proposition to use our state boards as the agents of the churches in investigating the character and qualifications of unknown applicants for pulpits. In view of the fact that among us, as among all other religious bodies, some unworthy men are masquerading as ministers of the gospel and are deceiving the churches in districts where they are not known, our state secretaries, at a recent joint meeting, resolved "that we urge our pastorless churches to call only such men as are favorably known to our state boards." The wording of this resolution is unfortunate. On its surface, it appears to imply that the favorable opinion of the state board is the only guarantee of ministerial worth and that none are genuine without this trade-mark. A strict construction of the resolution, making it call upon all churches, whatever might be their acquaintance with a man or their other sources of information regarding him, to hold him at arm's length until the state board had signified its approval, would be open to objections too obvious to need mention. Our New York correspondent has stated these objections clearly enough in his letter this week.

But, although it is not explicitly so stated in the resolution, we take it that it has reference only to cases where a church contemplates employing a man who is not well known to the congregation or its officers. It would, of course, be superfluous for a church which knows its prospective pastor better than the state board could be expected to know him, to apply to that board for information about him.

With this common-sense limitation understood, it seems to us that the resolution offers a feasible remedy for a very real evil. It is a fact that there are among us many preachers who are, by nature, habit or force of circumstances, wanderers. Some of them are worthy, some are unworthy. Some are stainless but incapable, some are immoral and brilliant, a few are criminal. It is also a fact that hundreds of our weaker and more isolated churches, knowing practically nothing of the men and churches outside of their own communities, fall an easy prey to the most vicious of these floaters, many of whom seek to explain their vagrancy by calling themselves evangelists, and thereby steal the livery of heaven to serve the devil in. These churches must have preachers. But they know no preacher to call when they need one. Two questions then arise:

First, Is it better to pick up an unknown preacher at random, or to seek reliable information about the applicants?

Second, If it is worth while to seek information, where? and how?

Assuming that the second alternative will be chosen in answer to the first question, it remains to find the best means of getting the desired information. There are various conceivable ways. One way is by letters of introduction, which a smooth rascal can always furnish in abundance from men, whom the officers of this little church do not know but whom the slippery preacher can easily make them believe that they ought to know. Still, the letter of introduction method is very helpful—if well lived up to—but it is liable to abuse. Some prominent and worthy men will give a letter of introduction to any chance caller just to get rid of him.

Another way of finding out about unknown preachers is to invoke the omniscience of one of your editors. Each of our papers serves as a bureau of information for its constituency, and seldom does a day pass, probably, in the office of any of our larger papers, without the receipt of one or more letters from churches asking that the name of a preacher be suggested, or that a confidential opinion of some man be furnished, and from preachers requesting that their names be mentioned to some church with a vacant pulpit. We do our best with all these matters and do it cheerfully, but we know our limitations. This is not our business and in many cases we are not able to give the information required.

Still another method would be to establish a bureau of information in connection with each of our state boards. This has already been done in Illinois and perhaps in other states. The boards are the creatures of the churches. The churches, as represented in their state conventions, have a right to instruct the boards to gather the necessary data about all preachers in the state, especially the stragglers and floaters; or the boards might legitimately do it without instructions. When it is known that such information is on file, the churches ought not to require much urging to use it when they are confronted with the proposition of employing an unknown preacher. And we do not see that their congregational autonomy would be in the least impaired by this arrangement—especially as it would leave them at full liberty to go it blind if they really prefer that way, or to engage a rascal after they find out that he is a rascal, if it turns out that way.

Of Such is the Kingdom.

The author of a recent volume entitled, "The Conversion of Children," undertakes to show that a deep and genuine religious experience is not impossible to those of very tender age, and that the youthful converts in real life do not necessarily die young, as is the habit of the preternaturally perfect heroes and heroines in Sunday-school books. He illustrates and enforces the point by citing numerous cases that have come under his own knowledge where "conviction of sin" and a thorough and lasting conversion have occurred at ages varying from four to ten.

The recital of these moving episodes inevitably arouses doubts as to whether many of these infantile religious experiences were not the result of the sincere but shallow imitativeness of childhood, rather than of an apprehension of the realities of religion. But however that may be, the contention that it is not necessary for a person to grow old in sin before he can be converted is entirely justified. In our staunch individualism, we have sometimes been afraid of unduly influencing children in the matter of religion. They have been allowed to grow up like little pagans without religious education so that they might be able to "decide for themselves" on reaching the age of discretion. The Sunday-school, of course, has been of untold value in correcting this error, but even this has not been able wholly to counteract the tendency to postpone conversion until such time as the child may have become an obvious and habitual sinner so that he may have a substantial supply of sins to repent of. There is no reason why a child should not, with the dawn of consciousness, begin to grow in grace. Just as he grows gradually into a realization of his relation to his parents and the family, so he should grow into a realization of his relation to God and the people of God. There is no more need for a preliminary period of alienation and rebellion in one case than in the other.

But how about those recorded cases of precocious children who at the age of four or five are overcome with despair at the thought of their own sinful and lost condition, fear that they are going to hell and when, after a period of anxious "seeking," they find peace, labor earnestly with their parents to renounce their evil ways? We have no hesitation in saying that such cases, where an infant of four exhibits symptoms of a violent emotional experience and such sorrow for sin as would be appropriate to a hardened sinner of forty, are abnormal and pathological. For a four-year-old to be represented as smitten with a violent sense of his own iniquity—not merely regret for particular shortcomings in the way of disobedience to his mother, unfraternal conduct toward his little sister and forbidden excursions to the pantry, but an overwhelming consciousness of his sinful nature, alienation from God and consequent impending doom—this, we say, borders upon the absurd. It is an attempt to fit the old doctrine of original sin into the new conception of the possibilities of childhood, and the two do not go together.

When Jesus called the little ones to him and blessed them, we do not recall that he endeavored to arouse in them a sense of their lost condition. Passing by what would have been to some theologians a glorious opportunity to discourse upon original sin and the necessity for these children to renounce their inherited guilt, grieve over their hereditary wickedness and find the joyful experience of forgiveness,—passing by this splendid chance to effect some marvelous infant conversions, he looked upon them and said simply: "Of such is the kingdom of heaven." And the children smiled back at the kindly face of the stranger, and then went on with their play.

Better than the conversion of children is the training of them from the very first to love God and good things, and to hate all forms of wickedness. They will not be sinless, as a Christian after conversion is not sinless, but having been started on the right road at the beginning of their pilgrimage they will have no need for the sort of conversion which consists in suddenly turning around and going the other way.

Blessed are the Poor.

A Catholic priest has been lecturing in St. Louis, expounding the faith for the edification of Protestants and answering, as best he could, their questions and objections. Some one, referring to the general poverty in Italy, Spain and other Catholic countries, asked: "Why is it that Catholic nations are much less progressive and prosperous than Protestant nations?" The priest answered: "Jesus Christ never made wealth or material greatness a mark of his true church. He declares that no man can serve God and Mammon, and denounces riches as one of the greatest obstacles to the kingdom of heaven."

This reply was more true than judicious. Grant that it satisfactorily defends Romanism against the charge that the question implied—which it does not, because the question refers to intellectual progress as well as to material wealth, and because it has reference to prosperity and wealth as the mark of a nation and not as the attributes of a church. But grant that the question is answered by this reference to the blessedness of poverty and its significance as the mark of the true church. In the light of this answer, let us ask some more questions: Why is it that the Roman Catholic Church is the richest religious body in the world, if wealth and material greatness are not the mark of Christ's true church? Why is it that its prelates receive, from the contributions of the poor, princely stipends upon which they live in princely state? Why does the head of that church enjoy an income which makes him the richest subject in the world, and maintain the court and style of a king with all the pomp and circumstance of "wealth and material greatness" that is possible to one who has been divested of temporal sovereignty—if "riches are one of the greatest obstacles to the kingdom of heaven"?

The priest who apologized for the poverty of Catholic Italy and Catholic Spain by inveighing against "material greatness" and pointing out the conflict between riches and spirituality, was not ignorant of the worldly possessions of the head of his church. Neither was he ignorant of the fact that that same head of the church, in his increasing senility, preserves but one thing unimpaired—his hatred of the Italian government, because it now holds sway in Rome, where his predecessors in the papacy ruled as independent sovereigns from the eighth century until the middle of the nineteenth. He knows that the dominant party in the Roman Catholic Church to-day has for its dearest wish to reinstate the Pope in that independent sovereignty which is the only element of "material greatness" which he now lacks. On the whole, this attempt to explain the backwardness of the Catholic countries by saying that the Catholic Church does not approve of wealth and implying that it voluntarily renounces it for the sake of the kingdom of heaven, is an insult to thinking men. It lacks the most primary essential of profitable religious controversy—truth.

The fact is that the Catholic countries are generally poor, not because the Catholic Church is too spiritually-minded to care about wealth, but partly because the rulers of that church are, for the most part, too worldly-minded to care about anything else. The avarice of the church has impoverished the countries. Acting upon the principle, perhaps, that riches are a burden to the soul, the church has cheerfully lifted that burden from the laity, easing thereby both their souls and their pockets at a single stroke.

We would not be understood as saying that the poverty of Italy and Spain has no other cause, or that all priests and prelates work simply for their own pockets. Many of them, especially many parish priests, are models of unselfish devotion. But the policy of the Catholic Church is determined by men who make the welfare of the people a consideration secondary to the interests of the church, who act on the principle that "wealth and material greatness" are marks of the true church, and who are not at all averse to receiving in compensation for their services all the wealth and all the insignia of material greatness that they can lay their hands on for their personal enjoyment.

John Alexander Dowie, who levies tithes upon his dupes and lives like the millionaire that he is—thanks to the extreme credulity of this so-called skeptical age—says: "The Pope of Rome lives in luxury upon the offerings of the faithful; why should not I?" Why, indeed? He has an equal right—and that is none.

Books That Die.

A recent writer in a literary magazine discourses upon "books that die," and mentions a list of works which, although popular half a century ago, are to-day forgotten by all save those whose delight it is to blow the dust from the tops of long unopened volumes. True it is, that there is a long list of books by no means lacking in respectable merit that have ceased to be a part of our common heritage and have become the peculiar possession of those literary antiquaries who pride themselves on their superior taste in choosing to remember what other men choose to forget.

Yes, they are gone, from the juvenile imbecilities of "Sanford and Merton" to the swollen and ponderous eloquence of "The Castle of Otranto." But what a time they took in going! It is not so to-day. It does not take a book half a century to die now. We read and forget with a facility born, perhaps, of the limitless supply poured forth by the publishers and forced upon our attention.

This habit of hasty reading and equally hasty forgetting may be as vicious as Mr. Howells says it is, but it is not without its advantages. If we could make men do our bidding, we would be inclined to order them, for their own good, not to read at all many of the books which they now feel compelled to read to keep up with the latest literary fashion. But if they will read them—and read them they will, such is the ingenuity of publishers and the convenience of libraries—how much better it is that they should speedily forget them.

When one thinks upon the immense sales of recent novels, first editions of a hundred thousand copies, half a million sold in a year, and all that sort of thing, and compares this with the smaller sales of better books a generation ago, one is moved to cry out at fate as most unjust. But one may find comfort in the certain assurance that most of these fast-selling books will disappear so much sooner than those earlier works which, having run their course, are now classed as "books that die." And these latter candidates for oblivion may—let us hope in the case of most of them and fear in the case of a few—earn the title of books that die young. They will never even live to be old enough to interest the antiquary. After all, if a book does not contain the seeds of immortality, perhaps it is better that it should sell its hundred thousand or quarter of a million copies at once and be done with it. The author gets his royalty when he needs it most, and still has time to reform and accomplish something in life worthy of a reputation that may be longer than that of his book, even if not so wide.

"The People's Forum."

In this issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will be found (page 1487) the first installment of a new department which we hope to make a permanent feature of the paper, namely, THE PEOPLE'S FORUM. As explained in a note on that page, this is everybody's opportunity to express his opinion on any sensible topic. The only limitations are that offensive personalities must be avoided and that the length of each communication must not exceed two hundred words.

The reason for the latter limitation is obvious. There are plenty of long articles in other departments of the paper where important subjects can be discussed at length, but we want to make the People's Forum a place where everybody can make his two-minute speech on any subject which the needs of the hour render important in his estimation. In any parliamentary body when a subject is broached upon which every one will want to speak, it is customary to limit the speeches in length—not that each member of the assembly could not make an able speech of one hour, but that it is desired to give every one a chance. Only the United States Senate, where the principle of unlimited debate prevails, is exempt from this practice. But a religious paper is not the United States Senate, and we therefore make the two-hundred-word limit as a protection for those who would otherwise be crowded out entirely. The space limit will therefore be rigidly enforced upon all alike.

In the nature of things, an editor can give space for long articles only on subjects which he considers important. He will, of course, permit the presentation of views with which he does not agree, but not unless he considers that the subject discussed has a degree of importance commensurate with the space devoted to it. The People's Forum will be free from this form of editorial control. It will indicate what subjects our readers consider important. If a note on any topic arouses interest and calls forth other comments, then it may seem wise to give space for a long article on the subject, but the People's Forum is the place for brief suggestions, comments, criticisms and commendations.

We especially invite the laymen to make use of this department. We believe that our religious papers would be more fully representative of all phases of thought among us if the ministerial element prevailed less exclusively in them. This department is "the committee of the whole."

Notes and Comments.

Attention is often called to the subject of unattached church members who move to a city and never "put their membership" in any church—as if membership were a thing that a person could carry around with him and deposit at will either in a congregation or a pigeon hole. The church member who has never "put in his membership" has no membership. It is estimated that in nearly every one of our larger cities where we have one or more churches there are more former members unattached than present members on the church books. It might be worth while to abate our anxiety about making room for the pious unimmersed, and consider methods of dealing with these impious immersed who have allowed their membership to expire by limitation.

A certain church member did not believe in paying the preacher. It was not stinginess with him but principle, he said. When he gave this as a reason for not contributing to the support of the church the wise old elder said:

"Do you believe in having fire in the church in winter?"

"Oh, yes."

"All right. You pay for the fire and the rest of us will pay the preacher."

This fable teaches that when a man does not believe all that you think he ought to believe, the best course is not to get up a debate with him, but to encourage him to live up to what he does believe, and await developments. Faith comes by doing as well as by hearing.

There was one episode at the Minneapolis convention to which, through oversight, we failed to call attention in our report of the convention. This was the suggestion made by President J. B. Jones, of William Woods College for Girls, Fulton, Mo., that provision be made for the free education of the daughters of our foreign missionaries. The suggestion is good. Most of the countries in which our foreign missionaries are at work afford no adequate facilities for education, and in some of them, notably India, the climate is such that foreign-born children cannot safely endure it. President Jones proposes to make an effort to raise a special endowment fund in connection with the institution of which he is at the head, to be used for the free education of the daughters of foreign missionaries at William Woods College. The school is now on a permanent basis and in prosperous condition, with property amounting to nearly $100,000 in equipment and endowment. The plan is a worthy one and should meet with prompt encouragement.

We call special attention to the article in this week's paper by President J. W. McGarvey entitled "Shall We Help Them?" We need ministers and we especially need educated ministers. The number of ministerial students in most of our colleges is actually falling off. But, as Bro. McGarvey says, "the men who want to come and can't are as numerous as ever." After eliminating, by some judicious process of selection, those who have not the natural qualifications for the ministry, there are still many who need and deserve help, and with assistance properly administered would make useful preachers. Read the article and consider whether there is not here an opportunity for an important educational work.

One of the unwise things which churches with a vacant pulpit sometimes do is to get several candidates before the church at the same time, each having his coterie of friends, and no one of them able to receive a unanimous call. The art of changing preachers is one that needs to be studied much more thoroughly—especially in a religious body which practices it so constantly. The candidating theory has been thoroughly tried and found wanting. No up-to-date church should resort to that method. A church should select its man on his record and then seek to get him. If it fails let it try another, but only one at a time and all unanimously.

The Christian Observer (Presbyterian) of Louisville, Ky., suggests that Christians in this country would do well to add to their accustomed prayers this patriotic petition: "May thy kingdom come into the United States and thy will be done by all our citizens." It is an appropriate suggestion. It would be well, too, if in our public prayers we would more frequently remember the President of the United States and others who occupy high and responsible offices. The Episcopal Church should not be alone in offering special prayers for those whose station gives them need for special strength.

The problem of the down-town church can be solved only by endowment. A church among the crowded poor, who need its ministrations most, can no more be self-sustaining than a university or an orphan's home. The Centenary M. E. Church of St. Louis, an old organization with a magnificent building dating from the period when its site was in a fashionable residence district, has recently decided not to move westward with the tide of urban emigration, but to hold its ground as a down-town church. A prominent Baptist minister put his approval of this decision into concrete form by pledging $100 toward an endowment. It is remarkable how slight becomes the significance of denominational lines when churches begin practical work among the most needy.

In the article on "England's Greatest King" in our issue of Nov. 7, the author, referring to the schools established by King Alfred, wrote: "Oxford was not one of these." By a typographical error the "not" was omitted, thus making him reaffirm the false tradition that Alfred was the founder of the University of Oxford. As a matter of fact, the great universities which came into being in the Middle Ages can scarcely be said to have had founders. They did not begin with incorporations and endowment, but with some teacher of ability—always an ecclesiastic and generally lecturing in a cathedral church or monastery—whose fame drew students from distant parts. Other teachers would take up their abode close by to win for themselves the patronage of as many students as possible out of this gathering throng of roistering seekers after knowledge. The teachers received no salaries, for there were no institutions to pay salaries, but the fees of the students made a good living for those teachers who could draw the biggest crowd, and the rivalry was therefore often intense. Sometimes a newcomer would arrive and by his superior brilliance draw all the students and drive the former professor away in disgrace, as Abelard drove William of Champeaux from his chair at Notre Dame in Paris two centuries after Alfred's time. The courtesies of academic life were not then what they are now, and the organization, or lack of organization, was such that there could scarcely be any talk of "founding" a university at that period. Universities then did not spring full armed from the head of Jove, like Minerva and the University of Chicago. They grew.

Questions and Answers.

1. Can a minister or an evangelist who has never been ordained for either position though he has preached for seven or eight years set apart elders for a congregation?

2. Has a congregation the right to set apart elders? A Learner.

1. The Disciples of Christ do not consider that the clergy form a distinct order with special powers, prerogatives and graces not shared by the laity and they have therefore never insisted upon ordination. It is coming to be more generally practiced among us, however, as we learn that the ceremony does not necessarily imply any such special class distinction, but is merely a formal assurance of the confidence of one's brethren and of their belief that he possesses the requisite qualifications for the work of the ministry. Unless we wish to set up a theory of apostolic succession, we cannot insist that every one who ordains must himself be ordained and so on back.

2. The congregation, and the congregation only, has the right to set apart elders. The minister who may conduct the service is only a representative of the church.

As you are doubtless aware, the Outlook insists that there are too many preachers. If I do not misunderstand, it holds that preachers ought to be paid about as doctors and lawyers are. True to its own principles, it refuses to give preachers any special rates. Am I bound as one who loves his fellow men to do what I can to hinder young men from entering the ministry? Enquirer.

We are not sure that the Outlook position is correctly represented in regard to the over-supply of ministers. In any case, however, you are bound as one who loves your fellow men to do what you can to hinder young men from entering the ministry if you think there are too many preachers. We think that opinion is a very erroneous one and we therefore encourage young men to enter the ministry. We would be glad to see ministers paid about as doctors and lawyers are. They deserve it. But it will probably not soon come to pass.

We think the Outlook is right in not giving special rates to ministers. A newspaper is not a charitable institution and few religious papers more than pay expenses even with the full rate from everybody. The special rate to ministers means a loss on every preacher's paper. This may be a worthy form of benevolence, but its whole burden ought not to fall on the publishers. They would gladly contribute liberally to a fund for supplying ministers with religious literature below cost, but we do not see why they should be expected to bear the entire burden.

Shall We Help Them?

By J. W. McGARVEY, President of College of the Bible

Some months ago, in answer to a courteous note from the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST I promised to write an article on the subject of aiding young brethren who desire to preach the gospel to obtain an education for the purpose. I now, after too long delay, attempt to comply with the promise.

A special cause for interest in this subject is the recent falling off in the number of young men who are studying for the ministry in the various colleges and seminaries of our country. If that falling off is not checked, and a reverse movement substituted for it, the churches will soon suffer a severe loss of power, and unbelief and iniquity in all forms will be proportionately advanced.

I am myself moved to deep interest on this subject, though not to a fresh interest, by the many letters which I have been constantly receiving through a series of years from indigent young brethren who long for a college education, that they may preach the gospel, and long in vain through want of means. They write to me that they are willing to work their way through college, if possible, at any kind of honorable employment. I have kept no accurate account, but I think that I receive such letters from fifty or seventy-five young men every year. If I could answer favorably all such letters, I think I could add fifty in one month to the number of students in the College of the Bible. I have no doubt that the presidents of our other colleges have similar experience, and I should be glad to see an expression from every one of them on this as on other points which I shall touch in the course of this article.

It is an undoubted fact, attested by universal experience, that, as the gospel at the beginning was preached to the poor, it has ever been, and will continue to be, preached by the poor. I once took pains to get the financial status in early life of 200 preachers in Kentucky, and I found that only two of them were sons of wealthy men. Nearly all of them came up from the depths of poverty. Rich men's sons and the sons of men whose hearts are set on riches, are notoriously exempt from the temptation to lead the life of a preacher; and when, as occasionally occurs, such a youth is seized with this aspiration, the father shakes his head and says, "There is no money in that, my son."

For the purpose of illustrating my subject, I have recently interrogated fifty of our Bible students, with the following result. The number who are now being supported at college by their parents is nine. The number who are paying their expenses out of money earned by themselves before they came to college is fourteen. The number who are paying their way wholly or in part by what they obtain for preaching is twelve. The number who are making their expenses wholly or in part by various kinds of manual labor is fourteen. And the number who are receiving help from societies or benevolent individuals is fourteen. The figures would be proportionate if I had canvassed the whole college.

It thus appears at a glance that but for these various methods of helping poor young men, our faculty would have to close the doors and resort to some other kind of work, while the hundreds of churches that have learned to look to our colleges for their supply of preachers would look in vain, for none but educated preachers are now acceptable to the churches, and the same causes, whatever they are, which prevent young men from being educated for the ministry would much more deter them from giving themselves to the work without education. A disastrous check upon the growth of churches and the spread of the gospel would be the inevitable result.

If we turn now to the question, How shall we increase the number of aspirants for this holy calling? I think the answer will be found, not in offering more facilities for the manual labor of students while at college, for these are necessarily quite limited in the vicinity of every college. Farming, factories and other devices have been tried again and again, and failure has been written on every one; and even if such devices could be made successful, the amount of capital required to procure and to operate them could be used more successfully in another way.

There is a possibility that by a greater concentration of the power of preachers in arousing the consciences of men of means on the subject, a few more of them might be induced to encourage their sons to be preachers, and to give them the needed education. Something can surely be done in this way, but not much. Many a rich brother can be persuaded to give freely to educate a poor man's son for the ministry, who would yet be indignant at the suggestion of making a preacher of one of his own sons. The poor boy is going to be a poor man anyway, and he might as well be a preacher; but my son is made of different clay, and is destined to always eat with a silver spoon. Our only resort, as the experience of the past in all religious bodies demonstrates, must be, as it has been, to help talented and pious young men to the education which fits them for this work of the Lord.

The brethren in Kentucky, more than forty years ago, realized their duty in this respect, and, under the leadership of such men as William Morton, Philip S. Fall, John T. Johnson, John Rogers, George Williams and others, the Kentucky Christian Education Society was organized, and in the course of a few years it was endowed with a capital of about $30,000. The interest on this sum is expended in the support of young men at college, and without making an exact count I think it has helped to an education about three hundred preachers. Among these are quite a large number of the most distinguished and useful men now before the public. The policy of the society is, and has been for many years, to furnish every beneficiary with only the sum which he lacks of being able to live at college in the most economical manner. This sum varies all the way from $100 per session down to $25. The extremely economical method of club boarding, which has been worked out by long experience in the College of the Bible, usually enables the poorest student to get through a session on a loan of $100.

Originally the charter of this society forbade loaning money to its beneficiaries, on the ground that a young man just out of college without a dollar in his pocket should not be burdened with a debt. The money appropriated was a free gift, to be refunded only in case the recipient should ever voluntarily abandon his calling. In recent years this provision of the charter has been changed, and the trustees are empowered to loan the money for a term of years without interest. The change is an experiment, and it will be continued or not according as it shall work favorably or unfavorably to the great purpose aimed at. Collections on the loans have thus far been very slow and meagre. The work of the society has been successful from the beginning. Its management has been in the main above criticism, and it enjoys the utmost confidence of the Kentucky brethren. Its benefactions are not confined to Kentucky students, but have been shared freely by brethren from all the states and from foreign countries. If the fund were $100,000 or even double that sum, it could all be used and its use would go far toward solving the problem of an increased supply of competent preachers.

In conclusion, I can say with the utmost confidence that a common objection against extending such help, based on the idea that it lessens a young man's self-reliance, has been thoroughly refuted by our experience. I have been officially connected with the management of the fund for thirty-eight years and in not a single instance has this objection been supported by facts. I think that all of my associates in the management, including some of our best and wisest men, agree with me in this judgment.

I think it would serve a good and great purpose if the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST would call out an expression on this whole subject from the presidents of all of our colleges.

Conservation

By Olney Bondurant

I passed through the ripened woodland
In the hush of an autumn noon,
And saw 'how 'neath the branches
The frost-kissed leaves were strewn.

'Twas yellow beneath the walnut,
With a gleam like mellowed gold,
And the long, white leaves of willow
Were like silver ribbons rolled.

Where the grape enwraps the oak trunk
And boughs with tendrils entwine,
Was mingled the gloss of the oak leaf
And the crimson of the vine.

I passed again through the woodland
In the spring's awakening hours,
And tints of vanished leaf forms
I found again in the flowers.

For the buttercup grew 'neath the walnut
Where the yellow drifts had lain, Dodson, Mo.

And a purer white than the willow's
In the lily I found again.

The russet hollyhock nodded
Where the oak leaves fell in showers,
And a softer tint of the grape leaves
Blushed from the wild rose bowers.

'Twas not the compact leaf stems
Endured the winter's length;
But the mold gave back to the sunshine
A beauty stronger than strength.

Then I thought of another woodland
Where men like dead leaves fall,
And lose both form and substance
In the mold that covers all.

Perhaps in another springtime
They shall brighter spring from gloom;
And the flowers in the gardens eternal
With the colors of earth shall bloom.

The Pulpit of a Century Ago and To-day BY S. C. HUMPHREY

To preach a sermon is not an uncommon thing, though to do so is to perform a very indefinite act. Sermons have their characteristics, and in differentiation are so markedly well defined that often one hearing a sermon, having no previous knowledge of the denominational connection of the one delivering it, is easily able to locate him.

A still wider gap in the general characteristics of sermons may be observed in the different ages of the Christian Church, but I believe that no such radical change has come to the matter of preaching since the days of Paul as has come within the last half century or less.

President Hadley, of Yale University, has recently made this statement: "The ministry has been more radically affected by certain changes of modern life than has been the case with any other profession. . . . The attitude of the public mind towards sermons has been changed." Whether we may be able fully to account for the fact or not, I believe the statement to be true.

Let anyone take up a volume of sermons that were published a generation ago, representative of the best sermonic literature of that day. Let him examine them in the light of present-day experience and observation and he will see that the whole underlying conception of the sermon has changed. Let me set forth, as best I may be able, the separate purposes of the sermon then and now, and then try to find the reason for the difference. We first inquire as to the respective attitudes of the preacher and his audience. Then—a half century ago and less—the presence of an audience suggested and was the evidence to the preacher (1) of religious interest, (2) of religious information sought, (3) of bewildering confusion of mind brought about by different religious teachers, (4) of a hungering after truth, (5) of a readiness to act on conviction, and (6) of a general power of logical discernment that constituted every auditor a juror.

Now to meet all these requirements upon the part of the preacher, gave him great concern. With great gravity and ponderous logic he builded up his theme, based upon a scriptural text two or more times repeated and perhaps critically analyzed, by arguments so convincing and overwhelming that no flaw or opening was left as a possible entrance of an adversary. Moreover, when he was through, the question he had so elaborately and logically discussed was settled for all time to come with that audience.

Nothing but prejudice, inexcusable and wicked, would even question his conclusion. Most questions had only one side to them and he showed that up, and made no account of any other source of information than that of the pulpit. The time honored office and power of the orator had scarcely then begun to decline.

But what of the present attitude of preacher and audience? Again we are to suppose the preacher is asking, "Why are these people here?" After reflection he answers:

(1) Very few have any interest in a doctrinal sermon. If I should attack or defend any of the old questions, once so divisive, I awaken no interest. I know that I compromise my distinctive creed to the extent that I cease to preach doctrines, but I cannot afford to send this audience away bored—they will not come back. (2) Some have come here sad and are wanting comfort. (3) Some have come from a sense of duty and need enthusiasm—a spiritual uplift, a rekindling of the flame of divine love, which gives the soul new life and joy. (4) Some have come to hear and perhaps to take part in the music. There is intoxication to them in the harmony of song and organ. (5) Some have come to meet and greet their friends—to enjoy the social fellowship, which in some communions used to be disallowed and forbidden because it quenched the spirit.

Now to meet all these, and probably other unenumerated reasons which have brought together the audience large or small which he faces, is the problem before the present-day preacher. He may or may not be in sympathy with the situation before him, as he knows it to be if he is sensible, but nolens volens, adjustment or failure is before him with all the force of a decree from God.

In his study and decision of what to do, we will try to find the reasons for the change noted.

He noted first, that in general the orator is no longer what he used to be. His office is not gone yet, but it is greatly modified. With the highest gifts and graces of the art, he is, on occasion, still a great power to move men, when his genius enables him to speak as the one voice of the multitude. But these occasions are rare, and to be at their best should arise suddenly. When reaction has taken place and men have had time for calm consideration and sober second thought, the orator's opportunity has gone. The editor, printer and summarist now take up the whole matter in the light of the facts of the case. Now, while there is enough in the facts of the gospel of Christ to profoundly move, as well as save, the world, yet they have become too familiar to be used as their original proclaimers used them. He is not a wise man that expects even the great theme of the gospel to be endowed with perpetual freshness.

When Jesus said, "Go preach the gospel," and when Paul said, "It pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe," the word preach must not be restricted to the orator or confined to the ministrations of popular oral address. Christ is preached by any and every means by which he is made known as the Savior. Hence through any of the modern agencies and methods of reaching the people, young and old, with the gospel, even though there should be no minister to publicly proclaim the gospel in the popular conception of the term preach, Christ's command and will is obeyed.

If, therefore, the present-day minister has the skill and wisdom to organize the church over which he is called to preside, as is the superintendent of the public schools in a city, and will avail himself, also, of all the efficient and improved methods of teaching as exemplified in our public schools, whose perfection is the highest exponent of our civilization, he will efficiently do his church work in very much the same way as the successful teacher does his work. As the teacher often finds it profitable to supplement the class work by lectures, applying the principles and lessons learned, so ought the minister with brevity and skill to enforce the lessons involved in the work of all departments of the church. The church a half century ago had one teacher or preacher and in some communions a board of elders for government. The church of to-day has subordinate teachers and helpers in every Sunday-school teacher and Endeavorer, thereby distributing and systematizing the work of the church, as the work in a great factory is systematized and carried on under the superintendency of one directing mind and manager.

Modern agencies and instrumentalities that have proved effectual in all the great departments of education and industry may and ought to be used in the work of the church. The man who holds on to the old methods of preaching is a twin brother to the man who refuses to travel or farm in any other way than his father did "fo' the wah."

There are evidently some conscientious good men who see the devil in all modern methods of church work, but their number is growing less as the time goes by. I would not speak harshly of them nor condemn them too severely, but to me it seems evident that God cares everything for results—little or nothing for methods, provided always that the means employed are in themselves not vicious.

To conclude: Christian work, as exemplified in missions, in benevolences, in sacrifices for Christ's sake, is in great demand, while the demand for fine orators is generally low.

Celina, O.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

“OMAHA, NEB., Nov. 10.—The Nebraska conference of the Colorado mission, Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, convened in this city to-day. Meetings were held morning, afternoon and evening, with a fair attendance. There were present 18 elders of the Colorado mission. Over all the sessions President Joseph A. McRae, of Colorado, presided, and was assisted by President Peterson, of the Nebraska district. President McRae spoke of the work in Colorado, Wyoming and Utah, in which states he said the mission work had been very successful. He reported the financial conditions of the entire mission of six states the best for years.”

The numerical increase of Mormons in the United States is one of the wonders of this wonderful age and country. When you hear a man say that ours is an age of unbelief, call his attention to the origin and progress of “the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints” in our own time and country. The present is not an age of unbelief; it is an age of extreme credulity. Every well read person knows the fraudulent character of the beginning of the Mormon delusion, and those who live where the Mormon emissaries are at work and who are acquainted with their methods, know that they are conscienceless sneaks. Their methods are anything but manly. They shun the open. They creep into houses and first lead silly women astray, and then lead, if possible, sillier men. They are as quiet as kittens when they are in the presence of intelligence; they are as bold as a herd of African lions when with their own kind.

Not long since I met a female who had the appearance of a lady—a woman who is a Mormon. Of course she denied it. She spoke of the piety of the Mormons—at the same time stoutly and repeatedly averring that she was not a Mormon. It did not require a special spiritual gift to see that she was not telling the truth. A Mormon virtue is to lie for the good of the cause.

A young woman with whom I am acquainted is learning by experience the meaning of hell. The thing called a man to whom she is married is a Mormon. During the courtship preceding the marriage, on account of pleasant things he said concerning the “saints,” she accused him of being a Mormon. This he promptly and with emphasis denied. He said, as did the woman spoken of above, that the Mormons have good points; but he could not be one of them. His disclaimer was accepted in good faith. As the time for the marriage approached she named a minister whom she desired to officiate. He said that to the gentleman named he had no objection; but he had promised an old schoolmate that when the time came for his nuptials he, the old friend, should officiate. This seemed reasonable and the girl consented, only to find herself in the presence of a Mormon elder as the officiating minister, when she stood up to plight her troth for life to the man whom she loved and who had deliberately deceived her. She had not the courage then and there to refuse to marry the man. His guise, as soon as the innocent girl was in his clutches, was cast aside, and he proved to be a full-grown “saint”! His parents are Mormons. To their home he carried his victim. She knew now the meaning of torment. She knows it all. She is not permitted in the place called home to even speak of religion. This is a sample of the piety of “the Latter Day Saints.”

The Mormons are industrious. They are frugal. Almost a miracle has been wrought by them in Utah in bringing the land into a high state of cultivation. This region was popularly supposed to be worthless when the Mormons took possession of it. They have made the wilderness to bloom, the desert to become fruitful. As a social, economic organization the world probably never saw anything equal to the Mormon settlement in Utah.

The rise and progress of Mormonism is a study more fascinating than any romance. Its history is stranger than fiction. Mormonism is not dead, nor is it dying. President Joseph A. McRae, of Colorado, “reported the financial conditions of the entire mission of six states the best for years.” See the quotation with which this letter begins. Do not comfort yourself with the thought that it will soon pass away. Mormonism is broken up into a number of warring sects; but this fact will not kill it. There is too much money in it for the leaders to permit us to entertain the hope that the delusion will soon cease to be. Tammany has suffered defeat; but only for a season. Why? There are “millions in it” for the bosses. Tammany is not dead. Mormonism, here and there, now and again, suffers defeat; but the defeat is only temporary. Millions of dollars are in it for the leaders. They will not let it die. The child is not yet born that will see the last of Mormonism in the United States.

The missionaries of “the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints” are at work, two thousand of them, here, there, yonder, everywhere—and they are at work. They go from house to house. They know how to reach the masses. The houses of the neglected and ignorant are visited. A systematic canvass is made. Tracts are distributed. Conversations are engaged in. Small meetings are held in the homes to which they can gain admission. At first the teaching of the New Testament is presented concerning the way of salvation. It is in this way that converts are made. The things that make men Mormons are later presented. The diligence of Mormon missionaries is worthy of praise and imitation. But, their handling of the Bible is cheap and mechanical. Their exegesis is of the multiplication table character. Those who do not know what the Bible is, nor its sublime purpose, nor how to use it, are liable to be caught in the adroitly handled net.

Your hope is that a general diffusion of intelligence will be the death of Mormonism. Be not deceived. Only intelligence in the Bible will save the people from this modern delusion of Satan. Some of the most ignorant men concerning the literature that the world agrees to call the Bible, i. e., the book, are to be found among persons of general intelligence. They are as easily duped in matters of this character in some instances as are those whom we characterize as ignorant. The remedy is biblical information.

Mormonism as a political force must, in time, be reckoned with by the people of the United States. The aggregate population of Utah, Wyoming, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Arizona, New Mexico and Oklahoma is 2,075,902. The territories here named will soon be sovereign states in the union. These nine states will elect eighteen United States senators. A small number of persons in any one will hold the balance. The Mormons are doing their best work in these states and territories. And they will stand as a political unit. Do you think the Roberts episode in the House of Representatives was a final victory? Not a bit of it! Some think that polygamy has been given up. Have you forgotten a letter that I embodied in one of my letters a few months ago, written by Mormon elders in Denver, advocating plural marriages? The Mormons of the Utah branch have not given up polygamy.

It will not surprise me to find a mutilated copy of this letter in a Mormon book one of these days. This is one of their ways. They will say: “B. B. Tyler, in a letter published in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, comes out in favor of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. He says:—” I have been quoted by Mormons in this way; why not again?

Kurdistan and the Kurdish People.

By M. George Daniel, Ph. D.

The name Kurdistan is sometimes applied to the Kurdistan mountains, and sometimes to the whole country inhabited by the Kurds. The area is estimated at 50,000 square miles, extending from Mount Ararat on the north to the Plains of Tigris on the south, and from the Plains of Oroomiah on the east to parts of Armenia on the west. The land is divided into four parts, three of which belong to the Sultan of Turkey, and one to the Shah of Persia, but most of these people are independent, paying tribute neither to the sultan nor to the shah.

The Kurds are descendants of the ancient Corduchi, with whom Xenophon and the ten thousand had so long a struggle. The region which they occupy is as rugged as their character. They are by far the most turbulent of the subjects of the shah. Apparently they have no relationship with any other race and, like Ishmael, their hand is against everyone and everyone's hand is against them. They themselves claim that they are descendants of Esau. They speak a mixed language, called Kurmanji, which is made up of Persian, Syriac and Arabic languages. It has never been reduced to writing, so they are without books and schools. If any writing is done, it is with Persian or Arabic characters. The Kurds number about 6,000,000 of whom 700,000 are subject to the shah and the rest under the sultan's rule. A Kurd is very decided and independent in spirit, he would rather live in a cave under a projecting rock and be unmolested, than to dwell in a palace and be subject to higher authority. Their houses are made of stone and clay, and usually under projecting rocks, or on the slope of a hill. The roof is so low that a man cannot stand erect.

The Kurds are cattle-keepers, and travel from place to place, wherever they may find pasture for their flocks. The herdsman goes before his sheep, having a staff in his hand, and on his shoulder hangs a bag in which he has provisions for the day. He gives names to his sheep, and when he calls a certain sheep it comes to him. He often may be seen sitting singing and playing his flute with his fond flock gathered around him.

The principal occupation of the Kurds, aside from raising cattle and sheep, is robbery. Many may be seen asleep during the day but they rise at sunset and start on their robbing expeditions, with a spear in one hand, a sword at the side, a pistol and dagger in the belt with many cartridges, and a gun in the other hand. By the next day at nine o'clock, a. m., they return with their booty of flocks, herds and valuable goods, and then they rest for a time.

During the greater part of summer they live in tents in the cool places on the mountain slopes and in the valleys. They have one room in their houses, which is divided into a bedroom, parlor, kitchen and stable, with one or two holes on the top for light. In daytime all inmates are out, but toward sunset they come dropping in one by one—at least a score of them, men, women and children. After night has fairly fallen, coarse stale bread and sour milk are brought in for supper. Two spoons and one big dish are all the plate, and the spoons are passed to each in turn, all in the dark, as they have no lamps. It is now bedtime, and one after the other finds his place under the same quilt, without a pillow or bed, except perhaps some hay spread on the floor. In a few minutes all are fast asleep.

Parents teach their children how to become successful thieves. A father will give his son, six or seven years old, a pistol, dagger and shield and play robber with the child, showing him how to use these deadly instruments.

The Kurds' religion is Mohammedan. They are very religious; pray five times a day—always before leaving their homes, so as to have success in their robbery. Before each prayer they perform the ablution. When a man is praying no woman can touch him, lest she might get the benefit of his prayers, as woman, according to their belief, has no soul, and if she touch a man during his prayer she would get his soul. If a woman come near to him during his prayers, the man stops.

Their chief priests are called sheiks, and are honored as gods. The people kneel before a chief priest and kiss his hands, clothes and shoes, and ask for his blessing. To penitent ones, he promises that he will ask God to forgive their sins. He has absolute power over laymen; they believe his words are inspired truths and obey implicitly. Every village has one chief sheik and one who is called the mollah-babah, or the Father of the Village. Every morning and evening the mollah will stand on the top of a high house, and call, "Allah Ochogher" (God, true one). When the people hear the call all kneel down and pray.

New York Letter.

By S. T. Willis.

"Whereas, It is a deplorable fact that in our ministry, as all others, there are unworthy men who impose upon weak churches especially; and in order to elevate the standard of the Christian ministry, 'Resolved, That we urge our pastorless churches to call only such men as are favorably known to our state boards.'"

In a publication just to hand in which the above quotation is made, it is not quite clear whether this resolution was adopted by the meeting of missionary secretaries at the Minneapolis convention or at the last meeting of the New York Christian Missionary Society. But it matters little which, the principle is the same and is certainly wrong. What is the legitimate business of our state and national missionary boards? Is it their work to plan and carry forward the enterprise of Christian missions, or is it rather to form themselves into committees of state and national censorship to settle the question of fitness—intellectual, moral and spiritual—of preachers, and arrange the "churchless preachers" in grades according to whether known "favorably" or "unfavorably" to the state or national board? The time has come to call a halt. The boards mentioned have no right to deal with this question except in so far as it bears immediately and directly upon their legitimate work as such—that is, the work for which they were severally selected—that of Christian missions. If we expect to maintain congregational government pure and simple we had better leave this question of supplying churches and pastors for the separate congregations and the individual preachers to deal with. That is where the whole matter properly belongs. The churches should let state and national missionary boards understand that they will confer a favor by attending strictly to their own business and by keeping their hands off other people's. Missionary boards are not dictators to, but servants of, the churches. Each congregation is supposed to know its own needs and desires better than any missionary board, be that board ever so wise and good. Brethren, let the "churchless preachers" and the "preacherless churches" attend to their own affairs

[See editorial, "A Groundless Fear."]

About three months ago the Rev. A. C. Dixon, the famous Baptist evangelist-pastor of the Hanson Place church, Brooklyn, resigned to accept the Ruggles street church duties in Boston. And Chicago will have to give up her famous Dr. P. S. Henson, who for twenty-five years was pastor of the First Baptist church in that city, to supply the needs of Hanson Place church. Dr. Dixon labored in Brooklyn for ten years and rendered a great service, not only to the church, but to the whole city at large. In fact, the outside demands on him were so exacting that he felt he could not do justice to all sides of his work, so he decided to go to Boston. But while New York regrets to lose Dr. Dixon she is pleased to have Dr. Henson, from Chicago, as she is to gain Dr. Lorimer, of Boston. New York lays the whole country under tribute to supply her wants. Another noted preacher who has recently accepted a pastorate in the metropolis is the Rev. Dr. Robert Mackenzie, of San Francisco. He goes to the Rutgers Presbyterian church, where Dr. Henry M. Booth rendered distinguished service through so many years. Dr. Mackenzie is to receive an annual salary of $6,000 and is to begin work within a few weeks.

The Methodists are leaving no stone unturned in their effort to raise $20,000,000 to liquidate the indebtedness on their churches as a thank-offering fund. Their churches in Manhattan and the Bronx were apportioned $1,000,000 of this fund, and they have raised $400,000 already, which is more than half the amount needed to pay all the debts on their churches in these two boroughs. Some very handsome personal donations have been made toward the lifting of mortgages and the endowment of homes for deaconesses and others. About $13,000,000 has been secured on the general fund of $20,000,000, and many believe that the other $7,000,000 will be raised without difficulty.

But another question of serious import now confronts the Methodists, and that is the shortage of bishops. The death of Bishop Parker and the sickness or impaired strength of Bishops Hurst, Bowman, Foster, Taylor and Thoburn entails more work upon the others than they can perform. Three of those in active service are past seventy-five years of age. The entire staff of bishops for the world is twenty-four. Bishop McCabe has suggested that thirty more bishops be added to the list, making fifty-four in all; likely it will be done.

Dr. George F. Pentecost, of Yonkers, N. Y., has resigned from his large pastorate to accept the position of special representative, under the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, in preaching the gospel to the English speaking peoples of the Philippines, China and Japan, something after the manner of his tour of India a dozen years ago. It is believed that Dr. Pentecost's evangelistic campaign through India did much for the cause of Christ in that land; so it is hoped that he will enter open doors, large and effectual, in these countries further east. In Japan and the Philippines the prospects are especially encouraging, because Japan appears to be on the eve of a great revival, and the Philippines, coming into the hands of the American people, are especially susceptible to the appeals of the gospel proclaimed by American preachers. Would not our society do well to send one of our strongest preachers on a like mission to these same countries? If it is a good thing for the Presbyterians to do, would it not also be a good work for the Disciples of Christ?

"I can forgive, but I can not forget," is only another way of saying, "I will not forgive." A forgiveness ought to be like a canceled note, torn in two and burned up, so that it never can be shown against the man. There is an ugly kind of forgiveness in this world—a kind of hedgehog forgiveness, shot out like quills.—Beecher.

We watch with wonder the apparent flight of the sun through space, glowing upon dead planets. But that is not half so wonderful as the passage of a human heart, glowing and sparkling with ten thousand effects, as it moves through life. The soul, like the sun, has its atmosphere, and is over against its fellows for light, warmth and transformation.—N. D. Hillis.

The Immortality of the Unseen

By GEORGE H. COMBS

(CONCLUDED.)

Accept that latest and most important revelation of science—the doctrine of the correlation of force, by which is meant that heat, magnetism, electricity, gravitation, all the forces of nature, are but manifestations of one primordial force, but variant expressions of this one force—call this force what you will and ask if it be mortal. When

"The moon is old
And the stars grow cold"

will this mysterious power be ready for burial? It is inconceivable. This something, this omnipotent force filling all things, upholding all things, do we not already begin to veil our faces in its presence as we remember that in this mysterious presence all things move and live and have their being? Have we not already spelled God? And do we not remember the startling question of the old negress: "Is God dead?" Can God die? Nay, the things which are not seen are eternal.

But not only does this principle that the seen is mortal and the unseen immortal hold good of this world but of all worlds. All seen things are temporal. We have long since recognized the truthfulness of this as applied to the world in which we live. We have read in our sacred books that the earth and the works that are therein shall be burned up. And such will be the fate of all worlds. Science has shown that worlds pass through the same changes as things here below. Spring, summer, autumn, winter, bud, bloom, fruit, decay; so change the worlds. Worlds have their birth, their youth, their maturity, their death. You can as confidently predict the time of the death of the world as an oak tree. The universe is already full of dead worlds. Yes, the visible, the material, must die. Not a brilliant star in the heavens but must meet the same fate as the fragile flower. The light of the sun will go out as the life of the humblest peasant, proud Mars as the firefly must cease to shine. Not in apocryphal speech, but in scientific truth, may we say, "The sun will be darkened and the moon shall not give her light and the stars of heaven shall fall and the powers that are in the heavens be shaken." The worlds that are seen will pass away. But is there not an unseen world—a world beyond the mutations of the seen, a world which ages not, a world never to be shadowed by darkening sun because the Lord God giveth it light?

This is our dearest hope. We feel that it must be so. That there is this unseen world man has always believed. It is a universal persuasion. Some happy hunting ground far away, some happy valley, some far off, wondrous elysian plain "where the Eïdola, the shadowy images of the dead, move in a world of shadows," some islands of the blest where Achilles and Tydides "unlaced the helmets from their flowing hair," some vale of Kashmir, some "Island valley of Avillon,

"Where falls not hail or rain nor any snow, Nor ever wind blows loudly," some new Jerusalem, has ever greeted the eyes of wandering, worn and weary men, and as they pushed aside for the moment the iron curtain which hangs between the seen and the unseen and gazed upon the glorious visions they forgot their toils and cares and heavy sorrows and burst into glorious song.

Well, this universal instinct must be true. God would not implant this longing in every heart, to mock it from his high heaven. Says Joseph Cook, "God makes no half hinges." He creates no such longing without its corresponding gratification. Humanity's heart cannot lie. There is an unseen world which to all the generations of men has been blessedly real and, believing that in its love-lit fields "the innumerable dwell" and that in a little while when we have grown tired of life's burdens we too shall pass over the river and be at rest, we wait and are content.

Look for but a moment at the application of this truth to man. Here again we meet with the dual. Here is flesh and spirit, the outward, the inward, the seen, the unseen, and here also it is the unseen which is eternal. "Our outward man perisheth but the inward is renewed day after day."

The outward man perisheth, that we know. This body is made to wear out. The eye will lose its brilliancy, the step its elasticity, the voice its power, the cheek its bloom, and the yellow grave gaps. Up to the cradle in which, under dainty coverlet, smiles your baby boy in happy dreams, comes ugly Death and leaves his mark upon his brow. "Aha! You are mine. I may wait eighty years before I claim you; I may come to-morrow." None escape.

Even of beauty, sleeping in the arms of love, may we say, only a little while and "the silver cord will be loosed, the golden bowl be broken, the pitcher be broken at the fountain, the wheel be broken at the cistern," and the dust shall return to the earth as it was. "As a flower of the field" so he perisheth. "For what is your life? It is even a vapor that appeareth for a little while and then vanisheth away."

We feel this. We do not need to be told that our bodies are mortal, that death is sure. We know it. The iron has already entered our souls. All the generations of men have stood with whitened lips at new-made graves. We too bury our dead every day. The silent cemeteries are everywhere about us. The toll of funeral bells is no unfamiliar sound. By our homes almost every day the hearse, with nodding plumes, creeps slowly, bearing its burden to the tomb. We die. The dead are more than the living. In dying we join the great majority—"our outward man perisheth."

But, blessed truth, "the inward man is renewed day by day," never ages, never wastes away, knows no death. It is of the unseen things which are eternal. Our inner man is not of this world. It has not the scent of mold, no earth stains upon its garments. It is not earth born. It is no child of pain and travail. It is from God.

"Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting,

The soul that rises with us, our life's star,
Has elsewhere had its setting.

And cometh from afar,

Not in entire forgetfulness,
And not in utter nakedness,
But trailing clouds of glory do we come
From God, who is our home."

From the earth we did not come, of the earth we are no part, to the earth we will not go.

This soul that "cometh from afar" is not to taste of the bitterness of death. For death cannot touch the unseen. Death can strike down my body, but it cannot strike me; only that which belongs to me. Death has no power over the unseen. Death can not harm the soul. It takes away the body, the old garment, but God giveth it a new. It breaks to pieces the old instrument which ever marred the music, but God giveth a new instrument, attuned to the melodious lays of the immortals. This assurance of immortality is the priceless treasure of our faith. Before the coming of the Nazarene the wise men of old had guessed this inner man immortal. The heathen mind had what Addison terms an "intimation" of immortality. They reasoned from the incompleteness of this life, from the soul's capacity for growth, from the deathlessness of certain qualities. A noted illustration of this last clause occurs to you. You remember that the Greek going to his death is asked by his beloved if after death they shall meet again, to which he responds, "I have asked that question of the hills, which look eternal, of the clear streams which flow on forever, of the stars among whose azure fields my raised spirit walks in glory. All are dumb. But as I look into thy face I feel that there is something in love which cannot wholly die. We shall meet again, Clemanthe." Truly says Mr. Ingersoll, "Immortality is a word which hope through all the ages has been whispering to love."

But these "intimations" are unsatisfactory. This hope of immortality is too precious, too vital, to rest upon golden sands of fancy and of dream. We would rest upon the rock. We would know. Thank God we may. Across the soundless centuries comes the cry, "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth on me though he were dead yet shall he live again, and whosoever liveth and believeth on me shall never die." Jesus Christ has risen and become the first fruits of them that slept. Because he rose we shall rise. We conquer through him. We live on. The "end" has no terrors for us. Fear is banished. We are immortal. "O death, where is thy sting, O grave, where is thy victory?" "Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

The Human Seasons.

Four seasons fill the measure of the year;

There are four seasons in the mind of man:

He has his lusty spring, when fancy clear

Takes in all beauty with an easy span:

He has his summer, when luxuriously

Spring's bonny cud of youthful thought he loves

To ruminate and by such dreaming high

Is nearest unto heaven: quiet coves

His soul has in its autumn, when his wings

He fureth close; contented so to look

On mists in idleness—to let fair things

Pass by unheeded as a threshold brook.

He has his winter too of pale misfeature,

Or else he would forego his mortal nature.

A Hoosier Boy and His Colt.

By Alex.

When autumn days are golden, and the rivulet of cider flows from the press, then the farmer's boy thinks life worth living. John Smith, aged fifteen, with his two younger brothers, Hi and Edd, were returning home one autumn afternoon with the juice from ten bags of apples which they had squeezed out in a neighbor's cider press. They were riding in an old-fashioned one-horse spring wagon, the "irons" for which had been bought in "town," while all the wooden parts had been dressed and the whole thing put together and painted by "Uncle Vaton," the farmer, John's father. If it was not so smooth nor so elegant as a Pullman palace car, it was enjoyed quite as much by the boys as is the mahogany-cased compartment by the globe trotter. This conveyance was used to carry the farmer's family to "Uncle Jim's," who lived among the rough hills of Big Creek, where they frequently went for a day of visiting; or eight miles away to church at Lancaster during big meetings, and to many other similar occasions; and it was no less serviceable in cider-making time.

The farmer's house stood back several rods from the main road. It was reached by a fenced lane, on the right of which was a meadow, and on the left the "woods pasture," a large gate opening from the lane into the barnyard. To-day John drove down this lane with a very proud heart. At this moment he had little thought of the cider or of his younger brothers: the horse in the "shays" was absorbing his thoughts. Teddy was now past three years old. During the summer, beside old Queen, he had been "broken" to work to the plow and the wagon. He had never worked "single," but had behaved himself admirably "double." He had become the very apple of John's eye. He was sleek and strong, showing the good effects of a little oats and corn and plenty of blue-grass, together with just enough real work to make him sober, which, however, in no way had broken his spirits. This afternoon John had persuaded his father to permit him to drive Teddy to the spring-wagon.

When it was discovered that the boys were coming home, John's sister Emma, his senior by two years, ran into the yard to watch them.

Teddy was pulling on the bits just as a green colt of spirit does when he realizes for the first time that he is becoming a horse. And John was just a human Teddy, fed and worked much as Teddy had been. For it is the man who knows how to raise a colt who is most apt to bring up the most sensible and serviceable boys. Both may exhibit "pranks," but they are never mean. If Teddy was just awaking to the first consciousness of his horsehood, John was having a realization of manhood which he had never known before; for his nerves were tingling with the sense of his mastery over the beautiful, spirited horse who was now drawing the wagon no longer by his shoulders and the "tugs," but by his mouth and the "lines."

As John was speeding Teddy at his best trot, a strong breeze began to fan the face of the driver. He wore a broad-brimmed straw hat, the brim of which had become limp with a summer's wear. This brim was fanned close over John's eyes, so that he found himself unable to see the road.

At the same time, the motion of the lines and the bounding of the wagon informed him that Teddy had "broken" and was now in a swift gallop. He is no longer the docile colt, but the strong horse, fired as by magic with the spirit inherited from a thousand generations of wild life on the plains, struggling to free himself from the firm hand of his master, and from the ignoble trappings of his harness. Unable to see an inch before him, John lives an age in a moment, and that age ends with a crash. Teddy had attempted to leap the gate opening into the barn yard, but, unable to carry his load with him, had instead landed upon the gate and broken it down. By plunging and kicking he immediately freed himself from the driver and the wagon, and was away with a spirit and a speed undreamed of before; and John, soon free and unhurt, hastened after him.

When the boy reached the hilltop overlooking the lower parts of the farm and the old "bend-field" orchard, he saw the colt come to a stop under the old rambo apple tree. After a moment's pause, with head and tail high in air, he uttered a snort which was inherited from some wild steed on Arabian deserts. Teddy, however, was soon "cornered" by the farmer and the boys, and mounting him John rode him at full speed back to the house. The colt was again hitched to the wagon, and the remainder of the afternoon was spent in driving him into all sorts of difficult places in order to eradicate, if possible, the memory of those moments of wild freedom, and to firmly impress upon him that man is his master. Your true horse-trainer is a practical psychologist.

That evening the family knelt around the great old-fashioned fireplace, and, after the tender prayer had been uttered and the dear old hymn had been sung, John and his sister Emma lingered for a moment. When all the others had retired she said, "John, God is so good, that no one was hurt." And John replied, "Do you know what I thought as we were all spilled out of the wagon? It was this, 'Pride always comes before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall.'"

A Modified Imperialism

By J. N. JESSUP

While we are glorying in our great conventions and our general expansiveness it is well for us to be reminded of a few things, "lest we forget." There is a pitiable, not to say criminal, condition among us. The need of most urgency among us is not for more missionary zeal and money, nor for larger educational facilities, great as these are. Missions, colleges, benevolences, a deepened spiritual life, are ends devoutly to be sought. What we need now most is an adequate means to these glorious ends.

The picture is not quite so touching in the strong states, although it exists painfully enough, as in the outlying territory. The spirit of independency has gone to seed and brought forth a fearful crop of incompetency, popery of the two by four measurement, stagnation and death. For example, in a certain state there are said to be 35,000 Disciples. (No one has been able to number this Israel accurately because most of them refuse the right of any one to count them!) These people worship largely at the week's camp meeting once a year and in schoolhouses at rare intervals when a traveling preacher (without recommendation, record, church membership, authority or precedent of any kind) comes by. These 35,000 church members are scarcely mentioned or reckoned with among the religious forces of the state. They are not felt as a religious force. They have no academies or colleges. They give about $300 to foreign missions, $200 to home missions, $2,000 to state missions. There are four or five settled pastors. The churches are without preaching, many of them engaged in civil strife and disrupted by party factions when, even if they were united, they are scarcely strong enough to stand alone. When a church gets into trouble and develops a fight there is no one, no one in all the United States with recognized authority to disinterestedly help settle the difficulty and put the church on its feet. The church must fight to its death, as it usually does, or receive such a knockout as will put it twenty-five years behind.

I have no hesitancy in saying that I would rather have five thousand well organized members in churches subject to the wise care of a central committee or presbytery or conference or elders or bishops chosen for piety and common sense, than to have these 35,000 "wild roes upon the mountains."

But these 35,000 are being saved as individuals even if they are not prominent in religious work? That is an open question. Are these babes in Christ? But babes must be looked after by parent or guardian. For lack of proper guardianship half a million of our babes will never get out of their swaddling clothes or come to manhood in Christ.

This is not alone true in the wilds, it is true of many in the central states. In one of the six states of our largest numbers our church was planted in a town before any others. It had every chance to get and keep the leadership there. The Methodists have far outstripped it. The Presbyterians, beginning many years later, are ahead of it. The Baptists are building up. Our church has been merely "holding on" for years. That church needed a guardian years ago. That help and oversight ought to have been ready in the form of a state committee of supervision.

Imperialism? Yes. I am an imperialist to the extent that people who need governing ought to be governed. A good many of our people need governing. We are coming to the time (if we have not already reached it) when we must have a closer organization, a more compact, well ordered and wisely governed people. It will create some agony and the cry of popery will be raised, but out of those birththroes will be born a people to whom we will be doubly proud to belong. How shall we begin this modified imperialism?

The Faith in Peril.

By J. H. Wright.

The faith has ever had its perils. Whether we view it as a system of truth to be believed, or as a life to be lived, it has had its secret and open dangers. As to Paul, personally, there befell, "perils of waters, perils of robbers, perils by his own countrymen, perils by the heathen, perils in the city, perils in the wilderness, perils in the sea and perils by false brethren," so "perilous times" come to the faith.

1. Peril from false teachings. "Faith comes by hearing and hearing by the word of God." To supplant the word of God is to imperil the faith. The Savior declares that "when any one heareth the word of the kingdom, and understandeth it not, then cometh the wicked one and catcheth away that which was sown in his heart." "Elymas, the sorcerer, withstood Paul and Barnabas, seeking to turn the deputy from the faith." Any doctrine or any individual whose influence is subversive of the word of God is a menace to individual faith and a peril to the faith.

And if we may learn from Paul's example we may not be indifferent either toward false teachings or teachers. False teaching jeopardizes the soul and imperils the faith. Paul was not indifferent in the days of his Jewish faith, and so he tried to stamp out Christianity. After he became a Christian his spirit was stirred within him at Athens in the presence of Pagan idolatry, at the blindness of his own nation in its failure to recognize in Jesus the long expected Messiah, and at Peter when Judaistic influences led him to dissemble. Startling, indeed, was his indictment of Elymas as "full of all guile and all villainy, thou son of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness," because, by his perversion of the word of God, he tried to "turn aside the proconsul from the faith."

Nor should we be indifferent. Doubtless there are "fads" which have their brief run and are perhaps better unnoticed, but when error comes in the guise of greater truth, then, because of its pretentious appeal to deeply religious minds, it is our duty to unmask it lest it deceive the very elect.

2. Peril from persecution. What a falling away when persecution sets in! Paul persecuted the church and probably many gave up the faith. Others were imprisoned, slain, and the faith was in peril. The awful persecution of the Diocletian period bade fair to sweep the faith off the earth. The heart grows sick as it scans the pages of history. In France, England, Scotland, Madagascar, China, the islands of the sea—everywhere—the red torrent of blood has flowed.

Should such persecutions befall us to-day how rapidly would our lists decrease! And it needs not confiscation of property nor peril of life to reveal this. A sneer, a rebuke, a threat, and Christianity often vanishes. But it is a poor type of Christianity after all. "The blood of martyrs is the seed of the church," has been true in all the ages. Amid such perils a heroic faith is developed. God has not withheld his strengthening grace, else the faith had been lost amid persecution.

3. Peril from covetousness. "The love of money is a root of all kinds of evil: which some reaching after have been led astray from the faith." This danger is first personal, then it becomes a menace to the local church, and then it cripples the great agencies of the church at large, for these cannot exist save as a Christ-incited liberality exists. It is insidious in its approach. The sufferer may not realize his danger. It is not well, as a rule, to "measure ourselves by ourselves," nor by our brethren, as the standard is too unsafe, but a comparison of our offerings for God's work with those of others may sometimes help us. Widow Two Mites still lives among us to remind Bro. Almighty Dollar of his privilege and duty.

When the local work is handicapped by covetously withheld offerings; when the cause of missions or of Christian education languishes because the money of Christians is hoarded or grudgingly, meagerly given, who can fail to see that the faith is in peril from covetousness?

4. Peril from unholy living. If you wish to have this thought sink into your heart, sit down and slowly, meditatively read the book of Jude. It is cyclonic in its intensity. I once read, "Contend earnestly for the faith," as a challenge to my indifference and as a rebuke to those who were lax in perceiving and emphasizing the doctrinal features of "the faith which was once for all delivered unto the saints." But to-day I see in it another thought. It is a shrill, penetrating, agonizing cry uttered because the faith was in peril from unholy living. "Ungodly men, turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness, and denying our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ," had "crept in privily," and the faith was in peril. And this same peril threatens the faith to-day. It may change its form; it may assume the grosser or the seemingly more refined forms of sin, but it is a menace. A recent Ram's Horn cartoon illustrates this. A well-dressed man, carrying in his hand a valise labeled, "Pride, Covetousness, Envy, Self-love," meets a miserable tramp carrying a bag labeled, "Intemperance, Profanity, Lawlessness, Vulgarity, Violence," and under the caption, "A Distinction without a Difference," this is recorded:

"Respectable Man: 'Why don't you brace up, reform, and renounce your sins?'"

"Vagabond: 'What's the use of talking, we are all sinners, ain't we?'"

"Respectable Man: 'Perhaps we are, but my sins are all respectable.'"

Of course there are sins and sins, and some are grosser than others, but any sin that robs God of a holy, consecrated life, is a peril to the faith. What can so deaden the message of salvation as the presence in the church of the intemperate, the licentious, the slanderer, the religious wire-puller, or those who, like Hymenæus and Alexander, having "thrust a good conscience from them make shipwreck of the faith?"

And what is our duty amid these perils? "Contend for the faith." When false teachings prevail, when persecution threatens, when covetousness or unholy living menaces, ever and always, "Contend for the faith." The sword we may not use, "for the weapons of our warfare are not of the flesh," but "the sword of the Spirit, the word of God," is ours; ours "for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness." Let us wield it.

Current Literature.

A Short History of the Hebrews to the Roman Period is the title of a new text book of Hebrew history by R. L. Ottley. The author attempts to keep the history of the people separate, as far as possible, from the history of their religion, and he accomplishes this to the extent at least of keeping clear of the more troublesome problems of Old Testament theology. He recognizes, at the same time, that the history of the Hebrew people was in a sense the history of their religion, since religious motives governed their development, and since all of their own historians explain the nation's career by constant reference to its close relation to Jehovah. The writer does not go out of his way to introduce disputed points of biblical criticism, and indeed often goes out of his way to avoid them. His own attitude is that of a moderate liberal.

The narratives of the patriarchal age are taken as giving the opinion of the Hebrews about the origins of the race—an opinion, however, which was not contemporary with the events described by hundreds and thousands of years, and which has not been to any appreciable extent confirmed by archeology, and never can be. These accounts can be accepted with confidence as trustworthy history, says the author, only if we assume that the inspiration of their writers was of a sort which insured them against historical and scientific errors, and this assumption he declines to make. He shows a disposition to regard the accounts of the Old Testament miracles as vivid presentations of the Hebrew conviction of Jehovah's special concern for the nation—and, as such, entirely correct—rather than as necessarily bona fide history. In other words, he believes that the Hebrew writers were right in asserting Jehovah's special care for their race, but that the incidents which they used to illustrate this religious principle—the stories of the miraculous deliverances, like the parting of the Red Sea and of the Jordan and the halting of the sun in the Valley of Ajalon—are not necessarily trustworthy as history.

The arrangement of the volume is convenient as a text book. There is an appendix containing citations of authorities and some discussion of disputed points for the benefit of students, and chronological tables and bibliography. The author's constant reference to the text of the Old Testament and his encouragement of its use by students will make the book almost as useful to those who disagree with his view of Hebrew history as it is to those who occupy the same ground. (Macmillan, $1.25.)

One of the fruits of the Ecumenical Foreign Missionary Conference, held in New York in April, 1900, was a new impetus to the systematic study of foreign missions, and one of the fruits of that new impetus is a new introduction to the study of missions entitled Via Christi, by Louise Manning Hodgkins. It is a little book giving an outline history of missions from the apostolic age to the beginning of the nineteenth century, and is arranged in such form as to be especially convenient for the use of mission study classes. It cannot be called deep philosophical history, but it affords not only an outline of the main facts regarding the external growth of the

✂ The People's Forum ✂

This is a new department of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. While our columns have always been open to our readers for the expression of their sentiments at any reasonable length and on all reasonable topics, it has seemed desirable to emphasize this fact by setting apart a distinct space as a Forum in which all who wish to speak may be heard. If you have a comment to make, whether critical or commendatory, make it here. If you have a suggestion to offer, offer it through The People's Forum. If you wish to take exception to anything in the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST, editorial or otherwise, here is the place to file your objection. We ask only that all communications be courteous in tone, and not exceeding two hundred words in length. They must be brief because we wish them to be numerous. Much can be said in two hundred words. Lincoln's Gettysburg address contains only a trifle more. Preachers and laymen are especially welcome to the floor in this Forum. In fact it is a splendid chance for the pew to get back at the pulpit. The following letters are from brethren who had a hint in advance that the Forum was about to be opened.

The People's Forum is only one of several interesting features which will be contained in the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST for the coming year.—Editor.

Patronize Our Own Enterprises.

I commend the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for its new policy of stopping a subscriber's paper when the time is out. That is business.

If one of our papers is not sound or has an unholy relationship, as some may think, just stop taking that paper, but don't publish it.

All our people should take our own papers. Our people should send to our colleges. Our Sunday-schools should take our Sunday-school literature. It is the best, the purest and the most helpful. Every church among us should take all our missionary collections, and thus educate the church to give.

I like the idea of having the Forum.

Wanted—Sunday-school Methods.

Readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST have found in its Sunday-school department much valuable information. Prof. Willett's articles were a delight and an inspiration to every student, and Bro. Richardson, as his successor, has maintained the same high standard.

However, it has seemed to me that if half the page was given over to the presentation of methods to ensure best results in Sunday-school work the page would be even more valuable than it is. My suggestion is that articles on the teacher's meeting, outlines of Bible and map articles, suggestions as to Sunday-school apparatus, etc., be allowed to divide the space with the weekly comment. J. P. ROWLISON.

[Good suggestion. We will think about it. Meanwhile we invite readers who have ideas about Sunday-school methods to write them out briefly and send them to us.—EDITOR.]

The Call to Apostolic Duty.

"As for them [the eleven] they went out and proclaimed the tidings everywhere, the Lord co-operating with them." The common people heard them gladly as they had him who spake as never man spake. Churches sprang up as if by magic. "The word of God grew; and the number of the disciples was greatly multiplied." "Daily in the temple and from house to house they declared the good news, that Jesus is the Messiah."

As compared with the ripeness of the field now the multitudes then were but as the first ripe sheaf to the ingathering. Then there was an innumerable host that had an aversion to the gospel; to-day the people are eager for it. Then there were but a few heralds of the cross; now there are thousands. Then the synagogue, the riverside, the forum, the official palace were used by the ambassadors of Christ; now every school-house, village, hamlet, city and town are open doors bidding us enter with the plea for the restoration of the early church.

Opportunity is but another word for duty. To ignore the call to apostolic service—which may be answered—merits divine disapproval. "Let us go up at once and possess the land, for we are well able to overcome it."

What Bible Should I Use?

Thos. Nelson & Sons have just brought out the American Standard Revised Bible in one style, but varying in quality of paper and binding and in prices. This enterprising firm will doubtless issue some other styles to meet the demand for different sizes and editions, with Nelson's "Helps," which is one of the very best aids for the student and teacher to be had in reasonable limits.

This Bible represents thirty years of competent scholarship co-operating to produce the best possible English expression of the word of the Lord. It is a credit to American learning, which has been gratuitously bestowed on this labor of love. The English revisers disbanded as soon as the work was published, New Testament, 1881; Old Testament, 1885. The American scholars who worked so faithfully with English brethren to produce that great work, felt that they could prepare an improved edition. The American Standard Revised Version is their effort to realize that end.

First of all our Bible should give us the best English equivalent of the exact thought of the inspired originals. Secondly, it should so guard this thought by avoiding loose paraphrasing, in colloquial English, that error may not be suggested. This American edition meets these necessary demands better than any other English version meets them. Besides, it gives an exceptionally useful selection of references. Would that Bible readers appreciated their value.

Wise old Christians will find new meaning in their familiar passages as their reward for using this Bible. All young Christians should use it only, for it best expresses the word of the Lord. All preachers should study it, use it in the pulpit, and by wise talks about it help on its wide and speedy adoption. Talk it up everywhere.

church, but also some insight into the religious condition of various ages. Illustrative extracts from the religious literature of different periods exhibit the type of devotion which was prevalent in each and the ideal of Christian life as each conceived it. In connection with each chapter there is a list of suitable subjects for themes and class exercises, with references to other books. Missionary societies which wish to study missions seriously in the light of their history can use this book to advantage, especially in connection with some such book as Prof. Clark's "Introduction to the Study of Christian Missions," which deals with the principles upon which missionary activity is based. (Macmillan. $.50.)

Does the command "Love thy neighbor as thyself" apply to states as well as individuals? By what rules is the moral quality of the acts of nations to be determined? Or should the acts of nations be governed only by considerations of expediency without regard to morality? These are the questions considered in Politics and the Moral Law, a little volume containing the address by Gustav Ruemelin, late Chancellor of the University of Tuebingen, delivered in 1874, and now for the first time published in English. The author's conclusion is that the law of love cannot be applied to nations, but that, instead of turning the other cheek, a government "does and must endeavor to anticipate even a threatened blow with an energetic counter-stroke." This is an exact application to politics of David Harum's principle: "Do to others what they want to do to you—and do it fast."

Again, in the matter of assisting a neighboring state which may be afflicted by famine, invasion or uprising, a state should determine its course without regard to the welfare of its neighbor and solely in view of the effects of such action upon itself. "In short, the entire chapter of the duties of love, which is the chief doctrine of the moral law, has no application to the conduct of the state. A nation depends upon the love of self." Yet the author condemns the principles of Machiavelli as immoral, and believes that nations should at least deal justly, even if they do not deal lovingly, with their neighbors.

As a description of things as they are, the author's statements appear reasonably correct. His principles are those upon which states actually do act, but whether they are defensible by any system of political ethics is another question. We have our doubts. (Macmillan. $.75.)

Strong Food.

Having the Longest Staying Powers.

It is a good thing to know how to select food that will so thoroughly feed and nourish the body that there is no indication of hunger or faintness from one meal to another.

Grape-Nuts Food will carry the user longer, probably, than any other food known. A young lady attending business college writes from Atlanta, Ga., saying, "Before I began using Grape-Nuts I got so hungry before the dinner hour that I was faint and almost sick, but since I have Grape-Nuts Food for breakfast I study harder, and wait longer for my dinner without experiencing any of the former trouble."

One great advantage is that it requires no cooking or preparation. I wish every one knew of the value of Grape-Nuts Food for children in school." I. Parkhurst.

Our Budget.

—S. S. Lappin, Atlanta, Ill., wants a singer for January.

—E. B. Redd, of Platte City, Mo., has accepted a call to the church at Jefferson City.

—L. S. Cupp has resigned his work at Huntsville, Mo., to take effect soon.

—W. H. Williams has been employed as pastor at Chanute, Kan., for the remainder of the year.

—An evangelist is wanted to hold a meeting at Ezbon, Kan., or a pastor for half time. Address, with recommendations, R. U. Mal-lory.

—D. F. Sellards has been compelled to give up the work at South Ottumwa, Ia., on account of ill health.

—J. W. Holsapple, of Sherman, Texas, has accepted an invitation to preach the Thanksgiving sermon at the union service at Howe, Texas.

—J. G. M. Luttenberger was in St. Louis Monday returning from his meeting at Litchfield, Minn. He begins at Shelburnville, Ill., next Sunday.

—Edwin Baker, evangelist, can be secured to hold special meetings or as pastor. He has had many years' experience. Address him at Rushville, Ill.

—T. A. Reynolds succeeds J. H. MacNeill at Muncie, Ind., and Bro. MacNeill succeeds J. F. Floyd at Kokomo, Ind., and Bro. Floyd goes to Washington, Ind.

—J. G. Ensell, who has been serving as temporary pastor at Marion, Ia., is now in the lecture field again and Nelson G. Brown, of Burlington, Ia., has gone to Marion.

—The Church of Christ at Kalamazoo, Mich., was dedicated on Sunday, Nov. 17. Addresses were made morning, afternoon and evening by F. P. Arthur, of Grand Rapids, and Prof. G. P. Coler, of Ann Arbor.

—Our readers will regret to learn of the illness of J. H. Garrison, the editor of this paper, who has been confined to his bed for over a week with a severe attack of fever. Correspondents whose letters are not promptly answered will know the reason why.

—W. W. Hollett has resigned the pastorate at Perry, Okla., after 13 months with the church and has closed his work there. On Oct. 27 the church raised $550 to pay accumulated debts. The church is now in good condition. Bro. Hollett is going to occupy a claim in the new country.

—W. H. Harding, who recently came from New Brunswick, and became evangelist for the Fifth Illinois district, has moved his family to Carlinville, Ill., which will be his permanent address. He is now in a meeting at Carlinville. Churches desiring his services should address him there.

—Florida is almost destitute of preachers. Ministers are needed, especially in some of the good interior towns. The salaries are not large at first, but the possibilities are great. Ministers who are interested are requested to address C. W. Zaring, corresponding secretary of the state board, Jacksonville, Fla., sending references.

—The prospectus of Bro. John T. Brown's "Churches of Christ at the Beginning of the Twentieth Century," has appeared. It is to be a sumptuous volume (or two) containing pictures and write-ups of as many churches and ministers as can be induced to pay $10 for a quarter page cut, $20 for a half page or $40 for a full page. That such a project fills a long felt want there can be no question. Any preacher who has a burning desire to see his picture in a book will find in this as convenient and economical a way as he can expect. To quote the words of the prospectus, "the enormity of such an undertaking" makes it a matter of interest to the entire brotherhood.

—The church at Shenandoah, Ia., J. H. Wright, pastor, recently lifted a mortgage of over $1,000, placed about $250 worth of permanent improvements on the church building and parsonage, paid off a floating debt of $200 in addition to meeting all current expenses and making liberal offerings for special evangelistic services, missions and local benevolences.

—M. S. Johnson, of Golden City, Mo., writes: "J. Windbigler and wife, of the M. E. Church, have united with the Christian Church during our meeting here. He is a preacher of ability. His standing in the M. E. Church was high. He comes among us from convictions of duty. He is unusually gifted and resourceful and will make a useful man among us. He should find work with one of our strong churches.

—The First Christian church, St. Louis, has decided to enlarge its building. Its present auditorium has become entirely inadequate to contain either the morning or the evening audiences. Bro. Brandt, as pastor, is ably assisted by his nephew, Mr. Helser, a former student of Butler College, who devotes his entire time to calling on persons who are, have been, or ought to be members of the church.

—Nov. 24 is World's Temperance Sunday. The Anti-cigarette League, through its general council, intends to make that day the culminating point in a great campaign to secure a million new members to the league in America. Statistics are said to show a great falling off in the quantity of cigarettes made and sold and this is attributed to the agitation of the league, to the orders of many large business houses against cigarette smoking by employes and to the laws that have been passed in many states as the result of this agitation. Literature and plans for the crusade can be secured from the general headquarters of the American Anti cigarette League, 106 La Salle avenue, Chicago.

—We call attention to the letter published elsewhere from M. B. Madden, of Sendai, Japan, in reference to the Japan Bible College. Those who have studied Japan from the missionary standpoint agree that educational work must accompany evangelistic work to win success. The people are enjoying a new intellectual life, an awakening comparable to that which occurred in Europe at the time of the Renaissance. Just as the revival of classical learning at that time produced a revival of paganism, with pagan morals, so the intellectual quickening of Japan will work a moral and religious degeneration unless dominated by the ideals and ideas of Christian education. The Japanese are interested in education and can, therefore, be approached most effectively along that line, because it is with them the line of least resistance.

—The annual report of the executive board of the Chicago Christian missionary society shows that the work in that city is in a more hopeful condition than ever before. The Illinois C. W. B. M. at its last convention undertook to raise a special fund of $1,500 for a city evangelist in Chicago. The Church Extension Board has granted a loan of $3,500 to complete the building of the Irving Park church and of $1,100 on the Humboldt Park church, both of which are now secure. The American Christian Missionary Society co-operates with the Chicago churches by giving $2 for every $1 raised by the Chicago churches for city missions up to $1,500. During the year the Chicago churches raised $26,485 for buildings, indebtedness, lots and building funds and spent $1,074 in special evangelistic meetings; these, in addition to the current expenses of the several churches. Three mission Sunday-schools and two new congregations have been organized during the year and a union has been effected between the West Side church and the Union Christian church, which now become the Jackson Boulevard Church of Christ.

All Stuffed Up

That's the condition of many sufferers from catarrh, especially in the morning. Great difficulty is experienced in clearing the head and throat.

No wonder catarrh causes headache, impairs the taste, smell and hearing, pollutes the breath, deranges the stomach and affects the appetite.

To cure catarrh, treatment must be constitutional—alterative and tonic.

"I was afflicted with catarrh. I took medicines of different kinds, giving each a fair trial; but gradually grew worse until I could hardly hear, taste or smell. I then concluded to try Hood's Sarsaparilla, and after taking five bottles I was cured and have not had any return of the disease since." EUGENE FORBES, Lebanon, Kan.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Cures catarrh—it soothes and strengthens the mucous membrane and builds up the whole system.

—At the close of the morning service at the Central Christian church at Springfield, Ill., Nov. 10, a call was made for volunteers to become charter members of the West Side church. Over one hundred persons who lived in the western part of the city responded. An organization was at once perfected and trustees were elected. The new church will continue to worship with the Central until January 1, when the handsome building which has been erected for it will be ready for dedication. The prospects of the new congregation are bright. This is the ideal way for increasing the number of congregations in the city.

—There is no way, it seems, for an editor to escape criticism of one kind or another. Here is a criticism from a preacher and pastor of national reputation that is of a kind which almost any old editor can bear with Christian resignation:

I have just laid down this week's CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, having gone through it from the cover-page poem to "Book Notes," feeling every moment that I ought to lay it aside till "a more convenient season." But I must confess that the uniform excellence of its contents, essays, editorials, news and publishers' ads, held me with a spell like the old salt's eye in Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner." Now you ought not to tempt busy, hard-worked people. But at your age, and with the habit formed through nearly forty years of the publication of the journal, I suppose you can find no place for repentance, though you seek it earnestly with tears. Garrison is joined to his ideals! let him alone!

A BUSY PASTOR.

—During October the church extension receipts amounted to $4,752.12. This is a falling behind October of last year of $494.69; 282 churches sent $2,866.56 to church extension. This is a loss of eight in the number of contributing churches and 66 cents in receipts. The individual gifts amounted during the same time to $1,885.56, a loss of $493.93 over last year. It is to be remembered that the obligations of the Board of Church Extension are constantly increasing. The board promised 69 loans during the last missionary year, aggregating $76,000, and these buildings are now in course of construction. Ten loans were promised at the October meeting and 15 at the November meeting. In all, nearly 100 churches are now in course of construction where the board is obligated to pay loans within the next six months. People should continue to send individual gifts, the churches their offerings and those who have annuity money to give to our board should send it in early this year to help the board meet its obligations. Churches that we cannot accommodate with four per cent. money are glad to get annuity money at six per cent. Those that have annuity money to give to this fund should put their money to work building churches at once.

—We call the attention of all subscribers to the necessity of being careful not to pay their subscriptions to wandering “agents” who can show no credentials. All authorized traveling agents can furnish documentary evidence of their authority. We have reason to believe that more or less fraud is being practiced at the expense of subscribers who are induced to pay to a smooth-spoken person who represents himself as our agent, but has no authority and makes no remittance to us. Such apparently is the case with regard to one, A. B. Smith, who is reported to have made some collections in the vicinity of Morgan, Ky. He is either a fraud or woefully careless for the money has never reached us. In any case he was unauthorized. Pay subscriptions either direct to this office or to the local agent whom you know or to a traveling agent who can present proper credentials.

—A movement is on foot for the establishment of a Bible chair at Norman, Okla., in connection with the Territorial University. It is proposed to organize a stock company with a capital of $10,000 to build a rooming and dining hall for our students at the university. It will accommodate from 30 to 50 students, will be called the Disciples’ Home for Students and will be so far as possible a real home. It will also be a center for the Bible chair work, will furnish to the community a feasible sign that the Bible chair exists and will pay its own way after it is started. The plan looks feasible. The stock company method, as the Oklahoma brethren probably know, has generally proved a failure when applied to colleges, but the conditions of this project are different and there is no obvious reason why it should not succeed here—if the stock can be sold. W. H. Matlock is secretary of the temporary committee.

“The Witness of Jesus.”

This volume of sermons, by Alexander Procter (Christian Publishing Company, $1.25) has been before the public now for some months. The book contains 19 sermons from Mr. Procter, with a memorial address by T. P. Haley. It was edited by J. H. Garrison and is a handsome volume of over four hundred pages.

To those of us who knew Alexander Procter and were familiar with his methods of thinking and his style of preaching the book is no disappointment. It is a good representation of Mr. Procter’s pulpit life. Had Mr. Procter consented to tax himself with the labor necessary to a careful writing out of these sermons, the book, from a literary point of view, would have been very different from what it is. He could write with distinguished ability; but he seldom did so. While the style of these sermons is somewhat loose, yet the sermons are truly Procterian, and will give the reader a very correct idea of the preacher as he appeared before an audience—a correct idea of his manner and matter of thinking. In reading these discourses I often saw and felt the splendid personality of the man, as I was accustomed to see and feel his power when listening to him preach.

In writing of Mr. Procter after his death, Bro. J. W. McGarvey said he was an “ideal-ist.” This is true, and I am glad that I lived so long in touch with a man of such splendid ideals. No men contribute more to the good of the world than do the idealists. The greatest idealist the world has ever known was Jesus Christ. And his ideals are doing more to-day to lift up society and save men than any other force.

Bro. McGarvey and Bro. Procter, as thinkers and preachers, were so different as never to be able to understand and enjoy each other. And yet it is possible for other men to stand midway between them, and to understand and enjoy them both. The realist and the idealist each has his place in the world; and it is a fortunate thing that we have both these types of thinkers. They serve as the ballast and the sails of the ship; the one holds it level while the other propels it forward. It is sometimes amusing to the crew, however, to hear the sails call out to the ballast—“Hold up there, you are impeding our progress,” and then to hear the ballast call out to the sails—“Draw in there, you are going too fast.”

These sermons of Mr. Procter give assurance of his soundness in all the essentials of Christianity. No man can read these sermons without feeling an uplift and an expansion of mind and heart.

For the memorial address of T. P. Haley, and the editing skill of J. H. Garrison, which constitute an important part of this book, the public will be duly grateful.

A Query Answered.

DEAR EVANGELIST:—

“Who can tell us the name of the first preacher who proclaimed the primitive gospel as urged by the Disciples of Christ in the region covered by the Louisiana Purchase?”

In answer to this query of your Nov. 7 issue, I refer you to the autobiography of Elder Samuel Rodgers. Bro. Rodgers was a convert of Barton Stone (P. 16). He and James Hughes came to Missouri and preached at Ramsey’s Creek, Pike county (P. 47). Another trip was made in 1822 when the first meeting was held here at Lexington. Bro. Rodgers and Bro. Hughes were at this time simply “Bible Christians.”

E. J. FENSTERMACHER.

The Globe-Democrat of this city rejoices over the overthrow of Tammany in New York city, but adds that there is a St. Louis Tammany whose overthrow is yet to be effected. The Globe-Democrat must remember, however, that the New York Tammany was overthrown by a combination of the decent elements of New York city against that corrupt organization. It was not done on partisan lines. This is exactly what should have been done in St. Louis in our last city election. Because it was not done the defeat of the corrupt element in St. Louis was only partial, whereas it might have been complete. One ring was overthrown, but in order to accomplish that on party lines an alliance was made with a corrupt element which now handicaps Mayor Wells in his sincere desire to give the city a pure and businesslike administration. Let us profit by the example of New York city and combine the decent element of all parties in St. Louis to overthrow the boodlers and parasites which now infest our city government.

At Osaka, Japan.

This is a city of a million souls and is the chief manufacturing city in the empire of Japan. As you approach it and see smoke-stacks in every direction, you are reminded of Pittsburg, Pa. The number of factories is about 1,800. The city is growing at a rapid rate. The railroad depot is said to be the largest and finest in all of the East. It is about like the depot at Columbus, Ohio.

This is a great center in which to plant the gospel. Ten missionary boards are at work here, represented by about fifty missionaries. There are five mission schools and several hundred students. The number of Christians (of all names) in the city is over 3,000. The oldest missionary is Dr. A. D. Hale of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, who has been here for twenty-six years.

The Foreign Society has been at work in this city only a little over two years. Already there are seventeen believers and two Sunday-schools. R. L. Pruett came here first. He is an excellent missionary and has the language well. He came to Japan as an "independent" missionary from Tennessee. The churches that sent him out did not provide sufficient support and he said he was soon the most "dependent" missionary in Japan. Since his appointment by the Foreign Society he has been doing most excellent work. He and his family live in the new mission home built by the Foreign Society. C. S. Weaver and wife are also stationed here. They have been in Japan only one year. They are working faithfully on the language. They came out from Illinois where they are well known. They are delighted with their new duties. Miss Bertha Clawson is also in Osaka, living with the Weavers. She is supported by the church at Angola, Ind. She has been here three years and says she would not exchange positions with any one in America. She has been a good student of the language and is doing a most useful service. Three buildings are needed in Osaka.

First, a home for C. S. Weaver and wife. They are now renting a house which belongs to the Church Missionary Society.

Second, we need a chapel where R. L. Pruett is doing work. The ground and chapel will cost about $3,000.

Third, a chapel is also needed for the work of the Weavers and Miss Clawson. Their work is about five miles apart. I hope some friend will give the money soon for these buildings. We have expended only about $12,500 for buildings in the whole empire of Japan. This is not enough for the great work we are doing.

We have enjoyed two very pleasant receptions here. One was tendered by the native Christians at the home of the Pruett; the other was by all of the missionaries of the different boards at the home of the Weavers. The missionaries are all very cordial. Sunday afternoon I preached at the union services. The audience was made up of missionaries and their families. Missionaries on the field, away from home and native land, are eloquent listeners.

On Sunday I was present at two native services conducted by our missionaries, and spoke, R. L. Pruett interpreting for me. Hirai Yokichi is our Japanese preacher in Osaka, working with our missionaries. He is a fine looking man, twenty-eight years of age, and is said to be an orator. Miss Lavenia Oldham, of Tokyo, had him in training for about six years. I was told that he could preach as well as the average preacher in America, and sometimes preached really great sermons. He preaches four times every week and sometimes oftener. He speaks a little broken English and is very pleasant and genial.

A Pressing Need.

Our greatest need in Japan is a Bible-school or Bible college, in which young men may be trained for evangelistic work. The missionaries have waited long and patiently for such a school. Americans can never bring Japan to Christ. The Japanese must do this. There is a greater need just now for well equipped young Japanese evangelists than for missionaries from America. One missionary expressed the opinion that such a school would accomplish as much as ten new missionaries. A number of bright, consecrated young men are ready to enter the Bible-school. Some who are now preaching could be greatly helped by spending some time in the school. There are now little bands of our believers in different parts of the empire that need teaching but there is no one to go to them. Doors are wide open to us at many points but there is no one to enter them. The missionaries and about ten native preachers are already overworked. H. H. Guy is taking some special studies in America for this work. The missionaries all agree that he is the man for this important service. He is in every way well fitted for it. Of course he will need help, but the help will come when he gets started. Some of the great mission schools of Japan began with two or three students. The chief thing now is to start and the next thing is never to let loose. The land has already been selected. There are about three acres. It will cost about $4,500. The buildings will cost $5,000 or $6,000. In a word, it will require from $10,000 to $15,000 for the school. This is a very small amount when the importance of the work is considered. Some mission schools in Japan cost far beyond $100,000 and they are being enlarged all the time. If a Bible college is important in Iowa, Illinois, Ohio or Kentucky where we have strong men and large churches, how much more important in a land where we are just starting. The supreme need in Japan just now is this Bible-school. Will

"Save the Child!"

That is the heartfelt cry of many a mother who sees her beloved child wasting and fading day by day. Sometimes it's too late for medical aid to help the child.

It is so weak, so lacking in stamina that there is no vantage ground of help.

One of the results of the use of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription preceding maternity is a strong, healthy child. Thousands of mothers testify to this. Frequently mothers write, "I was never able to raise a child before using 'Favorite Prescription,' or 'All my other children are sickly except this one, and I took your 'Favorite Prescription' this time."

All the child's strength comes from the mother. "Favorite Prescription" gives the mother strength to give her child.

There is no alcohol in "Favorite Prescription;" it contains neither opium, cocaine, nor any other narcotic. It is a purely vegetable and perfectly harmless medicine in any condition of the female system.

Accept no substitute for "Favorite Prescription." There is nothing "just as good" for woman's ills.

Sick women are invited to consult Dr. Pierce, by letter, free. Correspondence confidential. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

"I am so thankful for what Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription has done for me," writes Mrs. John T. Smith, of Slovan, British Columbia (Box 50). "It helped me through the long months of pregnancy and I have a big, strong baby girl, the most healthy of all my three, and it cured me of a disease which was taking away all my strength."

Free. Dr. Pierce's Common Sense Medical Adviser is sent free on receipt of stamps to pay expense of mailing only. Send 31 one-cent stamps for the book in cloth binding, or 21 one-cent stamps for paper covered. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

not some generous friend provide $10,000 for this special object? The buildings must be started next year.

Leaving Japan.

We have been in this land about five weeks. We have traveled from one end of it to the other. The most interesting thing to be seen is the triumph of the gospel. The progress that has been made in the last forty years is a marvel. Everywhere you are compelled to recognize the law and order of the land. The people are quiet and civil, and kind and obliging. We have not heard an unkind word or witnessed an unkind act toward us in all our travels. The people invite us to their homes and treat us like lords. When we reach a strange city, the policemen come and inquire if there is anything they can do for our comfort. Everywhere and by all grades and classes we have been treated as guests. Not so fifty years ago. Then no Christian or foreigner was permitted to enter. Then there were no modern public improvements, nor were they wanted. Now there are 4,000 miles of railroads with over 40,000 men in the railroad service. The telegraph wires are stretched all over the land; the postal system is one of the best in the world. The mail is delivered free to every man in the whole land, on the farm, in the distant mines, on the mountains, in the forests; in a word, there is free delivery everywhere. The postal system is much more prompt and efficient than in the United States. You can write a letter and mail it at eight o'clock at night in a city like Tokyo and receive an answer to it by eight o'clock the next morning. Daily papers are printed in every city of the empire of 25,000 population or more. Public schools are open to all. High schools and universities rank high. The missionary has helped to bring all this about. When you travel, you find good potatoes and apples and grapes and other fruits and vegetables to eat. These are also due to the missionaries who told the people of better things and helped them to introduce better growths of vegetables and fruits. The work of the missionary is seen in everything; in better laws, in better literature, in improved schools, in architecture, in clothing and in all that relates to the social, political and religious well-being of the people. A prominent Japanese told me that Christianity now has more moral influence in Japan than Buddhism or Shintoism, and he was not a Christian. The number of Protestant Christians is nearly 50,000 and no doubt 500,000 have been touched in their social and religious lives by the gospel. Our own work is prosperous. Baptisms are frequent. The churches are growing in grace and liberality.

Mr. Julius Keister, of 850 Michigan Avenue, Chicago, testifies that Dr. Miles cured him after ten able physicians had failed. Mrs. R. Trimmer, of Greenspring, Pa., was cured after many physicians had pronounced her case "hopeless."

As all afflicted readers may have $2.50 worth of treatment especially adapted to their case free, we would advise them to send for it at once. Address, DR. FRANKLIN MILES, 201 to 209 State St., Chicago. Mention this paper.

The missionaries have been especially kind to us. We have been in all their homes. We have not traveled a mile in Japan without their presence and help. They have bought every ticket, checked our baggage, paid the Kurumai, paid the hotel bills, etc. In their homes they have given us the best they could find to eat; the best bed has been ours; they have prayed for us; they have done all in their power to make us comfortable and to enable us to see and understand their work. They are diligent and faithful and doing all in their power to extend the kingdom of heaven among the heathen. They need and deserve the prayers of all the churches in the home land. They are isolated and lonely. Sometimes they do not see a fellow missionary or hear a prayer or a sermon in English in a whole year. They hunger for fellowship and sympathy. Their children grow up to speak a strange, heathen tongue. A happy American Christmas festivity or a joyous Children's Day, the children never know. My heart goes out to the children of the missionaries as never before. The women and children make even greater sacrifices than the men. They pray for each other, they pray for the churches and preachers at home. They live and walk with God. They go down into the slums of heathenism to lift up the women and children from filth and disease and vermin and wretchedness and woe. The copper-faced, stoical Japanese does not discourage them, the stench and grime does not repel them, temples and bells and gongs and great festal days do not overawe them. The love of Christ constrains them. Their lives have taught me a new lesson, their love and devotion for the outcasts of the world have given me a new vision of the Christ and his power over the hearts of men. May God bless these apostles of our churches, these heralds of the cross, these prophets of a new day in the sunrise kingdom.

The Magic City.

Thinking you might be interested in hearing of this twentieth century wonder, the city of Lawton, away out in Comanche county, western Oklahoma, in the shadow of the Wichita Mountains, I write you this Halloween—and I can assure you the witches are all out and at work even in this far western city.

If I could draw a true pen picture of this wonderful place, you would not believe it, for it would read like a fairy tale. We Americans do things in a hurry, but this seems like magic. Where less than three months ago was a bare prairie with the picturesque Comanche and his pony and the coyote, now stands a beautifully laid out little city of six or eight thousand inhabitants, with a railroad and every branch of business represented, and hundreds of business and dwelling houses. It is as if a fairy had touched the prairie with a magic wand and a fair city had sprung up at the touch. While many are in tents, yet the sound of the hammer is heard on every hand and good business houses and nice cottages and residences are springing up. Whole streets are almost solidly built up. The many beautiful claims are rapidly being settled and homes established.

Our church services have been held in a large tent, but plans are about perfected for a good church home. The foundation is about completed. The great difficulty in building in these new countries lies in this, nearly every one invests his little in a business and small home, and that doesn't leave much for the church, so we must needs ask our friends to help us. We have a membership of about 200 and a fine class of people. We have a good Sunday-school, Endeavor society and a splendid aid society. Our church services are well attended—we have been told better than any others in town—and we have a very interesting, well attended prayer-meeting. Bro. Millard, our sweet singer, has a claim in this district, and has his membership with us and delighted us all with his singing at several services while here. The rock for foundation was kindly given us by the United States government from their quarry at Ft. Sill, and we are very anxious to see a commodious building erected before cold weather. It would never do for us to put up a "shack" in a town of so much promise. And a debt cannot be thought of with no crops in the next year. If our friends who are well housed would give us a little lift, we could build a house that would be a credit to this city of promise and to our brotherhood. Will you do it?

Since writing the above, before mailing this, we had a terrible wind storm, which blew down many tents and a few buildings among which were the tabernacle and our living tents, the tabernacle was badly damaged. You see the great need of getting housed before the season of northerners advances much farther. MRS. A. B. CARPENTER.

Coffee Complexion.

Many Ladies Have Poor Complexions From Coffee.

"Coffee caused dark colored blotches on my face and body. I had been drinking it for a long while and these blotches gradually appeared, until finally they became permanent and were about as dark as coffee itself.

I formerly had as fine a complexion as one could ask for.

When I became convinced that coffee was the cause of my trouble, I changed and took to using Postum Cereal Food Coffee, and as I made it well, according to directions, I liked it very much, and have since that time used it entirely in place of coffee.

I am thankful to say I am not nervous any more, as I was when I was drinking coffee, and my complexion is now as fair and good as it was years ago. It is very plain that the coffee caused the trouble. Please omit my name from public print." Mrs. —, 2081 Ogden Ave., Chicago, Ill. The name of this lady can be given by the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

Most bad complexions are caused by some disturbance of the stomach and coffee is the greatest disturber of digestion known. Almost any woman can have a fair complexion if she will leave off coffee and use Postum Food Coffee and nutritious, healthy food in proper quantity. The food coffee furnishes certain parts of the natural grains from the field that nature uses to rebuild the nervous system and when that is in good condition, one can depend upon a good complexion as well as a general healthy condition of the body.

Kansas Notes.

In a Kansas town that was "open" in defiance of the state law, the citizens succeeded in getting the attorney-general to take action ordering the county attorney to close the joints. A few nights later, while the Methodist preacher, who had been active in the law enforcement effort, was away from home a mob of joint sympathizers went to his place and decorated the house with beer kegs, indulging in threats and vile language, to the terror of the preacher's wife and daughter, who were then alone. The mob was driven away but soon returned and egged the house. It is probable that the local authorities would have done nothing, but the attorney-general seems to have taken the matter up vigorously. In a letter to the county attorney, after having pointed out the law covering the case and spoken of the members of the mob as anarchists, he says: "It is bad enough when mobs take the law into their own hands to enforce it, but it is many times worse when a citizen and his family are subject to insult and abuse because he has been active in securing the law's enforcement." All good people wish that every member of the mob might be apprehended and punished. The liquor business in Kansas, as everywhere else, obeys no law except as forced to do so and has no regard for decency or the rights of others.

Bro. Matchett's meeting at Harmony moves on with good interest and some conversions.

The fifth district board met on Nov. 14 and commenced making arrangements for their convention next spring. They are planning to do some active mission work in the near future.

Bro. W. H. Scrivner, of Girard, is in a meeting just begun with the church at Belleville, C. Henderson, pastor.

The church at Howard recently had a short meeting with sixteen additions, nine baptisms. Seven of them were from the Junior C. E., which the writer organized during his stay in Howard. Bro. Williams, of Fredonia, did the preaching.

H. A. Lemon is in a very successful meeting at Morrowville. Thirty-two added at last report.

News has just reached me of the death of our beloved brother, M. Ingels, of Leanna. He was a hero of the cross, a friend to every preacher in the state and one of the most useful men we had. In losing him our cause loses a valiant soldier and our young men lose a safe and trusted counsellor. Sister Ingels has the sympathy of the entire brotherhood of Kansas.

Ohio Letter.

Ohio has "gone" Republican. Geo. K. Nash was re-elected governor by about 70,000 plurality. The legislature will be about 35 of a Republican majority. What of the temperance outlook, did you ask? Very fine. The Anti-saloon League was defeated in only two counties in the state—Franklin and Mahoning. Thos. H. Clark, the father of the famous Clark local option bill, was defeated by about 350 votes. This cost the brewers $20,000. But they put all their eggs in one basket. They defeated Clark, but enough others were elected in other parts of the state to assure the passage of a local option law. The daily press says that Gov. Nash will not reappoint his brewer colonel on his staff. A wise man will not make the same mistake twice.

"More than our apportionment" is becoming familiar to Secretary Bartlett these days. The first week of returns from the Ohio offering was very encouraging indeed. Many churches went beyond their apportionment. Many others reached it. There never was so keen a conscience on Ohio missions as there is in this present year of grace. Many churches will take the offering later in the month. C. A. Kleeberger is already out in the field, personally looking after the churches that did not show any inclination to respond. That is right. Send for it, but if you can't get it, go for it. The results of Bro. Kleeberger's work thus far show the wisdom of this course. Help save Ohio! There is yet time to take the offering.

Will E. Adams is in a meeting at West Mansfield with home forces, that seems at the outset to promise well.

Wm. Harris is with the church at East Liberty in a meeting. He was pastor there for two years, and is drawing a good hearing in the meeting.

The Central church in Toledo began a meeting last Sunday, with C. A. Freer, of Columbus, as preacher. C. W. Huffer feels that the outlook for a successful meeting was never better in the history of the church.

I. J. Cahill, of Dayton, has been preaching for the church at Mt. Healthy for 10 days. Bro. Cahill is a good preacher and Mt. Healthy has a most excellent church, so the co-operation ought to be congenial and fruitful.

P. H. Welsheimer, of Millersburg, has held a very successful meeting at Killbuck. At last account there had been over 20 additions.

The above items indicate that Ohio churches are making an effort to save the world. Every church ought to plan for a good meeting at least once a year. A meeting of days is not only good for the people who may be won for Christ, but it is good as a revival. The average Christian is something like a storage battery—he needs recharging now and then. A meeting serves this purpose better than anything else. Then it does a preacher good. It increases his zeal for souls. He prays more. He studies the needs of men more. He studies his Bible more. Let every preacher hold at least one meeting a year. Preach the word. Knowing the fear of the Lord, persuade men. The kingdom of heaven is at hand. Repent or perish.

W. T. Groom was called from his meeting at Bellefontaine, to the funeral of his brother at Covington, Ky. The work at Bellefontaine is very prosperous under his ministry.

How a Woman Paid Her Debts.

I am out of debt, thanks to the Dish-washer business. In the past three months I have made $600.00 selling Dish-washers. I never saw anything sell so easily. Every family needs a Dish-washer, and will buy one when shown how beautifully it will wash and dry the family dishes in two minutes. I sell from my own house. Each Dish-washer sold brings me many orders. The dishes are washed without wetting the hands. That is why ladies want the Dish-washer. I give my experience for the benefit of any one who may wish to make money easy. I buy my Dish-washers from the Mound City Dish-Washer Co., St. Louis, Mo. Write them for particulars. They will start you in business in your own home.

as to the merits of

The Praise Hymnal

"DEAR BROTHER FILLMORE:—I am greatly pleased with THE PRAISE HYMNAL, which marks a decided advance in hymnology among the Disciples of Christ. The book has many features that place it on a level with the very best hymn collections of the time. There has been displayed a careful regard for the familiar hymns of the church, and indeed I am glad to note the fact that some splendid hymns which have received the approval of widespread portions of the Church of Christ, but have never hitherto found admission to our own hymnals, are included in this collection. There is a large responsibility resting upon the shoulders of men who prepare the collections of music for a great brotherhood like our own. It is easy to mark the advance that has been made since our earliest attempts at hymn-book making. The standard of music has been rising, though not as rapidly, perhaps, as might have been desired. The musician who is conscientious and sincerely desirous of lifting the taste of those who depend upon him must be prepared to encounter opposition in his efforts. There is always a large demand for the so-called "popular music," which has certain helpful and "catchy" features, but which is only the music of a day. This, it seems to me, has occupied too large a place in our collections of church music hitherto, and even the amount of space you have given it in the present collection stretches somewhat the bounds of a just proportion. But there is adequate compensation here, as there has never been before in our church music, by the presentation of a large amount of thoroughly strong and enduring themes, for which I think you are to be emphatically commended. I am pleased also to see that you have incorporated the "Scripture Readings," which are grouped under appropriate heads, both topically and by sections. I am hoping that THE PRAISE HYMNAL will soon find itself employed in many of our churches, and that once employed, the best and most impressive themes in it may receive early recognition.

Los Angeles Letter.

The first of October the First church began a three months' campaign of enlistment, which is an effort on the part of every department of our church to increase its numbers and workers. The success attending our efforts has been gratifying. All lines of our church work are growing. It is believed that it will increase our workers in different lines almost 25 per cent. Last Lord's day 13 were received into our fellowship and another was baptized.

Los Angeles is experiencing a phenomenal growth. Within the past decade it more than doubled its population, thus showing the largest percentage of growth of any city in the United States of over 50,000 inhabitants. But it is growing now to beat all past records. Every incoming train is loaded with tourists and homeseekers from the east. The hotels are already filled. It is almost impossible to find a house to rent. The delightful and attractive features of the coast are becoming known in the east as never before and the people of the "effete" east are thronging hither. We give them a cordial welcome.

Our churches in all this section are experiencing encouraging growth. Many of these incoming disciples from the east soon forget their former religious affiliations and obligations and are lost to the churches. Others of them soon find their place in our churches and become our most successful and faithful helpers. Transportation is not always a means of grace. Especially is this true if the Rocky Mountains are to be crossed.

Ventura has recently dedicated a new church house, free of debt. F. M. Dowling, of Pasadena, was director-general on that occasion. They follow their dedication with a revival meeting, with H. E. Wilhite as evangelist. Redlands will soon dedicate a new house of worship and also install a new pastor in the person of W. G. Conley, of Lexington, Ky. George Ringo, recently of Falmouth, Ky., has located with the church at Riverside. The Baptists and Disciples at Oxnord have coalesced and formed a union church of Christ. They will call one of our brethren as pastor soon and will be in harmony with the Disciples of Christ. Knox P. Taylor, of Illinois, has been called by our missionary board to spend four months among our Sunday-schools, beginning about January, 1902. He will hold a week's institute with each school. Loren Howe, after a few months in Iowa, has returned to his pastorate with the Ontario church. L. O. Ferguson has recently held a meeting for the Eighth street church of this city. Thirteen were added during the meeting. H. E. Ward will assist him in a meeting at Modesta, beginning next Monday. Thus the campaign of enlistment goes on in every section of our southern California.

Convention in China.

Our annual convention has just closed. Bro. Rains was with us and did us great good. He has just left us and we feel somewhat lonely without him. He was full of life and encouraged us by his hopeful words and manner. It is a good stroke of business policy on the part of the Foreign Society to send a business man like Bro. Rains out to see the field and the workers. It does not require miles of argument to make him see the needs of the mission. He takes the situation in at a glance. I am writing to you at this time to tell you some of our hopes and prospects. It has been decided, Bro. Rains acquiescing, to enlarge our school work in China. It is quite plain to the mind, even to a casual observer, that we must do this if we are to have any hope of keeping pace with the rapid strides that this old empire is sure of make from this time on. There is not a shadow of doubt that the most potent factor in this renovation will be schools. The missionaries now have their hands on this work, and it remains to be seen whether they will be able to hold their advantage or not. There seems to be no reason why they should not, other than the lack of the proper encouragement from the churches.

So far as our mission is concerned, we have only been limping along in this great branch of the evangelizing work in China. The time has now come when we must enlarge or be content to fall far behind. We must do something worthy of the great plea for which we stand, or yield the field to others. I believe we shall not prove recreant to our trust. The work we have already done has by no means been in vain. We have already turned out some men who are now, and will, I think, continue to be an honor to the cause. But we must not be satisfied with these small things, seeing that we are able to do more and shall be held responsible for larger results. So, as I have said, trusting in God and relying upon the brethren, who have never forsaken, we have decided to launch out into the deep for a larger draught. This is something of our plan: We already have a preparatory school. This must be fully equipped for thorough work. Our apparatus in every department is all too limited. We cannot do good work without tools with which to work. We do not desire to grow beyond our ability to do good and thorough work. We now have capacity for 50 students only. There would be no trouble to double this number in a month if we had the room and the tools with which to work. These would pay their own way. But it is not our desire to so rapidly build up in numbers. We shall be satisfied to allow the growth to be gradual and only increase our buildings as we grow in efficiency and there is consequently increased demand for the work we shall be able to do. Our plan and our hope contemplate in addition to what we have already, an academic department, a Bible-school, a college of liberal arts and an industrial school. This, we are sure, is not too much to hope for in view of the great need and the liberality of the brotherhood. We shall proceed somewhat on this wise in the accomplishment of our designs: The land for a larger campus should be purchased at once. Nankin is now an open port and prices of land are advancing rapidly so that it will not be long until a very much larger sum will be required than now to buy land for our campus; $1,000 now will buy all the land we shall ever need for this purpose, but not so in a year from now. Then we shall need a science hall as soon as we can get it. It is of course useless to try to do work in these modern times without apparatus. The science hall will be made large enough at once to answer for all time to come in our work.

It is surprising too, what can be done with a little money in erecting buildings in China. Fifteen hundred dollars would put up as large a building as we need. This building would be as large as one which would cost nearly twice as much at home. Does it not seem that some of our philanthropic brethren ought to have buildings here when they can be had for so little? If we could succeed in getting some of our men of means out here to see for themselves there is no doubt that we should have some monuments in the way of buildings. Surely no better use could be made of a little money than in putting on its feet an institution of learning thoroughly Christian in this wonderful empire now struggling for the true light. We are all praying that God will put it into the hearts of some of the brethren to take up this enterprise. We don't ask for much: $5,000 this year and a little each year for a few years, and the foreign society will do the rest until the institution becomes self supporting, which time will not be far in the future. I shall be glad to correspond with any brother or sister who may think favorably of our enterprise, and give any details that may be desired. May the Lord put it into the hearts of the church to take an interest in this work is the prayer of your mission in China. F. E. MEIGS.

Missouri Mission Notes.

The Central Christian Register of Nov. 14, calls attention to a very serious condition of things in south central Missouri. First, however, the writer says that, "sixty per cent. of the churches of Christ are giving to missions, but in Missouri the per cent. is only forty-eight." We have very serious doubts as to the truth of this; the fact is there is hardly a church in north Missouri that does not give either to county, district, state, state Bible-school, home or foreign missions. Few of them give to all, nearly all give to some. But aside from those giving to state Bible-school, state, home and foreign missions we have no record of their giving. But here are some. Every church in Lincoln county gave to county missions, while only eight gave to state missions. Every church in Laclede county gave to county missions, while only two gave to state missions. Nearly every church in the Nodaway valley district gives for district missions, but many of them give for nothing else. So you can go over the state and find these conditions. We have the numbers who give to state Bible-school, state, home and foreign missions, but no man knows how many of the churches give to these other interests which are as truly mission interests as any other. The condition is bad enough at best, let us not make it any worse than it is.

Then the peculiar condition in Franklin, Gasconade, Osage, Maucor and Cole counties is presented, and the implication is that it is far worse than it was years ago. For the last several years the state Bible-school board has had John Giddens and R. B. Havener working in that territory a good portion of their time. They are good men, they are strong men and they do good work. Up to Oct. 1, the state board had J. J. Limerick in Osage county for all of his time and we are sure he did as fine work as any man could do, as his report shows. One would think, reading the article, that this territory was being wholly neglected but these facts show that this is a mistake, we have done for it all we possibly could. With greater resources we could and would do greater work. We may not deserve much credit, but give us a little.

Is the condition of things in south Missouri worse than it was five years ago? Is there any justification for any one feeling like "surrendering the field and let others occupy"? We don't believe one word of it. The missionary giving of a church is a good index of its condition and we have three times more contributing churches in south Missouri for state missions in 1901 than we had in 1896. The cause has improved an hundred per cent. in the southwest district. Why? Because we have been able to keep one man all the time and two men part of the time. The same policy

RESTORES EYESIGHT

"Actina," a Wonderful Discovery Which Cures Diseased Eyes, No Matter Whether Chronic or Acute, Without Cutting or Drugging.

There is no need for cutting, drugging or probing the eye for any form of disease, for a new system of treating afflictions of the eye has been discovered whereby all torturous and barbarous methods are eliminated. This wonderful treatment takes the form of a Pocket Battery and is known as "Actina." It is purely a home treatment and self-administered by the patient. There is no risk of experimenting, as thousands of people have been cured of blindness, failing eyesight, cataracts, granulated lids and other afflictions of the eye through this grand discovery, when eminent oculists termed the cases incurable. This wonderful remedy also makes the use of spectacles unnecessary, as it not only removes the weakened and unnatural conditions of the eye, but gives it a clear vision. J. N. Horne, Waycross, Ga., writes: "My eyes have been wonderfully benefited by Actina." W. R. Owens, Adrian, Mo., writes: "Actina saved me from going blind." R. J. Reid, St. Augustine, Fla., writes: "Actina removed a cataract from my son's eye." Robert Baker, 80 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill., writes: "I should have been blind had I not used Actina." A party of prominent citizens have organized in a company known as the New York & London Electric Association, and they have given this method so thorough a test on hundreds of cases pronounced incurable and hopeless that they now positively assure a cure. They have bought all American and European rights for this wonderful invention. Actina is sent on trial postpaid. If you will send your name and address to the New York & London Electric Association, Dept. 203, 929 Walnut street, Kansas City, Mo., you will receive absolutely free a valuable book, Prof. Wilson's Treatise on the Eye and its Disease in General, and you can rest assured that your eyesight and hearing will be restored, no matter how many doctors have failed.

will save the south central and the south-east.

What then? The great remedy for it all lies in larger contributions to our state mission work. Give us the means and we can do the work. It is impossible to do the work without the means to sustain it. The editor's first remedy, which turns out also to be his last, is, "Send an evangelist among them." We are ready, we are willing, we can find the man for south central Missouri. Put the money in our treasury and the work shall be done at once. Missouri atmosphere is fine, but we have not yet found the man who can live on that alone.

Brethren, we appeal to you that you make this cause prominent as never before. Let us put an end to all talk of "surrender" once and for all. State mission day is close upon us, only a little over a month away. Your board is awaiting with great anxiety the outcome of that day. We have great enterprises in mind, we want to do great things for Missouri and you can make them possible. We crave your co-operation.

SORE NECK

Take Scott's Emulsion for scrofula. Children often have sores on the neck that won't heal up. The sores may come and go. Parents may not know what's the matter nor what to do. Scrofula is the trouble and Scott's Emulsion is the medicine.

Scott's Emulsion heals the sores. But that is not all. Scrofula leads to consumption. This is the real danger.

Scott's Emulsion is the "ounce of prevention" that keeps off consumption.

Thanksgiving.

By W. S. Whitacre.

Our Father, we thank thee for blessings unnumbered,

For manifold mercies, unstinted, untold;
For riches transcending the value of rubies,
More precious by far than silver and gold.

We thank thee, our Father, for food and for raiment,

Without which our bodies would perish indeed;

But far above all of thy temporal blessings,
We thank thee for those that supply the soul's need.

For love of thy children unmeasured and mighty,

We thank thee, our Father, from day unto day.

A storehouse of riches as boundless as heaven

Is open to all who will walk in thy way.

We thank thee, dear Father, for Jesus our Savior,

Our hope of salvation when time is no more,
Our Captain and Guide o'er life's stormy ocean,

Our anchor, through faith, to the heavenly shore.

The Christian Manliness of Roosevelt.

By Jacob A. Riis.

Author of "The Making of an American," etc.

The Sunday-School Times prints the following copyrighted incidents of Theodore Roosevelt, by Jacob A. Riis.

In the newspapers that told of the President's death, I caught among the messages of faith and confidence in the new executive, once or twice, a note of timid inquiry, an echo, as it seemed, of the old days in Mulberry street: "Yes, we know he is courageous and strong; we know his high ideals, his fearless purpose, his spotless honor,—we own it all, and we are proud of it; but is he—quite—safe?" The answer was there, in the new President's public declaration that he would make no change, that things should remain as if the old chief had not died. There was no occasion for the inquiry. In fact, there never had been. The bitterest critics of his administration of the police in New York know now, if they were capable of learning, that his practical wisdom in dealing with that task was as great as his unhesitating courage. That task was to rescue the police from its partnership with corruption, and with unerring instinct he struck at the slough in which the corruption grew—the saloon. In no man's hands that lives and owns American citizenship to-day are the country's honor and welfare safer than in Theodore Roosevelt's. And the country knows it well.

Men who called him hasty in the old days have lived to heartily wish that they had spent their energies pushing on the load he dragged almost alone, instead of trying to persuade him from doing his duty in the interest of expediency, or denouncing him for not heeding them. Not that the one thing or the other made any difference to him. That the load was there to be dragged up the hill was enough for him. He stopped neither to consider the size of it, nor how steep was the hill. Above all, he did nothing hastily, but of deliberate purpose, most carefully weighed and thought out. In those days I was with him every day, almost every hour, and I knew not only what he did, but how he did it. One difference between him and his critics was that he had given his life to the patient study of the problems upon which they jumped with such headlong haste, anxious only to prevent "trouble," and hence that he was able to see clearly where their fears made them blind; another was that, foreseeing clearly, among other things, the consequences to himself, he was not afraid, for beyond and behind them he saw ever the duty he had sworn to do faithfully.

So it came about that during those turbulent times Mr. Roosevelt's appeal was ever to the moral forces of the community, to the forces making for decency and order, and it was their support that was his backing. The direct way to a thing was always his. When there was trouble with labor he sent for its leaders, and put the question straight—what they wanted; and when, not knowing the manner of man they had to do with, they tried blustering, he put them right in ten words, showing them clearly that they were their own worst enemies in fomenting trouble, and that, meeting him on that ground, they would lose the fight,—then turned back to the subject under advisement as if nothing had happened. And they applauded the man, and showed that they themselves were men in doing it. When he was governor, and wanted to see how the laws regarding sweating were carried out, he sent first for the labor men, told them what he wanted, and asked them to help him. Afterward he went himself, and saw what was done and what was not done. It was so always. It was thus that he, as a very young man serving in the Legislature, went to the bottom of the tenement-house cigar-makers' grievous troubles, and, having made out their side very clearly, took it without hesitation, to the amazement of the cynics, who, speechless, beheld a "silk stocking" take up the cause of the poor because it was the cause of right. And it was so that as police commissioner and governor, he gave his nights, as his days, to personal inspection of the wrongs he was asked to right. Having ascertained the facts, he went to the men who ought to help, and told them so. During the deadlock in the police board his appeal was constantly to the churches and the clergy, that of his opponents as constantly to politics and the politicians. The result we see in New York to-day: the police force, since his grip upon it was loosened, is deeper in the rut of politics and corruption than ever, but in the battle against the conspiracy, which is bound to win, the clergy and the churches lead. They are fighting Roosevelt's fight to-day, with the Bishop of New York at the forefront of battle.

That is the alliance which he brings with him to the White House. If there be any yet who believe him "hasty," they will find themselves disappointed in that, as always before. Roosevelt has persistently disappointed his enemies from the very beginning. Seeing his rapid rise, they compared him to a rocket, and said that he would come down a stick presently. And so he would have done had he been, as they thought, a politician. But he was a statesman—a man of destiny because a man of duty.

That is the keynote of his life. It was his father's, one of the most useful and public spirited men who ever lived in New York, a man whose life was, and is, a lesson to us all, and whose death moved the metropolis to such sorrow as it has seldom felt for any citizen. His high ideals of citizenship he got from him; his sanity, too, I fancy, for it was a distinguishing mark of one, and is of the other. So was his fairness, his sober sense of justice, for which the policemen in Mulberry street love him yet in secret. They dare not mention his name openly in these days of Tammany rule. For once, and once only, the honest policeman who did his duty, but had no pull, had an equal chance with the schemer. Neither kind will soon forget the two years of Roosevelt. I well remember the time I clashed with all three of the qualities in him which I have mentioned. It was when a woman was condemned to death for the foul and wicked murder of her step-daughter, and he, as governor, was beset by an endless array of more or less maudlin petitions praying for pardon. I too, labored with him. I did not like the execution, but more—I never owned it before, he would have been the last man to bring that argument to—I feared the effect of it on his career. I was weak and foolish, I know it now. I went to Albany, and all that evening and night, till the 1 a. m. train went back to the city, I argued it with him in his study. I pleaded on every ground I knew how, and I saw in his face the yearning to see it as his friend did. But he could not. He had pardoned others before, and I knew it was his dear delight to temper justice with mercy where it could rightly be done. Roosevelt is farthest from being a hard man; his heart is as tender as a woman's where it may be, as hard as steel where it must be. In this case he was absolutely right. Every consideration of fairness and justice demanded that the law take its course if the prisoner was responsible. That fact he ascertained by the strictest scrutiny, and then stood aside, heedless of the clamor. It was with something almost like awe that I saw him do it, for I knew what it cost him.

Theodore Roosevelt loves children as William McKinley did. When he was a police commissioner, we would sometimes go together to the Italian school of the Children's Aid Society, or some kindred place, and I loved of all things to hear him talk to the little ones. They did, too. I fancy he left behind him on every one of these trips a streak of little patriots to whom, as they grow up, the memory of their hour with "Teddy" will be a whole manual of good citizenship. I know one little girl out on Long Island who is to-day hugging the thought of the handshake he gave her as the most precious of her memories. And so do I, for I saw him spy her—poor, pale little thing, in her threadbare jacket—way back in the crowd of school-children that swarmed about his train, and I saw him dash into the surging tide like a strong swimmer striking from the shore, make a way through the shouting mob of youngsters clear to where she was on the outskirts looking on hopelessly, catch and shake her hand as if his very heart were in his, and then catch the moving train on the run, while she looked after it, her face one big happy smile. That was Roosevelt, every inch of him.

Realization.

There was a man who worked all day
And sat up late at night
And toiled and planned and schemed away
To gain the dizzy height;
He longed to have the right to stand
High o'er the crowd and hear men say,
As, looking up, they saw him there:
"How great he is, how grand!"
At last, when he was bent, when care
And toil had marred his visage, when
The mold of time was on his hair,
He stood high up o'er other men
And, listening, heard the passers-by Say lightly: "What a queer old guy!"

History of Thanksgiving Day.

The earliest record which we have of an American Thanksgiving Day is found in the New England annals of 1621. In the autumn of that year Governor Bradford, so saith the chronicler, sent out men to procure some game, in order that the New England colonists might properly enjoy a day of thanksgiving in remembrance of the fruits of their labors during the year that had passed. Another day of rejoicing was set apart and "solemnized" as "a day of thanksgiving unto the Lord," after an abundant harvest in 1622. It is stated that, on this occasion, Massasoit and his council of braves were invited to participate in the festivities, and that they did so, spending three days in feasting. Evidently the Indian friends of the colonists found Thanksgiving Day a day to be made the most of.

These thanksgiving days were not, however, of official character. The first official public Thanksgiving Day was not until the year 1631; and even this day was not at first intended to be a day of rejoicing and thanksgiving. It had been set apart as a day of fasting and prayer for relief. The colonists were in great distress; famine was imminent; a vessel laden with provisions, and long at sea, had not arrived. But just before the day of fasting came, the ship made port; and the day was then officially changed by the authorities from a day of sorrow to a day of thanksgiving.

THE YOUTH'S COMPANION, BOSTON, MASS.

This was the first real Thanksgiving Day of the American people. Thanksgiving days were occasionally observed also in New Netherland after this date; but it was not until February, 1644, that another official Thanksgiving Day was proclaimed. That year Governor Kieft proclaimed "a day of general thanksgiving," the occasion being a victory of the colonists over the Indians. At the conclusion of peace, in 1645, another Thanksgiving Day was proclaimed. We are not told that the Indians were invited to this ceremony.

Occasional days of fasting, prayer and thanksgiving were kept by the various colonists, at different times; but no general Thanksgiving Day was set apart until 1775, when the Continental Congress adopted the practice of designating such days. The first was Thursday, July 20, 1775. The following Thanksgiving days were also suggested by the Continental Congress: Friday, May 17, 1776; Dec. 11, 1776; Wednesday, April 22, 1778; Thursday, May 6, 1779; Wednesday, April 4, 1780; Thursday, May 2, 1781; Thursday, April 25, 1782. These days were suggested in the form of recommendations to the states, whose governors were asked to issue proclamations to their peoples for days in thanksgiving. Business with one exception was suspended on these occasions. Washington also issued a proclamation to the colonial army for a general Thanksgiving Day on Thursday, Dec. 18, 1777; and again on May 7, 1778.

The first national Thanksgiving Day was, by proclamation of President Washington, set for Thursday, Nov. 26, 1789. The second was set for Thursday, Feb. 19, 1795. The honor of the first suggestion seems to belong to Representative Elias Boudinot, who moved, in the house, that the president be requested to recommend "a day of thanksgiving and prayer, to be observed by the people of the United States." There was some opposition to the motion, the objections advanced being that such a thing might tend to imitation of the frivolities and pomps of kingdoms and other harmful doings; but the motion prevailed, and Thursday, Nov. 26, 1789, became the first national Thanksgiving Day of the American people.—Harper's Weekly

"No, I'm not very well impressed with the house," said the prospective tenant. "The yard is frightfully small; there's hardly room for a single flower-bed." "Think so?" replied the agent; "but—er—mightn't you use folding flower-beds?"

[The following poem was sent to us by C. A. Freer, of Columbus, O., who says he ran across a pen copy of it some time ago in an artistically wrought handwriting and signed Eliza Poitevent Nicholson. He does not know whether this is the name of the copyist or of the author. Whoever wrote it, it is a classic. Can any one tell us about its authorship?—EDITOR.]

Nay do not speak, my lord, there is no need,
I know too well what thou hast come to say;
My sister, whom thou lovest has been here,
And she has told me all—My father gives
Rachel to thee also, to be thy wife,
And thou wilt take her unto thee this night.
She told it to me, laughing, with no thought
Of how each word fell like a stinging lash
Upon the sorest and tenderest
Of sore and quivering things—a woman's heart,

Sore with the soreness of unserved for love.
And she did show me then the little box
Of precious ointment and the fragrant rolls
Of cassia, cinnamon and calamus
From far Ceylon, that thou didst give to her.
And from her neck she took a string of beads
And laid it in my hand, that I might count
Ten beads for every year that thou didst serve
So gladly and so patiently for her,
That all the years seemed but one day to thee,
As all the beads were strung on one short string.

In all those seven years there was no flock
That thou didst watch with shepherd's patient care

For love of Rachel, morning, noon and night,
That I would not have watched for love of thee;

And yet, my lord, thou gav'st no gift to me.
And when thou camest late unto thy tent,
From seeking some stray lamb on Aram's hills,

They were not Rachel's eyes that watched for thee,

But Leah's. When the hot Assyrian sun
Didst smite thy brow with fever on the plains,
They were not Rachel's eyes that wept for thee,
But Leah's.

Ah, my lord! when thou dost look Upon my sore infirmity, and say—

"Leah, the tender-eyed," say thou as well,
Leah, the tender-hearted, and the true.
And I have thought, if thou couldst only know

How heavy was the burden of my love,
That thou wouldst reach out kindly hands to me

And help me bear it. But I had no way
To tell thee or to make thee understand;
Thy love for Rachel made thee deaf and blind
To any word or sign by which I tried
To tell thee how I suffered. Ah, my lord,
There is no weed that grows in all the earth,
That would not be a flower if it could;
And sometimes I have almost hated God
Because he did not make my face so fair
As Rachel's. I have stood and looked Into her sparkling eyes and felt that I Could tear them out in quick and jealous rage!
But my true love for thee was tenderer
Than jealousy was fierce, remembering
How thou didst love her, I would turn away
With swift remorse, and love her well again,
Because she was so near and dear to thee,
And thou, my lord, so near and dear to me.
'Tis always so with perfect love like mine;
It is not love that hurts the thing it loves,
But selfishness.

And as the years wore on,
My love did grow so vital and so strong,
It seemed a separate and conscious thing
Apart from mine own self, and I have tried
To make its softness hard and cold with pride,
And failing, in hot anger I have laid Rough hands upon the faithful thing and sought

To murder it. But always did it prove
Even its weakness stronger than my strength;
And when my rage was spent, then I did look Upon its drooping head and pale, wan face,

And pity it because it was divine.
And could not die.

Ah! 'tis a fatal gift

To love like this, my lord, even the gods
Can feel no keener pangs of agony
Than women feel to whom they sometimes give

Such power to love. In all the seven years
That thou didst serve for Rachel did this love
Eat like a hidden cancer in my breast,
Blighting my youth and poisoning my blood
With passion and with burning jealousy.
My lord, I would have cut the very core
From out my heart, and laid it at thy feet,
For one sweet word or look of love from thee!
But when my father led me to thy tent
With stern command to enter, I did shrink
And tremble like the shy mimosa plant That shuts its frightened leaves at every touch.

My lord, forgive me that I did obey!
It was no thought, nor was it wish of mine
To thrust myself in Rachel's place—and yet—and yet—

'Tis hard, my lord, to find the words
That would be soft and delicate enough
To paint the timid, little, wav'ring hope That didst persuade me that if thou couldst know

How much I loved thee, then my love might win

One faint but answering sigh of love from thee,

As distant echo faintly answering sound.
But when the morning light showed thee my face,

And thou didst scorn me and humiliate
My holy love into the very dust,
As if I were the sandals on thy feet,
Then I did hate thee with a sudden hate!
Nay, do not frown; 'tis gone; that hate, that sore

Heart-breaking hate that is the twin of love.
I have no life apart from thee;

As sometimes from the sky the thirsty sun Stoops down and drinks the water from the sea,

So didst thou drink me up with one sweet kiss,

Thinking my lips were Rachel's.

Zilpah! Come!

My lord has gone, come thou and take
This wedding girdle from about my waist,
The wedding feast was not prepared for me.
The oleander and the myrtle green,
The figs and citrons and white mulberries,
The wine, the big pomegranates and the grapes
Were all for Rachel. There was not one bud—
One little faded bud in all the flowers—
And there was not one taste of all the fruit,
Or one small sip of all the wine for me.

'Twas all for Rachel! Zilpah, dost thou hear?
'Twas all for Rachel! all! ah! there was not Even one morsel of the wheaten bread,

Or one drop of honey or of oil for me.
And soon, within the space of one short hour,
My sister will be here to take my place

Within this tent—my lord did tell me so
And I must go, and thou must go with me.

And we must dwell together in the tent
He has prepared for me beyond the brook.

Come, Zilpah, thou must lead me to the door,
For I am blind from weeping all the day,

And still my weeping eyes are overcast
And heavy with a cloud of unshed tears.

Here, take my hands and hold them close and warm.

See how they tremble, feel how cold they are—

Wait, Zilpah, kneel with me before we go,
Knee lower, Zilpah, so! now help me pray

That God will give me children ere I die,
To nestle in my bosom and to ease

My heart of this mad love I bear my lord.
If God should hearken to thy prayer and mine,

And give me children, it might happen then

That in some hidden and mysterious way
A wave, or little ripple from the flood

Of tender love my lord would feel for them,
Might flow from them to me. Zilpah, I faint!

I Will Cure You of Rheumatism.

No pay until you know it.

After 2,000 experiments, I have learned how to cure Rheumatism. Not to turn bony joints into flesh again; that is impossible. But I can cure the disease always, at any stage, and forever.

I ask for no money. Simply write me a postal and I will send you an order on your nearest druggist for six bottles of Dr. Shoop's Rheumatic Cure, for every druggist keeps it. Use it for a month, and if it does what I claim pay your druggist $5.50 for it. If it doesn't I will pay him myself.

I have no samples. Any medicine that can affect Rheumatism with but a few doses must be drugged to the verge of danger. I use no such drugs. It is folly to take them. You must get the disease out of the blood.

My remedy does that, even in the most difficult, obstinate cases. No matter how impossible this seems to you, I know it and I take the risk. I have cured tens of thousands of cases in this way, and my records show that 39 out of 40 who get those six bottles pay, and pay gladly. I have learned that people in general are honest with a physician who cures them. That is all I ask. If I fail I don't expect a penny from you.

Simply write me a postal card or letter. Let me send you an order for the medicine. Take it for a month, for it won't harm you anyway. If it cures, pay $5.50. I leave that entirely to you. I will mail you a book that tells how I do it. Address Dr. Shoop, Box 582, Racine, Wis.

Helpful in Case of Accidents.

By S. H.

There is nothing sadder than to see a family wholly without the power or knowledge to help in cases of accidental poisoning, to see a loved member of the family on the verge of dying—yet no one able to give relief. Prompt action in such cases has often saved life and to have some knowledge of the best methods of treatment is a great comfort in a household. My father being a physician impressed it upon our minds to inform ourselves, and perhaps the following simple antidotes given me by him may be found useful in emergencies. The first thing to do is to produce vomiting so as to eject the poison from the stomach.

Mustard and salt and water (a cup of lukewarm water) with a little soda in it may be given, or an active emetic.

For external poisons such as poison oak, Virginia creeper poison or other plant poisons, you can bathe the affected parts in a strong solution of borax water, then apply a poultice of tansy leaves moistened with sweet cream. The borax is cooling, a sedative and kills disease germs or poison. Corrosive sublimate or poisons from alkalies, lead or mushroom, give vinegar and oil freely. Where the cause is not known give an emetic followed by sweet milk.

The Runaways.—VII.

The man turned and stared at Harry. "Why shouldn't I go in that box-car?" he demanded. "I have rented that box-car, and it holds my furniture!" He was a large man with heavy black whiskers. He had a kind voice, and his face was so pleasant you could not but feel how good it would be to have him for a friend. "My little sister is in there," said Harry, "and she is a-drying. See—them's her clothes." He pointed to the vari-colored articles that were spread upon the grass. "All of us fell in the branch, and we've had a time of it, I tell you!" And he smiled confidently at the sun-browned face with its twinkling blue eyes. Zep was now seen hurrying toward them from the woods. "He's the other," said Harry. "See, he's got on his shirt-wrong-side out!"

"You say your sister is—er—" The man paused doubtfully.

"A-drying," Harry explained. "The bank caved in and we caved in a-top of it and Emily—that's my sister—she's twelve—she like to of drown-ded. You won't mind to wait awhile, will you, sir?"

"Oh, not at all," said the man, slowly seating himself upon the end of a railroad tie where there was a scrap of shade from the box-car. "Miss Emily, take your own time," he called cheerily. Then he added, "But how did you know the box-car was unlocked? I forgot to lock it yesterday evening, and I happened to think of it a while ago, so I rode over to lock up."

"We slept in it last night," said Harry. "Oh!" said the man who did not seem to like this very well. "Where's your father?"

"We are orphans," said Harry. "We have uncles and aunts but I guess they would get out of being, if they could—all but aunt Mary; she's the best woman I ever saw; but just as poo-oo-oor! You don't know how poor aunt Mary is! Good thing we slept in your car last night, cause this morning, early, they was two tramps—" and Harry told all about frightening Jake and Gregg away. By the time he had finished Zep came up, and without knowing what Harry had been saying, he told about the tramps—giving the same particulars; so if the man doubted Harry's story, Zep proved it true.

"I certainly owe you a good turn for this," said the man when Zep had finished. "There are valuable things in that car which those rascals would certainly have stolen. When I realized that the door had been left unfastened, I was so alarmed, I galloped here all the way. But is this all there is of your party?"

"It's every one, counting Emily in the box-car."

"Of course we count her," said the man. "Would you mind to tell me where you are going?"

Zep laughed. "We wouldn't mind to tell you, if we knew," he said. "What we want is a job."

The man looked at Zep and then at Harry. "I see," he said, nodding solemnly. "Take your sister her clothes, and we'll talk it over." By the time Emily was dressed, Zep and Harry, entirely won by the fatherly manner of Mr. Dayton, had told him all their story.

"So you meant to spend this day guarding my property in the box-car!" he exclaimed at last. "Now I call that a good, American sort of style. It wasn't right though, to go fishing. Fishing is fishing, be it with seine or pin-hook, and the better luck we have on Sunday, the more demoralizing it is. However, I think nature paid you up very handsomely for that sin—though, as usual, she paid a good part of it to people who were not actively engaged in the sport. Children, how would you like to go home with me? There's a big yard and a well, where you can sit in the shade the rest of this day, with no temptation to fish."

"Come on," said Emily, "let's go at once!"

"Can we get a job on your place, Mr. Dayton?" inquired Harry. "We want to make money."

"Yes," said Emily, "Oh, we want to make money so bad!"

"Plenty of jobs," said Mr. Dayton, nodding his head. "There'll be a big dinner that must be got out of the way in about two hours."

"Mr. Dayton," said Zep, "will you try to send us to our uncle Tom's?"

"Upon my word," said the farmer, laughing, "I see no use in sending such nimble persons anywhere, when they may get off the train at any moment! Why do you carry your shoes instead of walking in them?"

"That's economy," said Harry. "We don't know how long these will have to do us."

"I never saw such grasping for wealth!" cried Mr. Dayton, smiling. "What are you going to do with all your money when you get it?"

"Give it to aunt Mary," said Emily promptly.

"Yes," said Harry, "everything we make is for her, but she don't know nothin' about our plans. You see she has five children, and the rent is so high in St. Jo', and people don't buy her pies much any more, and uncle Ben—that's her husband—he's thin, not a bit like aunt Mary—he has a different kind of back from us, so he can't do hard work of any description."

"No," said Emily, "any description of work puts him to bed. So when we make our money, we'll send it in a letter ever' week from different post offices so aunt Mary won't know where it's from. One day—"

"One day," chimed in Harry, "we'll step into the baker-shop and say, 'Hello, aunt Mary, WE sent you all that money!'"

"Then aunt Mary'll jus' hug an' hug us—" said Emily—but she could say no more, for she began to sob, which was a great surprise to her. Harry rubbed his knuckles in his eyes and put his arm about Emily.

"Harry and Emily are the most dreamy people!" said Zep with the calm superiority of an oldest child. "They are always thinking of things that ain't likely. But all the same, we want a job awful bad, we just must get one. But, Mr. Dayton, are you going to do anything about our uncle Tom?"

"I never like to discuss uncle Toms before dinner," said Mr. Dayton. "Come to my house, and we'll see what can be done. I think I can assure you that everything will be for your interests. Now, Miss Emily, if you'll get on that fence, I'll ride up and you can get on behind. You boys will have to walk behind us."

"Then I will have to get on a-straddle," said Emily, "'cause I ain't used to horses. And will you mind if I hold to you pretty tight?"

"Bless your heart, no!" said the farmer in his hearty voice. "Tight as you please! Steady now. One-two-three. There you are, safe and sound and straddle, Miss Emily. Here we go!" Mr. Dayton walked the horse up the road, while Harry walked beside Emily as she rode behind their new friend. Zep kept opposite the farmer.

The Gifts of God.*

(Thanksgiving Service.)

TEXT:—Every good gift and every perfect boon is from above, coming down from the Father of lights, with whom can be no variation, neither shadow that is cast by turning.—Jas. 1:17.

God is the great Giver! Though there be a thousand different channels pouring benefactions into your life, God is the source of them all. "Every good gift and every perfect boon" is from him. He may choose many servants to bring them, but they all wear the stamp of his beneficence. Let this truth be heralded anew at Thanksgiving time. Away with your secondary causes and vain conceits. The electric telegraph has flashed forth the truth for all the time of this industrial and commercial revival. While cities are a-building and ships a-sailing and the world a-throbbing with energy, read again the significant words: "What God hath wrought!"

Good Gifts.

Mark, it says, "Every good gift, every perfect boon." There is nothing evil, there is nothing imperfect, flowing into the world from that Source. God made man upright; but he has sought out many inventions. The hurts, the wounds, the shadows, the imperfections, are from the erring will, the stubborn blindness of man. Men are prone to look upon the good things by which they surround themselves, with a feeling of immense pride, as if by the cunning of their brains and the might of their hands they had gotten them. They forget that their very strength and cunning are gifts from God.

God is unchangeably good; with him there can be no variation. He never casts a shadow by turning. The center of the universe is a throne, and on that throne sits Benevolence. "The heart of the eternal is most wonderfully kind." Learn to recognize this fact. Learn to discriminate between the good and the bad. Many things that we esteem evil as they come into our lives are good; they are disguised blessings. Therefore cease repining. Clouds and showers are as merciful and beneficent as the sunshine.

Thanks in Everything.

"In everything give thanks; for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus to you ward" (1 Thess. 5:18). We can give thanks in prosperity; we can thank God for full granaries and loaded orchards and big bank balances; but who has learned to thank him for blasting and mildew, for devouring locusts, for loss and insolvency? Are we thankful for sickness and sorrow? Do we give God thanks for malicious enemies? Do we greet persecutions with a psalm of thanksgiving? "In everything give thanks!" "Everything" is a comprehensive term. If we were wise, if we could see the end from the beginning, if we could forecast final results, then we would readily and cheerfully obey this mandate.

"For this is the will of God"; that is, it is God's will that we should have a grateful heart. Nothing is more conducive to peace and contentment. In the waves of woe and the wilderness of doubt, trust him who "doeth all things well."

"Love divine has seen and counted
Every tear it caused to fall;
And the storm which love appointed
Was its choicest gift of all."

Thank Offerings.

Malachi exhorts the nation to bring all the tithes into the storehouse, and so prove the Almighty. His appeal is to awaken the consciences of the people. He accuses them of robbery; they have robbed God. He knows how the actions influence the thoughts and the emotions. Hence he pleads for the recognition of divine beneficence in offerings of their substance. The tithe belonged to God, according to the old regime; but according to the new, all that we possess and all that we are belong to him. "Ye are not your own; ye are bought with a price."

□ But we are more than paying a debt when we come to God with our poor gifts. We are acknowledging our stewardship. We are expressing in some measure our gratitude. A loving, grateful heart will overflow with thanksgiving, and it will prompt many a thank offering. Go to your pastor and say, "God has been good to me." He has raised my child from a sick bed, and I want to make a thank offering in recognition of his mercy. Take this and use it to bless them that sit in darkness and the shadow of death." This is a grace which needs cultivation. Why are there so few thank offerings? Is it because there are so many solicitations that there is no time left for spontaneous giving? Or is it because hearts are hard and unresponsive? Let the united prayer of Christ's church be—

"Thou that hast given so much to me,
Give one thing more, a grateful heart.
Not thankful when it pleaseth me,
As if thy blessings had spare days;
But such a heart whose pulse may be Thy praise."

Prayer.

We bless Thy name, O God, for the wonders Thou hast wrought, the mercy shown, the gifts bestowed. Wilt Thou mightily increase in us the impulse of praise. Make our voices songful and our faces radiant. Bless with us all the ends of the earth. Send Thy gifts abroad, but especially, O God, wilt Thou bless with salvation the sin-sick multitudes; with the bread of life, the famishing throngs, for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century is the most important contribution of the year to our Christian literature. The work is both historical and expository. It deals with the rise and progress of the great Reformatory Movement under seven distinct headings, as follows: Introductory Period, Period of Organization, The Turbulent Period, The Transition Period, Period of Revival of Home Missions, Period of Foreign Missions, and Period of Woman's Work. To these is appended a supplemental chapter of Lessons from Our Past. The book is printed on fine, heavy paper, and substantially bound in cloth. The Call of Moses.*

As the adopted son of Pharaoh's daughter, the position of Moses in the Egyptian court would be peculiar, and probably not altogether agreeable. Foreigners were not in favor with the Egyptian people, at this period of their history, least of all the Hebrews, who were naturally despised as a subject race. It would not be strange if among the courtiers of Pharaoh's court there would be some who looked with envy and hatred upon the popularity of this favored Hebrew. Josephus says that more than one attempt was made to assassinate Moses, doubtless from jealousy of his growing power. It is probable, as the same historian says, that Moses was given prominent place in the Egyptian army, for Stephen tells us, in his address in Acts, seventh chapter, that Moses, even before he fled from Egypt, was "mighty in words and deeds." If the story of his leading an Egyptian army to victory over the Ethiopians is true, it would evidence such military skill as was afterwards shown in his direction of the host of Israel through the wilderness.

What were the struggles through which this man of God passed, during his early manhood, before he finally decided to cast in his lot with the people of his own blood, we do not know. That such a struggle was his, we cannot doubt. To turn from the palace to the hut, from ease to toil, from royalty to slavery, from honor to contempt, was not possible without strenuous effort. Nor could the issue have been what it was, had Moses not been supremely a man of faith. "To scorn delights and live laborious days," is only possible to the true hero. It speaks volumes for our poor human nature that such a choice could have been made, even under the supervising grace of God. Doubtless Moses as a child had learned well the story of the pilgrimage of his fathers, and knew the purpose of God to make a mighty nation of Israel, but how easy it would have been to make himself believe that this purpose had been abandoned, in view of the awful and continued oppression under which his nation groaned. How natural to have sought to secure, through his own position at court, some favors for his own family, and leave the rest of his people to endure what he seemed powerless to prevent. But it was "by faith," as the writer to the Hebrews tells us, that "Moses, when he was grown up, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; choosing rather to be evil entreated with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; accounting the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt: for he looked unto the recompense of reward."

Thinking, therefore, that his brethren would understand his purpose to defend and deliver them, he one day took the part of a Hebrew against his oppressor, and in the struggle slew him. By this act he proclaimed his purpose to ally himself with the Hebrews, and Pharaoh sought to put him to death. Fleeing for his life, he naturally sought the wilds of the wilderness of Sinai, and there found a home in the house of Reuel, the chief sheik of the Midianite tribe which inhabited that part of the Sinaitic peninsula. The Midianites were descendants of Abraham, through his second wife, Keturah, and were, of course, worshipers of the God of Abraham. Here Moses found a peaceful abiding place for forty years, and might, perhaps, have remained there till the day of his death, had not God appeared to him, to remind him of the mission for which he had raised him up and fitted him.

It is probable that Reuel had died before the date of our lesson, and that Jethro was his son, and therefore the brother-in-law of Moses, instead of his father-in-law. The word so rendered is used for any relative by marriage, and is used indiscriminately for father-, brother-, or son-in-law, in the Old Testament. The son succeeded to the headship of the tribe, and Moses served under him, as he had under his father before him. One day, while he watched the flocks of Jethro in the near vicinity of Mount Horeb, which was known to all the tribes of that country as "the mountain of God," his attention was arrested by a strange sight. One of the acacia trees, a thorny shrub common in that vicinity, seemed to be flaming with fire, and yet was unconsumed. Moses drew near to discover, if possible, the cause of this strange phenomenon, and heard a voice from out of the bush, saying, "Moses, Moses!" His daily communion with God, in the quiet of the wilderness, had prepared him for such a voice, and he humbly answered, "Here am I." He is instructed to remove his sandals from his feet, in token of the sacredness of the place where God has met him, and, as he obeys, he hears the marvelous and gracious words, "I am the God of thy father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." No wonder Moses hid his face, and waited in silence for the further message of the Infinite. Perhaps he had often, during these forty years, wondered if God had remembered his promise, and would ever deliver his people. When weary years had passed, and no sign of his deliverance appeared, did Moses' heart sicken from long-deferred hope? If so, he is now rebuked, while he is filled with unspeakably joy. At last his people will be remembered, and their bondage ended. While he yet can scarcely believe for joy, the Lord assures him anew of his purpose, telling him that he has seen the affliction of his people, and has now come to deliver them, and bring them again into the land promised to the fathers. In this great enterprise, Moses is to be the chosen instrument of the Lord. His patience and faith are about to be rewarded with a glory that endless ages cannot dim.

Moses doubts his own ability to fulfill the trust committed to him. He possessed the modesty that characterizes all great souls. "Who am I?" is the question ever on the lips of those whom God calls to vast moral enterprises. The answer is ever the same. "I will be with thee." "Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts." God gives Moses the assurance of his constant presence and aid, and promises him that he shall bring his people to worship at this very mountain where he has appeared to him so mysteriously. One by one, Moses' doubts are dispelled, his courage strengthened, his zeal rekindled, till he sets his face steadfastly toward the court of Pharaoh, where he is to stand, not as a culprit, to answer for crime, but as an ambassador of God, to demand submission. He had endured, as seeing him who is invisible, and he had now been permitted indeed to behold him, and to be his chosen savior.

WHAT SHALL WE EAT

To Keep Healthy and Strong?

A healthy appetite and common sense are excellent guides to follow in matters of diet, and a mixed diet of grains, fruits and meats is undoubtedly the best, in spite of the claims made by vegetarians and food cranks generally.

As compared with grains and vegetables, meat furnishes the most nutriment in a highly concentrated form and is digested and assimilated more quickly than vegetables or grains.

Dr. Julius Remusson on this subject says: Nervous persons, people run down in health and of low vitality should eat plenty of meat. If the digestion is too feeble at first it may be easily strengthened by the regular use of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets after each meal. Two of these excellent tablets taken after dinner will digest several thousand grains of meat, eggs or other animal food in three or four hours, while the malt diastase also contained in Stuart's Tablets cause the perfect digestion of starchy foods, like potatoes, bread, etc., and no matter how weak the stomach may be, no trouble will be experienced if a regular practice is made of using Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets because they supply the pepsin and diastase so necessary to perfect digestion, and any form of indigestion and stomach trouble except cancer of the stomach will be overcome by their daily use.

That large class of people who come under the head of nervous dyspeptics should eat plenty of meat and insure its complete digestion by the systematic use of a safe, harmless digestive medicine like Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, composed of the natural digestive principles, peptones and diastase, which actually perform the work of digestion and give the abused stomach a chance to rest and to furnish the body and brain with the necessary nutriment. Cheap cathartic medicines masquerading under the name of dyspepsia cures are useless for relief or cure of indigestion, because they have absolutely no effect upon the actual digestion of food.

Dyspepsia in all its forms is simply a failure of the stomach to digest food and the sensible way to solve the riddle and cure the indigestion is to make a daily use at meal time of a safe preparation which is endorsed by the medical profession and known to contain active digestive principles, and all this can truly be said of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets.

All druggists throughout the United States, Canada and Great Britain sell them at the uniform price of fifty cents for full treatment.

*Lesson for December 1. Exodus 3: 1-12.

The Japan Bible College.

Our first missionaries reached Japan just eighteen years ago. They were good men. They came out to preach, and most faithfully did they perform that work. In a remarkably short time many stations were opened, chapels built and regular evangelistic trips taken. The whole of the provinces of Akita and Yamagata heard of the Lord through the zealous work of these first missionaries. But their numbers were too few and reinforcements did not even come fast enough to occupy the wide opened doors. There was no one to devote himself wholly to educational work; that is, the work of training evangelists and preachers. This condition has existed practically throughout the entire eighteen years. Although spasmodic attempts in school work, both for men and women, have been made, no one has stepped forth to prepare himself and devote his whole thought and life exclusively to Bible-school work. No one has felt called of the Lord or by the condition of the work to become a teacher of preachers and teachers. We have had no buildings, no land, no equipment, in fact, nothing to attract students, or to encourage any one to devote himself to the work of management. So that for this long period, we have had to depend upon other ways of securing our teachers and preachers than of training them ourselves. Our work all this time has been one-sided. It has not been so successful as it would have been had the co-ordinative work been carried on. Of the eight regular preachers we have to-day not one of them was converted from heathenism by us, and only one has received regular biblical training from us. We cannot expect the plea of Christ to take rapidly with the people as long as we do not have men trained in that plea. We do not have workers for most needy places. We have stations where there are several missionary workers and not a single Japanese preacher. This is radically wrong. The proportion should be just the reverse, at least four Japanese preachers to one missionary.

But we are going to solve our difficulty. Bro. H. H. Guy will devote himself to the work of training Japanese preachers and teachers. He is in Chicago University now preparing for this most needful work. He has the Japanese language well. He knows the people and their customs. He knows the Japanese field well, having taken long trips on preaching tours, both to the north and south. He is well beloved by his Japanese brethren. Then the Foreign Christian Missionary Society have given their hearty sanction to the speedy opening of the Japan Bible College. Secretary F. M. Rains has been here and has seen a desirable location and has recommended it for purchase. Buildings will be put up and a well organized and equipped school will be started upon Bro. Guy's return to the field. About $10,000 will be needed to begin this great undertaking. Oh! that some one of God's noble stewards would come to the help of Japan to that extent. It is the NEED of Japan now. In the next twenty or thirty years it would become to our work in Japan what Bethany, Hiram, Drake, Eureka, Butler, Lexington, Cotner, Add-Ran and other schools have been to our cause in the United States.

Who are to enter this Bible College? What kind of men have we who are desirous of studying and devoting themselves to the ministry of the gospel? I will speak now of the Sendai district alone. Mr. Mitsui is a teacher in the public school in Fukushima. Mr. Sawaki is a teacher in one of the largest public schools in Sendai. Mr. Suto is a graduate of the Japan Military College and a truly reformed man. Mr. Kokubun is an official in the provincial capitol in Fukushima. Mr. Kon, from the country district, has served seven years in the navy of Japan and is in receipt of a pension from the government. Mr. Tatebe has been an assistant and has been preaching at Haranomachi now for nearly three years. There are others still in this district alone, but this will suffice to show the character of the young men who are wishing to be trained for preachers. These are all well approved of by their brethren and are faithful workers. They come from different parts of the district and their education would have a wonderful effect on our future work in their home towns and cities.

The Japanese brethren have been praying for the opening of a Bible College for several years. Substantial members and churches have made a bona fide offer to establish two scholarships for the school and in other ways to support this undertaking. If there is anything which might be called the prayer of the Japanese brethren to the American brotherhood, it is this school. We can now hold the land and property in our own name.

Are there not many brethren who will help to make this school a success? Will not some one help to endow it? Will not some one build a building? Will not some one provide the library or some part of the equipment? Will not many establish scholarships, that they may soon have a well trained man as their representative in Japan? Will not every one who reads this appeal pray for this school? Brethren, we lay this most needful work upon your consciences; we ask your careful attention, your interest, your help; we ask your prayers. "The Japan Bible College!" The name signifies our lack and indicates our need. M. B. MADDEN.

THOMAS.

Gilson Berryman Thomas passed away at Kansas City, Nov. 14, at the home of his son, William L. Thomas, 920½ Garfield avenue. The remains were laid to rest in the cemetery at Independence, Mo., where his parents, William and Martha Thomas, and the most of their descendants who have crossed the river thus far, are resting until the resurrection morn. The sickness which terminated fatally came upon him at Red Mountain, Col., in which isolated spot, high up in the mountains, he made his home with his youngest son, G. B. Thomas, Jr., postmaster at that point. The approach to the river of death was for him such as one who had lived in the faith could expect. The crossing was peaceful. Of his generation, but a single member of the once large family, so well known in western Missouri since 1843, when they emigrated from Owen county, Ky., yet survives, namely, Mrs. H. R. Gray, of Kansas City. Numerous nephews and nieces, and other kindred and friends, drop a tear with the two sons and the sister referred to, over the grave of one who was a courtly gentleman, a good man, a kind father and brother, uncle and friend.

B. M.

WALKER.

Left his daughter Mrs. Sarah Boman's, home, near Zanesville, Ind., Aug. 29, 1901, after a short unconscious waiting from paralysis, in a winged flight with the waiting angels for his long expected home in heaven, Elder William Walker, in the 96th year of his earthly life. He had lived in constant readiness for over 62 years. His faithful companion, Sarah—or "Aunt Sally"—Walker, had preceded him after a completed, well-fought battle, in her 85th year, about 13 years ago. They raised one minister for the Lord and kept "the preachers' hotel" for over fifty years, all free. To sing, to pray, to work for, and to give to the Lord's blessed cause was their chief delight while on the earth. They leave six sons and two daughters, all in the church of God but one. One Christian daughter and little son with them in heaven. Many grandchildren, mostly in their Lord's happy service. He was among the first abolitionists, also among the first and most radical prohibitionists to the day of his death; was a Bryanite, free silver Populist; wanted to live to see Bryan president; was a devout Bible disciple and Christian elder; versus slavery, rum, plutocracy, imperialism and sectism: bold as a lion and gentle and loving as the lamb-like child; never was defeated in a Bible controversy; a model parent, Christian husband and citizen. God bless him forever.

The Spiritual Side of Our Plea

— By A. B. JONES —

This new volume is a notable contribution to a better understanding of the spiritual significance and value of our Reformatory Movement. It accentuates a side of our plea which has been too much neglected by many. It deals in a profound manner, characteristic of its author, with such questions as "The Letter and the Spirit," "The Real and the Formal," "Alexander Campbell on Remission of Sins," "The Word and the Spirit," and "Righteousness and Law." The views herein expressed are the result of long and mature deliberation by one of the clearest thinkers and writers in our ranks.

COMMUNION WINE

We are glad to be able to announce to our readers that we have just closed a contract with one of the largest grape-juice establishments in the United States, which will enable us to supply our patrons with a much better quality of unfermented grape-juice than we have hitherto sold, at a much lower price than has been asked.

This grape-juice is bottled especially for us and bears our label. It is intended for use in the Communion Service, and also for medicinal use. Pure grape-juice, such as this that we offer, is a most excellent drink for invalids, for convalescing fever patients, for children, etc., etc. Care should be taken, however, to avoid the many impure and adulterated brands of grape-juice now on the market.

PRICES. The prices we quote are for goods sent by express, not prepaid. We have put the prices as low as possible, that every church may be able to secure this non-intoxicating wine—the only wine that should be used in the celebration of the Lord's death. We especially urge patrons to buy in dozen lots. The price is less, the cost of transportation is proportionately less, and the trouble of frequent ordering is avoided. This grape-juice will keep in perfect condition for ten years.

Book Notes.

N. B. The business of the Christian Publishing Company is by no means confined to the books which we ourselves publish, or to those listed in our catalogue, or to those which we advertise, from time to time, in our periodicals.

We do a general book business, and can supply, AT THE REGULAR RETAIL PRICE, almost any book in print, no matter where or by whom published. If you see anywhere a review or advertisement of any book and desire to purchase it, send us a money order or draft to cover the regular retail price, and we will forward the volume postpaid.

We desire to call the attention of our patrons to the preceding paragraph, and particularly to the announcement that we will supply any desired volumes at the regular retail price. We are at all times anxious to serve our friends and patrons, and will gladly take any amount of pains to secure any desired volume, even if there is practically no profit for us in the transaction, as is often the case. If you really want to buy any volume we will do our best to get it for you, and we generally succeed in such endeavors. But do not expect that we can supply you with standard works at one-half the publisher's price. It is evident to us that the following method of procedure is frequently carried out: Bro. Z. sees advertised, somewhere, a book, the price of which is given at $2.00. He thinks he would buy it if he could get it for 60 cents. "Perhaps," he says to himself, "the Christian Publishing Company will get me the book for 60 or 75 cents." So he writes to us and asks: "Please tell me the price of —." He knows the price and where the book is published, because he has happened to run across it, but we have to look it up. We spend an hour, perhaps, in investigation before we secure the desired information. Then we write him that we can send him the volume for $2.00. That ends the story. Bro. Z. never had any serious notion of buying the book, but he has, unintentionally of course, put us to a great deal of trouble for nothing. If Bro. Z. had written: "Please send me —" or if, seriously intending to purchase the book but not knowing its value, he had inquired the price, that he might know what amount to remit for it, the case would have been different. We wish to be "hothered" with inquiries from people who mean business. But we can save our patrons as well as ourselves much unnecessary trouble and correspondence by stating that when we supply a book not in our catalogue and not published by us, it is always at the regular retail price. The only exceptions to this rule are the special bargains that we specifically announce.

We are already receiving a gratifying number of orders for our new stock of Communion Wine, at the reduced prices. As our churches come to know the excellent quality of this pure, unfermented "juice of the grape" and realize the moderateness of the prices we ask, we must inevitably do a vastly increased business in this line. Twenty years ago it was a common thing for our churches to use in the communion service alcoholic wine, purchased at a convenient saloon. Even yet, we regret to say, this practice is not entirely obsolete. But now that we are offering so excellent a quality of unfermented wine at so reasonable a price, there is no excuse for any congregation tolerating a fermented wine. Remember, prices in our present catalogue are canceled, and the following greatly reduced prices are now in force:

	Single	Half Dozen	Dozen
Quarts	$.65	$3.50	$6.00
Pints	.40	2.00	3.50
Half-Pints	.30	1.50	2.25

Again do we urge the wisdom of ordering in dozen lots, for several good reasons. Each dozen bottles, in all three sizes, is packed separately, and the purchaser of a dozen gets an "original package." The cost, per bottle, is much less when a dozen is ordered, and transportation charges are proportionately less. There is no danger that this grape-juice will spoil, if kept too long. It is hermetically sealed, and will keep ten years, if necessary.

It is our privilege to announce this week something entirely new, and as valuable as it is new. This is a series of little books, five in number, on the leading heroes of Old Testament history, written especially for young folks—those from twelve or fourteen to twenty-years of age. The titles are as follows:

David the King.
Joseph the Ruler.
Daniel the Fearless.
Samuel the Judge.
Moses the Leader.

These five volumes are from the pen of Galen B. Royer. The narratives are in story form and may almost be styled historical novels, save that the events and incidents in the careers of the heroes are, in the main, fact and not fiction. We can most heartily commend these books to parents who wish to interest their sons and daughters in Bible study, or who desire to supply their children with reading matter that is wholesome, and at the same time interesting and attractive. The price of these books is very low—only 35 cents per volume. The five books average

THANKSGIVING

THE UNSOUGHT BLESSING

I thank Thee, O my God, for answered prayer;
For dreams come true I thought too good to hold;
For gifts so precious and for scenes so fair
That they shall never vanish or grow old.

And more I thank Thee for the gifts of Thine
I did not hope for in my wildest thought;
The sweet surprises of thine oil and wine
Poured out when I had never dreamed nor sought.

Yet, giving thanks for answer and surprise,
It is for this Thy goodness I would boast;
That Thou has sent, despite my pleading cries,
The thing I did not want, but needed most.

THEME

OUR SPECIAL RATE OF ONE DOLLAR.

WE WILL TREAT THE SUBJECT UNDER THREE HEADS AS FOLLOWS:

FIRST—New Subscribers may secure THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for one year by remitting ONLY ONE DOLLAR.

SECOND—Old Subscribers with subscription PAID TO JAN. 1, 1902, OR BEYOND may have subscription extended one year by paying ONLY ONE DOLLAR.

THIRD—Those in Arrears may pay to Jan. 1, 1902, at regular rates and send ONLY ONE DOLLAR for the year 1902.

(A) The first division of our subject may be explained and emphasized by means of sample copies, exhibits of what THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for 1902 is to be (we will furnish printed folders on application), and by impressing upon the prospective subscribers the necessity of a Christian paper in the home. It should be further urged that the paper be the very best obtainable, which is another way of indicating THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

(B) Such homely admonitions as "A word to the wise is sufficient," "Make hay while the sun shines," "Now is the accepted time," "Opportunity has a forelock but no hack hair etc., may be used to illustrate and fix the importance of the second division.

(C) The third division naturally suggests a reference to the Twentieth Century and the awfulness of lingering in a century from whence one's friends and associates have departed. The Scripture admonition to "owe no man anything" may be used effectively.

CONCLUSION—Sin not away the day of grace. Accept the present opportunity. Now THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE.

clists and trotters are clipping one second after another from their respective mile records, until they now stand very close to one minute in the former and two minutes in the latter case.

We have broken some records in the way of Book and Bible Bargains, heretofore, but now we propose to make a new record in the way of a Bible Bargain that will never be equaled or excelled. If any reader of this announcement knows of any other Bible offer as good, or anywhere near as good, we would like to know of it.

WHAT THIS BIBLE IS.

One of the Finest Teachers' Bibles ever printed. Alsatian Levant (beautifully smooth, soft leather). Divinity Circuit, Round Corners, Leather Lined (this is important; the various "cheap" Bibles are lined with black paper). Silk Sewed, Red under Gold Edges. There are 1000 pages of text and 324 pages of helps, including splendid Concordance, Maps, Index of Names and Subjects, a Summary of the books of the Bible, Comprehensive Treatises by world-famous scientists, scholars and specialists, on such subjects as:

Parables and Miracles. Music of the Bible.
Prophecies Concerning Christ. Weights and Measures.
Mountains and Hills of the Bible. The Bible and the Monuments.
Bible. Jewish Sects and Orders.
Rivers and Lakes of the Bible. Poetry of the Bible.
Coins of the Bible.
Animals of the Bible

etc., etc., etc., etc.

The Type is a beautiful clear, plain, Minion. The Paper is of fine quality. The appearance of the Bible, as a whole, is remarkably fine and handsome. In fact, there are very few Bibles, at any price, that equal this book.

THE REMARKABLE PRICE!

ONE DOLLAR AND TWENTY-FIVE CENTS is all that we ask for this fine Bible without marginal thumb index, or One Dollar and Fifty Cents with thumb index. This is a regular Five Dollar Bible. Tens of thousands have been sold at that price, and that is the publisher's list price. We habitually sell things lower than others, and consequently we have sold the book for $3.50, but never until the present time did we offer it for less than $3.50. At that rate there was a very small margin of profit for us. At the price of $1.25 the book is sold for less than one-half the actual wholesale price. This is a plain statement of fact, and is absolutely true. There is no "catch" to our offer; there is nothing concealed; there is no undesirable feature of the book that renders it unsalable. We have a reason for making this extravagantly low price—a reason which the more shrewd of those who read these lines will divine, and which will make them all the more eager to take advantage of the offer.

THIRDLY AND LASTLY.

We can sell you one of these Bibles for One Dollar and Twenty-five Cents (or $1.50 if you wish the thumb index), or we will sell you two for twice that amount; but we cannot sell you one thousand for $1,250.00. Strange? Not a bit. We haven't a thousand copies, by a good many, and this offer is good only while our present stock lasts. If you want one thousand copies we will supply them, but the price will be $3,500.00.

The Christian Publishing Company is an old established concern. It has a reputation for fair and honest dealing. It guarantees this Bible to be just as represented. If you buy it, and are dissatisfied, you can get your money back by asking for it.

Current Events.

Reciprocity Convention. Last week there was held in Washington a convention of business men to consider the question of reciprocity. Over two hundred delegates were present representing all the important manufacturing interests of the country. The purpose of the convention was to harmonize the interests of the various industries and present a fairly complete statement of what the manufacturers of the country want in the way of reciprocal trade concessions with other countries. Such a conference as this prior to the opening of Congress deserves hearty approval if it can prevent the assembling of lobbyists in the halls of the capitol, outnumbering the members of both houses and fighting the battles of their conflicting interests whenever there is a prospect of tariff modifications. The reciprocity convention, however, proposes not to encourage tariff agitation, but to forestall it. The weight of its influence will be directed toward maintaining the present tariff scale, modified only in particular cases by reciprocity treaties.

A resolution was passed favoring the creation of a Department of Commerce, with a cabinet member at its head, and of a Bureau of Reciprocity within that department to study the vast mass of facts in the light of which treaties of reciprocity must be made.

Protection of Native Races. All good citizens should remember that Secretary Hay has appointed Dec. 6 as the day on which the state department will receive petitions for the enactment of the Gillett-Lodge bill for the protection of uncivilized native races against the white man's alcohol and opium. If Congress acts favorably upon this bill at the opening of the session, the United States will be allied with those civilized nations which are seeking by legislation and treaty to prevent the introduction of the vices of civilization among the Pacific islanders in advance of its blessings. The Gillett-Lodge bill forbids any American citizen to sell intoxicants or opium to the uncivilized races in the Pacific islands not under any civilized government. The bill was endorsed by President McKinley, was passed by the House of Representatives at the last session of Congress and was favorably reported by the committee of the Senate, but was crowded out in the closing days of the session and failed to become a law. Dr. John G. Paton, whose eminent services to civilization as well as to Christianity in the New Hebrides are universally recognized, has made two tours in the United States chiefly for the purpose of urging such legislation. At present American traders sell the natives rum and guns; the combination is not a safe one. Great Britain already has such prohibitory legislation in force. It is important that our government should place similar restrictions upon those of its citizens who are attracted to this form of trade because of the money there is in it. Petitions and letters should be sent to congressmen and senators, and further petitions "To All Civilized Nations" asking for treaties to insure the protection of the native races from liquor and opium traders of all nationalities, may be forwarded to the Reform Bureau, Washington, D. C.

Penny Postage. Among the questions which will come up at the approaching session of Congress is that of a one-cent rate for letter postage. Some congressmen have already declared their intention of advocating such a measure and there is no doubt but that it will have strong support. A reduction of $40,000,000 in the war tax has failed to wipe out the surplus and there is still an embarrassing excess of receipts over expenditures. Might it not be as well to spend some of this on a reduction of the rate of letter postage as to wipe out the surplus by reducing the tax on beer and tobacco? The question of preventing the abuses now practiced in regard to second-class mail matter always comes up at every session of Congress. Thousands of tons of matter, which is either books or practically pure advertising matter, are sent annually at the newspaper rate. The government is willing to lose a little in circulating newspapers, but there is no reason why it should be asked to bear the expense of circulating advertisements. There are dozens of papers in this country claiming weekly circulations of from 200,000 to 1,000,000 copies, which are published solely for what can be made out of their advertisements. No effective way has yet been found to debar these publications from second-class rates. There are a great many merchants who think that the one-cent letter rate need not wait upon this reform in the second class, and that, if the government is going to lose money in circulating advertisements for the benefit of a comparative few, it might as well lose a little more in carrying letters for the benefit of the many. Besides, it is not so certain that a one-cent letter rate would mean a permanent decrease in receipts. The reduction from the three-cent to the two-cent rate turned out to be a good business move.

The Capture of Colon. The fact that there is a rebellion in progress in Colombia had almost slipped from the minds of most of us until the unexpected capture of the important port, Colon, by the insurgents, or Liberals, recalled the fact. Colon is the Atlantic terminus of the Panama railway and its capture comes dangerously near to interfering with the only business which our government has in Colombia, i. e., a treaty obligation to keep the line of communication open across the isthmus between Colon on the Atlantic side and Panama on the Pacific. There has been no attempt as yet on the part of the Liberals to interfere with traffic on this road, but it is easy to see that such a state of affairs—the termini of such a short road in the hands of mutually hostile forces—is not conducive to the best commercial conditions. A Colombian gunboat has arrived at the port and its commander has notified the commanders of the American, British and French warships in that harbor that he intends to bombard Colon at noon on Monday. The foreigners residing in the town are seeking refuge on the ships of their respective countries. To bombard the city it will be necessary, it is said, to fire across the railroad tracks and yards, and it is scarcely possible that this can be done without virtually stopping railroad traffic. In that case it may be necessary for our representatives to take a hand in the matter.

Indian Affairs. In his annual report, a document of 300 printed pages, the Secretary of the Interior deals at length with the Indian question. In regard to education, he recommends that non-reservation schools should not be further extended and that industrial and manual training for both sexes should be introduced into all schools where it is not now practiced. The whole legislative policy of the government toward the Indians is summed up in the Curtis act, which imposed upon the Dawes Commission, created in 1893, the following duties: to make correct rolls of citizenship of the members of the five nations and, when this had been done, to divide the tribal lands into individual holdings among the members whose names appear on the roll, "giving to each so far as possible his fair and equal share thereof, considering the nature and fertility of the soil, location and value of same." Though much has been done, this work has not been completed and it is Secretary Hitchcock's opinion that it will take considerable time to accomplish what remains to be done before the tribal governments can be dissolved and the territory be ready for admission to statehood. This plainly indicates that the Secretary of the Interior, whose opinion on this question is naturally important, considers the movement for the admission of Oklahoma and Indian Territory as a single state to be premature.

Rebellion in the Klondike. A picturesque plan "ganged a-gley" when the project of throwing off British sovereignty and establishing an independent republic in the Klondike was prematurely disclosed. An oath-bound secret society had been organized, according to the reports, and, after the close of navigation had cut off communication with the outside world, the republic was to be established and it would have had six months in which to get into running order before any one outside could learn of its existence. The plan has been betrayed and is probably off. The grievances of the miners upon which they based their desire for independence are: ineffective and unequal mining laws, an excessive royalty tax on the product of the mines, unlicensed liquor and gambling traffic, official favoritism in disposing of timber and mining lands, and the unyielding attitude of Great Britain in regard to the Alaskan dispute.

The W. C. T. U. Convention. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union has been holding its national convention at Fort Worth, Texas. Among the many resolutions passed by the convention were those protesting against the removal of the restrictions upon selling liquors to Indians, in case statehood is granted to Indian Territory and Oklahoma, and against the Sunday opening of saloons in New York city, as is being proposed by some of the Fusionists who helped win the victory for reform, but are afraid the city will not endorse the reform program unless some compromises and concessions are made. Both of these resolutions commend themselves to the judgment of all right-minded persons. The scope of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union has been broadening ever since the beginning of the organization, until now it includes not less than forty-five departments of work, all of which are reforms of one sort or another, but some of which have no visible bearing on the question of temperance. It has seemed to many that the organization would have been an even more powerful agency than it is if it had confined itself strictly to temperance reform, without taking up other matters upon which the most zealous advocates of temperance develop radical differences of opinion. But whatever may be said in this direction, the fact remains that the W. C. T. U. with its 300,000 members in the United States, is one of the most effective agencies for reform that this country has ever known.

The Bandits Still Resist. The news that comes from Bulgaria regarding the ransoming of Miss Stone from the bandits is chiefly a vain repetition of unconfirmed rumors. What is certain is that Miss Stone is still in the hands of her kidnapers and that they are still standing out for the full amount of the ransom which they originally demanded. Mr. Dickinson, the United States Consul, has officially requested the Bulgarian government to desist from its attempts to capture the bandits, since such attempts drive them farther into the mountains and endanger the lives of the captives. This request may be a diplomatic blunder, since it will destroy any claim upon the Bulgarian government for indemnity—we cannot very well hold it responsible after asking it to let the robbers alone—but it may ultimately save the life of Miss Stone. The latest report is that Mr. Dickinson has delivered an ultimatum to the robbers, fixing a date by which his offer must be accepted, and is on the point of returning to Constantinople.

Workmen in Politics. Lord Rosebery's suggestion to put business men in charge of the government is being carried one step farther, and that, too, in actual practice, by the election of workmen to office in one or two notable instances. It is reported that San Francisco's mayor elect is a musician who plays in the orchestra in one of the theaters in that city. Of course we cannot tell whether to class him as skilled or unskilled labor until we have heard him play, but in any case this is not his sole occupation for he is a business man outside of theatre hours. But Bridgeport, Conn., has elected as its mayor a man who came from Ireland at the age of thirty, and has ever since been shoveling coal in the Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine factory. He is now 58. With wages which have never risen above $15 a week, he has supported his family and made some good investments in real estate. Six years ago he was elected alderman and at the recent election his candidacy for mayor overthrew the usual Republican majority and resulted in his election by a majority of over 3,000. It was another case of honest man against a machine. The policy which he will follow as mayor is outlined in these words, which we quote from the Outlook:

I'll serve all the people.
No politicians about me.
Public expenses must be reduced.
No junkets.
No secret sessions. No committee meetings behind closed doors.
I know the value of money. I have had to work for it. The taxpayers' money shall be used as if it were mine own.

If shoveling coal for twenty-eight years is the proper regime by which to develop such an idea of the duties of municipal office, then let us put all candidate through that curriculum. The job may look a little grimy from the outside but the chances are that a man will come out of it cleaner on the inside than if he had spent those twenty-eight years acquiring an extensive acquaintance with practical politics. Mr. Mulvihill, the new mayor of Bridgeport, might not be the best man for the place if there was need for the city to launch out upon new enterprises and inaugurate an era of municipal expansion, but that is not what Bridgeport happens to need at present. She needs a man to show her how to live within her income and to get her money's worth for every dollar that goes out of the city treasury—which is the same thing that most of our other cities need—and that is what the new stoker-mayor is qualified to do. His salary will be $3,000 a year, which is probably four times as much as he ever received before in his life, but if he comes up to the popular expectation he will earn it.

Gen. Wood to-day gave directions for the construction of the sea wall, half a mile in length, which will cost $50,000, and of a custom house building. He issued instructions, also, for harbor dredging, for the completion of the sewer system and water-works, for the repair of roads and for the transfer of prisoners from the jail to the old Spanish barracks, in order to make a courthouse of the jail, which is one of the oldest and most famous in the West Indies. During the afternoon he inspected the troops of the 8th cavalry and to-night he gave a public reception at the palace.

A pretty full day's work, that might fairly be called. With such a vigorous governor it is no wonder that Cuba is being transformed into a fit abode for civilized man. For the first time in her history Cuba is now passing through the throes of a presidential campaign. Palma and Maso are the two prominent candidates and, although the excitement has not yet become intense, the contest will probably be hot enough before the election, which occurs in February.

Admiral Schley, whose personal fortune, which was not large, has been all spent on attorneys' fees and the other expenses incident to the naval court of inquiry, has declined to allow his friends to bear any part of this expense for him. It was being quietly suggested that the amount might be raised by subscription among his friends and admirers, but he promptly put a stop to that movement. His attitude is correct and admirable. The investigation was not forced upon him. He asked for it and had a right to expect to pay for it. On such a delicate point of personal and financial honor, Schley is incapable of perpetrating any loop.

On December 20, ground will be broken for the first building of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition of 1903. Suitable ceremonies will mark this point at which the work of planning and designing becomes a work of construction.

Thanksgiving.

"Some hae meat but canna eat,
And some na meat that want it;
But we hae meat and we can eat,
So let the Lord be thankit."

"It is sweet, when on the great sea the winds trouble the waters, to behold from a cliff the deep distress of those who toil on the sea; not that it is a pleasure and delight that any should be afflicted, but because it is sweet to see from what evils you yourself are exempt."

The Lowland singer and the Latin philosophical poet have both voiced the thought that in contemplating the misfortunes of others we should find new occasion for rejoicing in the blessings which are ours; and the Roman at least, materialist though he was, and speaking of pleasure without thought of thanksgiving, has taken pains to guard against the inference that another's disaster should in itself be a source of delight.

It is inevitable as the season of Thanksgiving recurs—if sports and gluttony have not quite concealed the meaning of the day—that one should take stock of those things which ought to make him grateful, and that in doing so he should be aided by a comparison of his own lot with the circumstances of others. It would seem at first glance that such a process could not be productive of the desired result except in the case of the comparative few whom we are in the habit of considering as constituting the favored class. Persons of exceptional talents, of pre-eminent learning, of great wealth, of high social position and popularity might well find reason to rejoice at such comparisons. But how about the vast majority who have no such exceptional gifts? Can every one find reason for thanksgiving by comparing his lot with that of every one else?

Certainly, if the comparison be conducted by the proper method. Let an effort be made, not to prove one's complete superiority to others, but to appreciate the value of those gifts which have been bestowed by noting those individuals who have been deprived of one or another of these gifts. A visit to an asylum for the blind will give any man a new appreciation of the value of the gift of sight and of all the realm of beauty which is unlocked to us by the marvelous mechanism of the eye. The blind may value more highly his hearing and his quickened senses if he considers the eternal silence that surrounds the deaf. It is a common saying that one does not appreciate the blessing of a home until he is deprived of it, but a visit to those parts of a great city where overcrowded and squalid conditions make the very name of home a mockery, would help one to appreciate his own.

Each one of these classes—the blind, the deaf and the homeless—can be helped to a positive appreciation of what each one has by noting its absence in one of the others. For Thanksgiving should not be associated with rejoicing in superiority over one's fellows, but with recognizing the full value of all one's gifts.

The world is full of men and women who have learned to prize the blessings God has given by losing part of them. There is much meat in the old story of the Sybil who brought to the Romans her nine golden prophetic books and offered them for sale.

When her offer was refused, she burned three of the books and tripled the price. Again refused, she burned three more and again tripled the price. The last offer was accepted. Men are not rich by having but by appreciating. And as thanksgiving springs from appreciation, it may be said that gratitude is the true measure of one's wealth. As with the Romans who bartered with the Sybil for her golden books, losses often give a deeper realization of the value of what remains. So sometimes one who was poor when he was rich, grows rich when he becomes poor. Thrice blest is he who can learn from the losses of others and can grow rich in human sympathy, rich in deeds of charity and rich in grateful appreciation of all that has been given to him.

The man with one talent had less than the man with ten, but he had one talent to be thankful for. And so one must give thanks, not for what one has in excess of others, but for all that one has. This truth is fundamental, and only by recognizing it can one be saved from that most gross perversion—the substitution of a pharisaic complacency for the spirit of devout and humble thanksgiving.

Our Early History.

The organization of the Historical Society of the Disciples of Christ recalls a thought which has long been in many minds: that systematic measures ought to be adopted without delay to secure reliable data in regard to the early history of our movement before it is too late. Every year there pass from us men whose memories were rich storehouses of historical data that have never been committed to writing. The death of Dr. W. A. Belding, of Troy, N. Y., last week, is a case in point.

The first generation of our pioneers is gone. There remain representatives of the second generation, who knew the men of the first generation, were their intimate, though younger, contemporaries, and were themselves pioneers in the newer country. Even men of this second generation are now passing away rapidly, and steps ought to be taken, while some of them are yet with us, to secure a permanent record of the facts at their command. The Historical Society will do this, but it would be well if the matter could be taken up also by the various states severally, and especially by those states in which our pioneers labored most extensively.

As an example, take the case of Iowa. That state early became the scene of a series of remarkable and heroic efforts for the restoration of primitive Christianity. The record of those labors, so far as we know, is found only in the memories of some of the oldest men, together with scattered items in old church records, many of which are not preserved with that care which as historic documents they deserve. The death of Brother Nelson McConnell removed one whose contribution to the early history of our movement in Iowa would have been invaluable. But it is not yet too late. We believe it will be agreed that no state has a man who has known its affairs more intimately or during a longer period than Brother Allen Hickey, of Des Moines, has known the affairs of Iowa. Would it not be an enterprise worth considering for the Iowa brethren to commission Brother Hickey to collect, arrange and record all the important data which he can find, either in his own memory or in the documents which are preserved in various places throughout the state? A volume could be prepared which, without being large or expensive, could contain a vast amount of information which the churches in Iowa ought not to allow to fall into oblivion, and which in a few years it may be too late to collect.

We offer this as a general suggestion to all the states, with particular reference to Iowa by way of illustration, because in that case we think at once of the name of the one man best qualified for the work.

The Christian-Evangelist for 1902.

We are promising to our readers that the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for the coming year will be better than it has been during the current year. Some have been flattering enough to consider this an absurd promise, impossible of fulfillment. We appreciate their incredulity, but shall endeavor to show them that we can make good the promise of improvement.

We shall, for example, make an improvement in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST as a newspaper. Realizing that it is the function of a weekly paper to deal chiefly with the events that are now transpiring, we shall devote more space to articles, both descriptive and narrative, regarding those events which are most important from the Christian point of view. We shall try to make the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST such a paper that by reading it one may gain that view of the world and its various activities which a Christian man ought to have, and that one may gain it here better than in any other paper published. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will be not only a newspaper, but pre-eminently a religious newspaper, because it will bear in mind that the highest standard by which events can be estimated is their bearing upon the advancement of the Kingdom of God. Just as the writer of religious history must treat of many topics which are usually called secular, so the writer of current religious history—and that is the function of the religious newspaper—must treat of the events which some call secular. In each case, the point of view, the emphasis and the interpretation of events make the difference between the religious and the non-religious treatment.

In addition to presenting a Christian view of the world's events, we shall continue to advocate the principles and exhibit the spirit of the Christianity of Christ, so far as in us lies.

Another improvement which we propose to make is in the use of illustrations. A few centuries ago it used to be said that "pictures are the poor man's book"—because the poor man could not read. Today pictures are the busy man's book, for the busy man often has not time to read. A picture will often tell at a glance what a column of description could not convey. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for 1902 will be printed on heavy, super-calendered paper and will be copiously illustrated.

In addition to many articles upon timely subjects suggested by important events from week to week, we announce the following special features:

A Year of Missions: Not a series of appeals, but a presentation of the personal and picturesque side of missions, both home and foreign. So far as possible, every foreign missionary field of the Disciples of Christ will be represented by a separate article, and many of the home fields. It would be interesting to visit these many lands and see for yourself what is going on, would it not? These articles will be the best substitute for such a trip. The missionaries themselves will be your guides. The articles will be fully illustrated. A. McLean says of the plan for this series of articles that it is "the wisest suggestion respecting the missionary cause that has been made for some time."

Movements for Social Betterment: Concrete studies in the problem of poverty will be written by men who have made it a life study. Social settlements, institutional church work and other methods of helping "the other half" will be described. Descriptions and stories of the work that is actually being done. Many illustrations.

Dangerous Elements in Society: The Ignorant Foreigner, the Ward Politician, the Monopolist, the Saloon in Politics, etc. With illustrations.

The Liquor Problem: Articles on the various methods of dealing with the liquor problem: Prohibition, the Dispensary System, the Anti-Saloon League, Substitutes for the Saloon.

Methods of Church Work will be discussed by the pastors of some of our most successful churches.

Church News: All the important news of our churches while it is fresh; not all the gossip, but all the news. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST does not attempt to pose as the only simon-pure, orthodox organ of the Disciples of Christ and the author and finisher of all good works among us, but it is loyal to the plea for the restoration of primitive Christianity and, believing that work to be the greatest work of our time, it is interested in the men and churches who are carrying on that work. Send us your news.

Current Literature will be touched upon in book reviews and signed articles. A good book is an event which a newspaper cannot ignore.

Fiction of high moral tone and general interest will be furnished from time to time for both young and old.

National Questions will be treated by men high in public life.

Education: Several articles will be written for us by leading educators.

The People's Forum: A column in which any reader who has a criticism, a grievance, an opinion, an exhortation or a commendation, and can state it briefly, will be permitted to speak.

Editorials: Reviewing and interpreting the most important events of the day, advocating the principles of apostolic Christianity, discussing the current problems which arise in the work of restoration, and discussing the application of the teachings of Jesus to the concrete conditions of modern life.

The price of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for 1902 to all alike will be one dollar, and it will be discontinued at the end of the time for which it is ordered. This business policy will, we believe, commend itself to business men. We will rely upon the readers' interest in the paper to hold them on the subscription list when the time for renewal comes. How we can do it for one dollar is our secret, but we will do our share if you will do yours.

A British View of "Americanisms."

The London Evening News recently delivered itself of a most astounding piece of literary criticism, which has a bearing on the ever interesting question of the differences between American English and British English. In commenting on the Twentieth Century New Testament, the third part of which was issued a few days ago, it says: "In Chicago even the masterpiece of literature is not sacred. Twenty misguided inhabitants have just issued a translation of the New Testament into modern American. Such an atrocity almost makes one sigh for a few hours of the Inquisition."

One would think it must be very bad, very Chicagoese indeed, to call forth this trenchant criticism from our British contemporary. One thinks at once of George Ade and the like, and has visions of the New Testament hashed up in the form of "Fables in Slang." Yes, it must be very bad, very vulgar, very American, and western American at that, for every one knows that the lingua Chicaginiensis is a fearful and wonderful dialect, the flavor of which the mere babe in criticism can distinguish from any other perversion of the king's English as far as—well, as far as the odor of the stockyards will float to leeward on a breezy day.

But what is this that some captious objector says? The "twenty misguided inhabitants" who made this translation are not inhabitants of Chicago and not inhabitants of this country. They are, as a matter of fact, inhabitants of Great Britain and most of them occupants of chairs in her great universities. Oh! And this translation by the "twenty misguided inhabitants" (of Great Britain) is "into modern American." Strange! And it calls for a rehabilitation of the Inquisition in Chicago. Stranger and yet more strange!

We had always supposed it impossible for any Englishman to acquire our peculiar American language and especially the Chicago dialect. But here is the testimony of a most worthy journal that a group numbering twenty, the first of their kind, have acquired such fluent and idiomatic command of the vernacular that they are capable of writing Chicagoese like the most misguided inhabitant of that irreverent town. In fact, since the most arrant Chicagoisms of the native writers have hitherto escaped censure from our transatlantic contemporary, it must be concluded that these twenty eminent Britons have carried the literary style of our western metropolis to a peculiarly odious extreme—that they have, in fact, out-Chicagoed Chicago.

But this theory, while it covers some of the facts, leaves other and equally important phenomena unexplained, the chief of which is this: That all previous reviewers have found that the work in question leans to the side of British English rather than American English, whenever it departs from the purest standards of the Anglo-American language. Our readers will remember that in an article in this paper B. B. Tyler criticised the book as being too British in its diction and that a correspondent who signed himself "John Bull" defended it as being pure enough for anybody. It has remained for the London News to discover that those characteristics which others have considered distinctively and colloquially British are in reality Americanisms, and that the spirit of sacrilege which motivated the enterprise had its source in Chicago.

All this is one on the London News, of course. But it has a wider significance. Is it not a typical instance of the common misconception of the American people and their ways by foreigners, even by those cousins over seas—we would rather call them brothers—who are so closely allied to us in birth and speech and common interests that the term "foreign" seems a harsh misnomer? We love our British brothers collectively and many of them individually, but it must be confessed that it has grown to be a national failing with them to fancy that they know the American—singular number, for they conceive of only one type—like a book. The American's knowledge of English characteristics may be equally superficial and fragmentary, but he recognizes that it is not perfect. That is the difference. As a curious instance of facile and confident use of misinformation about American speech may be cited a passage in a book by a reputable British author who chances to allude to somebody's rubber overshoes—he calls them "galoshes"—and adds parenthetically "(or 'gummies,' as our American friends would say)." Would they, indeed! "Gummies!" Well, that is not so bad as the blunder of the London daily which mistook the composite colloquialisms of twenty English professors for a particularly outrageous specimen of "the American language."

Notes and Comments.

"The sermon reminded me of the motion of a squirrel in a cage: the repetition of a single idea with scarcely a variation of words, without natural beginning and without natural end, and capable, if necessary, of going on forever." The historian Froude thus describes a sermon which he once heard by a minister whose identity he charitably conceals. Have you ever heard one of the sort? Of course we know you never preached one.

The editor of this paper who has been somewhat seriously ill for more than two weeks, wishes it stated that he is convalescent and hopes to be able to approach the festal board on Thanksgiving day at least close enough to view it as from Pisgah's heights with wistful eye—observation without participation. The editor's chair has not been easy enough during the past two weeks to justify even an attempt at a continuance of the Editor's Easy Chair. It will re-appear after another week or two.

"Holy Angels' Euchre" is a headline which recently appeared announcing a mammoth euchre party to be given by and for the "Church of the Holy Angels." Not to mention the question of morals and the ethics of euchre parties, certainly no one with a sense of humor could ever perpetrate such a monstrosity as this heading. The very headline has the same crass grotesqueness that one finds in the Café de Ciel in Paris, where white-robed and paper-winged servitors with tin halos serve beer in a room built to look like a church for the delectation of those maudlin spirits who consider that sort of thing entertaining.

A Holland submarine boat underwent an endurance test last Saturday night which showed its ability to keep its occupants under water in comfort for a considerable time. The boat with its full crew was sunk in New York harbor and remained on the bottom fifteen hours. At the end of that time the electric apparatus put the pumps to work, emptied the reservoirs and the boat rose to the service. The crew reported that they had suffered no inconvenience from this novel experience of spending a night under water.

A Congregational minister in Chicago has drawn up a new catechism, with which he proposes to indoctrinate the young people of his church. So far as we are acquainted with it it appears to be an improvement upon the old, especially in that it leaves the rarefied atmosphere of theological explanations and comes down to the practical duties of the Christian life. Such a catechism might be a very useful and unobjectionable instrument. No one will deny that there is need for instruction, and the question-and-answer method has its advantages. Moreover, a catechism gotten up by one minister for the use of his own congregation would not be likely to usurp a fictitious and creedal authority over the popular mind, as the old catechism did for many generations.

Again the question has come up regarding the appropriation of public money for sectarian schools—which means Catholic schools, since all Protestant bodies have now ceased to desire it. The Catholics are again trying to get money from the government for their Indian schools by the same old argument: that the Indian children are being educated in Catholic schools at the request of their parents and that the schools should therefore be supported by the funds which the government holds in trust for the Indians. The argument is practically the same as that for supporting parochial schools on public school funds raised by taxation, for tax money constitutes a fund held by the government in trust for the people. Instead of taxing the Indians, the government gives them credit for certain sums in return for land. The case is virtually the same. Rome has never been able to reconcile herself to the free public school system which is the corner stone of our institutions.

Newspaper dispatches indicate that there has been a row in Jerusalem between certain Roman Catholics and members of the Greek Church. The quarrel occurred at the Church of the Holy Sepulchre where both worship together, glaring at each other meanwhile out of the corners of their eyes, while Turkish Mohammedan soldiers keep the peace. But even the Turkish soldiery on this occasion could not restrain the zeal of these two groups of Christians, and their jealousy over the honor of sweeping the court of the sanctuary brought on blows. With such a situation as this, Mohammedan soldiers trying with only partial success to quiet brawling Greeks and Romanists, one reflects with satisfaction that the spot desecrated by the turmoil has really less sanctity than is generally imputed to it. The claim that this is the place where the body of Jesus was laid in the rock-hewn sepulchre has probably as little historical foundation as most of the pedigrees of the miracle-working relics. But any place on God's earth is too holy to be a fit scene for a religious fight.

As the opening of the new session of Congress approaches, the citizens of St. Louis are beginning anew to wonder what the House of Representatives will think of the twelfth congressional district of Missouri sending to it "Two Frolics Daily" Butler, an individual whose career thus far in life has been brilliant only by the reflected radiance of the footlights of his vaudeville theatres. As a theatrical manager, Mr. Butler has accomplished a double success. He has apparently made some money, and he has given his theatres such a reputation that even their names cannot be mentioned in any circle of respectable society. When this eminent statesman presents himself to be sworn in as a member of the United States Congress, he will be protested and evidence will be presented to the committee on elections to prove that he was elected by fraud. It will be no trouble to show that there was fraud at the election, but it may be hard to demonstrate that the fraud was greater than his majority. But in any case he ought to be voted out as one whose character is a stench in the nostrils of all decent people. Roberts was a polygamist, and polygamy is a crime, but he may have persuaded himself that his religion justified his practice. But Butler's moral perversity is not even a matter of false religion, but just simple nastiness.

An outbreak at Athens is reported as the result of a proposal to translate the gospels into modern Greek. A popular meeting in the field surrounding the columns of the ancient temple of Jupiter Olympus passed resolutions calling on the synod to excommunicate any one who undertakes such a translation, and it is reported that a ministerial crisis in the government is imminent. The site of an old pagan temple is certainly an appropriate place for such a demonstration of superstitious zeal. There is still some uncertainty, however, as to the exact cause of the trouble, which is stated in the dispatches as simply a protest against the translation of the gospels into modern Greek. As a matter of fact, the gospels are already translated into modern Greek and copies of the translation have for years been on sale in the book stores in every Greek city that has a book store. The writer has a copy of the New Testament in modern Greek which he bought in Corinth. It was printed in Cambridge and from the price at which it was sold, had evidently been sent either for free distribution or to be sold at less than cost for missionary purposes. An enterprising peddler, however, was selling them at the railway station, cheaply enough but doubtless to his own profit, knowing full well that such foreign travelers as could read modern Greek would be glad to have a copy that they might read Paul's epistles as they journeyed along by the Gulf of Corinth. It may be that the present protest arises from a proposal to issue a revised translation or one under the sanction of the orthodox Greek Church.

However helpful and necessary it may be to preserve "the form of sound words," it should be remembered that nothing is easier than to preserve the form and lose the substance. J. H. Wright illustrates that important principle with the following:

"A member of the Christian Church was insistent upon leaving it that she might become a Christian scientist. She was asked if she were not in danger of surrendering her faith in Christ and neglecting his positive commands. She most earnestly resented this idea, claiming that the Bible was more precious to her than ever. Being asked if the Lord's supper was observed by them, she said, hesitatingly, 'Well, no; not in the sense you observe it.' 'Why not?' 'Well, you do it in remembrance.' Now Christ is ever with us. We can't 'remember' one who is with us, hence we do not observe it as you do.' And this is a fair sample of the false teachings of Christian Science. By its theories it obliterates the Lord's supper as a memorial institution. Sin is robbed of all its biblical significance. Bible words they still retain, but not in their biblical usage. And any theory that leads one away from the plain teachings of the word of God must fall under the same condemnation as did Elymas who 'perverted the right way of the Lord.'"

The combination of the northern railways, through the agency of the newly incorporated Northern Securities Company, is becoming more and more an assured fact, and the opposition to the combination is at the same time taking definite form. The governor of Minnesota has reiterated his determination to fight the combination to the last ditch and says he will spend his private fortune in the work if a sufficient amount cannot be secured otherwise. The leaders of the combination, of course, assert that their procedure is perfectly legal. Of course there is nothing inherently illegitimate in the existence of a state of peace between competing roads instead of a state of war, as most of the anti-trust legislation unfortunately seems to assume. There is an obvious need for federal legislation to cope with the growing dangers with which the trusts threaten the commercial world. As regards railroads, one is sometimes tempted to think that they are of necessity too large an affair and too closely connected with the welfare of the whole country to allow a few persons to own and control them. If the drift is toward public ownership, then these combinations which are now the objects of so much dread, may be only the preparatory stages of a larger combination under governmental ownership and control. One may not view that prospect without forebodings of other dangers, yet on the whole it is a more comforting outlook than any logical termination of the trust question which we can conceive. One thing is certain: that the industrial world will never go back to the old method of competition unrelieved by any sort of agreement, understanding or combination. Nothing short of sheer confiscation of all that one may accumulate in excess of a certain amount can prevent some men from acquiring great wealth, and, since this is not Turkey, that method is scarcely available.

Why Should Young Men & Women Go to College?

By PRESIDENT JOHN HENRY BARROWS, D. D., of Oberlin College

I have seen many answers to this question, and they cover usually the same ground. A college course enlarges manhood and womanhood; it is the best means of developing thought power; it enables one to make the most of himself; it gives knowledge and discipline; it makes one more effective for whatever work in life he has to do; it makes a man capable of filling a larger place in the world.

President Seelye, of Smith College, says, "The chief reason why a young woman of average ability should take a college course is to gain most surely and quickly the truest knowledge of herself and the world in which she lives, in order that she may become the perfect woman she was designed to be." President Taylor, of Vassar, has said, "College training is the best preparation for any line of life to which one may be called." Monsignor Conaty, rector of the Catholic University of America: "A college training gives thorough discipline of mind and will, and makes the student's own life fuller for humanity." Commissioner William T. Harris, of the Bureau of Education, has written: "A college course gives the survey of human knowledge presented in the light of the unity of all knowledge." President Eliot, of Harvard, writes: "It gives a wider outlook over the world of human society. It shows the young man his own powers, and teaches him to use them for his own good and the good of others." Senator Depew remarks: "I never met a millionaire who had not the equipment of a thorough education whose regret was not profound and deep that he had not this training." These testimonies might be indefinitely multiplied.

But let us now consider the question, "Why one should go to college," more analytically and carefully. Let us ask ourselves, What are the advantages of the educated life, and especially of a college education? Of course we might limit these to secular advantages; and these are not to be underestimated. It certainly pays to take a college course, from the business point of view. The statistics show that "college bred men and women earn upon an average three hundred per cent. more than those who do not have a college education." The chances for success in life are greatly enhanced. Even in business pursuits, investigations show that a college training multiplies a man's chances of success about twenty-five times. The college-trained man knows how to apply himself systematically, and he has greater intellectual resources. The late Ex-Mayor Strong, of New York, said that if he had to choose between two applicants for a position, the one a college man and the other a smart young fellow with only a common school education, he would engage the college graduate if he displayed an equal capacity for work. It is a great misfortune that the formal education of so many young business men ceased when they were boys. In their competition with college men of equal natural ability and faithfulness, these persons are eclipsed and outstripped. President Depew, of the New York Central Railroad, has said that hundreds of college men have begun at the bottom of railroad work and have soon distanced the uneducated boy and man.

If one's idea of success in life is to achieve reputation, to rise to a position of eminence, the college training is of immeasurable service. President Bashford has said that "while only one person in fifteen hundred is a college graduate in this country, still, over fifty per cent. of the leading representatives of our government in all the high offices are drawn from this mere handful of our citizens." Under the dome of the new House of Representatives in Boston, Massachusetts has inscribed the names of fifty-three of her most eminent citizens. Of these fifty-three, forty were college men. In Appleton's Encyclopedia of American Biography, there are fifteen thousand names, over one-third of which are of college men. It is estimated that of those without college training, only one in every ten thousand has risen to an eminence sufficient to have his biography written in this encyclopedia—one in ten thousand. But of the college men, one out of every forty has reached this recognition. Of the thirty-two speakers of the National House of Representatives, sixteen have been college trained. Twelve of the twenty-four presidents have been college graduates, and some of the others have attended college. Of the thirty-six secretaries of state, twenty-eight were college bred. Our greatest poets, historians, philosophers and theologians represent, with hardly an exception, a college training. Of the twenty-eight most eminent English authors of the present generation, all but two have been trained at the universities.

But I do not wish to confine the thoughts of my readers to this kind of an education. Let us inquire what education does for the mind. Aristotle was once asked, "In what respect do the educated differ from the uneducated?" and he answered, "As the living differ from the dead." In these days we are referring everything more and more to life. We are asking of literature what it does for life; of science, what it does for life; of the family, of the government, of the school, what they do for the enlargement and ennoblement of human life. The Christian college may say justly in the words of the Savior of mankind, "I have come that ye might have life, and have it more abundantly." The college of the earlier days may have had for its purpose to make ministers. The American college of a later day may have had for its purpose to make statesmen, servants of the country. The college of the present has for its highest purpose to make men and women of the best quality, the greatest strength, and the noblest purpose in life. We may say of a person that he is what he thinks; that he is what he feels; that he is what he wills. Accurate and enlarged thinking, noble feeling called forth by the great variety of objects and ends; strong, virtuous, unselfish, willing, choosing; these make character, these fashion manhood and womanhood.

I do not deny that some persons have gained a true and valuable education outside the college. So men have crossed the Atlantic slowly, perilously, in small sailboats. But the college is like the ocean steamship. It is the accepted and best way of accomplishing a great thing. What does the college life, properly pursued, do for one? First, it gives the student a wide general culture. It makes him familiar with the chief domains of knowledge. He learns to live in several of the chief spheres of human thought. He has wider intellectual sympathies; he is delivered from narrow-mindedness, from moving in one small groove. How is it accomplished? By the application of the mind, in a vigorous and liberal way, to the chief departments of the world's knowledge. Spaciousness is its fundamental characteristic; roominess. There are wide outlooks. History, poetry, science, various forms of literature and philosophy, have built this mansion; and they inhabit it as gracious companions. We come to the college life after our preliminary training with partial possession of our powers, and with some definite knowledge of the more important things to be known. But in the true college, limitations are removed, walls are broken down, we get out into larger thought, the ampler conception of truth. Take history, for example. Imagine the effect on a mind like that of young Abraham Lincoln of his reading the life of Washington and the story of the American Revolution. Here was a hungry soul with very limited advantages, hungry for knowledge. Among his ignorant neighbors he was not satisfied. He learned what little they could teach him. But this book made him know America, and the pure, strong, rounded character of the Father of his Country. And from that beginning he went out into the ever-enlarging spheres of knowledge and of interest. It is well for us to read carefully and thoughtfully the story of what is going on in many lands to-day. But how pitiful the mind of him who, reading the events of Great Britain this very year, has no knowledge of what lies back of them; who has no conception of the development of English history through two thousand years. I have traveled with people who were intensely interested, for example, in Winchester and Winchester cathedral in England, associated with King Alfred, William the Conqueror; a cathedral filled with memorials of English history for eight hundred years. My fellow-travelers admired the architecture, but they had scarcely any knowledge of great events and great names. This knowledge cannot be gained to any considerable extent in the hurry of travel. One must have had leisure to read whole books, to have become familiar with epochs and great men. Travel is a valuable means of education; but it is enormously enhanced with those who have had proper preparation for it.

Now, through history one lives over a man's past life. He makes himself at home in remote lands and epochs, or in those closer to himself. He develops memory, and gets the ages of human development sorted out, as it were. He does not confuse epochs. The larger spheres of human history are separated in his mind. He does not think of confounding the great empires of pre-Christian history with the later developments of the world. Nothing is more pitiful than the narrowness and ignorance which lump together things near and things remote in time and place. A little girl in a Unitarian Sunday-school in Boston was asked what she knew about Luther, and when he lived. She replied, "In the time of Moses." Another scholar replied, "I don't know when he lived, but I know he wrote the whole of the Bible." Such extreme cases help to make plain the value of that knowledge which separates and distinguishes, and places things in their proper order.

Another advantage of knowledge of the past is that it develops imagination, that imperial faculty by which one puts himself into the lives of others. I am not now referring to creative imagination; that of a Shakespeare or a Dante; the poetic creativeness which belongs to the supreme minds. I am referring to the imagination which reproduces to the mental vision the characters of human life, the scenes and events of human history. It is hard to exaggerate the enlarging power upon the young mind of the study of some great epoch or some great character. One lives over again the struggles of the civil war in England; he puts himself in the place of Cromwell or Hampden. He endeavors to think the thoughts of all the chief movers in that mighty drama. He feels once more what was in Milton's heart when he came back from his Italian travels to play a man's part in saving his nation from political and ecclesiastical despotism. And so with studying the French Revolution or the American Revolution, or the civil war in our own country, and so with the study of Athens against Asiatic despotism and barbarism. The same liberalizing potency belongs to a real, true study of the great poets, of the literature bibles of mankind, the real kind of poet like Tennyson. The modern method of studying the Christian scriptures leads to the best educational results. And I might mention other sorts of books which exercise this disimprisoning power, taking us out of ourselves into the great free world of life. And therefore I mention this as the first advantage of a true college training, that it enlarges not only our mental horizon, but our intellectual mansion. We not only see more and farther and wider, but become more and greater and better. Of course this enlargement goes over into the feelings as well as into the perceptions and the imagination. We come to care for more things.

A main purpose and result of education is the enlargement of one's sphere of life, the calling forth of our latent powers, which have in them the prophecy of immortality. It is a sad spectacle which once in a while we witness, the paralysis of a human arm. Inactive and useless, it shrivels. Now, intellectually, man is a Briareus. He has a hundred arms. And the uneducated man goes through life with most of these in a sling, shriveled, unused, unstrengthened, and hence valueless. The supreme blessing of a thorough college training is this: that it lets loose the latent forces of the human soul. It gives them air and exercise and development; not singly, but in their relation one to another.

But, besides all this, a second service which a thorough college training is fitted to furnish is equally important. It gives us possession of ourselves, not only by enlarging the sphere of our thoughts, providing a wonderful outlook over mankind, it also teaches us to command and utilize our mental possessions, to concentrate our mental powers on special objects, to give us ease and accuracy of expression. One may have an enlarged mind filled with much knowledge, but resembling a spacious mansion with all its furniture badly arranged; with all its articles of adornment and usefulness misplaced, that is, placed where they cannot be found or brought out when needed. The object of education is not merely knowledge or mental enlargement, it is also discipline, and for effectiveness in life, discipline is quite as important as knowledge. All educators confess that the college trained man can apply himself and master more quickly than others difficult tasks and problems, whether in law, medicine, business, or other forms of practical life. A college course, faithfully pursued, gives a wide discipline of the powers of expression. Language is by no means the smallest part of a true education. It is the hall-mark of academic gentility. I have no space to set forth another important service which the college renders. It is this: It enlarges the sphere and the means of a noble happiness. He who utilizes faithfully the advantages of a good college has multiplied the sources of joy and gains a new and deeper conviction that life is well worth living.

UNCLE TOBE'S THANKSGIVING.

By WILL H. DIXON.

I'se a-feelin' pow'ful t'ankful on dis T'anksgibin' day,
Dat de good Lawd's not forsook me, but still guides me on mah way.
I kain't understan' de reason why some folks am allus sad,
When de good Lawd's sun am shinin', an' all de worl' am glad.
Ob co'se de drout hab done some harm, an' de tater crap am small,
But Lawsy! da's a plenty—da's a plenty foh us all;
Co'se all de days ain't sunshine, an' life am not all fun,
Da's got ter be some clouds obscu' de brightness ob de sun.

So while I'se feelin' t'ankful, yit I pause to drap a teah,
Kase little Tobe an' Dinah am not wid me heah dis yeah;
'Peared lak Dinah dess kerflumixed when little Toby died,
She tuk a tuggin' at de heah, an' a mizzry in de side;—
Yit when dey laid dem bof away out dar up on de hill,
I know'd de Lawd was wid me, an' His lub was roun' me still;
An' so I'se t'ankful heah alone, wid my ole heah sobbin' teahs,
But I'se had dere sweet companionship, froo all de long pas' yeahs.

An' so I'se not complainin' 'bout de t'ings I hasn't got,
I'se t'ankful foh de t'ings I has, an' contented wid my lot;
T'ankful foh fruits an' harvest, foh de plenty in de lan', I'se t'ankful foh de sunshine, an' de Lawd's own guidin' han'.
Co'se, Boss, dat muley cow, done died, an' I dess near 'bout gib up,
But w'at's de use to mo'n foh dat? I still has de brindle pup!
An' ef dar ain't so many blessin's dat I has upon my list,
Den I'se t'ankful foh de curses froo de Lawd's good help I'se missed.

Co'se, Ben, dat ole blind mule, done died, but Lawsy! w'at o' dat?
I'se not a-gwine to mo'n foh him, when I has de ole gray cat.
Den dat little yaller roostah, he took de pip an' died,
An' de red one he kerflumixed, de one I meant to fried;
But Unc' Jerry brung me possum, an' he mighty good an' fat;
Wid co'n-pone an' sweet pertaters I dess hab a feast on dat.
An' so I'se not complainin' 'bout de thorns from day to day,
An' I'se t'ankful foh de roses dat I finds along mah way.

An' ef de good Lawd gibs de birds an' beasts His lovin' care, Ain' He gwine keer fer His chilluns no mattah whar dey are?
Co'se de roof ob de house hab done cাবে in whar de raftahs use ter be,
But Lawsy! it'll last awhile, plenty long enuff foh me;
Foh I'se not-a gwine ter be heah only dess a little while,
An' so instead ob cryin', I dess fairly has to smile.
I keeps a-lookin' at de flowahs dat my pafway heah adorns,
An' while lookin' at de posies, I forgits about de thorns.

An' when I takes dat fiddle down an' 'gins to softly play,
Dess 'pears lak Dinah am wid me heah on dis T'anksgibin' Day,
An' I heah's her voice a-singin' in de music sweet an' cleah,
An' little Toby's prattle sayin', "W'y, daddy, I is heah!"
Den I draws de bow mo' sof'ly, as a voice dess seems to say:
"Feah not, Toby, I am wid thee, Lo! I'm wid thee all the way."
Den I knows de Lawd's a-speakin' an' He'll lead me, by an' by,
Up to little Tobe an' Dinah, to T'anksgibin' in de sky.

SOME PILGRIM LOVE STORIES

✧ Sidelights on the History of Plymouth Colony ✧

By W. H.
ROGERS

The career of Israel under Moses is reproduced in the lives of the pilgrim fathers. Says a distinguished civilian: "Never since Moses led the Children of Israel into the promised land, has there been such an epic as the voyage of the Mayflower, and the landing of the pilgrims at Plymouth Rock."

The history of the latter event, as written by Bradford and Morton, reads strangely like the former as written by Moses. Their enthusiasm over the signal demonstration of God's providence in their behalf never failed. They claimed for themselves the mercies of God to Israel and repeated psalm 107 as their own experience:

"They wandered in the wilderness in a solitary way. They found no city to dwell in. Hungry and thirsty their soul fainted in them. Then they cried unto the Lord in their trouble, and He delivered them out of their distresses. And he led them forth by the right way that they might go to a city of habitation."

They noted the hand of God in the formation of Plymouth Harbor where the Mayflower lay at anchor as their home, pending the construction of their rude huts on the land. And here the historic vessel was protected from raging sea billows as by the strong loving arms of two great headlands, which stretched out from the mainland on either side, overlapping each other with just sufficient space for the exit and the entrance of the vessel. And when they would have sailed farther south, they were intercepted by a sand bar and driven into this harbor which God had prepared for them in the ages before.

They noted God's hand in the mild winter and in the coming of an early spring. It was God who, by an epidemic, wasted the savage tribe of Indians, just previous to their coming, leaving such gentle spirits among the red men as Hobbarnock, who welcomed the Englishmen and assisted them.

It was God's judgment that William Batten, the blasphemous servant of William Fuller, died of a grievous disease at sea; and God's providence that a son was born to Stephen Hopkins on the voyage, who was fittingly named Oceanus. So the vessel which left Plymouth, England, with one hundred and one souls aboard, reached Plymouth, America, with the same number.

They spent the winter building their log cabins (seven in number "which they daubed with mud"), and four other buildings. They were visited often and often that winter by a heavenly visitant, "the beautiful angel of death." He came six times before they had been here two weeks; he came eight times in January, seventeen times in February, thirteen times in March, and six times yet did he visit them before the year ended.

But to their faith the death angel never came except on a kindly errand of God. God wanted them to build their new world in America very close to the eternal world of which he gave them frequent glimpses.

So real was the unseen world to them, that in entering it their friends were even nearer to them than before. Death united them. It did not divide. Bright gleams from heaven relieved the gloom of earth, and not until we ourselves have become more spiritual shall we know what lasting strength has come into our American civilization as the result of the fifty persons who died the first year, at the end of which they were fifty on earth and fifty in heaven, but all one family.

And so they greeted the spring with glad hearts, and rejoiced in the singing of the birds. Cheerfully they sowed their peas and barley, and planted their beans and corn. Stiff work. All done by hand. No plows or cattle. Their harvest was good; the peas alone being a failure.

The writer has often visited Plymouth. He has talked with the lineal descendants of Bradford and Carver and Alden and Peregrine White. A few months since, I had the privilege of sitting at a dinner-table with a lineal descendant of Alden on my right, and a lineal descendant of Peregrine White on my left. The former was Daniel Webster's pastor in his last days, and preached his funeral sermon. I think I have had some opportunity of knowing the spirit of that famous colony. I know positively it was not the intolerant, gloomy crowd that it has been often painted.

Their religion too, was relieved by pleasurable romance. Their piety was mingled with pleasantry. Their weeping was interspersed with hearty laughter. The pilgrim colony was a graceful blending of light and shadow, of earnestness and cheerfulness, of a rational enjoyment of this world with a glad hope of the next.

Of the survivors remaining in the country after the deaths of the first year, the average length of life was 37 years. If I remember right, there were no more deaths for three years. And this first year there were births as well as deaths, and weddings as well as funerals. Little Peregrine White was born on the Mayflower. His father died a short time after—Feb. 21, 1621, and on the following 12th of May his mother was married to Edward Winslow, a gentleman of some means, whose wife had died only seven weeks before. Let us not be shocked at these hasty marriages of widows and widowers. There was wisdom, not to say necessity, in the case, and the circumstances under which they took place could provoke no scandal. The battle of life was before them with scant accommodations, and they made the best of circumstances and the most of one another. But it seems to illustrate that their sorrows were sweetened with joys, and their joys tempered by sorrows.

I fancy we may poorly appreciate the quality of their love, and the richness of their joy, for faith and submission brought them near to the God of joy and the God of love.

Death plucked the dear Rose from the bosom of Capt. Miles Standish on Jan. 24, 1621. In less than one month the doughty captain had sent John Alden as his messenger to William Mullins to ask him for his daughter, Priscilla. This sending of a messenger to "pop the question" was a custom of the times, and some of us have seen the time when we would like to have had that one good old puritan custom revived.

Notwithstanding the very recent death of Rose, Mr. Mullins was willing that Priscilla should marry the captain, but he told John that Priscilla herself must be consulted. Priscilla was called in, and John, the stripling who first leaped on the rock when the Mayflower landed, a young man 22 years of age, of excellent form, of fair complexion and ruddy countenance, delivered his address in a very courteous and prepossessing manner. Priscilla, a very beautiful maiden, listened with respectful and captivating attention, and after quite a pause she fixed her eyes on John, and with an open and pleasant countenance said, "Prythee, John, why do you not speak for yourself?"
